The king considering this, withdrew himselfe from the counsaile of his Lordes, which then were assigned to sit at London for matters of the Parliament: So that Counsaile which was ordeyned for the purpose to haue the Parliament, was delayed and layd asyde. And these false counsaylours fled from the king into dyuers partes. And among other, Mighell de la Poole Erle of Suffolke fled into Calice, and as it was then sayde, he had shauen off the heare of his heade, and came in lyke a Poulter to the Gates of the Castell of Calice to sell his Capons, where as his brother was Capitain: and anone he was knowne, and taken, and brought to William Beauchampe his brother Capiteyne of Calice, who forthwith brought him into England to the king. But the king was not a little displeasid with his brother for taking and bringyng of him, and therefore committed him to ward. But afterward he set him againe at libertie, for that it should not appere that he punished him for that cause, and so he returned to Calice, & kept his place. Yet Mighell de la Poole, fearing still the displeasure of the great Lordes would not tary, but toke his leaue of the king and departed from him. And the king beyng now destitute of the sayde Chaunceloz, and also of the Duke of Ireland, was nothing contented in his mynde: But forthwith sent for the sayde Duke of Ireland to come to him. And also he sent one Thomas Molyners, which was a man of great power in the Counties of Lancashire and Cheshire, and by him the king sent to the Shirife of Chester a Commission vnder a secrete seale, commaūdyng him that he should arreyse a great power, and that they should see the Kinges kinsman and especial friend the Duke of Ireland conueyed in safetie to his presence, not lettynge for any labour or expenses. Then this Molyners reysed a great power, and suche as for the loue they bare vnto the Duke of Gloucester, and to the other Lordes, would not go with him, he did emprison them in dyuerse prisons, commaūdyng the Jaylor to kepe them streyt in Irons, and to geue them bread and water, and some day water onely, vntill his returne againe. The king also commaūded Sir Raufe Vernon, and Sir Raufe Ratcliffe to assist them: And so they set forth toward the king, and they were in number aboute fife thousand men. Wherof when the Duke of Gloucester had knowledge, he and the Erle of Darbie, the Erle of Arondell, the Erle of Warwike, and the Erle of Nottingham assembled their powers out of all quarters, to ayde and assist them with all speede agaynst these oppressors of the Commons, and of the Realme, Realme, for feare least the honour of the Realme of Englande should be by them troden vnder foote.

The Duke of Irelande hauyng in his company Molyners, Vernon, and Ratcliffe, with a power of fife thousand men, as aforesayde, came still forward vntill he came to Radcocke Bridge, not passyng foure myles from Chepyng Norton: and if he had passed the same bridge, he had bene sure out of the daunger of his enemyes. But when he came thether, he founde it kept by the Erle of Darbyes folkes, which had broken the bridge, and so stopt his passage: And within a little way therof lay the Erle of Darby himselfe with a great company. But after the Duke of Irelande had knowledge of the Erles beyng there, he stayed and caused the Kinges Banner to be displayed, and with a mery countenance he exhorted his company to quite themselves balliantly, and he caused his Trompettes to sound: howbeit, there appeared vnto him, that as some were willyng to fight on his part, so there were other that clerely forsooke him, and sayde they would not fight agaynst so manye Noble men, nor in so vniust a cause. The Duke of Irelande espyng this, gaue his horse the spurres, and roade forward, thinking to haue passed the Bridge: But when he came thether and sawe the Bridge broken, he sayde with open voyce, we are deceyued, and turned his horse and alighted, and gate him vpon an other Courser, myndyng to haue fled ouer the Chamys: But there met him the Duke of Gloucester, with his companie. And when he sawe that he was enclosed amongest his enemyes on the one syde, and the Riuer of Chamys on the other syde, and also the Erle of Darby to please on him so far for to haue taken him, he thought to put all to hazard, and cast away his Gauntlets, and his sword to make him the lighter, and gaue his horse the spurres, and toke the riuer, and so escaped all his enemyes. And the next newes that was heard of him, was, that he was slaine in Louaine in huntynge of a wilde Boare, in the yere of our Lorde. 1393. and in the .xvi. yere of the reigne of King Richarde the seconde. But when King Richarde heard of his death, he tooke it merueylous heauily, and to shew the great affection that he bare vnto him, he commaūded that his dead carkasse should be brought from Loueyn into England, and to be conueied with all solempne funerall pompe to the Priorie of Colney in Essex, and caused him to be layde in a Coffin of Cypresse, and to be adourned with princely garmentes, and his face vncouered, and garnished with a Chaîne of Golde, and riche ringes put on his fingers. And the king himselfe was at his buryall accompanied with the Dukes mother, and with one Archebishop, and sundrie other Bishops: But of Noble men, there were very fewe, for they had conceyued suche hatred agaynst him, that they bitterly contemned him. But to returne where he left: After the Duke was fled, as aforesayde, Thomas Molyners would haue folowed him also, but the Lorde Mortimer drewe him backe and there killed him. Then the Lordes armye set vpon the people that came with the Duke out of Cheshire, Lancashire, and Wales, and toke them as enemyes, and spoyled them of their horse, harnesse, Bowe, and Arrowes, and so sent them home without doying of them any more harme.

After this the Duke of Gloucester, and the other Lordes went to Dr-enforde, beyng sozry that their fortune was not to haue taken the Duke of Ireland. And there they tooke their counsaile what was best for them further ther to do, to bring their purpose to good ende. And from thence they remoued to Saint Albons, and came thether on Christmas Euen, and there taried that day and the next, and on Saint Stephens day they tooke their way to London, & there mustered themselues besydes Clerkenwell, with a goodly army, which they diuided into thre battayles, and their harness was so cleane and bright, that it was a goodly sight to beholde: And they sent two Knights, and two Esquiers vnto the Maior of London, and Aldermen, and chiefe Citizens of the same, that they should come and declare vnto the sayde Lords, whether they were minded to take their partes, and the partes of the Commons, or else with the Duke of Irelande, and his Adherentes, Traytors vnto the King and the Realme. So came the Maior of London, whose name was Nicholas Erton, and certeine of the chiefe of the Citie with him, and brought the Keyes of the Citie with them, and submitted themsel-ues to the Lordes, and offered them entrie into the Citie at their pleasures with all their people. And then the Lordes sent certeine personnes befoze, to searche if there were any bishmentes, or personnes lye in wayte, for to trap or destroy them. And when they were well assured that all was cleere, they entred into the Citie, and there abode quietly. Sone after their commyng, meanes was made that there might be a meetyng betwixt the King and the Lords, & that they might come to common with him in the tower of London, which was agreed vpon. And the fryday folowynge came vnto the King sitting in a Pavilion stately apparellled, the Duke of Gloucester, the Erle of Nottyngham, and the Erle of Darby. But befoze they commyng into the Tower, they had the Keyes of the Gates sent vnto them, and of all the strong holdes within the Tower. And so soone as they came into the kinges presence, after their humble salutations done, they requested the King, that all those of his Court which were knowne or suspected of treason to his person or realme, might be taken and committed to seuerall holdes, the which the King graunted. And durynge the tyme of this communication, the Erle of Darby desyred the King vpon the Wall of the Tower to beholde the people that were there assembled for the preservation of him and his realme, which he did, and marueyled much to see such a goodly armie and strength. Then sayde the Duke of Gloucester vnto him, sir this is not the tenth part of your willyng subiectes that would haue risen to haue destroyed these false Traytors. And after they had such communication with the King, they would haue taken their leaue of him: But the King desyred them to tary all night there with the Quene. The Duke thynkyng to make all sure, made his excuse that he durst not be absent from all those folkes which they had brought with them, for feare that some businesse might arise, eyther in the armie, or in the Citie. But at the kinges instance, the Erles of Nottyngham, and Darby ta-ryed there all night.

And the next daye King Richard, at the instance of the Lordes, caused to be taken all suspect folkes of his courte, and to be sent into dyuers prisons to be kept against the parliament, and then to come to their aunswere. The persons that were apprehended, were these. Sir Symond Burley, Sir Wylliam Elm, Sir Nicholas Dagwoorth, Syr John Goloford, Clifford and Slake priests, Sir John Beawthamp, Syr Thomas Creuet, Syr John Salsburie, and one called Lyncoln, and James Barners a priest. There should also haue bene apprehended Alexander Neuell Archbishop of Yorke, Wighell de la Poole Erle of Suffolk, and Robert Tresilian chiefe Justice of England, but these would not be found. And there was also taken Syr Robert Brember of London knight, but he found suretie for his foorth commyng. Other Lords and Ladies there were that were put out of the Court, as John Fortham Bishop of Delyn, Lord Bewmond, Lorde Sowche, Lorde Louell, Lorde Thomas Canweyes, the Lord Cliffords sonne, Lord Bawdewyn, the Bishop of Chichester the kinges Confessor, the Lady Mo-noy, the Lady Poynings, the Lady Molyners and dyuers other.

Shortly after, that is to say the morow after Candlemas daye the parliament began, the which was named the parliament that wrought wonders. And the first daye of the parliament were arested sytting in their places all the Justices except Sir Wylliam Skipwoorth, that is to saye, Sir Roger Fulthorpe, Syr Robert Welknap, Sir John Carey, Syr John Holt, Syr William Brooke, and John Moxton the kinges Sergeaunt at lawe, all which were committed to the Tower, and there kept in seuerall places. The cause of their apprehension was, for that at the last parliament the Lordes and Nobles were made gouernors of the realme, by the assent of the sayde parliament, and also by the assent and counsaile of all the Justices then beyng, and therefore Indentures tripartited were made, wherof the one part remayned with the King, and the second parte with the Lordes that were chosen to gouerne the realme, and the thirde parte with the Justices. And for-as much as the sayde Justices at a counsaile holden at Nottyngham, as aforesayde, did afterward contrary to the sayde agreement, it was determy-ned that they should make aunswer therunto.

Irelande, Alexander Neuell Archebishop of Yorke, Wighell de la Poole Erle of Suffolk, Sir Robert Tresilian chiefe Justice of Englande, to an-swere Thomas of Woodstock Duke of Gloucester, Richard Erle of Aron-dell, Thomas Erle of Darby, and Thomas Erle of Nottyngham vpon certaine articles of high treason, which these Lordes did charge them with. And for as much as none of these appered, it was ordeyned by the whole assent of the parliament that they should be banished for euer: And their landes and goodes, moueable and bimmouable, to be forfeit and sealed into the kinges hand, the landes entayled onely except.

Shortly after this, was founde Robert Tresilian chiefe Justice lur-kyng in a Botcharies house at Westmynster, and there founde the meanes to haue spyes daylie vpon the Lordes what was done in the parliament: For all the dayes of his lyfe he was craftie, but at the last his craft turned to hys destruction: for he was discovered by his aboue seruant, and so taken and brought to the Duke of Gloucester, and the same daye had to the Tower, and from thence drawen to Tyborne, and there hanged.

The morow after, Syr Nicholas Brember which afore had bene Maior of the Citie of London against the Citezens will, was brought foorth.
This man had done in the Citie many great oppreessions, and in his Ma-raltie had made great and monstrous stockes to emprison men in, and also he caused to be made a common Are, to stryke of the heades of them which did resist his will and pleasure, for so highly was he in fauour with the King,

The next day after, there were condemned these folowynge, Thomas Uske, John Blagg, Sir Symon Burly, Syr John Beauchamp, Sir John Barners, John Erle of Salburie, and euerie of them were executed.

As touching the Iustices, they were also condemned to death by the Parliament: But suche meanes was made for them vnto the Quene, that she obteyned of the king pardon for their liues, but they forseyted their lands and goodes, and were iudged to perpetuall exile, and places appointed vnto them where they should remayne.

The Sadge of king Richard the second were white hartes with chapnes of Golde about their neckes.

And in the. xij. yere of the kings reigne, he kept a Marciall Justes in Smithfield in London, in the month of Nouember, where all such persons as came in on the kings partie, their Armour and apparell was garnished with whyte hartes, and crownes of Golde about their neckes.

And of that sorte were. xxiiij. knightes, with. xxiiij. Ladyes also appareled, as abouesayde, and their hozes were led with. xxiiij. Cheynes of Golde, and so conueyed from the Towze thorough the Citie of London vnto Smithfield, where the king, the Queene, and many other great estates beyng present (after proclamation by the Heraults made) many goodly and martiall feates of warre were practised, to the pleasaunt recreation of the king and the Queene, and all other the beholders of the same.

To this disporte came many straungers, among the which the Erle of Saint Paule, the Lorde Ostreuaunt, sonne and heyze vnto the Duke of Holland, and a yong sonne of the Erle of Ostrich, were greatly comended.

And when these Justes had cotinued by sundry times the space of. xxiiij. dayes, to the great ioye and comforte of the young lustie Bachelers, and to the kings great honor, who all that tyme kept open household for all honest comers: I say, when the same was finished, the straungers returned to their Countries with many riche giftes. And this yere also the Scottes brake into the Borders of Englande, robbed Comberland and Northumberlande, besieged new Castell, and discomfited and tooke prisoners the two sonnes of the Lorde Percy of Northumberlande. Cooper.

And at this time an Esquire of the Prouince of Nauarre, neere to Fraunce, accused an English Esquier, called John Welsh, of certaine points of treason. For triall whereof a daye was appointed for a fight to be taken betweene them, in the kings Palace at Westmynster, where eyther of them kept his day, and fought there a strong fight. But in the ende John Welsh was victour, and constrayned the other to peelde him: and then he was dyspoyled of his armor, and drawen to Tiborne, & there hanged for his vntreuth.

And thys yere a truce was taken betweene Englande and Fraunce, and Scotlande, for three yeres.

In the. viiiij. yere of this king, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, with a goodly company of men of armes, sayled into Spayne, to clayme there suche suche landes as he ought to haue, in the right of Dame Constance his wife, when the sayde Duke was vpon the other side of the Sea, there came vnto him the king of Portingale with a strong armie, and so entred the Territorie of Spaine. And there chaunced much harme to be done to the Spanyards in robbing and pylling their countrie, but whether by the Englishmen or the Portingales, it was not well knowen, but it caused grudge betwene the king of Portingale and the Duke, and also made many Spanyards that ought them good will to drawe back, and departe from them. And for reformation of that euill, certaine persons, as well English as Portingales that were founde gilty of suche robberie, were put to death: By meane wherof, the other feared so, that where by the former lewdnesse the Duke and the king were put to after deale, by the reformation of that euill, they gate againe daylie vpon their enemies: So that in processe of time the king of Spayne was driuen of necessitie to treat with the Duke of a peace and concord.

Of the which peace, as sayth Reynulph in his last boke, and. viij. Chapter, the conditions were these.

First, for a finall concord, the king of Spaine should mary the Dukes eldest daughter, named Constance.

Also, that he should geue vnto the Duke in recompense of costes so many wedges of Golde as shoulde lade eyght Charets. And that yere during the lyues of the sayde Duke and his wyfe, he should at his proper coste and charge, delyuer to the Dukes assignes ten thousand Marke of Gold, within the towne of Bayon.

And after this peace was stablished, and sureties taken for the performance of the same: The Duke departed with the king of Portingale, to whome shortly after he married his second daughter, named Anne.

And in this yere the Turkes made cruell warre agaynst the Genowayes or men of Geane, & they sought ayde of the king of England, and of the king of Fraunce. And for their helpe there was sent out of England a noble warryour called the Erle of Alby, with two thousande Archers. And out of Fraunce went the Duke of Burbon, and the Erle of Ewe, with. xv. hundred speares. The which kept their iourney vntill they came vnto a City in Barbary, named Thunys, sometime belonging to the sayde Genowayes, where the sayde English and frenchmen bare themselves so manfully, with the ayde of the Genowayes, that in processe they wanne the sayde Citie from the Turkes, and put the Genowayes agayne in possession thereof, and toke of them many prisoners, the which were exchaunged for chriстен prisoners befoze taken. And moze, they forced they sayde Sarazens to paye vnto the Genowayes ten thousande Ducates of Golde, for confirmation of a peace for a certaine time. But some other write, that this towne was not recouered, but only a truce taken for a time. And froissart sayth, that the Chriistians departed sodainely from the Citie of Thunys, without any league or truce making, fearing dyuers perilles and incidents that might else haue chaunced vnto them.

And here Cooper (in his Chronicle) sayth: That in this time in Englande it was decreed that the auctoritie of the Bishop of Rome should be ended with the Ocean Sea, and it should be lawfull thenceforth to no man to appeale to the Bishop of Rome, nor make sute that any Englishman should

And in this yere dyed king Robert of Scotland, and John Erle of Carreke his eldest sonne succeded and reigned after him, whome the Scottes called Robert after his father, because they thought John an vnluckie name in a King. He was mayned with the stroke of an horse in his youth, and so made vnhabable for the gouernaunce of the Realme, and Duke Robert of Albany continued as gouernoure all the tyme of hys reigne, and he reigned xviij. yeres.

King Richard lying at his Manor of Woodstock, and keepng there his Christmasse: The Erle of Pembroke beyng yong of age, was desirous to learne to iust, and requyred a knight named Sir John Saut John to run with him certeine courses. At whose request the sayd knight ranne with him in Woodstocke Parke certeine Courses. In the which, were it with stroke or other mishap, the sayde Erle receyued there his deathes wound, and dyed shortly after.

And at this tyme chaunced in London a Bakers seruant to carie a Basket full of horsebread: And as he came before the bishop of Sarisburies place in fletestreet, one of the Bishops seruautes tooke out one of the Loaves, and the Baker was earnest to haue it againe, and the Bishops seruaunt with his Dagger brake the Bakers heade: then came the Citizens and woulde haue had the Poman to Warde for breaking of the peace, and he resisted and fled into the Bishoppes house. Then roase the streete, namely the yorth, and they woulde haue had him out of the Bishoppes house, and there was great heauing and shouyng, and many people by. And at the last came the Maior of London, and the Shirifes, and they pacified this businesse as soone and as well as they could, and shortly after all was in quiet.

In this meane tyme, the Bishop of Sarisbury beyng at the Court with the King, and himselfe also being then high treasurer of England, such worde was brought him of this ryot, and the tale so euill tolde agaynst the Citizens and rulers of the Citie, that the sayd Bishop informed maister Arondell then Archebishop of Cantourbury, and Chaunceloz of Englande thereof, and in fine they two made so grienous a tale and complaint to the king agaynst the Rulers of the Citie, and Citizens, that the Maior and Shirifes were sent for in all hast: And when they came, they were shaken by to grienously, and their honest and reasonable excuses could not be heard: But forthwith the liberties of the Citie were seized into the Kinges handes, and the Maior and Shirifes discharged of their offices, and a knight named sir Edward Dalyngrige made Gouernour of the Citie.

And the king beyng thus in displeasure with the Citie, caused Michelmasse Terme to be kept at Porke, and so continued untill Christmasse next folowng.

The Citizens perceyving the king to continue in displeasure with them, made daily labour vnto such friendes as they could make, to pacify the kings wrath agaynst them, and to obteyne his most gracious pardon. The which at length, specially by the meane of the Queene, and Doctor Grauefende then Bishop of London, they obteyned. But first the Citizens were tolde that the

the King entended to come from his Manor of Shene, to the Citie of London, and then it was lyke they should obtain fauour: wherefoze in all goodly hast the Citizens trymmed and bewtefyed their Citie most sumptuously with Pageautes and riche hangyngs, and at the day appoynted, foure hundredeth of them in one Lyuery road and met the King on the Hethe on this side Shene, and in their most humble maner submitting themselues, and praiyng his grace to pardon their follyes past, besought him to take his way to hys Palayce of Westminster through the Citie of London. The which the King tooke in good part, and graunted them so to do: And when he came at London Bridge, they presented vnto him two sayre steedes, trapped in riche cloth of Golde, parted of red and white. The which present he thankfully receiued. And so the King kept on his way untill he came to the Standard in Cheepe, the Citizens of London in their Liueres standing vpon eyther syde of the street as the King went, cryng, King Richard, King Richard. And at the sayde Standard in Cheepe was ordeyned a sumptuous stage, in the whiche were set dyuers personages in rich apparell. Among the which, one Angell was ordeyned, which with a vice came downe, and set a riche crowne of gold garnished with stone and pearle vpon the Kinges heade as he passed by, and another on the Queenes, and so they roade forth untill they came at Westminster, where the Maior and his companie, takyng theyr leaue of him, returned to London.

The next day folowng, the Maior and his brethren went to Westminster, and presented there vnto the King two Basons of Siluer and gilt, and in them two thousand nobles of Golde, besechyng him in most humbly wise, to be good and gracious Lord vnto the Citie. The which he accepted thankfully, and gaue vnto them very comfortable wordes. And the thirde day folowng they receyued a newe confirmation of all their olde franchises and liberties: wherefoze by counsaile of their friendes, they ordeyned a Superaltare of Siluer, and guilt, and therein the stoye of Saint Edwarde was grauen most curiously, the which was valued at a thousand marke, and that they also presented as theyr gift vnto the King, which was berpe well accepted and taken.

And here Fabian sayth, that for the great zeale and loue that the aforesayde Bishop of London bare vnto the Citie and Citizens in this their sute to the King for their liberties, they of theyr awne good willes to this day, yerely vpon the feastful dayes, as the day y the Maior taketh his othe, which is the morowe after Simon and Jude, and Alhalowen day, Christmasse day, the Twelwe day, and Candlemasse day, when they go to Paules in theyr Liueres, they visite the place of his buryall, beyng in the middle Isle in the West ende of the Church, where the sayde Bishop is pictured and drawn forth in Brasse, holdyng the Charter of the Citie of London, and the great seale of England in his hand. But it seemeth to me that this is not true, for the place of buriall in Paules, to the which the Maior doth resozte, is the graue where William, sometyne Bishop of London is buryed, of whom we haue made mention in the first yere of William the Conqueror, who first obteyned the priuileges for the Citie, and so it appereth by the inscription vpon the same Grauestone.

And in this time, saith Fabian, dyuerse Gentlemen of Scotland chalenged sundrie poyntes of Armes with certeine Gentlemen of England. As first the Lorde Mordeise, chalenged the Erle of Nottyngnam Marshall of England. Sir William Darell Knight, and Cockborne Esquier, chalenged Sir Nicholas Haulbert Knight. And the same feates of Armes were holden in Smithfielde in London. And Mars was so friendly to the Engliske men, that the honour of that iourney went with them: Insomuche that the Erle Marshall ouerthrew the Lorde Mordeise his Appellant, and so brused him, that in his returne towarde Scotland, he dyed at Porke. And Sir William Darell refused his Appellant before they had runne theyr full courses. And the thirde of them, that is to wit Cockborne, was thowen at the seconde copying, to the ground, horse and man.

This yere and the. vij. day of June, dyed that gracious woman Quene Anne, and lyeth nowe buryed at Westminster by her Lord king Richard, by on the Southsyde of Saint Edwardes churche.

And this yere was a Truce concluded betweene Fraunce and England for foure yeres.

This yere king Richard made a boypage into Ireland, which was nothing profitable, nor honourable vnto him, and therefore the Wyfters seme to thinke it scant worth the notyng.

Also in this yere was a wonderfull tempest of wynde, which did muche hurte throughtout the Realme of England. And in this yere also dyed Constance, the second wife of John of Gaunt, and is buried at Lyncester.

This yere king Richard (as sayth Reynulph) went ouer to Calice, and there met with the French king about the conclusion of a maryage, which was with the Ladie Isabell daughter vnto the French king, whome the sayd French king did offer to the king of England to take in mariage as his wife. At the meting of these two Princes, was great prouision made of both sides, and many sumptuous shewes and sightes were there shewed and seene, and many riche and most costly bankets & feastes made by the one prince to the other, the reherfall wherof should be tedious, wherfore I will be short. At the last this mariage was agreed vpon, and the day of the solemnitie therof appointed. And the. xviii. day of Nouember, the sayde King Richard maryed the sayd Lady Isabell in Calice, beyng within the age of. viij. yeres, as saith Fabian. And Holidore also sayth that she was not of ripe and mete yeres to accompany with a man: But the Authour of the Booke which is called the Chronicles of England, sayth that she was. xix. yeres of age.

And here a little to note the giftes geuen of the Kinges one to another, whereof Froissart maketh a great & long discourse. But to be short, first king Richard gaue vnto the French king, a Bason of Golde, with an Ewer. Then the French King gaue him three standing Cups of Gold with Couers garnished with pearle and stone, and a ship of Gold richely garnished with perle and stone. At another metyng king Richard gaue him an Owoche, set with so fine stones, that it was valued at fiue hundreth Marke. Then the French king gaue him two flagons of Golde, a Tablet of Golde, and therein an Image of Saint Myghell richely garnished. Also a Tablet of Golde with a Crucifix, richely appoynted. And a Tablet of Golde with the Image of the Giftes geuen by the Kinges of England and Fraunce.

Trinitie set with pearle and stone, and a Tablet of Golde with an Image of Saint George, richely set with pearle and stone, which all were valued at xv. hundreth Marke. Then king Richard seeyng the bountie of the French king, gaue to him a Bawderick or Coller of Gold, set with great Diamods, Rubyes, and Baleses, beyng valued at fiue thousand Marke, the which for the richenesse thereof, and for the excellency and finenesse of the workmanship, the French king ware it aboute his necke, as often as the king and he met together. Then the French king gaue to him an Owoche and a spice Plate of Golde of a great weight, valued at two thousand Marke. Also many were the riche giftes that were geuen and receyued of Lordes and Ladies of both Princes. Among the which are specially noted foure giftes, which king Richard gaue vnto the Duke of Orleans, for the which he receyued againe of the Duke treble the value. For where his were valued at a thousand Marke: The Dukes were valued at three thousand Marke.

Now after that these two Kinges had thus solaced themselves, the one with the other, and all matters concerning the mariage fully concluded and ended. The French King, taking his leaue of King Richard, delyuered his young daughter vnto him, and sayde as followeth.

Right louyng sonne, I delyuer here to you the creature that I most loue in this worlde next my wife and my sonne, beseeching the father of heauen, that it may be to his pleasure, & to the weale of your realme, and that the amitie betweene these two realmes, in aduoydyng of the effusion of christian blood, may be kept inuolably for the terme betweene vs concluded, which terme was. xxx. yere, as sayth Froissart. And shortly after these two princes tooke their leaue eche of other, and the French King went into Fraunce, and King Richard came into England. Where he and the Queene were by the Citizens of London most honozably conueyed throughtout the sayde Citie vnto the Palice of Westmynster.

The latter ende of thys yere the King by sinister counsaile delyuered by appoyntment the towne of Brest in Briteyne to the Duke, which was occasion of displeasure betweene the King and the Duke of Gloucester his Uncle, as after ye shall here.

In february next folowynge, the King holding a sumptuous feast in Westminster Hall, manye of the Souldiours which were newly come from the towne of Brest aforesayde, pressed into the hall, and kept arome together. Which companie the Duke of Gloucester did earnestly beholde, and asked what men they were: and when he knew they came from Brest, which towne was geuen by without his knowledge, he was bered in his minde. In somuch as when the king was entred into his Chamber, and fewe nere vnto him, he sayde to the King: Sir, sawe ye not the felowes that late in so great a number to daye in your hall at suche a table? And the king answered yes, and asked the Duke what companie it was: To whome the Duke answered and sayde, sye these are the Souldiours come from Brest, and as nowe haue nothing to take to, nor know not how to shift for their luyng, and the rather for that I am informed, they haue bene before time euil paid. Then sayd the king, it is not my will, but that they should be well payd: And if any haue cause to complayne, let them shewe it vnto oure Treasorer, and they shall be reasonably answered.

In reasonyng of this matter further, the Duke sayde to the king, for you ought to put your bodye to paine for to wyne a strong holde or towne by feate of warre, befoze ye take upon you to sell or delyuer any towne or strong holde that is gotten with great difficulty, and by the manhood of your noble progenitoz. To this the king with chaunged countenance aunswered and sayde: Uncle, how saye you those wordes? Then the Duke boldly recited the aforesayde wordes. Wherevnto the king being then moze discontented, sayde: wene you that I am a Marchaunt, or a foole, to sell my land: by saint John Baptist nay: But truth it is, that our Cosyn the Duke of Briteyne hath rendred vnto vs all suche sommes of money as our progenitoz lent vnto him or his auncestours, vpon the sayde towne of Brest: for the which, reason & good conscience will, y he haue his towne restored vnto him agayne. By meane of which wordes thus vttered by the Duke, such rancour and malice kindled betweene the king and him, that it ceased not vntill the sayde Duke was put to death by murder vnlawfully, as shall appere in the next yere followyng.

This present yere the king bearing still malice in his minde agaynst the Duke of Gloucester, as aforesayde, and chiefly for that he and the Erles of Arondell, and of Warwike and other had forced him to renounce his most trustie friends and counsayloz, as he thought, as is befoze at large declared in the. xi. yere of this kings reigne, and noboe partly to be reuenged on their outrage, as he sayde: And partly also for that all princes subiects should take example, not to presse their soueraigne Lorde after that maner, he sommoned a parliament to be holden at Westminster. And there, not regarding the othe that he had made befoze to the Lordes in open parliament, he called out of exile certaine of the Justices, which by the former sentence giuen, should neuer haue returned. And for that the Deuill is alway readie to hasten euill purposes: This yere came out of Almayne to the king the Prouost of Colayn with other: And they perceauing that the king was light and Ambitious, thinking also to wyne largely thereby, informed him that eyther he was or should be chosen Emperour, which pleased him highly, and he gaue good credite vnto them, and very liberally rewarded them for their good tydings. And because he would be certainly certefied, he sent ouer his Ambassadors, which at their returne agayne into Englande made repozte vnto the king, that the most parte of the Electoiz had consented to his election, onely two or thze withstood it, for this cause, as they sayd, that he that could not keepe in due obeysaunce his awne subiectes, in his awne realme, it was not lyke that he should gouerne well other lyeng farre of and wide a sunder: Wherefoze his Ambassadors aduised him to wyne the fauour of them that so did stick. Nowe whether the messengers did sayne this, to reuelve the kings displeasure against the Duke of Gloucester and the Erle of Arundell and other, for that perrase they bare them no good will, or that they brought true reporte agayne, it is not knowen: But now when it was thought that this realme of England was most quiet, and that prosperitie was lyke dayly to encrease, what for that the king had married the French Kings daughter, and had by her great riches: And also for that truce was taken betwene both the princes for. xxx. yeres: And also considering the goodly garnishment of this realme by the great and wise number of noble Lordes, and valiaunt knightes, knightes, which were suche, as no christian realme for the number of them coulde then shewe the lyke. All these things considered, euen contrary to all mens expectation, sodainely the kings maiestie bearing in his heart great wrath and displeasure against the true Lords of his counsayle as aforesayd, whome he nowe purposed to be reuenged of, practised their destructions, which put the realme to great trouble, and in the ende it turned to the overthrow and confusion of the king himselfe, as ye shall here. For the. vij. daye of Julij next after, the king appointed to keepe a great feast in London, where he purposed to haue had the Duke of Gloucester, the Erle of Arondell, the Erle of Warwike and dyuers other, which he hated deadly, purposing there to haue trapped and taken all those noble men together without businesse, or further resistance. But the Duke of Gloucester excused him by sicknesse: The Erle of Arondell fearing the kings displeasure kept him at home in his Castell, and so there came to this feast none but onely the Erle of Warwike. And at the comming of the Erle, the king receaued him with maruellous gentle and louing countenance, and gaue him very comfortable wordes sayeng vnto him, be of good cheere and take no thought, for losing of Goers lande, swearing vnto him that he would prouyde other for him, that should amount to as good a balure. But neuerthelesse, after that dynner was done, the king caused him to be arrested of treason, and deliuered him to be kept in safe custody vntill the next parliament, which he had ordeyned to be kept for the destruction of him and manye other. The same night also the king spake vnto the Archbishop of Cauntorbury, that he should perswade his brother the Erle of Arondell frankly to submit himselfe, swearing his olde othe by Saint Iohn Baptist, that hurte should he haue none thereby, if he would so do. The Archbishop trusting the kings faire promise, moued this matter to the Erle his brother: But he knowing the kings great malice, and that he purposed nothing moze then to apprehend and destroye him, would in no wise agree to his brothers counsaile: howbeit the Archbishop would not so leaue him, but daylie was importune on him to submit himselfe: Sayng vnto him that all which he mistrusted should passe awaye lyke a clowde. And if he would not submit himselfe when he might, it might fortune to turne to the dishonouring both of him and his: For it was sayde then, and the same was the opinion of manye, that for none other purpose would he keepe these Lordes vnder a rest, but for to shewe the Lordes of Almayne that he coulde rule the greatest of them. And after that he had so holden his Lordes a season, that it was knowen in Almayne and in outward parties, that then his purpose was to restore them agayne to their liberties and dignities. So at the last, by these perswasions & other vsed by the Archbishop of Cauntorburie, his brother the Erle in an vnhappy houre submitted himselfe to the king. And forthwith he was taken and sent to be kept in the Isle of Wyght. And the same night that he was taken, the king sent secretly to the Shair of London, commaundyng him that he should make ready as manye harnessed men as he could, and that they should be in a readinesse within two or thze houres to attend vpon the king, whether his pleasure was to go. The king also commaunded the Erles of Rutland, Kent, Huntynghdon and Pottyngham to arme themselves, and to conduct the Londancers. And so they tooke waye to Blakby in Essex, where then was the Duke of Gloucester in his Castell. Notwithstanding fewe there were that knew, when the king set forth, whether he would go. And when they came nye the place, the king bewed his people following him, which were numbered by the Heraultes to be. x. thousand. Then the king sayde vnto them, whatsoeuer ye see me doe, lykewise studie you to doe the same. If I prepare me to fight, doe ye lykewise. If ye see me in peace, rest you also in quiet, doyng hurte to no man. The king sent afore the Erle of Rutlande to the Dukes Castell, that they should see what number of defensible men the Duke had within the Castell: for he was afeard both of the valiauntnesse and wisdom of the Duke. But it happened at that time that the most parte of the Dukes household seruaunts, by licence were departed to their friendes and wyfes. When the king was certefied that the Duke had so small a number aboute him, he maruelled muche, for it had bene tolde him before by such as bare the Duke no good will, that he had fortified and manned his Castell. So then the king approached there vnto, his men of armes goyng before him and behinde him: And albeit that the Duke was somewhat accrased, yet he met him with a solempne procession of the Colledge, and receaued him with all the reuerence and humilitie that he could doe, as it became him befo to do, being his souereigne Lozde. And the king as he sawe the Duke comming vnto him, and that he made him lobe curtesie: The king ciapped his hande vpon his shoulder, and arested him. To whom the Duke answered, that he not onely was content to obey his arest, but the arest of the least of his court. And the king sayde vnto him, and will you so, good Uncle? And the Duke answered, ye surely sy: then the king folowed the procession, and the Duke folowed the king a farre of. And when the king was somewhat set forth, he looked back, and called the Duke vnto him, and sayde, By Saint John Baptist, good Uncle, this that is done, shall be for the best both for you and vs, and so entered into the Chapell, where were a great number of reliques and Jewels of great balure: which when the king sawe, he sayde vnto his Uncle, I see you are a good husbunde: But nowe go your waye, and take some susteruaise, and after you haue dnyed, ye shall go to the place that I haue appointed, for here you may not tary. Then the Duke prayed the king to shewe him how may seruauntes he should haue to wayte vpon him: The king answered that he should be aduertised thereof before he rose from dyner. The Duke then went to his lodging, which was nigh vnto the Chapell. And the king went to his lodging, where was prepared for him and those that came with him, great and honorable fare, both of fische and flesc, and it was no great maruaile, for the Duke was aduertised priuily of the kinges comming. After that the king was set at dyner, he sent to the Duke his minde, what number of persons should wayte vpon him, and wyllid him to make shorte worke and come away.

After dyner the king departed, and left to conuey the Duke the Erle of Kent, and the Lozde Thomas Percy Steward of his house. And when the Duke had dnyed, he caused suche stuffe to be trussed vp, and caried wyth him, as was necessarie for him. And then bade his wyfe fare well, who was a Lady both honorable, wise and vertuous: and at his departing he desired her to make humble sute to the king, to haue him his good and gracious Lozde, and that she should boldly offer to sweare that he was neuer Traytor to his person, nor he that willed him any hurt. And when he was a horsback, with a mery cheere, he sayde vnto the Lozdes that abode for him. Nowe, whether shall we go? And who shall be our guide? For one of you? They answered with reuerence. Nay sy, it becommeth you to leade, and we to folow. Then sayde he, let vs set forth a Gods name, wheresoener your pleasure is that I shall go, and so was he conueyed to Calice, and thus taken and arested at that time, when he thought that he was most in the kings fauour. For not long before the king had geuen him so great giftes, honours and Lordships, that euery man thought there was no man moze acceptable in the kings fauour then he.

Now after the taking of these Lozdes was blowen abroad, there was made great moane for them throughout all England, as though the Realme had bene deliuered into the enemies handes: so great hope had the Commos vniuersally in them, but most specially in the Duke of Gloucester, whome the Realme beleued, that by his prosperitie the same was safe from all inward and outward enemies.

The king perceiuing the great affection that the people bare to the duke and the sayd Lozdes, and fearyng insurrection of the Commons, which were not all clere of their Melancholy, caused to be proclaymed, that this taking of the Lozdes was not done for their offenses committed of olde, but for new matters, wherein they had offended sithens the obteynnyng of their pardons, as they should vnderstand plainly at the next Parliament.

Duryng the tyme (sayth mine Authour) that these Lozdes were in prison, so sozpy was the people for them, that prayers and Processions were bled throughout all the realme, that it might please God of his goodnes to inspire into the Kinges minde, to be good and mercifull vnto these Lozdes, and to conuert his heart from hatred vnto loue. The king heeryng of these prayers, forbade streightly all Bishoppes and Prelates that such Processions should be no moze bled.

And shortly after, the king helde a great counsaile at Nottingham, and there he hauyng his Judges, and other of his learned Counsaile, caused inditmentes to be drawen of the Duke of Gloucester, and of the Erles afore sayde. And he framed there also an Appellation, and there it was ordeyned that certeine Appellers should lay vnto them highe treason in open Parliament, whose names were Edward Erle of Rutland, Thomas Lord Howbrey Erle Marshall, Thomas Holland Erle of Kent, John Holland Erle of Huntingdon, Lozde Beneforde Erle of Somerset, Lozde John Mountague Erle of Sarisburie, Thomas Lozde Spencer, William Lozde Scrope, Chamberleyn to the king. The which matters beyng deuised, the king caused proclaymation openly to be made, declaring vnto the people that these Lozdes were arested and imprisoned for high treason. And soone after he summoned a Parliament to be holden at London the .xv. day of September next following. And thether were commaunded to come all such as the king had best confidence in. And agaynst the tyme of the sayd Parliament, the king reteyned vnto him a gard of Archers of Cheshire, like as he should haue gone in battaile against his enemyes. And those Cheshire men were very rude and beastly people, and fell into such great pryde of the Kinges fauour, that they accounted the king to be as their felowe, and they set the

And after these rusticall people had a while Courted, they entered into so great a boldnesse, that they would not let, neyther within the Court, nor without, to beate and slay the kinges good Subiectes, and to take from them their victuals, and to pay for them little or nothing at their pleasure, and to rauish their wiues and daughters. And if any man fortun'd to complaine vnto the king of them, he was soone ryd out of the way, no man knewe howe, nor by whome, so that in effect they dyd what them lusted.

A new house made for the Parliament.

Sir John Buse the speaker of the Parliament.

Sir John Buse a flatterer.

Against this Parliament, the King had commaunded a great house to be made in the Palace at Westminster, which was so great, that scarcely the roome of the Palace sufficed to set it in. In this house was made a highe trone for the King, and a large place for all estates besydes, to sit in. And also there were places made for certeine Appealers, which are mencioned before, and they to be on the one syde, and the answerours on the other, and a lyke roome was made behynde for the knightes and Burgeses of the Parliament. And a place also made for the speaker of the Parliament, who at that tyme was one named Sir John Buse, which was called a cruel, ambitious, and couctous man without all measure. And immediately after, all men in their degrees were placed, and the cause of the calling of that Parliament beyng declared, which was that the king had ordeyned it for reformation of dyuerse transgressions and oppreSSIONS, done against the peace of our soueraigne Lorde the kinges Maiestie, by the Duke of Gloucester, the Erles of Arondell, and of Warwike, and other. Then forthwith came Sir John Buse, and made request on the behalfe of the Commonaltie, that it might please the kinges highnesse and excellencie, that for the enoyme actes done agaynst hys lawes and Maiestie, they might haue condigne punishment accordyng to theyr desertes, and chiefly the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, which then sat next vnto the king, whom he called the highest traytor, for where for many causes he should haue bene to the king a most faythfull Counsaylor, he by his euill counsaile and prodigious suggestions, craftily circumuented the king, inducyng him to graunt his letters of pardon to a great traytour the Erle of Arondell his brother. To this when the Archebishop arose and would haue answered, the king would geue him none audience, but commaunded him to sytte downe againe in his place, and not to make any further aunswere, for it should be well inough if he helde his peace for that tyme. Then Sir John Buse requyred that the Archebishop should not be taken to his aunswere, for he sayde that his wit was so great, and did so farre excell all other, and his craft so great, that he feare he shall circumuent vs: So at that tyme the Archebishop had no further heeryng. The said Sir John Buse in all his prepositions to the king, did not onely attribute to him worldly honours, but diuine names, inuentyng flatteryng wordes, and blused termes, and to a mortall man not conuenient, for as oft as he spake vnto the king in his Throne, he cast his handes abrode, as he had adoured and worshipped God, beserchyng his excelsse, high, and adozant Maiestie, that he woulde misse to graunt him this or that. And the Prince beyng ambitious of honours, did not repressle this insolencie, but tooke great pleasure in his wordes, whereof came more inconuenience, as shall appere.

Thus

Thus after, as ye haue heard, that the king had excluded the Archebishop from his aunswere: Sir John Buse, keping his olde flatteryng way, requyred on the behalfe of the Commons, that the Charters of pardon graunted vnto the traytors, as to the Duke of Gloucester, the Erles of Arondell, and of Warwike, should be by the assent and consent of all the whole Parliament be reuoked. The king also in his awne person protested, that those pardons were extorted from him, and that he did not willyngly graunt them, and therefore he requyred that euery man would say his opinion, as well spirituall as tempoꝛall, what they thought therein. The spirituall men began first, being afrayde to displease the king, and sayd that such pardons were reuocable, and at the kinges pleasure, and ought not to be allowed: And lyke wyse sayde euery of the spiritualtie, man by man, vntill it came to the Archebishop of Cauntorbury: For the custome is, when suche questions be asked, the yongest both of the spiritualtie and tempoꝛaltie say their opinions first, and so passe forth in order vntill it come to the highest. And when this question was asked of the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, he aunswered that the kinges person is so high from whom the pardon came, that he durst not say, that any suche Charters were reuocable: Howbeit, in the ende it was determined that such pardons were to be reuoked, for they did empeche the honoz of the kinges person.

After that Sir John Buse had obteyned this reuocation, he declared further, that the Erle of Arondell had yet another speciall Charter of pardon for his awne person, which he obteyned after the first, and in that also the said Sir John Buse requyred importunately ayde, in the name of the Commonaltie, that the same also might be reuoked. Then this question was also asked of the Prelates, which were of lyke opinion as they were of the first, that is to say, that it was reuocable. At this tyme the Archebishop of Cauntorbury absented himselfe from the Parliament, trustyng in the kinges promise, and lyke also as he had sworne vnto him, that nothyng should be attempted agaynst him in his absence, but the contrary folowed. For still this Sir John Buse pursued him, and at his instant sute, which seemed to be the kinges will, he was condemned to perpetuall exile, and that he should not make any further abydyng within this realme then sixe dayes. And after this Bishop was thus condemned, he sent to Rome, that Richard Walden his Treasurer might haue the Archebishopricke, whereunto at the kinges instance the Pope accorded, & within two yere after was by the same Pope deposed.

Shortly after this, was brought forth Richard Erle of Arondell, on the day of Saint Mathewe the Euangelist, to aunswere before the King, and the whole Parliament, to such thinges as should be objected and deposed agaynst him. And as he stood at the Barre, the Lorde Beuel was commaunded by the Duke of Lancaster, which sat that day as high steward of England, to take the whoode from his necke, and to bngyde him. Then the Duke of Lancaster, to whom by his office it apperteyned, notefyed vnto him, that for his manifolde rebellions and treasons agaynst the kinges Maiestie, he was arrested, and hether to kept in Warde, and now at the petition of the Lordes and Commonaltie, he was called to aunswere to suche crimes as should be there objected agaynst him, and there eyther to purge him of them, or else to abyde condigne punishment. And first he did charge him that he roade trayterously in harnesse agaynst the king with the Duke of Gloucester, and the Erle of Warwike, perturbyng of the peace and Realme.

To the which he answered, that he neuer did that as a traytor, nor for any hurt meant or intended against the kinges person, but for the kinges profite, and the realme, if that act might be well interpreted as it ought.

Also it was demaunded of him, why that he procured letters of pardon of the king for himselfe, if he knewe that he was not faultie therein? To this he answered, that he did it not for any feare of any thyng that he had misdone, but for stoppyng of euyl tongues, which neyther bare the king, nor him good wyll.

Also he was demaunded, whether he would denie that he made any such roade with the personnes afozenamed, and that he entred not armed into the kinges presence, agaynst hys pleasure and will? To this he answered that he could not say nay.

Then Sir John Bushe cryed importunately, and called for iudgement to be geuen against the traytor, & sayd: your faythfull commons aske, and requyre that it may so be. The Erle soberly turned his head, and sayd mildely vnto him: Not the kinges faythfull Commons require this, but thou, and what thou art I knowe well inough. Then the. viij. Appealantes before named, standyng on the other syde, cast their gloues vnto him, and folowed their appeale which before was read, and offered to fight with him man for man, in iustefyng of their appeale. Then said the Erle, if I were at my libertie, & that it might please my soueraigne Lord the king, I would not refuse to proue you lyers in your appeale. And then spake the Duke of Lancaster high Steward, and sayde vnto him, what haue you further to say to the popntes before alleaged agaynst you? He answered that of the kinges grace he had his letters of generall pardon, which he requyred might be allowed. Then the Duke answered that the Pardon was reuoked by the Prelates and Noble men in the Parliament, and therefore willed him to make some other answer. The Erle sayde againe, that he had another pardon vnder the kinges great seale, which was graunted him long after of the kinges abone mocion, which also he requyred to be allowed. The Duke sayde againe, that that pardon was in likewyse reuoked. And after this, when the Erle had nothing to saye for him selfe: Then the King with his Scepter made countenance to the Duke to geue iudgement. Then the Duke vsed these wordes vnto him: Forasmuch as thou art couicted of high treason. &c. Thou shalt be drawen to the Galowes, and there hanged, and after taken downe, and thy Bowelles to be taken out of thy body, and burned, and after to be beheaded, and quartered. And this iudgement geuen in this maner, the Duke pawled a while, and then sayd: The King our soueraigne Lord of his grace, because thou art of his blood, and one of the Deeres of the realme, hath remitted all the other paines vnto the last, so that onely thou shalt lose thy head.

And anone he was taken from the place, and without delaye had to the Tower hill, and there went before him, and behinde him the aforesayde furious Cheshire men, which onely in this Parliament had licence to beare weapon. There went with him also to his death the Erle of Notynggham, that had married his daughter: The Erle of Kent his Nephewe, the Erle of Huntynghdon, John Holland, which were all vpon great hozesses, and had

with them a great company of harnessed men. And when he should departe the Palaice, he desyred his hands might be let loose, and that he might geue suche money as he had in his Purse with his abone hands, betwixt that and Charing crosse. And so he gaue his almose, but his armes were bound behinde him. The Londoners seyng him thus passe thozough the City, bewayled sore his fortune, who not long before, among all the noble men was most famous, for he was so noble and balyaunt, that all the worlde spake honoz of him. And when he came to the Towze hill, the noble men that were about him, moued him berie earnestly to acknowledge and confesse that he had offended the king in high treason: But he in no wise would agree so to do, but sayd that he was neuer Traytor in worde nor deede. Then he turned to him that was the executioner and kyssed him, and said: do thy duetie, and as thou art commaunded, but torment me not, but with one stroke strike of my head, and he assayed himselfe with his fingers, whether the sworde was sharpe enough, and sayde it is very well. Then sayde he to his kinsmen that stood there, it had bene moze meeter for you to haue bene awaye then at this acte. I haue bene he that hath brought you vp, and haue enriched you, & brought you to honoz, and ye lyke unkinde persons rewarde me with this, to bring me to thame: But the time will come and that shortly, when there shall as many manuaile at your misfortune, as doth now of my fall. And then kneeled he downe, and the Executioner with one stroke strake off his head, and his bodey was honozably buried in the Augustine Fryers.

Then returned they that were at the execution, and shewed the king merily of the death of the Erle: But though the king was then mery and glad that the dede was done, yet after, as mine Aucthor sayth, he was exceedingly bered in his dreames, imagning that the Erle appered vnto him. &c.

After the iudgement and death of the Erle of Arundell, as aforesayde, then was Thomas Becham Erle of Warwik brought forth to abyde the iudgement of the Parliament. And when his accusers charged hym, as a Traytor, with diuers articles of treason, such as were before alleaged against the Erle of Arundell, he answered that his minde was neuer to be Traytor vnto the king, nor he thought neuer that those rydings and assemblies that he made, could be accompted as treason. And when the Judges had shewed vnto him that it was treason, he humbly asked of the king mercy and grace. The king then asked him, whether that he had so rydden with the Duke of Gloucester, and the Erle of Arundell: he answered that he could not denie it, and wished that he had neuer sene them: then sayde the king, doe you not knowe that ye are giltie of treason? he answered againe I knowledge it, and with great weeping and sobbyng required al those that were present, to make intercession to the kinges Maiestie for pardon for him. Then the king and the Duke of Lancaster commoned, & after the king had pawled a while, he sayde to the Erle, by saint John Baptist Thomas of Warwike, this confession that thou hast made, is vnto me moze acceptable then all the landes of the Duke of Gloucester, and the Erle of Arundell. Then the Erle making still intercession for pardon, the Lordes humbly besought the king to graunt it him. The king then was contented to graunt hym his lyfe, but he banished him into the Isle of Man, which then was the Lorde Scropes, and he promised the Erle, that he and his wyfe and children should haue honozable nozable enterfeyment : But that promise was slenderly kept, for both the Erle and the Countesse led their lyues in great penurie.

The king not yet quieted, sent one of his Iustices called Wylliam Bykyl, bozne in Ireland, to Calice, which was commaunded to enquire of the Duke of Gloucester, whether he had committed any such treasons as befoze were alleged agaynst the Erle of Arundell, and the Erle of Warwike, and that he should write what he sayde, and what the Duke did confesse : which after the sayde Justice had speedely done, he returned vnto the King, and shewed him such things of his awne deuise, as he thought would best please the King, affirming that those things the Duke had franckly confessed. The King after the sight therof, purposed the death of the Duke, and yet not willing to haue him bzought vnto open iudgement, for he feared the people, who bare him great loue and fauour, and therefore he sent the Erle of Pottyngham vnto Thomas Howbrey Erle Marshall, which then had the keeping of the Duke in Calice, and commaunded him that priuily the Duke should be killed. But he fearing to commit such an enozne deede, deferred the matter, though the king would haue had it done with all speede. For the which the King was soze mooued agaynst the Erle, and sware that it should coste him his lyfe, if he obeyed not quickly his commaundement. And beyng thus constreyned, he called out the Duke at midnight, as though he should haue taken shyping to go into Englande, and there in his lodgyng with his seruaunts, casting on fetherbeds vpon him, he was smothered. And so was this honozable and goodman miserable put to death, which for the honoz of the King and wealth of the realme had taken great traouayles.

After that the king in thys unhappye Parliament had bzought all these matters to passe : yet would he not dissolue the same, but prozoged it, because it was nigh the feast of Christmaste, and ordeyned that it should begin againe immediatly after the feast at Shrewesbury. And after that the king & Lords were come together, the king obteyned that the whole pover of both the houses was graunted vnto sixe or eyght persons which had aucthoritie to determine suche causes as yet hanged in the parliament. By vertue of which graunt, the number aforesayde did proceede in derogation of the state of the house, and to the great disaduantage of the king, and perillous example in time to come. And for that the king had spent much money at these Parliaments, he required to haue one disme and a halfe of the Clergie, and a fiftene of the temporaltie, and then he tooke vpon him the name of the Prince of Chester, for loue that he bare to the Cheshire men.

Then was the Erle of Darbie made Duke of Hertfoord : The Erle Marshall Duke of Norffolk, the Erle of Rutland Duke of Aubemarle : the Erle of Kent Duke of Surrey, and the Erle of Huintyngdon Duke of Excester : The Countesse of Norffolk Duches of Norffolk, the Erle of Somerset Marques of Dorset : The Lorde Spencer Erle of Gloucester, the Lorde Penyll Erle of Westmerland, the Lorde Scrope the kings Chamberleyn, the Erle of Wiltshire, the Lord Percy Steward of the kings house Erle of Worcester.

The king after this triumphed not a little, as one that had conquered and ouerthrowne his enemies, and he wared so hauwte, that he had all estates in contempt, and thought himselfe more noble then any prince lyuing. And then he

he chaunged his armes that his Graundfather had giuen, and ioyned Saint Edwardes armes and his together. And to rewarde the persons about named, whome he had aduanced to honoz, he gaue vnto them a great parte of the Duke of Gloucester, the Erle of Warwike, and the Erle of Arondels lands. And whatsoeuer the king did, no man durst speake a worde, or aduise hym in any thing, but must sothe him in whatsoeuer he sayd, or did. And such as were then chiefe of hys Counsaile, the commons iudged to be the woorst of all other, the which were these. The Duke of Aumarle, the Duke of Norffolk, the Duke of Excester, the Duke of Wiltshire, Sir John Buske, Sir Wylliam Bagot, syz Thomas Grene knight, to whom as is aforesayd, the Commons bare great and priute hatred.

Sone after this, the king caused to be arreigned and atteinted the Lord Cobham, vpon those articles that the Duke of Gloucester, the Erle of Arundell, and the Erle of Warwike were condemned for : But the Lorde Cobham was pardoned of his lyfe, and put to exile into the Isle of Bernesey, and there was assigned vnto him a small and pooze lyuing. And for an ende of thys parliament the King graunted a generall pardon to all persons, and for all maner of offenses, except onely fittie persons, whose names he would not declare, nor no man so priuy about hym that could vnderstand them. And it was sayde, that he kept that secret, that when any great man offended, he would then declare that he was one of the fittie that was excepted, and by that meanes he had alwayes his subiectes in his daunger.

Thys yere being the .xxij. yere of hys reigne, it chaunced Henry Erle of Darby a little befoze created Duke of Hertfoord, a prudent and wyse man, and welbeloued of all, calling to his minde, and well considering with himselfe howe king Richarde his Cossyn Germane was nowe come to that trade, that he little or nothyng regarded the counsaile of hys Uncles : nor other graue and sad persons, but did all thing at his pleasure, vsyng his wyll in steede of lawe and reason. Wherefoze on a daye beyng in the company of Thomas Howbrey Duke of Norffolk, and Erle Marshall, he beganne to breake his minde vnto him, rather for sorow and grieffe, then for malice or displeasure, reherfing howe king Richard little esteemed the Nobles of hys Realme, and as muche as laye in him, sought daylie occasions to destroy the more part of them, dispatching some by death, and other by banishment. And this his cruell and seuerer gouernement (sayde he) is not onely greenous to the Nobilitie, but to the Commons also, who greatly murmured thereat, therefore for as much as I knowe he loneth you, and, I am sure, so do you him, when time oportune will serue, ye shall doe well to aduertise him thereof, and to beseeche his grace to turne the lese, and vse a better way. When the Duke of Norffolk had heard fully his deuice, he tooke it not in good parte, but reconed that he had gotten a pray, by the which he should obteyn greater fauour of the king then euer he had, and for that time dissembled the matter and so departed. And after, when he had oportunitie and sawe his tyme, he declared to the king what he had heard : and to aggrauate, and to make the offense the greater, he added much therewith, but left out nothing.

When the king had heard him, and had pauised a little with himselfe, he beganne to be in a great chafe, but after a whyle he tempered his melancholy, and was content to here both parties together, and therefore called unto him the Duke of Lancaster, who was chiefe of his counsaile, and both the Dukes of Herfford & Northfolke, and caused the accuser openly to declare what he had heard the Duke of Herfford speake. The Duke of Northfolke rehearsed agayne the tale that he had tolde to the king, but not in such order as the Duke of Herfford had tolde it to him, but had added thereunto, and altered very much thereof. When the Duke of Herfford heard the tale so tolde, he was somewhat troubled therewith and paused awhile, and after turning him to the Duke of Northfolke, he declared worde by worde what he had sayde, and shewed the cause why he so spake, denyng all the other matters that the Duke of Northfolke had added thereunto, and sayde further vnto the king, that if it would please hys grace to suffer hym, he would prouue his accuser vnture, and a false forger of lyes by the stroke of a speare and dent of a sworde. The Duke of Northfolke affirmed constantly hys tale to be true, and refused not the Combate. The king demaunded of them if they would agree among themselves: which they both denied, and threwe downe their gages. By saint John Baptist, quod the king, if you of your selues will not agree, I will not studie how to agree you, and then he graunted them the battayle, and assigned the place to be at Couentrie, in the moneth of August next ensuyng.

Then was great preparation made, as to such a matter apperteyned, and when all things were in readynesse, and the daye come, thether came the king being accompanied with all his nobles. And thether came also the two Dukes aforesayde, that is to say, the Duke of Herfford Appellant, & the Duke of Northfolke Defendat, & they beyng armed, entred on horseback the one after the other into the Listes, & the people cryed vpon God to saue and prosper the Duke of Herfford, for they loued not the Duke of Northfolke, because it was said that he murdered the Duke of Gloucester at Calice, as aforesayd. Now the time beyng come, these two noble men, eche hauyng his Speare in rest, and readie to ioyne the battaile, the king cast downe his warder, and commaunded them to stay, and then the king and the Lordes went to counsaile, and they toke by the matter: And after great deliberation, the king by the mouth of the king of Heraults pronounced sentence in this sort, first that Henry of Lancaster Duke of Herfford Appellant, and Thomas Mowbray Duke of Northfolke Defendant, haue honorably and valiantly appered here within the listes this day, and haue bene redy to darreyne the battaile, lyke two valiant knightes, and hardie Champions: But because the matter is great and weightie betweene these two great Princes, this is the order of the king and his counsaile. That Henry Duke of Herfford for dyuerse considerations, and because it hath pleased the king, shall within. xlv. dayes depart out of the realme, for the terme of ten yeres, without returnyng, except by the king he be repealed agayne, and that vpon paine of death.

The Herault cryed agayne and sayde, that Thomas Mowbray Duke of Northfolke, by the ordenaunce of the king and his Counsaile, because that he had sowed sedicion in the realme by his wordes, wherof he can make no prooffe, shall aduoyde the realme of England, and dwell where he list out of the Kinges dominions, and neuer to returne agayne into the same vpon paine of death, and that the king woulde stay the profites and reuenues of hys landes untill he had receyued such sommes of money as the Duke had taken by of the Kinges treasurer, for the wages of the Garrison of Calice, which were still vnpayd. And then they called befoze him the two banished persons, and made them swere, that y one should neuer come into the place where the other was (willyngly) nor kepe companie together in any other forein region.

The Duke of Northfolke, which supposed to haue bene bozne out by the king, was sore repentant of his enterpryse, and departed sorowfully out of the realme into Allmain, & at the last came to Venice, where for thought he died.

The Duke of Herfford toke his leaue of the king at Eltham, and there the king released vnto him foure yeres of his banishment. And so he toke his iourney, and came to Calice, and so into Fraunce, where he continued a while.

When he was arriued in Fraunce, king Charles heeryng the cause of his banishment, which he esteemed very small and light, receyued him gently and honorably entercepted him: Insomuch, y he had by fauour obtained the mariage of the only daughter of John Duke of Berry, Uncle to the French king, if king Richard had not cast a stop in his way: For he well considered how the Commonaltie loued the Duke, and howe desyrous they were of his returne into England: and then foreseeyng that if he should be ioyned wyth so great an affinitie as the blood of the house of Berry was in Fraunce, and afterward sodeinly to returne into Englande, it might fortune to turne to hys more displeasure then pleasure, wherfore he letted that mariage.

Duryng the first yere of the exile of this Duke, his father John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster dyed, and is buryed on the North syde of the Quier of the Church of Saint Paules in London. The death of this Duke shortened the life of king Richard, for he notwithstanding, that the Duchie of Lancaster was to this Duke Henry lawfully descended, not onely seized without right or title all the goodes of the sayde Duke John his parent, but also defrauded his heyre of his lafull inheritaunce, receyuyng the rentes and reuenues of all his patrimonie, and geuyng to other that which was not his, and distributed the Dukes landes to his Parasites, and flatterynge folowers. This act was iudged of all the nobilitie to be vnlawfull, vniust, and vngodly, to depriue a man beyng banished out of the realme without defart, of his inheritaunce. But Edmond Duke of York, Uncle to Henrie nowe lawfully Duke of Lancaster, was sore moued with this chaunce, to see the king breake and violate all lawes: And after the murder of hys brother the Duke of Gloucester, to spoyle and robbe the sonne of his other brother. For he befoze this tyme, as much as his patience could beare, dyd tolerate and suffer the death of his brother, the banishment of his Nephew, and many mo iniuries, which for the lightnesse and youth of the king he passed ouer: But nowe that he sawe there was no hope of amendment of the kinges gouernement, and that he had no man nere him that durst boldly admonithe him of his office, and dutie, he therfore as a wise man, thought it meete in tyme to get him to a restyng place, and to leaue the solowynge of so doubtfull and wilfull a Captaine: Wherfore he with the Duke of Armerle his sonne, departed from the Court, and went to his house at Langley.

In this meane tyme, king Richard had made great preparation to go into Ireland, and gathered together great summes of money by sundrie deuises and practises: as first, he caused an inquirie to be made in euery shyre, of those that had beene in armes with the Duke of Gloucester, the Erle of Wherefore many were constreyned, as well of the Clergie, as of the Commonaltie, to make great synes. And also manye Noble men were compelled to pay vnto the king great sommes of money, which was called Pleasaunce, to please the king withall. Also at thys tyme the king caused many blacke Chartres to be made, and forced men to signe and seale the same, by the which he might whē he would vndo any of his subiectes. But some wryte that it was for that he purposed to deliuer Calice, and all his landes beyonde the Sea, to the French king, and to shewe that all his subiectes had assented therevnto.

The king ferreth forth to Ireland.

When all these thinges were done, as is mentioned befoze, the king set forward with a great nauie & power of men towards Ireland, in the moneth of Aprill, to suppress and tame the wilde heddes of the Irishe men, and he had with him his garde of Cheshire men, in whome hee put his speciall trust. Also he caried with him the greatest of the noble mens sonnes of England, as the Duke of Gloucesters sonne and heyre, the Erle of Herford son and heire to Henry Duke of Herford and of Lancaster. Also he was accompanied with the Duke of Aumerle, and the Duke of Exeter, and many other. And at his departure he left for his Lieutenant in England, Sir Edmond of Langley his Uncle, Duke of Yorke. And so the king entered into Ireland, and set fiercely vpon the Irishe men, and compelled them shortly to submit them selues. The sayng also was, that befoze his goyng into Ireland, he had let the realme to ferme to Sir William Scrope Erle of Wiltshire, and then Treasurer of England, to Sir John Bushe, Sir John Bagot, and Sir Henry Greene, knightes, for the terme of. xiiij. yeres: By reason wherof they procured many men to be accused, and such as were accused, there was no remedye to deliuer him, or them, but were he poore or riche, he must compounde and make his fine with those Tyrannes, at their will and pleasure. Nowe the King beyng in Irelande, as afoze sayde, he so subdued the Irischemen, and that in short space, that he brought the greatest part of that realme into very good order, and set them very quiet.

The King had let the Realme to Ferme.

The landing of the Duke of Lancaster and Archebishop of Cauntorbury.

But while the king was thus occupied in Irelande, the Duke of Herford by the prouocation of Thomas Arondell, Archebishop of Cauntorbury, who, as you befoze haue heard, was banished by king Richard, and was in France with the said Duke of Herford, returned nowe both into England, and landed at Rauenspurre in the North Countrie, in the moneth of August, and by reason of his title to the Duchie of Lancaster, he raysed and assembled the people euer as he went, so that he had gathered together a great number of people. And, as sayth Hall, there resorted vnto him, the Erles of Northumberland, and Westmerland, and the Lordes Percy, Rose, Willoughby, and other, and takyng an othe of him, that he should not do to king Richard any bodily harme, they made to him homage, & became his liege men, and so tooke theyr iourney towardes London, where they were receyued with all ioy and gladnesse. Then the Duke consulted there dyuerse dayes with his friendes. And thether came vnto him, Thomas Arondell, sonne to Richard Erle of Arondell, by king Richard a little befoze put to death, which had had late escaped out of prison. When the Duke had well perceyued and considered the great loue and fauor that was bozne him, as well of the nobilitie, as also of the commonaltie, and how they came dayly vnto his reliefe, he not onely yelded thankes vnto God therefore, but shewed himselfe most thankfull vnto them for the same, and then set forward into the West Countrie, and still as he passed, his people encreased without number, and beyng nowe so well and strongly accompanied, he then proclaymed open warre agaynst King Richard, and all his partakers and friendes.

King Richard beyng in Ireland, and nowe heeryng of the Dukes arrival in England, hastened not a little to set all thinges there in order, and returned into England, and landed at Mylforde Hauen, in the beginnyng of September, and from thence passed vnto the Castell of Flynt in Wales ten Myles distant from Chester, and there rested him and his people, entending there to haue gathered a great power, and to haue set vpon the Duke. But in this meane time, the afozesaid Duke, who had proclaymed himselfe Duke of Lancaster, in the right of his father John of Gaunt, was come to Bristow and there without resistance tooke Sir William Scrope Erle of Wiltshire, and high Treasurer of England, Sir John Bushe, and Sir Henry Greene, who shortly were adiudged, and were beheaded. There was also taken Sir John Bagot, but he escaped, and fled into Ireland.

William Scrope Sir John Bushe and Henry Greene put to death.

Now King Richard was not so diligent to gather his power together, but they were as hastie to flee from him, and to ayde the Duke, which amased the King much, and in the ende the king determined to kepe that Castell, and to abyde fortune. And this (sayth Hall) is to be noted of all Princes, rulers, and persons set in Aucthoritie, that this Duke Henry of Lancaster should be thus called to the Kingdome, and haue the helpe and assistance almost of all the whole realme (which perchance neuer there of once thought or dreamed) and that King Richard should thus be left desolate, boyde, and desperate of all hope and comfort, in whome if there were any offence, it ought rather to haue bene imputed to the frailtie of his youth, then to the malice of his hart.

When the Duke of Lancaster knew that king Richard was come to the Castell of Flint, he came forward with speede with a great armie, and dyebere nere Chester: When Thomas Percy Erle of Worcester, and Lord Steward of the Kinges household, and brother to the Erle of Northumberland, heard tell of the Dukes approachyng, and bearyng displeasure to the king, because a little befoze he had proclaimed his brother a Traytor, he calling together the Kinges household, did befoze them all breake his white staffe, and bid euery man go where he would, and shift for himselfe. And when the Kinges seruantes sawe this, they dispersed themselues, some one way, and some another, and left the king alone, sayng two or thre Lordes, and a fewe men.

Thomas Percy Lord Steward breake his staffe.

The Duke approachyng very nere to the Castell of Flint, whereof King Richard beyng aduertised by John Pallet, and Richard Seymer (his assured seruantes) departed out of the Castell, and fled to Conway, and there he sent for the Duke of Exeter his brother, the Erle of Northumberland, and Thomas Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and desired them to come to the Castell vnto him, to whome he shewed his purpose, and that he was well content to geue by the Crowne, and to be discharged of that great Burthen, and shortly after, he yelded himselfe vnto the Duke, who secretly sente him to the Parliament

Rec.

When the Duke had thus possessed his pray, he returned to London, and shortly after called a Parliament the. xiiij. of September, in the kinges name, at the which many of the kinges friends, but more of his, appeared. There was declared how vnprofitable king Richard had bene to the realme durynge his reigne, howe he subuerted the lawes, polled the people, ministred iustice to no man, but to such as pleased him. And to the entent that the Commons might be perswaded that he was an vniust and vnprofitable Prince, and a tyraunt ouer his subiectes, and therefore woorthie to be deposed, there were set forth certeine articles very heynous to the eares of many, and to some incredible, the effect of which articles hereafter folowe.

1. First that King Richard wastefully spent the treasure of the realme, and had geuen the possessions of the Crowne to men vnwoorthie, by reason wherof dayly newe charges more and more were layde in the neckes of the poore Comynaltie. And where diuers Lordes, aswell spirituall as tempozall, were appoynted by the high Court of Parliament, to common and treat of diuerse matters concernyng the comyn wealth of the same, which beyng busy about those commissions, he with other of his affinity went about to empeche them of treason, and by force and threathyng, compelled the Justices of the realme at Shrewsbury to condescend to his opinion, for the destruction of the sayd Lordes: insomuch that he began to rayse warre against John Duke of Lancaster, Thomas Erle of Arundell, Richard Erle of Warwike, and other Lordes, contrary to his honour and promise.

2. Item, that he caused his Uncle the Duke of Gloucester to be arrested without law, & sent him to Calice, and there without iudgement murdered him. And although the Erle of Arundell upon his arreignment pleaded his Charter of pardon, he could not be heard, but was in most vile and shamefull manner sodeinly put to death.

3. Item, he assembled certeine Lancashire and Cheshyre men, to the entent to make warre on the foresayde Lordes, and suffered them to robbe and pill, without correction or reprove.

4. Item, although the King flatterynge, and with great dissimulation made Proclamation throughout the realme, that the Lordes before named were not attached for any cryme of treason, but onely for extorcions and oppressions done in this realme, yet he layde to them in the Parliament, rebellion and manifest treason.

5. Item, he hath compelled diuerse of the sayde Lordes seruauntes and frindes, by menace and extreme paymentes, to make great fines to their better vndoing. And notwithstanding his pardon to them graunted, yet hee made them fine of newe.

6. Item, where diuers were appointed to comyn of the estate of the realme, and the comyn welth of the same. The same king caused all the rolles and recordes to be kept from them, contrary to his promise made in the Parliament, to his open dishonour.

7. Item, that he vncharitably commaunded, that no man upon paine of losse of lyfe and goodes, should once entreate him for the returne of Henry, nowe Duke of Lancaster.

8. Item, where this realme is holden of God, and not of the Pope or other ther Prince, the sayde king Richard, after he had obteyned diuerse actes of Parliament for his awne peculiar profite and pleasure, then he obteyned Bulles and extreme censures from Rome, to copel all men streightly to kepe the same, contrary to the honoz and auncient priuileges of this realme.

9. Item, although the Duke of Lancaster had done his deuoyze agaynst Thomas Duke of Norfolkke, in prooffe of his quarell, yet the sayde King without reason or ground, banished him the Realme for ten yeres, contrary to all equitie.

10. Item, before the Dukes departure, he vnder his broade seale licenced him to make attourney to prosecute and defende his causes: The sayde king after his departure would suffer none attourney to appere for him, but dyd with his at his pleasure.

11. Item, the same king put out diuerse Shirifes lawfully elected, and put in their rowmes, diuerse other of his awne minions, subuertynge the lawe, contrary to his othe and honour.

12. Item, he borrowed great sommes of money, and bound him vnder hys letters patents for the repayment of the same, and yet not one penny payde.

13. Item, he taxed men at the will of him and his vnhappy counsaill, and the same treasure spent in folie, not payng poore men for their bitail and biande.

14. Item, he sayd that the lawes of the realme were in his head, and sometye in his brest, by reason of which fantastigall opinion, he destroyed Noble men, and impouertised the poore Commons.

15. Item, the Parliament sittynge and enactyng diuerse notable statutes for the profite and aduancement of the comyn wealth, he by his priue friends and solliciters, caused to be enacted, that no acte then enacted should be more preiudiciall to him, then it was to any of his predecessors, through which prouiso he did often as he list, and not as the lawe ment.

16. Item, for to serue his purpose, he would suffer the Shirifes of the shire to remaine aboue one yere or two.

17. Item, at the sommons of the Parliament, when Knightes and Burgeses should be elected, and that the election had full proceeded, he put out diuers persons elected, & put in other in their places, to serue his wil & appetite.

18. Item, he had priue Espials in euery shyre, to here who had of him any communication, and if he commoned of his lasciuious liuyng, or outragious doynge, he streight wayes was apprehended, and made a greiuous fine.

19. Item, the Spiritualltie alleaged agaynst him, that he at his goynge into Ireland exacted many notable summes of money, besyde plate, and iewels, without lawe or custome, contrary to his othe taken at his coronation.

20. Item, when diuerse Lordes and Justices were swozne to say the truth of diuerse thinges to them committed in charge, both for the honour of the Realme, and profite of the king, the sayde king somenaced them with fore threathynge, that no man would or durst say the right.

21. Item, that without the assent of the Nobilitie, he carped the Jewelles, and Plate, and Treasure ouer the sea into Ireland, to the great empouertising of the realme. And all the good recordes for the comyn welth, and agaynst his extorcions, he caused priuely to be embesiled, and conueyed away.

22. Item, in al leages & letters to be concluded or sent to the See of Rome or other Regions: His wyting was so subtile and so darke, that no other prince prince durst once beleue him, nor yet his owne subiectes.

23 Item, he most tyrannously and vnprincely sayde, that the lynes and goodes of all hys subiectes were in the princes hands, and at his dispositio.

24 Item, that he contrarie to the great Charter of England caused diuers lustie men to appeale diuers olde men, vpon matters determinable at the common lawe, in the Court martiall, because that in that court is no triall but onely by battayle: wherevpon the sayde aged persons fearing the sequelle of the matter, submitted themselues to his mercy, whome he fined and ransomed vnrasonably at his pleasure.

25 Item, he craftily deuised certaine priuie othes, contrarpe to the lawe, and caused diuers of his subiectes, first to be sworne to obserue the same, and after bounde them in bondes for the former keeping of the same, to the great bindoyng of many honest men.

26 Item, where the Chauncellour according to the lawe, woulde in no wise graunt a prohibition to a certaine person: the king graunted it vnto the same person vnder his priuie seale, with great threathings, if it should be disobeyed.

27 Item, he banished the bishop of Cauntorbury without cause or iudgement, and kept him in the parliament Chamber with men of Armes. Item, the Bishops goodes he graunted to his successour, vpon condition that he should maintayne all his statutes made at Shrewesburie. Anno. xxj. and the statutes made. Anno. xxj. at Couentrie.

28 Item, vpon the accusation of the Archbisshop, the king craftily perswaded the sayde Bisshop to make no answer, for he would be his warrant, and aduised him not to come to the parliament. And so without answer he was condemned and exiled, and his goodes seased.

After that king Richarde was charged with the aforesayde articles, there was an instrument made, declarpng his answers, & how he consented wyllyngly to be deposed, the tenor of which instrument was as followeth.

This present instrument made the Monday the xxix. daye of September 1389. and in the xxiiij. yere of king Richard the second, witnesseth: that where by the aucthoritie of the Lordes spirituall and temporall of this present parliament, and commons of the same, the right honourable and discrete persons, here vnder named, were by the sayde aucthoritie assigned to go vnto the towre of London, there to here and iustifie such questions and answers as then and there should be by the sayde honourable and discrete persons heard: know all men to whome these present letters shall come, that we Sir Richard Scrope Archebisshop of Yorke, John bisshop of Hereford, Henry Erle of Northumberland, Raufe Erle of Westmerland, Thomas Lorde of Berkeley, William Abbot of Westmynstre, John Bziour of Cauntorburie, William Chirnyng, and Hugh Burnell knights, and John Marham Justice, Thomas Stowe, and John Burbage Doctours of the lawe Ciuille: Thomas Screeby, and Dionyse Lopham Notaries publique, the daye and yere abouesayd, betwene the houres of eyght and nine of the clock in the fore noone, were present in the chiefe chamber of the kings lodging within the sayde place of the towre, where was reherfed vnto the king, by the mouth of the foresayde Erle of Northumberland, that before tyme at Contwaye in Northwales, the king being there at his pleasure and libertie promised promised vnto the Archebisshop of Cauntorbury, then Thomas Arundell, and vnto the sayde Erle of Northumberland, that he for the insufficiency which he knewe himselfe to be of, to occupy so great a charge as to gouerne this Realme of Englande, would gladly leaue of, and renounce the right and title, as well of that, as of the title of the crowne of Fraunce and his maiestie, vnto Henry Duke of Herfford, and that to doe in such conuenient wise as by the learned men of this lande it should most sufficiently be by them deuised and ordeyned.

To the which reherfall, the king in our presence answered beningly and sayde, that such promise he made, and so to the same he was at that houre in full purpose to perfourme and fulfill, sayyng that he desyred first to haue personall speche with the sayde Duke, and with the Archebisshop of Cauntorbury his Cossyns. And furthermore, he desyred to haue a bill drawen of the sayde Resignation, that he might be perfite in the reherfall thereof. After which Copie by me the sayde Erle of Northumberland delyuered, we the sayde Lordes and other departed. And vpon the same after noone, the king desyryng much of the comyng of the Duke of Lancaster, at the last the sayd Duke with the Archebisshop of Cauntorbury entered the aforesayde Chamber, bringyng with them the Lorde Roos, the Lorde Burgeyn, and Lorde Willoughby with dyuerse other.

Where after due obeysaunce done by them vnto the king, he familiarly and with a glad countenance (to vs apperyng) talked with the saide Archbisshop & Duke a good season. And that communication finished, the king with a glad countenance, in presence of vs and the other aboue reherfed, sayde openly, that he was readie to renounce and resigne all his kingly maiestie in maner and forme as he before had promised. And although he had and might sufficiently haue declared his renoucement by the reading of another meane person, yet he for the more suretie of the matter, and for that the sayde resignation should haue his full force and strength, he therefore red the scrole of resignation himselfe, in maner, and forme as followeth.

In the name of God, amen. I Richard by the grace of God, king of Englande and of Fraunce, and Lorde of Irelande, acquyte and assoyle all Archebishops, Bishops, and other prelates secular & religious, of what dignitie, state or condition that they be of: And also all Dukes, Erles, Barons, Lords, and all mine other liege men, both spirituall and secular, of what maner of name or degree they be, from their othe of fealtie and homage, and all other deedes and priuileges made vnto me, and from all maner of bandes of allegaunce and regaly and Lordship, in the which they were or be bound vnto me, or in any other wise constreyned: And them their heyres and successours for euermore from the sayde bandes and othes I release, delyuer, acquyte and set them for free, dissolued and acquitted, and to be harmeless, for so much as longeth to my person by any maner of waye, title or right, that to me might follow of the aforesayde things, or of any of them. And also I resigne all my kingly dignitie, maiestie and crowne, with all the Lordships, power and priuileges to the aforesayd kingly dignity and crowne belonging, and all other Lordships and possessions to me in any maner of wise appeteyning, what name and condition soeuer they be of, except those lands and possessions for me & mine Obite purchased and bought. And I renounce all right right and all colour of right, and all maner of title of possession, and Lordship, which I ever had or haue in the same Lordshippes, and possessions, or any of them, or to them, with any maner of rights belonging or appertayning vnto any parte of them.

And also the rule and gouernance of the same kingdome and Lordshippes, with all ministrations of the same, and all things and euerye of them that to the whole Empire and iuridictions of the same belongeth of right, or in any wise may belong.

And also I renounce the name of worship & regaly and kingly highnesse, cleere, freely, singularly and wholly, in the most best maner and forme that I may, and with deede and word I leaue of and resigne them, and go from them for euermore, sayyng alwayes to my successors kings of Englande, all the rightes, priuileges and appurtenances to the sayde kingdome & Lordshippes aboue sayd belonging and apperteyning: For well I wote and knowe, lege, and deme my selfe to be, and haue bene, insufficient and vnhabable and also vnprofitable, and for mine open desertes not vnworthy to be put downe. And I sweare vpon the holy Euangelistes, here presently with my handes touched, that I shall neuer repugne to thys resignation, dimission, or receding by, nor neuer impugne them in any maner, by worde or by deede, by my selfe nor by none other: Nor I shall not suffer it to be impugned, in as much as in me is, priuily or aparte. But I shall haue holde and kepe thys pronouncing, dimission and leauyng by for fyne and stable for euermore, in all and in euery part thereof, so God help me and all Saints, and by thys holye Euangelist by me bodely touched and kyssed. And for more record of the same, here openly I subscribe and signe thys present resignation with myne aboue hande. And forthwith in oure presences and other he subscribed the same, and after deliuered it vnto the Archebyschop of Cauntorbury, sayyng that if it were in his power or at his assignement, he would that the Duke of Lancaster, there present, should be his successor and king after him. And in token thereof, he toke a ryng of Golde from his finger, being his signet, and put it vpon the said dukes finger, desyryng & requiring the Archbyschop of Yorke, to shewe and make reporte to the Lordes of the Parliament of his voluntarie resignation, and also of his entent and good minde that he bare towarde his Cossyn the Duke of Lancaster, to haue him bys successor & king after hym. And thys done, euery man toke their leaue and returned to their home.

On the morowe followyng, beyng on the Tewe day, and the last day of September, all the Lordes spirituall and temporall, with also the commons of the sayde parliament, assembled at Westmynster: where in the presence of them, the Archbyschop of Yorke, according to the kings desyre shewed vnto them seriously the voluntary renouncing of the king, with also the fauour that he ought vnto his Cossyn the Duke of Lancaster, for to haue him his successor. And moreover he shewed vnto them the Schedule or bill of renouncement, signed with King Richardes hand.

And when the things aforesayde were by the sayde Byschop fynished, the question was asked first of the Lordes, if they would admit and allow that renouncement: The which when it was of the Lordes graunted and confirmed, the lyke question was asked of the Commons, and of them in lyke maner affirmed.

After

After which admission, it was then declared, that notwithstanding the foresayde renouncing so by the Lords and commons admitted, it were needfull vnto the realme, in the aduoyding of all suspicions and surmises of euill disposed persons to haue in wytyng and regestred the manifolde crymes and defautes before done by the sayd Richard, late king of England, to the ende that they might first be openly shewed vnto the people, and after to remaine of record among the kings records. The which articles are before expressed.

Now when the Lordes of the parliament had considered this voluntarie renouncement of King Richarde, and that it was behouefull and necessary for the weale of the realme to proceede vnto the sentence of his deposition, they there appoynted by the auctoritie of the states of the sayde parliament, that is to saye the Byschop of Saint Asse, the Abbot of Glascebury, the Erle of Gloucester, the Lorde Barkeley, Wylliam Chyrning iustice, and Thomas Cppyngham, and Thomas Gray knightes, that they should geue open sentence to the kings deposition. Wherevpon the sayde commissioners layng their heades together, by good counsaile and aduisement and of one assent agreed among them, that the Byschop of Saint Asse should publishe the sentence for them and in their names, as followeth.

In the name of God, amen. We John Byschop of Saint Asse or Assenence, John Abbot of Glascebury, Richard Erle of Gloucester (and so the names of the other as they are aboue reherfed) chosen and deputed speciall commissioners by the three estates of this present parliament, representing the whole body of the realme, for all such matters by the said estates to vs committed: we well vnderstandyng & considering the manifolde crymes, hurtes and harmes done by Richarde King of Englande, and the misgouernance of the same by a long time, to the great decay of the sayd land, and vtter ruine of the same shortly to haue bene, we had the speciall grace of our Lorde God therbnto put the sone remedy: And also furthermore considering that the sayd king knowyng his awne insufficiency, hath of his awne meere inocion and free will renounced and geuen by the rule and gouernance of this lande, with all rightes and honours to the same belongyng, and vtterly for his merites hath iudged himselfe not vnworthely to be deposed of all kingly maicesty and estate royall. We the premisses well considering, by good and diligent deliberation, by the power, name and auctoritie to vs, as abouesayde, committed pronounce, decerne and declare the same king Richard, before thys to haue bene and to be vnprofitable, vnhabable, insufficient, and vnworthy to the rule and gouernance of the aforesayde realmes and Lordshippes, and all other the appurtenances to the same belongyng. And for the same causes we deprive him of all kingly dignitie and worship, and of any kingly worship in himselfe. And we depose him by our sentence definitive, forbydding expressly to all Archebishops, Bishops, and all other Prelates, Dukes, Marqueses, Erles, Barons and knightes, and to all other men of the aforesayd kingdome and Lordshippes, or of other places belonging to the same realmes and Lordshippes, subiectes and lieges whatsoeuer they be, that none of them from this time forward, to the aforesayde Richard as king and Lorde of the aforesayde Realmes and Lordshippes, be neyther obedient nor attendaunt.

And immediately after this sentence, the duke of Lancaster ryng from the place where he then sate, and standing where all might behold him, spake these wordes. I Henrie of Lancaster clayme the realme of England, and the the crowne, with all the appurtenances, as I that am descended by right line of the blood comyng from that good Lorde king Henry the thirde, and through the right that God of his grace hath sent unto me, with the helpe of my kinne, and of my friendes to recouer the same, which was in poynt to be vndone for default of good gouernaunce and due iustice.

After which words, thus by him vttered, he returned & sate him doونه in the place where he before had sitten. Then the Lordes heyring this claime, comyned secretly among themselves, and then was it demaunded of them what they thought: and they all agreed to the sayde claime, and that he was worthie to reigne as king ouer them. Then the Archbishop of Cauntorburp hauyng knowledge of the Lordes mindes, stode vp, and asked the Comons if they would assent to the Lordes, to the which also they assented. After which aunswere the Archbishop went to the Duke, and after low & solmne obeysaunce, kneelyng vpon his knee, did afterwarde arise, and tooke the Duke by the right hande, and led him vnto the kinges seate, and there wryth great reuerence placed him.

Duke Henry placed in the regall seate.

After the Duke was thus placed as king, then he stood vp and sayde to the Lordes and Commons present: I thanke you my Lordes spirituall and temporall, and all the states of this lande, and I geue you to vnderstand, that it is not my wil that any man thinke that by the way of Coquest I would disherite any man of his heritage, franchise or other rightes, that of right to him belongeth, nor to put him out of that which he now enioyeth, & hath had before tyme by custome of good lawe of this realme, except such priuate persons as haue bene against the good purpose & the comon profit of the realme.

When the king had thus spoken, he sate doونه, and then it was agreed that the Procurator afozenamed should go vnto the Towre, and resigne vnto the late king Richard all their homages and fealties in the name of the whole realme, and to shewe vnto him, not onely the maner of his deposition, but also howe Henry Duke of Lancaster was placed in the Kingdome, which was done accordyngly, and the next day after, the Duke was openly proclaymed kyng by the name of King Henry the fourth.

Now after King Richard was deposed, as you haue heard, then Henry Plantagenet, borne at Bolynghbrooke in the Countie of Lincolne, Duke of Lancaster and Hereford, Erle of Darbie, Leycester, and Lyncolne, sonne to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, tooke vpon him the gouernment of this realme, and was by sounde of Trompet proclaymed king of Englande, and of Fraunce, and Lorde of Irelande, the xxix. day of September, in the yere of our Lorde 1399. by the name of King Henry the fourth, and was crowned at Westminster the xi. day of October then next folowing, which was the day of the Translation of Edward the Confessor, with all tryumph and solemnitie.

And at the day of his coronation (as sayth Hall) because he would not haue it thought that he tooke vpon him the Crowne without good title and right therevnto had, therefore he caused it to be proclaymed and published, that he chalenged the realme not only by coquest, but also for that he was by king Richard adopted as heyre, and declared successor of hym, and by resignation, had accepted the Crowne and Scepter, & also that he was next heire Male of the blood royall to king Rycharde.

Henry prince of Wales.

Shortly after his coronation, he created his eldest sonne Henry, Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornewall, and Erle of Chester beyng then of the age of xij. yeres, and caused him to be proclaymed heyre apparant to the Crowne of this realme. And soone after he called his high Court of Parliament, in the which was demaunded by king Henryes friendes, what should be done with king Richard. And as the aforesayde Hall sayth, whome I chiefly folowe in this history, for that he hath diligently traueyled therein. The Bishop of Carlisle which was a man well learned, and of a good courage, stood vp and sayde: My Lordes, I require you to take hede what aunswere you make vnto this question: For I thinke there is none of you worthie or mete to geue iudgement on so noble a Prince as King Richard is, whom we haue taken and honoured for our souereigne and liege Lorde, by the space of. xxij. yeres, & I assure you, there is not so ranke a traytor, nor so arrant a thefe, nor yet so cruel a murderer, apprehended or deteyned in prison for his offence, but he shall be brought before the Justice to heere his iudgement: And yet ye will proceede to the iudgement of an annoynted king, and here neyther hys aunswere nor excuse. And I say, that the Duke of Lancaster, whom you call king, hath more offended and more trespassed to king Richard & this realme, then the king hath epyther done to him or to vs. For it is manifest and well knownen, that the Duke was banished the Realme by king Richard and hys counsaile, and by the iudgement of his awne father (for the space of .x. yeres) for what cause all you knowe, and yet without licence of king Richard he is returned againe into the realme, yea and that is worse, hath taken vpon him the name, title, & preheminance of a king: And therefore I say, that you haue done manifest wrong, to proceede in any thing against King Richard, without calling him openly to his aunswere and defence. Assoone as the Bishop had ended his tale, he was attached by the Erle Marshall, and committed to ward in the Abbey of Saint Albones.

And in the sayde Parliament it was concluded, that King Richard should continue in a large prison, and should haue all thinges honourably ministred vnto him, aswell for his dyet as also apparell. And that if any person or persons would presume to stirre and rere warre on the behalfe of King Richard for his deliuerance out of prison, that then King Richard himselfe should be the first that should die for that commotion.

In this Parliament, the Lorde Fitzwater appealed the Duke of Aumarle of high treason, and offered to fight with him in Listes royall: Likewise the Lorde Moxley appealed the Erle of Sarisbury, and there were more then .xx. Appealants which waged battail in this Parliament: But the king pardoned all their offences, sauynge the faultes of the Lorde Moxley, and the Erle of Sarisbury, whom he committed to ward, and after at the request of their friendes, they were againe set at libertie. The king also punished extremely all suche as were priuie and doers of the murder of Thomas his Uncle, late Duke of Gloucester, which was shamefully murthered, as is before, in the Towne of Calice. Also he greatly aduanced sundrie of his friendes, and called out of banishment Richard Erle of Warwike, and restored the Erle of Arondelles sonne to his aboue possession and dignitie, and manie other. He tooke into his speciall fauour John Holland Duke of Exeter, and Erle of Huntynghon, halfe brother vnto King Richard which had espoused the Ladie Elizabeth his aboue sister: And he beyng before Captaine of Calice, was greatly moued and inwardly grieved, that King Richard his brother was remoued out of the seate royall, and therefore began to stirre by newe motions and factions within the Realme: the which the king much feared, and therefore he reconciled him to his fauour, and made him as he supposed, his perfect friende, where in deede he was his deadly enemye.

Also in the ende of this Parliament were repealed all the statutes that were made in the .xxj. yere of the reigne of King Richard. And then King Henry supposyng that he had wonne the heartes and fauoures, aswell of the Nobilitie both spirituall and temporall, as of the Commons of his realme, prayed that for the aduoydng of all claymes, tytles and doubtes that might be made vnto the Crowne, that he might haue his dignitie, lyne and successio enacted, confirmed, and entayled, by the assent of the high Court of Parliament, the which was done in maner and forme folowynge.

The request and petition, aswell of the nobilitie, as of the Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, it is ordeyned and established, that the inheritance of the Crowne and Realmes of Englande, and of Fraunce, and of all other Lordships to y<sup>e</sup> king our soueraigne Lord, aswell on this side the seas, as beyond, apperteyning, with their appurtenances, shall be vntied and remain in the person of our soueraigne Lord the King, and in the heyres of his bodie lawfully begotten. And especially at the request and assent aforesayde it is ordeyned, established, pronounced, enacted, wrytten and declared, clared, that my Lorde Prince, Henry, eldest sonne to our soueraigne Lorde the king, shall be heyre apparant, and successor to our soueraigne Lorde in the sayde Crowne, Realmes, and Seigniozies, to haue and enioy them with all their appurtenances, after the deceasse of our sayd soueraigne, to him and the heyres of his bodie begotten. And if he die without heyres of his bodie begotten, that then the sayde Crownes, Realmes, and Seigniozies, with their appurtenances shall remaine to the Lorde Thomas, second sonne to our sayd soueraigne Lorde, and to the heyres of his bodie begotten. And if he depart without issue of his body begotten, all the premilles to remaine to Lorde John his thirde sonne and to the heyres of his bodie begotten. And if he die without issue, then the Crownes, Realmes, and Seigniozies aforesayd with their appurtenances shall remaine to the Lorde Homyer, the fourth sonne to our sayd soueraigne Lord, and to the heyres of his bodie lawfully begotten.

Now when King Henry had thus mortified himselfe and his issue so sure and fast, as he thought, that the same was not possible to be remooued, then was he neuer an vtter ouerthrow and destruction then euer he was, for suche is the nature of dissimulation, that when fortune with her flattering seemeth most to ioy and laugh, then (so fickle is she of condition) is most perill and daunger at hand: for now dyuers of those Lords which were King Richards friendes, outwardly dissimuled that which they inwardly conspired, which was the finall confusion and destruction of King Henry, and to restore agayne their olde Lorde and mayster King Richard. And the better to bring thys matter about, they practised with the Abbot of Westminster that then was, who had no good opinion of King Henry, for that he heard him once saye, when he was Duke of Lancaster, that Princes had to little, and the religious had to much, and therefore he supposed that he would not be a friend vnto the Church, if he continued long in that dignitie. Vnto the house of thys Abbot resorted one day as bidden gestes of the sayde Abbot, John Holland Duke of Exeter and Erle of Huntynghon, Thomas Holland Duke of Surrey, and Erle of Kent, Edward Duke of Aumarle and Erle of Rutlande, sonne to the Duke of Yorke, John Mountagew Erle of Salisbury, Hugh Spenser Erle of Gloucester, John the Bishop of Carleill, Sir Thomas Blunt, and one Magdalen, one of King Richards Chapell, a man as lyke vnto him in stature and propozcion, as vnlke in birth and dignitie. This Abbot highly feasted these great Lordes, and when dyner was done, they withdrew themselves into a secret Chamber, and when they were set, John Holland Duke of Exeter, who bare great grudge agaynst King Henry, declared to them their allegeaunce promised, and by othe confirmed to King Richard his brother, forgetting not the highe promotions and dignities, which he and all they present had receyued of the liberalitie of his sayde brother, by the which they were not onely bound to take part with him and his friendes, but also to be reuenged for him and his cause on his mortall enemies and deadly foes: In the doynge wherof he thought pollicy more meeter to be used then force. And the better to bring this matter about, he deuised a Justes to be kept betwene him and .xx. on his part, & the Erle of Salisbury .xx. of his part, at Orforde: To the which Justes King Henry should be desyred to be present, and when he were most earnestly beholdynge the pastyme, he should sodainely haue bene slayne and destroyed, and by this meanes king Richard, which was then alyue should be restozed to his libertie and to his crowne and kingdome.

This deuise seemed to please well all that were present, wherfore they made an Indenture sextipartite sealed with their seales, & signed with their handes, in the which eche bounde himselfe to other to endeouor themselves for the destruction of king Henry, and the erection and restozing of king Richard, and sware on the Euangelistes the one to be true to the other, euen to the houre and poynt of death.

Nowe all things beyng thus appoynted and concluded, the Duke of Exeter came to the king to Wynsoze, humbly beseeching him for the loue that he bare to the noble actes of Chivalrie, that he would vouchsafe not onely to repaire to Oxfozd, to see and beholde their enterpryses and attemptes, but also to be the discoverer and indifferent Judge (if any ambiguitie should arise) of their courageous actes and royall triumph. The king seing himselfe so earnestly desyred, and that of his brother in lawe, and suspecting nothing lesse then that which was purposed, did gently graunt vnto his request. And so sone as the Duke had his aunswere, he returned home to his house and prepared all things necessarie for the exploit of his pretended purpose. And when the time due nere, he came to Oxfozde with a great compaigne of Archers and horsemen, and when he came thether, he found there all his confederates well appointed for the purpose, except the Duke of Aumarle Erie of Rutlande, for whome they sent messengers in great haste, Thys Duke of Aumarle went befoze from Westminster to see his father the Duke of Yorke, and sitting at dynner, he had his Counterpane of the indenture of confederacie (whereof is mencion made afoze) in his bosome. The father espyed it, and demaunded what it was. His sonne lowely aunswere, that it touched not him: By Saint George, quod the father, but I will see it, and by force tooke it out of his bosome, and when he perceyued the content thereof, and the fire seales set and fired to the same, whereof the seale of his sonne was one, he sodenly roase from the Table, commaundyng his horses to be saddled, and in a great fury sayd to his sonne: thou Traytor theefe, thou hast bene a Traytor to king Richard, and wilt thou now be false to thy Cousyn King Henry? Thou knowest well inough, that I am thy pledge, Sorow, and Haine perne bodie for bodie, and for lande and goodes in open Parliament: and goest thou about to seeke my death and destruction? By the holy Roode I had rather see thee strangled on a Gybbet. And so the Duke of Yorke mounted on horsebacke, to ride to Windsoze to the king, and to declare the whole matter vnto him. The Duke of Aumarle considering in what case he stood in, tooke his horse and roade another way to Windsoze, riding all the way in post (which his father beyng an olde man, could not do) and when he was alighted at the Castell gate, he caused the gates to be shut, sayng that he must nedes deliuer the keyes to the king. And when he came befoze the kinges presence, he kneeled on his knees, beseeching him of mercie and forgiveness. The king demaunded the cause, and he declared vnto him plainly the whole confederacie. Well sayd the king, if this be true, we pardon you: if it be feyned, at your extreme perill be it.

While the king and the Duke talked together, the Duke of Yorke kneeled at the Castell Gate, whom the king caused to be let in, and there he deliuered nered the Indenture which befoze he had taken from his sonne. Which wrytting when the king had red and seene, perceyung the signes and scales of the Confederates, he chaunged his former purpose: For the day befoze he heard that the Chaloners and defenders were all in a redinesse, and thought the same day to haue gone thether, but now he stayed, and wrote his letters forthwith vnto the Erie of Northumberland his high Constable, and to the Erie of Westmerland, his high Marshall, and to dyuers other his friendes, of his doubtfull daunger and perelous ieopardie.

The Confederators perceyung the lacke of the Duke of Aumarle, and also seing no preparation made there for the kinges commyng, imagyned that their purpose was disclosed to the king, wherfore, that thing which they purposed preuily to haue done, they determined now openly with speare and shilde to set forth and aduance. And so they adourned Magdalene a man resembling much king Richard, in royall and Princely besture, calling him king Richard, and affyrmyng that he by fauour of his keepers was deliuered out of Prison and set at libertie. Nowe while the Confederates with theyr newe deuised king, accompanied wyth a puyssaunt armie of men, toke the direct way to Windsoze: King Henry beyng admonished of their commyng, with a fewe horse in the night went from Windsoze, and came to the Tower of London aboute midnight, where he in the Mornyng caused the Maior of the Citie to bring vnto him three thousand Archers, and thye thousand Billmen well armed and appoynted.

The Lordes of the Confederacie came to Windsoze, and entered the Castell, where they fyndyng not theyr pray, determined with all speede to passe forth towardes London: But when they were well onwarde of theyr journey, they then chaunged theyr purpose, and returned backe to Colbroke, and there stayed. These Lordes had many people folowyng them, what for feare, and what for entreaty, and specially for that they beleued certainly king Richard was there present with them. When King Henrie heard of theyr commyng toward London, he issued out of the sayd Citie with twentie thousand men, and came to Hounslow hethere, and there pitched his campe, mynyng there to abyde the commyng of his enemyes. But when the Lordes were aduertised of the kinges commyng, and of hys great puyssaunce, beyng eyther amased with feare, or else repentung their enterpryce, or mistrustung theyr owne companie, they departed from Colbroke to Barkhamsted, and so to Aucester, and there the Lordes tooke theyr lodgyng: The Duke of Surrey, Erie of Kent, and the Erie of Sarisbury in one Inne, and the Duke of Exeter, and the Erie of Gloucester in another, and all the armie lay in the fieldes. In the night tyme the Baylife of the Towne with lxxx. Archers set on the house where the Duke of Surrey and the other lay: The house was manfully assaulted, and strongly defended a great space. The Duke of Exeter beyng in another Inne, with the Erie of Gloucester, set fyze on dyuerse houses in the towne, thynkyng that the assylantes would leaue the assault and rescue theyr goodes, which they nothyng regarded. The army lying without, heying noyse, and seeyng fyze in the towne, thynkyng that the king was come thether with his puyssaunce, fled without measure to saue themselves. The Duke of Exeter & his companie seeyng the force of the townes men moze and moze to encrease, fled out on the backe syde, entendyng to repayre to the armie, which they found dispersed and retyred. Then the Duke seeing no hope of comfort, fled into Essex: And the Erie of Gloucester going towardes Wales, was taken and beheaded at Bristolwe: Magdalene flying into Scotland, was apprehended and brought to the Tower of London. And the Lordes which were still fighting in the towne of Cicester, were wounded to death and taken, and their heades stricken off and sent to London: And there were taken Sir Bennet Shelly, and Sir Barnard Brokas, and xxiiij. other Lordes, knightes, and Esquiers, and sent to Orforde, where the King then sojourned, and where Sir Thomas Blunt and all the other prisoners were executed.

When the Duke of Excester heard that his complices were taken, and his counsaylors apprehended, and his friendes put in execution, he lamented his awne chaunce, and bewayled the misfortune of his friends: But most of all he was troubled to thinke vpon the wretched ende that should happen to King Rycharde hys brother, whose death he sawe as in a Glasse, to be at hand by reason of this his unhappie enterpryse, and thus beyng succourlesse, and wandering by & downe, at the last he was taken in a towne called Blashy in Essex, and there made shorter by the head, and in that place specially (sayth Hall) for that he in the same Lordship, betrayed Thomas Duke of Gloucester, and was the very cause of hys death and destruction, and so the common prouerbe was verified, as you haue done, so shall you feele.

After this, Magdalene that represented the person of King Rycharde amongst the rebels, and dyuers other were put to execution, and all the heads of the chiefe conspirators were set on poles ouer London bridge, to the feare of other which were disposed to commit lyke offense. The Abbot of Westminster in whose house this confederacy was conspired, heeryng that the Chiefeteynes of his felowship were taken and executed, he going betwene the monasterie and his mansion house, for thought fell into a sodaine palsey, and shortly after without any speeche ended his lyfe: After whom the Bishop of Carlisle, more for feare then sicknesse yeelded his spirite to God, as one desyryng to die by deathes darre, rather then by the temporall sword.

But now drewe on the time, the Innocent must perithe with the innocent, and the vngiltie with the giltie: For King Rychard being ignorant of this conspiracie and kept in miserable captiuitie, was by King Henry adiudged to die, for he would delyuer himself of al inward feare of his enemies, wherfore some write that he commaunded him to be slaine, & others say that he was agreeable thereto, and some others affirme that he knewe not of it, vntill it was done: But howsoeuer it was, King Rychard dyed of a violent death: And one wyrtter sayth that King Henry sitting at hys table, and sore sighing sayde, haue I no saythfull friende that will delyuer me from him whose lyfe will be my death, and whose death will be the preservation of my life? Thys sayng was noted of them that were present, and specially of one called Sir Piers of Erton. This knight incontinently departed the Court wyth eyght talle persons with him, and came to Pomfret, commaunding that the Esquire which was accustomed to serue, and take the assaye before King Rychard, should no more vse that maner of seruite, sayng: let him eate well now, for he shall not long eate. King Rychard sate downe to dyner, and was serued without curtesie or assaye, he much marueyllyng of the sodaine imitation of the thing, demaunded of the Esquyre why he did not his duetie? Sir sayde he, I am otherwise commaunded by Sir Piers of Erton, which is newly come from King Henry. When he heard that word, he toke the caruyng knyfe in his hande, and strake the Esquire on the head, sayng, the Deuill take Henry of Lancaster and thee together: and with that word Sir Piers entered into the Chamber well armed, with eyght talle men in harnes, euey man hauing a byll in his hande. King Rycharde perceuyng them armed, knew well that they came to his confusion, and putting the table from him, valiantly tooke the byll out of the first mans hande, and manfully defended himselfe, and slewe foure of them in a short space. Sir Piers beyng somewhat dismayed with his resistyng, lept into the Chayre where King Rychard was wont to sit, while the other foure persons chased him about the Chamber, which being vnarmed defended himselfe against his enemies that were armed (which was a valiant acte) but in conclusion he came by the Chayre where Sir Piers stode, who with a stroke of his Pollax felled him to the ground, and soone after was rid out of his lyfe in this worlde. When this knight perceued that he was dead, he lamented and sayde: O Lorde, what haue we done? we haue murdered him whome by the space of xiiij. yeres we obeyed and honoured as our souereigne Lorde, nowe will all Noble men abhorre vs, and all good men hate vs, and poynt at vs as the murderers of a noble Prince. Thus haue you heard the death and ende of King Rychard the second as the best aucthours report of it.

When King Rychard had thus ended his lyfe, he was then entaulmed, and seared, and couered with lead, all saue his face (to the entent that all men might perceyue that he was departed out of this lyfe) and was conueyed to London, and so to the Tower, and from thence through London to the Cathedral Church of Saint Paule, and there remayned thre dayes, that all the people might see him, and from thence he was conueyed to Langley in Buckyngham shire, where he was buryed: And afterwarde by King Henry the fift, was remoued to Westminster, and there honourably entombed wyth Queene Anne his wyfe.

Now newes were first brought to the French King, how King Rychard was deposed of his Kingdome, at the which the sayde French King wounded not a little, and cryed out of the shamefull doying thereof, that an annointed king, and crownded Prince should be so villye vbled: But the French King was not so much agreeued, but Walleram Erie of Saint Paule, which had maryed King Rychardes halfe sister, was muche more grieued, who beyng moued with highe disdeine agaynst King Henrie, ceased not to prouoke the French King and his counsaile, to make sharpe warre vpon England, to reuenge the injury and dishonour committed and done to his sonne in law King Rychard, and he himselfe sent letters of defiance into England: Which thing was soone agreed vnto, and an armie royall appoynted with all speede to invade England. This armie was come downe into Picardie, readie to be transported into Englande: But when it was certainly certefyed that King Rychard was dead, and that theyr enterpryse for his deliuerance was haine, the armie was discharged, and euey man returned to his home. But shortly after, the French King gathered another great power, & entred the Duchy of Aquitaine and Gascon, and thought there to haue greatly preyayled. But

king Henry being advertised of all the frenche attempts, sent the Lorde Thomas Percey Erle of Worcester with a goodly crewe of Souldiours into Aquitaine to ayde and assist Sir Thomas Knolles his Lieutenant there, and to perswade and exhort the people to continue in their auncient libertie, and due obeysance. When the Erle was there arryued, he so wisely entreated the noble men, and perswaded the Magistrates of Cities and Townes, and so gently and familiarly vsed himselfe to the common people, that he not onely appeased theyr furie and malice, which they had conceyued agaynst king Henry, for the death & destruction of king Richard, but also he brought them to an vniforme obeysance, receiuyng of them othes of obedience, which done he returned againe into England with great thankes.

When king Charles of Fraunce perceyued that his purpose and attempt came to no good conclusion in Aquitaine, and that king Richard being dead, his enterprize into England would be to no purpose, he determined with himselfe howe to haue the Ladie Isabell his daughter, which was espoused to king Richard, to be restored home to him againe: And for that purpose he sent a solempne Ambassade into England to king Henry, which gently receyued them, and gaue aunswere that he would shortly send his Commissioners to Calice, which should further common and conclude with them, not onely vpon that request, but also of dyuerse other matters of great importance.

And shortly after their departyng, he sent Edward Duke of Yorke before called Duke of Aumerle, which succeeded in the sayde Duchie his father Edmond Duke of Yorke, a little before deceased, and Henry Erle of Northumberlande into the Countie of Guynes, and there they mette with the frenche Commissioners, who assembled together dyuerse tymes and in dyuerse places.

The Duke of Burbon aboue all thinges, requyred in the name of the french king his maister, to haue Queene Isabell to him deliuered: But the English men denyed that, and required to haue her to be maryed to Henrie Prince of Wales, a man both in blood and age to her in all thinges equall: But the french king vtterly refused that maryage, sayng that he would neuer ioyne affinitie againe with the Englishe Nation, because that the alliance had such infortunate successe.

Then they beganne to entreate a continuall peace, which request the french men refused, and in conclusion they agreed that the truce which was taken betwene them and king Richard for the terme of xxx. yeres, was renewed and confirmed: But some write that a new league was then concluded to continue the liues of both the Princes, which should appere to be true. For the king of England sent shortly after the aforesayd Ladie Isabell vnder the conduct of the Lorde Thomas Percey Erle of Worcester, being associate with many noble and honourable personages, as well women, as men, hauyng wyth her all the Jewelles, Ornamentes, and Plate, with a great surplussage geuen to her by the king, which she brought into England in solempne estate vnto Calice, and there shee was deliuered to Valeran Erle of saint Paule Lieutenant for the french king in Picardie, and so conueied to her father, which gaue her in maryage to Charles, sonne to Lewes Duke of Orleans. The french men often tymes requyred king Henry to assigne vnto her a dower, but all was in vaine, for the Englishe men aunswere, that the the matrimony was neuer consummate, by reason wherof, she was not dowable by the very treaty of the mariage concluded, and so this matter cessed and was no more moued.

Nowe as the olde prouerbe sayth, after winde commeth raine, and after one euill commonly ensueth another: So during this tyme that king Henry was bered and vnquieted, both within the Realme and without, Owen Glendore a squier of Wales, perceyuing the realme to be vnquieted, and the king not very well settled in his Kingdome, purposed to take vpon him the principalltie of Wales, and the name & preheminence of the same: and what with faire flatterynge wordes, and large promises, he inuegled and allured an vndiscrete number of welthe men, who tooke him for theyr Prince, and made to him an othe of allegeance and subiection. And being thus aduanced and supported, he made sharpe and cruell warre vpon Reignold Lorde Gray of Ruthen, and tooke him prisoner, promisyng him libertie, and that he would discharge his ransome if he would take his daughter in marriage, thinking by that affinitie to haue great ayde, and to be of a great power in Wales. The Lorde Gray being not very riche, neyther of substance nor of frendes, considering this offer to be the onely way of his reliefe and deliuerance, assented to his pleasure, and maryed the Damosell: But this false father in lawe kept him with his wife still in prison vntill he dyed: And not content with this heynous offence, he also made warre vpon the Lorde Edmond Mortimer, Erle of Marche, and in his awne Lordship of Wigmore, where in a conflict he slue many of the Erles men, and toke him prisoner, and fettered him in Cheynes, and cast him in a deepe and miserable Dungeon. The king was requyred to purchase his deliuerance, by dyuerse of the Nobilitie, but he would not here on that syde, but rather desyred and wished all his linage in heauen, for then his title had bene out of all doubt & question.

Owen Glendore glorifying in himself for these two victories, invaded the Marches of Wales on the west syde of Senerne, robbed Villages, brent townes, and slue the people, and being laden with prayes and bloody hands returned againe into Wales, neuer ceasyng to doe mischief vntill the next yere that the king raysed a great armie and puyssaunce, to resist and defende his malicious attempts, as after shall be declared.

And in this first yere also this realme was not only troubled with Ciuile sedition, and the craftie practises of the frenchmen, and great trouble of the Welshmen, but also of the Scottes with all their power armed themselves agaynst thys king Henry, the occasion whereof was, that George of Dunbare Erle of the Marches of the realme, made meanes vnto king Robert of Scotland that David hys eldest sonne might marie the Erles daughter called Elizabeth, and delyuered for the same mariage into the kings handes a great some of money. When Archibald Erle Douglas heard of thys conclusion, he disceyning the Erle of Marches blood to be aduanced before hys stock, did epyther by fayre wordes or else by disbursing a greater some of money, so enuegle king Robert of Scotlande, that David his heyre refusynge the first damosell, married the Erle Douglas daughter: The Erle of March desyred restitution of his money, to whome the king gaue many trifelyng answers, the which he tooke in so euill parte, that he with his wyfe fled into Englande vnto Henry Erle of Northumberlande, intending to be reuenged

kyng Robert beyng hereof aduertised, first deyrined the Erle George of all his dignities and possessions, and caused his goodes to be confiscate, and then wrote to the king of England earnestly beseeching him, if he would haue the truce any lenger to continue, eyther to delyuer into his possession the Erle of Marche, and other Traytors and rebels to his person and realme or else to banish and exile them out of his realme and dominions. King Henry aunswered discretely the Herault of Scotland, that the worde of a prince ought to be kept, and hys wytyng and seale ought to be inuolate: And considering that he had graunted a saufe conduyt vnto the Erle and hys company, he would neyther without cause reasonable breake his promise, nor yet deface his honour, which aunswere beyng declared to the king of Scottes, he incontinent did proclayme open warre against the king of England, with bloud, fyre and sworde.

King Henry forthwith gathering together a great pryssance & army, entered into Scotland brennyng and spoyling towne, Villages and Castels, sparyng nothing but Religious houses and Churches, and brent a great parte of the towne of Edenborough and Lyth, and besieged the Castell of Maydens in Enderborough in the ende of September, whereof was Captain David Duke of Rothsay, and Prince of the realme, and Archibald Erle Douglas wyth many hardy men. Robert Duke of Albany beyng appoynted Governour of the Realme, because the king was sick and vnapt to rule, sent vnto king Henry an Herault, assuryng hym on hys honour that if he would abyde and tary hys comyng, which should be wythin fyre dayes at the most, he would geue hym battayle, and remoue the siege, or else die for it.

The king being glad of these newes, rewarded the Herault with a Cobwe of silke, and a chayne of Golde, promising him in the worde of a Prince, not to depart thence, but to abide there the comyng of the Governour. The first daye passed, ye fyre and sixtene to, the Governour neyther appered nor sent worde, the wynter wared colde, victuall fayled, men dyed of the flure, and it rayned euery day so abundantly, that hunger and colde caused the king to breake by hys siege, and to depart out of Scotland without battayle or skirmishe offered: duryng which time both the Wardeynes of the Marches beyng with the king, the Scottes made a roade into Northumberland, and burned diuerse towne in Wamborough wyre, and shortly returned againe, or else they had bene trapped and come to late home.

When the king of Englande had dismissed his souldyours and discharged his armie, the Scottes entending to be reuenged of their great damages to them by the English nation done & committed by the Erle Douglas, appoynted two Armies to inuade Englande. Of the first was Chieftaine syr Thomas Halibarton of Dirlton, and Patrike Hebborne of Hales, which made a road into England, and returned with little losse and no great gayne. After this the aforesayde Sir Patrike Hebborne, encouraged with the prosperous successe of his first iourney, with a great armie of the people of Lowdian, inuaded Northumberland, robbing and spoyling of the countrie, and departed homeward, not without great gayne of beastes and captiues: But by the waye he was encountered with the Erle of Northumberland lands Vice Wardeyn, and other gentlemen of the borders, at a towne in Northumberlande called Nesbit, and there the Englishmen soze assayled, and the Scottes valiantly resisted, but after a long fight the victorie fell on the English part, and as John Maior the Scot wyteth, there were slaine the flowre of all Lowdian, and specially syr Patrike Hebborne with many of hys lynage. There were apprehended syr John, and William Cockborne, syr Robert of Was, John and Thomas Hablington Esquiers, and a great number of the common people. The Erle Douglas beyng soze grieved with the losse of his Nation and friendes, and entending to requite the same if it were possible, did by the consent of the gouernour of Scotland gather together an armie of twentie thousand talle men and mo. In the which armie the Lorde Mordeck Erle of Fiffe, sonne to the Governour of Scotlande, the Erle of Angus, and many other Erles and Barons of the Nobilitie of Scotland. These valyaunt Captaines and courageous Souldyours entered into Northumberland, with baners displayed lyke men that thought themselves hable to spoyle the whole Countrie of Northumberland. Now when they were entred into Englande, thinking no pryssance hable to encounter with their force, sodainely there issued out of a Waley beside a towne called Homelden, the Lorde Henry Percy, whom the Scottes for his haut and valyaunt courage, called Sir Henry Hotspurre, and in his companye the Lorde George of Dunbarre Erle of Marche before banished Scotlande, as you haue heard, with all the Gentlemen of Northumberlande, and eyght thousand men on horsback and on foote: The encounter was sharpe, the fight was dangerous and doubtfull, but in the ende the victorie chaunced to the English nation, and there were slaine of the Scottes of men of great renoune and estimation, Sir John Swynton, Sir Adam Gordon, Sir John Leuynton, Sir Alexander Ramsay of Dalehouse, and. xxiij. knyghtes mo, beside ten thousand of the common people. And there were taken prisoners, Mordeck Erle of Fiffe, Archibald Erle Douglas, Thomas Erle of Marrey, Robert Erle of Angus, and as some wyters affirme, the Erle of Athell, and Menteith with fyue hundreth other.

When the Lorde Percy had obteyned this great victorie, he sent his prisoners into dyuers fortresses, and determyned to subdue or destroy all the Countries of Lowdian and Marche, whose heades and Governours eyther he had slaine, or by force taken Captiues. And so with a great power entered into Cuedale, wastyng and destroyeng the whole Countrie, and there besieged the Castell of Coclaues, whereof was Captaine Sir John Grenelaw, who seyng that his Castell was not long hable to be defended, fell to composition with the Englishmen, that if the Castell were not surrendered within thre Moneths, that then he would delyuer it into the Englishmens handes.

The Captaine thereof wrote vnto the Governour, which calling a great counsaile, the most parte aduised hym rather frankly and freely to yeelde the Castell, thento put in iopardie the remnaunt of the Nobilitie of Scotlande: So muche was their courages abated and cooled wyth the remembraunce of the last conflict and battayle: But the Governour rebirking their feynt and cowardly hearts, sware that if no man would follow of the Nobilitie, he would doe his deuoyze to reskew the Castell at that daye.

But

But this othe was neyther kept nor broken, for he little preparing and lesse intending the othe which he solemply made, neuer set foote forward during the first two Moneths, for the reysing of the siege, or rescuyng of the Castell. But the Englishmen being sent for to go with the king into Wales, raysed their siege and departed, leauyng the noble men prisoners still with the Erle of Northumberland, and the Lozde Percy his sonne, which by the king were commaunded to keepe them to his vse, and not to delyuet them without his assent.

The king now purposing his iourney and enterprize into Wales, made great prouision both for men, munition and artillery meete for suche a buisnesse, whereof the frenche king beyng aduertised, sent priuilye the Lozde James of Burbone Erle of Marche, & his two brethren, John and Lewes with, xij. hundred knightes and Esquiers, to ayde Owen Glendoz against King Henry, and the sayde James of Burbone with his companye tooke shipping wyth. xxx. sayle at the mouth of Seyn, and the winde not beyng favourable to his purpose, could not approche to the coast of Wales, but came before the towne of Plymouth in Deuonshire, and there leauing his great shippes lyeng at Anker, in the night tooke lande, and bzent, spoyled and destroyed dyuers small Villages and pooze cottages, and robbed fiue or sixe little Crayers and fisher boates laden with fishe and corne. But while he and his companye lyke greedy Wolues were seeking after their praye, the winde arose high, and a great tempestuous rage and furious storme sodainly fluthed and drowned. xij. of his great shippes, which laye in the mouth of the haue for his safegarde and defense. Whereof when the Erle was aduertised, and perceauing by the syring of the Becons that the people beganne to assemble in plumpes to encounter with him, and also seying his power sore diminished, as well by the slaughter of suche as raunged abzoade in hope of spoyle and praye, as by the furious rage of the bmerciful sea, and hydeous tempest, with much paine and great labour tooke his shippes againe, and was not without great ieopardie of his lyfe driuen on the Coast of Briteyn, and landed at Saint Malos. The frenche king perceauyng that this iourney had euill successe, appointed one of his Marchalles called Demozancy, and the Master of his Crosbowes, with. xij. thousande men to sayle into Wales, which tooke shipping at Brest, and had the winde to them so prosperous that they landed at Hilford Haue, and leauing the Castell of Pembroke vnassaulted, because it was well fortifyed, manned and victualled, besieged the towne of Herfford West, which was so well defended by the Erle of Arondell and his power that they much more lost then gayned. And from thence they departed towarde Owen Glendoz, whome they named Prince of Wales, and founde him at the towne of Denbigh abyding there comming with ten thousand men. They were of him louingly receaued and gently enterteyned: And when all thinges were prepared, they passed by Glamorgan shire toward Worcester, and there bzent the Suburbes: But heying of the kings approachyng, they sodainely returned into Wales. The king with a great pypsaunce folowed and found them enbattailed on a high Mountayne, and a great valey betwene both the armies, so that eche army playnely perceaued other, and euery hoste looked to be assaulted of hys aduersary, and of the grounde to take the most aduantage: Thus they conty-

There were many fierce skirmishes, and many proper feates of armes daylie done, which the French Chronicles more then the English can reporte. For there were slayne the Lozde Patrioles of Tries, brother to the Marshall of Fraunce, the Lozde Mattelone, and the Lozde Wale; and the Bastard of Burbone with fiue hundred gentlemen.

Skirmishes with the French.

The Frenchmen and Welchmen were sore troubled and afflicted wyth famine, that their hartes and courages were sore abated, for the king had so stopped the passages, that neyther victuall nor succour could by any waye be conueyed vnto them: wherefore of very necessitie they were compelled eyther to fight or flee, and so by the aduisement and counsaile of the Marshall of Fraunce, which put not to much confidence in the wauering Welchmen, the whole host departed the eyght day, in the secretest maner that they could deuise. The Frenchmen with little rewardes and small gayne returned into Briteyn, making small boast of their painefull iourney.

When the king perceaued them thus departed, he followed them and chased them from hill to dale, and from one place to another, but all in vaine, and perceuyng then the time of the yere to be passed, and seying that as then he could doe no good, he returned agayne to Worcester, and there dispersed his armie, and returned agayne to London.

While the king was occupied in Wales, as aforesayde, certeine lewde and sedicious persons had blased abzoade & noysed that king Richard (which openly was seene deade) was yet liuyng, and desyred ayde of the common people, to repofesse his realme and royal dignitie: And for the better blasing of this false rumoz abzoade, they set vp vpon postes, and cast about the stretes, sundrie most slaunderous and sedicious billes and rymes, agaynst king Henrie, and his proceedyngs. The king beyng not a little offended with these malicious doynge, caused diligent searche to be made for the aucthors thereof, and amongst other, there was found out, Sir Roger Claringdon knight, and. viij. gray friers, which accoording to theyr desertes were put to execution at Tyborne.

Rumour spread abzoade that King Richard was aloue.

And here is to be shewed that king Henry now seeking friendship and affinitie in Germanie, sent this yere his eldest daughter Blanche, accompanied with the Erle of Somerset, the Bishop of Worcester, and the Lozde Clifford, and other noble personages into Almaine: which brought her to Coleyn, and there with great triumph she was maryed to William Duke of Bauier, sonne and heire to Lewes of Bauier the Emperour, in the which yere also dyed Ladie Katheryn Swynsford, the third wife of John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, father to this king Henry, and was buried at Lincolne.

While these thinges were thus in doying in England, Waleram Erle of Saint Paule, which had maryed the halfe sister of king Richard, hauyng a deadly hatred to king Henry, assembled a great armie, wherein (as sayth Maister Hall) were. xvi. thousand men, and a great number of the same were noble men, and after he toke shipping at Harflet, and landed in the Isle of

Henry Erle of Northum- berland & the Erle of Wor- cester. &c. be- gin to rebell.

In the ende of this yere dyed Geoffrey Chawcer, the most excellentest Poet that euer was in England, deceased the xxv. day of October, and lyeth buried in the bodie of the Church of Westminster, on the Southsyde neere vnto the Clocke. And the same yere also dyed that excellent Poet John Sowre, who lyeth buried in Saint Andries Church in Southwarke, and he buylded a great part of the same Church.

This yere appered a Comete or blasfing starre of a great and huge qua- titie, which some expounded to signifye great effusion of mans blood, and the same proued true, as after ye shal here. For Henry Erle of Northumberland, and Thomas Erle of Worcester his brother, and his sonne Lorde Henry Percy, called Hottespurre, which were to king Henrie in the begimnyng of his reigne both friendes and ayders, percepyng now that the king had pa- cified all ciuile sedition, and repressed his enemies, & had brought his realme to a conuenient quietnesse, they began now somewhat to enuy his glozve, and grudged at his wealth and felicitie: And specially grieved, because the king demaunded of the Erle and his sonne, such Scottishe prisoners as they had taken at the Conflictes fought at Homeldon and Nesbit, as you before haue heard. For of all the Captiues which were then taken, there was de- liuered to the Kinges possession, onely Mordake Erle of Fisse, sonne to the Duke of Albany, Governour of Scotland: For the king diuerse and sundry tymes requyred them of the Erle and his sonne, but the Percyes affyrmyng them to be theyr awne proper prysoners, and theyr peculiar prayes, did bitterly denie to deliuer them, insomuch, that the king openly sayd, that if they would not deliuer them, he would take them without deliuerance. Where- with they beyng sore discontent, by the counsaile of Lorde Thomas Percy Erle of Worcester, whose studie was euer to procure malice, and to set all thinges in broyle and vnberteintie, saynyng a cause to proue and tempt the king, came to him to Windsor, requyryng him by raunsome or otherwise, to cause to be deliuered out of pryson, Edmond Mortimer Erle of March their Cossyn Germaine, whome (as they reported) Owen Glendoz kept in fyl- thie pryson, shakelod with Irons, onely for that he tooke the kinges part, and was to him faythfull and true. The king began not a little to muse on thys request, and not without cause, for in dede it touched him as nere as his shirt, for that he was so neere of the blood of king Richard, and had good cause to make clayme to the Crowne. For this Edmond was sonne to Erle Roger, which was sonne to Ladie Philip, daughter to Lionell Duke of Clarence, the

the third sonne to king Edward the third, which Edmond at King Richardes going into Ireland was proclaymed heyre apparant to the Crowne of the realme, whose Aunt called Elianor this Lord Percy had maryed. And ther- fore the king little forced although that lynage were clerely subuerted, and bitterly extinct.

When the king had well aduised vpon and considered thys matter, hee made answer and sayde, that the Erle of Marche was not taken prisoner neyther for his cause, nor in his seruice, but willyngly suffered himselfe to be taken, the which fraude the king caused to be openly published, and thys answer pleased nothing the Erle of Worcester, but put him in a great Cho- ler and chafe, and departed in a great rage and fume, insomuch y<sup>e</sup> Henry Hottespurre sayde afterwardes openly: Beholde the heyre of the realme is robbed of his right, and the robber with hys awne will not redeeme him. And nowe the Percies disposed and bent themselues in all that they myght bitterly to depose king Henry, and to restore theyr Cossyn Edmond Erle of Marche vnto the Crowne and Diademe of the realme, whome they shortly after not onely deliuered out of the Captiuitie of Owen Glendoz, but also entred into a league and amitie with the sayde Owen agaynst king Henrie and all his friendes, to the great displeasure and long vnquietnyng of kyng Henry and his partakers.

The Lorde Percy & his brother re- demed Ed- mond Mortimer Erle of March and pay his ran- some.

And here sayth Hall, that the aforesayd Owen Glendoz, and the Erle of Marche, and the Percyes were greatly abused and deceyued by a Welthe Prophecier, who made them to beleue, that king Henry was the Holde- warpe curst of Gods awne mouth, and that they thre were the Dragon, the Lyon, and the Wolfe, which should deuide this realme betwene them by the prophetic of Habimet Harlyn: But in the ende all turned to their con- fusion and destruction, and specially of Owen Glendoz, and the Lord Per- cy: For the Erle of Marche was euer kept in the Court, vnder such a ke- per, that he could neyther do, nor attempt any thing agaynst the king, with- out his knowledge, and dyed without issue, leauyng his right title and inter- est to Anne his sister and heyre, maryed to Rycharde Erle of Cambridge fa- ther to the Duke of Yorke, whose offspring in continuance of tyme obteyned the game, and gat the garland.

King Henry now knowyng of this Confederacie, and nothing lesse myndyng then that which hapned after, gathered a great armie to go againe into Wales, whereof the Erle of Northumberland and his sonne were ad- uertised by Lord Thomas Erle of Worcester, and with all the diligence that they could, raysed all the powber that they could make, and sent to the Scots which before were taken prisoners for ayde of men, and promisyng the Erle Douglas the towne of Barwike, and a parte of Northumberland, and to o- ther Scottishe Lordes great Lordships and Seigniories, if they obteyned the hyper hand and superiortie. The Scottes allured with desyre of gaine, and for no malice that they bare to king Henry, but yet somewhat desirous to be reuenged of theyr olde griefes, came to the Erle with a great companie: And to make their cause to seeme good and iust, they deuysed certeyne Ar- ticles by the aduyse of Richard Scrope Archebischoppe of Yorke, brother to the Lord Scrope, whome King Henry caused to be beheaded at Bristow, as you haue heard before: which Articles they shewed to diuerse noble men and Bishops of the realme, which fauouring and consentyng to the purpose, promised them ayde, not onely by wordes, but also by wrytyng. Howbeit, whether it were for feare, eyther for that they would be lookers on, and no deede doers, neyther promise by worde nor by wrytyng was performed: For at the day of conflict, all the confederates absented them selues, and left the Erle of Stafford alone, which beyng of a haute courage and hie stomache kept his promise, and ioyned with the Percies to his destruction.

The Lord Percy, with the Erle Douglas, & other the Erles of Scotland, with a great armie departed out of the North partes, leauryng hys father sicke (which promised vpon his amendment and recouerie, without delay to followe) and came to Stafford, where his Uncle the Erle of Worcester and he met, and there began to consult vpon their great affaires, and there also they exhorted theyr Souldiours to spare no trauaile for the libertie of theyr Countrie, protestyng openly that they made warre chiefly to restore the noble realme of England to his accustomed glozy and freedome, which was gouerned by a tyrant, and not by his lawfull and right king. The Capteynes sware, and the Souldiours promised to fight, yea and to dye for the libertie of their Countrie.

When all thinges were prepared, they set forward towarde Wales, lo-kyng euery houre for new ayde and succours. The king hearyng of the Erles approachyng, thought it pollicy to encounter with them before that the Welsh men should ioyne with their armie, and therefore returned sodainly to the towne of Shrewesburie. He was scantly entred into the towne, but he was by hys Postes aduertised that the Erles with Baners displayed, and battails ranged, were comyng towarde him, and were so hote and courageous, that they with light hores began to skirmish with his hoste. The king perceiuyng theyr doynges, issued out and encamped himselfe without the East gate of the towne. The Erles nothing abashed, although their succours them deceyued, embattayled themselves not farre from the Kinges armie. And the same night they sent the Articles, whereof is mencion made before, by Thomas Kayton, and Thomas Saluayn Esquiers, to the king, the true Copie whereof, as sayth Hall, doth followe.

1 We Henry Percie Erle of Northumberlande, high Constable of England, and Warden of the west Marches of the same toward Scotland, Henry Percie our eldest sonne Warden of the East Marches of Englande toward Scotland, and Thomas Percie Erle of Worcester beyng Proctours and protectours of the common weale, before our Lorde Iesus Christ our supreme iudge, doe allege, say, and entend to proue with our handes personally this day, agaynst thee Henry Duke of Lancaster, thy complices and fauourers, vniustly presuming, and named king of Englande, without title of right, but onely of thy guyle and by force of thy helpers: That when thou after thine exile diddest enter into Englande, thou madest an othe to vs by on the holy Gospelles, bodely touched and kyssed by thee at Dankaster, that thou wouldest neuer claime the crowne, kingdome, nor state royall, but only thine awne proper inheritaunce, and the inheritaunce of thy wyfe in Englande, and that Richard our soueraigne Lorde and king and thine, should reigne during the tyme of his lyfe, gouerned by the good counsaile of the Lordes Spirituall and Temporall. Thou hast imprisoned the same thy so-

ueraigne Lorde, and our king within the tower of London, untill he had for feare of death resigned his kingdome of Englande and Fraunce, and had renounced all his right, in the aforesayde kingdome, and other his dominions and landes of beyond the sea. Under colour of which resignation and renunciation by the counsaile of thy friends and complices, and by the open noysing of the raskall people, by thee and thine adherents assembled at Westmynster, thou hast crowned thy selfe of the realmes aforesayde, and hast seized and entered into all the Castels and Lordships prteyning to the kings crowne, contrarie to thine othe, wherfore thou art forsworne & false.

2 Also we doe allege, saye and entend to proue, that where thou swoorest vpon the same Gospels in the same place and tyme to vs, that thou wouldest not suffer any dismes to be leuyed of the clergie, nor siffenes on the people, nor any other tallages nor taxes to be leuyed in the realme of Englande, to the behofe of the realme during thy lyfe, but by the consideration of the thre estates of the realme, except for great neede in causes of importaunce or for the resistance of our enemies, onely, and none otherwise. Thou contrary to thine othe so made, hast done to be leuyed right many dismes and siffenes and other impositions and tallages, as well of the Clergie, as of the commonaltie of the realme of England, and of the Marchaunts, for feare of thy Maiestie royall, wherfore thou art periured and false.

3 Also we doe allege, saye and entend to proue, that where thou swoorest to vs vpon the same Gospels in the aforesayde place and tyme, that our soueraigne Lorde and thine, king Richard should reigne during the terme of his lyfe in his royall prerogative and dignitie: Thou hast caused the same our soueraigne Lorde and thine, traytorously wythin the Castell of Boimffret, without the consent or iudgement of the Lordes of the Realme, by the space of .xv. dayes, and so many nightes (which is horrible among christian people to be heard) with hunger, thirst and colde to perishe, to be murdered, wherfore thou art periured and false.

4 Also we doe allege, saye and entend to proue, that thou at that tyme when our soueraigne Lorde and thine, king Richard was so by that horrible murder dead as abouesayde, thou by extorte power diddest vsurpe, and take the kingdome of Englande, and the name, and the honour of the kingdome of Fraunce vniustly and wrongfully, contrary to thine othe from Edmonde Mortimer Erle of Marche, and of Ulster, then nexte and direct heyre of Englande and of Fraunce, immediately by due course of inheritaunce after the deceasse of the aforesayde Richard, wherfore thou art periured & false.

5 Also we doe allege, saye and entend to proue, as aforesayde, that where thou madest an othe in the same place and tyme to support and maintayne the lawes and good customes of the realme of Englande: And also afterward at the tyme of thy coronation, thou madest an othe, the sayd lawes and good customes to keepe, and conserue inuiolate. Thou fraudulently and contrary to the lawe of England and thy fauourers, haue wrytten almost thorough euery shyre in Englande to chose such knightes for to holde a parliament, as shall be for thy pleasure and purpose, so that in thy parliaments no iustice should be ministred agaynst thy minde in these our complaynts now moued & shewed by vs, whereby at any tyme we might haue perfitte redresse: Notwithstanding that we according to our conscience (as we trust ruled by God)

haue oftentimes thereof complayned, as well can testifie and beare witnesse the right reuerend fathers in God, Thomas Arundell Archbishop of Caun-torbury, and Richard Scrope Archebishop of Yorke: wherefore now by force and strength of hand before our Lorde Jesu Christ, we must aske our remedy and helpe.

Also we doe allege, saye and entende to pzooue, that where Edmonde Mortimer Erle of Marche & Ulster, was taken prisoner by Owen Glen-doz, in a pitched and foughten fielde, and cast into prison, and laden with yron fettlers for thy matter and cause, whom falsely thou hast pzoclaimed willingly to yeelde himselfe prisoner to the sayd Owen Glendoz, and neyther woul-dest deliuer him thy selfe, nor yet suffer vs his kinsmen to raunsome and de-lyuer him: yet notwithstanding, we haue not onely concluded and agreed with the same Owen for his raunsome at our proper charges and expenses, but also for a peace betwene thee, and the sayde Owen. Why hast thou then not onely published and declared vs as traytors, but also craftely and deceitfully imagined, purposed and conspired the bitter destruction and confusion of our persons? For the which cause we desie thee, thy ayders and helpers as common Traitors and destroyers of the realme, and the Inuadours, oppressours and confounders of the very true and right heyres to the crowne of Englande, which thing we entende with our handes to pzooue thys daye, almightie God helping vs.

When king Henry had read their articles and defiaunce, he answered the Esquiers, that he was readie with dent of sword and fierce battayle, to pzooue their quarell false and feyned, and not with wytyng and slaundersous bylles, and so in his righteous cause and iust quarel, he doubted not but God would both ayde and assist him agaynst vntrue persons, and false forsworne traytors, with which answered the messengers departed.

The next daye in the morning early, which was the Euen of Marpe Magdalen, the king perceaued that the battayle was neerer then he eyther thought or looked for, therefore least long taryeng might minish or hinder his strength, he did with all speede set his battayles in good order: and lykewise did his enemies, which both in puissance and courage was nothing to hym inferior. Then sodainely the Trumpets blew, and forthwith the battayles ioyned. The Scottes which had the forward on the Lordes syde, intending to be reuenged of their olde displeasures, done to them by the Englishe nation, set fiercely on the kings foreward, that they made them draw back, and had almost put them out of their araye. The Welshmen also, which sith the kings departure out of Wales, had lurked and lyen in woodes and Moun-taynes, hearyng of thys battayle toward, came to the ayde of the Erles, and refreshed the werie people with newe succours. When a fearefull messenger had declared to the king that his people were beaten downe on euerye syde, it was no need to bidde him stirre, for sodainely he approached with his freshe battayle, and comforted, hartened and encouraged his parte so, that they toke their hartes to them, and manfully fought with their enemies. The Prince that daye holpe much his father, for although he were that daye sore wounded in the face with an arrow, yet he neuer ceased either to fight wher the battayle was most strongest, or to encourage them who seemed to him to faint. Thys sore and fierce battayle continued thre long houres with indifferent different fortune on both parts: but at the last the king cryeng victo-ry, brake

the array, and entered into the battayle of his enemies, and fought fiercely, and entered so farre into the battayle, that the Lorde Douglas strake him downe, and slue Syr Walter Blunt, and three other appa-relled in the kings sute and clothing, sayeng: I maruell to see so many kings to arise so sodainely agayne, but sone after the king was reysed agayne, and that daye he did many a Noble feate of armes. For the Scottes write, and frenche men also, though the Englishmen keepe sylence, that he himselfe slue with his awne handes that daye. xxvi. of his enemies, and the other of his parte encouraged by his doings fought valyauntly, and slue the Lorde Percy called Sir Henry Hotspurre, the best Captaine on the parte aduerser, and when his death was knowne, they fled and happie was he that was formost. And in that flight the Erle Douglas fallyng from the cragge of a MOUNTAYNE brake one of his stones, and so was taken, and for his valyauntnesse was of the king freely and frankely deliuered. There was taken also Sir Thomas Percy Erle of Worcester and dyuers other. On the kings parte were slaine Sir Walter Blunt, and. xvj. hundred other persons: But on the parte of the rebels were slayne the Erle of Stafford, the Lorde Percy, and about. v. thousand other, and as for the Scottes fewe or none escaped alyue.

After this great victo-ry by the king obtained, he first rendred his humble and hartly thanks to God almightie, & caused the Erle of Worcester the next morow after to be drawne hanged and quartered in the towne of Shrews-burie, and his head to be sent to London, and there set vpon a pole vpon London bridge, and the same tyme also were many moe Captaynes executed in the sayde place. And this being done, the king lyke a valyaunt Conquerour returned to London with great pompe, where he was by the Magistrates of the Citie most solemnly receaued, and ioyfully welcommed. But here a little to returne, before his departure from Shrewsburie he not forgetting his enterpryse agaynst Owen Glendoz, sent into Wales with a great armie Prince Henry his eldest sonne agaynst the sayde Owen, and hys sedicious complices, which being disinayed and in a manner desperate of all comfort, by the reason of the kings late victorie, fled into desert places and solitarie Caues, where he receyued a finall rewarde, meete and prepared by Gods prouydence for such a rebell and sedicious seducer. For being destitute of all comfort, and dreading to shew his face to any creature, lacking meate to sustaine nature, for pure hunger and lack of foode, miserably ended his wretched lyfe. Nowe after that the death of Owen was knowne to the Prince, and that the Prince with little labour, and lesse losse had tamed and bryde led the furious rage of the wyld Welshmen, and had left Governours to rule and gouerne the countrie, he returned to his father with great hono-ry and no small prayse.

The Erle of Northumberland heeryng of the ouerthrowe of hys brother and sonne, came of his awne free will to the kyng, excusing himselfe as one neyther partie nor knowyng of theyr doynge nor enterpryse: The king neyther accused him, nor helde him excused, but dissembled the matter for two causes, one was, he had Barwicke in his possession, which the king rather desired to haue by pollicy, then by force: The other was, that the Erle had his Castelles of Alnewyke, Warckworth, and other, fortifyed with Scottes, so that

that if the Erle were apprehended, all Northumberlande were in leoparde to become Scottische: For these causes the king gaue him sayre wordes, and let him depart home, where he continued in peace a while, but after rebelled as ye shall here.

And in this tyme, at the charges of the Citie of London, where before there was a certeine prison in Cornehill called the Tonne, they nowe buylded in the same place a sayre Conduyt, which at this day is called the Conduyt in Cornehyll.

This yere Walleram Erle of Saint Paule, considering that he had defyed king Henrre, and also that he had made dyuerse voyages, and done little dammage to the Englishe Nation, but had susteyned much losse, and yet continuing in hys olde malice agaynst the king of England, by the assent of the French king, assembled a great number of men of warre, as five hundred men of armes, five hundred Genowayes with Crosbowes, and a thousande Flemynge on foote, and layde siege to the Castell of Marke, three Leagues from Calice, within the territore of the king of England, the .xviij. day of July, whereof was Capteine Sir Philip Hall, with .lxxx. Archers, and .xxiiiij. other Souldiours. The Erle raysed agaynst the Castell dyuers engynes, but they preuayled not, for they within shotte so fiercely, and cast stones so incessantly, and defended the same so manfullye, that they preuayled not at that tyme. And the Erle perceiuyng that his enterprize had not such successe as he looked for, retyred with his men lodged in the towne, fortifying the same for feare of rescues that might issue from Calice. The next day he gaue a sore assault again, & with great force entered the bitter Court, of the Castell & toke therein a great number of horse, Byne and Cattaille, at the which assault sir Robert Barpynguille, cossyn to the Erle, was slain. The same day an hundredeth Archers on horsebacke came out of Calice, and perceined the doynges and demeanour of the Erle and his companie, and toward night they sent an Herauld vnto him, certefying that they would dyne with him the nexte daye: To whome he proudly answered, that he would gladly receiue them, and theyr dinner agaynst theyr comyng shoulde be ready prepared.

The next day ensuyng issued out of Calice two hundredeth men of armes, two hundredeth Archers, three hundredeth men on foote, with .x. or .xij. Chariots laden with victuall and Artillery, conducted by Sir Richard Aston knight, Lieutenant of the Englishe pale for the Erle of Somerset, Captaine generall of those Marches, which in good order of battaile marched toward their enemies, which before by their espialles were aduertised of their comyng: But that notwithstanding, they issued not out of their lodgynges to encounter with them, but kept themselves within their Closure.

The Englishe men shot so closely and so sharply together, that the Flemynge and footemen began to flie: The men of Armes fearyng the slaughter of theyr horses, ran away with a light gallop: The Genowayes which had spent the most part of their shot at the assault, made little defence, and small resistance, and so were all slaine and put to flight. The hastie and rather Erle of Saint Paule, and dyuerse other without stroke geuen to their enemies, fled to Saint Omers: And there were taken of the best of the armie, as sayth the French and Duché Chronicles, .lx. or .lxxx. persons, amongst whome whome the Capteyn of Bulleyn was one, and many Lordes and knightes slaine. After that the Englishe men had taken all the Cartes, Munitions, and victualles that their enemies had brought thether, they returned to Calice in great triumph: And within five dayes after, there issued out of the Englishe pale about the number of five hundred men, toward Arde by night tyme, thinking to haue found the towne vnzoyled: But Sir Hansard de Boys, and the Lord Kygnie defended it, and disappointed the Englishe men, who with the losse of forty men, returned to Calice: Which dead persons were brent in an olde house, because their enemies shoulde be ignozant of the damage that the Englishe men had by them susteyned.

The Erle of Saint Paule beyng at Turwyn, and yet imagining in some part, or by some way to be reuenged of the Englishe men, and to recover some part of his losse, but more of his honour, sent for a great companie of Noble men, and valiant personages, and concluded to invade the Marches of his enemies. But the French king considering the Erles euill fortune, commaunded him to leaue off his enterprize, with the which he was sore displeased. Yet to aduoyde perilles, the French king layde in Garrison at Bulleyn and other places, the Marques of Mount, sonne to the Duke of Barre, and the Erle of Dampney, and Sir John Harpadane, a knight of great renoune and high estimation.

The king of England circumspectly fore seeing thinges to come, and imagining that the French men attempted some newe enterprize agaynst him, or his Dominions beyond the Sea, sent foure thousand men to Calice, and to the Sea, whereof three thousand landed at Scluse, which besieged a Castell standing in the mouth of the Hauen, and made dyuerse assaultes, and lost diuerse of their companie: But newes were brought to them, that the Duke of Burgoyne had desyred licence of the French king to besiege the Towne of Calice, for which cause they raysed their siege, and went to the defence of Calice.

And this yere also sayth Keynolph, the Emperour of Constantinople, whose name, as some wyters call him, was Robert, came into Englande, onely to see the Countrie, and maners of the people thereof.

And this yere the Lorde of Castell in Briteyn landed within a myle of Plymmoth, with a great companie, and lodged in the towne all that day and night, and the next day spoiled and robbed the sayde towne, and carryed away all that was therein, and returned againe into their Shippes.

Some after this, Lewes Duke of Orleance, brother to the French king, a man of no lesse pride then of great courage, wrote his letters to king Hery, aduertising him that he for the perfect loue which he bare to the noble feates of Chivalrie and Martiall actes, could inuent nothing more honourable nor laudable to them both, then to meete in the field, eche part with an hundred knightes and Esquiers, all beyng Gentlemen, both of name and armes, armed and weaponed at all poyntes, to fight and combate to the yeldyng, and euery person to whome God shoulde send victoerye, to haue his prisoner, and him to ransome at his pleasure, offering himselfe & his companie to come to his City of Angulesme, so that the king of England would come to the lands and borders of Burdeaux, and there defende his chalenge.

was haucie and couragious, wrote to him againe, that he not a little mused and more maruailed, that the Duke beyng sworne aswell to him, as to king Richard, to mainteyn the peace betweene his brother the frenche king, and them concluded, and to that had set his signe and great scale, would now for baine glorie, and vnder the colour of doying of deedes of Armes, not onely violate the peace, and breake the amitie betweene them before concluded, but also geue an occasio of displeasure and ingratitude, by the which in conclusion might rise mortall warre, and deadly enemie: affirmyng farther, that no king annoynted, of very dutie was euer bound to answeere any challenge, but to his pere of egall estate, & equiuolent dignitie. And that no Christian prince ought or should consent to warre or effusion of Christian blood, but onely for the defence of his realme, or for conquest of his right, or for the amplifying of Christes fayth, and Christian religton, and not for pride, worldly fame, and baine glorie: And sayng further, that when oportunitie of tyme, and conuenient leysure serued, he would transiret and passe the sea himselfe, with such companie as he thought most conuenient, into his Countrey of Calceyne, at which tyme the Duke might sit forward with his band, for the atteynyng of honour, and accomplisshyng of his couragious desyre, promisyng in the word of a Prince, that he would not thence depart, vntill the Duke eithet by fulfillyng his awne desyre, or by singuler Combate betweene them two, onely for the aduoidyng of the effusion of Christian blood, should thinke himselfe satisfied and fully answered. Howbeit, at that tyme he beyng busied with weigh-tie affayres, concernyng the publike weale of his realme, could neyther ap-poynt tyme nor place, protestyng that the deferryng of tyme was neyther for disdeyne, nor yet for cowardnesse, but onely to abate the pride of him, which knowyng not himselfe, nor fearyng reproche, regarded not his othe, wytyng, nor scale.

To this answer the Duke of Orleans replied, and king Henry re-iorned, the which doynge for the vnpryncely tauntes conteyned in them, I thought meete to omit and passe them over.

The Duke of Orleans not content with the king of England, assembled an army of sixe thousand men, and entered into Guyan, and besieged the Towne of Clergie, whereof was Capteyne Sir Robert Antefielde a baly-ant knight, and an hardie Capteyne, hauyng with him onely three hundred Englishe men. The Duke almost euery day assaulted the towne very fiercely, but they within the Towne couragiously defended the same. Insomuche that when they had lien there three monethes, and had lost many of his men, and gotten nothing, without honour or spoyle returned into France.

After this, the Admirall of Briteyn, which was greatly enflamed and encouraged, because the last yere he had entered the Haven of Plymnoth, and robbed and spoiled the towne, and afterward had taken certayne ships with wine. And he being now accompanied with the Lorde Castell a baly-aunt Baron of Briteyn, and hauyng xxx. sayle of Shippes well furnished with artillerie, munition, and victualles, and. xiiij. hundred men of armes, say-led from Saint Malos, and came before the towne of Dartmouth, and would haue landed, but by the force of the townes men, and men of the coun-trie, they were repulsed and put back: In which conflict the Lorde of Castell with his two brethren, with foure hundred other were slayne, and aboute

two hundred prisoners taken and ransomed, whereof the Lord of Saque-uille high Marshall of Briteyn was one, which was brought to the king, and was afterward redeemed.

The Admirall being sorry of thys infortunate enterprize, with much losse and no gayne returned hastily into his Countrey. King Henry being aduertised of this attempt, sent the Lorde Thomas his sonne, which after was Duke of Clarence, to the sea, with a great nauie of Shippes, to the entent that eithet with battayle or spoyleing or destroyeng of the Sea costes, both of Briteyn and of France, he might reuenge this iniurie and inuasion. And he sayling by the sea costes landed diuers times, and brent townes and destroyed people without any pittie or mercie: And when he thought his quarell well reuenged, he sayled toward England, and in his returning he encountred with two great Caricks of Seane, laden with riche merchandise, betweene whome was a great conflict, and a bloody battayle: But after long fighting the Englishmen preuailed, and brought both the Carickes into Camber before Rye, where one of them by misaduenture of fyre perished, to the losse and no gayne of both the parties.

About this time, John Duke of Burgoyne, which had long laboured, and now obtayned licence to besiege the towne of Calice, preparyng Engines, and all other Instruments necessarie for that purpose, assembled at Saint Omers sixe thousand men of armes, xii. hundred Crosoowes, and
xii. thousand footemen. And now when all things were in a readinesse, and the whole armie assembled, he was by the frenche king and his counsayle (who had some mistrust in hym) countermaunded and forbidden any further to procede in that enterprize: For the which cause he conceaued such an hatred and deadly malice against the Duke of Orleans (whome he thought was the onely let and stop of his glozie and renowne) that he euer after, not onely stomaked and grudged agaynst him, but in the ende (as you shall here) brought him to death and finall destruction.

And it so happened, that this yere one William Serle, whome some call John Serle, beyng one of the murderers at Calice of the Duke of Glocester, was taken lurking in the Marches of Scotlande, and drawen on an herdle from that place by to London, and committed to the Tower, and then brought to Westmynster, and there he was also charged that he had bruted abroad that king Richard was alyue, and for these things was there arraigned, condemned, iudged, hanged, drawen, and quartered at Tyborne.

The Erle of Northumberland, of whome before is spoken, bearing no litle hatred vnto king Henry, for the death of his sonne Sir Henrie Hotspurre, and his brother the Erle of Worcester, as aforesayde, did daylie practise some meane to be reuenged therof, and now secretly he began to breake his minde to Richard Scrope Archebishop of Yorke, brother to William Lorde Scrope, high Treasorer of Englande, whome king Henry (as you haue heard) besidged at Bristow, & with Thomas Howbray Erle Marshall, sonne to Thomas Duke of Norfolke, for king Henryes cause before banished the realme of England, and with the Lordes, Hastinges, Fauconbridge, Bardolfe and dyuers other, which he knew to beare deadly hatred vnto king Henry. And after many meetings, and long consultations had, they finally did conclude and determine: that all they, their friends and Allies, wyth all their power should meete at Porke wolde at a daye appointed, and that the Erle of Northumberland should be Chiefetayne of the armie, who promised to bring with him a great number of Scottes.

The king hath knowledge of the conspiracie.

This conspiracie was not so secretly kept, nor so closely covered, but that the king had knowledge thereof, and was fully informed of the same: wherefore to prevent the time of their assembly, he with suche power as he could sodainely call together, marched with all speede into the North partes, and was there with all his hoste and power, before the Confederats heard any thing of his comming forward, and todaynely he caused to be apprehended the Archebischoppe, the Erle Marshall, Syr John Lampley, and Sir Robert Plumpton. These persons were arreigned and atteinted of highe treason, and adjudged to die, and so on the Monday in the Whitson weeke, all they without the Citie of Porke were beheaded.

And here I finde written in an auncient historie, that after the taking of the Archebischop of Porke, that the Archebischop of Cauntorbury, called Thomas Becon came unto the king and sayd, Sir if the Bischop of Porke haue so greatly offended you as it is sayd, yet I pray you consider that I am your ghostly father, and the second person in your realme, & that you ought not to hearken to anye mans boyce before me: wherefore I counsaile you referue the payne and punishment of the sayde Bischop to the Popes iudgement, and he will take suche order as ye shall be pleased. And if you will not so doe, yet let him be referred to the parliament, and keepe your handes undefiled from his bloud. The king answered: I may not stave him for the rumour of the people. Then the Archebischop called for a Notarie, to make an Instrument of the kings answer, that if neede were, it might be presented to the Pope: But the king would not stay but caused execution, as aforesaid.

Execution.

Beside the persons aforesaid, divers other of the sayde conspiracie, as the Lorde Hastings, the Lorde Fauconbridge, Sir John Coluile of the Dale, and Sir John Griffith were beheaded at Durham.

The Erle of Northumberland fleeth into Scotland.

The Erle of Northumberland perceaving his counsaile to be reveled, and his confederates put to shamefull execution, fled into Scotland to hys olde friend George of Dunbarre Erle of Marche, which the yere before was retoked out of exile, and restored to his possessions, name, and dignitie, where he taried untill the next Sommer, and then sayled into Fraunce, and after into Flaunders, desyring ayde and assistance agaynst king Henry: But when he sawe little hope of comfort, and that fewe hearkened to his request, he accompanied with the Lorde Bardolph much dismayed, and more desperate, returned againe to his true friends into Scotland, and there made his abode the whole yere, abyding the favour of fortune: During which tyme, the king without any difficultie tooke into his possession the towne of Berwike, the Castels of Alnewike, and all other Fortresses apperteyning to the Erle. And lying at Berwike, he caused to be put to death the Barons soune of Greystock, Sir Henry Beynton, and John Blenkinsop, and fyve other, as offenders in this conspiracie.

The Prince of Wales entreateth with a power into Scotland.

Nowe when king Henry had thus appeased this late conspiracy, he sent his soune the prince of Wales, accompanied with Edward Duke of Porke, and a great armie with him, to encounter with the Scottes, which by promise were bounde to ayde and assist the aforesayde Conspirators: But they hearyng hearyng that the founders of the warre were apprehended and put to death, made no haste forward, but taried peaceably at home. So that the Prince entering into Scotlande, and fynding no resistance, brent Townes, spoyled villages, and wasted the Countrey every where as he passed: which thing so much amased the king of Scots and his counsaile, y notwithstanding that he had gathered & appoynted a great host vnder the Conductes of the Erles of Douglas, and Bowhan to resist the prince and his inuasions: yet they sent Ambassadors vnto him, requyring him of peace and finall concord: which request he bitterly denyed, but at their humble petition a truce for certaine Moneths was taken, of the which they were both glad and ioyous, and so the prince laden with pray & spoyle, returned with great gaine to his father.

Whyle the prince persecuted thus the country of Scotland on the land, Sir Robert Umfreule Vice Admirall of England bered the Countreys of Fisse, and Loghdian on the Sea coast, for he lyeng in the Scottishe Sea xiiij. dayes, and every day landed on the one side or other and tooke prayes, spoyles and prisoners maugre the great powers of the Duke of Albany, and the Erle of Douglas: in so much that he brent and tooke the towne of Pemples on their sayre day: and with great gaine returning to his shippes, brent the Galiot of Scotlande with many other vessels, and sent cloth, victuall and dyuers marchaundizes to every towne in Northumberlande, setting thereon no great price, wherfore the Scots called him Robin Rensmarket.

Robin Rensmarket.

The king about this time was newly bered and bnguieted, for notwithstanding the fortunate successe that he had obteyned in all his outwarde warres and inward affayres, yet some of his people bare vnto him such cancard heartes, that still they practised his destruction: for nowe was a newe rumour spread abroad that King Richard was alyue once agayne, and that he was in Scotland: To the which fable, suche credite was geuen, that if prudent pollicie had not foreseene the daunger thereof, it had kindled a greater flame then would haue bene eyther easely or quickly quenched.

A newe rumour that King Richard was alyue.

This Sommer the plague of pestilence reigned so sore in the Citie of London, and in the countreie also rounde about the Citie, that the king durst not repayre thither. Wherefore he departing from the Castell of Ledes in Kent, determined to take shipping at Dynborough, and to saile over to Aye in Essex, and so to Piaishy, there to passe hys time untill the plague were cessed: And because certayne Pirates of Fraunce were lurking at the Thamesmouth waiting for their praye: Thomas Lorde Camoys with certaine shippes of warre was appoynted to waitt over the kyng. When the kyng was on the Sea, and in the middelt of his iourney, whether the winde taried, or that the Lorde Camoys kept not a direct coursse, or that his Ship was but a slugge. The french men, which by all similitude had knowledge of the kings passage, entered amongst the kings flanie, and tooke foure vessels next vnto the kings ship, and in one of them, Sir Thomas Rampton knight the kings Vice Chamberleyn, with all his Chamber stufte and apparell, and followed the king so neere, that if his Ship had not beene swift, he had landed sooner in Fraunce, then in Essex. The king being sore moued with the Lorde Camoys, caused him to be attached and endited, that he condiscended and agreed with the french men, that the king in his iourney should be intercepted and taken. On this poynt he was arreigned the last day of October, before Edmond Erie of Kent, that daye high Stuarde of the Realme, on which daye he was adiudged by his Peeres not guilty, and was dismissed at the barre, and restored to all his lands, goods & offices.

In this yere king Henrye, not onely desiring newe amitie with tozern Princes, but also the preferment of his lyne and progemie, sente the Ladie Philyp his yonger daughter to Erick king of Denmarke, Norway, & Swethen, which was conueyed thither with great pompe, and there with muche triumph was solemnly maryed to the sayde king, where theye tasted both of welth and wo, ioy and paine.

This yere Rochester Bridge was begon to be buylded of stone, and the same together with the Chapell standyng at the ende of the same, was finished by Sir Robert Knolles knight, who also newly rededyed the bodie of the Church of the white friers in fletestrete in Lodon, & there was buried.

You heard before howe king Robert of Scotland, beyng very aged and impotent, was not able to gouerne and rule his realme, and howe Walter his brother, beyng by him created Duke of Albanie (which was the first Duke that euer was in Scotlande) was made Gouvernour of his brothers Countre and Dominion. After which office and preheminence by him obtayned, he so sore thirsted after the Crowne and Scepter royal, that he cared little though the king his brother & his two sonnes had bene at Christs fote in heauen. And somewhat to further his purpose, it vnsfortunatly chanced, that Daup of Northsay Prince of the realme, and eldest sonne to the king was accused to his father of diuerse and sundry crimes, and especially of wanton and dissolute luyng, as rauishyng of wyues, deflowryng of Virgines, and defilyng of maydens: wherfore the king deliuered him to his brother the gouernour, trustyng that by his good counsaile, and discrete aduertisement, he would not onely amend his lyfe, but also waite graue, prudent, and wise. Nowe when the Duke had possessed part of his desyred pray, he sent his Nephewe from Castell to Castell, from prison to prison, from place to place, and in conclusion lodged him in a Towre within the Castell of Franklande, where with famine he caused him miserably to ende his lyfe, puttyng a pooze woman to painefull death, which gaue to the Prince the milke of her brestes by a Rede into the prison. His death was long hidden from the king his father: But in conclusion the Gouvernour shewed vnto the king, how diuerse persons trayterously had murdered him, which were apprehended and iudged to die, and yet in their lyues they neuer knewe nor sawe him. The King notwithstanding his brothers excuse, doubted much of the ende of his other sonne named James, wherfore he priuily prouided a ship, in the which he put the childe, beyng then of the age of .ix. yeres, vnder the tuition of the Lord Henry Scintclere, Erie of Orkeney, willyng him to conuey the prince into fraunce, if by any possibilitie he could thither attayne. And if fortune should driue him vpon the coast of England, he wrote his most gentle and louyng letters vnto king Henry, the effect whereof were, that forasmuch as a truce was taken betwene them, and that in the same was conteyned, that all men conueyng letters from the one of the kinges to the other shoulde surely and safely passe and repasse without any contradiction, and that therefore it would please him not to breake nor derie the sayde libertie to the bearer of his letter which was his only sonne, and to suffer him not onely to liue

safely and surely vnder his protection and defence, but also to vouchsafe to preferue and defende him, beyng now the onely heyre of the Kingdome of Scotland, from the malicious attemptes of his ambitious & cruell kindred.

Now all thinges beyng in a redynesse, the Mariners set forwarde and departed from Bas Castle with this yong Prince, and Henry Percey, sonne to the Lord Percey, called Hottespurre before slaine at Shrewsbury, and by force of tempest were driuen vpon the coast of England in Holdernesse, at a place called Flambozough hed, the .xxx. day of March, where the yong prince to refresh himselfe tooke land, and soone after he and all his companie were taken, and brought to the king at Windsor, where he with all due reuerence deliuered his fathers letter. When the letter was read and vnderstand, the king assembled his counsaile, to knowe what should be done with this noble infant. Some to whome the continuall warres was odious and hatefull, affirmed that there could not happen a moze surer or better occasion of peace betwene both the realmes, which beyng so offered, they would in no wise should be reiecte but taken, considering that this Prince was sent thither in trust of safegarde, in hope of refuge, and in request of ayde and comfort agaynst his enemyes and euill willers: But other (whose opinion tooke place) affirmed him to be a prisoner, and so to be ordered, forasmuch as he was taken, the warre beyng open, and that his father did not onely maintein the Erie of Northumberland and other rebelles within his Countre, and gaue them great honoures, but also sent a great number of his Nobilitie agaynst the king at the battail of Shrewsbury: wherfore it was agreed that he should be deteyned as a prisoner lawfully taken, and duely apprehended.

When newes of this definitive sentence was shewed to his father, he tooke suche an inward conceipt, that it cost him his lyfe within a fewe Monethes after. And although the takyng of this Prince was at the first tyme displeasent vnto the realme of Scotland: yet surely, after, he and all his region had great cause to reioyce, and thanke God of that fortunat chauce. For where before that tyme, the people of Scotland were rude and without good maners, and hauyng little learnyng, and lesse good qualities, this Prince beyng, .xviij. yeres prisoner within this realme, was so trayned and taught by his Schoolemaisters, which were appoynted to him onely by the kinges clemencie, that he not onely flourished in good learnyng and knowledge, but also excelled in Martiall feates, Muscicall instrumentes, Poeticall Artes, and liberall sciences. Insomuch that at his returne from Captiuitie, he furnished his realme both with good learnyng, and Ciuile pollicie, which before was barbarous, rude, and without all good maner.

This yere a worthy Citizen of London named Rycharde Whittynghon Mercer and Alderman, was elected Maior of the sayde Citie, and bare that office three tymes: This worshipfull man so bestowed his goodes and substance to the honor of God, to the reliefe of the poze, and to the benefite of the comon weale, that he hath right well deserued to be registred in the boke of fame. First he erected one house or Church in London, to be a house of prayer, and he named the same after his awne name Whittynghons Colledge, and so it remayneth to this day. And in the same Church, besyde certeine Priestes and Clerkes, he placed a number of pooze aged men and women, and buylded for them houses and lodgynges, and allowed vnto them

Also he buylded more then the halfe of saint Bartholomewes Hospitall in west Smithfielde in London. Also he buylded of hard stone, the beautiful Librarie in the gray Friers in London, now called Christs Hospitall, standing in the North part of the Cloyster thereof, where in the wall his armes is grauen in stone. He also buylded for the ease of the Mayor of London and his brethren, & of the worshipfull Citizens, at the solempne dayes of their assemblee, a Chapell adioynng to the Supperhall, to the entent they should euer before they entered into any of theyr affayres, first to go into the Chapell, and by prayer to call vpon God for his assistance. And in the ende ioyning on the South part of the sayde Chapell, he buylded for the Citie a Librarie of stone, for the custodie of their recordes and other bookes. He also buylded a great part of the East ende of the Supperhall, besyde many other good workes that I knowe not. But among all other, I will shewe vnto you one very notable, which I receyued credibly, by a writing of his owne hande, which also he willed to be fixed as a Scedule to his last will and testament, the contentes whereof was, that he willed and commaunded his Executors as they would answer before God at the day of the Resurrection of all fleshe, that if they found any debtoz of his, that ought to him any money, that if he were not in their consciences well woorth three tymes asmuch, and also out of the debt of other men, and well able to pay, that then they shoulde neuer demaund it, for he cleerely forgane it, and that they should put no man in sute for any debt due to hym. Looke vpon thys ye Aldermen, for it is a glorious Glasse.

But nowe to returne to the story where we left. The Erle of Northumberland, which had bene in Fraunce and other Countries, to haue gotten ayde agaynst king Henry, and missed of his purpose, did nowe put his whole confidence in the Scottes, and in especially in his olde friend George Erle of Marche, and so assembled a great power of the Scottishe Nation to invade Northumberland, and recovered diuerse of his owne Castelles and Seignories, to whome people without number dayly resorted. And he intending to be reuenged of his olde griefes, accompanied with the Lord Bardolfe, and diuerse other Scottes, and Englishe men, entred into Yorkshire, and there began to destroy and spoyle the Countrie.

Whereof the king beyng aduertised, caused forthwith a great army to be assembled, and marched toward his enemyes, but before the king came to Nottingham, Raufe Rokelby Shirife of Yorkshire, in the middelt of February, with the power of the Countrie, sodainly set on the Erle and his companie, at a place called Bramham Moore, where after long fight, the Erle, and the Lord Bardolfe, and many other were taken and brought to York, and there executed, and their heddes sent to London.

After this, the king hauyng knowledge that diuerse Pirates were about the coast of England, prepared certeine Shippes well furnished with men, victuall, and munition, and in the beginnyng of Marche sent to the sea, Lord Edmond Holland Erle of Kent, as Chefetaine of that Crewe. And when the Erle had searched all the coast of Fraunce, and had not founde one Pirate pirate or Sea robber, he was aduertised by his espialles, that they heryng of his army were gone back into the partes of Briteyne. Wherefore the sayd Erle entending to be reuenged on them, made his course thither, and before his arrivall they had conueyed theyr Shippes into the Hauens, so that he could not fight with them on the sea, wherefore he launched out his Boates, & with his lustie & hardie Souldiours toke land, and fiercely assaulted the towne of Briake standing vpon the Sea syde. The Citizens threwe out Bartes, cast stones, shot quarelles, and manfully defended their Walles. In the which conflict, the Erle receyued such a wounde in his head, that he departed out of this worlde the fift day after. The assaillantes nothyng dismayde, but rather kindeled and set on fire with the death of their Capteyn, like men desperat, still continued and folowed the assault of the towne, and by fine force entred into the same, and set it on fyre, and slue all that made any resistance: And for lacke of a Capteyne, the men of warre laden with prayes and prisoners, returned againe into England.

This Edmond Erle of Kent was in such fauour with King Henry, that he not alonely aduanced and promoted him to highe offices and dignities: But also by his meane, and no small cost, obteyned for him Lucie the eldest daughter, and one of the heyres of the Lord Barnaby of Milleyn (brother to Lord Saleace, whose sonne also called Saleace, murdering his Uncle Barnaby made himselfe first Duke of Milleyn:) For which marriage the Lord Barnaby payde to the sayde Erle of Kent, an hundred thousand Ducates in the Church of saint Mary Quereyes in Southwarke, at the day of the solempnitie of the sayde marriage, by Done Alphons of Caniola.

This Lucye, after the death of her husbände, by whome she had none issue, was moued by the king to mary hys bastard brother the Erle of Dorset, a man very aged and euill visaged, whose person neyther satisfied her phantastic, nor whose face pleased her appetite, wherefore she preferring her owne minde more then the kinges desyre, delyghting in him which shoulde more satisfie her wanton desire, then gayne her any profitie, for herse loue tooke to husbände Henry Mortimer a goodly yong Esquire, and bewtiful Bachelier. For which cause the king was not onely with her displeased, but also for maryeng without his licence, he seassed and fined her at a great some of mony, which fine king Henry the fift, both released and pardoned, and also made him knight and promoted him to great offices, both in England and in Normandy, which Sir Henry had issue by this Ladye, Anne maryed to Sir John Aubemond, mother to Elizabeth Candos, mother to Phillis maryed to Sir Dauid Hall Captayne of Cane: She had also issue, Mary maryed to John Cheddur, and Lucy espoused to Syr John Cressy.

This yere happened a long and great frost, which continued .xv. weekes, and by reason thereof dyed great numbers of sheepe and birdes.

About this time John Duke of Burgoyne, a man of a quick wit, and of a haute courage, and desyrous of rule, beyng of great aucthoritie among the french nation, to whome ciuile discorde was more pleasant, then brotherly loue and friendship, beganne sore to murmour and grudge agaynst Lewis Duke of Orleans, because that he was chiefe of the kings counsaile, and ordred all things by his discretion for that the king his brother was (as you haue heard) fallen into a frensie, and therefore meddled in nothing. Straitnes betwene John Duke of Burgoyne and Lewis Duke of Orleans.

Duke of Orleans on the other side, being highly set by in pride, beganne to disdaine and frowne at the Duke of Burgoyne, because he perceived that he aspired and gaped to have the supreme regiment in the publique affaires and weighty causes, thus the one would have no superiour, and the other would have no peere. This cankerd disdaine in short space grew to such a hate, that all the Realme of Fraunce was devided into factions, the one parte favouring the Duke of Orleans, & the other enclining to the Duke of Burgoyne, which division had almost brought the realme of Fraunce to utter ruine and confusion.

The French king being somewhat amended of his disease, hearing of the controuersie betwene these two princes, sent for them both to Paris, where he openly and largely rebuked their pride and malice, in so much that the Nobilitie there present iudged the displeasure betwene them was clerely forgiven and forgotten. But high courages are not so sone abated, nor rooted malice will not so sone be plucked by. For the Duke of Burgoyne still compassing the destruction of the Duke of Orleans, appointed a secreete friend called Raufe Actouille to bring his purpose to passe. This Raufe forgetting not his enterpryse, assembled together a companye of such persons as he most trusted, and as as a Wolfe greedy of his praye, when the Duke of Orleans was coming from the court, in the night season, he fiercely set upon him, and shamefully slue him.

When this murder was published, all people cryed vnto God for vengeance. The Duke of Burgoyne iustified this acte, by the mouth of John Petit Doctor in diuinitie, who wrested Scriptures and Doctors so farre out of course, that his iustification within fewe yeres after was by the whole vniuersitie of Paris adiudged Heresie.

The French king least greater mischiefe might ensue, was inforced to cloake his inward affection, and to dissemble the matter, doubting least the Duke of Burgoyne, whose heart and haute courage he had good experience of before (if he should proceede agaynst him for his euill acte) woulde ioyne and take part with the English nation against the realme of Fraunce. Wherefore after long consultation had by the entreatie of the king, and other Princes of the blood Royall, Charles Duke of Orleans, sonne to Duke Lewes lately murdered, and John Duke of Burgoyne were reconciled, and brought to a feyned concord and a faynt agreement, eche of them taking a corporall othe vpon the holy Euangelists, neuer after to disagree or renewe any displeasure for any thing before passed, but all this preuayled nothing.

For nowe the Duke of Orleans perceiving the king his vncle to beare with the Duke of Burgoyne, and to let the detestable murder of his father so lightly passe ouer without payne or punishment, allyed and confederated himselfe with the Duke of Berry and Bourbon, and the Erles of Mounson and Arminack, who reysed a great puyssaunce of people, & defyed the Duke of Burgoyne & his complices, as their mortal foe, & deadly enemy.

The Duke of Burgoyne fearing the ende hereof (because there was a motion of a marriage to be had betwene the prince of Wales and his daughter) was somewhat the bolder to sende to the king of England for ayde and succours against his enemies. King Henry no lesse foresyng then that which after ensued, which was that the discord of these two great princes might turne his realme to great profite and honour, sent to the Duke of Burgoyne Thomas Erle of Arundell, Sir Gilbert Umfreuyle Lorde of Kyne, Sir Robert Umfreuyle, and Syr John Grey, with five hundred Archers, which toke shipping at Dover, and landed at Sluce. When the Englishmen were arryued in Flaundrys, the Duke of Burgoyne with the Englishmen and all his power roade daye and night untill he came nere to Paris, and there the next daye after with harde fighting, and courageous shooting, the Englishmen gate the bridge of Saint Clow, and so passed ouer the riuier of Sayne, and tooke and slue all the Souldyours, which the Duke of Orleans had there left in garrison to defend the bridge. Amongest whome Sir Hansard de Boyes a valiant Captayne was taken prisoner by the Englishmen, and highly ransomed. But the Duke of Orleans and his companye, which were lyke to haue bene compassed with their enemies, so that almost all their wayes of refuge were stopped and enclosed, in the night time made a bridge ouer the riuier on the parte of saint Denyce streete, and so escaped and fled into the high Countries. And after this conflict the Duke of Burgoyne being nowe in his ruffe, and thinking no man eyther in auctoritie or bloud equiualent to himselfe, and blynded with a Rall before his eyes, tooke vpon him the whole rule and gouernaunce of the realme, and ordered the king as pleased him, and not to the kings wyll, and thinking also that in so troublous a time he had vnknytt the knot of all ambiguities and doubtcs, and therefore dismissed the Englishmen geuyng to them both heartie thanks and great rewarde, which doing king Henry much disallowed, considering that he had sent awaye his defence before the great brunt of the warre were ouer passed and should haue taken heed before what pollicie his enemies practised.

This yere sayth Keynolp, the king kept, and heide a great Justes in Smithfelde in London, which continued eyght dayes, and vnto the same came certayne Henowayes Gentlemen, and came with the Gentlemen of Englande, but the honor of that pastyme was geuen to the Englishmen, although some of the straungers did very well.

A great Justes in Smithfield.

King Henrie being nowe at quiet, and not troubled with ciuile dissension, nor warres in his realme, called his high Courte of Parliament, in the which after he had concluded dyuers actes meete and expedient for the publique wealth of his realme and people, he exalted and promoted his three younger sonnes to high honors, as Lorde Thomas to the Duchye of Clarence, Lorde John to the Duchy of Bedford, and Lorde Homfrefrey to the Duchy of Gloucester, and Lorde Thomas his halfe brother Erle of Dorset, he made Duke of Excester: Howbeit some wyrters saye that he was erected to that estate and dignitie by king Henry the fift, in the first yere of his reigne, which thing is not greatly materiall, considering he had none issue.

and gouerned both king Charles the French king, and the whole realme, so much stomacked and enuyed the Duke of Orleans and his helpers, that he caused the French king in person to arme himselfe against them and their adherentes, as traytors to him, and apparant enemies to the common weale, and sente diuerse Capteynes to invade their landes and territories in the Countreyes of Poytiers, and Angulesme, and other Seigniozies apperteyning and belongyng to the homage and obeyfaunce of the Duchie of Aquitayn and Guyan: Wherefore the Dukes of Orleans, and Berry, & Bourbon, with their friends and alyes, seyng that now their hope consisted in the king of Englande, sent to him Albert Arbemond, a man of no lesse learnyng than audacitie, who in the name of the Confederates offered certeyne conditions, as ye shall heere.

1 First, the sayd Lordes offered that from thenceforth they should expose and set forth their abone persons, finaunces and landes, to serue the king of England, his heyres and successours, whensoever they were requyred or called, in all iust quarelles: which iust quarelles, the king of England shal take to apperteyne to the Duchie of Guyan with the appurtenaunces, affyrmyng howe the sayd Duchie perteyneth, and ought to apperteyne, to him of right by lyneall heritage, and lawfull succession, manifestyng from thenceforth, that they should not blemish nor spot their truth nor fidelitie to assist and ayde him, in the recoueryng the same Duchie.

2 Also the sayd Lordes offered their somes, daughters, nephewes, and neeces, parentes and all their subiectes, to contract marriage accordyng to the discretion of the king of England.

3 And they offered townes, Castelles, treasures, and generally all their goodes to ayde the king, his heyres and successours for the defence of their rightes and quarelles, so that the bond of their allegiance might be saued, the which in an other secret appoyntment, they befoze had declared.

4 Also they offered to the king of England generally, all their friends, alyes, and well willers, to serue him in his quarell for the recouery of his whole Duchie of Guyan.

5 Also to ceasse all fraude, the sayde Lordes recognised that they were redie to affirme the sayd Duchie of Guyan to belong to the king of England, in like and semblable wise, in libertie, and fraunchises, as euer any of the sayde kings predecessours helde or possessed the same.

6 Also the sayde Lordes knowledged, that all the townes, Castelles, and fortresses, that they had within the Duchie of Guyan, to holde them of the king of England, as of the very true Duke of Guyan, promisyng all seruite and homages after the best maner, that in such case might be.

7 Also they promised to deliuer vnto the king as muche as lay in them, all townes and Castelles apperteynyng to the royaltie and Seigniozie of England, which are in number, xx. townes and Castelles, and as to the regarde of other townes and fortresses which were not in their puyssaunce and seigniozie, they would helpe the king of England, his heyres and deputies to win them, with men in sufficient number at their proper expences and charges.

8 Also the king of England was agreed, that the Duke of Berry his true Uncle and Vassall, and the Duke of Orleans his subiect and Vassall, and the Erle of Arminacke should holde of him by homage and fealtie, the landes and and Seigniozies hereafter folowynge: that is to say, the Duke of Berry to holde onely the Countie of Pontieu, durynge his lyfe, and the Duke of Orleans to holde the Countie of Angulesme, durynge his life, and the Countie of Perigot for euer, and the Erle of Arminacke to holde foure Castelles vpon certeyne sureties and conditions, as by Indenture should be appoynted.

9 For the which offers, couenauntes, and agreementes, they affirmed that the king of England as Duke of Guyan, ought to defende and succour them agaynst all men, as their very Lorde and soueraigne, and not to conclude any treatie of league with the Duke of Burgoyne, his brethren, children, friends or allyes.

10 Furthermore, the king of England ought to ayde the Lordes, as his true Vassals in all their iust quarelles for recoueryng of dammages, for injuries to them wrongfully done.

11 Also they required the king of England to send vnto them, viij. thousand men to ayde them agaynst the Duke of Burgoyne, which dayly prouoked the French king to make open warre on them, their landes and seigniozies, promisyng further to disburse and pay all the costes and charges which the sayde armie of Englishe men should expend durynge their warre, which letter was wyitten the. viij. day of May, in the yere of our Lorde afore meucioned.

The King Henrie louingly receyued, and gently entertayned this Messenger Albert, and when he had well debated and considered the case, he first detestynge the abhominable murder of the late Duke of Orleans, and seing no iustice ministered, nor no punishment done for so shamefull an act, hauyng also an approued experience of the Duke of Burgoyne would kepe no lenger promise then he himselfe lusted. And secondarily, consideryng what large promises and offers these Princes had made vnto him, both greatly to his honour, and to the high profite and commoditie of his realme and subiectes, thought that he was bound by the office of a king to ayde and succour them, which cryed for iustice and could haue none, and in especiall because they in that point beyng his subiectes and vassalles, ought to be defended in maintenance of his superiozitie and seigniozie: Wherefore he louingly promised them ayde and reliefe.

The returne of the Messenger with this message was to them as pleasant, as is the deliuerance of a Captiue from his soze imprisonment, or of a Marchant passing by the way, & beset with theues, when he is rescued by his friends or companions. And not without cause, for the French king, not of his abone courage animated, but maliciously incensed by the Duke of Burgoyne, persecuted the faction of the Orleanses from Citie to Citie, and from towne to towne, with such power and extremitie, that they were both of force and necessitie compelled to repayze to the Citie of Bourges in Berry, and there to appoynt themselves eyther to render or defend.

Ye must vnderstand that Princes haue sometyme Argus eyes, and Midas eares, for this feate was not so secretly wrought in Englande, but it was as apparantly spoyed in Fraunce: Wherefore the French kinges Counsaile sent the Erle of saint Paule, the olde cankerd enemy to the English men, into the partes of Picardie, with. xv. hundred horsemen, and a great number of footemen, and he ordeyned certeyne of his men to geue assault to the towne of Guyne, while he lay in stale to waite for the reliefe that might come from Calice.

The king graunteth to ayde the Duke of Orleans

The French men assault Guyne.

Calice. The furious frenche men brake a fetwe olde Pales aboute poore mens Gardeynes of Guisnes: But the men of warre in the Castell thotte so fiercelly, and cast out wilde fyre in such aboundaunce, that the assaylants were faine to retyre. And so the Erle of Saint Paule which neuer wonne gaine, but lost honour at the Englishe mens handes, returned, not onely with the losse of his people, but defrauded of his desyred pray, and went to the towne of Saint Quintines.

Thys yere, of an euill fauoured olde house or cotage was the Gylde hall in London buyded and finished at the charges of the Citizens, but chiefly at the charges of Richard Whytington Alderman.

But to retorne to the former historie, the French king in this meane while besieged the Citie of Bourges in Berry, wherein the Duke of Orleans and his company had fortifyed themselves. When the king of Englande was thereof aduertised, he sent forth his sonne Thomas Duke of Clarence, and Edward Duke of Yorke, with eyght hundred horsemen, and nine thousand footemen, which landed in the Bay of Hogges in Normandy by saint Maist, in the territorie of Constantyne. The Englishmen swarmed lyke Bees rounde about the countrie, robbing Marchaunts, spoyling husbandmen, and brennyng townes, and were ioyously receyued of the Erles of Flaunson and Richemond ayders of the Orienciall parte.

The Counsaile of fraunce not wpylling that the Englishmen shoulde ioyne with the Dukes of Orleans and Berry, or their complices, caused a common fame (although it were not true) to be spreade abroade, that there was a final peace concluded betwene the French king and his Lords, which late were to him aduersaries. When this fable was noted to the Englishmen, which were by hastie iourneyes passed the ryuer of Leyre, they spoyled the towne and Monasterie of Beaulieu, and wasted with fyre & sword the Countries of Courayn and Mayne. Agaynst whom the Duke of Burgoyne sent the Lorde Rambures, with a great armie, which in thorte tyme was vanquished. The Dolphyn of fraunce fearyng the doings of the Englishmen, concluded a feyned peace betwene the Duke of Orleans and Burgoyne, and their adherents, so that the Duke of Orleans should without delaye dispatche out of the dominions of fraunce all the Englishe armie. The Duke was not riche to pay, and the Englishmen were greedy to haue, insomuch as they marching toward Guyan in good order, what by sacking of townes, and what with ransoming of riche persons gate great treasure and many good prayes. Besides this, to the ayde of the Duke of Orleans king Henry sent to Calice the Erles of Kent and Warwike with two thousand fighting men, which spoyled and defaced the Countie of Bullenoy, and bent the towne of Samer de boys, and tooke with assault the Fortresse of Ruffalt with dyuers other.

The Duke of Orleans, which was daylie called vpon to dispatche the Englishmen out of fraunce, came to the Duke of Clarence and his armie, rendering to them a thousande Gramercyes, and disbursed to them as much money as eyther he or his friendes might casely spare, and for nine thousand Frankes, which remayned bnpayde, he delyuered in gage his second brother John Erle of Angulesme, which was Graundfather to Frauces, after ward frenche king, and Sir Marcell of Bourgh, Sir John of Samours, Sir Archibald

A French practice.

Archibald of Williers and dyuers other, which Erle long contynued in Englande as aiter ye shall here.

When this agreement was taken, the Dukes of Clarence and Yorke with great praye (riche prisoners and welthy hostages) came to Burdeant, making warre on the frontiers of fraunce to their great gaine and profit. So by the onely commyng in of the Englishmen into fraunce, the Duke of Orleans was restored, not onely vnto peace and quietnesse with all persons, sayng the Duke of Burgoyne: But also fell into suche fauour with the king and the realme, that he was of all men welbeloued, much honored and highly esteemed, and so continued, butill wauering fortune turned her variable wheele. For after this, he being enemy to the Englishe nation, was vanquished and taken prisoner, and so remayned in Englande aboute xxij. yeres, butill the flowre of his age was passed or soze blemished.

And thys yere the king abaced the coyne of Golde and Syluer, and caused the same to be curraunt in his realme at such value as befoze they had gone, where in dedde the Noble was worse by foure pence, then the other was, and lyke wise was the coyne of Siluer curraunt after the same rate.

And here I finde noted by certaine wyrters, that thys yere the Chamys did flowe three tymes in one daye, as though the same were matter worthe of a note, for the straungenesse thereof: But if you consider the causes thereof, then is it worthy of no note at all, for the causes thereof are naturall, as great windes and tempestes that rise on the sea costes, which by violence driue the sea into the freshe ryuers, moze aboundantly then the common course would, or else by lyke violence keepeth out the sea from the freshe ryuers, that it can not flowe at one houre so high and abundantly as the common course thereof is accustomed to doe, and it happeneth also many tymes by reason of abundaunce of rayne, which falleth of the lande, and filleth the ryuers, and so encreaseth the freshe waters, that the same meeting with the sea water entering into the ryuer, causeth the same to swell, and rise farre above the common course, and altereth the houres both of flowyng and ebbing. In lyke maner the tydes alter by reason of great and long frostes and Snowe that freezeth the ryuers and dyches in the land, which causeth short and mo tydes in fewer houres then hath bene accustomed, by reason the water is turned to Ice. And in lyke maner vpon a sodaine thawe, the floodes agayne encrease farre above the accustomed course, & of these naturall causes cometh the alteration of the houres of ebbing and flowyng.

Now after that these great and fortunate chaunces had happened to King Henry, he thinking that there could not a greater prayse be geuen to a king, then for the execution of his office, and the administration of iustice, and intending to lye in quietnesse, being nowe delyuered of all civile diuision, with the which almost all christendome was troubled, not onely to the decaye of Christs religion, and christian creatures, but to the greater aduancement of Paynyn princes, by the publishing and setting forth of that counterfeate and false prophet Mahomet. And that the king would shew himselfe myndefull hereof, he called a great counsaile of the three estates of his Realme, in the which he deliberately consulted and concluded, as well for the politiqne gouernance of his realme, as also for the warre to be made agaynst the Infidels, and specially for the recovery of the Citie of Jerusalem.

lem, in the which warres he intended to ende his transitory life, and for that cause he prepared a great armie, and gathered much treasure, intending to set forward in the same spring time. But see the chaunce, whatsoeuer man intendeth, God sodainely reuerteth, what princes will, God will not, what we thinke stable, God maketh mutable, whereby Salomons sayeng is found true: That the vvifedome of men is but foolishnesse before God. When this prince was thus furnished with treasure sufficient, with valiant Captaines and hardie Souldiours, with tall shippes furnished with victualles, munitions and all things necessary for such a iourney royall, he was taken with a sore and sodaine disease called an Apoplexie, of the which he languished vntill his appoynted houre. During which sickness, as some aucthors wyte, he caused the crowne to be set on the pillowe at his beddes head, and sodainly his panguie so sore troubled hym, that he lay as though his bzeith and soule were departed from him, wherefore hys Chamberleynges covered his face with a linnen cloth.

The Prince his sonne being thereof aduertised, entered into the chamber, and tooke away the crowne and departed: The father being sodainely reuyued out of his traunce, quickly perceaued the lacke of his crowne, and hauing knowledg that the prince his sonne had possessed it, caused him to repayre to his presence, requyng of him to shew for what cause he had so misused himselfe. The prince with a good audacitie answered: sye, to mine and all mens iudgements you seemed dead in this worlde, wherefore I as your next and apparaunt heyre tooke that as mine awne, and not as yours: well sayre sonne sayde the king (with a great sigh) what right I had to it, & how I enioyed it God knoweth. well quod the prince, if you die king, I wil haue the Garlande, and trust to keepe it with the sworde against all mine enimies as you haue done, well sayde the king, I commit all to God, and remember you to doe well, and with that turned himselfe in his bed, and shortly after departed vnto God in a Chamber of the Abbotes of Westminster called Jerusalem, the twentieth daye of Marche. 1413. and in the yere of his age. xliij. when he had reigned. xiiij. yeres. v. moneths and odde dayes, in much trouble and little pleasure, whose body with all funerall pompe was conueyed to Cauntorbury and there solemnly buried, leauing behinde him by the Lady Mary daughter to Lorde Homfrey Erle of Hereford and Northampton, Henry prince of Wales, Thomas Duke of Clarence, John Duke of Bedford, Homfrey Duke of Gloucester, Blanche Duchesse of Barre, and Phylip Queene of Denmarke, for by hys last wyfe, Queene Jane, he had no children.

The king was of a meane stature, well proportioned and formally compact, quick and delyuer, and of a stoute courage. After that he had appeased all ciuill dissentions, he shewed himselfe so gently to all men that he gat him more loue of the nobles in his later dayes, then he had euill will of them in the beginning.

When tydings of hys death was brought vnto the Duke of Clarence, being then in Aquitayne, he then with all diligence toke ship with the Erle of Angulesne, and other his hostages and returned into England, to the great comfort of hys bzeithzen.

Henry

Henry Prince of Wales, sonne and heyre vnto king Henrie the fourth, borne at Monmouth on the Riuer of Wye; after the death and buriall of his Noble father king Henry aforesayde, tooke vpon him the highe power and regiment of this realme of England the. xi. day of Marche. 1412. and was proclaymed king, by the name of king Henry the fift, and crowned at Westminster the. iij. day of Aprill next ensuyng. And before the possession of the Crowne, diuerse honorable and noble personages did to him homage, & fealtie (which before that time had not bene used) as vnto him of whom they had conceyued great hope and worthynesse of Government.

This king, this man was he (which accordyng to the olde prouerbe) declared and shewed that honoures ought to chaunge maners, for incontinent after that he was placed in the sege royall, and had receyued the crowne and Scepter of this Noble Realme, he determined with himselfe to put on the shape of a newe man, and to vse a nother sort of liuyng, turning insolencie and wildenesse into grauitie and sobernesse. And because he would so continue, and not be allured to the contrary by his olde familiars, who in the lyfe of his father, by their wantonnesse and entisyng caused him at one tyme to strike the Lorde chiefe Justice in the face, for the which he was imprisoned, and also had the displeasure of his father, who remoued him from being president of his counsaile, & placed therein his brother Thomas, Duke of Clarence, to his great grieffe: he therefore, I say, detestynge a wanton and disorderly life, first banished from him all his olde wanton familiars & flatterers, (not vntrewarded, nor yet vnpreferred) forbidding them vpon a great paine, not once to approach nor come neere his speche or presence, by the space of ten myles. And in their places he elected and chose men of grauitie, of wisdom, and of high pollicie, by whose wisdom, and prudent counsaile he might at all tymes rule to his honour, and gouerne to the profite both of himselfe and of his common weale. This prince among all other, did very well remember and consider, that a king ought to be a ruler with wisdom and grauity, and to be both diligent and constant: wherefore calling his counsaylors together, first of all (as Hall sayth) he commaunded the Clergie sincerely and truly to preach the worde of God, and to liue after the same. The laye men he willed to serue God, and obey their Prince, forbidding them about all thinges the brech of Matrimonie, the vse of swearyng and wilfull perurie. Besyde this he elected the best learned men in the lawes of the Realme, to the offices of iustice, and men of good liuyng he preferred to high degrees and auctoritie. And calling to remembraunce the madnesse of the Welchmen, and the falsehood and inconstancie of the Scottes (whose often incursions and robberyes he well had in his fathers dayes experimented and assayed) he studied to assuage and represse, to the entent that he beyng quiet in his awne regions, might eyther make outward warre without doubt or daunger, or else for the common weale of his realme studie howe to encrease the glozie of his seignorie, and so to kepe and conserue it.

When all thinges were thus settled and framed to his purpose, he caused the bodie of kung Richard the seconde to be remoued, with all funerall pompes conuenient for his estate, from Langley to Westminster, where he was honourably enterred with Queene Anne his first wife, in a solempne Tombe, erected and set vp at the costes and charges of this Noble Prince King Henrie.

And although this noble prince had set and established all thinges beyng in difference and variaunce within his awne peculiar realmes and dominions: Yet the same tyme, beyng called to the counsaile of Constance, which is a Citie situate vpon the goodly ryuer of Rhyne, he sent thither Richard Erle of Warwike, and thre Bischoppes, with other famous Prelates and Doctors besydes knyghtes and Esquiers to the number of. liij. hundred horse. At this Synode were assembled (as Hall saith) thre hundred. xliij. Bischops, Abbottes, and Doctors. And of noble men five hundred. liiij. And of knyghtes and Esquiers. xvi. thousand, besydes seruantes, which (not accomptyng the townes men) were accompted. lxx. thousand persons.

These persons were highly receyued of the Emperour Sigismond, and of the Bishop of Rome called John the. xxiiij. which in the same counsaile as the sayde aucthor affirmeth, for great and abheminable crimes, and detestable offences by him committed (of the which he could not purge himselfe, nor make any defence) was by the same Synode deposed, and of his estate depriued. Gregorie the. xij. beyng one of the Schismatical number, fearyng shame more than regardyng his worldly affection, deposed himselfe both from his name and Papall dignitie. But Benedict the. xiiij. still and stiffly affirmyng himselfe to be the Vicar of God, so much desyred honour, and somuche was wrapped in his awne lewde opinion, that neyther friend nor good counsaile could do any good with him, wherefore at the last, he was also deposed, and lost both his name and honestie. And within thre yere after, Otho Columbe a noble Romaine borne, was elected Bishop of Rome, and named Martyn the fifth. And in this counsaile, John Wickliffe English man, and John Husse, and Jerom of Prage Bohemians, were condemned of heresie, of whome ye may read more in the booke of Monuments of the Church.

And in this first yere, Sir John Oldcastell, which by his wife was called Lorde Cobham, a valiaunt Captaine and an hardie Gentleman, was accused vnto the Archebishop of Cauntobury of certeine poyntes of heresie: But for that I haue not purposed in this Historie to write of any matter that specially concerneth religion, I will therefore referre you to the booke of Monumentes of the Church, where the whole Historie of this Gentleman and many others is at large described and setfoorth. And in lyke maner foloweth in the sayde booke, the whole historie of Sir Robert Actone, Browne, Beuerley, and dyuerse other.

The king, for the honour of himselfe, and the aduancement of hys people, called this yere and the last day of Aprill, in the towne of Leycester his high Court of Parliament, in the which many good and profitable lawes were were concluded, and many petitions moued, were for that tyme deferred. Among which petitions one was, that a bill exhibited in the. xi. yere of King Henry (as is mencioned befoze) which by reason that the king was then troubled with Ciuill dissention, came to none effect, might nowe be considered and regarded: the effect of which petition was, that the temporall lands deuoutly geuen, & disordnately spent by the religious, and other of the clergie, might suffice to mainteyne to the honour of the king, and defence of the realme, xv. Erles, xv. C. knyghtes. vij. thousande, two hundred Esquiers, and one hundred almose houses, for the reliefe of the impotent and nedy persons, and the king to haue cleerely into his Coffers, xx. thousand poundes, with many other prouisions and values of sundrie religious houses.

This befoze remembred bill (sayth Hall) much feared the religious, insomuch that fat Abbottes swet, the proude Bishops frowned, the poore friers cursed, the sickly Monnes wept, and all together were nothyng pleased nor yet content. But to finde a remedie for a mischiefe, and a tent to stop a wounde, the Clergie practised to put into the kinges heade, the title that he had to the Crowne and Kingdome of Fraunce, and howe honourable it should be for him to trauaile for the recouerie thereof, and howe willyng all the good people of the realme would be to ayde him in that honourable enterprize. And the next day after in most solempne and learned maner, the Archebishop of Cauntobury, whose name then was Henry Chichley, made such an excellent Oracion to moue, encourage, and perswade the king to take that boyage in hand, that nothing could be eyther moze or better spoken. And when the Bishop had done, then the Nobilitie in like maner sayd to and fro their mindes, so that nowe there was vsed none other talke in euery mannes mouth in the Parliament house, but for the conqueryng of Fraunce, and the bill against the Clergie was lulled a sleepe, and nothing came thereof. And so soone as this boyage was agreed vpon, the parliament brake vp.

The aforesayde parliament being nowe ended, the king sendeth a solempne Ambassade vnto the French king, to make his clayme vnto the crowne and kingdome of Fraunce, as his right and inheritaunce, or else to bid hym battayle, and to declare vnto him, that if he would not deliuer the same vnto him, that then he would trie his right by dent of sworde: The Ambassadors were these, the Duke of Excester and Erle of Dorset the kings Uncle. The Lorde Grey Admirall of England, the Archebishop of Beuelyn, the Bishop of Norwiche, and they had attending vpon them aboute five hundred horse.

The French king receaued them very honorably, and sumptuously banqueted them, shewing to them goodly iustes, and martiall pastimes, by the space of thre dayes together, in the which Iustes the king himselfe to shew hys courage and actiuitie to the English men, brake speares, and lustely turneyed.

After this great triumph, the English Ambassadors had accesse vnto the French king and declared their commission, which was to require of him to deliuer vnto the king of England the realme and crowne of Fraunce with the entier Duches of Aquitaine, Normandy and Anidwe, with the Countries of Poyteu and Mayne, and dyuerse other requestes, and offering also that if the French king would without warre or effusion of Christian

bloud, tender to the king their master his verie right and lawfull inheritance, that then he would be content to take in marriage the Lady Katherine daughter unto the French king, and to endue her with all the Duchye and countreys before rehearsed. And if he intended not so to doe, then the king of Englande did expresse and signifie unto him, that with the ayde of God, and helpe of his people he would recouer his right and inheritance wrongfully withholden with mortall warre and dent of sword.

The French king and his counsaile much amased at these demaundes, thinking them very unreasonable, and yet not wylling to make any hasty answer in so great and weightie a matter, prayed the English Ambassadors to say to the king their Master, & they hauing nowe no oportunitie to conclude in so highe a matter, would shortly sende Ambassadors into England, which should certifie and declare to the king their whole minde, purpose and answer.

The English Ambassadors receyuing this for answer, tooke their leaue of the French king, and returned into Englande, declaring unto the king in order all that had bene done.

And at this time, as some writers reporte, the Dolphyn, who heering this message sent to the French king his father, and discerning the youth of King Henry, and thinking it was an enterpryse farre vnmete for him to take in hande, did therefore in mockage sende to him a Coupe of Tennys balles to play with all, meaning that he had better skill in a Tennys court, and handling of a Ball, then in the martiall affayres of warre. But the king after he had receyued from the Dolphyn his former present, answered: that before he had ended with him and his father, he purposed by Gods ayde to tolle as many Balles of Pyon with him, which & best racket he had should not be hable to resist nor returne. And forthwith, for that many French men were promoted within this realme to Ecclesiasticall dignities, and by reason thereof comeighed dyuers sommes of money ouer into Fraunce, for the reliefe of their friends and Countreie men, the king therefore for the common weale of his realme and subiectes, ordeyned that no straunger hereafter should be promoted to any spirituall degree or dignitie within this realme, without his speciall lycence and royall consent, and that all they that should so be admitted, should finde sufficient suretie not to disclose the secretes of this realme to any foreyn or straunge person, nor also to minister unto them any ayde or succour with money, or by any other meane.

And nowe with all speede he assembled a great puyssaunce and armie thorough all his dominions: And for the better furniture of his Maie, he sent into Holand, Zelande, and Friselande to procure and hire Shippes for the conducting and transportyng ouer of his men and municions of warre: And finally, prouyded for armour, victuall, money, Artillery, cariages, Centes, and other things necessarie for so high an enterpryse, the which prouisions were soone blown ouer and knowne in Fraunce. Wherefore the Dolphyn, who had taken on him the gouernance of the realme, because his father was fallen again into his olde infirmitie, sent for the Dukes of Berry and Alanson, and all the counsaile of Fraunce, to determine what should be done in so weightie a cause. And after long consultation it was agreed to assemble people thorough the whole realme of Fraunce to resist and repulse the the king of England and his power whensoever he would arryue or set foote in Fraunce.

But to the intent to haue steyed the king of Englande at home, they sent unto him a solempne Ambassade, to make unto him some offers accordyng to the demaunds afore rehearsed. The charge of this Ambassade was committed unto the Erle of Wandosme; to Master William Bouratier Archbyschop of Bourgues, and to the Byschop of Lysieux, to the Lorde of Pury and Braquemont, and to Master Gualtier Cole the kings Secretary and dyuers other. These Ambassadors accompanied with CCL. horse passed the sea at Calice, and landed at Douer, before whose arryual the king was departed from Wyndsoze to Winchester, intending to haue gone to Southampton, and there to haue bewed his Maie, but heering of the Ambassadors coming, taried still at Winchester, where the sayde French Lordes shewed themselves very honorably before the king and the Nobilitie. And the king sitting vnder his cloth of estate in the Bishops hall, the sayde Ambassadors had accesse unto him, where the Archebyschop of Bourges made unto him an eloquent Oration dissuading warre and prayeing peace, offering to the king of Englande a great somme of money, with dyuers base and pore Countreies with the Lady Katherine in marriage, so that he would dissolue his army, & dismisse his Souldiours which he had gathered and made ready.

The oration being ended, the king caused the Ambassadors to be highly feasted, and set them at his aborne table. And at a daye appoynted in the aforesayde hall, the Archebyschop of Cauntorbury made to their oration a notable and learned answer: the effect wherof was, that if the French king would not geue with his daughter in marriage, the Duchies of Aquitayn, Normandy, Aniove and all other seignories and dominions, sometime apperteynyng to the Noble progenitors of the king of England, he would in no wise retire his armie nor breake his iourney, but would with all diligence enter into the realme of Fraunce, with sword and fyre, and not leaue vntill he had recouered his auncient right and lawfull patrimony. The king allowed the Archebyschops sayng, and in the worde of a prince promised to performe it to the bittermost.

The Byschop of Bourges beyng in a chafe that his purpose tooke no better effect, prayed lycence and pardon of the king that he might speake, which being graunted unto him, he very rudely and vnrerently sayde unto the king as followeth. Thinkest thou to put downe and destroy wrongfully the most christian king our most redoubted soueraine Lorde, and the most excellent prince of all Christianitie, of bloud and preheminence? O king, sayng thine honor, thinkest thou that he hath offered or caused to be offered to thee lands, goodes, or other possessions with his awne daughter for feare of thee or thy English Nation, or of thy friendes or well willers? No, no, but of truth, he moued with pittie, as a louer of peace, to the intent that innocent bloud should not be disperfed abroade, hath made to thee these reasonable offers, putting his whole affiaunce in God most puyssaunt, according to right and reason, trustyng in hys quarell to be ayded and supported by his faythfull and good subiectes and his well wyllers. And syth we be subiectes and seruaunts, we require thee to cause vs safely and surely without damage to passe out of thy realme and dominions, and that thou wylte write

The king of England nothing bered nor vnquieted with the sayengs and proude bragges of the vnurtered Archebischop, but well remembering the prouerbe of Salomon, that warres are to be taken in hande with discre- tion, and where many can geue counsaile there is victorie, therefore coldely and soberly he aunswered the Bpshop, sayeng: My Lorde, I little esteeme your french bragges, and lesse set by your pover and strength; I knowe perfytely my right to your region, and except you will denie the apparaunt truth, so doe you, and if you neyther doe nor will knowe, yet God and the worlde knoweth it. The power of your Master, you see daylie, but of my power ye haue not yet tasted, if your Master haue louing friends and fayth- full subiectes, God I thanke him I am not vnprouyded of the same: But this I saye vnto you, that befoze one yere passe, I trust to make the highest crowne in your Country to stoope, and the proudest Myster to knele downe: And saye this to the vsurper your Master, that within thre Moneths I will enter into Fraunce, not as into his lande, but as into mine aboue true and lawfull patrimonie, entending to conquer it, not with bragging words, nor flattering Orations, but by power and dent of sword by the ayde of God in whome is my whole confidencz, and I assure you I will not speake that worde, the which I would not both write and subscribe, neyther would I subscribe to that which I would not wyllingly set to my seale, therefore your safe conduyt shall be to you delyuered with mine answere, and then you may departe surely and safely into your Countrie, where I trust sooner to bilitte you then that you shall haue cause to bid me welcome. With this aunswere the Ambassadors not a little greued did shortly after departe, but not unre- warded, and that very bountifully and liberally.

Nowe after the frenche Ambassadors were departed, the king, as I sayde befoze, hauyng a great foresight and disposing all thinges in order, did not forget the olde condicions of the variable and inconstant Scottishe Na- tion, and therefore appoynted the Erle of Westmerland, the Lorde Scrope, the Baron of Greytroke, and Sir Robert Umfreuile, with dyuerse other valiant Capteynes, to kepe the Marches ioynyng to Scotland. The which sir Robert Umfreuile, on the day of Saint Mary Magdalene, entered vpon the Scottes at the towne of Geder yng, hauyng in his companie onely foure hundred Englishmen, where after a long conflict and skirmishe, he slue of his enemies. lx. and odde, and tooke prisoners. CCC. and discomfited and put to flight a thousand and mo, whome he folowed in chase. xij. myles, and so laden with prayes and prisoners, returned to the Castell of Rokesborough vnhurt, of the which Castell he was then Capteyne.

When the king had prepared all thinges mete for his iourney, he then for the safegarde of the realme, leauyng behinde him the Queene his mother as Governour of the realme, departed to the towne of Southampton, and there purposed to take his shippyng. And because he would not steale on the french king, but that he should haue knowlege of his commyng, he there- fore dispatched with speede Antelop his pursuyuant at armes, with letters of defiance: The which letters, when the french king and his counsaile had read, and well considered, he made aunswere to the officer of armes, that he woulde prouide for his defence, and so lycensed the Messenger to departe at his pleasure.

Shortly after, the king beyng in a readinesse to aduance forwarde, so- deynly, he was credibly informed, that Richard Erle of Cambridge, brother to Edward Duke of York, and Henry Lorde Scrope, and Sir Thomas Gray had conspired his death and bitter destruction, wherfoze he caused them forthwith to be apprehended: And after these prisoners were examined, they notorely confessed the conspiracie, but also declared that for a great somme of money which they had receyued of the french king, they entended eyther to delyuer the king aliue into the handes of his enemyes, or else to murder him befoze that he should arrive in Normandie. When king Henry had all the truth opened vnto him, of the which he was not onely very desyrous, but also was most hartely soze, and inwardly griened that he should lose such va- liant Capteynes, by whose ayde he might haue bene made the more dread- full to his enemyes: but nowe the matter beyng thus fallen out, the king as- sembled together all his nobilitie, and befoze them caused to be brought forth the aforesayd thre great offenders, and vnto them sayde as foloweth. I can not a little meruayle what should moue you to deuise or conspire my death, who hath loued you most derely, and to say truly vnto you, ye could not con- spyre my death which am your heade and governour, but ye must also pur- pose the destruction of all that be here, and of all the people in this realme. And although some priuate Scorpion possessed your heartes, and heades to this great wickednesse; yet ye should nowe haue forborne to haue practised the same, so long as I was with mine armie, whome ye knowe can not continue without a Captein. But forasmuch as ye haue purposed so great a mischief, and so abhominable a fact, and confessed the same, and also to the entent that your ayders beyng in the armie may abhorre so horrible an offence, ye shall receyue the punishment and paine that the lawe hath appoynted for your demerites.

And the next day folowyng, when these noble men were executed, the king sayde to his Lordez, se you not the mad imagination of men, which per- secute me that dayly studie & vse my great trauayle to do good to them and to all men, and hurt to none, which I knowe is my duetie, and therevnto was I borne. I pray God that there remaine none among you that is infected with so much vnto truth, as had liefer to see mee destroyed and brought to con- fusion, then to see his native Countrie flourish and increased with honour, and Empire. But I assure you, I haue conceyued a right good opinion of you, and therefore by Goddes sufferance we will set forward, and for my selfe I will forget all paine & perill, and be your Lode sman and gypde. Now when the king had thus sayde, all the noble men kneled downe, and promi- sed faythfully to serue, and duly to obey him, and rather to die then suffer him to fall into the handes of his enemyes.

This done, the king thought surely that all conspiracie and sedition had bene quenched: But he was deceyued, for he sawe not a fyze that was newly kindeled, which after ward dwe to so great a flame, that it burned and con- sumed the walles of his aboue house and family, which fyze at that tyme if he had espyed, he might peraduenture easilie haue quenched and put out: For certeine wyte that Richard Erle of Cambridge did not conspyre with the Lorde

Certaine Lordez ap- prehended for treason.

Lozde Scrope, and Sir Thomas Gray, to murder king Henry, to please the frenche king withall, but onely to the entent to exalt to the Crowne his brother in lawe Edmond Erle of Marche, as heyre to Duke Lyonell the thirde begotten sonne of king Edward the third. After whose death, considering that the Erle of Marche for dyuerse secreete impedimentes, was not able to haue generation, he was sure that the Crowne should come to hym, or to his children. And therefore it is to be thought, that he rather confessed himselfe for neede of money to bee corrupted by the frenche king, then hee would declare his inwarde minde, and open his very entent: For surely he sawe that if his purpose were espyed, the Erle of Marche should haue drunken of the same Cuppe that he did, and what should haue come to his abone children he much doubted, therfore beyng destitute of comfort, and in dispaire of lyfe, to saue his children he feyned that tale, despyng rather to saue his succession, then himselfe, which he did in deede. For Richard Duke of Yorke his sonne, not priuily, but openly claymed the Crowne, and Edward his son both claymed it, and gayned it, as hereafter ye shall here, which thing at this time if king Henry had foreseene, I doubt (sayth Hall) whether euer that lyne should haue claymed the garland, or gotten the game.

Nowe assoone as the winde came about, the king set forward with hys Nauie, beyng in number an. Cxl. shippes, and shortly after landed at Cauc in Normandie without resistance. And the next day after, the king marched toward the towne of Harflew, standyng upon the Riuer of Sepne, betwene two hilles, and besieged it on euery part. The Capteyne of the towne was the Lord Escouteuyle, accompanied with the Lozde Blaynuyple of Hacqueuile, the Lozdes of Harmanuyple, of Galard Boyes, of Clere de Barton, of Adsanchez, of Brian, of Gaucort, of Lisleadam, and many other.

The frenche king beyng aduertised of the Kinges arryuall, sent in all the hast the Lord Delabreth Constable of Fraunce, and the Lord Bonciquall Marshall of Fraunce, the Senescall of Henawde, the Lozde Ligny, and dyuerse other Capteynes, which fortifyed townes with men, victuall and artillery, upon all the Sea coast. And heeryng that the king of England had besieged Harflew at his first landyng, came to the Castell of Caldebeck beyng not farre from Harflew, to the entent to succour their friends whiche were besieged, if they might by any pollicie: And if not, then they imagined howe to sley and hurt the Englishe men, when they went into the Countrie of foragyng for beastes and victuall, and so to trap and destroy them. But they were deceyued, for notwithstanding the prouision and pollicie of the french men, the Englishe men fortrayed the Countrie and spoyled the Villages and returned againe to the Campe with many a riche pray. The Englishe men daily assaulted the towne, and the Duke of Gloucester to whome the order of the assault was committed, made thre mynes vnder the ground, and approached the Walles with ordinaunce and engines, and would not suffer them within to rest at any time. The king lyng on the hill side with his battail, did not onely keepe the frenche men from succoryng of the towne, but also toke away from the townes men all the hope and trust of their succour, ayde, and reliefe, and also all the Goonpowder that was sent by the frenche king vnto them that were besieged, was taken by the English men. The Captaines of the french men within the towne, perceyued that they were not able to endure the fierce assaultes of the Englishe men, and fearyng to be ouercome and taken by force, desired of the king of England only truce for thre dayes, promysing that if they were not rescued within y<sup>e</sup> tyme, that then they would yeelde themselves and the towne, theyr liues beyng saued. And for performance hereof, they deliuered vnto the king. xxx. of the best Marchauntes and Capteynes that were within the towne.

The king of England accepted this offer. And so soone as this composition was agreed vpon, forthwith the Lozde Hacqueuyle was sent vnto the french king to declare the necessitie of the towne, and the short tyme of the truce. To whome the Dolphyn answered, that the kinges power was not yet assembled in such a nuber, as was conuenient to raise so great a siege.

When this aunswere was reported to the Capteynes, they seyng no hope of comfort or reliefe, after the thirde day rendered to the king of England the towne, beyng the. xxxvij. day after it was besieged, and the. xxij. day of the moneth of September, to the great abashment of all Normandie, for it was the chiefest port of all that Countrie. The Souldiours were ransomed, and the towne was sacked, to the great gaine of the Englishe men. The king of Englande made Capteyne of that towne his Uncle Thomas Duke of Excester, which established his Lieutenant there John Fastolffe, with. xv. hundred men, and. xxx. good knightes, whereof the Baron of Carew, and Sir Hugh Lutterell were two counsaylors. And because dyuerse of his Nobles lyng before Harflew were sicke of the fluxe, and many were dead, amongst whome the Erle of Stafforde, the Bishop of Norwiche, the Lozdes, Holyns, and Burnell, were foure besyde other. The king licenced the Duke of Clarence, his brother, John Erle Marshall, and John Erle of Arondell beyng infected with that disease, to returne into England.

King Henry not a little reioysing of this victory at his beginning determined with all diligence to set forward, and to performe his entended purpose and warlye enterpryse, but by reason that the sharpnesse of Winter weather approached more sooner at that time, then before it had bene accustomed he was therewithall sore troubled and bered. Wherfore he calling together all his Cheueteynes, and conferrynge with them what was best to be done: After long consultation, in the ende it was agreed on all sides, that it was a thing both necessarie and conuenient to set forward with all diligence before the dead time of Wynter approached, toward the towne of Calyce. And because their going forward might be called of slaundersous tonges a running or flyng awaye, it was therefore agreed, that the whole armie should passe the next way by lande thorough the middest of their enemies: And yet that iourney was iudged perillous, by reason that the number was much diminished by the fluxe and other feuers which sore bered, and brought to death aboute fiftene hundred persons, which was the very cause that the returne was the sooner concluded and agreed vpon: But yet before his departing he entred into the towne of Harflew. And all the men of warre that had not payde their ransome, he sware them on the holy Euangelistes to yeeld themselves prisoners at Calice, by the feast of saint Martyn in Nouember next folowyng: Dyuers of the Burgesses he highly ransomed, and a great part of the women and children he put out of the towne, geuing to euery poore creature. v. them their substance. The goodes in the towne were innumerable, which were all praye to the Englishmen, which sent the best into England as a token of good luck. There were two strong Towers standing on the Hauensyde, which looking for ayde did not yeelde tenne dayes after the towne was rendered.

When the king had repayred the towne, and fortified and furnished the same with men, munition, and victuall, he remoued from Harflew to Douthoyse, intending to passe the ryuer of Some with his army, befoze the bridges were eyther withdrawn or broken.

The French king heering that the towne of Harflew was taken by the king of Englande, and that he was marchyng forward into the Bowelles of the realme, sent out his proclamations, and assembled his people in euery quarter, committing the whole charge of his armie to his sonne the Dolphyn and the Duke of Aquiteyn, which incontinent caused the Bridges to be broken, and all the passages to be defended: besyde that, they caused all corne and other victuall to be destroyed in all places, where they coniectured that the Englishmen would repaire or passe thorough, to the intent that they might eyther keepe them in a place certayne without any passage or departure, and so to destroye them at their pleasures, or else to keepe them in a straye without victualles or comfort, and so by fauine eyther cause them to dye or yeelde.

The king of Englande afflicted with all these incommodities at one tyme was neyther dismayed nor discouraged, but keeping foorth his iourney approached to the ryuer of Some, where he perceaued that all the Bridges were by his enimies broken and unframed: wherefoze he came to the passage called Blanchetaque, where king Edwards great graudfather passed the ryuer of Some befoze the battayle of Cressy: But the passage was so kept that he could not passe without great daunger, considering that his enimies were both befoze his face, and hard behinde his backe: But yet he passed forward, burnyng Villages and taking great booties, and euery day he sent his light horsemen abroad to spie and seke what perilles there were at hande, and what embushments were layde on the one syde or the other, and where he might most safely passe the riuer. The Espialles returned and declared for a truth that the countrie swarmed with men of warre, whereof he being aduertised, set foorth in good order, keeping still his way forward, and so ordered his armie and placed his carriage, that hauing his enimies on both sides of him, he passed so terribly that his enimies were astrayde once to offer him battayle: And yet the Lorde Delabreth Constable of Fraunce, the Marshall Boncequait, the Erle of Wandosme great Master of Fraunce and the Lorde Dampier Admirall of Fraunce, the Duke of Alanson, and the Erle of Richmond with all the puyssaunce of the Dolphyn lay at Abuyte, and durst not once touche his battayles, but euer kept the passages, and coasted aloofe lyke a Hawke that lyketh not her praye.

The king of Englande still kept on his iourney vntill he came to the Bridge of saint Marce, where he found aboute xxx. thousand Frenchmen, and there pitched his fielde, looking surely to be set on and foughten withall: wherefoze to encourage his Captaynes the moze, he dubbed certaine of his balyaunt and hardy gentlemen knightes, as:

But after the king sawe that the Frenchmen made no semblance to fight, he departed in good order of battayle by the towne of Amynce, to a towne nere to a Castell called Bowes, and there laye two dayes, looking euery houre for battayle. And from thence he came nere to Corby, where he was steyed that night by reason that the common people and Defaunts of the country assembled in great number, and the men of armes of the Garrison of Corby skirmished with his armie in the morning, which sayeng was to him both ioyous and profitable, for there he discomfited the crewe of horsemen, and drave the rusticall people euen to their gates, and found there the same day a shalow foorde betwene Corby and Peron, which neuer was espied befoze. At the which he, his armie and cariages the night ensuyng passed the ryuer of Some without let or daunger, and then determined with all diligence to passe the ryuer of Some, without let or daunger, and then determined with all diligence to passe forward to Calice, and not to seeke for battayle, except he were therevnto constreyned, for his armie by sicknesse was sore minished, for he had onely two thousand horsemen, and xiiij. thousand Archers, bill men and of all sortes: The Englishmen were afflicted in this iourney with an hundred incommodities, for their victuall was in manner all spent, and newe they coude get none, for the enimies had destroyed all befoze their coming: Rest they could take none, for their enimies were euer at hand: Daylie it rayned, and nightly it freezed, of fuell was scarcenesse, and of fluxes was plenty, money they had ynough, but comfort they had none.

The French king being at Roan, and heering that the king of Englande was passed the water of Some, was not a litte discontent (and as Hall sayth) assembled his counsaile to the number of xxxv. to consult what should be done, the chiefe wherof, were the Dolphyn his sonne, whose name was Lewes, calling himselfe king of Cicile, the Dukes of Berry and Briteyn, the Erle of Montieu the kings youngest sonne, and dyuers other, wherof xxx. agreed that the Englishmen should not departe but foughten withall, and some were of the contrary opinio, but the greater number ruled the matter. And so Mountioy king at Armes was sent to the king of Englande to desyre him as the enemye of Fraunce, and to tell him that he should shortly haue battayle. King Henry soberly aunswored: Sic my entent and desyre is none other, but to do as pleaseth almightie God, and as it becommeth me, for surely I will not seeke your mayster at this time: But if he or his seeke me, I will willingly fight with hym. And if any of your nation attempt once to stop me in my iourney toward Caleys, at their leopardie be it, and yet my desyre is that none of you be so vnadvised or harebreynd, as to be the occasion that I in mine owne defence should be the effusion of Christian bloud, and thus he rewarded the Herault, and lycenced him to depart.

When the Lordes of Fraunce heard the king of Englandes aunswere,

The Englishmen were sore afflicted.

The French king sendeth a defiance to the king of England.

it was incontinent proclaymed, that all men of warre should resort to the Constable of Fraunce, to fight with the king of Englande, and his pursuance: whereupon all men accustomed to beare armour, and desirous to wyne honour thorough the realme of Fraunce, drew toward the field. The Dolphyn sore desyred to be at that battayle, but he was prohibited by the king his father: Lykewise Philip Erle of Charolous sonne to the Duke of Burgoyne would gladly haue beene at that noble assembly, if the Duke his father would haue suffred him, but many of his men staid awaye, and went to the Frenchmen.

The king of England being informed by his Espialles that the daye of battayle was neerer then he looked for, dislodged from Bemyers, and went in good aray thorough the fayre playne, beside the towne of Blangy, where to the intent that his armie should not be included in a streight, or driven to a corner, he chose a place meete and conuenient for two armies to darraigne battayle betweene the townes of Blangy and Agincourte, where he pight hys fielde.

The Constable of Fraunce, the Admirall, the Lorde Rambures maister of the Crosbowes, and dyuers Lordes and knightes pitched their Banners neere to the Banner royall of the Constable, in the Countie of Saint Paule within the territorie of Agincourt, by the which waye the Englishe men must needes passe towarde Calays. The frenchmen made great tyres about their Banners, and they were in number. lx. thousand horsemen as their aboue histoziars and writers affirme, besyde footemen, pages and Waggoners, and all that night they made great cheere and were mery. The Englishe men also that night sounded their trumpets, and dyuers Instruments muscalle with great melodie, and yet they were both hungrie, werie, sore traauayled and muche bered with colde diseases: Howbeit they made peace with God and their consciences, euery man encouraging other rather manfully to dye, then eyther to yeelde or fle.

Nowe approached the fortunate and fayre day to the Englishe men, and a blacke and unluckie day to the French men, which was the. xxb. day of October. 1415. beyng then Friday. On the which day in the moorning, the French men made three battayles. In the Vaward were. liij. thousande healmes of knightes & Esquiers, and foure thousand Archers, and. xv. C. Crosbowes, which were guded by the Lorde Delabreth Constable of Fraunce, hauryng with him the Dukes of Orleance, and Burbon, the Erles of Cleve, & Richmond, the Marshal Bonciqualt, and the maister of the Crosbowes, the Lord Dampier Admirall of Fraunce, and other Capteynes, and the Erle of Vaudoune, and other the kinges officers, with. xvj. hundzeth men of Armes, and they were ordered for a wing to that battaile. And the other wing was guded by Sir Guyllard Dolphin, and sir Clugnet of Brabant, and sir Lewes of Burbon, with. viij. hundzeth men of Armes of chosen persons. And to breake the shot of the Englishe men, were appoynted sir Guylliam de Saueusens, with Hector and Philip his brethren, Ferrey of Maylley, and Alein of Gaspanes, with other. liij. C. men of Armes. In the middle ward were assigned as many persons and mo as were assigned in the Vaward, and therof was the charge committed to the Dukes of Barre, and Alenson, the Erles of Beuers, Vawdemount Blamont, Salings, Graunt pree, & of Ruffy. of Agincourt in the rereuarde were all the other men of Armes, guded by the Erles of Harle, Dampmarctyne, Fauconberge, and the Lorde Lutrey, Capteyne of Arde, who had with him men of the Frontiers of Bolonoye.

When these Battayles were thus ordered, it was a glorious sight to beholde them, and surely they were esteemed to be in number six tymes as many or more then was the whole companie of Englishe men with Wagones, Pages and all. And now both the Armies beyng in a redinesse, the Constable of Fraunce with an eloquent and earnest Oration, encouraged hys soldiours manfully that day to stande to it for the honour of Fraunce: The king of England did no lesse prudently and valiantly spyre by the heartes of his people. And these exhortations ended, the king of England had placed primely two hundzeth Archers in a lowe Medowe nere to the forwarde of his enemies, but yet separate with a great dicke, and they were commaunded to kepe themselues close untill they had a token geuen them to shote. Besyde this he appoynted a Vaward, of the which he made Capteyne Edward Duke of Yorke, which of a haute courage obteyned of the king by petition that office, and with him were the Lordes Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope, and this battaile was all Archers. The middle ward was guded by the king himselfe, with his brother the Duke of Gloucester, and the Erles Marshall, Orford, and Suffolke, in the which were all the strong bill men. The Duke of Exeter, Uncle vnto the king, had the rereuarde which was myred both with Archers and Bill men. The horsemen like winges went on euery side of the battaile. When the king had thus ordered his battaile, yet fearyng least the French men would compass and beset him about, lyke a wise and a politike prince, he caused stakes bound with yron sharpe at both the endes, of the length of. v. or. vi. foote, to be pitched before the Archers, to the entent that if the barde horses ranne rashly vpon them, they might shortly be gozed and destroyed, and appoynted certteine persones to remouie the stakes when the Archers moued, as tyme requyred: so that the footemen were hedged about with the stakes, & the horsemen stode lyke a Bulwarke betweene them and their enemies, without the stakes. This deuice of fortifying of an armie with stakes, was at this tyme first deuised and practised, but since that tyme they haue denyed, Caltrappes, Harrowes, and other newe trickes. All thinges beyng thus set in order, nowe approached the battaile. But here shall sheweth at large, howe that the French men the night before had made themselues assured of the victorie, and had diuided the prisoners and spoiles among them, and had cast lottes for them, but it is an olde proverbe that he that maketh his reconyng without his hoste, must be false to recon twice, and also it is a true sayng, that man purposeth; but God disposeth, for victorie is the gift of God, as may appere by the sequelle of this battaile, which happened to the Englishe men rather miraculously then otherwise. Therefore to God the king very well gaue the praise thereof, as in the ende of the same ye shall heere.

Nowe the armies approchyng somewhat nere, an olde knight called Sir Thomas Harpyngton, a man of great experience in warre, with a Warder in his hande. And when he cast by the Warder, all the armie shoted, at the which the Frenchmen much manuepled: But that was a signe to the Archers in the Medowe; which knowyng the token shot wholly altogether ther at the vaward of the french men. When they perceyued the Archers in the Meadowe, whome they sawe not before, and sawe they could not come to them for a ditch, they with all hast set on king Henries foreward: But ere they ioynd, the Archers in the forefront, and the Archers on the syde, which stode in the Meadowe, so wounded the totemen, so galled the horses, and so combred the men of Armes, that the footemen durst not go forward, the horsemen ranne in plompes without order, some ouerthrewe his fellowe, and horses ouerthrewe their maisters: So at the first iorneyng, as the frenche men were clerely discouraged, so the Englishe men were muche chered and comforted. When the french vaward was thus discomfited, the Englishe Archers cast away theyr Bowes, and toke into their handes, Axes, Halles, Swordes and Billes, and therewith slue the french men, vntill they came to the middle warde. Then the king appoched, and so encouraged his souldiours, that shortly the seconde battaile was ouerthrowne, and dispersid, but not without great slaughter of men, for the frenchmen strongly withstood the fiercenesse of the English men, when they came to handie strokes, so that the fight was very doubtfull and perillous. And when one part of the french horsemen thought to haue entered into the kinges battaile, they were wylly the stakes ouerthrowne and slaine, or taken.

Prince.

Thus the battaile continued thre long houres. The king y day shewed himself a valiant Prince, for notwithstanding that he was almost felled by the Duke of Alanson, yet with plain strength he slue two of the Dukes companie, and felled the Duke: But when the Duke would haue yelded vnto him, the kinges garde, contrary to the kinges minde, outragiously slue him. And in conclusion, minding to make an ende of that dayes iourney, caused his horsemen to fetch a compasse about, and to ioyne with him against the reuerde of fraunce, in the which battaile were the greatest number of people. When the french men perceyued his entent, they were sodeinly amased, and rane away lyke sheepe, without array or order. When the king perceyued the Banners cast downe, and the array cleerely broken, he encouraged hys Souldiours, and folowed so quickly, that the french men turnyng to flight, ran hether and together, not knowyng which way to take, castyng away their armour, and on their knees desyred to haue their liues saued.

In this meane tyme, while the battaile continued, and that the Englishe men had taken a great number of prisoners, certeine frenche men on horsebacke, whereof were Capteynes, Robinet of Worneuile, Riffarde of Clamas, and Flamert of Agincourt, and other men of armes, to the number of vij. hundred horsemen, which fled first from the field at their first comyng, and heeryng that the Englishe Centes and Pauillions were farre from the armie, and without any great number of keepers or persons mete and conuenient for defence, partly moued with couetousnesse of spoyle and pray, and partly entenyng by some notable act to reuenge the damage and displeasure done to them and theirs in the battaile the same day, entered into the kinges Campe, beyng boyde of men, and fortrefed with Verlettes and Lackeyes, and there spoyled Hales, robbed Centes, brake by Chestes, and caried away Caskettes, and slue suche seruauntes, as they there found: For the which act they were long imprisoned and sore punished, and lyke to haue lost their lynes if the Dolphyn had lenger luyed.

But when the king of Englande by a fearefull messenger was sodeinly aduertised of thys newe onset, and also heard the outcrie of the Lackeyes, he fearing least his enimies were gathered together agayne, and doubtyng that the great number of prisoners that were taken, would rather take parte with the enimies then with him, did therefore by proclamation commaund throughout the armie that euery man should kyll his prisoner, vpon paine of death. When this dolorous commaundement was pronounced, pittie it was to see, and more lothsome to beholde how some french men were sodeinly stiked with daggers, some brayned with Bolaxes, some beaten downe with Halles, some their throtes cut, and some their bellies cut, and their paunches hanged out, so that in effect, hauing respect to the great number of prisoners, fewe or none was saued.

When this lamentable manslaughter was fynished, the Englishe men forgetting their woundes, and not remembryng what paine they had susteyned all that daye in fighting with their enimies, as men that were fresh and lustie, raunged themselves agayne in array, both prest and ready to abide a newe fielde, and also to inuade a fresh their enimies, and there withall couragiously set vpon the Erle of Harle and Fauconbridge, and the Lords of Louray and of Thync, which with vij. C. men of armes had all daye kept together, and slue them out of hande.

After this last conflict, the king of Englande passed thorough the fielde, and sawe neyther resistance nor the appaunce of any french men, sauing the dead Corsses, wherefore he caused a retrayte to be blowen, and brought all his armie together, about foure of the clock at after noone, and first (as Hall sayth) callyng his prelates together, caused them to geue thanks to God, by whose almightie power he had receaued that victorie, and to sing the psalme of In exitu Israel, &c. Commaunding euery man to kneele downe, when they came at this verse, Non nobis domine, non nobis, sed nomini tuo da gloriam. Which is in Englishe, Not vnto vs O Lorde, not vnto vs, but vnto thy name be geuen the prayse and glozy, & then caused the psalme of Te deum to be song, so that it might evidently appere that this noble prince had a perfite fayth and trust in the ayde of God, which heard his prayer, and regarded his fayth, and therefore gaue him the victorie.

That night he was refreshed with suche as he founde in the frenche campe, and in the morning Mountiory king at Armes, and foure Heraultes came vnto him to knowe the number of prisoners, and to desyre buriall for them which were slayne. But before he answered the Heraults, he calling to remembraunce, that it was moze honourable to be praysed of his enimies then extolled of his sciendes, did therefore demaunde of them why they made to him that request, for that he was not certaine whether the prayse of that victorie ought to be attributed to him or to their Nation? O Lorde quod Mountiory, thinke you vs officers of Armes to be rude and bestiall? If we for the affection that we beare to our naturall Countrie, would eyther for fauour or meede hyde or denie your glorious victorie: The Foules of the ayre and wormes of the ground will beare witness agaynst vs, and so wyll the Captiues that are yet in your possession. Wherefore accordyng to the dutie of our office, which is or should be alwayes indifferently to write, and truly to iudge, and therefore we saye and affirme, that the victorie is yours, the honoz is yourres, and yourres is the glorie, aduising you as you haue manfully gotten it, so polletiquely to vse it. Well sayde the king, seing this is your determination, I wyllingly accept it, desyryng you to shewe me the name of the Castell neere adioyning, and they aunswered it was called Agincourt: Then sayde the king, this conflict shall be called the battaile of Agincourt, which victorie hath not bene obteyned by vs noz our power, but by the ayde and sufferance of almighty God, for the iniurie and vntruth that we haue receyued at the handes of your prince and his nation. And that daye he feasted the French officers of armes, and graunted to them their request, which busily sought thorough the fielde for such as were slayne: But the Englishmen suffered them not to go alone, for they searched with them, and found manye hurte, but not in iopardy of their lyfe, whome they tooke prisoners, and brought them into their tents.

When the king of Englande had well refreshed himselfe and hys souldyours, and had taken the spoyle of suche as were slaine, he with his prisoners in good order returned toward his towne of Calice.

When tydings of this notable victorie was perfittely knowne in Englande, there was no small ioye and reioysing with prayeing of God, and making of Bonefyres with all the triumph that might be made.

On the Sundaye, after the king was departed toward Calcey, diuers Frenchmen repayred to the playne where the battaile was, and remoued agayne the dead bodyes, some to finde out their Masters, and to bury them, and some to take the reliques which the Englishmen had left. For the Englishmen tooke nothing but Golde, Siluer, Jewelles, riche apparell and costly armour: But the ploughmen and Heysaunts spoyled the deade Carcasses, leauing them neyther shyrt noz clovete, and so they laye stark naked untill Wednesday. On the which day diuers of the noble men were conueyed into their countries, and the remnaunt were by Philip Erle of Charoloy (soze lamenting the chaunce, and moued with pittie) at his cosse and charge buried in a square plot of fiftene hundred yardes, in the which he caused to be made thre pittes, wherin was buried by accompt fine thousand and. viij. hundred persons beside them which were carryed away, and other that were wounded to the death, and were carryed to Hospitalles and there dyed.

In this battaile were taken and slayne the flowre of all the Nobilitie of Fraunce, for there were taken prisoners:

And certainly by the relation of Heraltes, and declaration of other noble persons worthy of credite, as Enguerrant wyrteth, there were slaine at this battaile on the French parte, aboue ten thousand persons, whereof were princes and nobles bearing banners. Cxxvi. and all the remnaunt sauuing. xvj. C. were knightes, Esquires and Gentlemen: So of noble men and Gentlemen were slayne eyght thousand, and foure hundred, of the which fine hundred were dubbed knightes, the night before the battaile. From the fielde escaped alyue the Erle Dampmartyn, Clinet of Brabant, Sir Lewes of Burbon, Sir Galliot of Gaultes, Sir John Dengearmes, and fewe other men of name.

Of Englishmen were slaine at this battaile, Edward Duke of Yorke, The Erle of Suffolke, Sir Richard Kikeley, and Dauigam Esquer, and of all other not aboue fine or sixe hundred persons.

After that the king had refreshed himselfe in the Towne of Calice, and that such prisoners as he had left at Harflew, as you haue heard, were come vnto him to Calice: Then he the sixt day of Nouember with all his prisoners tooke shipping at Calice, and the same day landed at Douer, hauyng with him the deade bodyes of the Duke of Yorke, and the Erle of Suffolke, and caused the Duke to be buryed at his Colledge of Foderpynghey, and the Erle at Chelme. And by soft iourneyes he came to London, and was met and receyued at Blacketh by the Mayor and Aldermen of London, clothed in scarlet, and three hundred Commoners clothed in murrey, with all ioy and solemnitie, prayyng God for the high honour & victorie that he had obteyned.

But now to retorne to the french king, when he heavy newes of the losse of the aforesayde battaile came vnto him, he then lying at Roan, and wyth him the Dolphyn, the Dukes of Berrey, and Briteyn, and his second sonne the Erle of Donthewe, though the same were most grieuous unto him, no man ought to merueyle. Wherefore the frenche king perceyving that the warre was nowe but newly begon, determined to prouide for chaunces to come before they should sodainly happen. And first he elected his chiefe officer for the warres called the Constable, which was the Erle of Arminacke, a wise and pollitique Capteine, and an auncient enemye to the English men, and Sir John of Corsey was made maister of the Crosbowes, and then they fortified towne, and furnished garisons. While these thinges were thus in working, eyther for Melancholy that he had for the losse susteyned at Agincourt aforesayde, or else by some sodaine disease, John Dolphyn of Wyndesore, heire apparant to Charles the french king, departed out of this natural lyfe without issue, which was an happie chaunce for Robynet of Bozneuile and his companions, as you haue heard before, for his death was their lyfe, and his lyfe would haue bene their death.

After this notable victorie obteyned by the Englishe men, and that king Henry was departed into England, and the french king had made his new officers, as aforesayd. Thomas Duke of Exeter Capteine of Harflew, accompanied with three thousand Englishmen, made a great road into Normandy, almost to the Citie of Roan: In which iourney he gate great aboundaunce both of riches and prisoners. But in his returne the Erle of Arminack newly made Constable of France, entending in this his first iourney to winne his spurre, and in his companie aboute five thousand horsemen, encountered with him. The skirmishe was sore, and the fight fierce, but because the Englishe men were not able to resist the force of the french horsemen, the Duke to saue his men, was compelled to retyre as politikelly as he could deuyse: But for all that he could do, he lost three hundred of his men. The frenche men not content with this good lucke, folowed them almost to the Barrers of Harflew. When the Englishe men within the towne espied the chace, they issued out in good order, and met with their enemies, and not onely slue and tooke a great number of them, but also chased them aboute. liij. Myles toward the Citie of Roan.

Sigismund
Emperour.

And about this season, Sigismund Emperour of Almaine, which had maryed Barbara daughter to the Erle of Silie, Collyn Germain remoued to king Henry, a man of great vertue, & fidelitie, which had not only long labored to set an vnitie and conoord in Christes Church, and Christian religion, but also he sent dyuerse Ambassadors, aswell to the french king as to the king of England, because he was farre distant from their countries and regions to encrease perfect peace and vnitie. Wherefore he perceyving that his Ambassade brought nothing to such conclusion as he wished, did therefore in his awne person come from the furthest part of Hungary into France, and after into England, entending to knit together all Christian Princes in one amitie and frendship, and so beyng friendes together, to make warre and reuenge their quarelles agaynst the Turke, the persecutor of Christes fayth, and enemy to all Christendom. And with this noble Prince came the Archebishop of Reynes, and dyuerse other noble men, as Ambassadors from the french king, into England. The king of England for olde amitie betwene the house of England and Beame, accompanied with all his Nobilitie, Nobilitie, him receyued upon Blacke heth the. vij. day of May, and brought him through London to Westminster with great triumph, where Justes, Courneyes, and other martiall feates were to him with all ioy and pleasure shewed, and set forth.

Duryng which tyme, there came into Englande Albert Duke of Holland, who also was friendly enterteyned. And these two Princes were by the king conueyed to Windsor to saint Georges feast, and there were elected companions of the noble order of the Garter, and had the Coler and Habite of the same to them deliuered, and sate in their stalles all the solemnitie of the feast, by the which order they knowleged themselves to be highly honoured, and much exalted. After this solempne feast finished, the Duke of Holland well feasted, and greatly rewarded, returned into his Country. But the Emperour tarped styll, neuer ceasing to declare and perswade, what vnitie, what goodnesse, and what ioy might ensue, if both the realmes of England and France were brought to a finall conoord, and perfect vnitie. But the euill chaunce of the french Nation was to his purpose a barre, and a let, because they were predestinate to suffer yet moe plagues and detrimetes at the handes of the English men. For when conoord was at hande, and peace was entereng into the Gates, a new cause of moe discorde and dissension sodainly brake out, and came to the kinges knowlege: For he beyng informed of the losse of his men in the territorie of Roan (as you haue heard) was so sore displeased, that he would heere of no treatie, nor haue once this worde (peace) named.

of Holland.

The Emperour like a wise Prince, perceyving that the tyme would not serue to bring to passe that he came for, ceased any further to trauaile therein. And leauing all treatie and perswasion for France, he entered into a league and amitie himselfe with the king of England. Which confederacye least it should be broken, they studied and deuised all wayes and meanes possible, for the preservation and obseruation of the same: Which plaine meaning, and true dealing was afterwarde to them both, not onely much honour, but great commoditie. Nowe when the Emperour had thus concluded a league with the king of England, he tooke his iourney homeward into Germanie: and the king of England, partly to shewe him pleasure, and partly because of his awne affayres, associated him to his towne of Calice: during which time the Duke of Burgoyne offered to come to Calice to speake with the Emperour and the king, because he hearde talke of the league and confederacie that was concluded betwene them. The king sent to the water of Grauelyng, the Duke of Gloucester his brother, and the Erle of Marche, to be hostages for the Duke of Burgoyne, and sent also the Erle of Warwike with a noble companie to conduct him to his presence. At Grauelyng foorde the Dukes met, and after salutations done, the Duke of Burgoyne was conueyed to Calice, where of the Emperour, and of the king he was highly welcomed and feasted: Duryng which tyme, a peace was concluded betwene the king of England, and the Duke of Burgoyne, for a certain space, concerning onely the Counties of Flaundrys, and Arthoys, for the which cause the french king and his sonne was highly displeased. The Duke of Gloucester was receyued at Grauelyng by the Erle of Caroloys, sonne to the Duke of Burgoyne, and by him honourably conueyed to Saint Omers, and there lodged ged that night. The next day the Erle Caroloys came with diuers noble men to visit the Duke of Gloucester in his lodgyng. And when he entered into his Chamber, the Dukes backe was towarde him, talkyng with some of his seruantes, and did not see nor welcome the Erle Charoloys at the first entrie: But after he sayde shortly, without any great reuerence or comming towarde him: ye are welcome fayre Cossyn, and so passed forth his tale with his seruantes. The Erle Charoloys for all his youth was not well content, but suffered for that tyme.

When the Duke of Burgoyne had done all thinges at Calice that he came for, he after the .ix. day returned to Grauelynge, where the Duke of Gloucester and he met againe, and lounge departed, the one to Calice, and the other to Saint Omers: for the which voyage the Duke of Burgoyne was suspected to be enemye to the Crowne of Fraunce. After the Dukes departure, the Emperour was highly feasted and rewarded, and at his pleasure sayled into Holland, and so road into Beame. The king likewise tooke Ship and returned into England, on Saint Lukes euen, the yere of our Lorde. 1417.

In this meane tyme, the Erle of Arminack puffed by with his last victorie, although the honour were small, and the gaine lesse, determined clerely to get againe the towne of Harlew. Wherefore as closely as he could, he gathered together men in euery place, and appoynted them all to mete him at Harlew at a day assigned. The appoyntment was kept, and the towne was besieged both by water and land, before the Capteynes of the towne knewe perfectlye the first motion. For John Vicount Harbon, Viceadmirall of Fraunce had brought the whole nauie to the ryuage and thore adioynng to the towne, entending priuily to haue entered the towne before he had bene perceyued. But this subtile imagination tooke no place, for they which kept the watche tower, sodeinly perceyving their enemies to approche, rang the Laron Bell: And the Duke of Excester incontinently caused all men to repayre to the walles, and forsteyed the Gates, and dispatched a swift Barke to the king of England with letters, requiryng him of ayde and succour. And although the French men perceyued that their wily enterpryse was knowne, and that the towne could not so sodeinly be stolen and taken as they had deuised, yet they continued their siege both by water and by land, and made diuerse assaultes, at the which if they nothyng gayned, yet euer somewhat they lost.

When these newes were come to the eares of king Henric, and that he knewe that his people were in great ieopardie, except that great diligence were vsed for their reliefe and deliuerance, he without delay apparelled a great nauie, and made Chieftaine thereof the Duke of Bedford, who beyng accompanied with the Erles of Marche, Orenford, Hunsyngdon, Warwick, Arondell, Sarisbury, Deuonshire, and diuerse Barons, with two hundred sayle of good Shippes, well furnished with men, munition, and victualles, did with all speede set forwarde, and beyng shipped at Rye, they with good expedition came to the mouth of the Riuer of Seyne. And when the Vicount of Harbon, who with his nauie kept the mouth of the Riuer of Seyn, perceyued the Englishe nauie to approche, he geuyng a token to all his companie, couragiously set forth towarde his enemies. The Duke in likewise valiantly encountred with them, the fight was long, but not so long as perillous, for battailes of the sea be euer desperate. But after long fight the victorie fell to the Englishe men, and they tooke and sonke almost all the whole nauie of Fraunce, in the which were many Shippes, Hulkes, and Carricks, to the number of five hundred. Of the which three great Carricks were sent into England. And in the same conflict were slaine of the French men no small number, as it appeared by their dead bodyes, which swarmed euery day about the Englishe shippes.

After this victorie fortunately obteyned, the Duke of Bedford sayled by water by to the very towne of Harlew, and without let or impediment landed and refreshed it both with victuall and money: which succours if they were welcome to the Duke of Excester his Uncle, I report me to them that haue bene in necessitie, and would haue gladly bene refreshed.

When the Erle of Arminack heard that the puyssaunt Hauie of Fraunce was vanquished and taken, he reysed his siege before the towne, and returned with small ioye vnto Paris, as he that had no hope, nor sawe no lykelyhood or meane to recouer agayne the towne of Harlew, for the which he so sore thirsted.

After this discomfiture and great losse, the fortitude and strength of the Frenchmen beganne to decaye, and their bragging bewtie beganne to fade. For nowe the Princes and Nobles of the realme fell into diuision and discorde among themselves, as who say, that the Nobility studyeng how to reuenge their olde iniuries and displeasures, refused to take payne for the aduancement of the publique wealth, and sauegarde of their awne countrie. And for priuie displeasure, couert malice or hatred, their power began to wane so slender, and their libertie was brought into suche a malicious diuersitie and doubtfull difference, that, as here after shall be shewed, it was merueyle y their countrie was not brought to a perpetuall bondage: Which thing no doubt had followed, if this king Henry of Englande had longer liued in this transitorie worlde. For notwithstanding that the Duke of Orleans, the Captaine and head of the one faction, was at that tyme captiue and prisoner in England, yet there grew so much priuie displeasure and carthated betwene Charles the Dolphyn and John Duke of Burgoyne, that whyle the one studied and compassed howe to ouercome the other, with armour or with pollicie, with dissimulation or craftie conueyance, euerye Journeyman of their faction, and euery noble man partaker with the one or the other, put all their whole studie and diligence to aduance forwarde their sect and parte, and not one of them would take heede how to resist or refell the present ieopardie which was comming out of Englande. And as one inconuenience suffereth many to follow, so was it in Fraunce at this time: For the french king was not of good memorie: The warre that was towarde seemed both doubtfull and perillous: The princes were vntrusty, and at discorde, and an hundred things, which might bring the realme to extreme miserie and bitter destruction, as after you shall here.

When the Duke of Bedford had atchieued his enterpryse, and performed his commission both in rayeing the siege of Harlew, and victualling of the towne, he with no small number of prisoners, and great abundaunce of praye, as well in shippes and in prouision for the sea, returned into Eng-

Shortly after this, the king assembled his high courte of Parliament, and there in open audience made to them a thozte and pithie Oration, declaring to them the iniuries lately done and committed by the French Nation, and shewed also the iust and lawfull occasion of his warres, and signified also what discorde and ciuile dissention reigned amongst the Nobilitie of France, and rehearsed many things for the which it were now very necessarie and needefull for his grace and the realme, to repressse and ouercome them with all their power and puyssaunce, and that without deferring or prolonging of time, and therefore in all gentle maner desyzed them to prouide for money and treasure out of hande for the conduct and wages of souldiours, to the intent that nothing should lacke when they should be ready to set on their enemies.

The whole parliament hearing his causes so iust, and his request so reasonable, did immediately geue their generall assent to ayde him, and caused such somes as they agreed vpon to be forthwith collected and payed, so glad was all men of these warres, and as all they conceaued good opinion thereof, so it happened in the ende most honorable to the king, and profitable to the subiectes.

John Duke of Bedford made gouernour of the Realme of England.

John Holland Erie of Huntingdon.

The king of Englands came with a power into France.

In this parliament also John Duke of Bedford was made Gouernour or Regent of the realme, and head of the publique wealth, which office he should enioye as long as the king was making warre on the French nation. The king before he would take his boyage, sent the Erie of Huntingdon to serche and scowze the Seas, least any Frenchmen being in waye for him might attrap him sodainly, or he had any knowledge of their setting forward. This lustie Erie called John Holland, sonne to the Duke of Excester, which was behedded at Circiter in the time of King Henry the fourth, and Collyn to the king, with a great number of shippes searched the sea from the one coast to the other. And in conclusion he encountred with ix. Caricks of Jeane (which Lorde Jaques the Bastard of Burbon had reteyned to serue the french king) and set vpon them sharply, the conflict was great, and the fight long: But in conclusion the Frenchmen were overcome and fled, and three of the greatest Caricks with their patrones, and Monsieur Jaques de Burbon their Admirall were taken with asmuch money as should haue payd the Souldiours of the whole flete for halfe a yere: And three other Carickes were bowged and sent to the bottome of the sea.

The king heering of this good chaunce, about the ende of Julij tooke his Ship at Portesmouth, accompanied with the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester, brethren to the sayde king, the Eries of Huntingdon, Merhall, Marwike, Devonshire, Salburie, Suffolke and Somerset, the Lords Rolfe, Willoughby, Fitz Hugh, Clynton, Scrope, Matriners, Bourchier, Ferrers of Erby & Ferrers of Chartley, Fanhope and Gray of Codnoze, Sir Gilbert Umfreuyle, Sir Gilbert Talbot, and dyuers other: And so having winde and wether to his desyre, he landed in Normandie nere vnto a Castell called Touque, where he consulted with his Captaines what waye was best to be taken concerning their high enterpryse.

When the Normans heard of the kings arriuall, they were sodainly stricken with a deadly feare, and as men amazed, and halfe out of their wities, and and forsake their houses and bagge and baggage, and ranne into the strong and walled townes. And likewise the men of warre, which were left in euery place to scowze the Country, fled into the walled townes, among the rude Commonaltie.

When king Henry had taken counsaile, he layed siege to the Castell of Touque, being very well fortified both with nature and mans arte, and began to assault it: And although that they within valiantly defended it, yet by fine force the king ouercame it and tooke it, and all the men that were therein, whome also he tooke to mercy, and made Captaine thereof Sir Robert Kirkkeley knight.

From thence he passed forth to the strong towne of Cane, which standeth in a playne fertile countrey, no stronger walled then depe ditched, which was well victualled and replenished with people: For the Citizens fearing the kinges coming, had prouyded for all things necessary for defense. And as sone as the king was come he cast a depe trench with a high mount to prohibite them within the towne to haue any egress or outward passage: and that done, beganne fiercely to assault the towne: But the men of the towne were nothing abashed, and stood manly to their defence. The fight was fierce and euery man tooke heede to his charge. The Englishmen studied all the wayes possible to dammage their enemies, some shot arrowes, some cast stones, and other shot Connes: Some brake the walles with engines, some set scaling ladders to the walles, and other cast in wildfyre, euery man labored to come to hande strokes, which was their desyre. On the other syde, the Normans threwe downe great stones, Barres of yron, dartes, hot Witche, and breinyng Brimstone and boyling lead. Dyuers dayes this assault continued to the great losse & hurt of the Englishmen. When king Henry perceyued this, he absteyned from the assault, & determined vnderminyng to overthrow the walles & towres of the towne, & the Pioners wrought so fast that within fewe dayes, the walles stood onely vpon Postes ready to fall, when fyre should be put vnto them. The king caused his people to approche the walles, and to keepe the Citizens occupied, least they should make a countermine, or to be an impediment to his workemen and laborers, wherefore he caused the assault to be cried agayne: Then euery man ran to the walles, some with scaling ladders, some with hookes, and some with cards and plom nets, euery man desyryng to get by on the walles, and haue to hande to grapple with his enemye, the Citizens manfully defended. While the fight was quick and fierce on both sydes: The Englishmen in diuers places perceived and brake thorough the walles, and dyuers overtnes and holes were made vnder the foundation by the Pioners, by the which the Englishmen might easely enter into the towne. The king hauing compassio of the townes men, desyryng rather to haue them saued then destroyed, sent them worde by an Herault, that yet was time of mercie and clemencie, if they would submit themselues to his grace: But they obstinately hoping of succour, answered that they would stand at their defense. Then the Englishmen againe scaled the walles, and entred thowow the trenches into the towne: The fight was sore by the space of an houre, but in conclusio the Englishmen obteyned.

Cane besieged and als saulced.

Howe when the king was possessed of the towne of Cane, he first of all commaunded all harneys and weapons to be brought into one place, which was

was done with diligence without any resistance. Then the miserable people kneeling on their knees cryed for mercie: To whom the king gaue certayne comfortable wordes and bade them stande by, and then he resorted to the Church and gaue thanks to God, & after he caused a good and great watch that night to garde the towne. And the next day in the morning he called the Magistrates and gouernours of the towne into the Senate house, where some for their stony stubbernesse, and mad obstinacie were aduudged to die, and other were soze fyned and highly ransomed. Then he callyng together hys souldyours and men of warre, both gaue to them high laudes and prayes for their manly doings, and also distributed to euery man according to his desert the spoyle and gayne, taken of the towne and townes men, chiefly because he had tried at that assaulte their valiaunt courages, and vnfearefull heartes.

Howe though the towne were wonne, as aforesayde, yet the Castell which was strong and well fortifed, both with men & al things necessary for defence, was still in the Frenchmens possession, the captayne wherof, to the entent to shew himselfe valiaunt and not wylling to breake his othe, boasted that he would rather dye in defense, then freely to yeelde the Castell. King Henry was not minded to ouerthrow the Castell (without which it was not easie to be won) because it was bewtiful & necessary both to kepe the towne from goyng backe, & also to defend the same when oportunitie should serue: Wherefore he sent worde to the Lorde Mountaigny being captaine, that if he would yeelde the Castell by a daye, he should departe without dammage: And if he would be obstinate, he should finde no fauour. When the Captaine and his companions had well considered vpon the condition offered, he rendred the Castell and yelded themselues. And so the king was possessed both of the towne and Castell of Cane.

While the king of England was besiegyng this towne, the French men had neyther a conuenient armie to resist their power, nor were redy or able relieue their friendes in this miserable necessitie, because they had such diuision & dissension among themselues, and a good cause why: For king Charles was of so small wit by reason of his sicknesse, that he could not rule, and so was spoyled both of his treasure and kingdome, and euery man spent and wasted the common treasure.

Charles the Dolphyn beyng of the age of. xvi. or. xvij. yeres, onely lamented and bewayled the ruine and decay of hys countrie: He onely studyed the aduancement of the common welth, and he onely deuyed how to resist his enimies: But hauyng neyther men nor money, was greatly troubled and vnquieted. And in conclusion, by the counsaile of the Erle of Arminack Constable of Fraunce, he founde a meane to get all the treasure and riches which Quene Isabell his mother had gotten and hozded by in dyuerse secret places: and for the common vtilitie of his Countrie, he spent it wisely in buyyng of his Souldiours, in preparyng of thinges necessarye for the warre. The Queene forgettyng the great perill the realme stode in, but remembryng the displeasure to her by this act done, declared her sonne and the Constable to be her mortall enimies, and promised that they should be persecuted to the bittermost. And euen for very womanly malice, shee set in the highest auctoritie about the king her husband, John Duke of Burgoyne, geuyng him the regiment and direction of the king and his Realme, with all prehemynence and souereigntie.

The Duke of Burgoyne hauyng nowe the sworde of auctoritie, for the which he had so soze longed, and glad to be reuenged of his olde iniuries, began to make warre on the Dolphyn. And purposyng that when he had once tamed and framed to his purpose this yong vnbrideled Gentleman, then he determined, as he might to resist and withstand the common enimies of the realme. The same or like reason moued the Dolphyn, for he myndyng first to repress and extinct the Ciuile dissension at home, before he would inuade forein enimies, prepared warre to subdue and destroy John Duke of Burgoyne, as the chiefe heade & leader of that wicked and great mischiefe, whereby the realme was much vnquieted, & more decayed, and in a maner brought to a small ruine and bitter destruction. Thus Fraunce was inflamed, and in euery part troubled with warre and diuision, and yet no man would eyther prouide in so great a daunger, nor once put forth their synger to remoue the mischiefe.

King Henry not myndyng to lye still in Normandie, nor yet to leaue his enterpryse vnperformed, sent the Duke of Clarence to the Sea coast, which with great difficultie gate the towne of Bayeux. The Duke of Gloucester also with small assault, and lesse defense tooke the towne of Lisieux. In the meane season, King Henrie tarped still at Cane, fortifyng the Towne and Castell, and put out of the towne. xii. hundred women and impotent persons, and replenished the towne with Englishe people. And while the king iourned at Cane, he kept a solempne feast, and made there many knightes: And besydes that, he shewed there an example of great charitie & mercy. For in searching the Castell, he found there innumerable substance of plate & money, belonging to the Citizens: whereof he would not suffer one penny to be touched or conueyed away, but restored the goodes to the owners, and deliuered to euery man his awne.

When the fame of the gettyng of Cane was blowen through Normandie, the Normanes were so soze afrayed, and so much abashed, that you should not onely haue sene men, women, and children runnyng in euery way by great plompes from towne to towne, not knowyng whether to flie: But also the rurall persons and husband men draue the Beastes out of the Villages into suche places where they hoped of refuge or defence: So that a man would haue thought that Normandy had sodainly bene left desolate and boyd of people and Cattaille. But when the rumoz was spread abroad of his clemencie shewed to Captiues, and of his mercie graunted to suche as submitted themselues to his grace, all the Capteines of the townes adisyng came willyngly to his presence, offering to him themselues, their townes, and their goodes. Whereupon he made proclaymation, that all men which had or would become his Subiectes, and sweare to him allegeaunce, should enjoy their goodes and liberties in as large or moze ample maner then they did before, which gentle enterteinyng, and fauourable handelyng of the stubborne Normanes, was the very cause why they were not onely content, but also glad to remoue and turne from the French parte, and become subiects to the Crowne of Englande.

When the king had set Cane in good order, he left there for Capteynes, St. J. the

And while the king wanne thus in Normandie, his nauie lost nothing on the Sea, for they so scoured the streames, that neyther Frenchman nor Briten durst appere: Howbeit one day there arose so hideous and so terrible a strome, that neyther Cable helde, nor Anker preuayled, so that if the Erles of March and Huntyngham had not taken the Hauens of Southhampton, the whole nauie had perished, and the people had bene destroyed, and yet the sauegarde was straunge: For in the same Hauens two Balyngers, and two great Carrikes laden with marchandice were drowned, and the broken masts of another Caricke was blown ouer the wall of Hampton (as diuers wyrters affirme) such is the power of the winde, and such is the rygour of a tempest. When the fury of the winde was asswaged, and the Sea waxed calme, the Erles of March, and Huntyngham passed ouer the sea with all their companie, and landed in Normandie, marchyng toward the king, before whom the Normanes fled, as fast as the fearefull hare doth before the greddie Greyhound. And so they passed through the Countrey, destroyng of Villages, and takyng of prayes, untill they came to the king who then was goyng toward Rhoan.

And durynge this tyme Sir John Oldercastell Lord Cobham, of whome mencion is made before, was taken, and after condemned and hanged, and bzent, the whole Hystorie whereof you may reade in the booke of the Monumentes of the Church.

As the king passed to Rhoan, he was skirmished with, in sundry places, but in the ende the victorie still happened vnto him, so that nothing that stood in his way could stop him, for he tooke by force Dountlarch, Louyers and Sureur, and at the last came before the Citie of Rhoan, the which was wonderfully fortified, for the while he had lpen at the siege of Cane, and was in other places of Normandy, the inhabitants of Rhoan had walled it round about, and made dyuers Bulwarke for the defense thereof, they had also great store of victuals, for the whole countrey about had brought thether such as they had: And thether also they had brought their plate, Jewels, and money, so that the towne was filled with great ryches & treasure, which caused the king to be the more desyrous thereof, wherefore the last daye of Julij he compassed the same rounde about with a strong siege, and gaue therevnto a terrible assault. And to the intent that no ayde should passe by the ryuer toward the Citie, a great chayne of Yron was deuised at Dountlarche, and set on piles from the one side of the water to the other: and beside that chayne he set by a newe forced bridge, sufficient both for cariage and passage. And at this tyme the Erle of Warwike was sent to the towne of Calwdebeck standing on the ryuer side betwene the Sea and the Citie of Rhoan, which towne he so hardly assaulted, that the Captaines offered to suffer the English nauie to passe by their towne without hurte or detriment, to the Citie of Rhoan, and also that of Rhoan yeldded, they promised to render their towne without anye fayle or farther delaye: And this composition they sealed, and for performance of the same they deliuered pledges. And immediately after this agreement the English nauie, to the number of one hundred Sailles, passed by Calwdebeck and came before Rhoan, and besieged it on the water side. To this siege came the Duke of Gloucester with the Erle of Suffolke and the Lorde of Burgayny, which had taken the towne of Chierburgh, and were lodged before the port of Saint Hilarij, neerer their enemies then any other persons of the armie.

During this siege, arryued at Harflewe the Lorde of Kylinay in Ire-land with a band of. xvi. hundred Frishmen, armed in Mayle with Dartes and scaynes, after the maner of their countrey, all talle, quick, and deliuer persons, which came and presented themselves before the king, lyeng still at the siege: Of whome they were not onely gently enterterncd, but also (because the king was informed that the French king and the Duke of Burgoyne would shortly come, and eyther rayse the siege, or victuall the towne at the Northgate) they were appointed to keepe the Northside of the army, and in especiall the way that came from the forest of Lyons. Which charge the Lord of Kylinay and his company ioyfully accepted, and did so they deuoyre, that no men were more praysed, nor did more dammage to their enemies then they did, for surely their quicknesse and swiftnesse did more preiudice to their enemies, then their great barbed horses did hurte or dammage to the vnable Frishmen.

Thus the Citie of Rhoan being compassed aboute with enemies, both by water and lande, hauing neyther comfort nor ayde of king nor Dolphyn. And although the armie were strong without, yet within there lacked neyther hardy Captaynes nor manfull Souldiours. And as for people, they had more then ynough: For it was written by him that knewe the number, there were at the time of the siege within the Citie of Christian people. CC. and. x. thousand persons. The king and his people assaulted the towne fiercely: The frenchmen defended it courageously and valiantly: long was the siege, and terrible were the assaults, to the losse and no gayne of neyther partie: wherefore after the king of England had well considered with himselfe that by the manifold assaults many of his people perished, therefore at the last he determined to conquere them by famine. Wherefore he stopped all the passages both by water and lande that no victuall should be conueyed to the Citie, and he cast trenches round about, & set them full of stakes, and defended them with Archers, so that they within could haue no waye out, eitherto invade their enemies, nor departe out of their fortresse.

And sodainly a fayned tydings was brought, that the french king approached with all his power to rayse the siege and to rescue the Citie: wherefore king Henry commaunded all men to lye in their harneys, least they might by some subtile cautele be surprisid vnware, and taken vnprourded. But the french king neyther came nor sent, to the great wonder of the Englishmen.

This siege thus contynuyng from Lammas to Christmas, diuers enterprizes were attempted and diuers pollicies were deuised, how euery part might dammage and hurte his aduersary and enemy, but no parte much reioysed of their gayne. During which time, victuall began sore to fayle within the towne, so that onely Wineger and water serued for drinke, yea and at the length dogges, Rattes, and Hylse serued for their meat, and the scarcety of victualles was so great, that daylie great numbers of people within the Citie dyed for hunger. And the riche men within the towne put out of the gates great numbers of poore people and children, which were by the Englishmen that kept the trenches, beaten and driuen back agayne to the gates of the towne, which agaynst them were closed and barred. So that this miserable people vncomfortably forsaken, and unnaturally dispisid of their owne nation and household felowes, betwene the walles of their Citie, and the trenches of their euemies lay still cryeng for helpe and reliefe, for lacke whereof innumerable soules daylie died and hourelly starued. Yet king Henry moued with pittie and compassion, did in the honour of Christes birth on Christmas day refreshe all the poore people with victuall, to their great comfort, for the which act they not onely thanked him, but also prayed to God for his preseruation and furtheraunce, and for the hinderaunce and euill successie of their vnkinde Citizens and vncharitable countre men.

This miserable famine daylie more and more encreasing, so daunted the heartes of the bolde Captaines, and so abated the courages of the riche Burgeses, and so tormented the bodyes of the poore Citizens, that the stowte Souldiour for faintnesse could scarse holde his weapon, nor the riche Marchaunt for money could not buye a thyuer of bread: So that the commonaltie cryed to the Captaines, and the needie people besought the Lords to haue compassion vpon them, and to inuent some waye for their succour and comfort.

The gouernours of the towne, after long consultation had, considering the great necessitie that they were in, and seing none apparence of succour or reliefe, determined it both necessary and conuenient to treat with the king of Englande. And vpon newe yeres euen, there came to the walles at the gate of the bridge diuers commissioners, appoynted by the Captaines, which made a signe to the Englishmen lying without, to speake with some gentleman or other person of auctoritie. The Erie of Huntingdon, which kept that part, sent to them Syr Gilbert Umfreuyle, to whome they declared, that if they might haue a guyde and a safe conduyt, they would gladly speake with the king. Sir Gilbert not onely promised to doe their message, but

but also to certefie them of the kings pleasure and purpose, which communication ended, he repayred to the Duke of Clarence, and other of the kings Counsaile, aduertising them of the request of the Citizens, which incontinent assembled themselves in the kings lodging, where Syr Gilbert Umfreuyle wisely and discretely declared to the king, the mindes and intents of the Citizens. The king lyke a graue prince considering that a thing gotten without effusion of bloude is both honorable and profitable, and sawe that the haute courages of the bragging french men were sore abated and almost tamed, thought it conuenient to here their lowly petition and humble request, and therefore willed Sir Gilbert to aduertise them that he was content to here twelue of them, which should be safely conueyed to hys presence: And with this aunswere Sir Gilbert departed, and made relation thereof to the Capitaynes standing at the gate: who on the next daye in the morning appoynted foure knightes, foure learned men, and foure Burgeses all clothed in black, to go to the king of England. These twelue persons were receyued at the porte Saint Hillarij, by Sir Gilbert Umfreuyle accompanied with diuers gentlemen and yeomen of the kings household, commonly called yeomen of the Crowne, and they were conueyed to the kings lodging. And shortly after, they were brought into the kings presence, who behelde them with a fierce and princely countenance. And one of them beyng of a stowte courage spake vnto the king as foloweth: Right high and mighty prince, if you will consyder wherein the glozie of victorie doth consist, you shall playnely perceaue that the same is in the taming of proud men, and ouercomming of valiaunt souldiours, and subduyng of strong Cities, and not in slayng of christen people by hunger and famine, wherein resteth neyther manhood, wylt nor pollicie. What glozie shall you obtayne in kyllyng of wretches by famine, which death of all deathes is to be dispisid? If you wylt shewe your selfe charitable before God, or mercifull before men, let all our poore people which will depart out of our Citie passe thorough your campe to get their lyuing in other places, and then manfully assault our Citie, and by force (if you dare) subdue and conquere it. And in this doyng if your enterprise succede well, then shall ye not onely obteyne worldly lame and glozy, but also merite much of God, in hauing pittie and compassion of the poore and needie people.

When this bragger had sayde, the king which no request lesse suspected then that which they desyred, began a while to muse. And when he had well considered the subtile & craftie inuention of the Messengers, he with a fierce countenance, and a bolde spirite made to them this aunswere. Thinke you of fantastick frenchmen, that I am so ignoraunt, that I can not perceyue your double dealyng and craftie conueyaunce? Judge you me so simple, that I knowe not wherein the glozy of a Conquerour consisteth? Esteeme you me so ignoraunt, that I perceyue not what crafts and warlike pollicies by strong enemies are to be subdued and brought to subiection? Yes, I am not so lopteryng a truaud as to forget so good a lesson. And if these things be to you blind and obscure, I will declare and open them vnto you. The Goddesse of warre called Bellona (which is the Correctrice of Princes for right witholding, or iniury doyng, and the plague of God for euill liuyng) hath these thre handmaydes, euer of necessitie to attend vpon her, that is, blood, fyre, and famine, which thre Damoselles be of that force and strength that euery of them alone is able to torment and afflict a proude Prince: But they all being ioyned together, are of puissance able to destroy the most populous Countrey and richest region of the worlde. If I by assaultyng of your towne shoulde seeke your blood, although I gayned (as I doubt not but I should) yet my gaine were not clere without some losse of my people, If I set your Citie on fyre, and so consume it and you also, then haue I lost that precious Jewell which I haue so long laboured for. Therefore to saue mine awne people (which is one poynt of glorie in a Captein) and to preserue the towne, which is my iust and lawfull inheritaunce: And to saue as many of you as will not willingly be destroyed, I haue appoynted the mekest of the thre Damosels to afflict and plague you, vntill you be brudeled and brought to reason, which shall be when it shall please me, and not at your appoyntment: And therfore I say and affirme, that the gaine of a Capteine by any of these thre handmaidens is both honorabile and triumphant: But of all thre, the yongest mayd is in all thing most profitable and commodious. And nowe to aunswere to your demaundes, as touchyng the poore people lying in the ditches, I assure you, I more lament your lacke of charitie toward your Christian brethren, yea, and your awne nacion, your awne blood, and your awne Countrey men, then I reioyce at the vndoyng of so many creatures, and castyng away of so many enemyes. You lyke Trauntes put them out of the towne, to the entent that I should slay them, and yet I haue saued their lyues. You woulde geue them neyther meate nor drinke, and yet I being their mortall enemye haue succoured and relieved them: So that if any vcharitie be, it is in you: If any shame or reproch be taken, receyue it your selfe, for you be the doers. If I haue done them good, let God reward me, for I looke of them to haue no thanks, if you haue done them euill, so shall you be doue to. And as to suffer your people to passe out of the Citie through my campe, no, no, I will not so accomplishe your cloked request, but you shall kepe them still to spend your victualles: And as to assault your towne, I will you knowe it, that I am thereto both able and willyng as I see tyme and occasion: But scyng the choise is in my hande to tame you eyther with blood, fyre, or famin, or wyth all, I will take the choise at my pleasure and not at yours. And with that the king with a frowning countenaunce departed from them into his Chamber, and commaunded them to dyne with his officers.

When he was departed, the French men meruayled at his excellent wit, and mised at the hautinesse of his courage, and after they had dyed and consulted together, they requyred once again to haue accesse vnto his royall presence, which when it was to them graunted, they humbly on their knees besought him to take a truce for. viij. dayes, in the which they might by theyr Commissioners take some ende and good conclusion betwene him and hys counsaile. The king like a piteous Prince, rather couetyng the preseruation of the people, then their destruction, after good deliberation taken, graunted to them their askyng, with the which aunswere they ioyously returned.

After their departure, there were appoynted and set by thre rich tents, the one for the Lordes of Englande to consult together: The seconde for the Commissioners of the Citie, and the thirde for both partes to argue and debate the matter in. The Commissioners for the Englishe part were, the

Erles

Erles of Warwike, and Sarisburie, the Lorde Fitzhugh, Sir Walter Hungerford, Sir Gilbert Umfraville, Sir John Robsert, and John de Gasques de Allmada. And for the frenche part were appoynted Sir Guy de Butteller, and sire other.

Duryng this truce, euery day the Commissioners met, the Englishmen accused, and the frenchmen excused. The Englishmen demaunded muche, and the frenchmen proffered little. Thus with arguyng and reasonyng the viij. day came, and nothing was done, nor one article concluded. Wherefore the Englishe men toke downe their Centes, and the french men toke their leaue: But at their departyng, they remembryng themselves, required the Englishe Lordes for the loue of God that the truce might continue vntill the Sonne setting the next day, to the which the Lordes assented.

When the frenchmen were returned to Roan, sodainly in all the towne sprong a rumoz that the truce was expired, and nothing determined. Then the poore people ranne about the streetes lyke frantike persons, howtyng, cryyng, and callyng their Capteynes and Gouvernours murderers, and manquellers, sayng that for their pryde and stiffe stomacke, all this miierie was happened vnto the towne, threathyng to slay them if they woulde not agree vnto the king of Englandes demaund and request.

The Magistrates being amased with the furie of the people, called all the towne together, to knowe their mindes and opinions. The whole boye of the Commons was to yeelde, yeelde rather then starue. Then the french men in the Euening came to the Tent of Sir John Robsert, requiryng him of gentlenesse to moue the king that the Truce might be prolonged for foure dayes. The King therevnto agreed, and appoynted the Archbishop of Cantorbury, and the other seuen before named for his partie, and the Citizens appoynted an egall number for them. So the Centes were againe set by, and dayly were assemblies, and much treatie on both partes. And on the fourth day the treatie was concluded, to the great reioysyng of the poore Citizens of Roan, and the same treatie was conteyned in. xxiij. Articles, which for that they are long, I do omit them: But the somme and effect of them were, that they yeelde the towne of Roan, themselves and their goodes vnto the king of England, the. xij. day of January, in the yere aforesayde.

When the rendyng of the Citie of Roan was blowen through Normandie, and the kinges Proclamation published through the Countrey, it is in a maner incredible to here what a number of townes yeelde vnto the king, not being once desyred, which to recite I purpose not, because at this day England possesseth not one of them.

Nowe when the gettyng of Roan, and the deliery of all the townes aforesayde were blowen through the Realme of Fraunce, the heartes of the frenchmen were sodainly heauie, and their courages soone cooled. But who soeuer kicked and winched at this matter, John Duke of Burgoyne raged & swelled, yea, and so muche fretted, that he wist not what to say, and lesse to do: And no marueyle, for he was at one tyme bered with a double disease. For he ruled both king Charles and his, and did all thinges at his will, whether reason agreed or no, and for that cause he knewe that he was neyther free from disceyn, nor yet deliuered from the scope of malice. And therefore he imagined & all mischiefes and calamities which chaunced in the common wealth should be imputed and assigned to his vnpolitique doynge, or to his negligent permission. Wherefore he imagined it profitable to the realme, and to him selfe most available, if by any meanes possible he could devise any way or meane, by the which he might reconcile and ioyne in amitye the two great and mightie kinges of England and of Fraunce. Which thing once obteyned, and beyng deliuered from all feare of exterior hostilitie, he determined first to reuenge his quarell agaynst Charles the Dolphyn, & after to repressse all causes of grudge or disdeyne, and to recouer againe both the fauour of the Commonaltie, and also to put away all causes of suspicion or imagined infamie against him and his procedynge. And intending to buyld vpon this fraile foundation, he sent letters and Ambassadors to the king of England, aduertisyng him that if he would personally come to a communication, to be had betwene him and Charles the French king, he doubted nothing but by his onely meanes, peace should be induced, and bloodie battaile excluded.

King Henry heard gently the Ambassadors, and agreed to their request and desyre, and so came to Maunt, where at the feast of Penthecost he kept a liberall house to all commers, and sate himselfe in great estate. On which daye eyther for good seruire before by them done, or for good hope of things to come, he created Gasconde Foyes a balyant Gascoyne, Erle of Longeuyple, and s<sup>r</sup> John Gray he made Erle of Tankeruyple, and s<sup>r</sup> John Bourchier Erle of Ewe. After this solempne feast ended, the place of enteruiew and meeting was appointed, to be beside Melaus on the ryuer of Seyne in a fayre playne, every parte was by the Commissioners appointed to their ground. The frenchmen ditched, trenched and paled their lodgings for feare of after clappes: But the English men had their parte onely barred and ported. The king of Englande had a large Tent of blewe Ueluet and greene, richely embrodred with two deuises, the one was an Antlop drawing in an horse Mill: the other was an Antlop sitting in an high stage, with a braunch of Olive in his mouth. And the tent was garnished and decked with this poesy. After busie labour, commeth victorious rest. And on the top and height of the same was set a great Eggle of Golde, whose eyes were of suche orient Diamondes, that they glistered and shone ouer the whole field.

The french king likewise had in his Parke a fayre Pavillion of blewe Ueluet, richely embrodred with stobze delices, and on the top of the same was set a Hart flyeng made all of fyne Siluer winges enameled. Betwene these two Campes or enclosures was appointed a Tent of purple Ueluet, for the counsaylours to meete in, and every parte had an egall number to watch on the night, and to see good order on the daye.

When the day of appointment approched, the king of England accompanied with the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester his brethren, and the Duke of Excester his Uncle, and Henry Bewford Clerck, his other Uncle, which after was Bishop of Winchester and Cardinall, and the Erles of March and Salburie, and other to the number of a thousand men of warre entred into his parke, and tooke his lodging. Likewise for the french part, thether came Isabell the French Queene, because the king her husbande was fallen into his old freneticall disease, hauing in her company the Duke of Burgoyne, and the Erle of saint Paule: And she had attending vpon her the fayre Lady Katheryn her daughter, and, xxvj. had also for her furniture a thousand men of warre.

After these estates had reposed themselves one night in their Tents, the next daye all suche as were appointed, repayred toward the pavillion ordeyned for the consultation. Where the king of Englande lyke a prince of great stomack, and no lesse good behauiour, receyued humbly the Frenche Queene and her daughter, and them honorably embraced, and familiarly kissed. The Duke of Burgoyne made lowe curtesie, and bowed to the king, whome the king louingly tooke by the hande, and honorably enterteyned him. After salutations and embracings finished, they fell to counsayle within the Pavillion assigned, which was kept with a garde appointed by both the parties, that none but commissioners should once attempt to enter. After the kings request made, and his demaunds declared: The French Queene and her company tooke leaue louingly of the king of England, and returned vnto Douthoyse, to certefie her husband. And king Henry returned to Maunt. The next day after they assembled agayne, and the french parte brought with them the Lady Katheryn, onely to the entent that the king of England seing and beholding so fayre a Lady, and so minion a Damosell, should so be inflamed and rapt in loue, that he to obteyne so bewtifull an espouse, should the sooner agree to a gentle peace and louing composition. This company met together eyght seuerall times, sometime the one parte was more, and sometime the other. And notwithstanding that the English men and french men were lodged no great distaunce a sunder, yet was there neuer fray nor occasion of tumult or rpot prouoked or stirred of any of both the partes.

In this assemble many wordes were spent and no deedes done, many things required and serue offered, many arguments made, and nothing concluded. Some write that the Dolphyn to let this treatie, sent to the Duke of Burgoyne Sir Crauagny du Chastell, declaring to him, that if he would let this agreement, he would common with him, and take suche an order, that not onely they but the whole realme of Fraunce should thereof be glad and reioyce: But what was the very cause of the breach, no man certainly declareth. When none effect ensued of this long consultation, both parties after a princely maner departed, the English men to Mautes, and the french men to Douthoyse.

The king of Englande was nothing pleased that this communication came to no better ende: wherefore he mistrustyng the Duke of Burgoyne, to be the very let and stop of his desyres and requestes, sayde vnto him before his departing: Fayre Cossyn, we will haue your kinges daughter, and all things that we demaunde with her, or we will driue your king and you out of his realme. Well sayde the Duke of Burgoyne, before you driue the king and mee out of hys Realme, ye shall be well wearied, and thereof we doubt little.

After this departure the Duke of Burgoyne being nobly accompanied, roade to the towne of Melune, where the Dolphyn then sojourneyed, and in the playne fieldes they two lyke friends commoned together, and concluded apparantly an open amitie and sure friendship, which was wrytten by Notaries, and signed with their handes, and sealed with their great seales of armes: But as the sequele sheweth, heart thought not that tongue talked, nor minde meant not, that hande wrote. This treatie was concluded ded the first daye of Iulie, 1419. and was proclaymed in Parys, Amoyence and Bonthoyse.

When this new alyauce was declared vnto the king of England, then lyeng at Maunt, he was therewith soze displeased, and not without cause, for he perceaued that the force of these two princes were much stronger now being vnited in one, then they were before when they were separated and diuided. Yet for all this great sworne amitie he went forward with his intended enterpryse. Wherefore he sent Captaine Bueffe brother to the Erle of Foye newly created the Erle of Longeuyle, with .xx. hundreth men secretly to the towne of Bonthoyse, which on Trinitie Sunday early in the morning came into the towne, and so sodainely and quickly had set vp their scaling ladders to the wall, that they were entred into the towne, or the watch perceaued them, cryeng, Saint George, Saint George.

The Lorde Lisleadam Captaine of the towne perceauing the walles scaled, and the market place garyned, opened the gate toward Paris, at the which, he with all his retinue and diuerse of the townes men, to the number of eyght thousand, fled. For the Englishe men durst not, because their number was small, once diuide themselves or fall to pilfering, till about nine of the clock, at which time the Duke of Clarence came to their ayde with five thousand men, and by the way he encountred diuers Burgeses of the towne flyeng with all their substance toward Beauuoye, whome he tooke prisoners, and brought them to their olde dwelling place.

When the Duke was come to Bonthoyse, he much prayesed the valy-auntnesse of the assaylants, and gaue to them the chiefe spoyle of the towne and Merchants, of the which they had a great and riche praye. Then the Duke passed forward and came before Paris, and lay before the Citie two dayes, and two nightes without any proffer, eyther of issue by his enemies or of defence if he had the same assaulted, which he could not well do because it was long and ample, and his number small, and for so great an enterpryse not furnished, wherefore scing that his enemies durst not once looke vpon him, he returned agayne to Bonthoyse: For the taking of which towne the countie of Fraunce and especially the Parisians were soze dismayed and astounded, for now there was no Fortresse left habile to resist or withstande the Englishmen, vnt that they might come to Paris whensoever they would: In so much that the Frishe men ouercame all the Isle of Fraunce, and did to the french men innumerable dammages (as their awne wyters affirme) and brought daylie prayes to the English army. And beside that, they would robbe houses, and lay beddes vpon the backs of the kyne and Oxen, and ride vpon them, and carie yong children before them, and sell them to the Englishmen for slaves: which straunge doyngs so feared the french men within the territorie of Paris, and the countie about, that the rude persons fled out of the Villages with all their stuffe, to the Citie of Paris.

The french king and the Duke of Burgoyne lyng at Saint Dionyse, hearing of all these doynges, departed in all the hast with the Queene & her daughter to Troys in Champaigne, there takyng great deliberation what was best to be done, leauyng at Paris the Erle of saint Paule, and the Lord Lisleadam with a great puissaunce to defende the Citie. At the same tyme the Duke of Clarence tooke the strong towne of Gysoys, and the towne of Gayllard,

Gayllard, and all the townes of Normandie were shortly after espyue and by force or rendred, except Mount Saint Michell, which because the gaine therof was very little, and the losse in assaultyng of it semed to be very much, and also it could do small harme or none vnto the Countie, therefore the same was neyther assaulted nor besieged.

And thus, as you haue heard, was the Duchie of Normandy reduced againe to the right line, which had bene from the tyme of king Edward the thirde in the yere of our Lorde, 1255, wrongfully deteyned from the kinges of England.

The wise men of Fraunce soze lamenting the chaunce of their Countie, and the miserie of their people, sawe and perceued that they had puissaunce enough to defende their enemies, if they were at a perfect conorde among themselves. And they sawe also that although there were a peace betweene the Dolphyn and the Duke of Burgoyne, yet they espied no good fruit to come therof: For the Duke eyther for secret displeasure y he bare to the Dolphyn, or for the doubt that he had of the Englishmen, neuer assayed by himselfe the armie of king Henry, nor neuer sent ayde nor succours to the Dolphyn. Wherefore by meanes of frendes a newe communication was appoynted, to the entent that the corrupt dregges of their olde malice and inwarde grudges might clerely be expulsed and cast out. The place of this metyng was appoynted at the Towne of Monstreil Faultyou, so called because a small brooke called Vou runneth there to the ryuer of Seyne. Ouer which riuer was made a Bridge with diuerse Barres ouerthwart, so that the princes opening the Barres might embrace eche other, and keepyng the barres shut, eche might see and comunon with other at their pleasure. The day was appoynted when these two great Princes should meete, to the entent that all Ciuile discorde shoulde by this communication be cleere forgotten, or at the least shoulde be suspended vntill the enemies were banquished and driuen out of their Counties. But this mocion succeeded worse then the entreators deuised: For whilest euery man was fulfilled with hope of peace and conorde, craftie imagination crept out of cankerd displeasure, and had almost confounded altogether.

When the day and place of the solempne Enterueu was agreed and assigned, Cauagny du Chastell, a man prompt and prone to all mischiefe, calling to his remembrance y shamefull murder of Lewes Duke of Orleans, (vnder whome he had long bene a Capteine) done and committed by this Duke of Burgoyne, as before you haue heard, determined with himselfe to reuenge the death of his olde maister and Lorde. Some wyte that he was thereto styrred and prouoked by the Dolphyn (and not unlike) for the Dolphyn which bare a continuall hatred to the Duke of Burgoyne, imagined peradventure by this meanes to repressse and subdue the whole power and high pride of this Duke, without any suspicion of fraude or reproche of vnto truth and villanie. The day came, which was the .xij. day of August, and euery Prince with his number appoynted came to this Bridge. The Duke of Burgoyne beyng warned by his frendes to keepe his Closure, and the Barres on his syde shut, little regardyng his frendes monition, as a man that could not aduoyde the stroke for him prouided, opened the Barres and Closure, and came to the Dolphyns presence, which was cleane armed, and

ded the Duke on the one knee, shewyng to him great reuerence and humilitie. The Dolphyn shewed to him no louyng countenance, but reprovod him, layng to his charge much vnturth, and great dishonour: The Duke againe boldly defended his cause, and kneeled still, and his sworde was at his back, which with often turnyng and mouing was shaken very backwarde, wherefoze the Duke chaunced to put his hand backe to plucke his sworde forward. What, quod Sir Robert de Loyz, will you drabe your sworde agaynst my Lorde the Dolphyn? When Cauagny du Chastell apperceyued that an occasion was geuen to performe his enterprize, he incontinent strake him with a Hatchet on the head, so that he coude not speake, and other standyng by shortly dispatched him of his lyfe. Diuerse of his part, not thinkyng him to be dead, began to drabe weapon, amongst whome the Lorde Houale was slaine, and the other taken. For this murther were condemned (but not apprehended) by Parliament, the President of Bourgoyn, the Vicont of Narbone, Guiliam Battailier, Cauagny du Chastell, Robert Loyz, and foure other. This was the ende of John called the proude Duke of Burgoyne, which moze regarded ciuile warre then his awne life and welfare. And this soden death, as I thinke, came not to him without desert, for shamefull murderynge of Lewes Duke of Orleans, the french kinges brother: such is the iudgement of God, that blood is recompensed with blood, and unnatural murther is requited with shamefull death, or soden destruction.

After this heynous murther thus committed, the Dolphyns seruants spoiled the Duke of all his garmentes, euen to his shirt, and covered his face with his hosen: But forasmuch as yet this is no part of the Historie of England, I will returne againe where I left.

When Philip Erle of Carolops, sonne and heyre to this Duke John, and nowe by the murther and death of his father was made Duke of Burgoyne, and Erle of Flaundyys, was informed of this misfortune, he toke the matter very grieuouly and heauily, insomuch that none of his counsaill durst once speake vnto him, and in especiall the Ladie Michell his wife, who was sister to the Dolphyn, and daughter vnto the french king, was in great feare to be forsaken, and cast out of his house and fauour: But as all thinges end, so sorow asswageth. When his grieuous sorow was somewhat mitigated, he first by the aduice of his counsaile, tooke into his fauour the sayre Duches his wife, and after sent diuerse notable Ambassadors to the king of England, who lay then at Roan, to treat and conclude a peace betweene them both for a certeyn space: To which request, in hope of a better chaunce, king Henry agreed. And after that, he kept a solempne Obsequie for his father at Saint Maas in Arras. Durynge which tyme the Erle of Saint Paule, and the Parisiens sent to the Duke of Burgoyne Ambassadors, to know what they should do, and howe they should defende themselves agaynst the Englishe men. He gently answered, that he trusted shortly by the ayde of God to conclude a peace betweene England and Fraunce.

When these Ambassadors were departed, the Duke after long consultation had with his counsaile and nobilitie, sent the Bishop of Arras and two notable persons to the king of England, with certeyne Articles which the Duke of Burgoyne offered to him of loue, as he sayde. The king of England considerynge with himselfe that the Duke of Burgoyne was a conuenient instrument to bring his purpose to passe, did therefore louyngly receyue and honourably enterteyn his Ambassadors, sayng vnto them, that very shortly he would send his Ambassadors vnto him, that should declare vnto him his lawfull and reasonable requestes and desyres.

With this message the Dukes Ambassadors departed toward Arras: and incontinent after their departure, king Henry sent the Erle of Warwike, & the Bishop of Rochester with many knightes and squiers, to the Duke of Burgoyne, who when they came to the Duke, declared the effect of their Ambassade. He gently heard their requestes, and some he allowed, and some he augmented, and some he altered and disallowed: But in conclusion the Duke of Burgoyne, and the king of England agreed vpon certeyne Articles, so that the french king and his Commons would assent vnto the same. And shortly after it was agreed that the king of Englande should sende in the companie of the Duke of Burgoyne, his Ambassadors to Troy in Champein, sufficiently aucthorised to conclude so great a matter. The king of Englande beyng in good hope that all his affayres should prosperously succede and go forward, sent to the Duke of Burgoyne, his Uncle the Duke of Exeter, the Erle of Sarisbury, the Bishop of Ely, the Lorde Fanhope, & Lord Fitz Hugh Sir John Robart and Sir Philip Hall, with diuers Doctours, and they were in number fiue hundred horse, which in the companie of the Duke of Burgoyne came to the Citie of Troys the .xxj. day of March. The french king, the Quene, and the Ladie Katheryn, them receyued and hartely welcommed, shewyng great tokens and signes of loue and amitie. And after a fewe dayes they fell to counsaile, in the which it was concluded, that king Henry of England should come to Troys, and marry the Ladie Katheryn, and the king should make him heyre of his Realine, Crowne, and dignitie, after his departure out of this naturall lyfe, with many other articles, which hereafter shall be reherced.

When all these things were done and concluded, the Ambassadors of England departed toward their king, leauing behind them Sir John Robart, to geue his attendaunce on the Lady Katheryn. When King Henry had heard his Ambassadors rehearse the articles of the treatie and amity concluded, he condescended and agreed with all diligence to set forward to Troys, longyng for the sight of the Lady Katheryn his newe spouse. And being admonished by the late mischaunce of John Duke of Burgoyne, he did not rashly presume to aduenture himselfe among his newe reconciled enemies: But when he sawe all things safe and in good order, he being accompanied with the Dukes of Clarence and Gloucester his brethren, the Erles of Warwike, Sarisburie, Huntynghdon, Ewe, Tankerulle and Longuyle, and 10. thousand men of warre, departed from Roan to Douthoyse, and from thence to saint Dionyce, which is two leagues from Paris, and from thence to Doutharenton, where he left a garrison of men to keepe the passage, and from thence by Bourgoyn he came to Troys, where the Duke of Burgoyne accompanied with many noble men receaued him two leagues without the towne, and conueyed him to his lodging and his princes with him, and all his armie was lodged in villages there aboutes. And after he had awhile reposed himselfe, he went to visite the king, the Quene and the Ladie Katheryn, whome he found in Saint Peters Church, where was an honorable meeting and a louing embracing on both sydes, which was the twente dave of Maye, and there at the same time were the Lady Katheryn and the king of Englande made sure together, and the thirde dave of June next following, they were with all solempnitie married in the same Church. At which mariage the Englishmen made such triumphs & reioysing, as though nothing in the worlde coulde haue chaunced more happie and honozable.

And when this honourable mariage was solempnized, and the feastes and triumphes of the same finished, then the two kings and their counsaile assembled together dyuers dayes, wherin the former league and treaty was in dyuers pointes altered and brought to a certaintie. by the deuise of the king of England and his brethren, when this great matter was finished, the kings for their parte sware to obserue the same in all pointes. Lykewise sware the Duke of Burgoyne, and a great number of Princes and nobles, which were present, and they were the better perswaded therunto, for that they maruelled before at the noble actes done by King Henry, of whom they had knowlege onely by reporte, and nowe they more maruayled when they sawe and beheld the honour and wisdom of his person. And immediately upon this agreement, King Henry was proclaymed heire and Regent of Fraunce. And as the french king sent the copie of this treaty to euery towne in Fraunce: So the king of Englande sent the same in Englishe to euery Citie and market towne of Englande, to be published and made knowene, the Copie of which articles here after ensue, worde for worde.

King Henry
is proclaymed
heire and Regent of Fraunce.

1 First, it is accorded betwixt our father and vs, that for as much as by the bond of Matrimonie made for the good of the peace betwene vs, and oure most dere beloued Katheryn, daughter of our sayde father, and of our most dere mother, Isabell his wife, the same Charles and Isabell bene made father and mother, therfore them as our father and mother we shall haue and worship, as it sitteth and seemeth so a worthy prince and princeesse to be worshipped, principally before all other temporall persons of the worlde.

2 Also, we shall not distrouble, disseason or letten our father aforesayde, but that he holde and possesse as long as he lyueth, as he holdeth and posses-seth at this time the crowne and the dignitie royall of Fraunce, and rentes and profites for the same, of the sustenance of his estate, and charges of the realme. And our foresayde mother also hold as long as shee lyueth the state and dignitie of the Quene, after the maner of the same realme, with conuenient conuenience parte of the sayed rents and profites.

3 Also, that the foresayde Ladye Katheryn shall take and haue dowter in our Realme of England as Quenes of Englande here afore were wont for to take and haue, that is to say, to the some of .xl. M. Scutes, of the which two algate shall be worth a noble Englishe.

4 Also, that by þ waies maners and meanes that we may without trans-gressio or offence of other made by vs, for to kepe þ lawes, customes, vsages and rights of our said realme of England, shall doen our labor & pursue, that the said Katheryn also sone as it may be doen, be made sure to take and for to haue in our sayd realme of England from the tyme of our death þ said dowter of .xl. M. Scutes perely, of þ which twaine algate be worth a noble Englishe.

5 Also if it hap the sayde Katheryn to ouerline vs, she shall take and haue the realme of Fraunce immediatly, from the time of our death, dowter to

the sonne of .xx. M. franks perely of and vpon the lands, places and Lord-shippes that helde, and had Blaunch sometime wyfe of Philip Wosecle to our sayde father.

6 Also, that after the death of our father aforesayde, and from thence forwarde, the crowne and the realme of Fraunce with all the rightes and appurtenances shall remaine and abide to vs, and been of vs and of our heires for euermore.

7 Also, for as muche as oure sayde father is withholden with diuers sickness, in suche maner as he may not intende in hys owne person, for to dispose for the needes of the foresayde realme of Fraunce: therfore during the life of our sayde father, the faculties and exercise of the gouernaunce and disposition of the publique and common profite of the sayde realme of Fraunce with counsaile and nobles and wise men of the same realme of Fraunce, shall be and abide to vs: So that from henceforth we may gouerne the same realme by vs. And also to admit to our counsaile and assistance of the sayde nobles, suche as we shall thinke meete, the which faculties and exercise of gouernaunce thus being toward vs, we shall labor and purpose to speedely, diligently and truely to that that maye be and ought for to be to the worship of God and our sayde father and mother, and also to the common good of the sayde realme, and that realme with the counsaile and helpe of the worthy and great nobles of the same realme for to be defended, peaced and go-uerned after right and equitie.

8 Also, that we of our owne power shall doe the courte of the parliament of Fraunce to be kept and obserued in his auctoritie and soueraignie, and in all that is doen to it in all maner of places, that nowe or in time comming is or shall be subiect to our sayed father.

9 Also, we to our power shall defend and help all and euery of the Heres, Nobles, Cities, Townes, commonalties and singular persons, nowe or in tyme comming, subiects to our father in their rightes, customes, priuileges, freedome and franchises longing or due to them in all maner of places, now or in time comming subiect to our father.

10 Also, we diligently and truely shall trauaile to our power, and doe that iustice be administred and done in the same Realme of Fraunce after the lawes, customes and rightes of the same realme, without personal exception.
And that we shall keepe and holde the subiectes of the same realme in tranquillitie and peace, and to our power we shall defende them agaynst all maner of violence and oppression.

11 Also, we to our power shall provide, and to doe our power that able persons and profitable bene taken to the offices; as well of Justices and other offices longing to the gouernaunce of the demaynes and of other offices of the sayde realme of Fraunce for the good, right and peaceable Justice of the same, and for the administration that shall be committed vnto them, and that they be suche persons that after the lawes and rightes of the same realme, and for the vtilitie and profite of our sayde father shall minister, and that the foresayde Realme shall be taken and deputed to the same offices.

12 Also, that we of our power so soone as it maye commodiously be done, shall trauaile for to put into the obedience of oure sayde father, all maner of Cities, Townes and Castels, places, Countries and persons within

the realme of Fraunce, disobedient and rebels to our sayde father, holding with them which bene called the Dolphyn or Arminack.

13 Also, that we might the moze commodiously, surely and freely doen, exercise and fulfill these things aforesayde. It is accorded that all worthy nobles and estates of the same realme of Fraunce, as well spirituals as temporals, and also Cities, notables and commonalties, and citezens, Burgeis of townes of the realme of Fraunce, that bene obeysaunt at this time to our sayde father shall make these othes that followen.

14 First, to vs hauyng the facultie, exercise, disposition and gouernaunce of the foresayde common profite to our hestes and commaundementes they shall meekely and obediently obey and intende in all maner of thing concerning the exercise of gouernaunce of the same realme.

15 Also, that the worthy great Nobles and estates of the sayde realme, as well Spirituals as Temporals, and also Cities and notable commonalties and Citezens and Burgesies of the same realme in all maner of things well and truely shall kepe and to their power shall doe to be kept, of so much as to them belongeth or to any of them all, those things that bene appointed and accorded betwene our aforesayde father and mother and vs, with the counsaile of them whome vs list to call to vs.

16 Also, that continually from the death and after the death of our sayde father Charles, they shall be our true liege men and our heires, and they shall receyue and admit vs for their liege and souereigne and berie King of Fraunce, and for suche to obey vs without opposition, contradiction or difficultie, as they been to our foresayde father during his lyfe, neuer after this realme of Fraunce shall obey to man as king or Regent of Fraunce, but to vs and our heires. Also they shall not be in counsaile, helpe or assent that we leese life or limme, or be take with euill taking, or that we suffer harme or diminution in person, estate, worship or goodes, but if they know any suche thing for to be cast or imagined agaynst vs, they shall let it to their power, and they shall doen vs to weten thereof as hastely as they may by them selfe, by message or by letters.

17 Also, that all maner of conquests that should be made by vs in Fraunce, vpon the sayde inobedients out of the Duchie of Normandie, shall be doen to the profite of our sayde father, and that to our power we shall doe that all maner of landes and Lordships that beene in the places so for to be conquered longyng to persons obeyeng to our sayde father, which shall sweare for to keepe this present accorde, shall be restozed to the same persons to whom they long to.

18 Also, that all maner of persons, of holy Church beneficed in the Duchie of Normandie or any other places in the realme of Fraunce subiect to our father and fauoring the partie of the Dukes of Burgoyne which shall sweare to keepe this present accord, shall enjoy peaceably their benefices of holy church in y<sup>e</sup> Duchy of Normandy, or in any other places next aforesaid:

19 Also likewise all maner persons of holy Church obedient to vs and beneficed in the realme of Fraunce, and places subiect to our father that shall sweare to keepe this present accorde, shall inioy peaceably their benefices of holy Church in places next abouesayde.

20 Also that all maner of Churches, Uniuersities, and Studies generall,

and all Colleges of Studies, and other Colleges of holy Church, being in places nowe or in tyme comyng subiect to our father, or in the Duchie of Normandie, or other places in the Realme of Fraunce subiect to vs, shall enjoy their rightes and possessions, rentes, prerogatives, liberties, and franchises, longyng or delue to them in any maner of wise in the sayde Realme of Fraunce, sauynge the right of the Crowne of Fraunce, & euery other person.

21 Also by Gods helpe, when it happeneth vs to come to the Crowne of Fraunce, the Duchie of Normandie, and all other places conquered by vs in the realme of Fraunce, shall bowe vnder the commaundement, obeysaunce and Monarchie of the Crowne of Fraunce.

22 Also that we shall enforce vs, and do to our power that recompence be made by our sayde father, without diminution of the Crowne of Fraunce, to persons obeyng to him, and fauouryng to that partie that is sayd Burgoyne, to whome longeth landes, Lordships, rentes, or possessions in the sayde Duchie of Normandie, or other places in the realme of Fraunce conquered by vs hethertowarde, geuen by vs in places, and landes gotten, or to be gotten and ouercome, in the name of our sayd father vpon rebelles, and inobedientes to him. And if it so be, that such maner of recompence be not made to the sayd persons by the lyfe of our sayde father, we shall make that recompence, in such maner of places and goodes, when it hapneth by Gods grace to the Crowne of Fraunce. And if so be that the landes, Lordships, rentes, or possessions, the which longeth to such maner of persons in the said Duchie, and places be not geuen by vs, the same persones shall be restozed to them without any delay.

23 Also duryng the life of our sayde father, in all places nowe, or in tyme comyng subiect to him, letters of common iustice, and also grauntes of offices and gites, pardones or remissions and priuileges shall be written and proceede vnder the name and seale of our sayde father. And forasmuch as some singular case may fall, that may not be foreseene by mannes witte, in the which it might be necessary and behouefull that we do write our letters, in such maner case if any hap, for the good and suretie of our sayd father, and for the gouernaunce that longeth to vs, as is befoze said, and for to eschewen perilles that otherwise might fall to the preiudice of our sayde father, to write our letters, by the which we shall commaund, charge, and defende after the nature and qualitie of the neede in our fathers behalfe, and ours as Regent of Fraunce.

24 Also that duryng our fathers life, we shall not call ne write vs king of Fraunce, but vtterlye we shall abstayne vs from that name as long as our father liueth.

25 Also that our sayd father duryng his lyfe shall nempne, call, and write vs in french in this maner. Nostre trechier filz Henry Roy Dengleterre, heretere de Fraunce, and in Latin in this maner. Preclarissimus filius noster Henricus Rex Anglie & heres Frauncie.

26 Also that we shall put none impositions or exactions, or do charge the subiectes of our sayd father without cause reasonable and necessary, ne otherwise then for common good of the realme of Fraunce, and after the sayyng & askyng of the lawes and customes reasonable, approued of the same realme.

27 Also that we shall trauaile to our power to the effect and entent, that by the assent of the three estates of eyther of the realmes of Fraunce and England, that all maner of obstacles may be done away, and in this partie that it be ordeyned and prouided, that from the tyme that we or any of our heyres come to the crowne of Fraunce, both the Crownes, that is to say of Fraunce and England, perpetually be together in one, and in the same person, that is to say, from our fathers lyfe, to vs, and from the terme of our life thenceforward, in the persons of our heyres, that shall be one after an other. And that both realmes shall be gouerned, fro that we or any of our heires come to the same, not seuerally vnder diuers kinges in one tyme, but vnder the same person, which for the tyme shall be king of both the realmes, and soueraigne Lord as aforesaid, keepyng neuerthelesse in all maner of other thinges to eyther of the same realmes their rightes, liberties, customes, vsages, and lawes, not makynge subiect in any maner of wise one of the same realmes to the rightes, lawes, or vsages, of that other.

28 Also that henceforward, perpetually shall be still rest, and that in all maner of wise, dissensions, hates, rancors, enuies, and warres, betwene the same realmes of Fraunce and England, and the people of the same realmes, drawyng to accorde of the same peace, may cease and be broken.

29 Also that there shall be from henceforward for euermore, peace and tranquillitie, and good accorde, and common affection, and stable friendship, betwene the same realmes, and their subiectes before sayde: the same realmes shall keepe themselves with their Counsaile, helpes, and common assistance, against all maner of men that enforce them for to done, or to imagin wrongs, harmes, displeasures, or grieuance to them, or to eyther of them. And they shall be conuersant, and Marchandisen freely and surely together, payyng the custome due and accustomed. And they shall be conuersant also, that all the confederates and alyes of our sayd father, and the realme of Fraunce aforesayde, and also our confederates of the realme of England aforesayde, shall in. liij. Monethes from the tyme of this accorde of peace, as it is noted to them, declare by their letters, that they wyll drawe to this accorde, and will be comprehended vnder the treaties and accorde of this peace, sayyng neuerthelesse eyther of the same Crownes, & also all maner actions, rightes, and reuenues that longen to our sayd father and his subiectes and to vs, and to our subiectes, again such maner of allies and confederacies.

30 Also neyther our father, neyther our brother the Duke of Burgoyne shall begyn ne make with Charles, clepyng himselfe the Dolphyn of Wyennes any treatie or peace or accorde, but by counsaile and assent of all and eche of vs thre, or of other thre estates of either of the sayd realmes aboue named.

31 Also that we both assent of our sayde brother of Burgoyne and other of the nobles of the realme of Fraunce, the which thereto ought to be called, shall ordeyne for the gouernaunce of our sayd father sekerly, louyngly and honestly after the askyng of his royall estate and dignitie by the maner that shall bee to the worship of God and of our father and of the realme of Fraunce.

32 Also all maner of persons that shall be about our father to do him personall seruice, not ouely in office but in all other seruices, as well the nobles and gentles as other shall be suche as hath bene borne in the realme of Fraunce or in places longyng to Fraunce, good, wise, true and able to that aforesayde seruice. And our sayde father shall dwell in places notable of his obedience and

and no where else. Wherefore we charge and commaunde our sayde liege subiectes and other beyng vnder our obedience that they keepe and do to be kept in all that longeth to them this accorde and pence after the forme and maner as it is accorde. And that they attempt in no maner wise any thing that may be prejudice or contrary to the same accorde and peace vpon paine of life and lynne, and all that they may forseyt against vs. Pouen at Troys the xij. day of May. 1420. and proclaymed in London the. xx. day of June.

33 Also that we for the thinges aforesayde and euerye one of them shall geue our assent by our letters patentes, sealed with our seale vnto our said father with all approbation and confirmation of vs and all other of our blood roiall and of all the cities and towne to vs obedient sealed with their seales accustomed. And further our sayde father besyde his letters patentes sealed vnder his great seale shall make or cause to be made letters approbatory and confirmacions of the Decrees of his realme and of the Lords, Citezens, and Burgesses of the same vnder his obedience, all which articles we haue sworn to kepe vpon the holy Euangelistes.

So soone as these articles were made and concluded, as aforesayde, the king of England hauing in his company the French king, and the Duke of Burgoyne came before the towne of Sene in Burgoyne, which toke part with the Dolphyn. And after that he had destroyed the Countrie about it, within. xv. dayes the towne was yeilded. And from thence he remooued to Mounstrell Salt Powe, where the former Duke of Burgoyne was slayne, as is before mencioned, which towne was taken by assault, and many of the Dolphyns part apprehended before they could get to the Castell. And after the getting of the towne, the Castell which was newly replenished with men and victuall, denyed to render, and therefore it was strongly besieged.

The king of Englande sent certaine of the prisoners that he had taken in this towne to aduise the captain of the Castell to yeild the same: But they obstinately denyed the request, geuyng euill spech to the kinges Herault. Wherefore the king of Englande caused a Gibbet to be set vp before the Castell, on the which were hanged. xij. prisoners, all Gentlemen and friends to the Capitaine. When the Lorde of Guytry Lieutenant of the Castell perceived that by no meanes he could be releued nor succored, and fearing to be taken by force, he began to treat with the king of England, which in eyght dayes would take none of his offers. But in conclusion he and his rendered themselves simply, their lyues onely saved: And after sixe weekes siege, the Castell was deliuered, and the Erle of Warwike was made Capitaine of the towne and Castell, which fortifyed the same with men, ordinaunce and artillarie. From thence the king of Englande departed to Molyne vpon Sepn, and besieged it rounde about, in whose company were the French king, the young king of Scottes, the Dukes of Burgoyne, Clarence, Bedford and Gloucester.

These balyaunt Princes and Noble men besieged the strong towne of Molyn vpon Seyn, as aforesaide, with all their force and army, by the space almost of vij. Moneths. They without made Mynes, cast trenches and shot Gonnes at the walles. And they within, whereof the Lorde Barbason was chiefe, manfully defended the same, during the which siege, the frenche Queene, and the Quene of Englands, and the Duches of Burgoyne came dyuers times to visite their husbandes, and to see their friends. This siege so long continued, that victualles within the towne beganne to fayle, and penitence beganne to encrease, so that the Capitayne beganne to treat: And in conclusion the towne was deliuered vpon certaine conditions, whereof one was, that all that were consenting to the death of the Duke of Burgoyne should be deliuered to the king of England, whereof the Lorde Barbason was one, and so they were deliuered to the king, and he sent them vnder the conduyt of the Duke of Clarence vnto Paris, and there they were executed. And fourthwith the sayde Duke of Clarence was by the french king made Captayne of Paris, and had in possession the Bastill of Saint Anthony, the Loure, the house of Peele, and the place of Boys de Wyncens.

After the towne of Molyn was yelded, as aforesayde, the king made Capteyne there the Erle of Huntingdon. From thence he departed with his armie to Corbell, where the french king and the two Queenes then sojourned. And from thence the two kinges accompanied with the Dukes of Burgoyne, Bedford, Gloucester, and Exeter, and the Erles of Warwike, Sarisbury, and a great number of other noble men, set forth toward Paris, whom the Citizens receyued ioyfully, in most honourable maner. The next day the two Queenes made their entry into Paris, where also they were receyued with all solempnitie, as was the two kinges. Duryng the tyme that these two kinges lay in Paris, there was a great assembly called, aswell of the Clergie as of the Nobility, in which the two kinges sate as iudges, before whom the Duches of Burgoyne by her aduocate appealed the Dolphyn and, vij. other for the death and murder of John Duke of Burgoyne her husbände. To the which apeale, the counsaile on the other part made dyuers offers of amends: But this matter was put of vntill an other day. To the Citie of Paris at this tyme resorted the thre estates of the Realme, where euery person severally swore vpon the holy Euangelistes, to kepe, support, mainteyn, and defend the treatie & peace final which was concluded betwene the two Princes and their counsailes, & therunto euery noble man spirituall, gouernour, and temporall ruler set to their seales, which instrumentes were sent to the kinges treasury of his Eschequer at Westminster, sauely to be kept, where they yet remayne. These two kinges sojourned in Paris at the feast of Christmasse. The french king lying at the house of S. Paule, kept no estate nor open court to no man, except to his household seruautes. But the king of England and his Quene, kept such solempne estate, so plentifull a house, so princely pastyme, and gaue so many giftes, that all the noble men of Fraunce spake honourably of him.

Some after this feast of Christmasse, the king of England tooke vpon him as Regent of Fraunce to redresse causes, to remoue officers, to reforme thinges that were amisse, and caused a newe coyne to be made called a Salute, wherein were grauen the Armes of Fraunce, and the Armes of England quartered. And to set all thinges in a quietnesse, he ordeyned sir Gilbert Umfreuile Capteine of Melun furnished with a good number of balyaunt souldiours. And the Erle of Huntingdon his Cousin Germain he appointed Capteyne at Boys de Wyncens. And the Duke of Exeter with fine hundred men of armes, was assigned to kepe the Citie and towne of Paris.

When the king had thus ordered his affayres accordyng to his deuise, he with the Quene his wife, his Princes and Nobles, departed from Paris, and came to the Citie of Roan. But before his remouyng, he caused proesse to be made agaynst Charles called the Dolphyn, commaundyng him to appere at the Table of Marble in Paris: Where for lacke of apperaunce, he was with all solempnitie in suche a cause requisite, denounced guiltie of the murder and homicide of John late Duke of Burgoyne: And by the sentence of the Court of Parliament he was banished the realme and territories of Fraunce, and depriued of all honours, names, dignities and preheminences which he then had or hereafter might haue. Wherefore the Dolphyn went into Languedock, and after to Poyters, getting to him such friendes as he could, and especially he obteyned so highly the fauour of the Erle of Armiack, that he not onely tooke his part, but also relieved him with money, ayded him with men, and in his awne person continually serued him agaynst his foes and enemies.

While king Henry sojourned in the City of Roan, he receiued homage of all the Nobles of Normandie: Amongest whome the Erle of Stafford did homage for the Countie of Perche: And Arthure of Briteyn did homage for the Countie of Jury, which the king before had geuen vnto them. He also ordeyned his Lieutenant generall both of Fraunce and Normandie, his brother Thomas Duke of Clarence: and his deputie in Normandie was the Erle of Sarisburie. And thus all thinges beyng set in order, the king and Quene of England departed from Roan to Amiens, and so to Calice, where he tooke shipping, and hauyng a fayre passage landed at Douer, and came to Eltham, and through London to Westminster: But by the way he was receyued most ioyfully and honourably, namely by the Citizens of London.

And shortly after, great prouision and preparation was made for the coronation of the Quene, who was crowned the. xxiii. day of February with all solempnitie.

Now while the king was thus occupied in England, the Duke of Clarence brother to the king, and his Lieutenant generall in Fraunce & Normandie, as is aforesayd, assembled together all the garrisons of Normandie at the towne of Berney, & from thence departed into the Countie of Mayn. And at Pount de Gene, he passed the riuier of Poue, and roade through all the Countie to Lucie, where he passed the riuier of Loyze, and entred into Aniove, and came before the Citie of Angiers, where he made many knightes, that is to say, Sir William Rosse, Sir Henry Godard, Sir Rowland Kilder, and Sir Thomas Beaufoord called the Bastarde of Clarence and diuerse other. And shortly after that he had forayed, brent, and spoyled the Countie, he returned with pray and pillage to the Towne of Beufoord in the Valley, where he was aduertised that a great number of his enemies were assembled together at a place called Bangie, that is to say, the Duke of Alanson calling him selfe Lieutenant generall for the Dolphyn, who was accompanied with a great number of Erles and other the Nobles of Fraunce.

At this tyme the Duke of Clarence had a Lombard resortyng vnto him called Andrew Forgusa, which was retained with the part aduerse, of whom the Duke required the number of his enemies: To whome he reported that theyr number was but small, and of no strength, and farre vnmeete to encounter with halfe the power of his puyssant armie, entisyng and prouokyng him to set on the French men, warranting him a famous victorie, and a faire day. The Duke geuyng to much credite to this Traytor, lyke a valyant and courageous Prince, assembled together all the horsemen of his armie, and left the Archers behinde him vnder the order of the Bastard of Clarence, saying that he onely, and the nobles would haue the honour of that iourney. When the Duke was passed a streight and a narrow passage, he espyed his enemies ranged in verie good order of battaile: And the saide aduersaries had had layd such Busshementes at the streptes, that the Duke by no wayes with out battaile could eyther retyre or flie. The Englishmen seeyng no remedie, valiantly set on their enemies, which were foure to one: The battaile was fierce, and the fight deadly. The Englishmen that day did valiantly, yet it auayled not, for they were oppressed with the number of frenchmen. There were slaine the Duke of Clarence, the Erle of Tankerville, the Lord Rosse, Sir Gilbert Umfreuile, Erle of Kent, Sir John Lumley, and Sir Robert Cleved, and almost two. M. Englishmen. And the Erles of Somerset, Suffolke, and Berch, the Lord Fitzwater, Sir John Barkley, Sir Raufe Penile, Sir Henry Inglos, Sir William Bowes, Sir William Longton, and Sir Thomas a Borow, and diuers other taken prisoners. And of the frenchmen there were slaine aboue .xii. hundred of their best men. The Bastard Clarence which tarped at Beaufoord was informed of the number of the frenchmen, wherefore he with all the Archers made hast to succor the duke: But they came to late: for the frenchmen heeryng of the appochoyng of the Archers, fled with their prisoners with all the hast they could, leauing behinde them the bodie of the aforesayd Duke, and the dead carions. When the Archers came and sawe their enemies gone, they lamented not a little the euill chaunce of the deceyued Duke: But seying no remedie, they tooke the dead bodie and buried them all, sayyng the Dukes corps, which with great solempnitie was sent into England, and buried at Cauntorbury besyde his father. After this, the English men brent & spoyled the Countie of Mayne, and so returned to Alanson, and there departed euery man to his garrison. This battaile was fought at Babwy in Aniove on Easter Euen in the yere of our Lorde. 1421.

King Henry beyng aduertised of this infortunate ouerthrowe, and deceivable doying of the Lombard, and losse of his brother, sent without delay, Edmond Erle of Mortaigne, & brother to the Erle of Somerset into Normandy, geuyng to him like Auctoritie and preheminance, as his brother the late deceased Duke of Clarence had or enjoyed. After this, he called hys high Court of Parliament, in the which he declared so wisely the actes that were done in the Realme of Fraunce, the estate of the tyme present and what thinges were necessarye for the tyme to come, (if they would looke to haue that Jewell and high kingdome, for the which they had so long labored and sought for) that the Commonaltie graunted a siffene, and the Clergie a double siffene. And because no delay should be in the kinges affayres for lacke of payment, the Bishop of Winchester his Uncle lent to him. xx. thousand pounds, to be receyued of the same disnes or siffenes.

When all thinges necessarye for this boyrage were redie and prepared, he sent his brother John Duke of Bedford with all his armie (which the french men write to be foure thousand men of armes, and. xx. thousand Archers, and other) before him to Calice. And he himselfe shortly after in the middle of May passed the Seas, and arriued there in great triumph, where to him was shewed, that the Dolphyn with. vii. M. men had besieged the towne of Chartiers which was manfully defended by the Bastard of Chyau and other, set and appoynted there by the Duke of Excester.

King Henry not minding to lose so fayre a towne, departed in good order with all his armie towarde Paris. And at Mounstrell there receaued him him the Duke of Burgoyne, which from that place attended vpon the king to Dowaste in Ponthieu, and so came to Abbeville, and from thence to Bops de Vincens, where he found the French king and Queene, whom he louingly saluted, and they him agayne honozably receaued. And there the king of England and the Duke of Burgoyne determined without delaye to fight with the Dolphyn and to raise the siege before Chartres. The king of England with all his power came to the towne of Auant, & thether repayed the Duke of Burgoyne with foure M. men: of whose coming the king reioysed not a little. But before they departed from thence, they had knowlege & true instruction that the Dolphyn hering of the puyssaunt army of the king, was reculed with his people vnto Towres in Towrain. Wherefore the king of England incontynent, not onely sent the Duke of Burgoyne into Picardy to resist the malice of syr Jaques Harcourte, which daylie inferred warre, and caused wast and destruction in the same Countrey: But also appointed James king of Scottes to lay siege to the towne of Dixet, which so fierly assaulted the same, that after sixe weekes, they rendered the same to the king of Scottes to the behoofe of king Henry his soueraigne Lorde, who appointed Captayne there the Erle of Worcester.

The king himselfe remoued from Auant, and passed ouer the Ryuer of Leyz, folowynge the Dolphyn toward Towers: But the Dolphyn mistrusting his power fled to Burges in Berry, and there determined to tarie vntill fortune would looke more fauourably vpon him.

The king of England with all his puyssaunce so fast folowed the syng Dolphyn, that victuall beganne to fayle: wherefore he considering the daunger and hurte of his awne people, and sawe none aduantage to folowe the Dolphyn, did for the safetie of his people retorne ouer the ryuer of Leyz, and gate Salconepes vpon Poue, and a towne called the kings new towne, and dyuers other whose names were to tedious here to reherse.

The aforesaide towne was no lesse victualled then manned, and as well fortified, so that the king of Englande could neyther haue it deliuered vnto him, nor yet gayne it by assault without great losse and detriment. But yet he determined not to departe vntill he had eyther gayned or ouerthrowne the same: And durynge the tyme of this siege was borne at Wyndsoze the kings sonne called Henry, whose Godfathers were John Duke of Bedford, and Henry Bishop of Winchester, and Jaquet Duches of Holland was Godmother, whereof the king was certefyed byeng at this siege of Meaux, at the which he much reioysed, but when he heard of the place of his natiuity, whether he fantaysed some olde blind prophetic, or else iudged of his sonnes fortune, he sayde to the Lorde Fitz Hugh his Chamberleyn these wordes. My Lorde, I Henry borne at Wymouth shall small tyme reigne and get much: And Henry borne at Wyndsoze shall long reigne and loose all: But as God wyll, so be it.

After the Queene of England was thus deliuered of her fayre sonne, she returned into Fraunce, first to her husbande, and after to her father and mother, where she was on all partes so honozably receaued and so louingly enterteyned and highly feasted, that she appered to be no lesse beloued nor welcommed vnto her noble husbande, then vnto her naturall parents.

ny a baliuant man of warre of the Dolphyns parte, which before was captaine of the Castell of Faloy, and yeelding it by composition, sware neuer to beare armour agaynst the king of Englande, assembled a great number of men of warre, as well of Britons as French men, that is to saye the Lorde Mountburchier, the Lorde Copuon, the Lorde of Chastelgiron, the Lorde of Tyntignace, the Lorde de la Howllaye, and dyuers other which entered into the Countrey of Constantyne in Normandy and robbed and killed the Englishe men where they might eyther espie or take them at their aduantage: But the Erle of Suffolk keeper of those marches hering of their doyngs, sent for the Lorde Scales, Sir John Aston Bailife of Constantyne, Sir Wylliam Hall, Sir John Banester and manye other out of the Garrisons within that territorie, which encountered with their enemies at a place called Le Parke de ouecque, in English the Bishops Parke. There was a fore and a long fight, and many a proper feate of armes was done that day and many a man was in that place ouerthrowen: The Englishe men onely desyred victorie, and the French men desyred a safe returne: But in conclusion the French men being not hable to resist, began to flie, in the which conflict and fight there were slayne, the Lorde Copuon, the Lorde of Castell Siron and thre hundred other: And there were taken prisoners, the Lord de la Howllay, and syr Olyuer Maunay and .lx. other. The king being aduertised of this good chaunce and happy iourney sent for syr Olyuer Maunay to be brought vnto him, he then byeng at Meaux. And when he sawe him he sayde: faire father you haue sworne, & promised vnto vs that you would neuer make warre nor beare armour against vs nor our subiectes: ye are an auncient knight, and ought to haue kept your sayth and promise, which you haue vntuly and also vnhonestly broken, and yet we will not (although by the law of armes we might lawfully so doe) put you to death, but graunt to you your lyfe: But we will send you into England to learne you to speake Englishe. And shortly after he was sent to London, where he dyed, and was buried in the white Fryers.

The Scottes wrote (believe them if ye will) that the king of Englande hering that the Dolphyn had sent for ayde into Scotlande, and that he had retayned them in wages (for of their awne habilitie, they be neyther able to send an army ouer the sea, nor yet of substance to beare a continuall warre, for this all their awne histories declare, and their Chronicles make mencion, and yet the countrey is not so poze, but the people be as proude) sent one day for James the Scottishe king, and in the presence of his counsaile declared vnto him, what humanitie, what fauour and singular affection king Henry his father bare during his naturall lyfe, toward the sayde king of Scottes: Putting him in remembraunce of the great loue and friendship which he himselfe sith the beginning of his reigne had shewed vnto him, and that neyther he nor his father had negligently omitted any thing that might apperteyn to the office of a friend or to the duetie of a Tutor, which should loue and cherish his Orphane or Pupile, promising him liberty with a great rewarde if he would cause the Scottes which were adherents to the Dolphyn to retorne agayne into their countrey and natiue region. To the which request the king of Scottes with a wise and good courage answered, saying: what your noble father hath done to me, and what fauour or benefite

I haue receyued at your handes, I shall not nor will not when I maye (I assure you, forget: And when my power shall serue, I shall not faile to recompence your doings with lyke kindnesse. But of your request I meruaile not a little, first considering that I am a prisoner, and haue no possession of my realme: Secundarily that I am as yet neyther sworne to my subiectes, nor they by othe of allegeaunce are bounde to obey my commaundements. Wherefore I desyre you no more to moue me in this thing, which nowe I cannot doe: And yet if I might, I would first foresee whether it were for me honozable, or to my realme honest, to leaue our olde friend in his extreme neede and necessitie without ayde or comfort. With this aunswere the king of England was not content (as the Scottes say) but after that king James was departed from his presence, king Henry sayde, happie shall they be who shall be subiectes to such a king that is indued with suche wit and wisdom at these young yeres.

The king of Englande lyeng still befoze the towne of Meur in Brye (as you haue heard) and had sore oppzessed them within the towne. Whereof hearing the Lorde of Offmound with a company of chosen persons, sent by the Dolphyn, came priuely in the night to the walles, and set by a ladder, and dyuers of his company went by and entred the towne: But as he himselfe passed ouer a planke to haue come to the walles, he fell into a deepe ditch. The Englishe men hearing this noyes, ranne to the ditch, where they tooke the Lorde of Offmound, and slue dyuers of his company which stood at defence. The Captaine within the towne perceauing that their succours were taken, playnely iudged that the towne could not long continue: wherefore they caused all the goodes of the towne to be brought into the market place, which was strong and well fortifyed, The king of Englande being hereof aduertised, commaunded in all haste to geue an assault to the towne, which was quickly done, so that the towne by fine force was within thre houres taken and spoyled. And the same daye the king besieged rounde about the market place, and tooke the Hill adioyning to the same. The Captaynes perceauing in what case they were, fearing to be taken by assault, began to treat with the king of Englande, which appointed the Erle of Warwike and the Lorde Hungerforde to common with them: And in conclusion a treatie was taken, and so the towne and Market place with all the goodes were deliuered into the king of Englandes handes, the tenth daye of Maye, the yere of our Lorde. 1422.

When the deliery of the strong towne of Meur was published through the Countrey, all the townes and fortresses in the Isle of Fraunce, in Lannoys, in Brye, and in Campeigne yelded themselves to the king of England, which appoynted in them baliuant Capteynes and hartie Souldiours.

After that king Henry had thus taken and possessed the towne of Meur and other fortresses at his pleasure, he returned againe to Boys de Wynnes, where he found the frenche king, and the Queene, and his wife, who with all ioy receyued him: And so the .xxx. daye of Maye beyng Whitson euen, the two kinges and the Queenes returned to Parys, where the king of England lodged in the Castell of Loure, and the french king in the house of Saint Paule. These two kinges kept great estate with their Queenes at this feast of Pentecost: But the king of England (as Enguerant both confesseth, essest, and dyuerse other sayth) kept such gloxious an estate, and so costly a Court, that he with his Queene sate at dinner in Parys richely appoynted with moche riche bestures, adourned with Diademes of Golde, garnished and beset with precious stones, and decked with Jewelles both bewtiful and pleasaunt. Besydes this his Princes and estates, Barons and chiefe Capteynes were set in solempne estate, plenteously serued, and abundantly feasted, so that the people of Parys which thether resorted to beholde this estate, iudged him to be more lyke an Emperour, then their aboue king (which sate solitarily alone) to be like a Duke or a pooze Marques: But now againe to returne to our Hystoie.

The Dolphyn knowyng by his Espyals where the King of Englande and his power lay, came with all his puyssaunce ouer the ryuer of Leyze and besieged the towne of Cosney, or Conny, and sent part of his armie to waste and destroy the confines of the Duchie of Burgoyne. And as he purposed, so it happened, for the Duke of Burgoyne with his power set forwarde to defend his awne lande and dominion, and wrote to the king of England to send ayde to them of Cosney or Conny, which had promised to render their towne to the Dolphyn if they were not reskued by the king of England within ten dayes. King Henry heeryng these newes, aunswere that he would not send one creature, but he would go befoze himselfe. And so with all diligence came to the towne of Corbell, and so to Senlys, where, whether it were with the heate of the ayre, or that he with his dayly labour was febled or weakned, he began to ware sicke, yea and so sicke that he was constrayned to tary and to send his brother the Duke of Bedford to perfoyme his iourney & enterprize.

The Duke lyke a baliuant Capteyne set forwarde to reskue the towne besieged, whereof heeryng the Dolphyn with all his Captaynes and hardie souldiours departed thence into Barry to his great dishonour and lesse gaine: And so was the Citie of Cosney, or Conny reskued, to the great honour of the Englishe Nation. But in this meane while, king Henry waxed sicker and sicker, and beyng layd on a Horlitter, was conueyed to Boys de Wynnes, to whome shortly after repayed the Dukes of Bedford and Gloucester his Uncles, and the Erles of Sarisbury and Warwike, whome the king most louyngly entercepted and embraced: But when they behelde him (sayth Polidore) lyng in such an extremitie and daunger, they could not refrayne from mournyng and bewaylyng of him. Howbeit the king with a Princely and courageous heart, without any outward shew either of sad countenance or sorow, comforted them, and encouraged them to be mery and ioyous. But when he perceyued his sicknesse so sore to encrease, that there was no hope of health or recovery, he rendred to God his most hartie thankes, and chiefly that he called him out of this miserable life, at such tyme as when he was of most perfite remembraunce, both toward God and the world, and also in the tyme of his flourishyng conquest, in the which he neuer receyued one spot of dishonour. And turnyng himselfe to his brethren and other noble persons there present, he sayde vnto them: My naturall brethren and trustie friendes, I see you lament and bewaile my death appochoyng at hand, of the which death I am both glad and reioyce, for this short tyme of my mortall lyfe shall be a testimonie of my strength, a declaration of my iustice, and a setting forth of all mine actes and traunyles, and finally shall be the cause that

brethren and others.

I by death shall obteyne fame, glozy, and renowne, and escape the reprehension of cowardnesse, and the mote of all infamie, which I might haue chaunced to haue fallen into, if nature had lenger prolonged my lyfe and dayes: for it is commonly sayd, that as tyme chaungeth, so maners and condicions alter, and in long tyme, all thinges continue not in one state. But as eternitie is the tryumphet vpon tyme, so do I trust that after this short life to haue eternall beyng: And after this miserable pilgrimage, myne hope is to enjoy the celestiall Kingdome, and to come to the Palace of rest, & place of quietnesse.

Nowe as touchyng you (no doubt but this my sodeyne chaunce molesteth you) and not without a cause: You lament the calamitie and mischaunce that is like to fall in your Countrie, because that I in this troublesome time leaue you destitute of a Governour and Ruler, which chaunce is the lesse to be moned and regarded, because in all worldly thinges, somethyng euer lacketh, and nothing long endureth: wherefore, because the olde sayng is, that in the time of necessitie, wit and wisdom is to be experimented, therefore I require you to consult, and to studie and take paine to come to the ende of the iourney, which I in my time haue begon and entered in, and chietely because I haue euer loued and trusted you aboue all other persons: And therefore I desire you nowe to shewe like loue, and to be as trustie to my sonne that shall be your soueraigne Lorde: So that whatsoeuer dutie, allegiaunce, or fauor for my liberalitie or kindenesse to you shewed, was to me eyther of honestie or ciuilitie due or owyng: Let the same for my sake, be extended, & rewed and recompenced to mine heyre and successor little Prince Henry. Some persons haue hated the father, and yet loued the childe, and some haue loued the father, and yet murdered the childe, of which sort I neyther recon nor accompt you: But this I say, if you loue me, ye ought to loue my childe, not for hys desert, but for myne. And sith nowe I shall be taken from you before satisfaction or recompence be made vnto me for my manifolde goodnesse and ample benefites to you shewed in my lyfe: I say and affirme, that after my death (except you will be noted with the blot of ingratitude, I will not say vnto truth) you ought to render the same to my childe your Nephewe and kinsman: I pray God that ye do not defraude me of the good expectation that I haue euer had of you. And because I will not charge you, I will therefore friendly exhort you, to bring by my little infant in vertuous liuyng, morall doctrine, and prudent pollicie, to the entent that by your paine he may proue wise, by your instruction he may proue polittique, and made able to rule and gouerne a kingdome, and not to be ruled of other: By the which deuoir you shall not onely do your duetie to your Prince and soueraigne Lorde, but also deserue thanks of your natie Countrie, to the which ye are most specially bounde. Besides this, my petition is not onely to comfort my most deere and welbeloued wife the Queene, nowe beyng (as I thinke, the most dolourous and sorowfullest woman liuyng) but also to loue her and honour her, as I haue both loued and honoured you.

And as touchyng the estate of my realmes: First I commaund you to loue and ioyne together in one league or concord, and in one vnfayned amitie, keepyng continuall peace and amitie with Philip Duke of Burgoyne. And neuer make treatie with Charles that calleth himselfe Dolphyn of Wicn, by the which any part of the crowne of Fraunce, or of the Duchie of Normandie and and Guyan may be appayzed or diminished. Let the Duke of Orleans and the other Princes still remaine prisoners, vntill my sonne come to his lawfull age, least they returnyng home againe, may kinde more fire in one day, then may well be quenched in thre. If you thinke it necessarie, I would my brother Montrey should be Protector of England, during the minority of my childe, prohibityng him once to passe out of the realme. And my brother of Bedford with the helpe of the Duke of Burgoyne, I will shall rule and be Regent of the realme of Fraunce, commaundyng him with fire & sword to persecute Charles callyng himselfe Dolphin, to the entent either to bring him to reason & obeyfaunce, or to driue and expell him out of the realme of Fraunce, admonishing you to lose no tyme, nor to spare no cost in recoueryng of that which to you now is offered. And finally whatsoeuer I haue gotten, or you shall obteyne, I charge you kepe it, I commaund you to defend it, and I desire you to nourishe it: For experience teacheth, that there is no lesse prayse to be geuen to the keper, then to the getter, for verely gettyng is a chaunce, but keepyng is wisdom.

The noble men present promised to obserue his precepts, and performe his desires: But their heartes were so pensue and so replenished with dolor, that no one without wepyng could behold the other, and the next day folowyng he ended his life in this world, beyng the last day of August. 1422.

This Prince was the noblest king that euer reigned ouer the realme of England, his famous prowes and martiall actes were suche, as bewtifed and glorified all this region: But when his death was knowen to the common people, no estate from the highest to the lowest, but cryed out and lamented that most infortunate and vntimely death. For he was beloued of all, and disceyned nor hated of none, no not of his very enemies, who also spake most honourably of him. But nowe as his death put great feare in the heartes of Englishe men for the atchyuyng of the enterprize of the conquest of Fraunce: So the same did encourage the french enemies that they ensured themselves to gaine, and get againe whatsoeuer before they had lost, as in dedde in the sequelle of this Historie it will to plainly appere. And the decease and sodeine death of this noble Prince is by diuers wryters, dyuerly reported: some say he was poysoned, and to say truth, that might be so, for vndoubtedly the french men, namely the Dolphyn, feared the vtter ouerthrow and losse of his inheritance of the realme of Fraunce, as it was most like if God had geuen this Prince longer life, and therefore whatsoeuer the sayde Dolphyn could by any french practise do or attempt for his destruction, it was not left vndone. Some other wryte it was of a Palsey and a crampe: But other that seemeth herein to wryte most nere the truth, say that it was of a Plurisis, which at that tyme was so rare a sicknesse and so straunge a disease, that the same to the most part of men was vnknewen, and Physitians beyng little acquainted therewith, knewe no present remedy for the same. This king reigned .ix. yeres. v. monethes, and .xxiiiij. dayes, & liued not, saith Hall, full .xxv. yeres, and Polidore sayth he liued but .xxviij. yeres. Of stature he was somewhat tall, more than the common sort. Of bodie he was slender, and somewhat leane, well membred, and strongly made, a goodly countenance, but somewhat long necked, blacke heared, stoufe of stomacke, and eloquent of tongue, and in Martiall affayres so valiaunt, as neuer was there any worthy of more prayse for his traueyles and victories in so short tyme.

His bodie beyng enbawmed was conueighed with all funerall pompe from Boys de Vincennes to Paris, and so to Rhoan, to Abbeville, to Calice, to Douer, and so through London to Westminster, where among his noble progenitours he was enterred.

And shortly after this solempne buriall, his sorowfull Queene returned into England, and kept her estate with the yong king her sonne.

Henrye the sixt.

When certain knowledge of the death of king Henry the fift, was brought into Englande, then Thomas Duke of Excester, and Henry Bishop of Wynchester, brethren vnto the king deceased, and Uncles vnto the yong Prince, calling together the other Lordes of the counsaile, did cause their yong Nephewe Prince Henry beyng then about the age of. ix. Moneths with sounde of Trumpets openly to be proclaymed king of England, & of Fraunce, the last daye of August. 1422. by the name of king Henry the sixte, to the great comfort and reioysing of all the Englishe Nation.

Shortly after the Duke of Gloucester returned into Englande, and first of all he called all the Lordes of the counsaile and nobles of the realme, and declared vnto them the last will and Testament of king Henry his brother, and what was his commaundement: By reason whereof he was chosen and named Protectour of the Realme of Englande. Which office when he had taken vpon him, he forthwith ioyned vnto him as counsaillers the grauest, noblest, and wisest in the realme, and first tooke order for the stay of all things within this realme of England, and then with all speede prouided for all things necessarie for the warre for the conquest of Fraunce, and appointed valiaunt and expert Captaynes that should be in a readynesse when oportunitie of time required. And besides thys, he by all politique meanes, gathered great sommes of money, and left nothing vndone that should aduaunce his pretended purpose.

Whyle these things were thus deuysed within the realme of England, the Duke of Bedford Regent of Fraunce, no lesse studied and tooke paine, to keepe and order the countries and regions by king Henry late conquered and gayned, and also determined not to leaue of from daylie warre and continuall trauayle till the time that Charles the Dolphyn (which was now a flote, because king Charles his father in the Moneth of October this present yere, was departed to God,) were eyther subdued or brought to due obeyssaunce. And surely the death of this king Charles caused many alterations and chaunges in the realme of Fraunce, for a great parte of the nobilitie which then eyther for feare of the puissance of the Englishe men, or for to please and folowe the minde and appetite of Charles the Frenche king, took parte with king Henry against the Dolphyn: Hering now of the french kings death, returned from the Englishe parte and adioyned themselves to the company of the Dolphyn, and diligently studied howe to vanquish and drive away the Englishe nation out of the territorie of Fraunce.

The Duke of Bedford beyng greatly moued with these sodaine chaunges, forsteyed his towne both with Garrisons and munitions, and assembled together a great armie both of Englishe men and Normans, to whom he made a long Oration, admonishyng them to obserue and keepe their othe and faith (which they had made to the late king Henry and his heires) inviolate and vnbroken, wylling them in no wise to be the occasioners or counsaillers that yong king Henry should be deprived from his fathers lawful inheritaunce, by the hatred of certayne Traytors Frenchmen, which had renewed the olde hatred being of late extinct betwene the realmes of England and of Fraunce, and studied to set all things agayne in a broyle: requiring them also to call to their memoire how that the realmes of England & of Fraunce, the two most famous regions of all Europe, by the benefite of almightie God were of late so vniited, connered, & ioyned together in an eternall league and composition, & so strongly established, that no worldly power were able or of puissance sufficient, to resist or withstande the malice of the same: And although sometimes by chaunce of warre the losse might turne on their parte, yet in conclusion the detriment should be recovered, and a surplusage gayned. And if (according to their bounden duties) they would honoz, serue and loue yong king Henry their souereigne Lorde, and would diligently persecute and set on his enimies, they should not onely shew themselves true and faythfull subjects to their true and vndoubted king: But also should for their fidelitie and good seruice receiue of him condigne rewarde, cure and besides immortall fame and renowne.

This exhortation stayed the heartes of many of the french Capitaynes, which wyllingly sware to king Henry feaultie and obedience, by whose example the commonaltie did the same. Thus all the people set in an order in the realme of Fraunce, nothing was minded but warre, and nothing was spoken of but conquest.

The Dolphyn which lay at this time in the Citie of Boytiers heering of the death of his parent, had his heart mixed both with ioye and sorow: for notwithstanding that he was sorowfull, as a naturall childe which lamented the death of his father, yet he was ioyous that power and princely estate was nowe to him happened, by the which he iudged that he should be the more able to defende his enemies and recover more friends: and so calling together the princes of his faction, caused himselfe to be proclaymed king of Fraunce, by the name of Charles the. vij. And then being in good hope of recoueryng his patrimony and expelling his enemies, with a haute courage prepared warre, and assembled together a great armie, and first the warre beganne by light skirmishes, but after it proceeded into mayne battles. The Dolphyn thinking not to make long delays in so great a cause, lest the power of his enemies might daylie be augmented, sent the Lorde Granuile

Pount Melance recovered againe by the Englishmen.

Dumfrey Duke of Gloucester married Jaquet the wyfe of John Duke of Brabant.

Grample to the towne of Pount Melance standing on the river of Seyne, which so sodainely came to the same, that he was on the walles or the souldiours within heard of his approche, and so he tooke the towne, and slue a great number of the English souldiours.

When the Regent of Fraunce was aduertised of thys sodayne enterprize, he appointed the Lorde Thomas Montacute Erle of Salisburie, a man both for his great pollicie and haute courage, moze to be compared to the olde balyaunt Romaynes, then to men of his dayes, accompanied with the Erle of Suffolke, the Lorde Scales, the young Lorde Dounynges, Sir John fastolffe Mayster of the household with the sayde Lorde Regent, and dyuers other to besiege the towne of Pount Melance, which after two Moneths was rendred to the sayde Erle: and the Lorde of Granuile sware to be true to the king of Englande ever after that day, but shortly after he forgetting his othe, returned to his olde Mayster agayne. The Erle of Salisburie appointed Sir Henry Mortimer, and syr Richard Vernon to be Captaines of that towne. And from thence departed into Champaigne, and there besieged the towne of Sens, and tooke syr Guillam Maryn the Captayne and slue all the Souldiours within the towne, and made there Capitaynes Sir Hugh Seddyng, and Sir Richard Abwemond.

The Parisians, which ever like the Wethercoke be variable and inconstant, perceyuing that the Dolphyn daylie begame to haue moze ayde and power, then he was before accustomed, trustyng to returne againe vnder his obeyfance and subiection (which they both wished and desired) to the entent that it should not appere to come of their desire, and that their fayth and fidelitic should not be put in the Balauce of diffidence with the English nation, sent diuers Senators of their Citie as Ambassadors to the king of England, desyryng him of aide and succour, to whom not onely great thanks were rendred for doying their duetie of subiection, but also high feastes were made, and promises declared, that if they still continued in due obeyfance, and were not adherent to the kings enemies, that neyther succour shoulde want, nor cost should be spared for their common comfort, and publike utilitie. With which aunswere the company outwardly pleased (whatsoeuer they inwardly imagined) departed to Paris. In this season Dumfrey Duke of Gloucester eyther blynded with ambition or dotting for loue, married the Lady Jaquet or Jacomin daughter and sole heire to Wylliam of Bavier Duke of Holland, which was lawfull wyfe to John Duke of Brabant then lyving, which mariage chaunced much to his dishonor. For surely the sweete tast of this pleasaunt mariage, brought after a sower sauce, both to the amorous husbände, and to the wanton wyfe. For John Duke of Brabant, what with force, and what with spirituall compulfaries, neuer left of, till he had recovered his Lady out of the Duke of Gloucesters possession, as after you shall here.

And in this present yere the West gate of London, now called Newgate, which before was an vgly and filthy Dongeon, was now newly builded at the charges and expences of Richard Whytingdon, late Alderman and Maiour of London, by the handes of his Executors.

These chaunces thus happenyng as you haue heard, John Duke of Bedford, Philip Duke of Burgoyne, and John Duke of Britaine, made an an assemble and friendly enteruiewe in the Citie of Amias, where they renewed the old league and auncient amitie made betwene the noble prince king Henry the sixt, and them before concluded: addyng thereto these conditions and agrements, eche of them to be to other both friend and ayder, and the enemye of the one to be enemye to the other, and all they to be both friendes and ayders to the king of England, and well wylling to hys well wyllers, and auengers of his aduersaries. And because that affinitie is an embracer of amitie, there was concluded a mariage betwene the Duke of Bedford, and the Ladie Anne sister to the Duke of Burgoyne. When these agrements were finished, the Duke of Bedford departed to Troyes in Champaign, wherether with high pompe was conueyed the Lady Anne of Burgoyne, which in the presence of her brother and her Uncle Duke of Brabant, and of the Erles of Salisburie and Suffolke, and of nine hundred Lordes, knightes and Esquires, he was married to John Duke of Bedford, with such solempnitie, feart and triumph, as before that time had not bene sene of the Burgonions.

During this triumph, the Parisians thinking to blinde the eyes of the Duke of Bedford wrote to hym, howe diuers Castels and fortresses lyeng round about their territorie, were replenished with his enemies dayly stoppyng their passages, and robbing their marchantes, to their vtter vndoing, if they by his helpe were not relieved: fraudulently meaning, and falsely enticing him to absent himselfe from them, till their craftie conueyed purpose were compassed and atchiued. For diuers of them stubberly bearing the yoke and subiection of the English nation, perceyuing the Duke of Bedford and the principall Capitaines of the English men to be farre from Paris, employeng themselves to ioy and solace, for the honor of this high mariage, conspired to bring into the Citie, Charles the Dolphyn, callyng himselfe french king. And to the entent that their inuented purpose should succede, they thereof aduertised the Dolphyn and his counsaile, appoynting the day of his coming, and the time of his entrie. But the Duke of Bedford was informed of all their secret confederacie and sedicious faction, wherefore he meaning not to lose in short time that which in no small space was gayned, put spurres to the horse, and with a great power entered into Paris one day before the fayze was appointed, and two nightes before the looking for of his enemies, who being vnprovidid, he sodainely caused to be apprehended and taken, and openly put to execution. After this ieopardie thus escaped, he put diffidence in all the Parisians, trusting little the Nobles, and geuing lesse credite to the comons, determined to fortifie the garrisons of his awne nation, and all the Castels neere and adioyning to the Citie, which within small time were abundantly furnished. And to auoyde all night watchers adioyning to Paris, and the confines of the same, he first tooke into his possession, eyther by assaulte or composition the towne of Trayneil and Bray vpon Seyne, and because two Castels the one called Dacy, and the other called Cursay were also euill neighbors to the Parisians, he sent Sir John fastolffe great master of his household, with a notable armie to besiege the Castell of Dacy, which takyng vpon him that enterprize, so handeled his enemies, that the Capitayne named Guillam Keymon Esquire, and all the garrison yeelded them simply to his mercy and discretion, whome he sent as prisoners to the City of Paris, and after besieged the Castell of Cursay, which to

to him was shortly rendered upon like appointment, and so with praye and prisoners he returned to the Lorde of Bedford his Master. In this berie season the Dolphyn sent Lorde William Stuard, Constable of Scotland, and the Erle of Ventadoze in Auergne, and many other nobles of his parte, to lay siege to the towne of Crauant, in the Countie of Auxerre within the partes of Burgoyne, whereof hering the Lorde Regent, and the Duke of Burgoyne, they assembled a great armie, to the number of. xv. thousand, whereof the Erle of Salisburie was ordeyned Captaine, which came in good array to gene battayle to the besiegers of the towne of Crauant, and because the ryuer of Yonne which runneth by the sayde towne, was betwene the Englishe armie and their aduersaries, they coude not well assaile their enemies, which defended the bankes and passages very strongly, yet notwithstanding both horsemen and footemen of the Englishe parte, courageously put themselves into the ryuer, and wyth fine force recouered the banke, tohome the Burgonions incontinent folowed. When they were all gotten into the playne, the Archers shot, and the Bilmen strake, and long was the fight in indifferent iudgement, but in conclusion the frenche men not able to resist the force nor puyssaunce of the Englishe Nation, were taken, cyther slayne or discomfited, for in that mortall battayle were slayne and taken to the number of eyght thousand men, wherof was slayne of English men. xxi. C.

After this fortunate victorie obteyned, the English men entered into the towne of Crauant, much prayng the doynges of the Capteynes, and the fidelitie of the Citizens, and when they had set all thinges in an order, they returned to Paris, where of the Regent they were ioyously receiued, which there constituted the Erle of Sarisbury (as he was wel worthy) Vicegerent and Lieutenant for the king and him in the Countie of Fraunce, Bry, and Champaine, and Sir John Fastolfe he substituted Deputie vnder him in the Duchie of Normandie on this side the riuer of Seyne, and with that he deputed him gouernoz of the Countie of Aniew and Mayne, and assigned able Capteynes in euery holde and forresse. The Erle of Sarisbury which could not scepe in his great office of trust, layde siege to the towne and Castell of Mountaguilon in Brie, whereof were Capteynes, Pregelent of Cotyn, and Guille Bourgoys Britons, which valiantly defended the Castell by the space of fiue monethes, but in conclusion the assaylantes were so fierce that they within for sauegarde of their lyues rendred the holde, and the Capteynes sware neuer to bere armure agaynst the Englishe men on this syde the riuer of Leyre: durynge which siege, the Erle of Suffolke toke by force the Castell of Coucy: and the strong Castell de la Roche he gat by appoyntment in Mosconoy.

Nowe must I go backe to put you in memorie howe James king of Scottes, beyng both prisoner in the time of king Henry the fourth, and also as subiect to king Henrype the fift his sonne, seruyng him in his warres in Fraunce till he departed out of this transitorie life at Boys de Vincens, and so as chiefe Mourner attended on the Corps of the sayd decessed king, vnto his buriall, and after at Westminster was released of his Captiuitie, and restored to his realme and possession. For the true knowlege thereof, you shall vnderstand that England demaunded a smal raunsome for so great a prince, as the Scottes accompt their king (and the Scottes were neither able, nor offered offered no somme conuenient) wherefore the counsaile of the realme of England grauously pondered, and wisely considered, that if by coniunction of marriage, England and Scotland were perfectly knit in one, that the indissoluble bande of amitie betweene the frenche and Scottishe Nations should be shortly broken and dissolued. Wherefore the protector of the realme of England by the consent of the whole Baronage of the same, gaue to him in marriage the Ladie Jane, daughter to John Erle of Sommerset decessed, not onely sister to John then Duke of Sommerset, but also Cousin Germain remoued to the King, and Niece to the Cardinall of Winchester, and the Duke of Breter.

The King of Scottes hauyng a great affection to this sayre Ladie, but much more desirynge his deliuerance and libertie, put in hostages for the redempcion of his raunsome, because a great part thereof was diminished and abated for the money allowed to him for his marriage, and so was deliuered to depart at his pleasure. Alack, the olde proverbes be to true: an Ape although he be clothed in purple, will be but an Ape, and a Scot neuer so gently enterpeyned of an Englishe prince, will be but a dissemblyng Scot. What kindnesse could be more shewed to a prisoner, then to bring him by in good literature? what loue may be more declared to a captiue, then to instruct him in martiall feates, and warlike assayzes? what fauour can be more ascribed to a highe and renoumed prince, then to geue in marriage to his vnderlyng and vassall, his Cousyn and kinswoman of his royall parentage lawfully descended. All these kindnesse sufficed not, nor all these gratuities anayled not to make this king James friendly to the realme of Englande. For he notwithstanding his homage done to the yong Henry king of England, and of Fraunce, at his Castell of Windsor this present yere, before three Dukes, two Archbishops. iij. Erles. x. Bishops. xx. Barons, and two. C. knightes and Esquiers and mo, accordyng to the tenor hereafter folowynge.

I James Stuart king of Scottes, shall be true and faythfull vnto you Lorde Henry, by the grace of God king of England and Fraunce, the noble and superior Lorde of the Kingdome of Scotland, and vnto you I make my fidelitie for the same kingdome of Scotland, which I hold and claime to hold of you, and I shall beare you my fayth and fidelitie of life and lim, and worldly honour agaynst all men, and faithfully I shall knowlege, and shall do to you service due to the kingdome of Scotland aforesayde. So God helpe me and these holy Euangelistes.

Neither regardyng his othe, nor esteemyng the great abundaunce of plate and riches, to him by the mother and vncler of his wife liberally geuen, and friendly deliuered (of which sort of richesse fewe or none before that day were euer seene in the Countie of Scotlande) like a dogge which hath cast by his stomacke and returneth to his bomyt, or like a snake which after hys engendryng with a Lampray, taketh agayne his olde popson: After he had once taken the ayre, and smelled the sent of the Scottishe soyle, became like his fraudulent torefather, an vntrue Prince, and like his proude progenitors toke the ymage of a braggyng and boastyng Scot, newly alied himselfe with the frenche Nation. And yet whatsoeuer he did, his Nation both write and testifie, that by the learnyng which he by the great benefite of the kinges of England durynge his Captiuitie in this realme had obteyned, replenished his his Countre with good litterature, and by the nurture the which he was brought by in Englande, he brought his people to civillitie: So that his captivitie was to his Nation the greatest libertie that ever they could have, delivring them from blinde ignorance, to excellent knowlege, reducing them from bestiall maners, to honest behaviour, and in conclusion causyng them to knowe vertue from vice, pollicie from rudenesse, and humaine honestie from wilde and beastly liuyng. This was the deliveraunce and the doynges of James the first of that name king of Scottes, which neither reigned verie quietly, nor yet ever favoured Englishe men before the French people: sayyng that he hauyng with him into his countre a yong Gentleman of Northumberland called Andreto Gray (which duryng his captivitie was hys companion) promoted him to the mariage of the heyre of the Lorde of Foules in Anguis, of the which the Lord Grayes of Scotland at this day do descende.

Nowe to returne to the affayres of England. The Duke of Gloucester beyng Protector and Governour of the realme, called to him the peeres and nobility of the realme, and by their agrementes & deuises sent into Fraunce to the Regent his brother ten thousand men of warre, which were of the same Regent in the Countre of Paris louyngly receyued, and accordyng to their degrees honestly enterteyned. During their liuyng in Paris, diuers chaunces happened in Fraunce, for euen as Englishe men valiantly woune, and victoriously conquered towne and Castels with open warre and apparant conquest: so the Frenchemen fraudulently stole, and couertly obteyned diuerse fortresses and holdes, apperteinyng to the Englishe faction, and in especiall the fayre towne of Champaigne, and the pretie towne of Crotoy.

When the Duke of Bedford was aduertised of these craftie trickes and sodeine inuented traynes, he sent forth an armie, first to Compaigne, wherof was Capteine the Erle of Suffolke, accompanied with the Erle of Ligny, and diuerse other Capteines of the English men, which lay on the one side of the river of Somme, and on the other syde lay the Lord Lisleadam, sir Thomas Raupstone, and the prouost of Paris. The Frenchmen beyng strongly furnished and well victualled, couragiously defended the towne agaynst the assailantes. The Englishe men perceyving that Guillam Remond otherwise called Mariolayn, had beene the leader of the Souldiours within the towne, which before at Paris was taken prisoner by sir John Fastolfe, caused him to be sent for to Paris, and so brought him to the siege, and set him in a Chariot with a halter about his necke, and coueyed him to the Gibbet without the towne, sendyng worde to the garrison within the towne, that if they would not without delay render the towne and fortresse, they would incontinent strangle their olde Capteine and chiefe conductor. The Souldiours within the towne perceyving that if Guillam Raymond the onely trust of their reliefe, and the aunient friend in their necessitie should suffer death, that then their hope of all ayde were extinguished: and therefore for deliveraunce of him and sauegarde of themselves, they yelded the towne: so that both he and they might depart with horse and harnesse onely, in sure conduite and safetie: yet long or the towne of Compaigne was delivered, Sir Philip Hall, which was sent to Crotoy by the Lord Regent, with. viij. hundred men to besiege the towne, gat it by assault sodeinly, or the Frenchmen had eyther disposed their garrison, or appoynted their lodgynges, and tooke all the men of

of warre, & put them to ransom. And so these two towne cowardly stolen, were manfully recovered, but yet the writers of French fables that do deface the glory of the Englishe, write & say that these towne were yelded to the Burgonians, which neither had the keyyng of them, nor were souldiours to any other person but to the king of England. While these thinges were thus doying in Fraunce, Sir John de la Pole, brother to the Erle of Suffolke, Capteine of Aranches in Normandie, assembled all the garrisons of the base Marches of the Countre of Anio, and came before the Citie of Angiers, and bent the suburbs, spoyled and destroyed the whole Countre, and hauing as many prayes and prisoners as his men might carpe, he was encountred by the Erle of Armerle, the Vicont Arbone, and sixe thousand Frenchmen: which findyng the Englishe men out of array because of the carriage of their great spoyle, sodeinly set on them, and slue thre hundred persons, and tooke prisoners the saide Sir John delapoole, Sir John Basset, John Aulford Lieutenant of Faloy, John Clifton, Henry Mortimer, and sixe hundred other. Although the Frenchmen gate this day in one place, yet they went not victors away in another, for the Bastard de la Baulme, and the Lorde Craignar Capteines of Courrallon with a great band, made a roade into Halconnoys, with whome by chaunce met Mathew Gough, and other Englishe men which were scouryng the Countre, to see and here newes of their enemies, there was a sore conflict, and an hard encounter, the partes in maner beyng of courage and number egal, but after long fight, the French men almost all were slaine and taken, and the Bastard beyng well horsed fled, after whome folowed with the fiercenesse of his spurre Mathewe Gough, and chased him to his Castell gate, and there tooke him as he would haue hid him in the ditch, and presented him to the Erle of Sarisbury, returnyng from Compaigne to Paris, which not only gaue to him the rightes belongyng to the prisoner, but also rewarded him with a goodly Courser, and highly exalted his name and manhoode.

About this season, Arthur brother to John Duke of Briteyn commonly called the Erle of Richemond, hauyng neither profite of the name nor of the Countre, notwithstanding that king Henry the fift had created him Erle of Pury in Normandie, and gaue him not onely a great pension, but the same towne of Pury: yet because his brother the Duke of Briteyne fearyng the Englishe men now hauyng Normandie, would smell and desyre to taste the sweete soyle of Briteyn, was late (contrary to his league and othe) returned to the part of Charles the Dolphyn, he likewise returned and craftely without cause fled into Flaundy, and so came to the Dolphyn to Hoytiers, which was more glad of his commyng then if he had gayned a C. M. crownes, for the Britons which kept the towne and Castell of Pury, hearyng that their maister was ioyned with the Dolphyn, both kept the Castell agaynst the Duke of Bedford, furnisbyng it dayly with newe people and munitions, and also bered, spoyled, and robbed the Countre adioynyng, doying to the Englishe men the most hurt and Dammage that could be deuised or imagined.

The Lorde Regent being aduertised of all these troubles and calamities, assembled a great armie both of Englishe men and Normans, entenyng to serch the Dolphyn in every part, to the entent to geue him battaile in a pitched field, and so to make a finall ende of his intended conquest. So ha-

uing in his company of Erles, knightes and Esquiers to the number (as the frenche writers testifie) of .xviij. hundred men of armes, and eyght thousand Archers and other, came before the towne of Pury, which was well defended: but the Englishe men beganne to vndermine the wallles, so that they within were glad to render the towne vpon condition, which was taken. Howbeit the Capitaynes of the Castell promised to yeelde, if their fortresse were not rescued at a daye assigned by the Dolphyn, with a number sufficient to rayse the siege, and vpon this promise hostages were deliuered into the possession of the Lorde Regent. By his lycence an Herault was sent to the Dolphyn, to aduertise him of the time determined, the which heryng of the distresse that his people and friendes were in, sent incontinent John Duke of Alanfon his Lieutenant generall, the Erle Douglas whome at that setting forth he made Duke of Corayne, and the Erle Boughan, whom then in hope of good speede, he made Constable of Fraunce (which office he enioyed not fully an hundred houres,) and the Erles of Amuric, Vantadoure, Tonnerre, Maulieuriet, Forest, the Vicountes of Harbon and Chouars, the Lordes of Granuyle, Caules, Malycorne, Manny, Ballap, Fountaynes, Mountfort, and many other noble knightes and Esquiers, to the number of .xv. M. french men and Britons, and .v. M. Scottes, whom the Erles of Douglas had transported late out of Scotland, more for mercede then for loue.

Thys armie royall approached within two Miles of Pury, and sent .xl. light horsemen to view and espie both the number and conduit of the English men. These spies came very nere to the siege, and were espied and chaced to their companions agayne, and declared all what they had seene and perceyued. The Duke of Alanfon seing that he could not get any auantage of the English men, (although the Dolphyn had geuen him in straight commaundement to fight with the Regent) whether his heart fayled or he thought to wayte a more fortunate season for his purpose and enterpryse, retired back with his whole army to the towne of Veruoyle in Berche, which belenged to the king of Englande, and sent worde to the garrison of that towne, that they had discomfited and slayne all the Englishe armie, and that the Regent with a small number, by swiftnesse of his horse had saued himselfe. The inhabitants of Veruoyle geuing to light credence to the frenche fables, receyued the Duke of Alanfon with all his armie into the towne, and submitted themselves to him, which towne he desyred to haue of the gift of the Dolphyn as his owne inheritaunce and lawfull patrimony. Now approached the day of rescous of Pury, which was the day of our Lady the Assumptiō, at which day, no rescous appered to s<sup>r</sup> Gerrard de la Pallier Capitaine of the Castell, which beyng in dispayre of all ayde and comfort, presented the keyes to the Duke of Bedford, and shewed him a letter signed and sealed with the handes of .xviij. great Lordes, which the daye before promised to geue the Duke battayle, and to dissolue the siege and raise the assaulte: well sayde the Duke, if their hartes would haue serued, their p<sup>r</sup>ysse was sufficient once to haue profered, or to haue performed thys faythfull promise. But sith they disdaine to seeke me, God and saint George wylling I shall not desist to folowe the tractes of their horses tyll one parte of vs be by battayle ouerthrowne: and so he gaue a safeconduyt to the Capitayne and other

which would departe, but many of the Britons within the Castell of Pury, seing the faint hartes, and the false promises of the flattering french men, submitted themselves to the Lorde Regent, and swore to be true to the king and him, whome he gently accepted, and put them in wages.

Then he furnished the Castell and towne with a newe garrison, and incontinent he sent the Erle of Suffolke with sixe hundred horses, to espie where the french men were lodged, which passed by Dampeuille, and came to Brelmel, where he heard newes that the french men had taken Veruoyle in Berche, and were there yet abyding, whereof with all diligent celeritie, he sent worde to the Duke of Bedford, which not minding to leese his long desired pray, set forward in great haste toward their enimies. The french men heryng of his comming, set their people in array, & made all one maine battayle wythout forward or reeward, and appointed certayne Lumbards and horsemen to breake the array of the Englishe men eyther behinde, or at the sides, whereof was Capitayne S<sup>r</sup> Stephyn Venoyles, called the hier. The Duke of Bedford, not ignoraunt howe to order his men, made likewise an entier battayle, and suffered no man to be on horseback, and set the archers (euery one hauyng a sharpe stake) both in the front of the battayle, and on the sides lyke wings, and behinde the battayle were the pages with the Chariottes and cariages, and all the horses were tyed together eyther with the reines of their bridles or by the tayles, to the entent that their enimies should not sodainely surprize or disturbe them on the back behinde: and for to defend the cariages were appointed two thousand archers. The french men at the first sight remembryng howe often times in pitched fieldes they had bene ouercome and banquished of the Englishe nation, beganne somewhat to feare, but when they sawe no remedy but to fight, they tooke good courage to them, and set softly forward. In which marchyng the Duke of Alanfon, sytting on horseback, did with many good wordes encourage his Capitaynes and Souldiours to the battayle.

And in lyke maner the Duke of Bedford encouraged his people, and forthwith they gaue the onset vpon their enimies, cryeng, Saint George, Bedford. And the french men likewise cryed, Mount ioy, saint Denise. Then the arrowes flewe out of the long bowes on the one parte, the quarrels out of the Crosse bowes on the other parte. After they came to hande strokes: great was the fight, and terrible was the battayle, with so indifferent iudgement of victorie, that no Herault could determine to which parte fortune most shewed her louyng countenaunce. For on both sides men were slayne and wounded, and on both partes some were felled and recouered, thus stil in a doubtfull iudgement the battaile continued about three houres. The Duke of Alanfon in the meane season neuer ceased to exhort and pray his people manly to fight, and not to suffer their enimies, (which were at the berie point to be ouercome) by their faint hartes to be victors, and ouercomers. Lykewise the Duke of Bedford rode about his armie, refreshing the weake with freshe men, and encoraging hys people with most pleasaunt wordes: But at the laste, when he perceiued the frenchmen, what with heate, and with trauayle, to waxe wearie and faint, and not to be so freshe as they were before (for surely the nature of the frenchmen is not to labo<sup>r</sup> long in fighting, and much more braggeth then fighteth) he with all hys strength set incontinent on them with suche a violence, that they bare them downe to the grounde by fine force. The french horsemen that daye did little seruice: for the archers so galled their horses, that they desyred not much to appproch their presence. In this battayle were slaine by reporte of Moniop king at armes in Fraunce, and the Englishe Heraulds there present, of frenche men and Scottes. ix. thousand and seauen hundred, and of the Englishe men. xxi. C. but no man of name, sauyng fivie yong Esquiers. And there were taken prisoners, John Duke of Alaunson, the Bastarde of Alaunson, the Lorde of Fayect, the Lorde of Hornit, Sir Piers Harrison, Sir Loys de Wancorte, Sir Robert Busslet, Sir John Turnebull a Scot, and two hundred Gentlemen, besides common Souldiours.

After that the Duke of Bedford had thus obtayned the upper hande of his enemies, and discomfited the onely strength of the Dolphyn. Then he commaunded all the frenchmen within the towne of Vernoyle, to go out and depart, or else to abide their aduventure. They perceyving the euill successe of their boasting enterprise, and seing no meane, whereby in so lowe an ebbe they might be ayded, deliuered by the towne, and went forth out of the same, their lyues saued. Of which towne the Lord Regent constituted Captayne by Phillip Hall, and so departed from thence to the Citie of Roan; where with triumph (and not bntworthy) he was ioyously receyued and honourably feasted. And after all thinges there set in an order, he remooued to Paris.

When this victorie was published through Fraunce: The Dolphyn was driven out of all þ Countries apperteynyng to the crowne of Fraunce, and might resort to no Countries except to Bourbonys, Aluerne, Berry, Boycton, Combrain, a part of Anioy, and Barrain, and Languedoc. And because cause diuerse of his friendes, which were aduocates in Paris, exiled themselves from the Parliament of Paris, which was with all rightes, and iurisdictiones thereunto belongyng, kept, and holden in the name of king Henry the sixt, as lawfull heire, and very king of the realme of Fraunce: he therefore to shewe himselfe as a king, erected his court of parliament, his Chauncery, and all other Courts in the Citie of Boytiers, and there established his great seale, with all due circumstances thereunto apperteynyng, which there continued by the space of. xiiij. yeres, as you shall after here declared. The Duke of Bedford lying at Paris, entendyng there to bring to obeyssaunce Charles the Dolphin, or else to drive him out of his little Comie holes, and small countries, sent the Lorde Scales, Sir John Montgomerie, Sir John Fastolf, with two thousand men, to conquere the Countries of Anioy and Mayne, which without assault had rendered to them the strong Castelles of Beamoût le Vicont, Teune, Silly, Osle, Courceriers, Rouilly, Masse, Coueteuenant, and twentie other, which for prolixitie of time, I thinke necessary to be omitted. For surely the Englishe pyssaunce was so tryed, proued, assayed, and spred abroad throughtout all Fraunce, that the frenchmen thought that in conclusion the Englishe men would haue, or should haue all thinges, whiche they either wished or enterprised. The Duke of Bedford yet thirteyng after more good fortune, sent the Erle of Sarisbury, with a great armie accompanied with the Lord Scales, and other approued Capteynes, (whose names you haue heard before) into the Countrie of Anioy and Mayne, which were euill neighbours to the Duchie of Normandie: In which armie were ten thousand men of warre, or there about. These lustie Capteynes entered first into the Countrie of Mayne, and besieged the riche and strong Citie of Mauns, the chiefe towne and empery of all that Countrie and region. And although the Citezens, aswell for the sodaine accesse of their enemies, as for the feare of the name of the Erle of Sarisbury (which was both dread of his enemies, and honoured of his friends) were somewhat amazed and astonied: Yet their Capteynes named sir Baldwyn of Champaigne Lorde of Coisse, Sir Guillian de Harignie, and Sir Hughe de Gooz, studied and inuented all wayes possible howe to defend themselves, and to do damage and harme to their enemies: and surely, they had within the towne a crewe and a companie of warlike and practised souldiours. The Englishe men approached as nyght to the walles as they might without their losse and detriment, and shot agaynst their walles great stones out of great Goonnes (which kinde of engines before that tyme, was very little seene or hearde of in Fraunce,) the strokes whereof so shaked, crushed and riued the walles, that within fewe dayes, the Citie was dispoyled of all her towres and outward defences. The Citezens of Mauns much marueilyng at these newe orgaynes, both seeryng their destruction imminent, and desperate of all ayde and succour, offered the towne vpon this condicion: that all persons which would tary within the towne might abyde, and all that would depart with horse and harrisse onely, should be permitted: which offers were accepted, and the towne rendered, whereof the Erle made Capteyne the Erle of Suffolke, and his Lieutenant Sir John Fastolfe. After this the sayd Erle of Sarisbury besieged the faire towne of Saint Susan, whereof was Capteyne, Ambrose de Lore, a man of no lesse audacitie then pollicie, accompanied with a great number of hardy men of warre. When the Erle of Sarisburie had both biewed and seene the situation and nature of the place, he determined to assault it in that place which was most weake and woꝛne: and so the trumpets blew to the assault and scaling Ladders were rayed to the walles, and the Englishe men with great noyse began to clime and ascende. The Souldiours which durst not come out of the towne to encounter with the Englishe armie, manfully ran to the walles to resist and defend the assaylants. And so all that day the assault with many aduentures still continued, and although the inhabitauntes and Citizens were sore wounded, they neuer left off both to defende themselves, and to annoy and hurt their enemies. When the Erle perceyued that by this light assault and sleight skirmishe he lost somewhat, and gayned nothing, he made a wall, and cast a trenche round about the towne: and caused his great ordenaunce to be shot at that part of the wal which was most feeble and slender, and so daily and nightly he neuer ceased to beate, and breake downe the Wall and Towres: so that within two dayes the most part of the wall was perced and cast downe to the ground. When the Capteine perceyued these newe feates, he began to entreate, and offered for himselfe and his souldiours, two thousand crownes, so that they might depart in their dobles onely, so their lyues were saued (which somme or money) because winter approached: was taken, and the towne yelded. Of the which towne he made Capteine Sir John Dopham, a balaunt and a circumspect knight. After that, the said Erle besieged the towne and Castell of Mayon le Jubez, wherin was Capteine the Lord of Escotais: which towne after the space of five weekes was yelded (the liues of the defenders onely saued.) To the keying whereof he appoynted Sir John Montgomery knight. And after the feast of the Purification of our Ladie, he besieged the Castell de lafort Barnard: During which Siege, a sale was made of the towne of Alanfon beyng in the Englishe mens possession by a Gascoyne and one of the Garrison there, for foure hundred crownes, to Charles de Villiers, Peter le Beuffe, and other french Capteynes. When the day was appoynted of the deliuerance both of the towne and the money, the Gascoyne opened and discovered the whole agreement to the Erle of Sarisburie: which ordeyned the Lorde Willoughby, and Sir John Fastolfe with two thousand Englishe men to encounter with the byers of the kinges towne of Alanfon. At the day appoynted and time assigned, Charles de Villiers chiefe Marchant of this riche enterpryse, early in the morning with two hundred horsemen, and three hundred footemen approached neere the towne, and abiding for the Gascoyne, he there displayed his banner, thinking triumphantly to enter into the towne: but it happened otherwise. For as they were ware, or suspected any rescues, they were environed with the Englishe armie, and slaine and taken every creature, saue Peter Danthenazy, and .xxv. other, which by the swiftnesse of their horses saued themselves.

After this conflict ended, the Lorde Willoughby with his companie returned to the Erle of Sarisburie, before the towne le fort Barnard: the Capteines whereof considering that there was no hope of succour to be sente to them, and that their bitaile diminished, and that they were not long able to abyde the harde assaultes of the Englishe Nation, rendered the towne and Castell, reseruing to them their horse and harnesse onely, which towne the Erle

Erle receyued to the vse of the king: But the Regent for the balaunt seruice done by the Erle, gaue the same towne to him and to his heyres for euer. Besides this, the Erle partly by assault, partly by composition, toke diuers other townes, as Saint Iales, where he made Capteine Richard Serthyme Esquier, Chauceaux Lermilage, where he made gouernour Mathew Gough, Guerland, of the which he assigned ruler, John Bariaffer, Gualcoꝛne, whereof he made Capteine, William Glasdale Esquier, Lisse Soubs Boulton, wherof he made Capteine sir Lancelot Lisse knight, Acafellas, wherof was made Capteine, Henry Braunche, Mountseur, of the which was made Constable, sir William Oldehall knight, la Suisse, was assigned to the keepyng of John Suffolke squier, and beside this, about .xl. Castles and Pyles were ouerthrowne and destroyed. When the fame and report of these newes were blowen through fraunce, some feared, some feared, and some raged for anger: But the veritie of all thinges beyng by the Duke of Bedford declared into England, all men reioysed and were verie glad: not onely for the conquest of so manie townes, but also that God had sent them victorie in a pitched fielde, and in a mortall battaile. Wherefore generall processions were commaunded, to render to God almightie humble and hartie thankes, by whose onely gift, and not by the power of man, these notable victories were gotten and achieved.

It is not conuenient that I should talke so much of fraunce, and omit all thinges done in England: Wherefore, you shall vnderstand, that about Easter this yere, the King called his high Court of Parliament, at his towne of Westminster, and coming to the Parliament house, he was conueyed through the Citie vpon a great Courser with great triumph, which childe was iudged of all men, not onely to haue the very Image, the liuely portraiture, and louely countenance of his noble parent and famous father, but also lyke to succede, and be his heyre in all morall vertues, marciall pollicies, and Princely feates, as he was vndoubted inheritor to his realmes, seignories and dominions. In which Parliament was granted to the king a subsidy of .xii. pence of the pounce, towards the maintenance of the warres, of all marchandise coming into this realme, or going out of the same, and three shyllings of euery Tonne of wine, besides other sommes set on other liquor, for the terme of thre yeres, & likewise was taxed euery sack of wooll, aswell of English men, as of straungers. During which parliament, came to London Peter Duke of Quimber, sonne to the king of Portugal, & Cessin Germaine remoued to the king, which of the Duke of Breter and the Bishop of Winchester his Uncles, was highly feasted, and liberally rewarded, and was elected into the noble order of the Garter. During which season, Edmond Mortimer, the last Erle of Marche of that name (which long tyme had bene restrained from his libertie, and finally wared lame) deceased without issue, whose inheritance descended to Lord Richard Plantagenet, sonne and heyre to Richard Erle of Cambridge, beheaded, as you haue heard before, at the towne of Southampton. Which Richard within lesse then .xxx. yeres, as heyre to this Erle Edmond, in open Parliament claymed the crowne and scepter of this Realme, as hereafter shall more manifestly appere. In the tyme of which Parliament also, whether it were, either for desert or malice, or to auoyde thinges that might chaunce, accordyng to a proverbe, which sayeth:

saith, a dead man doth no harme. Sir Roger Mortimer, cosyn to the sayde Erle, was attainted of treason and put to execution: of whose death no small flaunder arose among the common people.

After all these actes done in England, and in France, Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, with the Lady Jaquet his supposed wife, passed the sea, and came to Mons in Henawde, and there by force tooke all suche landes, as John Duke of Brabant her first husbände had in possession of the sayde Lady Jaquet, which doing Phylip Duke of Burgoyne, beyng great friend to the Duke of Brabant, muche disdayned, and moze frowned at, and thought for the olde loue and familiaritie, that he bare to the Duke of Gloucester, that he woulde by friendly monicion, turne hym from hys vn honest and vngodly life, to a reasonable reformation, and brotherly conformitie. Wherefore he wrote louyngly vnto hym, that he should vtterly leaue of any further to folowe the newe attempted enterpryse, aduertisyng him and protestyng openly, that the vsurping and wrongfull withholding of an other mans possession, was not so vile and flaunderous, as the defying of a pure and cleane bed, and adulterously keping the wife of his Christian brother. The Duke of Gloucester being in this case very wilfull, eyther blinded with dorage, or inflamed with couetousnesse of his wyfes possessions, regarding neyther the admonishment of the Duke of Brabant, nor yet the godly aduertisement of the Duke of Burgoyne, sware that he would not leue of to make farther warre, till he had expelled the Duke of Brabant, out of hys wyfes seignories, territories and dominions. Wherefore the Duke of Burgoyne assembled together a great armie to make warre on the Duke of Gloucester, in the cause and quareil of the Duke of Brabant his friend and cosyn. The Duke of Gloucester, partely for great affayres, that then were imminent in the realme of Englande, and partely to assemble moze people, to resist and withstand the power of the Dukes of Burgoyne and Brabant, left hys wyfe at Mons in Henawde, with the Lordes of the towne, which sware to hym, to defende and keepe her agaynst all men, till the time of his returne. Wherefore he leauing with her two thousand English men, departed to Calice, and so into Englande.

When he was gone, the Duke of Burgoyne so threatened, so bered, yea, and almost so famished them within the towne of Mons, that they deliuered into his possession the Lady Jaquet or Jacomyne: which incontinent sent her to Gaunt, where she disguised her selfe in a mans apparell, and so escaped into a towne of her awne in Feland, called Zirice, and from thence she was conueyed to a towne in Holland, called Tergowve, where she was honorably receiued, and there made her selfe strong to withstande her enemies: And for her succour the Duke of Gloucester sent to her five hundred men. The Dukes of Burgoyne and Brabant left her not all in quiet, but bent her townes in Holland, and slue her people in Felande, to her great detriment and displeasure. But in conclusion, this matter was brought before Martin the first Bpshopp of Rome: which adiudged the first matrimonie with Duke John of Brabant, to be good and effectuell, and the second Conuall celebrated with Duke Humfrey of Gloucester, to be of no value, force or effect, and that if the Duke of Brabant dyed, it should not be lawfull to the Duke of Gloucester, to mary againe with the Lady Jaquet. The Duke

Duke of Gloucester obeyng to this sentence, beganne to waere lothe of his supposed wyfe, by whome he neuer had profite but losse: for whose cause his friends became his enemies, and for whose sake he was openly flaundered. Wherefore he, by wanton affection blinded, toke to hys wyfe Elianoz Cobham daughter to the Lorde Cobham, of Sterberow, which before (as the same went) was his soueraigne Lady and paramour, to his great flaunder and reproche. And if he were vnquieted wyth his other pretended wyfe, truly he was ten tymes moze bered, by occasion of this woman, as you shall hereafter playnely perceyue: So that he beganne his marriage with euill, and ended it with worse. The Ladye Jaquet after the death of John Duke of Brabant, married a gentleman of meane estate, called Franke of Bursellen, for the whych cause the Duke of Burgoyne imprysoned her husbände, and lefte her in great trouble: suche was the ende of these two mariages.

A little before this time, Sir Thomas Ramptone, s<sup>r</sup> Philip Branch, Sir Nicholas Burdet, and other English men, to the number of five hundred, repaired and fortified the towne of Saint James de Leitron, on the frontiers of Normandy, adioyning to Brittain. Arthur Erle of Richemond and Pury brother to the Duke of Britayne, which like an vntrue Gentlemā, sworne and forsworne to the king of England, sodaynely fled to Charles the Dolphyn: which much reioysing of his fauour and amitie, gaue to hym the Constableship of France, which the Erle of Boughan slayne before at Vernoyl, a small time occupied, and lesse space enioyed. This new Constable not a little ioyfull of his high office, thought to doe some pleasure to the Dolphyn hys Master, and to aduance his name at the first entry into his auctoritie, he imagined no enterpryse to be to him moze honorable, nor to his prince moze acceptable, then to aduoyde and drine out of the towne of Saint James de Beueon, all the English nation. So in hope of victorie he gathered together aboue xl. M. men, of Britons, Frenchmen and Scottes, and enuironed the towne of Saint James, or Saint Jaques de Beuron, with a strong siege. The English men within, which in number passed not five hundred men, manfully defended the daylie assaultes of the fierce french men. The English men consulted together what way was best to be taken: and after long debating, they determined to issue out of the towne, and to fight with their enemies. So on a day, when the Britons were werled with a long assault, towards the euening the English men came out of the towne one part by the posterne of the Castell, and another parte by the gate of the towne, cryng saint George Salisburie: and set on their enemies both before and behinde. The French men seing the courage of the English men, and hearing their crie, thinking that the Erle of Salisburie was come to raise the siege, ranne aboape like sheepe, and there were taken slayne and drowned in the water of them foure thousand men and mo. Besides thys, these iolly Ballaunts left behinde them for haste, all their tentes, xliij. great Connes, and xl. Barrelles of powder, three hundred pipes of wyne, two hundred pypes of Bisket and flour, two hundred trayles of figges and seasons, and five hundred Barrels of Hering.

The french men (beyng thus vanquished) fell in diuision amongst themselves: the one layng to the charge of the other the losse of their men, and

and the cause of their flyeng. Such is euer the chaunce of the warre, when victorie is obteyned, the most cowarde and faint harted boy will booste and bragge, and when the battayle is lost, the fault is assigned to the best, and not to the worst. The new Constable was soze dismayed and much ashamed of this discomfiture and shameful flight, but there was no remedy but patience: But to the entent to blot out and deface this shamefull flyeng with a notable victorie, he with a great armie entered into the Countrie of Ambove, and bzent, spoyled and destroyed two or thye at the most, little pooze thetched Villages: which small act done, his malice was quenched, and his olde griefe (as he thought) victoriously reuenged.

In this season fell a great diuision in the realme of England, which of a sparkle was like to growe to a great flame. For whether the Bpshp of Winchester called Henry Beaufort, sonne to John Duke of Lancaster, by his thirde wyfe, enuided the aucthoritie of Humfrey Duke of Gloucester protector of the realme, or whether the Duke had taken disdain at the riches and pompons estate of the Bishop, sure it is that the whole realme was troubled with them and their parte takers: so that the Citizens of London fearing that which might insue upon the matter, were fayne to keepe daylie and nightly watches, as though their enemies were at hande to besiege and destroy them: In so much that all the shoppes within the Citie of London were shut in for feare of the fauourers of these two great personages, for eche parte had assembled no small number of people. For pacifying wherof, the Archebyschop of Cauntorburie, and the Duke of Quynber, called the prince of Portyngale, roade eyght times in one day betwene the two aduersaries, and so the matter was stayed for that time. The Bpshp of Winchester not content with his Nephewe the Lorde Protector, sent a letter to the Regent of Fraunce, the tenor whereof ensueth.

Right high and mightie prince, and my right noble, and after one, leuest Lorde, I recommend me vnto you with all my heart. And as you desire the welfare of the king our soueraigne Lorde, and of his realmes of Englande and Fraunce, and your owne health and oures also, so hast you hether. For by my truth, if you tarie, we shall put thys lande in aduenture with a fielde, suche a Brother you haue here, God make hym a good man. For your wysdome knoweth, that the profite of Fraunce standeth in the welfare of Englande. &c. Written in great haste on Allhallow euen. By your true seruant to my lyues ende. Henry Winchester.

The Duke of Bedford beyng soze greued and vnquieted with these netoes, to tituted the Erle of Warwike, which was lately come into Fraunce with sixe thousand men, hys Lieutenaut in the french dominions, and in the Duchy of Normandie, and so with a small company, he with the Duches his wyfe, returned agayne ouer the Seas into Englande, and the .x. day of January, he was with all solemnitie receyued into London, to whom the Citizens gaue a paire of Basynnes of siluer and gilte, and a thousande Marke in money: and from London he roade to Westminster, and was lodged in the kinges Palayce. The .xxv. day of Marche after hys comming to London, a Parliament beganne at the towne of Leicester, where the Duke of Bedford openly rebuked the Lordes in generall, because that they in the tyme of warre, throught their priuie malice and inwarde grudge, had almost mooued the people to warre and commocion, in which time all men ought or should be of one minde, harte and consent: requiryng them to defende, serue and dread their soueraigne Lorde king Henry, in performing his conquest in Fraunce, which was in maner brought to conclusion. In this Parliament the Duke of Gloucester layed certaine articles to the Bpshp of Winchester charge, the which with the answers hereafter doe ensue.

The Articles of accusation and accord, betwene the Lorde of Gloucester, and the Lorde of Winchester.

Here insueth the articles, as the kings counsaile hath conceiued, the which the high and mightie prince, my Lorde of Gloucester hath surmised upon my Lorde of Winchester Chauncelour of England, with the answer to the same.

Articles set forth by the Duke of Gloucester against Henry Bpshp of Winchester.

1 first, where as he beyng Protector and defendoz of thys lande, desired the Towre to be opened to him, and to lodge him therein, Rycharde Wooddeuile Esquire, hauing at that time the charge of the keeping of the Towre, refused his desire, and kept the same Towre agaynst him, vnduely and agaynst reason, by the commaundement of my sayde Lorde of Winchester: and afterwarde in approuing of the sayde refuse, he receyued the sayde Wooddeuile, and cherished him agaynst the state and worship of the king, and of my sayde Lorde of Gloucester.

2 Item, my sayde Lorde of Winchester, without the aduise and assent of my sayde Lorde of Gloucester, or of the kings counsaile, purposed and disposed him to set hand on the kinges person, and to haue remoued him from Eltham, the place that he was in, to Windsor, to the entent to put him in gouernaunce as him liste.

3 Item, that where my sayde Lorde of Gloucester, to whome of all persones or that should be in the lande, by the waye of nature and byrth, it belongeth to see the gouernaunce of the kings person, informed of the sayde vndue purpose of my sayd Lorde of Winchester, declared in the article nexte aboue sayde. And in letting there of, determining to haue gone to Eltham vnto the king, to haue prouided as the cause required. My sayde Lorde of Winchester, vntuely and agaynst the kinges peace, to the entent to trouble my sayde Lorde of Gloucester goyng to the king, purposing his death in case that he had gone that way, set men of armes and Archers at the ende of London bridge next Southwarke: and in forbarring of the kings high way, let drawe the cheyne of the Stulpes there, and set by Pyppes and Hardels, in maner and forme of Bulwarkes: and set men in Chambers, Sellers, and Windows, with Bowes and arrowes and other weapons, to the entent to bring to small destruction my sayde Lorde of Gloucesters person, as well as of those that then should come with him.

4 Item, my sayde Lorde of Gloucester sayth and affirmeth, that our soueraigne Lorde his brother, that was king Henry the fift, tolde him on a tyme, when our sayde soueraigne Lorde beyng Prince, was lodged in the Palayce of Westminster in the great Chamber, by the noyes of a Spanyell there was on a night a man spied and taken behinde a tapet of the sayd chamber, the which man was deliuered to the Erle of Arundell to be examined vpon the cause of his beyng there at that tyme, the which so examined, at that tyme, confessed that he was there by the stirring by and procuring of my

my sayde Lozde of Winchester, ordeyned to haue slayne the sayd prince there in his bed: wherefore the sayde Erie of Arundell let lacke him forthwith, and drowned him in the Thames.

Item, our souereigne Lozde that was, king Henry the fift, sayde vnto my sayde Lozde of Gloucester that his father king Henry the fourth lying, and visited then greatly with sicknesse of the hande of God, my sayde Lozde of Winchester sayd vnto the king (Henry the fift then being prince) that the king his father, so visited with sicknesse was not personable: and therfore not disposed to come in conuersation and gouernance of the people, & for so much, counsayled hym to take the gouernance and crowne of thys land vpon him.

The answer of the Bp-shop of Winchester vnto
the former articles.

Here ensue the answers to the accusations made by my Lozde of Winchester Chauncelour of England, vnto the causes and matters of heavinesse, declared in articles agaynst him by my Lozde of Gloucester.

1 First, as of the refuse made vnto my Lozde of Gloucester, of opening the tower to him, of his lodgyng therein, by the commaundement of my sayde Lozde of Winchester, he aunswereth: that in the presence of my sayde Lozde of Gloucester, befoze his comyng out of his Countie of Henaulde, for causes such as were thought reasonable, it semeth lesfull that the tower should haue bene notable stored and kept with vitaille, howbeit, it was not forthwith executed, and that in likewise after that my sayde Lozde of Gloucester was gone into his sayde Countie of Henauld for sedicious and odious billes and language, cast and bled in the Citie of London, sounyng of insurrection and rebellion agaynst the kinges peace, and destruction aswell of diuerse estates of this land, as straungers beyng vnder the defence, in somuche that in doubt thereof, straungers in great number fled the land: and for the more sure keepyng of the sayd Tower, Richard Wooduille Esquier, so trusted with the king our souereigne Lozde that dead is (as well ye knowe) and also Chamberlain and Counsaillor vnto my Lozde of Bedford, with a certeine number of defensible persons assigned vnto him, was made deputie there, by the assent of the kinges counsaile, beyng that tyme at London, for to abyde therein for safegarde thereof, and straitly charged by the sayde counsaile, that duryng that tyme of his sayde charge, he should not suffer any man to be in the Tower stronger then him selfe, without especiall charge or commaundement of the king by the aduise of his counsaile.

2 Item, that after, sone vpon the comyng of my sayd Lozde of Gloucester into this lande from his Countie of Henauld, the sayde Lozdes of the kinges counsaile were informed, that my sayde Lozde of Gloucester, grudged with the sayd maner of enforcyng the Tower, and let say to them of London, that he had well vnderstand, that they had beene heauily threathned for the tyme of hys absence, and otherwise then they should haue bene if he had bene in thys land, wherefore he was right euill contented, and especiall of the sayde forsyng of the Tower, set vpon them in maner of a chaste vilaine. Consideryng the good equitie and truth that they had alwayes kept vnto the king, offering them ther vpon remedie if they would.

3 Item that after this, Richard Scot Lieutenant of the Tower, by the commaundement of my sayd Lozde of Gloucester, brought vnto him Frier Randolphe, the which had long befoze confessed treason, done by him agaynst the

the kings person that dead is, for the which knowlege he was put to be kept in the sayde Tower, and straightly commaunded vnder great paine geuen vnto the sayd Scot, to kepe him straightly and surely, and not to let him out of the sayd Tower without commaundement of the king, by the aduice of his counsaile. The which sayd Frier Randolphe, my sayde Lozde of Gloucester kept then with himselfe (not witting to the sayd Scot) as he declared vnto my sayd Lozde of Winchester. Sone after that he had brought the sayd Frier Randolphe vnto my Lozde of Gloucester, sayng vnto my Lozde of Winchester, that he was vndone but he helped hym, and expressed as for cause of the sayd witholdyng of Frier Randolphe: And sayng mozeouer, that when he desired of my sayd Lozde of Gloucester, the deliuerance of the sayd Frier Randolphe, to leade him againe vnto the Tower, or sufficient warrant for his discharge, my sayd Lozde of Gloucester aunswered him, that his commaundement was sufficient warrant and discharge for him. In the which thing aboute sayde, it was thought to my Lozde of Winchester that my sayd Lozde of Gloucester, tooke vpon him further then his Authozitie stretched vnto, and caused him to doubt and dread, least that he would haue proceeded further. And at such time as the said Wooduille came vnto him to aske his aduice and counsaile, of lodgyng of my sayde Lozde of Gloucester in the tower: he aduised and charged him, that befoze he suffered my sayd Lozde of Gloucester or any person lodge therein stronger then himselfe, he should puruey him a sufficient warrant thereof, of the king by the aduise of his counsaile.

4 Item, as to the sayd article of the aforesayd causes of heavinesse, my said Lozde the Chaunceloz aunswereth, that he neuer purposed to set hand on the kinges person, nor to remoue him, or that he should be remoued, or put in any maner of gouernance, but by the aduice of the kinges counsaile. For he could not conceiue any maner of goodnesse or of aduantage that might haue growen vnto him thereof: But rather great perill and charge, and hereof my sayd Lozde of Winchester is redy to make profe in tyme & place conuenient.

5 Item, as to the third article of the forsayd causes and heavinesse, my said Lozde Chaunceloz aunswereth, that he was oft and dyuers times warned, by dyuers credible persons, aswell at the tyme of the kinges last Parliament, holden at Westminster, as befoze and sithe, that my sayd Lozde of Gloucester, purposed him bodily harme, and was warned thereof, and counsayled by the sayd persons, and that diuerse times to abstaine him from comyng to Westminster, as my sayde Lozde of Winchester declared vnto my sayde Lozde of Gloucester.

6 Item, that in the tyme of the sayd Parliament, diuerse persons of lobe estate of the Citie of London in great number, assembled on a day vpon the Wharffe, at the Crane of the Vntrie, and wished and desyzed that they had there the person of my Lozde of Winchester, sayng: that they would haue threwen him into the Chamise, to haue taught him to swim with boinges. Whereof billes and language of slaunder, and threathnynges were cast and spoken in the sayde Citie, by my sayde Lozde the Chaunceloz, which caused him to suppose, that they that so sayd and did, willed and desyzed his destruction, although they had no cause.

7 Item, that after the comyng to London of Sir Raufe Bottiller, and maister Lewes, sent fro my Lozde of Bedford, to the rest of the Lozdes of the counsaile, they beyng informed that my sayd Lorde of Gloucester did beare displeasure to my sayd Lord of Winchester: They came to my sayd Lorde of Gloucester to his Inne, the second Sunday next before Allhallowenday, and there opened vnto him, that they had knowlege and vnderstandyng of the sayde displeasure, praiyng him to let them knowe if he bare suche displeasure agaynst my sayd Lorde of Winchester, and also the causes therof. At the whiche time (as my sayd Lorde of Winchester was afterward informed) that my sayde Lorde of Gloucester affirmed that he was heauie toward him, and not withouten causes that peradventure he would put in wrytyng.

8 Item, that after the Monday next before Allhallowenday last past in the night, the people of the sayd Citie of London, by the commaundement of my sayde Lorde of Gloucester, as it was saide: For what cause my Lorde the Chaunceloz wist not, assembled in the Citie, armed and arrayed, and so continued all that night. Amongest diuers of the which (the same night by what exercitacion, my sayde Lorde the Chaunceloz wist not) sedicious and heauie language was vsed, and in especiall agaynst the person of my sayde Lorde the Chaunceloz. And so the same Monday at night, my sayd Lord of Gloucester, sent vnto the Innes of Court at London, charging them of the Court dwellyng in the same, to be with him vpon the Morow, at eyght of the Clocke in their best array.

9 Item, that on the morowe, beyng Tuesday next folowynge carely my sayd Lorde of Gloucester, sent vnto the Maior and Aldermen of the sayd Citie of London, to ordein him vnto the number of thre .C. persons on horseback, to accompanie him to such place as he disposed him to ride, which (as it was sayd) was vnto the king, to the entent to haue his person, and to remoue him from the place that he was in, without assent or aduise of the kinges counsaile, the which thing was thought vnto my sayde Lorde the Chaunceloz, that he ought in no wise to haue done, nor had not bene seene so before.

10 Item, that my sayde Lorde the Chaunceloz, consideryng the thinges abovesayde, and doubtynge therfore of perilles that might haue ensued therof, intendynge to puruey thereagaynst, and namely for his awne suretie and defence, accordyng to the lawe of nature, ordeyned to let that no force of people should come on the Bridge of London toward him, by the which he or his might haue bene indaungered or noyed, not intendynge in any wise bodily harme vnto my sayd Lord of Gloucester, nor to any other person, but onely his awne defence in eschewyng the perill abovesayde.

11 Item, as toward the fourth and fift of the sayde articles, my Lorde the Chaunceloz answereth, that he was euer true, to all those that were his soueraigne Lordes, and reigned vpon him, and that he neuer purposed treason or vntreuth agaynst any of their persons, and in especiall agaynst the person of our sayd soueraigne Lorde King Henry the fift. The which consideryng the great wisdom, truth and manhoo, that all men knewe in him, he would not for the tyme that he was king, haue set on my sayd Lord the Chaunceloz so great trust as he did, if he had found, or thought in him such vntreuth. The which thing my sayde Lorde the Chaunceloz offered to declare and shewe, as it belongeth to a man of his estate to do, requiryng therevpon my Lord of Bedford, and all the Lordes spirituall and temporall in this Parliament, that it might be seene, that there were Judges conuenient in this case, that they would do him right, or else that he might haue leaue of the king by their aduise, to go sue his right, before him that ought to be his iudge.

12 And as toward the letter sent by my Lord of Winchester, vnto my lord of Bedford, of the which the tenor is before reherced, of the which my lord of Gloucester complained him of the malicious and vntreue purpose of my said lord of Winchester, as toward the assembling of the people, and gatherynge of a field in the kings land, in troublynge therof, and agaynst the kings peace: My sayde lord of Winchester answereth, that if his sayde letters duly vnderstand, and in such wise as he vnderstood and meant in the wrytyng of them it may not reasonably be gathered and taken, that my sayde lord of Winchester, intended to gather any field or assemble people, in troublynge of the kings land, and agaynst the kinges peace, but rather he purposed to acquite him to the king in his truth, and to kepe the rest and peace in the kinges land, and to eschew rebellion, disobedience and all trouble: For by that that in the begynnyng of the sayd letter, he calleth my sayde Lorde of Bedford, his leuest lord, after one, that is the king, whome he ought to accept of dutie of his truth, the which he hath euer kept and will kepe.

13 Moreover in the sayde letter, he desireth the comyng home of my lord of Bedford, for the welfare of the king, and of his realmes of England and of France, the which stande principally in his keepyng of rest and peace, and prayeth my sayd Lorde of Bedford to speede his comyng into England, in eschewyng of leoparde of the lande, and of a fielde the which he dread him, might haue folowed if he had long tarped: As toward those wordes, and yetary we shall put this land in aduventure with a field, such a brother ye haue here. &c. My sayde Lorde of Winchester sayeth, the sooth is: before or he wrote the sayd letter, by occasion of certeine ordinaunces, made by the Maior and Aldermen of London, agaynst the excessive takyng of Masons, Carpenters, Tilers, Plasterers, and other laborers, for their daily iourneyes, and approued by the Kinges aduise and his counsaile, there were cast many heuinesses and sedicious billes, vnder the names of such labourers, threathnyng risynge with many thousandes, and manassynge of estates of the lande, and likewise sedicious and euill language spoken, and so continued and likely to haue ensued of purpose and intent of disobedience and rebellion. To the redressyng of the which, it seemed to my lord the Chaunceloz, that my sayd lord of Gloucester, did not his endeuor nor diligence that he might haue shewed, for lacke of which diligence, they that were disposed to do disobeyfance, were encouraged and emboldened. So that it was like that they should haue made a gatherynge, and that the king and his true subiectes, should haue bene compelled to haue made a field, to haue withstand them, the which field makynge had bene aduentyng of this lande: And in tokenyng that it was neuer my sayde lord Chauncelozs intent to gather no field, but as truth most stirred him agaynst such as riotously would make suche assemble agaynst our soueraigne Lorde, and the weale of this land. He desired so hastely, the comyng of my sayde lord of Bedford, the which he would in no wise haue so greatly desired, if he would haue purposed him vnto any vnlawful makynge of a field, for he wist well that my sayde lord of Bedford would most sharply haue chastised and punished, all those that so would any riotous assemble make. When this answer was made, the Duke caused this wrytyng folowynge,

That my sayde Lord of Bedford, and my sayde Lords spirituall and temporall, and eche of them shall as farre forth as their cunnings and discretions suffisen, truly, iustly and indifferently, counsaile and aduise the king, and also procede and acquite themselves, in all the sayde matters and quarrells, without that they, or any of them, shall priuely and apertly, make or shewe himselfe to be party or parciall therein, not leauing or eschewyng so to doe, for affection, loue, meede, doubt, or drede of any person or persons. And that they shall in all wise, keepe secreete all that shall be commoned by way of counsaile in the matters and quarrells aboue sayde, in the sayde Parliament, without that they or any of them shall, by worde, wytyng of the king, or in any wise open, or discover it to any of the sayde parties, or to any other person, that is not of the saide counsaile: But if he haue a speciall commaundement or leaue thereto of the king, or of my sayde Lord of Bedford. And that eche of them shall, with all his might and power, assist by waye of counsaile, or else shewe it vnto the king, my Lord of Bedford, and to the rest of my sayd Lords, to put the sayd parties to reason, and not to suffer that any of the sayde parties, by them or by their assistents, procede or attempt by way of fight agaynst the kings peace: nor helpe, assist, or comfort any of them thereto, but let them with all their might and power, and withstande them, and assist vnto the king, and my sayde Lord of Bedford, in keeping of the kings peace, and redressing all such maner of proceeding by waye of fight or force.

Which othe in maner and forme aboue rehearsed, all the Lords as well spirituall as temporall, being in this Parliament at Leycester assembled the fourth day of Marche, promised vpon their fayth, duetie and allegeaunce, which they owe to the king their soueraigne Lorde, truly to obserue and keepe, according to the true meaning and purpote of the same.

The Arbitrament.

In the name of God, we Henry Archebyshop of Cauntozbutie, Thomas Duke of Excester, John Duke of Norffolke, Thomas Bysshop of Duresme, Phillip Bysshop of Worcester, John Bysshop of Bathe, Humfrey Erle of Stafford, Wylliam Alnewik keeper of the kings priue seale, Rauffe Lorde Cromewell, Arbitratoures in all manner of causes, matters and quarrells of heauinesses and greuances, with all incidents, circumstaunces, dependents, or conneres, beyng and hangyng betwene the high and worthy Prince Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, on the one partie, and the worshipfull father in God, Henry Bysshop of Wynchester and Chauncellour of England, on the other partie, by eyther of them for the peasing of the sayde quarrells and debates, taken and chosen in maner and forme, as it is conteyned more plainly in a compromise made therevpon, of the which the tenour sheweth in thys forme.

The Arbitrament.

Memorandum, the .viij. day of March, in the fourth yere of our soueraigne Lord the king, Henry the sixt. The high and mighty prince Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, at the reuerence of God, and for the good of the king our soueraigne Lorde in this lande, and namely at the reuerence, and specially at the request and prayer of the mightie and high Prince, my Lorde of Bedford his brother, agreed him to put and putteth all maner matters and quarrells in deede, with all their incidents, circumstaunces, dependentes and conneres, that touchen him and his person, that he hath in any wise, doe, or seeleth him greued, or heauie agaynst my Lorde his Uncle, my Lorde of Winchester. Or else that my Lorde of Wynchester findeth him greued agaynst him, in as much as they touch him or his person, fro the beginning of the worlde vnto this day: In the aduise, ordinaunce and arbitrament of the worthy father in God, Henry Archebishop of Cauntozbury, the high and noble prince Thomas Duke of Excester, and John Duke of Norffolke, the worshipfull father in God Thomas Bysshop of Duresme, Phillip Bysshop of Worcester, John Bishop of Bathe, The noble Lorde Humfrey Erle of Stafford, the worshipfull persons, Mayster Wylliam Alnewike keeper of the kings priue Seale, and Rauffe Lorde Cromewell, promising and behighting, by the fayth of his body, and worde of his princelhood and kings sonne, to doe, kepe, obserue and fulfill, for him and his behalfe, all that shall be declared, ordeyned and arbitred, by the foresayde Archebishop, Dukes, Bishops, Earle, keeper of the priue scale, and Lorde Cromwell, in all matters and quarrels aboute sayde: Grauntyng also and promysing ouer that, to be comprehended in the foresayde arbitrement, as towarde putting awaye all heauynesse or displeasures in any wise, conteyned by my Lorde of Gloucester, agaynst all those that haue in any wise assisted, counsayled, or fauoured vnto his sayde Uncle of Winchester, and as towarde any matters, that be touching my Lorde of Gloucester, remitteth it and the gouernaunce thereof vnto the king and his counsaile, they to deme it by the aduise of his counsaile, as hun thinketh it to be done. In witnesse of the which thing, to this present compromise, my sayde Lorde of Gloucester, hath subscribed his name with his awne hande Humfrey Gloucester. And in like forme, my Lorde of Winchester in an other compromise, hath subscribed with his awne hande, vnder the worde of Priesthood, to stande at the aduise, ordinaunce and arbitrement of the persons aboute sayde, Mutatis Mutandis.

The causes beforesayde and quarrels by vs sene, heard, and diligently examined and decreed, by the assent of the sayde parties, ordeyne and awarde, that my lords of Gloucester and of Winchester, for any thing done or spoken, by that one partie against that other, or by any of theirs, or any other person or persons, afore the vij. day of this present moneth of Marche, neuer hereafter take causes, quarrels, displeasures or heauynesses, that one against the other, ne neyther agaynst the counsaylers, adherents or fauourers of that other, for any thing or things that are past. And that my sayde lorde of Gloucester, be good lorde to my sayde lorde of Winchester, and haue him in loue and affection as his kinsman and Uncle. And that my sayde lorde of Winchester, haue to my sayde lorde of Gloucester, true and sadde loue and affection, doe and be readie to doe to him suche seruice, as appertayneth of hone. ty to my sayde lorde of Winchester and hys estate to doe. And that eche of them be good Lorde vnto all those adherents, counsaylers and fauourers of that other, and shewe them at all times fauorable loue and affection, as for any thing done by them, or sayde afore the seuenth day of Marche.

And we decree, ordayne and awarde, that my sayde Lorde of Winchester, in the presence of the king our soueraigne Lorde, my Lord of Bedford, and my Lorde of Gloucester, and the residue of the lordes spirituall and temporall, and commons beyng in thys present Parliament, say and declare in maner and forme that foloweth.

My soueraigne lorde, I haue well vnderstande, that I am noyed among the states of your lande, howe that the king our soueraigne lorde that was that time, being prince and lodged in the great chamber at Westminster, by the bayeng of a spanyell, there was on a night taken, behinde a tapet in the same chamber, a man, that should haue confessed that he was there by mine excitation and procuring to haue slaine the foresayd Prince there in his bed, wherevpon he was sacked, and forthwith drowned in the Thames. And furthermore I am accused, how that I should haue stirred the king that last died, the time also that he was prince, to haue taken the gouernaunce of this realme, and the crowne vpon him, lyuing his father the same tyme being king: Thorough which language and noysing I feele my name and fame greatly enblemished, in diuers mens opinions. Wherevpon I take first

God

God to my witnesse, and afterwarde all the worlde, that I haue bene at all times, and am true louer and true man, to you my Soueraigne lorde, and shall be all my lyfe. And also I haue bene to my soueraigne lorde, that was your father, all time of his reigne, true man: and for such he tooke me, trusted me, and cherished me to his liues ende, and as I trust no man will as firme the contrary, nor neuer in my lyfe procuring, nor imagining death nor destruction of his person, ne assenting to any such thing, or lyke thereto, the tyme that he was king or prince, or else in other estate. And in likewise, I was true man to king Henry the fourth, all the time that he was my soueraigne lorde, and reigned vpon me: In which matters, in all maner of wise, that it liketh to you my soueraigne lorde for to commaunde me, I am ready for to declare me: And furthermore, where, how and when, it shall like you by the aduise of your counsaile to assigne me. Wherefore, I beseech you my soueraigne lorde, as humbly as I can, consydering that there is no grounded procelle, by the which I might lawfully in these matters aboute sayde be conuict, blessed be God, to holde me and declare me, by the aduise of all the lordes, spirituall and temporall, being in this present Parliament, true man to you my soueraigne lorde, and so to haue bene vnto my soueraigne lordes that were your father and Graundfather, and true man also, to haue bene at all times vnto your sayde father, whilest he was prince, or else in any other estate, the sayde dislauder and noysing notwithstanding. And this same declaration to be enacted, in this your sayde present parliament.

The which wordes declared in maner as it is aboute sayd, by my said lord of Winchester, it seemeth to my sayde lordes the Arbitratours, that it is meete that my sayde lorde of Winchester draw him aparte, and in the meane tyme, the lordes being present, be singularly examined thervpon, and say their aduise: And if it be assented by them, in maner as my sayde lorde of Winchester desireth, let him be called agayne, and that then my lorde of Bedford haue these wordes in effect that follow.

sayde Uncle, the king my lord, by the aduise of his counsaile, hath commaunded me to say to you, that he hath well vnderstande, and considered all the matters which ye haue here openly declared in his presence, and thervpon ye desire a petition that he will declare you, and by the aduise and assent of the Lordes spirituall and temporall, beyng in this present Parliament, he declareth you a true man to hym, and that ye haue so be to my Lorde his father, and Graundfather, also true man to my Lorde his father whiles he was Prince or else in any other estate, the sayde dislauder and noysing notwithstanding: And wil that the said declaration be so enacted in this present parliament. After the which wordes thus sayde, as before is declared, by the sayd Lordes Arbitratours, that my sayde lorde of Winchester should haue these wordes that foloweth, to my sayd Lord of Gloucester.

My Lorde of Gloucester, I haue conceyued to my great heauynesse, that ye should haue receyued by diuers reportes, that I should haue purposed and imagined agaynst your person, honoz and estate, in diuers maners, for the which ye haue taken agaynst me great displeasure, Sir I take God to my wittesse, that what reportes so ever haue bene to you of me, peradventure of such as haue had no great affection to me, God forgeue it them, I neuer imagined, ne purposed any thing that might be hindering or preiudice to to your person, honor, or estate. And therefore, I pray you that ye be unto me good lord from this time forth, for by my will I gaue neuer other occasion, nor purpose not to doe hereafter thorough Gods grace.

The which wordes so by him sayde, it was decreed by the sayde Arbitratours, that my lord of Gloucester should answer and say.

Faire Uncle, sith ye declare you suche a man as ye saye, I am right glad that it is so, and for such a man I take you. And when this was done, it was decreed by the sayd Arbitratours that euery eche of my lordes of Gloucester and Winchester should take eyther other by the hande, in the presence of the king and al the parliament, in signe and token of good loue and accord, the which was done and the parliament was adiourned till after Easter.

When the great fyre of thys discention, betweene these two noble personages, was thus by the arbitratours to their knowlege and iudgement utterly quenched out, and layde vnder boorde all other controuersies betwene other Lordes, taking parte with the one partie or the other, were sone appeased and brought to concord, for ioy whereof the king caused a solempne feast, to be kept on whitson Sunday, on the which daye he created Richard Plantagenet, sonne and heire to the Erle of Cambridge (whom his father at Hampton, had put to execution, as you before haue heard) Duke of Yorke, not foreseeing before, that this preferment shoulde be his destruction, nor that his seede should be of hys generation, be the extreme ende and finall confusion. He the same day also promoted John Lorde Howbrey and Erle Marshall, sonne and heire to Thomas Duke of Norfolke, by king Richard the second exiled this Realme and dominion, to the tytle, name, and stile of the Duke of Norfolke, during which feast, the Duke of Bedford adourned the king with the high order of knighthood, which on the same day dubbed with the sword these knights, whose names ensue.

red, and men were prepared in euery Citie, towne and Countrie: Duryng which businesse, Thomas Duke of Excester the sad, wise, and well learned Counsailler, great Uncle to the king, departed out of this mortall lyfe, at the manor of Greenewiche, and was with all funerall pompe conueyed through London to Bury, and there buried. In which yere also dyed the Ladie Elizabeth his halfe sister, and of the whole blood with King Henry the fourth married to Lorde John Holland Duke of Excester, and after to the Lorde Fanhope, buried at the Blacke Friers of London.

While these thinges were thus appointyng and concludyng in England: The Erle of Warwike Lieutenant for the Regent in the realme of Fraunce, entered into the Countrie of Mayne, and besieged the towne of Chasteau de Loyre, the which shortly to him was rendered, whereof he made Capteyne Mathew Gough Esquier. After that, he toke by assault y Castell of Mayet, and gaue it for his valiantnesse to John Winter Esquier, & after that he conquered the Castell of Lund, and made there gouernour William Gladdisole gentelman. At which place he was informed, y the french men were assembled together, in the Countrie of Beausse, wherfore like a valiant Capteine, he with all his power marched thetherward, to encounter with his enemies, and to fight with his aduersaries, which hauing knowlege of his apzoching, fled, and durst not abide the triall, nor leopard the aduenture, and in his returning, he besieged the Castell of Montdublean, wherof was Capteine sir Roberton des Croix, which siege cotinued thre wekes, but in conclusion y English men so fore charged them within, y the capteine with his whole company were content to yelde the Castell, their liues, horse, and harness, onely reserved: which to them was after long consultation had, & many agrements made, frankely graunted. And the sayd Erle of Warwike, leauyng there the valiant Lord Willoughby, returned againe to Paris. Duryng which season, he was ordeyned by the assent of the thre estates of the realme of England, to be gouernour of the yong king, in like maner as the noble Duke of Excester before his death was appoynted & assigned, but yet he taried still in Fraunce, and did there no small seruire as you shall hereafter perceyue.

The Lord Willoughby made gouernour of the yong king.

The Regent of Fraunce thus beyng in England, meanes was made by the Duke of Burgoyne, for the deliuerie of the Duke of Alanson, which was taken prisoner at the battaile of Veruoyle the last yere. So he for the soume of two hundred thousand crownes, was deliuered and set at large: but neither for the release of all, or abatement of part of his raunsome, he would in no wise acknowlege the king of Englad, to be his liege and soueraigne lord: Such affection bare he to the Dolphyn, and such truth shewed he to his naturall Countrie. When all thinges were concluded, ordered, and established, both for the conseruation of peace and tranquillitie within the realme of England, and also for the maintenance of warre, for the finall gainyng of the region of Fraunce: The Duke of Bedford and his wife, toke their leaue of the king, at Westminster, and landed at Calice, with whome also passed the seas, Henry Bishop of Winchester, which in the sayde towne was inuested with the Habite, Hat, and dignitie of a Cardinall, with all Ceremonies to it apperteynyng. Which degree king Henry the fift, knowyng the haute courage, and the ambitious minde of the man, prohibited him on his allegiance once, either to sue for or to take: meanyng y Cardinals Hats should not presume to be egal with princes. But now the king beyng yong, and the Regent his friend, he obteyned that dignitie, to his great profite, and to the impoverishing of the spiritualtie. For by a Bull Legantine, which he purchased at Rome, he gathered so much treasure, that no man in maner had money but he and so was he surnamed the rich Cardinall of Winchester, and neyther called learned Bishop, nor vertuous Priest.

After that, the Duke of Bedford was returned into Fraunce, the Lord of Rustian Marshall of Briteyn, assembled a great companie of the Britishe nation, which fortifyed and repayred the towne of Pontoison, and after the saide Marshall, with a thousand men entered into the Countrie of Constantyne in Normandie, and came before the towne of Aranches. The English men within the garrison, issued out, and boldly fought with their enemies: But after long conflict & many strokes geuen, the Britons were overcome, and the Lorde Rustian taken, and the most part of his people slaine.

The Duke of Bedford heeryng that the towne of Pontoison was newly fortifyed, and strongly defended, sent thether the Erle of Warwike, accompanied with the Lorde Scales, and diuerse other valiaunt Capteynes and Souldiers, to the number of .vij. thousand men to besiege the towne, which so environed it on euery part, that neyther man could scale out, nor beast could passe in. The siege long continuynge, vitaille began to waxe scant in the English armie, wherefore the Lord Scales hauyng in his company, sir John Harpeley Bailly of Constantyne, Sir William Brearton Bailly of Cane, Sir Raufe Tesson, Sir John Carbonell, and thre thousand good men of warre, departed from the siege to get vitail, powder, and other things necessary for their purpose and enterpryse. And as they were returnyng with their cariages on the sea coast, nere to Saint Michaels Mount, they suddenly were encountered with their enemies, whereof the chiefe were the Baron of Coloses, the Lorde Dauseboist Capteine of the sarde Mount, the Lorde Mountabon, the Lorde Mount bouchier, the lorde of Chasteau Siron, the lord of Cynygnat, the lorde Chasteau Brian, with .vij. thousande men of warre. The lorde Scales and his companie (seying that they were compassed on euery syde with deadly daungers, for the sea was on the one syde, and their enemies on the other, & no meane way to escape or flie) descended from their horses, and like gredie Lions together in an vnpeaceable fury, set on their enemies. The skirmishe was strong, and the fight was fierce, the English men kept themselves so close, that their enemies coulde haue no aduantage of them. At the last the lorde Scales cryed Saint George, they flie, with that the Englishmen tooke such a courage, and the Frenchmen that fought before, were so dismayde that they began to flie. The English men leaped againe on horseback, and folowed them, and slue and tooke aboue xi. hundred persons, amongst whome were taken, the Baron of Coloses, and the Lorde of Chasteau Brian, and .xxx. knightes.

After this victorie, the lorde Scales with his vitayles, prouision, and prisoners, returned to the siege, where he was of the Erle and other noble men ioyously receyued, and for this noble fact, highly magnified and prayed. While the siege thus continued before Pontoison, Christopher Hanson and other souldiours of the garrison of saint Susan, made a road into the Countrie of Anjou, and came to a Castell named Ramfort, which Castell was was so priuily scaled, that the Capteyne within and his company, were taken or slaine before they knewe of their enemies approchyng. When knowlege of this scate was made open to the Frenchmen, which were assembled to the number of .xx. thousand to rayse the siege, and to breake by the Campe, lying before the towne of Pontoison, they left that iourney for a tyme, and returned to the Castell of Ramfort, and besieged the same by the space of ten dayes.

The Englishmen consideryng the multitude of the enemies, and the farre absence of their friendes, began to treat with the French men, and so upon condicion to depart with bagge and baggage, horse and harnesse, they rendered by the Castell, and departed with moze riches then they brought, which Castell thus possessed by the French men, they forgoat the reskue at Pontoison, and brake by their armie. But soone after, the lorde of Rais, callyng himselfe Lieutenant generall for the Dolphyn, accompanied with the Lorde Mount Jehan, the lorde Beaumanoyze, and the lorde Tuffie, and other to the number of thre thousand persons, entered into the Countrie of Mayn, and layde siege to the Castell of Malicorne, whereof was Capteyne an English man, called Oliuer Swaterby, which Castell with the Captein was by force taken and obteyned: in like maner they toke the little Castell of Lude, and therein William Blackebozne, Lieutenant for William Glasdale Esquire, and put him to ransome, and slue all his souldiours. After this victorie, in the which they muche glozied, the Frenchmen perceyuyng that the Erle of Warwike continued still his siege before the towne of Pontoison, and knowing by their espials, that the Englishmen were determined to geue them battaile, if they once attempted to rayse the siege, and therefore fearing to fight in an open battaile, reculed backe againe to the Dolphyn with little gaine, and small honour. The Frenchmen and Britons beyng straightly besieged within the towne of Pontoison, perceyuyng no likelihood of succors to come, and seying the English armie daily did encrease, fearing the sequelle thereof, if they by violence should be taken and banquished, they offered the towne, so that they might depart with horse and harnesse only: which request (after long sute and petition) to them was hardely graunted. The Erle lyke a valiaunt Capteyn, entered into the towne, and there appoynted for gouernours, the Lord Roos, and the Lorde Talbot, and leauyng there a conuenient garrison, returned to the Lorde Regent.

After the takyng of this towne, there was a league, and a treatie concluded betwene the Regent and the Duke of Briteyn, by the which agreement both the townes of Pontoison, and Saint James de Beuron were beaten downe to the ground, and clerely defaced. After the Lorde of Rais was departed out of the territorie of Mayn as you haue heard, Christopher Hanson, Philip Gough, Martyn Godfrey called the scaler, and diuerse other of the garrison of Saint Susan, to the number of .xxx. Archers, went out in a Mornyng to seeke their aduentures, and came nere to the Castell of Saint Laurence de Mortiers (at the same very season) when Sir James de Sepeault Capteyne of the same, was gone out of hys Castell with the greatest number of his retinewe, to a Churche directly against the Castell. In the Masse tyme, the Englishmen entered by subtiltie into the gate, and so gat the Dungeon. And when sir James returned from Masse, as he entered into the gate he was taken, and his men fled, and so was the Castell

A league concluded betwene the Duke of Briteyn and the Regent.

Castell furnished with Englishe men, and Capteine there of was appoynted, Sir William Oldehaule.

The same season, Sir John Fastolfe, gouernoz of the Countreies of Anioiw and Hayne, assembled a great puyssaunce of men of warre, and layd a siege before the Castell of Saint Owen Destays, beyde the towne of Lauall, whereof was Capteine Sir Guillam Ozeuge, which, after ten dayes besiegyng, rendered the Castell, their liues and armure onely except: howbeit, one railyng and slaunderous person was put to terrible execution. And from thence, the sayd sir John remoued to the strong Castell of Grauille, and after .xij. dayes, they within offered to yelde the Castell by a day, if they were not succored by the Dolphyn or his power. The offer was taken, and pledges deliuered, which were Gullam Cordouen, and John de Haisiery Esquiers. After these pledges deliuered, sir John Fastolfe returned in post to the Regent, aduertisyng him of this composition and agreement: wherefore the said Lorde raysed a great power, to fight with the frenchmen at the day appointed, and in his companie were the Erles of Mortaigne, and Warwike, and the Lordes Roos, and Talbot, Sir John Fastolfe, Sir John Tubemond, Sir John Katclife, and dyuerse other, to the number of .xx. thousand men, and so marched forward in hope to meete and ioyne Battaille with their enemies. But their aduersaries which were not farre of, durst not approche, wherefore the Regent sent sir John Fastolfe incontinent to receyue the Castell: but they within (contrary to their promise and appoyntment) had newly vitailed and manned the place, and so forsakyng their pledges and felowes in armes, refused to render the fortresse accordyng to the appoyntment: wherefore the pledges were brought before the sight of them within the Castell, and there openly put to death. After this, the Lord Talbot was made gouernoz of Anioiw and Hayn. And Sir John Fastolfe was assigned to another place: which Lord Talbot, beyng both of noble birth, and haute courage, after his commyng into Fraunce, obeyned so many glezious victories of hys enemies, that his onely name was, and yet is dreadfull to the french nation, and much renoumed amongst all other people. This sely Capteyn, & some of the haliant Mars, entered into Hayne, and slue men, destroyed Castels, and brent townes, and in conclusion, sodainly tooke the towne of Lauall: but the Lorde Loghae, and dyuerse other, retrayted themselues into the Castell, and there remayned eight dayes. Duryng which tyme, it was agreed, that all Capteynes, Burgesles, and men of warre, which were within the Castell, should depart with bagge and baggages, payng the Lorde Talbot for all thinges, one hundreth thousand Crownes. And the Castell so beyng deliuered, was committed to the kepyng of Gilbert Halsall, which after, was slaine at the siege of Orleans, for whom was made Capteine Mathewe Cough, which beyng at the iourney before Senlies, by treason of a Miller that kept a Mill adioynyng to the wall, y frenchmen entered into the towne, and brought it into their subiection and obeyssaunce.

The Duke of Alaunson, which, as you haue heard, was late deliuered out of Englande, reuiued agayne the dull spirites of the Dolphyn, and the faint hartes of his Capitaynes, promysing to them great victorie with little trauayle, and much gaine with small labour, wherefore in hope of good luck, he determined to doe some notable feate agaynst the Englishe men. Then happened a chaunce vnlooked for, or vnthought of, euen as they would haue wished or desired, for not onely the Magistrates, but chiefly the spirituall persons of the Citie of Mouns, knowing that the Duke of Britaine and his brother, were reuerted and turned to the french partie, beganne sore to mourne and lament, that they were subiectes and Vassals to the yoke and power of the Englishe men. Wherefore they determined and fully concluded, to aduertise of their mindes and determinations, the Capitaynes of Charles the Dolphyn, (of them called the french king) and so by certain false Friers, thereof wrote humble and louing letters. These newes pleased muche the french Capitaynes, but no lesse you may be sure the Dolphyn himselfe, as a thing descended from heauen, of them vnought, vnimagined and not deuised. Wherefore to take oportunitie when time serued, and not to leese so great a benefite so honestly offered, the Lordes Delabreth and Fayet, Marshals of Fraunce, accompanied with the Lordes of Monte Thon, of Buel Dozual, Corlye and Beaumamoyze the heire, and Guyllyam his brother, and .b. c. other hardie Capitaynes and valiaunt Souldiers, tooke vpon them this enterprize, sending great thankes and laudes to the Clergie and Citezens, for their assured fidelitie to their soueraigne lord, promysing them to be there at the day appointed, not doubting to finde them readye accordyng to their promise, gladly to receiue them.

When the daye assigned and the night appointed was come, the french Capitaynes priuely approached the towne, making a little fire on an hill in the sight of the towne, to signifie their comming and approaching. The Citezens which by the great Church were looking for their approche, shewed a burning Cresset out of the Steeple, which sodainly was put out and quenched. What should I saye, the Capitaynes on horseback came to the gate, and the Traytors within slue the porters and watchemen, and let in their friendes, the footemen entered first, and the men of armes wayted at the barriers, to the intent that if much neede required, or necessitie compelled, they might fight in the open field. And in the meane season, many Englishe men were slayne, and a great clamour and a houghe noise was harde through the towne, as is wont and accustomed to be in a towne, by treason sodainly surprised and taken: but what was the cause of the crie, or beginning of the noyse, few except the confederates, eyther knew or perceyued. For the remnaunt of the Citezens beyng no partakers in this faction, imagened that the English men had made hauock in the towne and put all to the sword. The Englishmen on the other side, iudged that the Citezens had begonne some newe rebellion agaynst them, or else had striuen amongst themselues. The Erle of Suffolk, which was Gouernour of the towne, hearyng the clamour and noyse of the people, hauing perfite knowledge of suche as escaped from the walles, in what case the Citie stood in, without any taryeng or prolongyng of time, entered into the Castell which standeth at the gate of Saint Vincent, whereof was Constable Thomas Sower Esquire: whether also fled so manye English men, that the place was pestured, & there if they were not rescued, likely to be famished: but surely they were sore assaulted and marueylously hurte, with the shot of the Arblasters and Crossebowes, but they defended themselues so manfully, that their enemies gat small aduantage at their handes. But all their hardinesse had not serued, nor all their pollicy had not defended them, if they had not priuely sent a Messenger to the Lorde Talbot, which then laye at Alanson, certefiying him in what case they stood, for bitaile had they none, municions fayled, and the Castell was almost vndermined, so that yelding must folowe, and resistance could not preuaile. The Lorde Talbot hering these newes, neyther slept nor banquetted, but with all hast assembled together his valiaunt Capitaynes, to the number of .vij. hundred men of warre, and in the euening departed from Alanson, and in the morning came to a Castell called Superche two Myles from Mauns, and from thence sent as an espiall Mathew Gough, to espie the gouernaunce of the enemies, and if he might, to shewe to his countrey men that he was at hande, to be their ayde and rescues. Mathew Gough so well sped, that priuely in the night he came into the Castell, where he knewe howe that the French men being lordes of the Citie, and now casting no perilles, nor fearing any creature, beganne to ware wanton and fell to ryot, as though their enemies could doe them no damage: thinking that the English men which were shut vp in the Castell, studied nothing but how to escape & be deliuered. When Mathew Gough had knowne all the certainty, he priuely returned agayne, and within a mile of the Citie met with the Lorde Talbot, and the lorde Scales, and made open to them all thinges according to his credence, which to speede the matter, because the day approached, with all haste possible came to the posterne gate, and alighted from their hozses, and about sixe of the clock in the morning they issued out of the castell, cryeng Saint George, Talbot. The Frenchmen which were scarce bp, and thought of nothing lesse then of this sodaine approachment, some rose out of their beds in their shirts, and lept ouer the walles, other ran naked out of the gates for sauing of their liues, leauing behinde them all their apparell, hozses, armour and ryches, none was hurte but such, which eyther resisted, or would not yeelde, whereof some were slaine and cast in prison. There were slaine and taken foure hundred gentlemen, and the villaines frankely let go. After this, inquisition was made of the authozs of this vngacious coniruration, and there were accused thirtie Citezens, twentie priestes, and fiftene friers, which according to their desertes were put to execution.

In thys yere, as sayth Carion, the Uniuersitie of Loueyne in Brabant was founded by John Duke of Burgondy.

And here to encourage and moue the worshipfull and good Citezens of London to be thankefull to God, and beneficiall to their pooze neighbours, and to the common weale, I thought it good to note vnto you the charitable dedde of a worthe Citezen and Alderman of London named John Kaynewell, who about this time gaue certayne landes and tenements lycng in the sayd Citie, to the Chamber of London, for the which the sayde Chamber is bound for euer to discharge the inhabitauntes of the wardes of Dowgate, Billingsgate and Algate, of all suche fiftenes as from time to time shall be graunted vnto the king (so that it passe not thre fiftenes in one yere.)

The Citie of Houns thus being reduced into the English mens hands, the lorde Talbot departed to the towne of Alanson. After which marciall feate manfully achede, the Erle of Warwike departed into Englande, to be gouernour of the yong king, in stead of Thomas Duke of Excester, late departed to God. In whose steele was sent into Fraunce, the lord Thomas Mountacule

Mountacule Erle of Salisburie, with fve thousand men, which landed at Calice, and so came to the Duke of Bedford in Paris. Where he consulting with the Duke of Bedford, concerning the affayres of the realme of Fraunce: seing all thinges so prosperously succede on the English parte, beganne meruaylously to phantasie the Citie and countrey of Orleans, standing on the Riuer of Loyre. But because the Citie was well fortifed both by the nature of the situation of the place, and by the pollicie of man, he imagined it not the worke of one day, nor the studie of one houre. Wherefore he remitted it to a farther deliberation, yet he was the man at that time, by whose wpt, strength and pollicie, the English name was much fearefull and terrible to the French nation, which of himselfe might both appoint, commaund and doe all thinges in maner at his pleasure, in whose power, (as it appered after his death) a great parte of the conquest consisted and was esteemed, because he was a man both painefull and diligent, redy to withstande thinges perillous and imminent, and prompt in counsayle, and with no labour would be weered, nor yet his courage at any time abated or appalled, so that all men put no more trust in any one man, nor no singular person gat more the hartes of all men. After this great enterprise had long bene debated and argued, in the priue counsayle, the Erle of Salisburies deuise, (although it seemed hard and straunge to al other, and to him as it were a thing predestinate very easie) was graunted and allowed, which enterprise was the finall conclusion of his naturall destiny, as you shall shortly perceyue. Thus he replenished with good hope of victorie, and furnished with artillery, and municions apperteyning to so great a siege, accompanied with the Erle of Suffolke and the Lorde Talbot, and with a valiaunt company, to the number of ten thousand men, departed from Paris, and passed through the countrey of Beaufe: he toke by assault the towne of Painuile, but the Frenchmen fled into the Castell, and there continued fve dayes, at the end wherof they rendered themselves simply: of the sayde number, some were put to death for certaine causes, and some were taken to mercie: he toke also the towne of Batwency, suffering euery man, which would become bassayle and subiect to the king of Englande, to inherite their landes and enioy their goodes. The townes of Meun vpon Loyre and Jargenan, hering of these treatise, presented to him the keyes of the towne, vpon lyke agreement and equall condicions.

After this in the Moneth of September, he layde his siege on the one side of the water of Loyre, and besieged the towne of Orleans, before whose comming, the Bastard of Orleans, and the Bysshop of the Citie and a great number of Scottes hering of the Erles intent, made diuers fortifications about the towne, and destroyed the suburbes, in the which were .xij. Parische Churches, and foure orders of friers. They cut also downe all the vines, trees and bushes within fve leagues of the towne, so that the English men should haue neyther comfort, refuge, nor succour.

Here muste I a little digresse, and declare to you, what was this Bastard of Orleans, which was not onely now Capitayne of the Citie, but also after by Charles the sixt made Erle of Dunoy, and in great auctoritie in Fraunce, and extreme enemye to the English nation, as by this storie you shall apparantly perceyue, of whose line and stem descended the Dukes of Longuile, and the Marques of Rutylon. murdered

murthered in Paris, by John Duke of Burgoyne, as you before haue heard, was owner of the Castell of Concy, on the frontiers of Fraunce towards Arthoys, wherof he made Constable the lord of Cabony, a man not so wise as his wife was faire, & yet she was not so faire, but she was as well beloued of the Duke of Orleans as of her husband, betwene the Duke & her husband (I cannot tel who was father) she conceyued a child, & brought forth a pretie boy called John, which child being of the age of one yere, the Duke diseased and not long after the mother & the Lorde of Cabony ended their luyes. The next of the kinne to my Lorde Cabony, challenged the inheritaunce, which was worth foure thousand crownes a yere, alleging that the boy was a bastard: and the kindred of the mothers side, for to saue her honesty, it plainly denied. In conclusion, this matter was in contention before the Presidents of the Parliament of Paris, and there hanged in controuersie till the chyld came to the age of eyght yeres olde. At which time it was demaunded of him openly whose sonne he was: his friendes of his mothers side aduertised him to require a daye, to be aduised of so great an aunswere, which he asked, and to him it was graunted. In the meane season his sayde friendes perswaded him to claime his inheritaunce, as sonne to the Lorde of Cabony, which was an honorable luying, and an auncient patrimony, affirming that if he sayde contrarie, he not onely slaudered his mother, shamed himselfe, and sternered his blood, but also should haue no luying nor any thing to take to. The scholemaster thinking that his Disciple had well learned his lesson, and would reherse it according to his instruction, brought him before the Judges at the day assigned, and when this question was repeted to him agayne, he boldly answered, my hart geueth me, and my noble courage telleth me, that I am the sonne of the noble Duke of Orleans, more glad to be his Bastard with a meane luying, then the lawfull sonne of that coward Cuckold Cabony, with his foure thousand crownes. The Iustices much marueyled at his bold answer, and his mothers cosyns detested him for shaming of his mother, and his fathers supposed kinne reioysed, in gayning the patrimonie and possessions. Charles Duke of Orleans hearing of this iudgement, tooke him into his family, and gaue him great offices and fees, which he well deserued, for (during his captiuitie) he defended his landes, expelled the English men, and in conclusion procured his delineraunce.

This couragious Bastard, after the siege had continued three weekes full, issued out of the gate of the brydge, and fought with the Englishmen, but they receyued him with so fierce and terrible strokes, that he was with all his company compelled to retire and flie back into the Citie: but the Englishmen folowed them so fast, in kylling and taking of their enemies, that they entered with them the Bulwarke of the brydge: which with a great Towre standing at the ende of the same, was taken incontinent by the English men. In which conflict many French men were taken, but mo were slaine, and the keeping of the Towre and Bulwarke was committed to William Glasdale Esquire. When he had gotten this Bulwarke, he was sure that, by that way neither man nor bitaile could passe or come. After that, he made certain Bulwarkes round about the Citie, casting trenches betwene the one and the other, layeng ordinaunce in every part, where he sawe that any battery might be deuised. When they within perceyued that they were enuironed with fortresses resses and ordinaunce, they laied Gunne against Gunne, and fortified towres agaynst Bulwarkes, and within made new Rampires, and buylded newe Shidwalles, to annoyde crackes and breches, which might by violent shot suddenly insue. They appointed the Bastard of Orleans, and Stephyn Weigold called the heire, to see the walles and watches kept; and the bishop sawe the inhabitants within the Citie were put in good order, and that vittailles were not wantonly consumed, nor baimely spent.

In the Tower that was taken at the brydge ende, as you before haue heard, there was a high Chamber, hauyng a Grate full of barres of yron by the which a man might loke all the length of the brydge into the City, at which grate, many of the chiefe Capteynes stode dyuerse times, biewyng the Citie, and deuising in what place it was best assailable. They within the Citie perceyued well this totyng hole, and layde a piece of ordinaunce directly agaynst the windowe. It so chaunced that the .lix. day after the siege layd before the Citie, the Erle of Sarisbury, Sir Thomas Garraue, and William Glasdale, and diuerse other, went into the sayde Tower, and so into the high Chamber, and looked out at the grate, and within a short space, the sonne of the maister Goomer, perceyuyng men looke out at the Chamber windowe, tooke his matche, as his father had taught him, which was gone downe to dinner, and fired the Goom, which brake and sheuered the yron barres of the grate, wherof, one strake the Erle so strongly on the hed, that it stroke away one of his eyes and the side of his cheeke, Sir Thomas Garraue was likewise stricken, so that he died within two dayes. The Erle was conueyed to Newm upon Loze, where he lay being wounded .viij. dayes, and then died, whose bodie was conueyed into England, with all funerall pompe, and buried at Bissam by his progenitors, leauyng behinde him an onely daughter named Alice, maryed to Richard Newill, sonne to Raufe Erle of Westmerland, of whom hereafter shall be made mencion. What detriment, what damage, and what losse succeded to the English publike wealth, by the sodeine death of this valiaunt Capteyne, not long after his departure, manifestly appered. For the high prosperitie, and great glozie of the English nacion in the partes beyond the sea, began shortly to fall, and little and little to vanishe away: which thing, although the English people like a valiaunt and strong bodie, at the first tyme did not perceyue, yet shortly after, they felt it growe like a pestilent humoz, which successiuelly a little and little corrupteth all the members, and destroyeth the bodie. For, after the death of this noble man, fortune of warre beganne to chaunge, and triumphant victorie beganne to be darkened. Although the death of the Erle were dolorous to all Englishmen, yet surely it was most dolorous to the Duke of Bedford, Regent of Fraunce, as he which had lost his right hande, or lacked his weapon, when he shoulde fight with his enemy. But seeyng that dead men cannot with sorowe be called agayne, nor lamentation for dead bodies cannot remedie the chaunces of men liuyng: He (like a prudent gouernour and a politike patron) appoynted the Erle of Suffolk to be his Lieutenant, and Capteyn of the siege, & ioyned with him the Lord Scales, the Lord Talbot, Sir John Fastolfe, and diuerse other valiant knightes & squiers. These Lordes caused Bastilles to be made round about the Citie, with the which they troubled their enemies, and assaulted the walles, and left nothing vnattempted, which might be to them any aduantage, or hurtfull to their enemies.

In the tyme of Lent, bitaile and artillerie began to waxe scant in the Englishe armie, wherefore the Erle of Suffolke appoynted Sir John Fastolfe, Sir Thomas Rampsone, and Sir Philip Hall, with their retinues, to ride to Parys to the Lord Regent, to enforme him of their scarcenesse and necessitie. Which beyng therof informed, without any delay, or prolongyng, prouided bitaile, artillerie and municions, necessary & conuenient for so great an enterprize, and laded therewith manie Chariots, Cartes, and horses: and for the sure conduite, and sauegarde of the same, he appoynted Sir Simon Morhier, Prionost of Paris, with the garde of the Citie and diuerse of hys awne houtholde seruaunts, to accompanie Sir John Fastolfe, and his Coplices, to the armie lying at the siege of Orleans. The which departed in good order, to the number of fife hundred men of warre, besyde wagoners, out of Parys, and came to Paynuile in Beausse, and in a moornyng earely in a great frost they departed, from the place towarde the siege, and when they came to a towne called Ronuray, in the laundes of Beausse, they perceyued their enemies comyng agaynst them, to the number of. ix. or. x. thousande French men and Scottes: The Capteines whereof was Charles of Cleremont, some to the Duke of Burbon, then beyng prisoner in Englande, Sir William Steward Constable of Scotland, a little before deliuered out of Captiuitie, the Erle of Pardiacke, the Lorde John Wandosme, Vidame of Charters, the Lorde of Touars, the Lorde of Lohat, the lorde of Eglere, the lorde of Beauieu, the Bastarde Tremoile, and many other valiant Capteynes. Wherefore Sir John Fastolfe and his Companions set all their companie in good order of Battaille, and pitched stakes before euery Archer, to breake the force of the horsemen. At their backes they set all their wagons, and cariages, and within them they tied all their horses, so that their enemies could neither assaile them on the backsyde, nor yet spoyle them of their horses, and in this maner they stood still, abiding the assault of their aduersaries. The Frenchmen (by reason of their great number) thinkyng the victorie to be in their handes, egerly lyke Lyons set on the Englishe men, which with great force them receyued, and manfully defended: for it stood them vpon, considering the vnequalitie of the number. And after long and cruell fight, the Englishe men droue backe and vanquished the proude Frenchmen, and compelled them to flie. In this conflict were slaine, Lorde William Steward Constable of Scotland, and his brother, the Lorde Dozwall, the Lord Delabret, the Lorde Chasteaubrian, Sir John Basgot, and other Frenchmen and Scottes, to the number of. xxx. hundreth, and aboue. xi. hundreth taken prisoners, although a French writer affirme the number lesse.

After this fortunate victorie, Sir John Fastolfe and his companie (of the which no man of any reputation was eyther slaine or taken) came with all their cariages, bitaile, and prisoners, to the siege before Orleans, where they were ioyously receyued and welcomed of all the Souldiours. This conflict (because the most part of the carriage was Heryng and Lenten stuffe) the French men call the vnfortunate battaille of Herynges.

The Erle of Suffolke, beyng thus bitayled, continued his siege, and euery day almost skirmished with his enemies, which, being in dyspayre of all succours, began to comon amongst themselves, howe they might render the the towne, to their most honour and profite. After much reasonyng, and long debatynge amongst the Capteines, and the Magistrates of the towne, what way was best to be folowed: Some affirmed it not only to be shameful and dishonourable, but also vnaturall and vnrasonable, to yelde the towne to the Englishe men, beyng neither friendes nor fauourers of the French nation: other, fearyng the victorie of the Englishe men, imagined, that if they by force possessed the Citie, they would do to them as tyrantes be accustomed to serue wilfull and obstinate people, and therefore they thought it a great folly and a notable lightnesse, as well not to beware of the one, as to denie or refuse the other. But when they saw, that their glorie must nedes decline to a shame and reproche, they thought to find a meane way to saue themselves, and their Citie from the captiuitie of their enemies, and deuised to submit their Citie, themselves, and all theirs vnder the obeysance of Philip Duke of Burgoyne, because he was brought out of the stocke & blood royall of the auncient house of France: thinkyng by this meanes (as they did in deede) to breake or minishe the great amitie betwene the Englishe men and him.

After this poynt concluded, they made open and sent to the Duke all their deuises and intentes, which certefied them that he would gladly receyue their offer, so that the Regent of France would thereto agree and consent. And therupon dispatched certeyn Ambassadors to the Duke of Bedford, to whom these newes were straunge and not very pleasant, vpon which poynt, he assembled a great counsaile. Some thought that maner of yeldyng to be both honorable and profitable to the king of England, by reason whereof, so great a Citie, and so rich a Countrie, should be brought out of the possession of their enemyes, into the handes of their trustie friendes, without further coste or bloodshed. The Duke of Bedford and other were of a contrary opinion, thinkyng it both dishonourable, and vnprofitable to the realme of England, to see a Citie so long besieged at the costes and expences of the king of England, & almost brought to the point of yeldyng, to be yelded to any other forein Prince or Potestate, and not to him or his Regent, the example whereof might prouoke other townes hereafter to do the same. This reason tooke place, and the Regent answered the Dukes Ambassadors, that it was not honorable nor yet consonant to reason, that the king of England should beate the Bushe, and the Duke of Burgoyne should haue the birdes: Wherefore sithe the right was his, the warre was his, and the charge was his, he sayde that the Citie ought not to be yelded to no other person, but to him, or to his vse and profite. By this little chaunce, succeeded a great chaunge in the Englishe affayres, for a double mischiefe of this answer arose and sprong out. For first the Duke of Burgoyne began to conceyue a certein priue grudge agaynst the Englishe men for this cause: thinkyng them to enuy and beare malice agaynst his glorie and profite, for the which in continuance of tyme he became their enemy, and cleued to the French king. Secondly, the Englishe men left the siege of Orleans, which by this treatie they might haue had to friend, or to haue continued neuter, till their Lorde the Duke of Orleans, or the Erle of Angulostie his brother were deliuered out of the captiuitie of the Englishe people. But if men were Angels and for saw things to come, they lyke bestes would not runne to their confusion: but fortune which guideth the destenie of man will turne her wheele as shee lusteth, who so ever sayth

While this treatie of the Orleans was in hande, Charles the Dolphyn daily studied, and hourly laboured, to plucke the fauour and heartes of the Nobilitie of Fraunce, from the Englishe Nation, to the entent, that he might assemble a puyssaunce sufficient, to relieue his friendes, beyng shut vp in the Citie of Orleans. While he was studyng and compassyng this matter, there happened to him a straunge chaunce, of the which I will write a little, because some of the frenche Authours, and especially, John Bouchet wyrteth of it to much.

For as he and other say, there came to him beyng at Chynon, a mayde of the age of. xx. yeres, and in mannes apparell, named Jone, bozne in Burgoyne, in a towne called Droymy besyde Vancolour, which was a greatespace a Chamberlein in a common Hostrey, and was a Kampe of such boldnesse, that she would course horses, and ride them to water, and do thinges, that other yong maydens both abhorred and were ashamed to do: yet as some say, whether it were because of her foule face, that no man would desire it, either because she had made a boboe to liue chaste, she kept her maydenhed, and preserved her virginitie. She (as a monster) was sent to the Dolphyn, by sir Robert Wandencort Capteyne of Vancolour, to whome she declared, that she was sent from God, both to ayde the miserable citie of Orleans, and also to restore him to the possession of his realme, out of the which he was expelled and ouercommed: reherlyng to him visions, traunces, and fables, full of blasphemie, superstition, and hypocrisie, that I marueyle much that wise men dyd beleue her, and learned Clerkes would wyrite such phantasies. What should I reherse, howe they say, she knewe and called him her king, whome she neuer sawe before? That she had by reuelation a sworde, to her appoynted in the Church of Saint Katheryn, of fierboys in Torayne where she neuer had bene: that she declared such priuie messegges from God, our Ladie, and other saints, to the Dolphyn, that she made the teares ronne downe from his eyes: So was he deluded, so was he blinded, and so was he deceyued by the Deuilles meanes which suffered her to begin her race, and in cōclusion rewarded her with a shamefull fall. But in the meane season, such credence was geuen to her, that she was honozed as a saint of the religious, and beleued as one sent from God of the Tempozaltie, insomuch that she (armed at all poyntes) rode from Moyters to Bloys, and there founde men of warre, vitaille, and municions, readie to be conueyed to Orleans.

The Englishe men perceiuyng that they within could not long continue for default of vitail & powder, kept not their watch so diligently as they were accustomed, nor scoured not the Countrie enuironed, as they before had ordeyned: which negligence, the Citizens beyng shut in perceiuyng, sent word thereof to the frenche Capteynes, which with Duzell in the dead time of the night, and in great raine and thunder, with all their vitaille and artillerie entered into the City. And the next day the Englishe men boldly assaulted the towne, promisyng to them that best scaled the walles great rewarde. Then men mounted on Ladders couragiously, and with Connes, Arrowes and Pikes, beate their enemyes from the walles.

The Frenchmen, although they marueyled at the fierce fighting of the Englishe people, yet they were not amased, but they defended themselves to the darke night; on which day no great priuate feate, worthy of memorie, was eyther attempted or done. The Bastards of Orleans (seing the puyssaunce of the Englishe nation) beganne to feare the sequete of the matter: wherefore he sent worde to the Duke of Alaunson, aduertisyng him in what case the towne then stode; and that it could not long continue without hys hasty speede, and quick diligence. Which delayng no time, nor deserting no space, came with all his army within two leagues of the City, and sent worde to the Capitaynes, that on the next morow they should be ready to receiue them. Which thing the next daye they accomplished, for the Englishe men thought it to be much to their auaille, if so great a multitude entered into the Citie, vexed with famine and replenished with scarcenesse. On the next day in the morning the frenchemen altogether issued out of the towne, and assaulted the fortreffe or Bastile, called the Bastile of Saint Loure, the which with great force, and no little losse they tooke and set it on fyre, and after assaulted the Towre at the bridge foote, which was manfully defended. But the frenche men being more in number, so fiercely assaulted it, that they tooke it: the Lorde Calbot could come to succours, in the which William Gladysdale the Capitayne was slaine, and the Lorde Moyngs, and the Lorde Downyngs also.

The Frenchmen puffed by with this good luck, seing the strong Fortresse was vngotten, which was vnder the defence of the Lorde Calbot, fetched a compasse about, and in good order of battayle marched thatherward. The Lorde Calbot lyke a Capitayne without feare or dread of so great a multitude, issued out of his Bastile, and so fiercely fought with the frenche men, that they not able to withstand his puyssaunce, fled (lyke sheepe before the wolfe) agayne into the Citie, with great losse of men and small artillerie: and of the Englishe men were lost in the two Bastiles sixe hundred persons. Then the Erle of Suffolke, the Lorde Calbot, the Lorde Scales, and other Capitaynes, assembled together, where causes were shewed, that it was both necessary and conuenient eyther to leaue the siege for euer, or to deferre it till an other time, more luckey and conuenient. And to the intent that they should not seme eyther to flie or to be driuen from the siege by their enemyes, they determined to leaue their fortresses and Bastiles, and to assemble in the plaine field, and there to abide all the day, abyding the outcomyng and battayle of their enemyes. This conclusion taken, was accordingly executed. The frenche men weried with the last bickering, held in their heades, and durst not once appere: and so they set fyre in their lodgings, and departed in good order of battayle from Orleans. The next day, which was the eyght day of May, the Erle of Suffolke, ryding to Jargeaux with foure hundred Englishe men, and the Lorde Calbot with an other company returned to Meum. Which towne after that he had fortested, he incontinent assaulted and warne the towne of Lauall and the Castell, soze beyng and punishing the townes men, for their hard hartes, and cancarde obstinacie: and leauing there a garrison, reculed to Meum.

After that the Englishe men were thus retired from the siege of Orleans, and seuered themselves in diuers townes and fortresses, holding on their parte: The Duke of Alaunson, the Bastard of Orleans, Jone the Duzell, the Lorde of Gancort, and diuers other frenche men, came before the towne towne of Fargeaux, where the Erle of Suffolke, and his two brethren sojournd, the twelue day of June, and gaue to the towne a great and terrible assault, which the Englishe men, (being but a handfull) manfully defended on three partes of the same. Boyton of Sentrailes, perceyuing one part of the towne to be vndefended, scaled the walles on that part: and without any difficultie tooke the towne, and slue sir Alexander Pole brother to the Erle, and many other, to the number of two hundred: but they not much gaped, for they lost three hundred good men and more. Of the Englishe men were taken .xl. beside his brother John. After thys gayne and good luck, the french men returning towarde Orleans, fell in contention and debate, for their captiues and prisoners, and slue them all, sauing the Erle and his brother.

After the gayning of the towne of Fargeaux, the same armie came to Meun, and tooke the towne at the bridge, and put therein a garrison, and from thence remoued to Banguency. Which garrison being not vittayled rendered the towne, so that they might depart with bagge and baggage, frankly and freely: which desire to them was graunted. At this towne of Banguency met with the Duke of Maunson, Arthur of Britayne the false forsworne Gentleman to the king of Englande, newely made Constable of Fraunce (as you haue heard) with whom was the Lorde Delabret with .xiiij. hundred men, to whome daylie repayed frethe ayde out of euery parte, as the Erle of Wandosme, and other to the number of .xx. or .xxiiij. thousand men. All these men of warre, determined to go to Meun, and to take the towne, but they were informed, that the Englishe men had left the towne desolate, and were returned to the Lorde Talbot to Jeneuille. Then they concluded to passe towarde that towne. But as they marched forward vpon a Saturday, they had perfite knowlege, that the Lorde Talbot with five thousand men, was comming to Meun. Wherfore they intending to stop him a tyde, conueyed their company to a small Village called Patay, which way they knewe that the Englishe men must nedes passe by. And first they appointed their horsemen, which were well and richely furnished, to go before, and sodainely to set on the Englishe men, or they were, epyther ware or set in order. The Englishe men comming forward perceyued the horsemen, and imagining to deceyue their enemies, commaunded the footemen to enuiron and enclose themselves about with their stakes, but the french horsemen came on so fiercely, that the archers had no leysure to set themselves in aray. There was no remedie, but to fight at aduventure. This battayle continued by the space of three long houres. And although the Englishe men were ouerpressed, with the number of their aduersaries, yet they neuer fled back one foote, till their Captayne the Lorde Talbot was sore wounded at the backe, and so was taken. Then their hartes began to faint, and they fled, in which flight, there were slayne about twelue hundred, and taken .xl. wherof the Lorde Talbot, the Lorde Seales, the Lorde Hungerford, and Sir Thomas Rampstone, were the chiefe: Howbeit diuers archers which had shot all their arrowes, hauing onely their swordes, defendyng themselves, and with the helpe of some of the horsemen, came safe to Meun.

When the same was blowen abroad, that the Lorde Talbot was taken, all the french men not a little reioysed, thinking surely that now the rule of the Englishe men should shortly asswage and waxe faynt: for feare whereof, whereof, the townes of Jeneuille, Meun, Fort, and dyuers other, returned from the Englishe parte, and became french, to the great displeasure of the Regent. From this battayle departed without any stroke stricken, s<sup>r</sup> John Fastolfe, the same yere, for hys balyauntnesse elected into the order of the Garter: For which cause the Duke of Bedford, in a great anger toke from hym the Image of saint George, and his Garter: but afterward, by meane of friends, and apparaunte causes of good excuse by hym alleged, he was restored to the order agayne, agaynst the minde of the Lorde Talbot.

Charles, calling himselfe french king, being aduertised of this victoery, thought nowe that all things succeeded, according to his opinion and good hope, which euer was of that high courage and haute minde, that in hys most aduersitie, he neuer dispayred in good lucke at length: so that the Erle of Salisburie being dead, and the Lorde Talbot lying in captiuitie (which were the glory of his enemies) he thought to enterprize great and waighty things, where before he medeled with small and little doings. For fulfilling of his minde and appetite, he determined, first to conuere the Citie of Reynes, to the intent that he being there, might according to the fashyon of his progenitors, with all accustomed Ceremonies, be sacred and annoynted king, that all men might see and perceyue, that he was by all lawes and decrees, a iust and a lawfull king. Wherfore he assembling together a great armie, and hauing in his companie Joan the Duzell, whome he vsed as an Oracle and a Southsayer, passed thorough Champaigne by the Towne of Anzer which he besieged, they within sent to him Messengers, prayeng him of certaine dayes of abstinence of warre, in the which (if they were not rescued) they promised to render the towne. He not wylling to recompence with ingratitude the louing hartes of the Citizens, graunted gently to their petition, and leauing there certain persons, to see that they should not iuggle with hym, departed from thence to Troys, being the chiefe Citie of Champaigne, which he besieged twelue dayes. Sir Phillip Hall Captayne there, b<sup>r</sup>oupyed both of vitayle and men, mistrusting that ayde would not come in time, vpon composition rendered the towne, so that he and his, with all their mouables might in safetie departe the Citie: which demaunde was agreed to. After that Troys was yeilded, the communalite of Chalons rebelled against sir John Awbemond their capitayne, and constrayned him to deliuer the towne vpon like composition, which against his will he was faine to doe: and likewise did the citizens of Reins, desiring him to geue safe conduite to all Englishe men, safely to departe.

When he had thus conquered Reins, he in the presence of all the Noble men of his faction, and the Dukes of Lozayne and Barre, was sacred king of Fraunce, by the name of Charles the sixt, with all tytles and ceremonies thereto apperteyning. They of Anzer which were not rescued within the time appointed, brought the keyes to him, and submitted themselves to hys obeyfaunce: lyke wise did all the Cities and townes adioyning, geuyng thanks to almighty God, which hauyng compassion on their miserie, had restored them to libertie and freedome.

The Duke of Bedford, hearing that these townes had returned to the parte of his aduersaries, and that Charles late Dolphin had taken vpon him the name and estate of the king of Fraunce, and also seing that daylie Cities and and towne returned from the English part, and became French, as though the English men had nowe lost all their hardie Chiefetaynes and balyant men of warre, espyed and evidently perceyued, that the laste and vttermost point of recouery, was driuen onely to ouercome by battayle, and to subdue by force. By which victorie (as he put his confidence in God) he trusted not onely to scourge and plague the Cities, which were so sodainely chaungeable, but also to asswage and caulme the haute courage of the newe sacred French king and his companions. Wherefore he hauing together ten thousand good English men (beside Normans) departed out of Paris in warlike fashion, and passed through Bre to Monstrell Faultow, and there sent by Bedford his Heralde letters to the French king, alleging to him that he contrary to the lawes of God and man, yea and contrary to the finall conclusion, taken, concoyded, and agreed betweene his noble brother king Henry the fift, and king Charles the fift, father to the sayde now vsurper, leauyng all humane reason and honest communication (which sometime appeareth debates and pacifyeth strifes) onely allured and entyled by a deuillish witch, and a fanaticall Enchaunteresse, had not only falsely and craftely taken vpon him, the name, title & dignity of the king of France: but also had by murder, stealing, craft, and deceitfull meanes, violently gotten, and wrongfully kept, diuers Cities and towne, belonging to the king of England, his most beloued Lorde, and most dearest Nephew. For profe wherof, he was come downe from Paris with his armie, into the Countrey of Beye, by dent of sworde, and stroke of battayle, to proue his wytyng and cause true, willing his enemy to chose the place, and he in the same would geue him battayle.

The newe French Kyng, departyng from his solempne ceremonies at Reins, and remouing from thence to Dampmartine, studyng howe to compass the Parisians, eyther with money, or with promise, was somewhat troubled with this message, howbeit, he made a good countenance, and a French bragge, aunsweryng to the Heralde: that he would sooner seeke hys mayster the Duke, then that the Duke should pursue him. The Duke of Bedford heying his aunswere, marched toward him, and pitched his field in a strong place, and sent out diuers of his raungers, to prouoke the French men to come forward. The French king was in maner determined to abide the battayle, but when he heard saye by his Espialles, that the power and number of the English men were to his army equall in power, he determined that it was more for his profite, to abstaine from battayle without danger, then to enter into the conflict with iopardie: fearing least that with a rashe courage, he might ouerthrowe all his affayres, which so effectuously proceeded. And so well aduised, he turned with his armie a little out of the way. The Duke of Bedford perceyning his faint courage, followed him by Mountaynes and dales, till he came to a Towne in Barre, not farre from Senlis, where he found the French king and his army. Wherefore he ordered his battayle, lyke a man expert in marciall science, setting the Archers before, and himselfe with the noble men in the mayne battayle, and put the Normans on both sides for the winges. The French king also ordered hys battayles, accordyng to the deuise of his Capitaynes. Thus these two armies without any great doing (except a fewe skirmishes, in the which the Dukes light horsemen did very balyantly,) laye eche in sight of other, by the space of two dayes and two nightes. But when the French king sawe, and perceyued, how glad, howe diligent and couragious the English men were to fight and geue battayle, he imagined that by his taryng, one of these two things must nedes chaunce: that is to say, eyther he should fight against his will, or lye still like a coward, to his great rebuke and infamie. Wherefore in the dead of the night (as priuely as he could) he brake by his campe and fled to Bray. When this flight was perceyued in the morning, the Regent could scarce refraine his people, from folowynge the French army, calling them cowardes, dastardes, and loutes, and therefore, he perceyuing that by no meanes, he could allure the newe French king to abide battayle, mistrusting the Parisians, and geuing no great credite to their saye, swete, and flattering wordes, returned agayne to Paris, to assemble together a greater power, and so to prosecute his enemies.

In this season, the Bohemians (which belike had espyed the vsurped authoritic of the Bishop of Rome) began to Rebell against his See. Wherefore, Martin the fift, Bishop of Rome, wrote vnto them to absteyne from warre, and to be reconciled by reason, from their damnable opinions. But they (beyng perswaded to the contrary) neyther gaue eare vnto him, nor yet obeyed his voyce. Wherefore the Bishop of Rome, wrote to the Princes of Germanie, to invade the Realme of Beame, as the den of heretykes. Beside this, he appoynted Henry Bishop of Winchester, and Cardinall of Saint Eusebie, a man very well bozne (as you haue heard) but no better bozne then high stomacked, to be his Legate in this great iourney, and to bring out men from the Realme of England, into the Countrey of Beame. And because the war touched religion, he licenced the sayd Cardinall, to take the tenth part of euery spirituall dignitie, benefice and promocion. This matter, was declared in open Parliament in England, and not dissented, but gladly assented to, wherfore the bishop gathered the money, and assembled foure thousand men, and mo, not without great grudge of the people, which daily were with tallages and aydes weried, and soze burdened. And when men, municions, and money were redie for his high enterpryse, he with all his people came to the Sea strand at Douer, redie to passe ouer the Sea into Flaundyrs.

But in the meane season, the Duke of Bedford consideryng, how towne daily were gotten, and Countries hourly wonne in the realme of fraunce, for lacke of sufficient defence and number of men of warre, wrote to his brother the Duke of Gloucester, to relieue him woth ayde, in that tempestuous tyme and troubleous season. When this letter was brought into England, the Duke of Gloucester was not a little amazed, because he had no armie redie to sende at that tyme: For by the reason of the Crewe sent into Beame, he could not sodainly rayse a newe armie. But because the matter was of such importance, and might neyther be from day to day differred, nor yet long delayed, he wrote to the Bishop of Winchester, to passe with all his armie toward the Duke of Bedford, which at that tyme had both nede of men and assistance, consideryng that nowe, all stood vpon losse or gaine: which thing done, and to his honor achieved, he might performe his iourney agaynst the Bohemians. Although the Cardinall was somewhat moued with this counteraund, yet least he should be noted, not to ayde the Regent of fraunce, in so great a cause, and so necessary an enterpryse, he bowed from his former iour-ney, and passed the sea with all his companie, and brought them to his Cosin, to the Citie of Parys.

Charles the Frenche King, hauyng knowlege in the meane season by his espials, which went round about the Country, to intise & sollicite townes and Cities, to returne from the Englishe part, and become French, that the inhabitantes of Champaine, and Beuauoys, ought to him great loue and singuler fauour, and gladly coueted to renounce the subiection of England, and to be vnder his protection, and also offered to open him their Gates, so that they should not thereby, be in iopardie of their luyes, and losse of their goodes, with all hast and diligence remoued towarde Champaigne. The Duke of Bedforde beyng aduertised of his progresse, and hauyng his arme augmented, with the newe ayde, which the Cardinall had of late conducted, marched forward with great speede to encounter and geue battayle, to hys mortall enemye the French king. When the Duke was come to Senlis, the Frenchmen were lodged on the Mountpilioll, betwene Senlis and Champaigne. Every army knewe of other, and every host might beholde other. Then the Campes were trenched, and the battayles pitched, and the fieldes ordered.

Thus these great armies laye two dayes, nothyng doyng but wryth skirmitches, in the which the Normanes sore bered the French men. Wherefore the Lord Regent, gaue to them many high laudes and praisynge, and determined surely the next day to set on the French king in his Campe, if he would abyde battaile. But while king Charles did polletikely consider, what a variable Lady, Fortune was, and what a sodein and vnthought chaunce of a small thing, might do in a battaile: for the detrimetes and ouerthrowes, that he and his Nation had taken and tasted by the Englishe men, were to them a learnyng, to auoyd open ioinyng, mutuall conflict, and force to force. And besyde that, he had by his searchers and spyes, plaine and perfect knowlege, that many and diuers Cities and townes in Fraunce, abhorryng the English libertie, and aspyryng to the French bondage and native seruitude, (acordyng to the nature of Asses, which the more they be charged with, the more they desyre) would (when they sawe their tyme) not onely rebell and returne to his faction and part, but also were redie to ayde and assist him, in recovery of his desired realme and auncient dominion, in expellyng also the Englishe nacion out of the territories of Fraunce. And therefore he imagined that the Duke of Bedford, was so hastie to geue him battaile, thinkyng that if he then were overcome, the game had for the Englishmen bene clerely gotten, and to the Frenchmen, a perpetuall checkmate. Wherefore he determined neuer (except very necessitie compelled or constrayned him) to fight in open battaile with the Englishmen, nor by a field to aduenture his realme with them, of whome his predecessors so often tymes had bene vanquished, wherefore like a carpet Capteyne, he in the night, remoued his Campe and fled to Crespie, and yet his number was double to the Englishe armie. The Duke of Bedford seeyng that the French king, was thus cowardly retrayed, and as a man which durst not once assay the stroke of an Englishe arme, shamefully reculed: with all his power and armie, and returned againe to Parys, sore suspectyng the deceitfull fayth of the polletique Parisians. The Bishop of Winchester, after the French kinges flight, went into Beame, and there there did somewhat, but what it was Authours kepe silence, and so do I: But shortly he without any great prayse, and small gaue, returned into England, more glad of his retraite, then of his aduauuncyng forwarde. Sone after the Bishop of Rome without his agreement, vnlegated him, and set another in his steede and aucthoritie, with which doyng he was neyther content, nor pleased.

On the sixt day of Nouember, beyng the day of Saint Leonard, king Henry, in the eight yere of his reigne, was at Westminster with all pompe and honoz, crowned king of this realme of England.

But to returne to the troubleous warres in Fraunce. After that the French king was fled from the Duke of Bedford (as you haue heard before) and was come to Crespy in Valoys, he was credibly informed, how the Citizens of Champaigne, desired greatly to be vnder his gouernaunce and subiection. Wherefore he mindyng not to lese so fayre an offered pray, ceased not till he came to the towne, where with al reuerence and benignitie, he was repued and welcommed. And after that, were rendered to him the townes of Senlis and Beauoys. And the Lorde Longuenall tooke by stealth, the Castell of Aumerle, and slue all the Englishe men, and in short space, the Lorde Barbason, which long had bene prisoner in the Castell Baylard, so muche, what with fayre wordes and large promises, perswaded his keepers, that he not only deliuered his aboue person, but also caused the towne, to turne from the English men, to the part of king Charles his mayster. Which king although he much reioysed, at the good successe, that Fortune had to hym sent, yet he was somewhat desperate, how to recover his countrie from the possession of the English men, except he vnknuitted the knot and league, betwene the Duke of Burgoyne and them. Wherefore, he sent his Chaunceloz, and diuers Ambassadors to the Duke of Burgoyne, first excusyng himselfe of the death and murther of Duke John his father, and after, declaryng to him, that there could be nothing more foule, more dishonest, nor more detestable, then, for his aboue peculiar cause, and priuate displeasure, to ioyne with hys auncient enemies, and perpetuall aduersaries agaynst his native Countrie and naturall Nation: Not onely requiryng him of concord, peace, and amity, but also promisyng golden Mountaines, and many more benefites, then at that tyme, he was eyther able or could performe. This message was not so secreete, nor the doyng so closely clokod, but the Duke of Bedford, thereof was plainely enformed. Which, beyng sore troubled, and vnquieted in hys minde, because he sawe the power of the Englishe nacion, dayly waxe lesse, he of all thinges first foreseyng, if any losse should of necessitie chaunce, of those townes and Countries, which his noble brother king Henry the fift had conquered, in the very Countrie of Fraunce, for lacke of tuicion or defence: yet for an Ankerholde, he determined to kepe, possesse, and defende, the Duchie of Normandie the olde inheritaunce and auncient Patrimonie of the kinges of England, and from them onely, by force and not by iustice, by violence and not by right, sithe the tyme of King Henry the thirde, (the deuillish deuision then reigntyng in the realme) wrongfully deteyned, and iniutiously vsurped. Wherefore, he diligently prouidyng, for thinges that might chaunce, appointed gouernoz of the Citie of Parys, Lewes of Lurenborough, Bishop of Curwoyne and Ely, beyng Chaunceloz of Fraunce, for the king of England, a man of no lesse wit, then of birth, leauyng with him a conuenient number of Englishmen to defend both the Citie and territorie of Paris, and the Isle of Fraunce, then beyng in the Englishe mens possession and gouernaunce.

These thinges thus ordered, he departed from Paris, into Normandie, and called at Roan a Parliament, of the three estates of the Duchie, in the which he declared vnto them, the great liberties, the manifolde priuileges, the innumerable benefites, which they had receyued of the kinges of Eng- land, duryng the tyme that they were possessors, and Lordes of the same Duchie, not puttyng in obliuion, the miserie, bondage, and calamitie, which they had susteyned, by the intollerable yoke, and dayly tributes, continually layde in their neckes lyke Asses, by the cruell and couctous Frenchmen: And puttyng them also in remembraunce, how the kinges of England, were not onely brought forth and disceded of the Normans blood and progenie, but were the very true and bndoubtfull heyres, to the same Countrie & Duchie, lineally succeeding, and lawfully descendyng from Rollo the hardie, first Duke and prince of the same Dominion: Requiryng them further, to liue in loue and amitie amongst them selves, to be true and obedient to the king their souerigne Lorde, and to kepe their othe and promes, made and sworne to his noble brother, king Henry the fift, promisyng to them, English libertie, and priueleges royall.

While the Duke of Bedford was thus interteinyng and encouraging the Normans, Charles the newe French king, beyng of his departure aduertised, longyng and thirstyng for to obteyne Paris, the chiefe Citie & prin- cipall place of resort, within the whole realme of Fraunce, departed from the towne of Senlis wel accompanied, and came to the towne of Saint Denise, which he found desolate, and abandoned of all garrison, and good gouernare. Wherefore, without force and small damage, he entered into the boyd towne and lodged his armie at Mountmartir, and Abberuilliers, nere adioyning, and lyng to the Citie of Parys. And from thence, sent John Duke of Alan- son, and his sorceresse Joan (called the Mayde sent from God) in whom, his whole affiaunce then consisted, with three thousand light horsemen, to get a- gaine the Citie of Paris, eyther by force, or by sayre flatteryng, or reasonable treatie, and after them, he without delay or deferryng of tyme, with all hys power, came betwene Mountmartir and Parys, and sodeinly approached the gate of Saint Honore, setting by Ladders to the walles, and casting fag- gots into the ditches, as though he would with a French brag, sodeinly haue gotten the sayre Citie. But the Englishe Capteynes, euey one keepyng his warde and place assigned, so manfully and fiercely, with a noble courage, de- fended themselves, their walles and Towers, with the assistance of the Paris- siens, that they rebuted and draue away the frenchmen, and thre w do bone Jone, their great Goddesse, into the botome of the towne ditche, where she lay behinde the backe of an Ass, sore hurt, till the tyme that she all filthie with mire and dirt, was drawen out, by Gyschard of Chienzone, seruaunt to the Duke of Alaunson. The French king, seyng the great losse, that he had susteyned at this assault, and accompted his pretended conquest in maner im- possible, leauyng the dead bodies behinde him, and takyng with him, the wounded Captaynes, which were of no small number, returned into Berry. But in the meane way, the Citezens of Laignie became his subiectes, and made made to him an othe, promisyng to continue from thenceforth to him, both true and obedient.

The Duke of Bedford commenceth the Citezens of Paris.

The Duke of Bedford, beyng in Normandie, and heeryng of this sodain attempt, lost no tyme, nor spared no trauaile, till he came to Parys. Where he not onely thanked the Capteynes, and praysed the Citezens for their assured fidelitie and good will, towarde their king and souerigne Lorde, but also extolled their hardinesse, and manly doynges, above the Starres, and highe elementes: promisyng to them, honour, fame, and great aduancementes. Which gentle exhortacion, so incozaged and inflamed the heartes of the Pa- risians, that they sware, promised, and concluded, to be friendes euer to the king of England and his friendes, and enemies always to his foes and ad- uersaries, makyng proclamation by this stile. Friendes to king Henrie, friendes to the Parisians, enuemies to England, enuemies to Parys. But if they spake it with their hearts, eyther for feare, that Charles the french king should not punish them, if he once obteyned the superioritie ouer their Citie and towne, or that they flattered the Englishmen, to put themselues in cre- dite with the chiefe Capteines, you shall plailely perceiue, by the sequele of their actes.

Sone after these doynges, came to Parys with a great companie Phi- lip Duke of Burgoyne, which was of the Regent, and the Ladie his wife, ho- nourably receyued, and highly feasted. And after long consultation had, for the recoueryng of the towne, lately by the french king stollen and taken, it was agreed, that the Duke of Bedford, should rayse an armie, for the reco- uerie of the sayd fortresses, and that the Duke of Burgoyne, should be his de- putie, and tary at Parys, for the defence of the same. After this great busi- nesse thus concluded, and appoynted, the Duke of Bedford himselfe, without any great resistance, recouered againe the towne of Saint Denise, and dy- uers other Castels. And after that done, he sent the Bastard of Clarence, to lay siege to the Castell of Coursie, beyng both by the naturall situation, and mannes pollicie, very strong and in maner vnable to be beaten downe. The siege continued six monethes, but in conclusion, the Captaine discomfited of all releue and succor, rendred the fortresse, the life of him and his souldiours onely saued: which offer was taken, and the Castell rased, and cast downe to the ground. Duryng this siege, Sir Thomas Kiriell knight, with foure hundreth Englishmen, departed from Gournay in Normandie, and road by Beauoys, spoliyng, robblyng and wastyng the Countrie, to the Suburbes of Cleremount. Whereof, heeryng the Erle of the same towne, assembled all the men of warre, of the garrisons adioyning, to fight with the Englishmen: and so the french men with all diligence set forwarde, and found their ene- mies in a straight place, nere vnto Beauoys. The Erle of Cleremount seing that he could not hurt them with his men of armes, by reason of the straight, came downe on foote with all his companie, and fiercely set on the Englishe men. The fight was fierce, and the aduantage doubifull. But in conclu- sion, the archers shot so terribly, that the french men not able to abide the smart, and gaules of the arrowes, fled apace, and the Englishmen leauyng the straight, leaped on horsebacke, and folowed the chase. In the which were taken two hundreth prisoners, and thrise as many slaine. The Erle, by the swiftnesse of his horse escaped his enemies, and came to the towne of Bea- uoys:

uoyes : and so Sir thomas Kiriell, with plentie of spoyle and prisoners, returned to Couruay, rendyng to God his hartie thankes for that good chaunce and happie victorie.

Yet fortune sent not this good luck alone, for the Erle of Suffolke at that same very season, besieging the towne of Amacle, whereof was capitaine the Lorde Raumbures (after. xxiii. great assaults geuen to the forresse) had the towne and Castell to him simply rendered. Wherefore, he caused. xxx. of the townes men, for their vntruth to be hanged on the walles, and all the rest he ransomed, and sent the Capitayne into England, where he remayned sixe yerres continually, and after by exchange was deliuered. After this, the Erle fortified the towne with men, munitions and bytaile, and so by a little and little, the English men recovered agayne many townes which before they had lost, without any great losse of their people. Which thing the frenche men well considering, imagined by what meanes, how to get agayne the towne of Laual, which the Lorde Talbot (before as you haue heard) gat by scalpyng in a night. Wherefore to possesse their desired pray, they with money and gay promises, first corrupted a Miller, that kept a Mill adioyning to the wall, so that the Miller suffered the Lorde Homet with three hundred other, to passe thozough his Mill into the towne, in a very darke night. When they were entered, they slue the keepers of the gate, and let in the Lorde Bertrand de la Ferrier, with five hundred men of armes: which eyther slue or tooke prisoners, all the English men within the towne, And shortly after, by Stephin de Vignoles called the Heire, tooke by scaling, the towne of Louiers in Normandy, and did much dammage, to all the townes adioyning.

While these chaunces happened, betwene the English men and French men, Philip Duke of Burgoyne, married the Ladye Isabell, daughter to John King of Portyngall, and great aunt to the King of England. In honour of which mariage, he instituted and beganne an order of. xxxvi. knights without reproche, called the order of the golden fleece, and deuised statutes, Mantels, collers and ceremonies for the same, much lyke to the ordinances of the noble order of the Garter begonne in Englande, almost an hundred yerres before the inuention of this fraternitie and friendship. On the which wyfe, he begat the hardie Duke Charles, father to Marie, after married to Maximilian king of the Romaynes, as (when place requireth) shall be hereafter to you declared.

In thys very season the English men in the colde Moneth of December, besieged the towne of Laigny, in the which was the Duzel and dyuers other good Capitaynes. But the weather was so colde, and the rayne so great and continuall, that they of force compelled, not by their enemies, but by the intemperate season, reysed their siege: and in their returne, the Duzel and al the garrison within the towne, issued out and fought with the English men, where (after long fighting) both parties departed without eyther great gaine or losse. After this enterpryse done, the Duke of Burgoyne accompanied with the Erles of Arundell and Suffolke, and the Lorde John of Luxembzough, wyth a great puyssaunce, besieged the towne of Compeigne: which towne was well walled, manned and bytailed, so that the besiegers must eyther by assault or long taryeng, wearie or famishe them within the towne.

towne. So they cast trenches, and made mynes, and studied all the wayes that they could deuise, howe to compassse their conquest and interpryse. And it happened in the night of the Ascension of our Lorde, that Ponthon of Fentrales, Jone the Duzell, and five or sixe hundred men of armes, issued out of Compeigne, by the gate of the bridge towarde Mowntdedier, intending to set fyre in the tents and lodgings of the Lorde of Baudo, which was then gone to Marigny, for the Duke of Burgoyns affayres. At which time by John of Luxembzough, wyth eyght other gentlemen (which had ridden about the towne to serche and biewe, in what place the towne might be most aptly and conueniently assaulted or scaled) were come nere to the lodging of the Lorde of Baudo, where they espyed the french men, which beganne to cut downe tents, ouerthrowe pavilions, and kill men in their beds. Wherefore shortly they assembled a great number of men, as well English as Burgoyons, and couragiously set on the french men. Soze was the fight and great was the slaughter, in so much that the french men, not able lenger to indure, fled into the towne so fast, that one letted the other to enter. In which chase was taken, Jone the Duzell, and diuers other: which Jone was sent to the Duke of Bedford to Roan, where (after long examination) she was brent to ashes. This witch or manly woman (called the mayde of God) the french men grealy glorified and highly extolled, alleging that by her Dzealunce was vitayled: by her king Charles was sacred at Keynes, and that by her, the English men were often times put back and ouerthrowne. O Lorde, what dyspayse is this to the Nobilitie of fraunce: What blot is this to the french Nation: What moze rebuke can be imputed to a renowned Region, then to affirme, wyrite and confesse, that all notable victories, and honorable conquestes, which neyther the king with his power, nor the nobilitie with their valiantnesse, nor the counsaile with their wit, nor the commonaltie with their strength could compassse or obtaine, were gotten and achieved by a shepherdes daughter, a Chamberlein in an hostrie, and a beggers brat: which blinding the wittes of the french nation, by reuelations, dreames and phantasticall visions, made them beleue things not to be supposed, and to geue fayth to things impossible. For surely, if credite may be geuen to the actes of the Clergie, openly done, and commonly helued, thys woman was not inspired with the holy ghost, nor sent from God (as the french men beleue) but an Enchanteresse, an organe of the Deuill, sent from Sathan, to blinde the people, and bying them in vnbeliefe: as by a letter sent from the king of England may appere: But for that the same is long, I thought it sufficient to rehearse the effect thereof, which was as foloweth.

First that she two yerres and moze, contracte to Gods lawe, and the honest estate of womanhood, was clothed in mans apparell, and exercised the office of a Capitayne in the warres.

Also, she affirmed that she was sent of God, and that she had spoken personally with God.

Also, she caused her selfe to be honozed and woꝛshipped of many, as a woman sanctified.

And for a true declaration of the falsitie and lewdnesse of her doing, she being called before the Bysshop and the Uniuersity of Paris, was there with great

Three properties that appertaine to a good woman.

This letter, the king of England, sent not onely to the Duke of Burgoyne and other Princes, to declare the veritie of the matter, and the administration of Justice, but to admonishe all rude and ignorant persons, in all other countries, to refraine from the credite and beliefe of the sayings, of suche prophane prophesies, and craftie imaginers, as this pieuiste painted Puzell was. Yet notwithstanding, this lawfull processe, this due examination and publike sentence, John Buchet, and diuers French wyrters affirme her to be a saint in heauen. But because it is no point of our sayth, no man is bound to beleue his iudgement, although he were an Archdeken. But Paulus Emilius, a famous wyrtter, reherling that the Citezens of Orleans had buylded in the honoz of her an Image or an Idole, sayth that Pius Byshop of Rome, and Anthony Byshop of Florence, much maruayled and greatly wondered at her actes and doings. With which sayng, I can very well agree, that she was moze to be maruayled at, as a false prophetesse, and seducer of the people, then to be honored or worshipped as a Saint sent from God into the realme of Fraunce. For of this I am sure, that all ancient wyrters, as well diuine as prophane, allege these three thinges beside dyuers other, to apperteine to a good woman. First shamefastnesse, which the Romaine Ladies so kept, that seldome or neuer they were seene openly talking with a man: which vertue at this day amongst the Turkes, is highly esteemed. The second is pittie: which in a womans hart, abhorreth the spilling of the bloud of a poore beast, or a siely birde. The thirde is womanly behauiour, aduoyding the occasion of euill iudgement, and causes of shame. If these qualities, be of necessitie, incident to a good woman, where was her shamefastnesse, when she daylie and nightly was conuersant with comen souldiours and men of warre, amongst whome is small honestie, lesse vertue and shamefastnesse least of all exercised or vsed? Where was her womanly pittie, when she taking to her the heart of a cruell beast, slue man woman and childe, where she might haue the upper hande? Where was her womanly behauiour, when she cladde her selfe in a mans clothing, and was conuersant with euery losell, geuing an occasion to all men to iudge, and speake euill of her, and her doings. Then these things, being thus plainly true, all men must needes confesse, that the cause ceasing, the effect also ceaseth: so that if these morall vertues lacking, she was no good woman, then it must needes consequently folow, that she was no saint.

Now leauing this woman, consumed to ashes, let vs returne agayne to the siege of Compeigne, which still continued. During which tyme, the Regent sent to the Duke of Burgoyne, lyeng at the siege, the Erle of Huntington, sir John Robert with a thousand Archers, which daylie skirmished with them of the towne, and made suche Bastiles and fortresses, that the towne must needes be rendered, or else they within famished. But see the chaunce, when victorie was at hande, tydings were brought to the Duke of Burgoyne, that Philip Duke of Brabant, was departed out of this worlde, leauing behinde him no heire of his body: To whome the sayde Duke pretended to be next heyre, wherefore he taking with him, his best Capitaynes, for the recouery of so great a Duchy, departed from the siege, leauing his poore people behinde him, and ordeyned in his place, for his Lieutenant, Sir John Luxemborough, which being of small strength and lesse courage, after the Dukes departing, aduised the English men to depart for that time, till the next Sommer: which thereto at the first, would in no wise agree. But there was no remedy, for he was Capitaine generall, and had the ordinaunce vnder his rule, so that without that, they could nothing doe: Wherefore in great displeasure, they returned into Normandy. After whose departure, the Capitaine set fire in all the Bastiles; and secretly departed, leauing behinde him dyuers peeces of ordinaunce, for lack of of cariage. Wyth which returne, the Dukes of Bedford and Burgoyne, were sore displeased: for if he had continued his siege eyght dayes lenger, the towne had bene rendered, without dent of sword. For pestilence and famine, had almost consumed all the Souldiours, and left the towne without safegard or defence.

After this siege broken by, John Duke of Norfolkke tooke agayne the townes of Dampmartyn, and the Chasse Hongay, & dyuers other townes. And the Erle of Stafford tooke the towne of Brie, in Countie Robert, and from thence, foraged all the Countrey to Sens, and after tooke Queynoy in Brie, Grand Buys, and Rampellon, with many prisoners, as sir Jaques de Hilly, and sir John de la Hay. During which time the French men tooke Louiers, and Willuence. And then the towne of Melune rebelled, and had suche ayde of other townes adioyning, that the English Souldiours, were fayne to leaue Melune, Moxret, and Corbell. Thus, according to the chaunce of warre, the one parte gat, and the other lost. Thus the Englishe affayres (as you haue heard) within the realme beganne to waue, and were variable, which caused the Englishe Capitaynes to be of diuers opinions. For one part being sozie and pensue, adiudged the things present, light and of no moment, in comparison of them which they saw likely to folowe: and another sort, adiudged that present time to be most ieopardous, and perillous: Because they sawe the power of their enemies nowe increased, and their awne strength rather decayed, then conserued. And so every man studyeng on this businesse, aduised secretly with himselfe, what counsayle was best to be taken, and what way was best to be folowed, to remedie these things, thus waueryng in a doubtfull Ballance, did at the last conclude, that it was most apt and mete, for the time present, that king Henry in his royall person, with a new armie, should come downe into Fraunce, partely to comfort and visite his awne subiects there: partly eyther by feare or fauour (because a childe of his age and beautie doth commonly allure to him, the hartes of the eldier persons) to cause the Frenchmen to continue in their due obeyssaunce towarde him. Wherefore after a great host, convenient for that purpose, assembled, and money for the maintenaunce of the warre, redy gathered, and the realme set in order, and the Duke of Gloucester appoynted Gouvernour (which during the kings absence, appeased dyuers riottes, and punished many offenders) the king with a great power, tooke shipping at Douer, and landed at Calice; and there taried a good space, and from thence, he remoued to Roan, where with all triumph, he was receyued, and there sojourned till the middest of August; bys nobles

daylie consulting on their great businesse, and waightie affayres.

In the Month of Nouember, he remoued from Roan to Ponthoise, and so to saint Denice, to the intent to make his entrie into the Citie of Paris, and there to be sacred king of Fraunce, and to receyue the Scepter and Crowne of the realme and Countrey.

There were in his company of his awne Nation, his Uncle the Cardinall of Winchester, the Cardinall and Archebyschop of Poike, the Dukes of Bedford, Poike, and Norfolk, the Carles of Warwike, Salisburie, Orford, Humpyngdon, Ormonde, Mortayn, Suffolke, and of Gascoynes, the Erle of Longuile, and Marche, beside many noble men of Englande, Guyan & Normandy. And the chiefe of the french nation were the Dukes of Burgoyne, and Lewes of Luxembogh Cardinall and Chauncellour of Fraunce for king Henry, the Byschops of Beauoyes and Meyon, both peeres of Fraunce, beside the Byschop of Paris, and dyuers other Byschops, the Erle of Waudemount, and other noble men, whose names were to tedycus to reherse. And he had in a garde about his person, thre thousande strong archers, some on horseback, and parte on foote. And as he was coming, betwene Saint Denice and Paris, he was met at the Chapell, in the meane way, by Syr Simon Mazer Prouost of Paris, with a great company, all clothed in redde Satin, with blewe Whoodes, which did to him due reuerence and love obeyssaunce. After whome came dyuers riche and notable Burgesses of the towne of Paris, all appareled in Crimosyne cloth. After they had done their reuerence, there approched to the king the .ix. worthies, sytting richely on horseback, armed with the armes to them apperteyning. Next after them, came the knight of the watch, for the prouost Marchants, and with him, all the officers of the Courte, appareled in blew, and Pattes redde. And in a long space after, came Master Philip de Nozillier, chiefe president of the Parliament, appareled in a robe of estate: and all the other Presidentes of the Parliament, clothed in robes of Scarlet, and in lyke robes folowed the Lordes of the chamber of accomptes, and of the finaunce, the Masters of the requestes, the Secretaries, and Regesters, and euery company, as their course came, saluted the king with eloquent Oracions and heroicall Verses, and so conueyed him to the gate of Saint Denice, where the Prouost of the Marchauntes, and the Shyefes of the towne receyued him with a Canopy of blew Veluet richely embraudred, with flower Delices of Golde, and bare the same ouer him, through the towne, which on euery side was hanged with riche clothes of Arras and Tapissery. And at euery porte and bridge where he passed, was set a Pageaunt of great hew and small cost, which because they were but trifles, I ouer passe, and speake but of one deuise, made before the gate of the Chastelet, where vpon a stage stood a goodly childe, clothed with habite royall, set full of flower Delices, hauing two crownes on his head, representing the yong king, and on his right hande stood two noble personages, in the armes of Burgoyne and Flaunders: and on the left side of him, stode thre personages clothed in the armes of Bedford, Salisburie, and Warwike, which to him deliuered the sworde of England. This Pageaunt was well regarded, and highly prayesed. From thence he departed to the Palace, and offered in the Chapell, and from thence he departed to the house of Cournelles, and there tooke tooke his repast. And the next day he was conueyed to Boys de Vincennes, where he reposed himselfe till the fittene day of December: on which daye, he returned to the Palace of Paris. And on the .xvij. of the sayde Moneth, he departed from the Palace in great triumph, honorably accompanied to our Lady church of Paris: where with all solempnitie he was annoynted and crowned king of Fraunce by the Cardinall of Winchester: (the Byschop of Paris not being content that the Cardinall should doe such a high ceremonie in his Church and iurisdiction.) At the offering he offered Bread and wine, as the custome of Fraunce is. When the diuine seruice was finished, and all ceremonies due, to that high estate accomplished, the king departed towarde the Palace, hauing one crowne on his head, and another bozne before him, and one scepter in his hand, and the second bozne before him. What should I speake of the honorable seruice, the daintie dishes, the pleasaunt conceytes, the costly wyues, the sweete Armony, the Musicall instruments, which were seene and shewed at that feast, sith all men may coniecture, that nothing was omitted, that might be bought for Golde, nor nothing was forgotten that by mans wyt could be inuented. Yet this high and ioyous feast, was not without a spot of displeasure, for the Cardinall of Winchester which at this tyme, would haue no man to him egall, commaunded the Duke of Bedford, to leaue of the name of Regent, during the tyme that the King was in Fraunce: affirming the chiefe ruler being in presence, the aucthoritie of the substitute was cleerely derogate: according to the common saying: in the presence of the high power, the small aucthoritie geueth place. The Duke of Bedford tooke such a secret displeasure with thys doing, that he neuer after fauored the Cardinall, but repugned and disdayned at all things that he did or deuised. And so because the Cardinall would haue no temporall Lorde eyther to him superiour or with him egall, he set forth this proude and arrogant conclusion, thozow which unhappie diuision, the glorie of the Englishe men beganne first to decay, and bade away in Fraunce.

The next day after this solempne feast, were kept triumphant Justes, and Turneys, in the which, the Erle of Arundell, and the Bastard of Saint Poll, by the iudgement of the Ladies, wan the prize, and gat the honor. When he had kept open house to all commers, by the space of .xx. dayes, because the ayre of Paris was somewhat contrariant to his pure complexion, he was aduised by his counsaile, to returne to Roan. But before his departure, he caused all the Nobilitie, the Presidents of the Parliament, the Prouostes of the Citie, and of the Marchauntes, and the chiefe Burgesses of the towne and Citie, and all the Doctors of the Uniuersitie, to be assembled in his presence: to whome the Duke of Bedford made a long and solempne Oracion, perswading the frenchmen to the lone and obedience of king Henry, whom he termed theyr naturall souereigne Lorde and Prince, descended from the Ladie Isabell, daughter & sole inheritrice to king Philip (the sayre) french king.

When the Duke had finished and ended his Oracion, the people beyng glad, and reioysyng at his saynges, cryed: Vive le Roy: Live king Henry, live king Henry. After which crie passed, the Noble men, aswell of Fraunce, as of Normandie, did to him homage, and the common people, sware to him fealtie: to whome (although he were a childe) he gaue both pleasaunt and good words, with hartly thanks, to the great admiration of the french people.

Homage.

Fealtie.

After he had feasted the Nobles and Commons of Fraunce, within the Citie of Paris, he with a great companie, departed from thence, and by smal iourneyes came to Roan, where he kept with great solemnitie, the high feast of Christmasse. While these noble Ceremonies were thus in doyng, in the Citie of Paris, sundrie chaunces diuersly happened in severall places, to the displeasure of the one part, and to the gaine of the other. For Sir Fraunces Surrien Arragoys, a noble Captaine in Normandie, toke by force and pollicie, the towne of Mounterges, with a great pray of treasure and prisoners, and therein he put a garrison, and bitailed the towne, to the great displeasure of the French king. About the same season, the Erle of Arundell, beyng truly informed, that the Lord Boufcar, Marshall of Fraunce, was come to Beauuoy, intending to do some feate in Normandie, assembled the number of xxiiij. hundreth men, & layd himselfe priuely, in a close place, not farre from the sayd towne, and sent a great number of light horsemen, to ron to the barriers of the Citie. The Frenchmen, like valiant men of warre, issued out, & manfully fought with the Englishmen: which sodainly fled toward the stalle. The Frenchmen couragiously folowed, thinkyng the game gotten on their syde. But when they were entered into the straight, the Erle set freshly on them, so that after long fightyng, there were slain and taken, in maner all the french men, save a few which fled into the towne with the Marshall. Amongest the Captaynes was founde prisoner, the valiant Captaine, called Boynton of Sanctrayles, which (without delay) was exchaunged for the Lord Talbot, before taken prisoner, at the battaile of Patay. There was also taken one called the shepherd, a simple man, and a sely soule, whom the frenchmen reputed, to be of such a holinesse, that if he touched the wall of a towne, of their enemies, that incontinent, it would fall to the ground, and ouerturne. Such false phantasticall sayners, were at that tyme much regarded, and no lesse beleued in fraunce.

Richard
Beauchamp
wite.

This chaunce succeded not fortunately alone: For Richard Beauchamp Erle of Warwick, had a great skirmitish before the towne of Gournay, where he discomfited and repulsed his enemies, and besyde the carions which were left dead on the ground, he tooke prisoners, three scoze horsemen, all Gentlemen of name and armes. Like chaunce of infortune, happened at the same tyme, to Renate or Keyne Duke of Barre, a great friend to Charles the French king, both in lendyng him money, and also in ministryng to him ayde and succors. This Duke bearyng displeasure to Anthonie Erle of Audemont his Cosyn and kinsman, gathered together a great army, and besieged the towne of Audemont. The Erle before the Dukes approchyng, to the entent that he would not be enclosed and compassed aboute by his enemies within a wall, leapyng behynde him a conuenient crew of men of warre, to defende the towne for a tyme, with all diligence rode to the Dukes of Bedford, and Burgoyne, beyng then at the great triumph at Paris, whose parte he had euer taken. After long consultation, it was agreed that Sir John Fastolfe should go with him, hauyng in his companie sixe hundreth Archers, and the Duke of Burgoyne sent to him his Marshall, called Sir Anthonie Doulongon, with, xv. hundreth men.

The Erle of Audemont thus beyng accompanied, marched toward his enemies. Duke Keyne heeryng of his comyng toward him, was somewhat

what dismayed, fearyng least if his enemies should approche to the walles, and be espyed by the garrison within the towne, that at one tyme he should be assailed before, by them that would issue out of the towne, and behind, by the Erle and his armie. Wherefore like a hardie Captein, he brake by his siege, and met face to face with the Erle and his companie: betwene whome, was a cruell and mortall battaile. The horsemen endured long, but in conclusion, the Englishe Archers so galled the horses, and so wounded the men, that the Barroys and their friendes were compelled to flie: In which chase was taken, the sayd Duke of Barre, the Bishop of Nies, the Lord of Rodemaque, Sir Euerard of Sasebery, the Vicount Darcy, and two hundreth other, besyde three thousand men, which were slaine. In this lucky tyme also, no lesse occasion of victorie, was offered to the Englishe men, beyng in another part, if when the pigge had bene profered, they had opened the poke: For Robert Lord Willoughby, and Mathew Gough, a valiant Welshman, with, xv. hundreth Englishmen, layd siege to a towne in Anlow, beyng both by situation and pollicie, very strong and defensible, called Saint Seuerpne. The Englishmen assailed it not so couragiously, but they within, with egall audacitie, boldly made defence: so that fortune semed, to way both the parties in egall ballaunce. Charles the French king, beyng thereof aduertised, sent with all speede the Lorde Ambrose de Loze, with many noble and valiant personages, to ayde and relieue his friendes, inclosed in the towne by his enemies. This Lorde de Loze, beyng Capteyne of the towne, made much hast to comfort his Deputie and Capteine within the same, and so marched forward with great speede: but fearyng to be sodainly compassed about, he tarped still at Beaumont, lookyng for the armie and Capteynes that should folowe, and then altogether to set on their enemies, and so to rayse the siege. While he made there his abode, and tooke his leasure, the Englishmen, by their espials were ascertayned and aduertised, what progresse their enemies made, and what they intended. Wherefore they polletikely provided, to fight with the one part, before the whole puyssaunce were ioyned. And so a great part of them departed secretly in the night, toward their enemies, and found the watche so out of order, and ouersene, that a thousand men were entered into the campe before they were espyed. But the sleayng of men, and cuttyng downe of Tentis, awaked the Captaynes, whome this sodaine feare, and vnlooked chaunce so greatly abashed, that no man in maner, eyther could here his felowe or himselfe, or could make signe to expulse or driue out their enemies out of their campe. But when the day begaune to appere that all thing might be seene and percepued, the Englishmen geuen to couetousnesse of spoyle, and desyre of rauine, neither chased, nor folowed their enemies, but beyng content with their pray and gaine, began to retreat toward the siege againe. But see the chaunce: the french men which were comyng after, and heard by the noyse of the people, that some fray was then in hand, put the spurres to the horse, and set on their enemies, beyng laden with bagges and wallettes, of prayes and spoyles. The other part which before fled, returned againe, and assailed their enemies. The frenchmen egetly assailed, and the Englishmen manfully defended, which beyng out of order, were compelled to flie, of whome Mathew Gough and diuerse other were taken prisoners, and yet of the other part many were slaine, and a great number taken, amongest mongest whom, was the Lozde of Loze, which for all the battaile, was kept and not deliuered.

The Lord Willoughby, heeryng of this chaunce, rayfed the siege and departed, very sore displeasid. Therefore let euery Captain take good heede of victorie, the which as she is harde to obtain, so she is quicke to flie away: for it is dayly sene, that he which thinketh surely, that he hath her in his handes, before he can catche her, is deceyued, and conueth into a great losse and daunger: and on the other side, when she is gotten, (except good watch be hourly kept) she will steale away, with much hurt and detriment, to the first gaper. Thus the Englishemen, for the greedie appetite of gayne, lost the triumphing victorie, which they had in their handes. While the English and French nation thus stroue and contended for preeminence principally, yea, and for superior power of life, by the vnreasonable rage of war in Fraunce, the riche men were spoyled of their goodes, the spirituall persons were taxed and brought low, the common people were slaine, murdered and troden vnder the foote, women were defyled, birgines were rauished, towne were destroyed and wasted, towne dwellers and Citizens were robbed and exiled, bewtifull buyldings, were cruelly bzent, and nothyng was spared, which by fire, blood, or famine, might be catched or destroyed, besyde a hundreth moze calamities, that dayly vexed and troubled the miserable French nation.

Although Fraunce were at this tyme thus miserably afflicted: yet England was not without some trouble: for dayly Englishemen, as well noble as meane personages, were slaine, taken, wounded, or hurt, their substance were continually exacted, and consumed for maintenauce of the warres, so that mischief and calamitie was indifferent to both the nations, and quietnesse and gayne, were expulsed and banished from them both: in so much that the lamentacion and dole of both the Countreies, were heard through the whole west part of the worlde, and of their continuall dissencion, all Europe and Affrike, had their eares and mouthes full, so that all men, not onely marueyled, that Fraunce could so much trouble so long tyme sustaine, but moze wondered that the realme of Englande, being but an Isle, was able so to scourge, plague, and trouble the large French region, for which cause Eugenie the fourth being Bishop of Rome, intending to bring this cruell war to a friendly peace, sent his Legate, called Nicolas, Cardinall of the holie Crosse, into Fraunce, to the entent to make an amitie, and a concord betwene the two princes, and their realmes. This wise Cardinall, came first to the French king, and after to the Duke of Bedford being at Paris: exhortyng concord, and perswadyng vnitie, the byng, declaring, and arguyng peace to be most honourable, and moze profitable to Christian Princes, then mortall warre, or vncharitable dissencion.

When the Legate had thus perswaded the Princes on euery part, they both gently answered, that they were content to come to a reasonable ende. But when the first communication was moued, and by Commissioners treated, their doynge were so farre disagreeable from their wordes, that not onely reasonable and honest condicions of peace, could be neyther heard nor accepted. but moze frowardnesse, pertinacye, and malice, was kindled and strong by in their stomacks, then before that tyme had bene sene. The Cardinall being in bitter dyspayre, of concludyng a peace betwene the two realmes (least he should seme to depart empty of al things, for which he had taken so much traualle) desyred a truce for sixe yeres to come, which request, as it was to him by both parties hardly graunted, so was it of the french men sone and lightly broken after his returne: For the Bastard of Orleans, newly made Erle of Daunoys, tooke by treason the towne of Chartres from the Englishemen: affirming by the lawe of armes, that stealing or byng a towne, without inuasion or assault, was no breach of league, amity or truce. In the which towne, he slue the bishop, because he was a Burgonion, through which occasion, new malice increased, and mortall warre began againe to rise and spring.

While these thinges were thus doynge in Fraunce: There chaunced in Englande by certeine light persons (who as some wyte bare no good will to prietees) dwelling in Abyngton, that a tumult and an assembly was made, to the disquietnesse of the realme, but by wisdom of the protectoz, the same was sone pacified, and the chiefe Authour thereof, whose name was William Mundeuile, alias John Sharpe, being apprehended, was put to execution, and so were sundrie other. After these thinges thus quieted, the Cardinal began to common with the Duke of Gloucester, concernyng the affayres and businesse of Fraunce: But the Duke of Gloucester, suspectyng that the truce would not long continue betwene both the realmes, (as it did not in dedde) deuised how to send moze ayde, and men to the Duke of Bedford, and gathered by moze money and treasure, for the further maintenauce of the warres, and resistance of their enemies. Whereupon the Duke of Gloucester called a Parliament, in the which money was assigned, and men were appoynted. Duryng which Parliament, James the king of Scottes sent Ambassadors, to conlude a peace with the Duke of Gloucester, which (because the king was absent) referred the matter to the thre estates. After long consultation, not without great argumentes, a peace was graunted and concluded, which all men iudged should long continue, because king James was then vexed with ciuile warre, and intestine dissencion, and also the Frenchmen had taken truce, as you haue heard for sixe yeres.

When this Parliament was finished, the Cardinall well garnished with men & money, departed out of England, & came to Roan to the king, to whom also resorted from Paris, John Duke of Bedford, to debate and consulte of thinges, not vnlikely to happen and chaunce. Wherefore a great counsaile was celebrate in the Castell of Roan, & many doubts were moued and disputed.

After this disputacion, with many argumentes ended, the Dukes of Bedford and Yorke, and Edmond late Erle of Mortain, and nowe by the death of John Duke of Somerset, (which died without heire male, leauyng behinde him, a sole daughter called Margaret, after Countesse of Richmōd) erected to the name and tytle, of Duke of Somerset, liked and approued, the first argument, and first moued reason: affirmyng best, that warre must be provided for, and that money ought to be disbursed, and to attoyde all doubt, that a greater armie, was necessary to be gathered together and assembled. When all thinges were agreed, king Henry departed to Calice, and from thence to Douer, and so by easye iourneys he came the .xxj. day of February, to the Citie of London, where he was receyued, not only with great pompe and triumph, but also highly presented with giftes and money, as in the Chronicle of Robert Fabian, you may rede at large, which I ouerpasse.

After that the king was departed into England, the Duke of Bedford, Regent of Fraunce, and Captaine of Calice, tarped behinde in the Marches of Picardie: where he was informed, that certein souldiours of Calice, grudging at the restraint of woolles, began to mutter and murmure agaynst the king and his counsaile, so that the towne of Calice was like to stand in jeopardy. Wherefore the Duke foreseeing the mischief that might insue, and thinking it wisdom to withstand the first mocion, caused the Chiefstaynes of this faction to be apprehended, & after due examinacion had, diuers were put to death, and many banished and exiled the Marches for ever. After that he had purged the towne of that vngenerous and sedicious companie, and had furnished it with new Souldiours and discrete men of warre, he was determined, first to repayre againe to Parys, but his heart would not serue him: for sith his departure, Ladie Anne his wife and Duchies, was departed to God, and honorably enterred in the Celestins at Paris: by whose death, and for other causes, (as partly you haue heard) the sure loue, and approued fidelitie, betwene the Duke of Burgoyne, his brother in lawe and him began to wax faint and colde. For which cause, he being perswaded by the Lorde Lewes of Luxenborough, Bishop of Tyrwine and Ely, and Chaunceloz of Fraunce for king Henry, agreed to marry the Lady Jaquet, daughter to Peter Erle of Saint Paule, and neece to the sayd Bishop, and to Lorde John of Luxenborough, to the intent that by this newe affinity the olde acquaintance and familiaritie, which he had with the noble family of Luxenborough shoulde be renewed and inforced, and with a moze sure knot, knit and confirmed. Whereupon, he departed from Calice to Tyrwyne, where he was highly receyued of the Erle of Saint Paule, and his brethren, and there he maryed the fayre and fresh Ladie Jaquet, of the age of .xxij. yeres, with all triumph and nuptiall solempnitie. After which ceremonie ended, he returned with his new spouse to Calice, and so into England, where he with his wife remayned vntill August next, and then returned againe to Parys. The Duke of Burgoyne, (whose mynde began to incline, a little and little, toward king Charles) was sore grieued and angrie, that the Duke of Bedford was ioyned in affinity with the noble and famous house of Luxenborough: by the which he sawe, that the power of the Englishemen shoulde be greatly aduanced. But the marriage was fully ended, and he could find no remedy.

While these things were doing thus, in other places, the French souldiours lacking wages (and amongst them a great number, which in hope of pray, and desire of spoyle, had cast by the Blough, and left their labour) beganne priuely (as time serued, and occasion gaue place) to take both English men and Burgonions, and raunsomed and spoiled them at their pleasures. And although they were prohibited thus to doe (during the time of truce and peace) yet in conclusion they spared not openly to rob, spoyle and burne: yea and to steale townes, which they affirmed to be no breach of truce. The English picked and vexed with these open wrongs and manifest iniuries, prepared for warre, after the sixt Moneth that the truce was taken and concluded. And by this meanes, the warre was renewed and begunne agayne. The vntreue French men breakers of peace, and not keepers of of truce, reysed a crewe of men, and sodainely tooke the towne of saint Valere, standing in Normandy on the Riuer of Some: and another army vnder the conduyt of Sir Ambrose, Lorde of Loze, wasted and destroyed all the Countie about Caen. The Duke of Bedford not minding to lye still in ydelnesse, sent the Erle of Arundell, the Erle of Warwicks soune, the Lorde Lisle, Adame Marshall of Fraunce for king Henry, and twelue hundred men with ordinaunce and municions, to besiege the towne of Laigny, byon the riuer of Marne. Which Erle, with the shot of a Canon, brake the Arche of the bridge, and gat from the french men their Bulwarke, and set it on fire. Dyuers assaults were attempted, but the towne was well defended: for wythin were shut vp eyght hundred men of armes, beside other meane Souldiours.

The Duke of Bedford being thereof aduertised, gathered an armie of six thousand men of warre, and hauing all things necessary, he came to the siege before Laigny. He there made a bridge of Boates, and brought his ordinaunce so neere the towne, that to all people, it seemed not long able to resist. But the Erle of Dumoy's Bastard of Orleans, with dyuers hardie Capitaines, as valyauntly repulsed, as the English men assaulted. Thys siege continued, as fyre agaynst flame, and sometime flame agaynst fyre. For although the English men shue the moze number, yet they gat neyther pray, nor botie: and although the french men kept valyauntly the walles, and defended the loupes, yet they both lost men and Capitaynes, and were long secluded from their ayde and succors, till Charles the french king perceyuing this towne, to be the thre corner key betweene the territories of the English men, the Burgonians, and his awne, and that the losse thereof, shoulde turne him to innumerable dammages and hurtes, sent the Lorde of Rieu, Boyton the Heire, the Lorde Bancort, and six thousand men wyth great plentie of bittayles, to the intent eyther to rayse the siege, or to bittayle the towne. The french Capitaynes made a bragge, as though they would fight with the English men wythin their field and Campe. The English men would not issue out, but kept themselves in good order, euer looking for their entrie and inuasion. The Regent perceyuing, that they approached not, sent to them an Herault of armes, declaring his intent, and the courage of hys company, which nothing moze desired then battayle. And to shewe himselfe as a Capitaine, meaning that which he offered, and not dissimuling that which he spake: he incontinent diuided his men into thre battayles, no moze wisely ordered, then politiquely gouerned: as who would saye, come on french man, if thy hart wyll serue. But hys aduersaries moze craftie then hardy, moze politique then courageous, framed themselves in suche order of battayle, as they were able to doe all thing, and yet in conclusion (concerning martiall feates) they did nothing. For while they made a proud bragge, and a stoute skirmish with the English men, they appointed dyuers rude and rusticall persons, to conuay into the towne .xxx. Dren, and other small bittayle, but thys swete gayne was sowzely payde, for if the losse with the gayne be pondered in one balauce, for hauing regarde to .xxx. leane Dren, in the conflict were slayne, the Lorde Sentrayles brother to Pothon, the valyant Capitayne John, brother to the Lorde Bancort, and fiftie other noble and valyaunt personages, beside other common people, which bought that bargaine, aboute the price of the common Market. The French men perceyving their infortunate chaunce, and not onely considering, the unspeakable heate which then wearied their people, being in the beginning, of the hote month of August: but also perceyving the Englishe men to be planted and settled, in a place unable to be wonne, and in a grounde both dangerous to invade, and hard to assaile, like men desperate of gayne, and without hope of victorie, departed to Fort vnder Perre, where by a bridge of Tonnes, they passed into the Isle of Fraunce.

The Duke of Bedford (like a wise prince) not minding to lease the more for the lesse, nor the accident for the substance, fearing that Paris and other townes more necessarie to the Englishe men, and of more estimation would returne to his adversaries, thinking if the greater power were holden, the lesse should be sone obtayned, reysed his siege and returned to Paris, nothing lesse minding then to try his quarrell with dent of sword agaynst his enemies: and so sent Bedford his herault to the Lorde Gawcort, and other Chiefetaynes of his army, offering him battayle, and a pitched field, within a convenient grounde, where so ever he would, within the Isle of Fraunce, assigne or appoynt. To the which officer of Armes, the Capitaynes answered, that battayle they feared not, nor the Englishe puissance, they not much regarded, but they sayde: that time was to gayne, and time was to lose, of the which two, they doubted not to espie the one, either for their great gaine, or to their apperaunt losse. Whereupon they sent the Lorde Ambrose de Lore with vij. C. horsemen to rob and spoyle the poore people, coming to the fayre, on the day of Saint Michaell the Archangell, kept in the suburbs of the towne of Caen. But when Dauy Hall Esquire, Capitayne of the towne for the Duke of Yorke, issued out to fight with him, he departed by flight, without eyther botie or gayne of the fayre. The Frenchmen perceyving, that neyther power, force, nor pollicie could auayle against the Englishe nation, determined to trip and deceyue them, by their accustomed seruant called Hayster Treason, and so by money corrupted Piers Audesbeuffe, Constable of the Castell of Roan, that the Marshall of Fraunce, and the Lorde Fountaynes, with two hundred persons disguised, entered into the Castell, but they were sone espied, and driuen to the Dungeon, where they were taken and yelded: whereof some were hanged, some headed, and some ransomed at the pleasure of the Regent: and such ende had the Traytors, which would by treason rather then by battayle, obtayne their praye and desired purpose.

Thys Pageaunt played, the Regent sent Peter of Lurenborough Erie of Saint Paule, and Robert Lorde Willoughby, with a competent crewe of men to besiege the towne of Saint Valerie, which the French men a litle before had taken. These valyaunt Capytaines not minding to slepe their businesse, environned the towne with a strong siege. Within the towne were Sir Lewes de Vancort, Syr Philip de la Toure, and Syr Reignold de Versailles Capitaynes, with three hundred good fighting men, which by the space of three weekes, manfully defended the same. But at the .xxi. day, they perceyving the fiercenesse of the Englishe men, and the weakenesse of themselves (having no hope of reliefe, nor confidence in any ayde) rendered the towne, their horse and harness onely saued. The Erie put in the garrison of the the towne freshe and valyaunt Souldiours, and appointed Capitaine there, Sir John Wobemonde: in the which towne sodainely, whether it were by infection of the ayre, or by corrupt vittayle by long lying, which the townes men did eate, a great pestilence sprang in the infortunate Countrey. Which after so many calamities and euill chaunces, being two times besieged by the French men, and thise recovered by the English Nation, was now infected and corrupted with the pestilent plague: whereby two partes of the people, within short space were destroyed and consumed.

After this towne gotten, the Erie of Saint Paule, and the Lorde Willoughby returned to the Regent, where they were wel welcomed. And after, the saide Erie departed from Paris, to lay siege to the Castell of Mouchas, but being encamped nere to the towne of Blangy, he by a sodaine Maladie, finished his dayes, and departed the worlde, leauing his seigniozies to Lewes his sonne and heire. For which dead Erie were solempne obsequies kept, both in Paris and in London, because he was father in lawe to the Regent. In the meane season, the French men entered into the costes of high Burgoyne, and vrent, tooke and destroyed townes: for which cause, the Burgonions beyng sore displeased, assembled a great armie, both to reuenge their quarels, and also to recover agayne the townes, from them unustly taken: to whom, as to his friends the Duke of Bedford sent Robert Lorde Willoughby, and Syr Thomas Kiriell, with a convenient company of Souldiours, which entering into the laundes of Laonoy, were encountred with a great number of their enemies: notwithstanding, after long fight, the French men were slayne and disperled: wherof were left dead in the field, an hundred and sixtie horsemen, beside prisoners, which after in a furie, were all killed and put to death.

Whyle these chaunces thus happened in Fraunce, John Lord Calbot gathered together a crewe of chosen men of warre in England to the number of eyght hundred, and sayled into Normandie, and passed by Roan towards Paris, and in his way he toke the strong Castell of Joinge, betwene Beauoy, and Gisors, and caused all the French men within, to be hanged on the walles, and after rased and defaced the Castell, & came to the Duke of Bedford to Paris. The presence of which renowned Capitayne (a maruellous thing it is to see) so encouraged the hartes of the English nation, that they thought nothing able to resist their puissance, and so discouraged the hartes of the French men, that they were in doubt, whether it were better to fight or to flie. And thys was not without a cause: for surely he was a chosen Capitaine, and in martiall feates a man fully instructed, and his courage and practise in warre, was fearefull to the French nation, and to his awne Countrymen an especiall hope, and a sure defence. When this hardye Baron, had commoned with the Regent, & agreed what waye he should take, without long delay or prolonging of tyme, he departed from Paris with his armie, and besieged the Castell of Beaumont vpon Dife, whereof was Capitayne, Syr Amadour de Agnolles brother to the Heire. Which Castell was sone rendered vpon condition. After that he regayned without long siege, the townes of Creille, the bridge of Saint Marens, the newe towne in Cinoy, Crespi in Vallors, and Cleremount in Beauoy: and so with great riches and fatte prisoners, he returned agayne to Paris. Thus prosperous prosperous successe happened not to the Lorde Calbot alone : but in the very same season, the Erle of Arundell tooke the Castell of Boreham, and raised it to the grounde, and after tooke by force the Castell of Boreham, and from thence came to Saint Seleryne, where the Lorde Ambrose de Lore was Capitayne, which issued out and fought with the English men. Egerly at the first, that he drove them back an arrow shot by fine force. But the Erle so encouraged his men, that they tooke newe courages to the assault, and set so fiercely on the French men, that they slue a great number, and drove the remnaunt into the towne.

After this victorie he besieged Louiers, whereof was Capitayne, the Heire and his brother, which rendered the towne, without stroke or assault. For all this good luck, the Erle forgat not to returne, to the towne of Saint Seleryne, but assembled a great armie, and environed the towne about with a strong siege. When he had lien there almost thre moneths, every day attempting or doing somewhat, for the perfozmaunce of his enterprise, in conclusion at the thre moneths ende, he gaue so fierce an assault, that by force he entered the towne, and slue John Allemagne and Guillam sent Aubayne, the chiefe Capitaynes, and eyght hundred other men of warre, and the children of the Lorde Lore were taken captiues: he replenished and fortified the towne againe with newe men, and municions, and made there Capitayne Sir John Coznewall. Which act thus accomplished, he departed, and came before the strong towne of Silly, and there pitched hys Campe. The inhabitants of the same, somewhat dismaied with the chaunce, that late happened to the towne of Saint Seleryne, deliuered to him pledges, vpon this condition: that if they were not rescued within thirtie dayes next insuyng, then they (their lyues saued) should render the towne into his possession: which offer was taken. The Capitaynes within the towne sent a Poste to the French king, to aduertise him of their hard chaunce, which incontinent sent to them Arthur Erle of Richmond (but after some wyrters, John Duke of Alaunson) with a great company of men. When the Erle sawe the French succours appere, he restored agayne the pleges to the Governours of the towne, and issued out of his campe, taking a place most mete and comuenient for to abide battayle, for which he soze thirsted and longed. The Duke or the Erle (take which you list) lyeng by a brooke side, which a man might stride ouer, seyng the English men so warlike and strongly embattayled, thought it not for his profite to geue battayle, or to set forward: but in the dead time of the night cowardly fled, and with shame returned: although some French wyrters affirme, that he looked that the Erle of Arundell should haue given him battaile, and because he profered not forward, therefore the French men departed. This appereth to be an apparaunt lye, and a French bragge: for if they came to rescue the towne, why did not they geue battayle, and so driue away the English men from the towne? If they came to fight, why departed they without any stroke stricken? But it seemeth that they came, to make a French face, and for to doe nothing. For they without skirmishe or succouring the towne, departed in the night secretly (as you haue heard.) When they within the towne knew that their succours fayled, they rendered themselves to the mercy of the Erle of Arundell, which gently receiued them, and leauing a garrison in the towne, departed to Hauns, and

and in the meane way, tooke the Castels of Mellay and saint Laurence. About this time the Lord Willoughby, and Syr Thomas Kiriell, returning with great victories out of the parties of Burgoyne, toke in their waye, the towne of Louiers, and furnished it, both with men and municions.

Amongest so many good chaunces, some euill are accustomed to fall, and happen, or else the gayners will not knowe themselves. So it happened, that a great number of rude and rusticall persons in Normandie, dwelling by the sea coast, eyther prouoked or intiled thereunto by the French king, or desprous of alteracion and chaunge (which thing the common people muche couet and desyre) made an insurrection, and put on harnesse, and by force expelled certein garrisons out of their holdes, and tooke certein townes: publishing and proclaimyng openly, that their onely purpose and intent was, to expell and banishe the whole English Nation, out of their Countries and coastes. Wherefore it may evidently appere, that the blacke Ethiopian* or the blacke coloured Raven, will soner turne their colours, then the vniuersall people bred in Fraunce, will hartily loue, and inwardly fauor an English borne childe. And yet the Normans of long tyme, louingly and gently, haue obeyed to the subiection of England, and haue of the English Nation bene well accepted and regarded, but now they forgetting their dutie, and remembryng theyr hurtes, did not feare to rebell agaynst theyr Prince and soveraigne Lorde.

This mischieuous companie, thus frantikely gathered together, with al speede marched towarde Cane, to the intent there, both to assemble a greater number of people, & also to consult what way they should folow in their newe begon attemptate. But the Dukes of Yorke and Sommerset, which then were liyng in Normandie, heyrng of this vngacious faction, and troubleous commocion, and hauyng knowlege by theyr espyals what iourney they intended to take: incontinent without delay, sent the Erle of Arundell, and the Lord Willoughby, with .viij. thousand Archers, and .xiiij. hundred light horses to stay and kepe them, eyther for setting forth, or makyng further progresse. The Erle of Arundell goyng one way, appoynted the Lorde Willoughby, with two thousand Archers, and a certaine number of horsemen, to go before him, to lie in watche and stale, secretly by the way, to stoppe the iourney and passage of the rebelles, when they should approche. The Lorde Willoughby, couertly couered himselfe and his companie, sendyng worde to the Erle, of the place where he laye, to the entent that he might make a signe and token (when tyme should be most luckey and fortunate) to inuade and set on their enemies. Which thing done, the Erle folowed at the backe, the ragged route, and mischieuous multitude, as a man, that draue the Deere before him into the Buckstalle, or the sely Conies into the secreete Hay. When the ignoraunt multitude approached nere to the place of the stale, the Erle made a token, and shot a Goon for a signe. Then the Lorde Willoughby, set on them before, and the Erle behinde, shotyng so fiercely, that the dastard people partly amased with the sodaine chaunce, and partly galled and wounded with the shot of the arrowes, threwe away their harnesse, desiryng nothyng but death. The Erle of Arundell (moued with compassion) caused his souldiours to leaue of and stay, from farther murthet or bloodsheddyng, and apprehendyng such as he thought to be leaders, and chiefe stirrers of the people, let the other retuene home frankely and freely: but yet there were a. M. and more slain, before the souldiours could be brought again vnder their stādards.

After this com. nocion appeased, and the sodeine rage in the beginnyng stayed and bzideled, diligent inquirie was made of the malefactorz, and such as were found guilty, by diuers terrible execucions (accozdyng to their desertz) miserably ended their trayterous liues. Durynge which rebellien, Peter Kokefort and his companie, gat by treason the towne of Depe, and dyuers other holdes, therebnto adioynng. After the Erle of Arundell, had obteyned so many Conquestes, and notable victories (as you haue heard) he attempted another, which was the last worke and extreme labor of his liuyng dayes. For the Duke of Bedford, beyng informed, that his aduersaries, had sodainly surprised and taken the towne of Rue, and therein had put a garrison, which sore bexed the Countreies of Ponthieu, Arthoys, and Bolenors, sent worde to the Erle, that he without delay, should besiege the sayd towne. The Erle obeyed to his commaundement, and incontinent, sent for all the people vnder his gouernance, and in his marchyng forwarde, came to Couerney, where he heard tell, how that there was a certain Castle, nere Beauuoyz, called Gerbozpe, which eyther by force of rasyng, or violence of weather, was sore decayed and defaced. And because this place was oportune and very necessary, to prohibite, let and stop the Englishe men, to make sodein runnynges in, or rodez into the Countreie of Beauuoyz: Charles the French king commaunded Sir Stephen de Neignolles, commonly called the Heire, to see the Castell reedified and fortified. The sayd sir Stephen with a great companie, came to the ground, and lackyng neyther stufte necessary, nor artificers sufficient, in small tyme erected the Castell, and began to defende the fortesse. The Erle of Arundell, beyng credibly informed of their doynge, and perceiuyng that this newe edificacion was verpe prejudiciall to the Englishe part, determined first to take the Castell, supposyng to finde there little or no resistance, but he was deceyued, for there was the Heire, with many good and baleaunt Captaines. The Erle with fīue hundred horsemen, encamped himselfe in a little close, not farre from the Castell: the french men which were three thousand men, perceiuyng that the Erle and his horses were wery, and that his archers were not yet come, determined for their aduantage to set on him, before the comyng of his footemen, which they knewe to be little more, then a myle behind the Erle. Wherefore for a pollicie, they set forth fiftie horsemen, as though there were no mo in the Castell. The Erle perceiuyng that, sent forth Sir Randolfe Standishe, to encounter with them, hauyng in his companie a hundred horse: the Frenchmen fought couragiously a while, and sodainly came out all the remnaunt, and slue Sir Randolfe Standishe, and all his companie, and boldely set on the Erle and his bande, which manfully defended them, so that the Frenchmen gat little aduantage, for all their great number. The Heire perceiuyng the courage and defence of the English people, caused thre Culuerines to be shot amongst them, whereof, one strake the Erle on the Ankle, and so brake his legge, that for paine he fell from his horse, then the French men entered amongst the Englishe armie, and tooke the Erle beyng on the ground, prisoner. and Sir Richard Woodville, and sixe scoze more, and there were slain almost two hundred. The remnaunt saued themselves as well as they might.

The Erle was carped to Beauuoyz, where, of this hurt he shortly dyed, and was buried in the Friers Monozs. He was a man of a singuler vertue, con- fancie, and grauitie, whose death in so troubleous a world did sore appall the heartes of his nacion. By this infortune, Rue was not besieged, nor Gerbo- rietaken, such is the chaunce of warre.

I may not forget a chaunce which happened this yere, to the example of Princes, and a spectacle for gouernozs. For the deuill himselfe, to set further diuision betweene the Englishe and French Nacion, did apparell certeine Clawpoules & Parasites, commonly called Tituils, and tale tellers, to sow discorde and discencion, betweene the Dukes of Bedford, and Burgoyne, not sayng triles nor phantasies, but thinges of reproche, repugnaunt to both their honours, estates, and dignities, with the which, eche of them was as well pricked, as hastily spurred, so that all loue, betweene them ceased, all af- finitie was forgotten, and all olde familiaritie was cast by disdain, into the caue of oblivion. Such a pestilent breath hath flattery, and such mischiefe ensueth of Princes light credence. This grudge was perceyued, by their mutuall friendes, which by charitable exhortacion and Godly aduertisement, exhorted them to renue their olde loue and familiaritie, and to mete and en- teruene, in some place decent and conuenient. The Duke of Bedford gladly condiscended to come to saint Omers, beyng the Duke of Burgoyne's towne, and thither accozdyng to his appoyntment, he in honourable estate came and resorted, and likewise did the Duke of Burgoyne. The Duke of Bedford, beyng Regent of Fraunce, and sonne, brother, and vncl to kinges, thought that the Duke of Burgoyne, should first haue visited and saluted him: Duke Philip on the other part, beyng Lorde and soueraigne of the towne, iudged it not mete, nor to stand with his honour, to go to him, where he was lodged, but was content by intreatie of friendes, to mete him in a place indifferent, be- twene both their harborowes: which offer was not accepted, & so both par- ties departed discontent, and neuer after saw or commoned with other. We hat should I speake of the courage of these two proude princes, the Duke of Bedford myndyng to haue no peere, and the Duke of Burgoyne willyng to haue no superioz, by whose proude disdain, and enuious discorde, shortly England lost, and Burgoyne gayned not long, as you shall perceyue in thys Historie folowynge.

The Bastard of Orleans, called the Erle of Dumoyz, the Lorde Rochford Marshall of Fraunce, with other, in the beginnyng of this. xiiij. yere, tooke the towne of Saint Denise by treason, and skirmished with them of Paris, and leauyng behinde him a great garrison, toke the towne of How- done, and the brydge of Saint Maxence by composition, and at that time was taken the tobone of Mount Meulan, by sodenly scaling of two fishermen: which entered by at a common priuie, standyng on the wall. Thus towncs bntwalled, were prayes to rauinous men of warre, so that the pooze inhabitants within them (not beyng able to keepe their fidelitie or allegeaunce, when shield and defence lacked) were constrayned and compelled to yelde and render themselves to the more power, and byper hande: least they being neddy and innocent people, should be bered and tormented, with the unreasonable men of warre: So that in all Christendom, no region was more bntquiet, more bered, more pooze, nor more to be pitied, then the Countrie of Fraunce. And although the rude and pooze people, suffered many plagues and aduersities: yet the Souldiours prospered not in all thinges. For although pray and spoyle sometyme refreshed their mindes, and did comfort their stomackes, yet at another tyme they were slaine, taken and licked by, or they were ware. For euery Prince studied, and circumspectly compassed, how to keepe defend & releue, the Cities and towncs, of their seuerall faction, and priuate fidelitie. Wherefore when facietie of slaughters, and aboundance of murders, had replenished the stomackes of both the factions, and that both in generall had perceyued their hurtes, pondered their losses, and considered their ruynes, and dayly afflictions: although their stomackes were haute, and their hearts stonie, yet they waxed soft, priuily enclining to peace, and wishyng concozde, and not without an bygent cause: For all thinges necessarie to mannes living, penury shewed her selfe forth, and abundance was hidden in a Caue. The corne fieldes lay bntilled, the medowes were overtroden, the woodes were spoyled, so that all men went to harnesse, and no man to the Plough. The Churches were seldome bled for deuocion, but many times spoyled for desyre of gaine. These and such innumerable mischiefs, caused both the people beyng enemies, to desyre peace, and yet the one part disdeyned openly to offer it, or the other priuately to receyue it.

The crie and noyse of this perillous and insaciabie warre, was blafed through Europe, detested through Christendome, and especially at the counsaile of Basill, where then the Emperour Albert, and all the Princes and Potestates of Christendome, or their Deputies were assembled, for the bntion of that bntgracious Scisme, in the bnturped Sea of Rome. Wherefore, the Emperour and the temporall Princes, supposyng the exhortacion of discrete fathers, should more profite amongst the two highe stomacked nacions of England and Fraunce, desired Eugeny then Bishop of Rome, to be the author and Arbitrer of that great strife & contencion: so that by his meanes, counsaile, and exhortacion, the weapon might be taken out of the handes of two so inuincible nacions, which neuer would yelde or bow, the one to the other, neyther yet once heere of abstinence of fightyng, or refusyng from war: so much were their heartes hardened, and so princely were their stomackes. And one thing put them in good comfort of some good conclusion, because the Duke of Burgoyne was willyng (so that it were not of his awne sute) to returne and reconcile himselfe to Charles, his mortall enemy and auncient aduersarie. Wherefore by auctoritie of this generall Counsaill, two Cardinals came to the towne of Arras in Arthoys, whither were sent for the king of England, Henry Beuford, Cardinall of Winchester, Henry, Archebishop of Pozke, William de la Pole, Erle of Suffolke, and John Holland Erle of Huntyngdon, with diuers other knightes and Esquiers: and for the French king were there present, Charles Duke of Burbon, Lewes Erle of Gaudome, Arthure of Briteyne, Constable of Fraunce, the Archebishop of Reyns, and Sir Phillip Harcozt. There was the Duke of Burgoyne in proper person, accompanied with the Duke of Gelders, & the Erles of Estamps, Lygny, Saint Paule, Vaudemont, Neuers, and Daniell, sonne to the prince of Orange, with a great gard and a galland companie.

Huntyngdon,

Upon the day of the first session, the Cardinall of Saint Crosse, declared to the three parties, the innumerable mischiefs, the multitude of inconueniencies, which had succeeded through all christendome, by their daylie discord and continuall discention: exhorting and requiring them for the honoz of God, for the lone that they bare to the setting forth of Christes religion, and for the aduancement of the publique wealth of all Christendome, that they would laye all rancour aparte, repressse all wyath and anger, and conform themselves to reason, and to godly concozde, by the which, they should receyue honoz, profite, and continuall quietnesse, in the worlde, and of God, areward euerlasting. After which admonition thus to them geuen, and after diuers dayes of communication, euery parte brought in their demaunde, which were most contrary, and hard to come to a good conclusion. The Englishe men required, that king Charles should haue nothing, but at the hande of the king of Englande, and that not as duetic, but as a benefite by him of hys meere liberalitie giuen and distributed, to which the Frenchmen answered that: king Charles would haue the kingdome frankely and freely, without begging it of an other man: requiring the king of England to leaue the name, armes, and tytle of the king of Fraunce, and to be content with the Dukedomes of Aquitayn and Normandy, and to forsake Paris and all the towncs which they possessed in Fraunce, betwene the Ryuers of Loyze and Sone, being no parcell of the Duchy of Normandy. The English men loth to lese so good a botie as Paris, did not esteeme and allowe the demaunds of the French Ambassadors, and they on the other side, couetyng and desyryng to obtayne agayne the renoume and glozpe of their Region, which was Paris, would in no wise condescend, to any parte of the Englishe requestes. Thus the pryde of the one parte, and the ambition of the other letted concozde, peace, and quietnesse. The Cardinales seing the frostie hartes, and hardened mindes of both parties, determined not to dispute the titles, but offered to them honest and reasonable condicions of truce and peace, for a season: which articles both parties, eyther for stowardnes, or for diswayne openly refused: In so much as the English men in great displeasure departed to Calice, and so into England. One wytter affirmeth, that they beyng warned of a secret conspiracie moued agaynst them, sodainely remoued from Arras, and so sayled into their countrey.

Whiles this treatie of peace was thus in communication at Arras, the Lorde Calbot, the Lorde Willoughby, the Lorde Scales, with the Lorde Lille Adame, and five thousand men besieged the towne of Saint Denise, with a strong bande. The Erle of Dunois hearing thereof, accompanied with the Lorde Lohac, and the Lorde Sueill, and a great company of horsemen had thetherward to raise the siege, and in the meane way they encountered with s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Kiriell, and Mathew Goughe, ryding also toward

S. Denise, betwene whome was a great conflict, and many slayne on both parties: but sodainely came to the ayde of the frenche men, the garrison of Mount Melance, which caused the Englishe men to returne without any great harme or damage, saving that Mathew Gough by fonderyng of his horse was taken and caried to Mount Melance. During which fight, the towne of saint Denise, was rendered to the Lorde Calbot and the other Lordes, which caused all the walles to be rased, and abated downe to the grounde, saving the walles of the Abbay, and a Tower called Uerbyn. After this towne gotten, the Lorde Willoughby left Sir John Ruppelley at Pouthoyse, and departed to gouverne Paris, which then began to smoke, and sone after brast out in flame (as you shall shortly perceiue.) After whose departure the inhabitants of Pouthoyse rebelled, and drove out the Englishe men by very force, and rendered themselues subiectes to king Charles. This towne was small, but the losse was great, for it was the very convenient way betwene Paris and Normandie, so that now the gate betwene them both, was set open and the passage at large.

Let vs now agayne returne to the counsaile at Arras. After the Englishe Ambassadors were departed, the French men and the Burgoyons beganne familiarly to common of a peace, and talke of an amitie, to the which motion, Philip Duke of Burgoyne, was neyther deafe nor straunge: for he in the beginning of his rule, being much desyrous to reuenge and punish the shamefull murther done to his father, and to kepe himselfe in his highe estate, and preheminece, beganne to be associate, and to reigne with the English power, and to serue the king of England, thinking that by his amitie and ioyning, he shoulde neither harme nor hurte the common wealth of the Country, wherof at that time he bare the whole rule, nor yet lose one iote or point of his auctoritie, or gouernaunce. But when it happened contrary to his expectation, that the king of Englande by the right course of inheritance, tooke vpon him the whole rule and gouernaunce, within the realme of Fraunce, and ordered by the aduise of his counsaile, all causes, iudgements, warres and concordies, and that the Duke iudged that he was not had in great confidence, nor in perfite trust, as he thought, because the Duke of Bedford would not suffer the towne of Orleans to be rendered to him, (as you befoze haue heard:) He therefore imagined, and determined with himselfe to returne into the pathe againe, from the which he had strayed and erred, and to take part and ioyne with his awne bloud and Nation: so that some honest meane might be sought by other, and not by himselfe, least peraduenture by his awne seeking, he might binde himselfe in conditions hurtfull and sore inconueniences, to the French king, and also be noted of bruthe and traytorous behauiour toward the king of England and his nation: to whom he had done homage, league, and sworne fealtie. Now this counsaile was to him a cloke for the rayne, as who should say, that he sought not amitie of the french king (which thing in hys hart he most coucted and desyred) but was thereunto perswaded by the generall counsaile, and by the Bishop of Rome, to whome it was reason, in all honest requests that he should submit himselfe, and humblye obey. And so shadowed with this counsaile, wythout long argument or prolonging of time, he toke a determinate peace, and a final conclusion vpon these conditions: that he should haue to him deli-

uered the Counties of Arthoys, Bonthieu, and Bullondys, & the townes of Amience, Corby, Mondidyer, Peron, Saint Quintine, and Abbeuille, wyth many other seignozies, & superiorities, which be not for my purpose to reherse. Prouyded alway, that the french king paying in redy money to the Duke or hys heyres foure C. M. Crownes, should haue the sayde townes and Countries to be redeliuered againe: and many other things the french king graunted to the Duke of Burgoyne, which after he was not able to performe nor accomplish, for he had no power to make deniall to the Duke, of any demaunde or request, which the Duke eyther phantased or moued: as who would say, that he thought in himselfe, that such an aduersary which desired so honest, and so reasonable condicions (considering the state of the time, and the occasion of concord, most apparauntly offered to him) ought neyther to be refused nor cast away, the which chaunce was to him luckey and fortunat: for surely the thing forescene and looked for, succeeded and tooke place, as you shall perceiue. This concordie was so pleasaunt to the french king, that he not onely sent for him: but as a Swan that swimmeth after her make, mette hym in proper person, at the Citie of Keynes, and forthwith they entered into a league with perfite amitie and friendship.

When thys league was sworne, and this knot knit, the Duke of Burgoyne, to set a bayle befoze the king of Englandes eyes, sent Choison Doz, his king at armes to king Henry with letters: that he being not only wared faint, and wearyed, with continuall warre, and daylie conflictes, but also chased daylie with complaints and lamentation, of his people, which of the french men suffered losse and detriment, embzayding and rebuking him openly, affirming that he onely was the suppozer and mainteiner of the English people, and that by his meanes and power, the moztall warre was continued and set forward, & that he moze diligently studied, and intentiueky toke paine, both to keepe and maintaine the Englishe men in fraunce, and also to aduance and promote their desires and intentes, rather then to restore king Charles his Cosyn, to his rightfull inheritance, by reason of which things and many other, he was in maner compelled and constraigned to take a peace, and conclude an amitie with king Charles, exhorting king Henry when honest and reasonable conditions were offered, to take them, and to make an ende of the warre which so long had continued, to the decaye of both the realmes, and to the effusion of christen bloud, beside the great displeasure of almighty God, which is the auctor of peace and vnitie: promising him his ayde and furtheraunce in that behalfe, with many glosyng and flatterynge wordes, which I passe ouer.

This letter was not a little looked on, nor smally regarded of the king of England, and his sage counsaile: not onely for the waightinesse of the matter, but also for the sodaine chaunge of the man, and for the straunge superscription of the letter, which was: To the high and mightie prince, Henry by the grace of God, king of England his welbeloued Cosyn: Neyther naming him king of Fraunce, nor his soueraigne Lorde, according as (euer befoze that time) he was accustomed to doe. Wherfore all they which were present, being sore moued with the crafty doing and vntreue demeanour of the Duke, whom they so much trusted, could neyther temper their passions, nor yet moderate their yre, nor yet bridle their tongues: but openly called him

Traytoz, deceyuer, and most inconstant pzince. But when the rumoz of the Dukes reuerting was published amongst the common people, they lette wordes and went to stripes: for they being moued and pricked with this unhappie tydings, ran fiercely vpon all the Flemings, Hollanders, and Burgonions, which then inhabited within the Citie of London, and the suburbes of the same, and slue and hurt a great number of them, befoze they by the kings proclamation could be prohibited to leaue of and abstayne from suche violence and iniurious doing: for the king nothing moze minded, then to saue innocent bloude, and defend them which had not offended.

After the letter wise red, and wisely brooked, he willed the officer at armes to tell his mayster, that it was not conuenient, noz honorable for him, to be enemie to the English nation, without cause or occasion geuen: but his duetie, all things considered, was to haue kept his auncient truth and olde alleageaunce rather then to be the occasion of newe warre and freshe dissention: aduertising him farther, that it was not the point of a wise man, to leaue and let passe the certaine for the vncertaine, admonishing him also, not to mingle and mixe his safete and surenesse, with the vnstableness and vsuretie of his newe alye and Cosyn king Charles.

When the Messenger was departed, the king of Englande and hys counsaile thought and determined to worke some displeasure to the Duke, and to set some conspiracie against him in his awne Countrey, wherfoze by rewardes, they did suborne and corrupt certaine Gouvernozs and rulers of townes and Citie, within the Dukes countries and dominions (which nations surely be euer procline and readie to commocion and rebellion.) But the Gauntoys, which of that feate euer bare the Bell, and were the common ryfers agaynst their souereigne Lords, some of them imagening that the power of the English men was not long lyke to continue within the realme of Fraunce, moze for feare then loue of their Duke, sat still and moued not, but let other townes alone, which soze troubled the Dukes wittes, and a great whyle did disquiet and bere his senses.

But in this time, and the .xiiij. day of September, died John Duke of Bedford Regent of Fraunce, a man as politique in peace, as hardy in warre whose bodie was with great funerall solemnitie buried in the Cathedral Church of our Lady in Roan, on the North side of the high aulter, vnder a sumptuous and costly monument: which tombe and sepulture, when king Lewes the .xj. sonne to this king Charles, which recovered agayne Normandie did well aduise and beholde, certaine noble men in his company, hauing moze youth then discretion, and moze enmie in their hartes then considerations of their parents, counsayled him to deface and pluck downe the tombe, and to cast the dead carcasse into the fieldes: affirming that it was a great dishonoz both to the king and to the realme, to see the enemy of his father, and theirs, to haue so solempne and riche memoriazl. King Lewes answered agayne, sayeng: what honoz shall it be to vs, or to you to breake this monument, and to pull out of the ground and take vp the dead bones of him, whome in his lyfe, neyther my father nor your progenitozs with all their power, puissaunce and friendes were once able to make flie one foote backward, but by his strength, wyf, and pollicie, kept them all out of the principall dominions of the realme of Fraunce, and out of this noble and famous Duchy

Duchy of Normandy: wherfoze I say, first God haue his soule, and let his body now lye in rest, which when he was alyue, would haue disquieted the proudest of vs all: and as for the tombe, I assure you, it is not so decent, noz conuenient for him, as his honoz and actes deserued, although it were much richer and moze beawtifull.

This yere chaunced a maruellous great frost, the which beganne the .xxij. of Nouember and continued vntill the .x. daye of February next folowynge, in the which tyme the Thames was so feruently frosen, that no ship nor other vessel could come within the same. By reason wherof the ships that came from Burdeaux, were forced to vnlade at Douer & other places, and were copelled to bring their wares by land ouer Goters Hil to London.

After the death of thys noble pzince and valyant Captayne, the Duke of Bedford, the bright Sunne that commonly shone in Fraunce fayze and beawtifull vpon the English men, beganne to be cloudie, and daylie to waxe darker: for the French men seing the chiefe Capitaine taken awaye, beganne not onely to refuse their obedience and loyaltie, which they had sworne and promised to the king of Englande, but taking sworde in hande, rebelled, persecuted and openly defyed the English men, yet all these mischaunces, not one point abated the valyaunt courages of the English people: for they nothing mistrusting God, nor good fortune, set by a newe sayle, and beganne the warre newe agayne, and appointed for Regent in Fraunce, Richard Duke of Yorke, sonne to Richarde Erle of Cambridge, although the Duke of Yorke, both for birth and courage, was woerthy of this honoz and preferment, yet he was so disdayned of Edmonde Duke of Somerset beyng Cosyn to the king, that he was promoted to so high an office (which he in very deede gaped and looked for) that by all wayes and meanes possible, he both hindered and detracted him, glad of his losse, and sozie of his well doing, causing him to linger in England without dispatch, till Parrys and the flower of Fraunce were gotten by the French king. The Duke of Yorke perceyuing his euill will, openly dissimuled that, which he inwardly thought, eche working things to the others displeasure. This cancarde malice, and pestiferous diuision so long continued, in the hartes of these two Pzinces, till mortall warre consumed them both, and almost all their lynes and offsprings, as within fewe yeres you shall perceyue.

The Normans of the Countrey of Caux, beyng somewhat hartened, by the death of the Duke of Bedford, beganne a newe rebellion, and slue diuers Englishmen, and robbed many pretie townes, which were of King Henries faction and part, and tooke the towne of Harflew by assault, and diuers other townes. The Lord Talbot beyng aduertised of this rebellion, sent for the Lord Scales, Sir Thomas Kiriell, and the Lord Hoo, which afflicted and plagued the people of Caux, that they slue aboue fise thousand persons, and brent all the townes and billages in the countrey, not beyng walled, so that in that part, was neither habitacion nor tillage, for all the people fled into Briteyn, and all the beastes of the Countrey were brought to Caldeber, where a good sheepe was solde for an English penny, and a Cow for .xij. pence. Dayly was skirmishing and fightyng in euery part, in so much that the Lorde Scales with foure hundreth Englishmen, discomfited at the Kye beside Roan, the Heire and fiftene hundreth valiaunt Frenchmen, and Sir

Richard Reignold de Fountaynes, Sir Aleyne Gerond, Aleyne de Monsay, and Scoffrey Graine Capteyne of the Scottes, and thre hundred and mo, were taken prisoners, besyde seven fayre and pleasant Couriers. But thys victorie stayed not the hartes of the French nation, for their myndes were so full of treason, and their malice so great agaynst the Englishmen, that many townes turned to the part of king Charles, without conquest or desyre, and diuers were sold for couetousnesse, and many were deliuered by treason, as Depe, Boys de Vincenes, and other.

Thomas Lozde Beainond, which of late was come to Paris with eight hundred men, issued out of Paris with six hundred souldiers, onely intending to see and vieue the doynges and number of the French armie, but he was sodeinly espyed, and compassed about: so that within a small space, he was discomfited and taken, and with him foure score prisoners, beside two hundred which were slaine in the fielde, and the remnant chased to the very gates of the Citie. The Parisians, and in especiall the Master of the Hales, and some of the Uniuersitie, and Michaell Laillier, and many notable Burgesses of the towne (which euer with an Englishe countenance covered a French heart) perceiuyng the weakenesse of the Englishmen, and the force and strength of the Frenchmen, signifying to the French Captaynes their myndes and intentes, willed them to come with all diligence, to receiue so rich a pray, to them without any difficultie offered and geuen. The Constable deslayning no tyme, came with his power, and lodged by the Charterhouse: and the Lozde Lisleadam, approching the walles, shewed to the Citizens, a Charter, sealed with the great seale of king Charles, by the which he had pardoned them their offences, and graunted them all the olde liberties and ancient priuileges, so they would hereafter be to him obedient, true, and seruiceable: which thing to them declared, they ranne about the towne crying: Saint Denise, lue king Charles. The Englishe men perceiuyng this, determined to kepe the gate of Saint Denise, but they were deceyued, for the Cheynes were drawn in euery strete, & women and children cast downe stones, and scaldyng water on the Englishe mens heades, and the Citizens persecuted them, from strete to strete, and from lane to lane, and slue & hurt, diuers and many of them. The Bishop of Tyrwoine, Chaunceloz there for king Henry, and the Lord Willoughby, and Sir Simon Moruier, tooke great paine to appease the people, and repress their fury: but when they saw that all wayled not, they withdrew themselves, to the Bastile of Saint Anthony, which fortreffe they had well bittayled and furnished, with men and munitions.

Whiles this rumoz was in the towne, the Erle of Dinnoys and other scaled the walles, and some passed the riuer by Boates, and opened the gate of Saint James, at the which the Constable with his Banner displayed entered, at whose entrie the Parisians were very glad, and made great ioy. The Bishop and the Lozde Willoughby, with their small companie, defended their fortreffe, tenne dayes, loking for ayde, but when they sawe that no comfort appered, they yeldd their fortreffe, so that they and theirs with certain baggage, might peaceably returne to Roan, which desire was to them graunted. Then as they departed, the Parisians rayled, mocked, and taunted the English men, with the most spitefull wordes, and shamefull termes, that could be inuented or deuised: so that all men may apparauntly perceyue, that their heartes neuer thought, as their tongues bittered.

After this glorious gaine, the French king besieged the towne of Craile, vpon Oyse, whereof Sir William Chamberlain was Captain, which with five hundred Englishmen issued out of the towne, and after long fight, discomfited his enemies, and slue two hundred, and tooke a great number prisoners: the remnant not likyng their market, departed to Compeigne, and other townes adioinyng. Durynge which season, xij. Burgesses of the towne of Gysoz, solde it for money to Doyton of Kantrayles, but he had not the Castell deliuered. Wherefore with all his power, he besieged the same, whereof the Lozde Calbot beyng aduertised, sent for the Lord Scales, and they both with, cxliij. hundred men, rescued the Castell, tooke the towne, and discomfited their enemies, and slue of them about foure hundred persons. Nowe was the olde proverbes berefied, that he that commeth a day after the fayre, commeth to late, and when the sterde is stolen, it is no boote to shut the stable doore. For when Paris, Saint Denise, Saint Germaines in Lay, and many other townes in Fraunce were taken and betrayed, for lacke of succours and sufficient garrisons, then the Duke of Yorke appoynted at the Parliament before to be Regent of Fraunce, and by the disdeyn and enuy of the Duke of Sommerfet and other, not till now dispatched, was sent into Normandie, with, liij. thousand men, and in his companie the Erles of Sarisburie, and Suffolke, and the Lozde Fauconbridge, and diuers balaunt Capteynes. When he was landed at Harlew, the Erle of Sarisburie besieged the Castell of Chamboys, which shortly was to him rendered. Then the Duke remoued to Roan, where he set good orders, and did great iustice in the Countie, wherefore the Normanes in their Chronicle, highly extoll and much magnifie him, for that poprit: Howbest, they say, that he gate by long siege, the towne and Abbey of Fecampe, and did none other notable act, durynge the tyme of his rule and gouernance.

Phillip Duke of Burgoyne, which (as you haue heard) brake both his othe and promise with the king of England, imagined with himselfe, that the Englishe men were like shortly to be expelled out of all the townes on that syde the sea, and that they had no certain refuge nor place to resort to, out of Normandie, but only the towne of Calice. Wherefore he assembled his counsaile, and the heades of the Cities and townes of Flaundyys, Brabant, Holland, and Zeland, in the towne of Gaunt, where was declared vnto them, the right, title, and interest, that he had to the towne of Calice, and the countie of Guisnes, as a very patrimonie belongyng to his inheritance: shewyng further, that the sayd towne was the golfe and swallower by of all the golde and siluer of his Countie and dominions, for so much as there was the staple of woole, tynne, lead, and other marchandise, for the which the Englishe men would take no common currant money, but onely gold and siluer, to the great impoverishment of his seignories & Regions: sayng further, that Calice only was the common stop, betwene his Countie and Briteyn, and Spaine, so that Southward, nor Westward, his subiectes could not passe, without the daunger of that towne. Wherefore these detrimetes considered, he determined if they would assent, shortly to recouer and conquere that towne and the Countie of Guisnes. To this purpose all the counsaile, and common people, not onely agreed, but also promised ayde, both of men and money. Lorde howe the Fleminges bragged, and the Hollandys craked, that Calice should be wonne, and all the Englishemen slaine, swearing, and staryng, that they would haue it within thzee dayes at the most: thinkyng verely, that the towne of Calice, could no moze resist their puyssaunce, then a pot of double beere, when they fall to quaffyng.

To tell you what ordenance was new cast, what powder was bought, what engines were deuised, what harnesse was prouided, what bitaile was purueyed for that great enterprize: I will not comber you, in rehercyng euery thyng particularly, because the Flemynges write, that the prouision was moze then tongue could speake, or heart could thinke, yet you may beleue as you list. These doynges were not so priuie, but Sir John Radeliffe Deputy of the towne of Calice, was thereof enformed, and shortly of the same aduertised king Henry, and his counsaile, which incontinent sent thether the Erle of Mortayne, sonne to the Duke of Somerset, and the Lorde Cammeys, with. xv. hundreth men, and great foysen of bitaile, which issued out of Calice, and came befoze Grauelgnyne, where they were encountered wyth a great number of Flemynges, which were shortly discomfited, and foure hundreth of them slaine, and six scoze taken prisoners, and caried into Calice. And within two dayes after, the Englishemen draue by fine force, the Lords of Bauraine and Bado, to the Barriers of Arde, and discomfited the companie, to the number of. xv. hundreth, and slue. vij. balcaunt Captaynes, & toke many Gentlemen prisoners. Philippe Duke of Burgoyne, abidyng still in his high and warlike enterprize, assembled together of Flemynges, Picardes, Hollanders, and Henobiers, a great armie, to the number of. xl. thousand, so well armed, so well bitayled, so well furnished with ordenaunce, and well garnished in all thynges, that they thought in their heartes, and blasted among themselves, that the Calicians, would leaue the towne desolate, and flie for their sauegarde, heeryng onely of the approchyng of the Gauntoys. But they reckned befoze their host, and so payde moze then their shot came to. When this gallant armie was passed the water of Grauelgny, the Duke entenyng to begyn his great conquest, besieged and assaunted the litle and pooze Castell of Oye, which hauyng in it but fiftie souldiers, of the which. xij. solde their liues derely, the remnant compelled by necessity, yelded themselves simple to the Duke, which to please the Gauntoys, beyng of the most puyssaunt companie in his armie, liberally gaue to them both the Castell and the prisoners, as a signe and token of good lucke, and fortunate victorie. Which rude and beastly persons, nothyng expert in warre, or lawes at armes, not onely rased and abated the Castell, but also hanged. xxix. of the captiues, and had so done with all the remnant, if the Duke, (disdaynyng theyr crueltie) had not entreated for the rest.

After this victorie, litle honourable, and lesse profitable, the Picardes besieged the Castell of Marke, and thze times assaunted it, moze to their losse then gain. The English men within, whereof Sir John Geddyng was Capteyn, set out the banner of Saint George, and rang the belles, to the entent to haue succours from the towne of Calice. But the Capteynes there, myndyng not to leaue the moze for the lesse, nor the substance for the accident, wished them good luck, & good fortune without any ayde sendyng. For doubt of the Dukes great armie and power. The souldiers within Marke, beyng but two hundreth and six, seyng no hope of succour, & desperate of comfort, rendered themselves to the Duke vpon condicon that their liues and limmes should be saued, and so they were conueyed in sure custodie to the towne of Saint, and the Castell of Marke was rased and defaced.

After this act done, the Duke of Burgoyne, accompanied with the Duke of Cleues, the Erle of Estampes, the Lords of Dantoyne, Croy, Cresquy, Humiers, and many other balcaunt Barons, and Knightes, with his great army, came befoze the towne of Calice, and placed his siege about the same, most to his aduantage, and to the most displeasure of his enemies. He gaue thze great assaultes to the towne, but his people were not so fierce to assault, but the English men were as quicke to defende, so that he gainyng so litle at these thze enterprizes, was content to abstaine from further approchyng toward the walles. At the first assault the Heire, which was come to see the Duke of Burgoyne, was soze wounded and hurt. Besyde this, the Duke had dayly one great eye soze, which was because that at euery tyde, shippes arriued in the Hauen, out of England, openly befoze his face, laden with bitaile, munitions, and men, and also the Calicians would for the nonce, put out cattaille into the marish, vnder the towne walles, to the entent to prouoke the Fleminges to come within their catchyng and daunger, which beyng couctous of pray and gain, often aduentured, and seldome returned againe: for many by this meanes were taken prisoners, but many moe slaine with ordenaunce. The Duke one day rood about, to viue and beholde the situation, and the walles of the towne, to the intent to take his most aduantage, either by assault or shot of ordenaunce. He was quickly espyed, and with the stroke of a Canon, a Trompetoz which rood next befoze him, and thze horses in his companie were slaine out of hand. When he sawe that all thynges succeeded not to his purpose, he first set the Lorde of Croy, and a conuenient number, to besiege the Castell of Guisnes, where the sayd Captain gat litle profite, and did lesse harme: And after deuised howe to stop the Hauen, so that no succours should enter there, and also to prohibite them within the towne to make any egressse or road outward, and so by this meanes to famishe and compell them to yelde and render the towne. This deuice was set forwarde, and nothyng slept: for foure great Hulkes were laded with great square stones, semented and ioyned together with lead, to the intent that they should lye still like a mount, and not to seuer a sonder. These shippes with the remnant of the Dukes nauie were conueyed into the mouth of Calice hauen, and in a full sea by craft and pollicie, were sonke downe to the ground, but whether God would not that the hauen should be destroyed, cyther the conueyers of the Hulkes, knewe not the very Channell, these foure great shippes at the lowe water, lay openly vpon the sandes, without any hurt doyng to the rode or Chanell, which when the souldiers had perceyued, they issued out of the towne, and brake the shippes, and caried both the stones and the tymber into the towne, which serued them well to their fortifications. The seconde deuice was also accomplished, which was a strong Bastell, set on a litle mountaine, furnished with foure hundreth men and much attillcry, which fortresse did let the English men to issue out, when they would, to their great displeasure and disturbance.

Calice besieged by the Duke of Burgoyne.

Whiles these things were in doing, there arryued into the Dukes armie an Herault of Englande called Pembroke, belonging to the Duke of Gloucester, which declared to the Duke of Burgoyne, that the Protector of England his Mayster (if God would send him wind and weather) would geue battayle to him and hys whole puyssaunce, eyther there, or in any other place within his awne Countrey, where he would appoint: but the day he could not assigne, because of the inconstancie of the winde, and mutabilitie of the aire. The Duke (like a noble man) aunswere the Herault: Sir, say to your mayster, that his request is both honozable, & reasonable, howbeit, he shall not neede to take paine, to seeke me in mine awne Countrey, for God wylling he shall finde me here, till I haue my will of the towne, readie to abide him, and all the power that he can make. After this aunswere made, the Herault was highly feasted, and had a Cup, and a hundred golden Gyldeng to him deliuered for a rewarde, and so returned to Calice. After whose departure, the Duke called a great counsaile in the chiefe Hauilion of the Gauntroys, and there declared both the Heraults message and his aunswere desyring them to regarde his honoz, the estimation of their Countreis, and the honesties of themselves, and like men to receyue their enemies, and balyauntly to defend their aduersaries, promising to them victorie, gaine, and perpetuall glorie.

Whiles this great matter was in consultation, the Calicians, not well contented with the Bastell, which the Duke had newly buylded, issued out of the towne in a great number, part on foote, and part on horseback. The footemen ran to assault the Bastile, and the horsemen went betwene the armie and the assaults, to stop the ayde and succors which might come. The alarmy was sounded, in so much that the Duke in proper person was coming on foote to releue his people, but by the meanes of the horsemen, he was stayed and kept back a space, in the which delay of time, the Englishmen by fine force gat the place, and slue a hundred and sixtie persons, the remnaunt were taken prisoners, and defaced the fortreffe, and set it on fyre: caryeng with them all the ordinaunce and artillerie into the towne of Calice, to the great displeasure of the Duke and his counsaile. The next day after, there sprang a rumoz in the armie (no man could tell how) that the Duke of Gloucester with a great puyssaunce was already embarked and shipped, and would arryue at the next tide, and come downe before Calice, and raise the siege. What was the very cause, I can not truly write: but surely the same night the Duke fled away, and sent in all hast to the Lorde of Croye, to raise his siege before Gypsnes, which tydings were to him very ioyous, for he neyther got nor saued: so these two Capitaines departed leauing behinde both ordinaunce, bitaile and great riches. The french writers, to saue the honoz of the Duke of Burgoyne, say that there was a certaine discord and commocion amongst the Flemings and duche Nation: affirming that the great Lordes and the Picardes, (whome the frenche men greatly extoll) would betray and sell the Flemings and their friends, and that for the same cause, in a great furie they cried home, home, and would not tarrie, for no request the Duke could make, nor no exhortation that could be geuen: and so by their misgouernance, the Duke was enforced to rayse his siege and to departe. The Flemishe authozs affirme the contrary, saying: that they were were readie to abide the coming of the Duke of Gloucester, but the Duke of Burgoyne fearing to be trapped, betwene the Duke of Gloucesters armie before, and the garrison of Calice behinde, so that he could escape by no way, fled away in the night, geuing to them no warning before. So that for lack of time, and conuenient space, to lade and cary their stufte, and being commaunded to retire with all speede and diligence, they were compelled to lose, and leaue behinde them their bitaile and tents, to their great losse and detriment. Now it is at your liberties (gentle Readers) whether you will geue credite to the french men (which were absent and no doers in the act) or to the Flemings, which were partakers of the losse and dishonoz. But the infallible veritie is, that he fled the .xxvi. day of July in the night, & the next day in the morning the Duke of Gloucester landed in Calice hauen, and straight went into the Campe, where his enemies the night before were lodged, and there he found many goodly peeces of ordinaunce, and in especially one called Dyeon, named after the chiefe towne of Burgoyne, beside pavillions, wine, Beere, Meale, and innumerable bittaile.

The Duke of Gloucester seing his enemies reculed, hauing in his company .xxv. M. men, entered into Flaunders, burning houses, kylling such as would resist, destroyeng the Countrey on euery parte, setting fyre in the townes of Doyorniche and Baillens, and wasted the suburbes of many faire Cities, and in all this way, they lost no man, nor saue any creature appere to defend the Countrey. After they passed by Newe Castell, and destroyed Rymesture, & Vallon Chapell, and then entred into Arthoys, to Arques and Blandesques, setting fyre in euery part where they came. Thus they passed by Saint Omers, to Gypsnes, and so to Calice at sixe weekes ende, where they were well refreshed: for in all this iozney, they had little plenty of good bread, which caused much faintnesse, and diuers diseases in the armie. When the Duke of Gloucester had sufficiently plagued and wasted the Countreys of the Duke of Burgoyne, and brought great prayes of beastes and spoyle to the towne of Calice, he setting there all things in good order, returned into Englande, where he was aduertised, how James king of Scottes, contrary to his othe, league and promise, had besieged the Castell of Rokesborough, with thirtie thousand men, wherof Sir Raufe Gray was Capitaine which manfully defended it twentie dayes, but the Scottishe king being aduertised, that the Erle of Northumberland was coming to fight with him, fled with no lesse losse, then dishonoz to his towne of Edenbrough.

After this dangerous businesse finished, and for a time ended, by meane of friends, and desire of Princes, a truce or abstinence of warre for a certaine tyme was moued betwene the king of England, and the Duke of Burgoyne, for which cause were sent to Grauelynne for the king of England, the Cardynall of Winchester Henry Beauford, John Lorde Moubrey Duke of Norfolkke, Humfrey Erle of Stafford, and dyuers other well learned and honorable personages: and for the Duke there appered the Duches his wyfe, the Byshop of Arras, the Lorde of Croy, and diuers other. At which treatie, a truce was taken for a small time, and for a lesse space obserued. Which abstinence of warre was concluded betwene the king of Englande, and the Duches of Burgoyne (leauing out the Duke and his name.) Some thinke that the king of England would not enter in league with him, because he had broken his promise, wytyng and fidelity, wrytten, sealed, and sworne to him, and to his father. Other unagened this to be done by a cautell, to cast a mist befoze the French Kings eyes, to the intent he should beleue, that this feat was wrought by the Duches, without assent or knowledge of the Duke or his counsaile, and so he was not bounde to accomplish anye act or thing done in his wyfes treatie.

About thys season, Katheryn Quene and mother to the king of Eng- lande departed out of this transitorie lyfe, and was buryed by her husband, in the Chyncher of Westminster. Thys woman after the death of King Henry the sixt her husbnde, beyng young and lustie, following more her owne appetite, then friendly counsaile, and regarding more her private affection, then her open honour, tooke to husband priuely a goodly gentleman, and a beautifull person, garnished with many goodly giftes, both of nature and of grace, called Owen Tuther, a man brought forth, and come of the noble linage and auncient lyne of Cadwoaleder, the last king of the Brytons, by whome she conceaued and brought forth three goodly sonnes, Edmond, Jasper, and another, which was a Monk in Westminster, and liued a smal tyme, and a daughter, which in her youth departed out of this transitorie lyfe: After whose death king Henry, because they were hys brethren of one wombe descended, created Edmond Erle of Richemond, and Jasper Erle of Pembroke, which Edmond engendered of Margaret daughter and sole heyze to John Duke of Somerset, Henry which after was king of thys realme, called king Henry the seauenth, of whome you shall heare more hereafter. This Owen after the death of the Quene hys wyfe, was apprehended and committed to warde, because that contrarie to the statute made in the first yere of thys king, he presumptuously had maried the Quene, with- out the kinges especiall assent and agreement, out of which prison he esca- ped, and let out other with hym, and was agayne apprehended, and after escaped agayne.

This Sir Richard was made Baron of Rivers, and after Erle, and had by thys Ladye many noble sonnes, and fayze daughters: whereof one was Lady Elizabeth, after Queene of Englande, maried to king Ed- ward the fourth (as hereafter you shall perceue.)

ceased.

Whiles this marriage was celebrating, Jane late Quene of England, and before Duches of Britayne, daughter to the king of Nauerre, and wife to king Henry the fourth, died at the mannoz of Hauering, and was buried by her husbnde at Cauntorbury, in which tyme discaised the Countesse of Warwike, and Henry Archebyschop of Yorke.

And here I may not forget the double dealing, and craftie demeanour, of James King of Scottes: which being (as you haue heard) late prisoner in Engiande, not onely was garnished with learning and ciuilitie (which things were rare and straunge befoze that time, within the realme of Scot- land) but also set at libertie, and honorably sent home. And to the intent that his amitie might be perpetuall, and that loue might continually succede be- twene both the realmes, by his meane and accorde: first, his great roun- some was abridged, and dimished, and after he was ioyned in mariage with one of the bloud royall, as befoze you haue heard: yet this vngentle prince, and forgetfull friend, putting in obliuion both the duetie of his obeysaunce, towarde his soueraigne and liege Lorde, and the othe and promise that he made to king Henry, when he did to him homage, and fealtie at the Castell of Windsor (as befoze you haue heard) turned his back to his friend and kinsman and loked to the French parte, which neuer did him honor nor pro- fit, not onely sending into Fraunce daylie ayde and succours, agaynst the Englishe nation, but also by newe alliaunce sought and practised wayes and meanes, how to ioyne himselfe with fozein princes, to greue and hurte his neighbours and adioynants of the realme of Englande. And although his owne power were small, to doe them any great damage, yet he thought that he being lincked in suche noble houses, should the lesse feare the malice of his enemies: vpon which feeble foundation, he concluded two mariages, the one with Lewis the Dolphin, sonne to Charles the French king, and the other with Fraunces Duke of Britayne. Which mariages were not de- sired for loue or riches, but onely for ayde to resist and driue out the English men out of Fraunce. For the Lady Margaret maried to the Dolphin, was of such nasty complexion and euill sauored breath, that he abhorred her com- pany, as a cleane creature doth a caryon: whereupon she conceived such an inward grieve, that within short time after, she ended her dayes. Although this Lady had such impediments (as you haue heard) yet her sister Isabell, maried to Fraunces Duke of Britayne, lacked neyther exceeding betwie, nor pleasaunt breath: but as for wyf, womanhood, and ciuile behauior, she neuer had, nor exercised. Wherefoze when the Duke befoze his maryage, was by his counsaile admonished to refuse and forsake so innocent a crea- ture, he more moued with her fayze face, then her womanly wisdome an- swered: that it was ynough for a woman to iudge the difference be- twene the wyte and the doblet of her husbnde, and to knowe him in the darke from another man.

For these mariages, king James demaunded of his commons a great subsidie or tallage, which was sore grudged at, and in maner denied: so that he maried them with fayze promises, and ayde and succour agaynst the Eng- lish men, rather then with bagges of money, or Chestes of Plate. Thys fozein alliaunce little profited or auayled the realme of Scotland, nor this newe amitie defended not king James: for Walter Steward Erle of Athole, which pretended a tytle to the crowne, by reason that he was begot- ten of king Robert the second, by his first wyfe, and by whose occasion, Ro- bert Duke of Albany, murdered David Duke of Rothsay, elder brother to thys king James (as in the story of king Henry the fourth, you haue heard declared) after the coronation of king James the first in Scotland, earnest- ly sollicitated him to put to death Duke Murdoch, and all the offspring of Robert first Duke of Albany, trustyng that after he had destroyed that lyne (which was a stop in his way) to inuent some meane how to destroy the king and his children, and so to obteyne the Crowne and preheminance of the Realme. Wherefoze he perswaded Robert Steward his Nephew, & Robert Craime hys Colyn, and diuers other, to murder and slay the king their soueraigne Lozde, which thereto by deuillish instigation incensed and procured, came to the towne of Bertho (commonly called S. Johns towne) and there entered into the kings priuie chamber, and slue first diuers of hys seruauntes, which made resistance, and after kylled the king with many mortall strokes, and hurt the Quene, which in defense of her husband felled one of the Traytors. When this vngacious deede was blown about the towne, the people rose in great plumpes, and found out the princequellers, and them brought to straight prison, which afterward (according to their deserts) were with most terrible torments put to death and executed.

After James the first, succeeded James the seconde, his eldest sonne, which fearing sedicion and ciuile disoord, beyed moze his awne nation, then the Englishe people did.

The Castell
of Tanker-
wile taken.

Nowe leauyng Scotland, let vs returne to the businesse of Fraunce. Whiles the Scottes were compassyng how to destroy their king: the Lozde Calbot with a great companie layd siege to the Castell of Tankerwile, which after four monethes was to him simplie rendred and geuen by. This towne was no great gaine to the Englishe men: for in the meane season the French king in his awne person besieged the strong towne of Monstreu Faulzion, whereof Thomas Gerard was Captein: which moze for desyre of rewarde, then for feare of enemies, solde the towne to the French king, and had of him great giftes, and good chere, which afterwarde was well knowen, to hys shame & reproch. This towne had bene reskued oz the French king foughten withall, if one chaunce had not happened: For the Duke of Porke was discharged of his office of Regent, and the Erle of Warwike preferred to the same, so that the Duke of Porke liyng at Roan, would haue gladly rescued the towne, if his aucthoritie had not succeeded, and the Erle could not, for the winde was so clene contrary to him, that he & his armie tarped for the winde aboue ten weekes. And so betwene the discharge of the one, and the charge of the other, this Towne of Monstreu, was deliuered and solde.

The Erle of Warwike
made Regent of Fraunce.

A parliament

This present yere was a Parliament kept at Westminster, in the which were diuers notable conclusions ordeyned and taken, aswell for the preservation of peace and con corde at home, as for the maintenance of warre, and hostilitie in outward regions: in the which Parliament, (who so will loke on the actes) shall perceyue that one act made, for buyng and sellyng by straungers, was profitable for the publike wealth of this realme, if it were well kept (as a fewe good actes oz none be, eyther by the negligence of the gouernours, oz by the insolencie and lewdnesse of the people.)

Nowe must we speake somewhat of Charles the French king: which after he had gayned againe the Citie of Paris, and diuerse other townes, was so puffed by with pride, that he thought it but a trifle to conquire Normandie, and expulse all the Englishe nation out of his Countries and seignories. Wherefore he sent Arthure of Briteyne Constable of Fraunce, and John Duke of Alanson, into Normandie with a great army, which besieged the towne of Aranches, standyng bpon the knop of an hill, nere to the Britishe sea, both well walled and well manned. While they lay there long, little gettyng and much spendyng, the Lozde Calbot with a balaunt companie of men approched nere the French men, and encamped themselves in the face of their enemies, to prouoke and intice them to battaile and fight. The french men refusyng this offer, kept themselves within their trenches, dayly fortifyng and reparyng their Campe. The Englichemen perceiuyng their doynges, remoued their armie halfe a Mile farther, geuyng their enemyes rowne to issue out and to fight, but all this little auayled: for the Frenchmen lay still and stirred not. The Lozde Calbot seyng their faint heartes, raysed his field, and in the open sight of them all, entred into the towne, and the next day issued out, and found the french men ridyng abroad, to destroy the plain Countre, whom he enuironed, bet, and discomfited, slayeng many, and takyng diuerse prisoners.

This yere, sayth Cooper, all the Lions in the Towre of London dyed, which before had liued there a long tyme.

On the sixt day of Nouember this present yere, the Erle of Warwike as Regent of Fraunce, passed the sea, after he had bene seuen times shipped and unshipped, and landed at Humblew, with a thousand freshe Souldiers, and came to Roan, and then the Duke of Porke returned into England, neyther wholly pleased, nor half content. For he secretly smelled, that some men priuily dispeyned his aduancement, and enuied his promotion: yet (like a wise man) he kept his tongue close, whatsoener his heart thought. Betwene the chaunge of these two Capteines, the Duke of Burgoyne (which soze enuied the glozy of the Englishe men) besieged the Castell of Croitoy with ten thousand men and mo, haryng with him great plentie of Goonnes, and goodly ordenaunce. The Erle of Warwike hearyng of this feate, sent the Lozde Calbot, the Lozde Fauconbridge, sir Thomas Kiriell, sir John Mountgomery, Thomas Limbrike, Thomas Chandos, Dauid Hall, & diuers other knightes and squiers, and many tall yomen, to the number of fiue thousand men, which passed the riuer of Some, besyde the towne of S. Walery: for the passage of Blaunche Taque was very dangerous to go throug, because the Duke of Burgoyne had layd there ordinaunce, and other engines, to let, trouble, and stoppe the Englichemen to go ouer at that foord. And yet, where the Lozde Calbot passed, his men went in the water by to the Chinne, so glad were the men to rescue their felowes. When the Duke of Burgoyne was informed of the approachyng of the Lozde Calbot and other, he with all his power sayng foure which were left in a Bastile, by him there newly buyded, fled to Abbeuile, which Bastile was sone gayned, and the men within eyther slain oz taken.

After this towne receyued, the Lozde Calbot sent worde to the Duke of Burgoyne, that he would vtterly waste and destroy the Countre of Picardie, except he (like a valiant Prince) would geue him battaile. And accordyng to his promise, he bent townes, spoyled, and slue many people in Picardie, but for all his doynges, the Duke would not appere, but stole away from Abbeuile, & fled to Amias. So the Lozde Calbot was. xx. dayes full in the Countries of Picardie, and Arthoyse, destroyng and brennyng all that they could see oz come to, and after departed. And in the meane season, Sir Thomas Kiriell had gotten all the Dukes cariages, and ordenaunce, and left as much vittaille in the towne of Croitoy, as would serue sixe hundred men a whole yere, and conueyed the remnant in safetie to the Erle of Warwike, which not onely receyued the Capteynes with good semblaunce, and louyng chere, but also highly magnified their actes, and much prayed they

After this enterprize atchieued, Henry Erle of Mortaine, sonne to Edmond Duke of Sommerfet, arriued at Chierburgh with foure hundreth archers, and thre hundreth speares, and passed through Normandie, till he came into the Countie of Mayne, where he besieged a Castell, called Saint Anjan, in the which were thre hundreth Scottes, besyde French men. This Castell he tooke by a strong assault, and slue all the Scottes, and hanged the Frenchmen, because they were once swozne Englishe, and after brake theyr othe: and after he gat also another Castell, two miles from Saint Julians, called Aegerche, which was shortly after recouered, and the Lord Camenis which came to the rescue of the same, in the meane way was trapped and taken. Thus the victorie flowed sometye on the one part, and sometye on the other, but the treason of the Frenchemen farre surmounted in getting, both the polley & strength of the English Capteynes: for by the vntruth and falshode of the very Burgesles and inhabitautes of the towne, of Meaux in Brie, and Saint Susanne, the same yere were solde and deliuered to the French part in the ende of this. xvi. yere.

This yere king Henry caused a solempne obite and terrement to be kept within Paules Church of London, for Sigismond the Emperour, who also was knight of the Garter.

This yere happened many vntemperate stormes, whereof rose suche a skarcitie, that wheate was solde at thre shillynges foure pence the Bushell, wine at. xij. pence the Gallon, Bay salt at. xiiij. pence the Bushell, and maull at. xiiij. shillynges foure pence the quarter, and all other graynes were sold of an excessive price, aboue the olde custome.

In the Moneth of June, the Erle of Hunteyngton (as Steuarde of Guyen) with two thousand Archers, and foure hundreth speares, was sent into Gascoyn, as a supplement to the Countrie, and the Comons of the same. For the king of England and his counsaile, were enformed that the Erle of Dumoys, lay on the frontiers of Tholose, secretly by rewarde and fayre promises, entisyng and prouokynge diuers towne in Guien to become french and leaue the Englishe nacion. Wherefore, this Erle (like a pollitike warrior) altered not onely the Capteynes in euery towne and Citie, but also remoued the Magistrates, and chaunged the officers, from towne to towne, and from rowne to rowne, so that by this meanes at that tyme, the Erle of Dumoys lost both trauaile and cost. In the same moneth also, Sir Richard Wooduile, Sir William Chamberlain, Sir William Deyto, and Sir William Storie, with a thousand men, were sent to stiffe the towne in Normandie, which surely at that tyme had thereof great neede: for the Englishe Capteynes had small confidence in the Normans, and not to much in some of their awne Nation. For that harlot bribery, and her felow couetousnesse, ran so fast abroad with french Crownes, that bnneth any creature, (without an especiall grace) could holde either hand close, or purse shut, such a strong percer is monie, and such a gredie glotton is auarice. You haue heard before, howe that king Charles heart by getting of Paris, was set vpon a merie Minne, and thought dayly that all thinges more and more, would both apply to his vurpose, and solob his appetite. Which inuented imaginacion, sodainly both deceyued him, and also abated his haute courage & proude stomacke.

For sodainly there arose a straunge storme, and a quick pitie, so mischicuous and so pernicious, that nothing more execrable, or more to be abhorred, could happen in any christian Region. Which sedicious tempest, if wise counsaile had not with all speede repressed, no doubt, but king Charles, and the whole publike welth of Fraunce, had bene turned by, and clene ouerthrowne. For Lewes Dolphyn of Vien, and heye apparant to king Charles, a yong prince of a froward stomacke and euill condicions, despyng libertie, and to be out of ward and rule, with such as were of his nature and condicions, began to conspire agaynst his father, and souereigne Lord. The chiefe of this vngacious faction with him, were John Duke of Alanson, and John Duke of Burbon. These confederates gathered together a great power, and the Dolphyn tooke vpon him, the rule and gouernaunce of the Realme orderynge causes, not in his fathers name, nor by his aucthoritie, but after his awne will, affection, and phantasie. When king Charles his father, had knowlege of this vnnaturall disobedience, and insolent & proude doyngs, he was (and no maruaile) greatly moued with this sodaine commocion: thinkyng himselfe borne, and predestinate to trouble, remembryng that it was no small thing, in his awne Countrey so many yeres, both with straungers, and with his awne Nation, to fight and strue for rule and dignitie, but nowe to be constrained to contend and make warre with his awne sonne, for the Crowne and Regiment of his realme and Dominion. Yet these thinges did not bring him, beyng a man of great wit and counsaile, dayly troubled and vnguided with calamities and displeasures, into vtter dyspayre, or extreme wanhope: but like a pollitike prince, determinyng to withstand and resist the smoke at the beginnyng, befoze the fyze and flame brast out abroad, called together all such as he had eyther in great confidence, or especiall fauour, communicating to them all his inward thoughts and priuie purposes. After long consultation had, it was agreed by the most part, that this fyze was more mete to be cured by polletique and wittie handlyng, rather then by force, and dent of sworde. Wherefore, letters were written, and postes were sent to euery Citie and Borough, straightly prohibityng all and singuler persons, either to heere, or obey, any precept or commaundement, set forth or published by the Dolphyn himselfe, or by other, or in his name, and all offences done in that confederacie, were by open proclamation freely forgoen and remitted. And besyde this, diuerse graue and sage persons, were sent to the Dolphyn, and his alies, to common and conclude a peace, and reconciliation betweene the french king and them, declaryng to them, that their ciuile warre, and inward dissencio, was the very meane to cause their enemies, vtterly to plague and destroy their native Country, which was almost desolate, & brought into subiection, by the continuall practised war befoze. By which meanes and persuasions, the knot of this sedicious faction, was losed and dissolved: and the king with his sonne, and other confederates, openly agreed and apparantly pacified. And so the spring of these mischicuous sect, was stopped and repulsed, or the flood had any thing encreased, or flowen farther.

The English men (which euer sought their aduantage) heying of this domesticall diuision in the realme of Fraunce, rayfed an army, and recouered againe diuers towne, which were stollen from them befoze by the french nation: and made great prouision to recouer againe the Citie of Paris, but

Donthoyle.

In the Month of Nouember this present yere, there was such a great frost, and after that so deepe a snowe, that all the ground was couered with white, and al the diches hardened and frosen, which weather put the English men in comfort to recouer againe the towne of Donthoyle, by the French king gotten before, by corrupting with money diuers Burgeses of the towne. Wherefore the Englishmen being clothed all in white, with John Lorde Cliforde their Capitaine, came in the night to the diches, and passed them without daunger, by reason of the frost, and sodaynely scaled the walles, slue the watche, and tooke the towne with many profitable prisoners. When this towne was thus gotten, Lorde Richard Beauchampe Erle of Warwike and Regent of Fraunce, died in the Castell of Roan, and was conueied into England, and with solempne ceremonies was buryed in his College of Warwike, in a very solempne and sumptuous Sepulture.

The death of the Erle of Warwike
Regent of Fraunce.

Then was the Duke of Yorke agayne made Regent of Fraunce, which accompanied with the Erle of Orforde, the Lorde Burchier, called the Erle of Ewe, Sir James of Ormond, the Lorde Clinton, and dyuers other Noble men, sayled into Normandy: Before whose arryual, the French king beyng sore greued with the taking of the towne of Donthoyle, assembled a great army, and besieged the sayde towne himselfe, and made rounde about it Bastiles, Trenches, and diches, and daylie shot ordynance, and gaue thereunto dyuers great and fierce assautes. But John Lord Clifford, lyke a valyaunt Capitayne defended the towne with such valyauntnesse, that the French men rather losse then gayned. The Duke of Yorke at his landing, hauing true knowledge of this siege, sent for the Lorde Talbot, and a great number of souldiours, and so came nere to the towne of Donthoyle, and there encamped himselfe, and sent worde to the French king, that he was there, readie to geue him battayle, if he would come out of his Campe and Bastiles. King Charles was ruled by his counsaile, which in no wise would suffer him to aduenture his person, with men of so lowe and base degree: bydding him to remember, what losses he and hys auncesters had suffered, by geuing to the English men battayle: which thing they principally desire, wylling him to keepe his ground still, and to bid them enter at their perill, and in the meane season, to stop the passage of the Riuer of Oyse, so that no byttayle could be brought to the English armie by that waye, by which meanes he should not onely obtaine his purpose, but also cause the English men to recule back againe, for lack of bittayle and succours. The Duke of Yorke perceyuing that the French king was nothing minded to fight, determined to passe ouer the ryuer of Oyse, and so to fight with him in his lodging, whereupon he remoued his Campe, and appointed the Lord Talbot and other, to make a countenance as they would passe the Riuer by force at the gate of Beaumont, and appointed another company with boates of

of timber and leather, and bridges made of cordes and ropes (whereof he had great plentie, caried with him in Chariottes to passe ouer the ryuer bene the Abbay. While the Lord Talbot made a cry, as though they would assaile the gate, certaine English men passed the water ouer in boates, and drew the bridge ouer, so that a great number were come ouer, or the French men them espied. When they sawe the chaunce, they ran lyke mad men, to stop the passage, but their labour was lost, and all their paine to no purpose: for the most parte of the English people were sodainely transported, in so much that they chased their enemies by fine force into the towne agayne, and tooke Sir Guiliam de Chastell, Nephew to the Lorde Cantebury, and dyuers other gentlemen prisoners. The French men seying their damage irreuerable, returned to the French king, accompting to hym their euill chaunce and vnlucky fortune, which therewith was not a little displeasaut: and well perceyuing, that if he taried the coming of the English men he was like to be eyther in great reuerdy, or sure to sustayne much dishonor and great damage. Wherefore he remoued his ordynance into the Bastile of Saint Martyne, which he had newly made, and leaueing behinde him the Lorde of Cotigny, Admirall of Fraunce, with three thousand men to keepe the Bastiles, dislodged in the night from Maubuysson and came to Poyse: for if he had taried still in that place, the Lorde Talbot with certaine of his trustie souldiours, which passed the riuer of Oyse in two small leather boates had eyther slayne or taken him in his lodging the same night. The English men the next daye in good order of battayle, came before the towne of Donthoyle, thinking there to haue found the French king, but he was gone, and in his lodging they founde great ryches, and muche stuffe, which he could not haue space to conuey for feare of sodaine inuasion. Then the Duke of Yorke with his company entered into the towne, and sent for newe bittayle, and repayred the towres and bulwarkes about the towne, and dyuers times assailed the Bastile of the French men, of the which he passed not greatly because they were not of power, eyther to assault, or stop the bittayles or succours from the towne. The Duke being thus in the towne of Donthoyle, was aduertised that the French king and the Dolphyn with all the Nobilitie of Fraunce, were lodged in Poyse, wherefore he intending once agayne to offer hym battayle, left behinde him there for Capitayne, Sir Seruays Clifton, with a thousand souldiours, and remoued his armie, and came before Poyse, and set himselfe and his men in good order of battayle, readie to fight. There issued out diuers gentlemen, to skirmish with the English men, but they were sone discomfited, and foure valyaunt horsemen were taken prisoners, and dyuers slayne. The English men perceyuing the faynt hartes, and colde courage of their enemies, which nothing lesse desired, then to encounter wyth the English nation in open field, dislodged from Poyse, and came to Mant, and sone after to Roan.

When the Regent and the Lorde Talbot, were returned agayne into Normandy, the French king (for all his euill luck) forgot not the towne of Donthoyle, and first he considered what charges he had susteyned, both during the time of the siege, and also in making Bastiles, trenches, and other deuises: and after remembered, that his people, and especially the Parisians (to whome this towne was an euill neighbor) would rayle and say, that he was

was not able, or lacked courage to get so small a towne, or to discomfite halie a handfull of armed people. Wherefore these things set in order, he assembled all his puyssaunce, and returned sodainely againe to Donthoise: where he first by assault gat the Church, and after the whole towne, and tooke the Capitaine prisoner, and diuers other Englishe men, and slue to the number of foure hundred, which deerevely solde their lyfes: for one French wypter affirmed, that the French king lost there three thousand men and mo, and the whole garrison of the Englishe men, was onely a thousand: so they garded the towne, but they gat no great bootie of men. When the fame of thys victorie was blowne abroad, the hartes of the townes men wared faynt, in so muche that Melune, Cozbuell, Eureux, and diuers other townes, yeelded and turned at a prowde crake, or a French bragge, without stroke striken, or any blowe geuen.

After these hote rages, the weather beganne to waxe more temperate, for king Henry, and king Charles were agreed to send Ambassadors to common and treat some good peace and conclusion betweene them and their realmes. So the king of Englande sent the Cardinall of Winchester, with diuers other noble personages of his counsaile to Calice, with whome was also sent Charles Duke of Orleans, yet prisoner in Englande, to the intent that he might be both the authoꝝ of the peace, and procurer of his deliuerance. The French king sent the Archebishop of Reyns, and the Erle of Dumnoys: and the Duke of Burgoyne, sent the Lorde Creuecier, and diuers other, because that the Duke of Orleans was passed the sea with the English Ambassadors, they would meete in none other place to common, but in Calice. The French Ambassadors perceyuing their mind, came to Calice, where the Duke of Orleans, gently receyued the Erle of Dumnoys (his Bastard brother) thanking him hartely for his paine taken, in gouerning his countrey, during the time of his captivity and absence. Diuers communications were had, as well for the deliuerance of the Duke, as for a finall peace: in so much, that after much consultancy and little doing, another tyme was appointed for a newe assembly, and euery parte to declare to their soueraigne, the request and desire of the other. So these Ambassadors tooke their leaue and departed, and the Englishe commissioners comeyed agayne the Duke of Orleans into England, which had nothing then to pay hys ransome, and yet he could not be deliuered without payment. The cause why these commissioners did not agree, was (as the French writers saye) that the Englishe men demaunded, not onely to haue and possesse peaceably the two Duchies of Aquitayne and Normandy, to their kinges and princes discharged of all resort, superioritie, and souereigntie, frankly and freely, agaynst the realme of Fraunce, the kinges and Gouvernoꝝ of the same for euer: but also required to be restored to all the townes, Cities, and possessions, which they, within thirtie yeres next before gone and past, had conquered in the realme of Fraunce. The English men thought that they demaunded but right and reason: and the French men, thought their request to be most hurtfull to their realme, and auncient glorie. So both parties, rather minding to gayne or saue, then to lose, departed for that time (as you haue heard). After which diet prozaged for a time, Philip Duke of Burgoyne, partly moued in conscience, to make some amendes and recompence to Charles

Charles Duke of Orleans (then being prisoner in England) for the death of Duke Lewes his father) whome Duke John father to this Duke Philip, shamefully slue, and cruelly murdered in the Citie of Paris) as in the time of king Henry the fourth, is plainly mencioned (and partly intending the aduancement of his niece, Lady Marie daughter to Adolph Duke of Cleue, by the which aliaunce, he trusted surely to knit suche a firme knot, and friendly amitie with the Duke of Orleans, that all olde rancor should cease, and all discord should be forgotten: and in their places concord should be stablished, and perpetuall loue embraced) sent messengers into England, to the sayde Duke, declaring to him his good will, deuise and entent. The which proffer he not onely accepted, but also was most ioyfull thereof. And as some wypters affirme, the sayde Duke of Burgoyne payde for his ransome and deliuerance foure hundred thousand crownes, but other say three C. M. and so he was deliuered out of Englande into Fraunce at that time, both speaking better Englishe then French, and also swearing, neuer to beare armoz agaynst the king of England. After his arrivall in Fraunce, he came to the Duke of Burgoyne his speciall friend, gratifying and thanking him of his libertie and deliuerance: and according to his promise and convention, he maryed the sayre Lady Mary in the towne of S. Omers, on whom he begat a sonne, which after was French king, and called Lewes the xij. After his deliuerance from captiuitie he forgat not hys Uncle John Erle of Angolesme, which had bene as a pledge in Englande for the debt of Duke Lewes of Orleans his father, sithe the last yere of king Henry the fourth (as in his storie is declared): but made friends, borrowed money, and morgaged land, and so set him at libertie, and brought him into his Countrey: This John engendered Charles, father to Fraunces, the first of that name, which after the death of Lewes the. xij. obeyned the crowne of Fraunce.

Here is to be noted, that olde rancor newly appeased, will commonly spring out agayne: for although the vnhappie diuision, betwene the two noble families of Orleans and Burgoyne, were by this great benefite and marriage, for a time geuen ouer and put in oblivion, and so continued by the space of twentie yeres and moze, yet their children and Cosyns, within few yeres after, fell so farre at square, that the house of Burgoyne was spoyled of the sayrest flower of his garlande, as you shall here afterwarde at large declared, and in especiall in the time of king Fraunces the first, the very heire of the house of Orleans, which not onely continually vexed with mortall warre, Charles the fift, Emperoz of that name, lineall successour to Philip Duke of Burgoyne: but also did as much as in him lay, to depriue the sayde Charles of his honoz and possessions (as men wytyng their lyues, will hereafter declare.)

In the beginning of this. xix. yere, Richard Duke of Yorke Regent of Fraunce, and gouernoz of Normandie, remembryng the great charge, and waightie office to him deliuered and committed, determined (after long consultation) to invade the territories of his enemies, both by sundrie armies, and in diuers places, to the entent that the French people beyng vexed within their awne Countrey and peculiar Dominion, should make no rodes nor enterpynges into the Duchie of Normandie, the returnyng whereof, was somewhat suspicious. This deuise for that season, semed both profitable and necessarie, wherefore, without long delayng of time, he sent Robert Lorde Willoughby, with a great crue of souldiers, to inuade and destroy the Countrie about Anias, and John Lorde Talbot, was appoynted to besiege the towne of Depe, and he himselfe, accompanied with Edmond Duke of Somerset, set forward into the Duchie of Aniou. The Lorde Willoughby, accordyng to his commission, entered into the Countrie to him appoynted, and to the entent that his trauaile should not be espyed nor knowen, he straightly forbade and inhibited all maner of fire and burnyng of townes, which is the most open and plaine token of warre and inuasion. By reason whereof the poore paystantes and rusticall people goyng abroade without feare or suspicion of euill, were ouerronne or taken with the horsmen, or they could attaine to any towne, or forcelet: so that innumerable people were slaine, and taken, or they heard any tidynges of their enemies approchyng. The French men in the garrisons adioyning, astoried at the clamor and crie of the poore people, issued out in good order, and manfully set on their enemies. The fight was sore, and the victorie long and doubtfull: But in conclusion, the French men seeyng their people in the forefront of the battaile, to be killed without mercie, like men desperate turned their backs and fearefully fled, the Englishe men folowed, and slue many in the chase, and such as escaped the sworde were robbed and spoyled, by Lewes Erle of Saint Paule, which was comyng to ayde the Englishe nation. In this conflict were slaine, aboue five hundred men of armes, and a greater number taken: so the Lord Willoughby, like a victorious Captein, with riche spoyle and good prisoners, returned againe to the Citie of Roan. The Dukes of Yorke and Sommer set, likewise entered into the Duchie of Aniou, and Countie of Mayne, destroyng townes, spoilyng the people, and with great pray and profite, repayed againe into Normandie. The Duke of Sommer set, not filled with this gayne, entered into the Marches of Briteyn, and tooke by a fierce assault, the towne of Serche, apperteyning to the Duke of Maunson, and spoyled and brent the same, and after that, departed to Donzay, where he sojourned two monethes, from whence he sent daily men of warre, which destroyed and wasted the Countreys of Aniou, Craonnys and Chatragonnoyes.

The French king in all hast, sent the Marshall of Loyache, with foure thousand men, to resist the inuasions of the Duke of Sommer set, which Capteyne determined to set on the Duke and his people, in the dead tyme of the night. This enterprize was not so secrete, but it was reueled to the Duke, which marched forward, and met the French men halfe way, and after long fight, by fine force they were manfully discomfited, and they slue a hundredth persones and mo, and tooke captiues. Ixij. whereof the chiefe were the Lord Dausigny, Sir Lewes de Buell, and all the other almost, were knightes and Esquiers. After this encounter, the Duke tooke the Towne of Beamothe Vicount, and manned all the fortresses on the frontiers of his enemies, and with riche bootyes, and welthie captiues came againe to the Duke of Yorke.

Durynge these fortunate chaunces and victories, the Lorde Talbot also, the vnwried Chieftain and manly warriour, environed the towne of Depe, with depe trenches, and great mountaynes, and did set by upon the Mount de Poulet, a strong and defensible Bastile, at which tyme was Capteyne of the same towne, Charles de Marez, a man of more force in battaile, then polletike

polletike in defence of a siege: for the Englishe men beyng a small number, had to them deliuered with fayre wordes, and faint strokes, the Castell of Charleinespyll, and diuerse other fortresses adioyning to the towne. Durynge the siege, many encounters were had, and many great assaultes geuen, the Englishe men sometime saued, and sometime gayned, but the most losse lighted on the Frenchmen for a while. But of thre Capteynes sent forth at one tyme (as you before hane heard) all cannot retorne with egall honour, and euen botie. For the Lord Talbot perceiuyng the towne of Depe, to be strongly defended, both with men, vitaille, and ordinaunce, and that he lacked all the sayde furnitures for the accomplishyng of his stout enterprize, deliuered the custodie of the Bastile, with the gouernaunce of the siege, to his Bastard sonne, a baleaunt yong man, and departed to Roan, for ayde, money, and munitions. The French king, was quickly aduertised of the Lord Talbots absence, and of the estate of the Englishe men: wherefore without delay, he meanyng not to lose so great a pray, sent his eldest sonne Lewes Dolphyn of Vien accompanied with the Bastard of Orleans, called the Erle of Dumoy, and diuerse other nobles of Fraunce, to the number of .xv. thousand persons, well armed, & no lesse garnished with all thinges necessary for theyr purpose. Thre dayes they assailed the Bastile, and so many times they were put back, but powder fayled in the fortresse, and weapon wherewith to defend, was very scant, so that in conclusion, the Englishe men were banquished, and the Bastile taken, and in it the Bastard Talbot, Sir William Peytow, and Sir John Repeley, which were shortly after redemed: The other Englich souldiers seeyng the Bastile gayned, stood all day in good order of battaile, and in the night polletikely returned to Roan, without losse or damage. At this assault, the French men say, that they slue two hundredth Englishe men, and denie not, but they lost five hundredth persones, and by this meanes, the one nacion lost the Bastile, and the other saued the towne, to the great displeasure of the Lorde Talbot.

While these thinges were a doynge, Phillip Duke of Burgoyne, hauyng an enuious heart, at the glory and fortunate successe of the Englishe people, intenyng to bereue them of one of their assured friendes, called Lewes of Lurenborough Erle of Saint Paule, made sharpe warre upon his Countreys, and tooke diuers townes and fortresses from him, so that in conclusion more for feare, then for loue, he vtterly refused his fayth and promise, made to the Duke of Bedford his brother in lawe, and turned to the Frenche part, and became a luke warme enemy to the realme of England. The losse of this friend and necessarie neighbour, not a little grieued king Henry and his counsaile: Howbeit they made such puruepaunce and prouision, by discrete counsaile, that if he of euill will, would do to them little good, yet he of malice should do to them no great hurt or damage.

The Englishe Capteynes beyng in Guyen, hauyng knowledge of the baleaunt doynge of their Countreimen in the realme of Fraunce, determined to do some notable and noble enterprize on the French coastes adioyning to Aquitain: and so they besieged the strong towne of Tartas, belongyng to the Lorde Delabreth, their olde and auncient enemy. The Capteynes and gouernours of the towne consideryng their weakenesse, and the force of the Englishe men, tooke this appoyntment with the Englishe Capteynes, that the

the towne should remaine neuter, and for y<sup>e</sup> assurance therof, they deliuered Cadet the sonne of the Lord Delabzeth in pledge, vpon this condicion: that if the Lord Delabzeth would not assent to their agrement, then he should signifie his refusall, to the Englishe Capteynes, within thre monethes next ensuyng: and he to haue his pledge, and they to do their best. The frenche king, at the request of the Lordes of Guyen, which were not able to defende themselves, toke this matter in hande, and caused the Lord Delabzeth to certifie his disagreement to the Erle of Huntingdon, Lieutenant for the king of England, in the Duchie of Aquitaine. And to please the great Lordes of Guyen, he assembled. lx. thousand men, and came to Tholose, and so to Tartas: to whom the Chieftaynes of the towne, seying no succours comyng, rendered the towne, and Cadet Delabzeth, which was left there as a pledge, was deliuered, the french king after the yeldyng of Tartas, remoued to S. Seuer, a strong towne in Gascoyn, but smally peopled with men of warre, which he toke by force, and slue thre hundred persons, and toke Sir Thomas Rampstone prisoner. After this towne gayned, he with all his power besieged the Citie of Arques, and toke the Bulwarke of the same, which was smally defended, and sone gotten. The inhitauntes of the towne, began sore to be afrayed, and came to the Lorde Mountferrand, Capteine for the king of Englande, requiryng him to haue mercie vpon them, and to render the towne to the french king, vpon some honest couenant or composition. The Capteyne perceiuyng the faint heartes of the Gascoynes, and knowyng that without their ayde, he was not able to resist the puissance of the french king, toke an agrement, and departed with all the Englishe crue to Bourdeaux, where he found the Erle of Longuile, Capdab of Bueffe, and Sir Thomas Rampston, which was a little before deliuered.

After this, the fortresses of Rioll and Mermandie, yelded them to the french king. Although these townes thus submitted them to him, yet he had them not long, nor made much taryng in the Duchie of Guyen, for the Englishe men not onely prohibited the Gascoynes to minister to his armie bitaile, and sustenance, but also gat into their handes, and toke such bitailes as were conueyed to him from Tholose and Boyters: So that in maner constrained with famine and lacke of prouision, he retired his armie againe into Fraunce. After whose departure, the English Captaines recouered againe the Citie of Arques, and the other townes by the french king gayned, and tooke prisoner his Lieutenant, called Reignault Guillam the Burgenyon, and many other Gentlemen, and all the meane Souldiours, were eyther slaine or hanged.

While the french king was in Guyen, the Lorde Talbot toke the towne of Couchete, and after marched towarde Gapllardon, which was besieged by the Bastard of Orleans Erle of Dumoys: which Erle heeryng of the English mens approchyng, rayled his siege and saued himselfe. A little before this enterprize, the french men had taken the towne of Curreur, by treason of a fisher. Sir Fraunces Arragonoys heeryng of that chaunce, apparelled sixe strong men, like rusticall people with sackes and baskets, as carriers of cozne and bitaile, and sent them to the Castell of Coznill, in the which diuers English men were kept as prisoners: and he with an imbushment of Englishe men lay in a Ualey nie to the fortresse. These sixe Companions nions entered into the Castell, unsuspected and not mistrusted, and straight came to the Chamber of the Capteyne, and layde handes vpon him, geuyng knowlege thereof to their imbushment, which sodainly entered the Castell, and slue and toke all the french men prisoners, and set at libertie all the Englishe men, which thing done, they set the Castell on fire; and departed with great spoyle to the Citie of Roan. Thus the Ladie victorie, sometime smiled on the Englishe part, and sometime on the french hyde. Thus one gayned this day, and lost on the next. Thus fortune chaunged, and thus chaunce hapned, accordyng to the olde prouerbe, sayng: in warre is nothing certayne, and victorie is euer doubtfull.

Nowe let vs leaue the Marciall feates, practised betwene the Englishe and french Nation, in the Region of Fraunce, and speake a little of a smoke that rose in England, which after grew to a great fire and terrible flaine, to the destruction of many a noble man. You haue heard before, howe the Duke of Gloucester sore grudged at the proude doynges of the Cardinall of Winchester, and howe the Cardinall likewise, sore enuied and disdayned at the rule of the Duke of Gloucester, and howe by the meanes of the Duke of Bedford, their malice was appeased, & eche was reconciled to other, in perfitt loue & amitie, to al mens outward iudgements. After which con corde made, the Cardinall and the Archebishop of York did many things without the consent of the king or the Duke, beyng (durynge the minoritye of the prince) gouernoz and protectoz of the realme, wherewith the Duke (like a true harted prince) was neyther content nor pleased: and so declared in wrytyng to the king, certein articles, wherein the Cardinall and the Archebishop had offended, which articles were here so long to reherse, and specially for that they were neyther regarded nor tooke any effect.

When the king had read the articles, he committed the hering thereof to his counsaile, whereof the most parte were spirituall persons, so what for feare, and what for fauour the matter was winked at, and dalyed out, and nothing sayde to it: & sayre countenance was made to the Duke, as though no displeasure had bene taken, nor no malice borne eyther in heart or in remembrance agaynst him. But benigne will once breake out, and inwarde grudge will sone appere, which was this yere to all men apparaunt: for diuers secret attempts were aduanced forward this season, agaynst the noble Duke Humfrey of Gloucester, a farre of, which in conclusion came so nere, that they bereft him both of lyfe and lande, as you shall hereafter moze manifestly perceyue. For first this yere, dame Elyanour Cobham, wyfe to the sayde Duke, was accused of treason, for that she by sorcerie and enchaunment, entended to destroy the king, to the entent to aduance and promote her husbände to the crowne: vpon thys she was examined in Saint Stephens Chapell, befoze the Bishop of Canterbury, and there by examination comict and iudged to doe open penance, in thre open places, within the Citie of London, and after that adiudged to perpetuall prison in the Isle of Man, vnder the keeping of Sir John Stanley knight. At the same season were arrested as ayders and counsayers to the sayde Duches, Thomas Southwell priest, and Chanon of saint Stephens in Westminster, John Hum priest, Roger Bolynbroke, a cunning Necromancier, and Margery Jourdayne, surnamed the Witch of Eye, to whose charge it was layde, that they at the request of the Duches, had deuised an Image of ware, representing the king, which by their sozcery, a little and little consumed, entending thereby in conclusion to wast, and destroy the kings person, and so to bring him to death, for the which treason, they were adiudged to dye, and so Margery Joydayne was bzent in Smithfield, and Roger Wolynghbroke was drawen and quartered at Tyborne, taking vpon his death, that there was neuer any such thing by them imagined, John Hum had his pardō, and Southwell died in the towre before execution: the Duke of Gloucester toke all things patiently, and sayde little.

The counsaile of England, forgat not the late enterprize of the french king, done in the Duchie of Guen, wherefoze to fortifie the countrey, least he peradventure would attempt agayne a like tozney, they sent thether Syr William Wooduile, with eyght hundred men, to fortesie the frontiers, till a greater armie might be assembled: And farther made publique proclamation, that all men which would transport, or cary any cozne, cheese, or ether bittayle into the parties of Aquitayne, should pay no maner of custome or tallage, which lycence caused that countrey to be well furnished of all things necessarie and comenient. About this season, the king remembryng the balli-ant seruice, and noble actes of John Lozde Talbot, created him Erle of Shrewsburie, and with a company of thzee thousand men, sent him agayne into Normandie, for the better tuicion of the same, which neyther forgat his duetie, nor forslowed his businesse, but dayly labored and hourly studied, how to molest and dammage his enimies.

In thys yere dyed in Guyen, the Countesse of Comyng, to whome the French king, and also the Erle of Arminake pretended to be heire, in so much that the Erle entered into all the landes of the sayde Lady, as very inheritor to her of right, and toke homage of the people of the countrey. But to haue a Rowlande to resist an Oliuer: he sent solempne Ambassadors to the king of England, offering him his daughter in mariage, not onely promising him silver hilles, and golden Mountaynes with her, but also would be bound to deliuer into the king of Englands hands, all such Castels and townes, as he or his auncestors, deteyned from him, within the whole Duchy of Aquitayn or Guyen, eyther by conquest of his progenitors, or by gift or deliury of any french king: offering farther to ayde the same king from him and his auncesters, by the french kings progenitors, the Lozde de Albret, and other Lordes of Gascoyne, vniuersly kept and wrongfully withholden. Thys offer seemed both profitable, and honorable to King Henry and his realme, and so the Ambassadors, were both well heard, and louingly entertayned, and in conclusion, with a gentle aunswere (not without great rewardes) they departed into their countrey: after whome were sent for the conclusion of the sayde mariage into Guyen, Sir Edward Hulle, Syr Robert Roos, and doctor John Grafton Deane of Saint Seuerines with an honorable company, which (as all Englishe Cronographers affirme) both concluded the mariage, & by prorie affied the yong Lady. The french king was not ignorant of all these conclusions, wherefoze he disdeyning that the Erle of Arminack, should both vsurpe agaynst him the Countie of Comyng, and also ioyne himselfe with his mortall enemye the king of England: Core-coner his right, and to punish his rebell, he sent Lewes his eldest sonne Dolphyn of Wyen, into Couergne with a puissaunt army, which sodainely tooke the Erle of Arminack at the Ile in Joydayne, and his yongest sonne, and both his daughters, and by force obteyned the Countries of Arminack, Louerigne, Rouerigne and Houlleston, beside the Cities of Seuerac and Cadenac, and chased the Bastard of Arminack out of his Countrey, and constituted gouernour of all those seigniozies, Sir Theobald de Walpergne, Bailif of Lyon. So by reason of this infortunate chaunce, the mariage concluded was differred, yea, and so long differred, that it neuer tooke effect, as you shall heare moze playnely declared.

This yere the Steple of Paules Church in London, was set on fyze by lightning, and lastly quenched by the great labour of many.

Thus while England was vniquieted, and fraunce sore bered, by spoile slaughter and burning, all christendome lamented the continuall destruction of so noble a realme, and the effusion of so much christian bloud, wherfoze to appease the mortall warre, so long continuing betwene these two puissaunt kings, all the princes of christendome so much labored and trauiayled, by their Oratozs and Ambassadors, that the frostie hartes of both the parties were somewhat mollified, and their indurate stomacks greatly allwaged. So there was a great diet appointed, to be kept at the Citie of Tours in Courayne, where for the king of England appered, William de la Pole Erle of Suffolke, Doctor Adame Wolyns, keeper of the kings priuie seale, and Robert Lozde Roos, and diuers other: And for the french king were appointed, Charles Duke of Orleans, Lewes de Bourbon Erle of Wandoline, and great Master of the french kings household, Sir Diers de Bressell Stewarde of Doyton, and Bartram Beauriau, Lozde of Bricigny. There were also sent thether, Ambassadors from the Empire, from Spaine from Denmarke, and from Hungary, to be Mediators betwene these two princes. The assemble was great, but the cost was much greater, in so much that euery parte for the honoz of their prince, and praise of their countrey, set forth themselves, as well in fare, as apparell, to the bittermost point and highest prick. Many meetings were had, and many things moued to come to a finall peace, and mutuall concozde. But in conclusion, for many doubtles and great ambiguities, which rose on both parties, a finall concozde could not be agreed, but in hope to come to a peace, a certaine truce as well by sea as by lande was concluded by the commissioners for. xviii. monethes, which afterwarde agayne was prolonged to the yere of oure Lozde. 1449. if in the meane season it had not beene violated and broken, as hereafter shall be declared.

In the treating of thys truce, the Erle of Suffolke, extending his commission to the bittermost, without assent of his associates, imagened in hys phantasie, that the next way to come to a perfite peace, was to moue some mariage betwene the french kings kinswoman, and king Henry his soueraigne: and because the french king had no daughter of ripe age, to be coupled in matrimonie with the king his master, he desired to haue the Lady Margaret, Cosyn to the french king, and daughter to Reyner Duke of Aniuw, callyng himselfe King of Sicile, Naples, and Jerusalem, hauing onely the name and style of the same, without any peny profite, or foote of possession. This mariage was made strange to the Erle a good space, in so much that he repented him of the first mocion, but yet lyke a bolde man, entending not to take a foyle in so great a matter, ceased not still daylie to sollicite and aduance forward his cause. The wily french men perceyuing the ardent affection of the Erle, towarde the conclusion of the mariage, declared to him that this mariage was not like to come to conclusion, as he desired, because the king his Master, occupied a great parte of the Duchie of Anio, and the Citie of Mauns, and the whole Countey of Mayne, apperteyning (as they sayde) to king Reyner, father to the damosell.

The Erle of Suffolke (I can not say) eyther corrupted with bribes, or to much affectionate to this vnprofitable mariage, condiscended and agreed to their mocion, that the Duchie of Anio, and the Countie of Mayne, should be released and deliuered to the king her father, demanding for her mariage neyther penny nor farthing (as who would say) that this newe affinitie excelled ryches, and surmounted Golde and precious stone. And to the entent that of this truce, might ensue a finall concozd, a day of enteruene or meeting was appointed betwene the two kinges, in a place conuenient, betwene Chartres and Roan. When these things were concluded, the Erle of Suffolke with his company, thinking to haue brought ioyfull tydings, to the whole realme of England, departed from Coures, and so by long iorneyes arrived at Douer, and came to the king at Westminster, and there openly before the king and his counsaile, declared how he had taken an honorable truce, for the safegarde of Normandy, and the  $\text{xx}$  of the realme, out of which truce, he thought, yea, and doubted not, but a perpetuall peace, and a finall concozde should shortly proceede and growe out. And much the sooner, for that honorable mariage, that inuincible alliaunce, that godly affinitie, which he had concluded: omittynge nothing, which might extoll and set forth the personage of the Ladie, not forgetting any thing of the nobilitie of her kinne, nor of her fathers high stile: as who would say, that she was of suche an excellent betotie, and of so high a parentage, that almost no king or Emperour was worthe to be her make. Although this mariage pleased well the king, and dyuers of his counsaile, and especially such as were adherents, and fautors to the Erle of Suffolke, yet Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, Protector of the realme, repugned and resisted as much as in him lay, this newe alliaunce and contriued matrimonie: alleging that it was neyther consonant to the lawe of God nor man, nor honorable to a prince, to infringe and brcake a promise or contract, by him made and concluded, for the vtilitie and profite of his realme and people, declaring that the king by his Ambassadors sufficiently instructed and authorized, had concluded and contracted a mariage betwene his highnes, and the daughter of the Erle of Arminack, vpon conditions both to him and his realme, as much profitable as honorable. Which offers and conditions, the sayde Erle sithe his coming out of his captiuitie & thraldome is redy to yelde and performe, sayng: that it was more conuenient for a Prince, to mary a wyfe with ryches and friends, then to take a make with nothing, and disherite himselfe and his realme of olde rightes and auncient seignories. The Duke was not heard, but the Erles doings were condiscended vnto & allowed. Which fact engendered such a flame, that it neuer went out, till bothe the parties with many other other were consumed and slayne, to the great vnquietnesse of the king and his realme. And for the performance of these conclusions, the French king sent the Erle of Wandosme, great master of his house, and the Archebysshop of Reyns, the first peere of Fraunce, and dyuers other into England, which were ioyously receyued, and friendly enterteined. Which Ambassadors, after instruments on both parties, sealed and deliuered (not burrewarded) returned into their Countrey. When these things were thus done, the king both for the honour of his Realme, and to assure to himselfe more speciall friendes, he created Lorde John Holland Erle of Huntynghdon, Duke of Excester, as his father was, and Humfrey Erle of Stafford, was made Duke of Buckingham, and Henry Erle of Warwike, was erected to the tittle of Duke of Warwike, and the Erle of Suffolke, made Marques of Suffolke, which Marques with his wife, and many honorable personages of men and women richely adorned, both with apparell and Jewels, hauing with them many costly Chariots, and gorgeous horselitters, sayled into Fraunce, for the conueyaunce of the nominated Quene, into the realme of England. For king Reyner her father, for all his long stile, had to thort a purse, to send his daughter honorably to the king her spouse.

This noble company came to the Citie of Coures in Courayne, where they were honorably receyued, both of the French king, and of the king of Sicile. Where the Marques of Suffolke, as procurator to king Henry, espoused the sayde Lady, in the Church of saint Martins. At which mariage were present, the father and mother of the bride, the French king himselfe, which was Uncle to the husbände, and the French Quene also, which was Aunte to the wyfe. There were also the Dukes of Orleans, of Calaber, of Maunson, and of Britayne, seauen Erles. xij. Barons. xx. Bishops, beside knightes and gentlemen. There were triumphaunt Justes, costly feastes, and delicate banquets: but all pleasure hath an ende, and euery ioye is not continuall. So that after these high solempnities finished, and these honorable ceremonies ended, the Marques had the Lady Margaret to him deliuered, which in great estate, he conueyed through Normandy to Deepe, and so transported her into Englands, where she landed at Portemouth, in the Moneth of Aprill. This woman excelled all other, as well in beautie and fauour, as in wyt and pollicie, and was of stomacke and courage, more lyke to a man, then a woman. Sone after her arriual, she was conueyed to the towne of Southwike in Hamshire, where she with all nupciall ceremonies, was coupled in matrimonie to king Henry the sixt of that name. After which mariage, she was with great triumph, conueyed to London, and so to Westminster, where vpon the .xxx. day of May, she with all solempnitie thereunto apperteyning, was crowned Queene of this Noble realme of Englands.

This mariage seemed to many, both infortunate and vnprofitable to the realme of England, and that for many causes. First the king had with her not one pennie, and for the fetchyng of her, the Marques of Suffolke demanded a whole fiftene in open Parliament: also for her mariage, the Duchie of Anio, the Citie of Mauns, and the whole Countie of Mayne, were deliuered and released to king Reyner her father, which Countreies were the very stayes, and backebandes to the Duchie of Normandie. Furthermore for this mariage, the Erle of Arminacke tooke such great displeasure, that he became vtter enemy to the realme of England, and was the chiefe cause, that the Englishmen were expulsed out of the whole Duchie of Aquitain, and lost both the Countries of Gascoyne and Guyen. But moit of all it should seme, that God with this matrimonie was not content. For after this spousage, the kinges friendes fell from him, both in England and in Fraunce, the Lordes of his Realme fell in diuision among themselues, the Commons rebelled agaynst their souereigne Lorde, and naturall Prince, fieldes were foughten, many thousandes slaine, and finally the king deposed, and his soune slaine, and this Queene sent home againe, with as much miserie and sorowe, as she was receyued with pompe and triumph, such is worldly vnstabilitie, and so waueryng is false flatteryng fortune.

Duryng the tyme of this truce, Richard Duke of Yorke, and diuers other Captaynes, repayred into England, both to visite their wiues, children and friends, and also to consult what should be done, if the truce ended.

This yere, as I finde noted by George Lyle, Henry Chicheley Arch-bishop of Cauntorbury dyed, who in his life time builded two houses, for students in the Uniuersitie of Oxford, the one called all Soules College, and the other Barnard College.

And nowe to consult for some good order to be taken for Fraunce, the king called his high Court of Parliament, in the which aboute all thinges, it was concluded, diligently to foresee, that Normandie should be well furnished and strongly defended, before the terme of the truce should be expired: for it was openly knowen, that the French king was redie in all thinges, to make open warre, if no peace or abstinence of warre, were agreed or concluded. For which consideracion, money was graunted, men were appoynted, and a great armie gathered together, and the Duke of Sommer set was appoynted Regent of Normandie, and the Duke of Yorke thereof discharged. In which Parliament, to please the people withal, it was enacted, that when wheate was solde for six shillynges. viij. pence the quarter, and Rye for foure shillynges, and Barlie for three shillynges, it should be lawfull to every man to cary the sayde kindes of corne into the parties beyond the Sea, without licence, so it were not to the kings enemies or rebelles: which Act king Edward the fourth for the vtilitie of his people, approued and confirmed.

The Duke of Sommer set made Regent of Fraunce.

The Marques of Suffolke, beyng in high fauour with the king, and in no lesse grace with Queene Margaret, for concludyng the maryage betwene them two, somewhat infected with the seede of bainglozie, and thinking that his procedynges and doynge in Fraunce (duryng the tyme of his legacion) had as well pleased all men, as they pleased himselfe, the seconde day of June, in the first session of this Parliament, before all the Lordes spirituall and temporall, in the higher house assembled, openly, eloquently, and boldly, declared his paine, trauaile and diligence, which he had taken and suffeyned of late tyme, in the realme of Fraunce, aswell for the takyng and concludyng a truce or abstinence of warre, betwene the realmes of England and Fraunce, as in makyng of the mariage betwene the king his souereigne Lorde and theirs, and the noble Princes Ladie Margaret, daughter to the king of Sicile and Hierusalem: Openyng also to them, that the sayde truce should expire the first day of Aprill next comyng, except a finall peace or a further further truce were concluded in the meane season: aduising them to prouide and foresee all thinges necessary for the warre (as though no concord should succede, nor agreement could take place) least the French men perceiuyng them vnprouided, would take their aduantage, and agree neyther to reason nor amitie: sayng vnto them, that sithe he had admonished the king, & them, accordyng to his dutie and allegeaunce, if any thing quayled, or if daunger ensued, he was thereof innocent and guiltlesse, and had acquitted himselfe like a louyng subiect, and a faythfull counsaylor, prayng the Lordes to haue it in remembraunce. Likewise the morowe after, he with certeyne Lordes, descended into the common house, where he declared agayn all the sayd matters, to the Knightes, Citizens, and Burgeses, omittynge nothing that might soude to his glozie, nor openyng any thing which might redound to his dysprayse: prayng the Commons for his discharge, that aswell all his doynge and procedynges in the kinges affayres beyonde the Sea, as also his aduertisement and counsaile, opened to the Lordes and commons now together assembled, might be by the king and them, enacted and enrolled in the Recordes of the Parliament: whereupon the morowe after, William Burley, speaker for the Commons, and all the compaignie of the neyther house, repayred to the kinges presence, sittynge in his throne, amongest his Lordes in the Parliament Chamber, where the sayde William Burley, by the counsaile of the Commons (whether they did it more for feare then for loue, or were thereunto entised by the Marques friendes, as some men doubted) most humbly commended to the kinges highnesse, the foresayd Marques of Suffolke, and all his actes and notable workes, which he had done, to the pleasure of almighty God, the honour of the king, and the vtilitie of the Realme: as in takyng the truce, concludyng the mariage, and the good admonicion geuen by him in open Parliament, for prouision of warre to be made, duryng the time of truce, least to much trustyng of peace, might encourage the Frenchmen, the sooner to begin warre and inuasion: besechyng the kinges highnesse, in the name of the Commons, to imprint in his heart and remembraunce the sayd Marques, and his labors and actes, to his honour and renoume, which should be an example to all other, which the king should call to like seruice, to employ themselues in like endeuor, faythfully and honourably to serue their king and souereigne Lorde: prayng also the Lordes spirituall and temporall, that they for the consideracions before reherfed, would vouchsafe to make like petition to the kinges Maiestie, and that all the actes and demeanors of the sayde Marques, might by auctoritie of Parliament, be to his honour, and perpetuall fame, in the rolles of the same Parliament, recorded and substantiallyly registred.

At which humble intercession, the Lords, aswell spirituall as temporall, rose from their seates, and on their knees made to the king like request and petition, as they of the commons before were desired: whereupon the king by the mouth of the Archebishop of Cauntorbury his Chaunceloz, made answer, that their requestes were so reasonable and so honourable, that he in no wise could but louyngly accept, & gently allowe the same, sayng also: that their desyres were to him a singuler pleasure, and an especiall comfort: and that he would from thenceforth accept and take the sayd Marques to his benigne grace, and especiall fauour, as a person which hath done both true, faythfull, faythfull, and notable seruice to him and to his Realme, to the entent that all men put in like trust, should enforce themselves to do like or better seruice to their souereigne Lorde or Maister: agreeyng also (accoyding to their requestes and petitions) that the labors, demeanors, diligences, and declarations of the sayd Marques of Suffolke, and the sayd commendacions and desyzes, not onely of the Lordes, but also of the Commons, aswell for the honour of him and his posteritie, as for his acquittal and discharge, should be enacted, and enrolled in the Records of the same Parliament, which was so done. This Marques thus gotten by into fortunes throne, not content with his degree, by the meanes of the Queene was shortly erected to the estate and degree of a Duke, & ruled the king at his pleasure, in somuch that he obeyned the wardeshippes, both of body and landes of the Countesse of Mar- wike, and of the Ladie Margaret, sole heyre to John Duke of Sommer set, (which Ladie was after mother to king Henry the seuenth) and besyde that, caused the king to create John de Foys, sonne to Gaston de Foys, Erle of Longuile, and Capdawe of Bueffe, Erle of Kendale: which John had married his niece, and by his procurement, the king elected into the order of the Garter, the sayd Gaston, and John his sonne, geuyng to the sonne, towardes the maintenaunce of his degre and estate, landes and Castelles in the Duchy of Guien, amountyng to the somme of one thousande poundes by the yere, which landes, name, and stile, the issue and line of the sayd Erle of Kendale at this day haue, and enioy.

The Marques of Suffolke made Duke of Suffolk.

Here a man may beholde, what securitie is in worldly glory, and what constancie is in fortunes synplyng: for this Duke of Suffolke, in open Par- liament of the Lords praised, of the commons thanked, and into the kings fa- vour entierly receiued, within foure yeres after, was in the same place, by the comynons of the Realme accused of many treasons, misprisions, and offences, done and committed agaynst the king, and the common welth of his realme, and in conclusion, beyng exiled the realme, he was taken vpon the Sea, and made shorter by the head, which chaunce had not happened to him, if he had remembred the counsaile of the Popyngay, sayyng: when thou thinkest thy selfe in Court most surest, then is it high tyme to get the home to rest.

These thinges beyng in doyng, the French king seyng that the towne of Mauns, and diuers fortresses in Mayne, were not to him deliuered, ac- coyding to the appoyntment made, gathered together a great number of peo- ple, for to recouer the same: whereof the king of England beyng aduertised (least the breche of truce should begin by him) caused the towne to be deliue- red, without any force.

Maister and his seruaunt.

This yere an Armozers seruaunt of London, appeled his Maister of treason, which offered to be tried by battaile. At the day assigned, the frends of the master, brought him Malmesye and Aqua vite, to comforte him with all, but it was the cause of his and their discomfort: for he poured in so much, that when he came into the place in Smithfelde, where he should fight, both his witt and strength fayled him: and so hee being a tall and hardie perso- nage, ouercladed with hote drinckes, was banquished of his seruaunt, being but a cowarde and a wretch, whose body was drawen to Tibozne, and there hanged and beheaded.

In which yere was a great insurrection in Norwiche, against the Pri- or or of the place, in so much that the Citezens kept the gates, against the Duke of Norfolke, which came thether to appease the matter: but in conclusion, they opened the gates, and submitted themselves. The chiefe offenders, were (accoyding to their desertes) straightly punished, and executed, and the the Prioz was discharged of his office, and sir Thon Clifton was made go- uernour there, till the King had restored the Citezens to their auncient ly- berties, and franchises. This commocion was for certaine newe exactions, which the Prioz claymed and toke of the Citezens, contrarie to their auncient freedoms and vsages: but this was not the drewe meane to come to their right and purpose, and therefore because they erred and went out of the path, they were by punishment brought againe to a very straight trade, and the right way.

tion in Norwiche.

This yere Symon Cyze Alderman of London, whoe also had bene Maioz of the same, builded at his owne costs and charges, the Leaden hall, in the saide Citie, and a faire Chapell ioyning to the same, chesely to haue the same made a store house in Sommer, for wood and Cole to be bought, and there layd by, and in the winter to be solde vnto the pooze people at a reason- able rate, without gaine, the stocke beyng saued, and he left in stocke there one thousand pounde, which after ward was borrowed by King Edward the fourth, and neuer payd againe (as it is said) and so that provision decayed.

During the tyme of this truce or abstinence of warre, while there was nothing to bere or trouble the mindes of men within the Realme, a sodayne mischiefe, and a long discorde, sprange out, by the meanes of a woman: for king Henry, which raigned at this tyme, was a man of a meeke spite, and of a simple witte, preferring peare before warre, rest before businesse, ho- nestie before profite, and quietnesse before labour. And to the intent, that all men might perceiue, that there coulde be none, moze chaffe, moze meeke, moze holpe, nor a better creature: In him raigned shamefastnesse, modesty, integritie, and pacience to be maruayled at, taking and suffering all losses, chaunces, displeasures, and such worldly tormentes, in good parte, and wyth a pacient maner, as though they had chaunced by his owne faulte, or negli- gent ouersight: and he was gouerned of them whome he should haue ru- led: and brided of such, whome he sharply should haue spurred: He cared not for honoz, nor thirsted for riches, but studied onely for the health of his soule: the sauing wherof, he esteemed to be the greatest wisdom, and the losse thereof, the extremest folie that coulde be. But on the other parte, the Queene his wife was a woman of a great witte, and yet of no greater wit, then of haute stomacke, desirous of glory, and couetous of honoz, and of rea- son, pollicye, counsaill, and other gistes, and talentes of nature, she lacked no- thing, nor of diligence, studie, and businesse, she was not buexpert: but yet she had one pointe of a very woman: for often times, when she was behe- ment & fully bent in a matter, she was sodainly like to a wethercock, mutable and turning. This woman perceyning that her husbände did not frankly rule as he would, but did all thing by the aduise and counsaile of Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, and that he passed not much on the aucthoritie and go- uernaunce of the realme, determined wyth her selfe, to take vpon her the rule and regiment, both of the king and his kingdome, and to depriue and remoue out of all rule and aucthoritie the sayde Duke, then called the Lord Protectour

Protector of the realme: least men should say and report, that she had neither wyt nor stomach, which would permit and suffer her husband, being of perfite age and mans estate, like a yong Scholer or innocent Pupile, to be governed by the disposition of another man.

This manly woman, this corageous Queene, ceased not to prosecute forthwith, her inuented imagination and purpose, and practised daylie the furtheraunce of the same. And although this inuention came first of her aboue high minde and courage, yet it was furthered and set forward by such as of long time had borne malice to the Duke, for declaring their vnttruth as you before haue heard. Which benemous Serpents, and malicious Tigers, perswaded, incensed and exhorted the Quene, to loke well vpon the expenses and reuenues of the realme, and thereof to call an accompt: affirming plainly that she should evidently perceyue, that the Duke of Gloucester, had not so much aduanced and preferred the common wealth, and publique vtilitie, as his aboue priuate things and peculiar estate. Beside this, Keyner king of Sicile, wrote to his daughter, that she and her husbande should take vpon them the rule and gouernaunce of the realme, and not to be kept vnder, lyke yong wardes and desolate Orphans. The Queene perswaded and encouraged by these meanes, tooke vpon her and her husband, the high power and aucthoritie ouer the people and subiectes. And although she ioyned her husbande with her in name for a countenaunce, yet she did all, she sayde all, and she bare the whole swinge, as the strong Oxe doth, when he is yoked in the plough with a poore sicly asse: and first of all she excluded the Duke of Gloucester, from all rule and gouernaunce, not prohibiting suche as she knewe to be his mortall enemies, to inuent and imagine causes and griefes agaynst him and hys: so that by her permission and fauour, dyuers noble men conspired against him, of the which, dyuers wyrters affirme, the Duke of Suffolke, and the Duke of Buckyngham to be the chiefe, not vntprocured by the Cardinall of Winchester, and the Archebishop of Yorke. Dyuers articles both heynous and odious were layde to hys charge in open counsaile, and in especiall one, that he had caused men adiudged to dye, to be put to other execution, then the law of the land had ordered or assigned: for surely the Duke being very well learned in the law ciuill, detesting malefactors, and punishing their offences, gat great malice and hatred of such as feared to haue condigne rewarde for their vngacious actes and mischieuous doyngs. Although the Duke (not without great laude and prayse) sufficiently answered to all things to him obiected, yet because his death was determined, his wisdome little helped, nor his truth smally auayled: but of this vntquietnesse of minde, he deliuered himselfe, because he thought nextly of death, nor of condemnation to die: such affiaunce had he in his strong truth, and suche confidence had he in indifferent iustice. But his Capitall enemies and mortall foes, fearing that some tumult or comunocion might arise, if a Prince so well beloued of the people, should be openly executed, and put to death, determined to trap and vndoe him, or he thereof should haue knowledge or warning. So for the furtheraunce of their purpose, a parliament was sommoned to be kept at Bury, whether resorted all the peeres of the realme, and amongst them the Duke of Gloucester, which on the second day of the session, was by the Lorde Beaunonde then high Constable of Eng-

lande, accompanied with the Duke of Buckyngham and other, arrested, apprehended, and put in ward, and all his seruants sequestred from him, and xxxij. of the chiefe of his retinue, were sent to diuers prisons, to y great admiration of the common people. The Duke the night after his imprisonment, was found dead in his bed, being the .xxiiij. day of February, and his body shewed to the Lordes and commons, as though he had died of a palsey or impostume: but all indifferent persons well knewe, that he died of no natural death, but of some violent force: some iudged him to be strangled: some affirme that a hote spit was put in at his fundament: other write, that he was stifled or smoldered betwene two featherbeds. After whose death, none of his seruantes (although they were arraigned and attainted) were put to death: for the Duke of Suffolke, when they should haue bene executed, shewed openly their pardon, but this doyng appeased not the grudge of the people, which sayde that the pardon of the seruants was no amends for murthering of their master. The dead corps of this Duke was caried to saint Albons, and there honorably buried. Thus thys noble Prince, Sonne, brother, and Uncle to kinges, which had balauntly and politiquely by the space of .xxv. yeares gouerned this realme, and for his demerites, called the good Duke of Gloucester, was by a bone cast by his enemies, choked and brought to his fatall fine, and last ende. So all men may openly see, that to men in aucthoritie, no place, no not the Courte the chiefe refuge of all, nor the dwelling house, nor yet a mans priue Castell, or his bed ordeyned for his quietnesse, is out of the daunger of deaths dart.

This Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, descending of the blood royal, was not onely noble and valyant in all his actes and doyngs, but sage, pollitique, and notably well learned in the Ciuile lawe. And among other his worthy prayses, this followyng is not to be forgotten, which most liuely and plainly declareth him to be both prudent and wise, & to his great laude and praise is wrytten and set forth by Sir Thomas Moore knight, in a booke of hys, entituled, a Dialogue concerning heresies and matters of religion, and in the .xiiij. chapter of the same booke, in this wise followyng. In the time of king Henry the sixt (sayeth he) as he roade in Progresse, there came to the towne of Saint Albons a certayne begger with hys wyfe, and there was walking about the towne begging fiue or sixe dayes before the kinges coming thether, sayeng that he was borne blinde and neuer sawe in all his life, and was warned in his dreame that he should come out of Berwik, where he sayd that he had ever dwelled, to seke Saint Albons, and that he had bene at his Shyrne, and was not holpen, and therefore he would go seeke him at some other place: For he had heard some saye sence he came, that Saint Albons body should be at Colyn, and in dede such a contention hath there bene. But of truth as I am certainly informed (sayth Sir Thomas Moore) he lyeth here at saint Albons, sauing some reliques of him, which they there shewe shryned. But to tell you shortly, when the King was come, and the towne full of people, sodainely this blind man at saint Albons Shyrne had his sight, & the same was solemnly rong for a miracle, and Te deum songen, so that nothing was talked of in all the towne, but this miracle. So happened it then that Duke Humfrey of Gloucester, a man no lesse wise, then also well learned, hauing great ioy to seee suche a miracle, called the poore man unto him, and first shewing himselfe ioyous of Gods glorie, so shewed in the getting of his sight, and exhorting him to mekenesse, and to no ascribing of any part of the worship to himselfe, nor to be proude of the peoples praise, which would call him a good & a godly man therby, at the last he looked well vpon his eien, & asked whether he could euer see any thing at al in all his life before. And when as well his wife as himselfe affirmed fastly, no, then he looked aduisedly vpon his eyen agayne, and sayde, I beleue you very well, for me thinketh that ye can not see well yet. Yes Sir quoth he, I thanke God and his holy Martir, I can see now as well as any man: yea can, quod the Duke, what colour is my Gowne? Then anone the begger tolde him, what colour quod he is this mans Gowne? he tolde him also without anye stayeng or stomblyng, and tolde the names of all the colours that coulde be shewed him. And when the Duke sawe that, he bade him walke * Faytoure, and made him to be set openly in the stocks: for though he could haue sene sodainely by miracle the difference betwene dyuers colours, yet could he not by sight, so sodainely tell the names of all these colours, except he had knowne them before, no more then he coulde name all the men whome he should sodainely see, thus farre mayster Moore. And thus much for the noble prowesse and bertue, ioyned with lyke Ornamentes of knowledge and learning shyning in this Duke: for the which as before hath appered, he was both loued of the commons, and well spoken of of all men, and no lesse deseruing the same, being called the good Duke of Gloucester: so neyther yet wanted he backbiters and priue enuyers, as before hath bene expressed.

When the rumoz of the Dukes death, was blowen through the realme, many men were sodainely amased for feare: many abhorred and detested the fact, but all men reputed it an abhominable crueltie, and a shamefull tyranny. But the publique wealth of the realme of Englande, by the butwoorthy death of this polittique prince, sustayned great losse, and ran into ruine, for surely the whole waight and burden of the realme, rested and depended vpon him, as the experience afterward did declare. For after his death, good and sage men fearing themselves, fled out of the flattering court, into whose places entered such, as desiring their awne promotion, set open the gates to newe factions, which could neuer be extinct, till all the seignories beyonde the sea (except Calice and the Marches) were lost, and king Henry in conclusion spoyled of his realme and lyfe. There is an olde sayde sawe, that a man entending to auoyde the smoke, falleth into the fyre: so here, the Quene minding to preserue her husband in honor, and her selfe in auctoritie, procured and consented to the death of this noble man, whose only deith brought to passe that thing, which she would most fayne haue eschewed, and tooke from her that Jewell, which she most desired: for if this Duke had lyued, the Duke of Yorke durst not haue made title to the crowne: if this Duke had lyued, the nobles had not conspired agaynst the king, nor yet the commons had not rebelled: if this Duke had lyued, the house of Lancaster had not bene defaced and destroyed, which things happened all contrary, by the destruction of this good man. This is the worldly iudgement, but God knoweth what he had predestinate, & what he had ordeyned before, agaynst whose ordinaunce preynteth no counsaile, and agaynst whose wyll auaynteth no stryuing.

And

And it is written of this good Duke of Gloucester, that he bulded the diuinitie Schole in Oxford, which is a rare pece of worke. And at this time also, William Wanyplet a man of great deuocion, wisdome, and iustice, was made Bishop of Winchester, and Chaunceloz of England, who to the furtherance of learnyng, buylded Mary Magdalene College in Oxford.

In this .xxvj. yere of the reigne of this king: But in the first yere of the rule of the Queene, I finde nothing done worthie to be reherfed, within the realme of England, but that Richard Duke of Yorke, beyng greatly ayded by his wife, to the chiefe peres and potentates of the Realme, ouer and besyde his awne progenie and great consanguinitie, perceiuyng the king to be a ruler not rulyng, and the whole burden of the realme to depende in the ordinaunce of the Queene and the Duke of Suffolke, began secretly to breake to his friends of the Nobilitie, and priuately declared to them, his title and right to the Crowne, and likewise did he to certeine wise and sage gouernours and Rulers of diuers Cities and townes: which priue attempt was so polittically handled, and so secretly kept, that his prouision was redie, before his purpose was openly published, and his friendes opened themselves of the contrary part could them espie: but in conclusion time reueled truth, and olde hatred openly sprang out, as you shall hereafter both lament and here.

Duryng these doynge, Henry Beauford, Bishop of Winchester, and called the riche Cardinal, departed out of this worlde, and was buryed at Winchester. This man was sonne to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, descended of an honourable linage, but bozne in Waste, more noble of blood, then notable in learnyng, haute in stomake, and highe in countenance, riche aboue measure of all men, and to fewe liberall, disdainfull to his kinne, and dreadfull to his louers, preferring money before friendship, many thinges beginnyng, & nothyng performing. His couetousnes insatiabie, and hope of long life, made him both to forget God, his Prince, and himselfe, in his latter dayes: for Doctor John Baker his priue counsaylor, and his Chapleyne, wrote, that he lyng on his death bed, sayd these wordes. Why should I die, hauyng so much ryches: if the whole realme would saue my lyfe, I am able either by pollicie to get it, or by riches to bie it. Fye, will not death be hyred, nor will money doe nothyng? when my Nephewe of Wedforde died, I thought my selfe halfe by the wheele, but when I saw mine other nephew of Gloucester diseased, then I thought my selfe able to be equall with kings, & so thought to encrease my treasure, in hope to haue wozne a triple Crowne. But I see nowe the worlde fayleth me, and so I am deceyued: prayng you all to pray for me. Of the getting of this mans goodes, both by power Legantine, or spirituall bribery, I will not speake, but the keepng of them for his ambitious purpose, aspyng to ascend to the Papistcall Sea, was both great losse to his naturall Prince, and native Country: for his hidden riches might well haue holpen the king, and his secrete treasure might haue relieved the Commonaltie, when money was scant, and importunate charges were dayly imminent.

After the death of this Prelate, which was a great stay to the king and the realme, the affayres in Fraunce, were neyther well looked to, nor the gouernours of the Countrie were well aduised. For an Englishe Capteyn, called Sir Francess Surrien the Arragonoy, a man for his wit and activity, admitted to the order of the Garter, tooke by scalyng sodainly in the night, a Towne on the frontiers of Normandie, belongyng to the Duke of Briteyn, called Fongiers, spoilyng the same, and killyng the inhabitauntes to the great destruction of the people, and moze displeasure to the Duke of Briteyn, their soueraigne Lorde. The Duke beyng thereof aduertised, sent worde to the french king, declar yng to him that in the tyme of truce (in the which, he as his allye and bassall was comprehended) he was spoyled and bereued of his towne of Fongiers: besechyng the frenche king, in that cause to see a recompence and amendment: whereupon he sent John Haruart his Caruer, and John Cosinet one of the Maysters of his requestes to the king of England: and to the Duke of Sommer set, he dispatched Peter de Fontaynes Esquier, and one of the chiefe of his stable, to whome by both the Princes, as it was answered, that the fact and enterprize was both done, contrary to their minde, will and knowlege. And for the truce to be kept not onely restitution, but also amendes to be made to the Duke of Briteyn, a day of dyet and assembly was appoynted to be kept at the towne of Louiers. At the tyme appoynted both the parties assembled: the french part demaunded amendes with no little recompence: The English Oratozs answered, that without offence, nothing by iustice ought to be satisfied: affirmyng the doing of Sir fraunces Surrien, to be his onely act, without the consent or counsaile, eyther of the king of England, or the Duke of Sommer set his Lieutenant and Regent. Duryng this dayly comunicacion and long delay, certaine frenchmen, friendes to the Duke of Briteyn, desir yng to be reuenged of the iniurie done to him at Fongiers, and also imagin yng howe to do some newe displeasure to the Englishmen, were aduertised by a wagoner of Louiers, that the towne of Pountlarche, was but meanly manned and slenderly furnished, & the watch was but negligently loked to: with which saynges the frenchmen beyng somewhat encouraged, deuised a way how by pollerie to take the towne: so the wagoner laded his Wagon, and passed forwarde, hauing in his companie two strong barlettes clad like Carpenters, wyth great Axes in their neckes. And for the furtheraunce of their purpose, the Lorde of Bressy with a chosen company of men of Armes, lodged himselfe in a bushement nere to the gate of Saint Andzewe. And Captayn floquet, accompanied with Sir James of Cleremount, and another great companie, priuily lurked vnder a wood toward Louiers. When all things were appoynted, early in the moznyng in the beginning of the moneth of October, the wagoner came to the gate, and called the Porter by name, prai yng him to open the gate, that he might passe to Roan, and returne againe the same night. The Porter (which well knewe the boyce of his customer) tooke little hede to the other two companions, and so opened the one gate, and sent another felowe of his, to open the foremost gate. When the Chariot was on the draw Bridge, betwene both the gates, the Chariotmaister gaue the Porter money and for the nonce, let one peere fall to the ground, and while the Porter stouped to take it vp, the wagoner with his Dagger stroke him in at his throte, so that he cryed for no helpe, and the two great Lubbers flue the other Porters, and with their Axes cut the Areltree of the Wagon, so that the drawe Bridge could not be shortly drawen by. Which thinges done, they made a signe to Captayne floquet, which without delay or tract of tyme, entered the towne, towne, and flue and tooke the English men, which neyther heard nor thought of any such enterprize: amongst whome the Lorde Fauconbridge, Captein of the sayde towne, was apprehended as a prisoner: by this pretie cautele and sleight imposture, was the towne of Pountlarche taken and surprized, which towne was the key and passage ouer the Riuier of Some, from Fraunce to Normandie, beyng distant from Roan, onely foure leagues. Thus wrong was added to wrong, and iniury heaped to iniury, whereby the terme of truce was violated, and mortall warre was reuiued. But because the taking of this fortreffe had a certein colour of breakyng of truce: The Duke of Somerset by Ambassadors, and not by force of Armes, deuised to recouer againe this pretie towne, & sent for the restitution of the same, diuers Ambassadors to the french king and his counsaile, which made aunswere againe, that if the Englishmen restored to the Duke of Briteyn, the towne of Fongiers with condigne amendes, for the damages done and committed within the same, the towne of Pountlarche should againe be rendered and deliuered: for the frenche king and his counsaile begaune nowe to perceyue and smell, that the affayres of England by the death of the Duke of Gloucester, were sore minished and decayed, and that good counsaile began to ware faint and decay, and sedicion freshly began to spring and rise: By reason whereof they thought that Normandie might sone be conquered and recouered, and that the English nation out of that region might easely be expelled and driuen: wherefore they determined to take the good occasion to them openly offered, and to lose no tyme in so good a Bargaine. Whereupon king Charles diuided his armie into threepartes, not doubtyng of victorie, by reason that the fame of the conquest of Pountlarche, was blowen and spread abroad ouer all the Countrie. So after diuers assaults (not without losse of diuers of his men) he had rendered to him by composition, the townes of Louiers and Gerbozy, whereof William Harper was Captaine. Thus prosperous victorie dayly succedyng to the french kinges armie, he augmentyng hys hoste, determined to get the Towne of Uerroy in Perche, and gyde it round about with a strong siege. The inhabitauntes whereof, although with the sodaine chaunce they were somewhat abashed, yet hauyng some succors, and hoppyng of more reliefe, toke to them good courage, and manfully defended the towne. But when their ayde tarried longer then they eyther thought or desired, they were compelled to compound with their enemies, vpon this condicion: that if the siege were not raysed within .xx. dayes, that then they should depart with bagge and baggage, which condicion was accepted: and because no rescues came, the towne, Castell, and the great Tower, were deliuered. The french Historians affirme, the towne to be taken by assault, and the Castell by composition, but all writers agre, that the frenchmen obteyned it. Thus was warre reuiued before the full terme of the truce expired, which was the most detestable and vnprofitable chaunce, that eyther could or might haue happened or come to the realme of England. For by this sodaine damage and losse, without thought arisyng, the English Captaynes were so busied and vnquieted, that with appeasyng dayly rumors within townes, and what with studie how to recouer Castels lost and taken, that they scarce wist what way to take: for while they studied how to kepe and defend one Citie, foure or five other, folowyng fortunes chaunce, turned to the french part, and became their enemies. The chiefe cause of which reuoltyng and turnyng was this: It was blowen throughtout all Fraunce, that the realme of England, after the death of the Duke of Gloucester, by the severall faction of Princes, was divided into two partes, and that William de la Poole, late created Duke of Suffolke, and diuers other, were the occasion of the death of the sayd Duke of Gloucester, which was the very father of the Countrie, and the shield and defence of the pooze Commonaltie, and that the fornamed Duke of Suffolke, onely for lucre of money, vexed, oppressed, and molested the pooze people, so that mens mindes were not intenttue, nor geuen to outward affayres and forzen Conquestes, but all their studie was, howe to driue backe and defende domesticall iniuries, and dayly wronges done at home: by reason whereof men of warre were bnpayed, and no armie for resistance was eyther gathered or assembled together: which mischiefes whyle the king (as thinges of the worlde, and of no great moment) did neglect and omit, as he which preferred and extolled godly thinges, aboue all worldly affayres and mortall cares, and thought them most to be phantasied and labored: And while Queene Margaret his wife, in whome the whole rule of the realme consisted, being a woman of to much credence geuyng to euill and flatterynge counsaylors, that by no meanes after they coulde be eyther overcome or resisted: so that by this meanes, the French Nation knewe in what case the state of the realme of England stood in, which elated and encouraged their heartes, and daunted the courages of the Normanes and Gascoynes, so much, that for lacke of ayde and reliefe, they turned to the French part, and forsoke their very soueraigne Lozde, the king of England in short space, as you shall after here.

Irelande.

It was not enough, the realme of England this season thus to be vexed and vnquieted with the businesse of Normandy, but also a new rebellyon began in Ireland, to the great displeasure of the King and his counsaill: for repressing wherof, Richard Duke of York, with a conuenient number of man, was sent thether, as lieutenant to the king, which not onely appeased the fury of the wilde & sauage people there, but also gat him such loue and fauor of the countrey and the inhabitants, that their sincere loue, and friendly affection coulde neuer be separated from him and his lignage, as in the sequele of this storie you shall moze plainely perceiue.

Englande lozeth all that was gotten in Fraunce.

The Frenchemen hauing perfite vnderstanding of the infirmitye and vnbreadnesse of the realme of Englande, displayed their Banners, and set forth their armies, and in short space gat by yelding, Constaunce, Gisors, Castel Bayllarde, Montean du mere, saint Lo, Feseampe, Nebochastle, Alanson, Conque, Manleon argenton, Lisiaux argenton, and diuerse other townes in Normandy: Likewise in Guien was the towne of Mauliffone rendered to the Erle of Foy. These townes were not yelded voluntarily by the English souldiozs, but they were thereunto compelled by the Citezens and the inhabitants of the townes, which apparantly perceiuing, that the great flame of the English force, was extinct and consumed, rose against the Capitaines, & other opened the gates to their enemies, or constrained them to render vpon a composition. By which enforcement was the rich Citie of Roan deliuered: for surely the Duke of Somerset and the lord Talbot Erle of Shrowesbury, had well kept and defended this Citie, if they had bene no more vexed with the Citezens, then they were with their enemies. For after the french king had once by his Herault summoned the citie, the inhabitants not onely sought wayes and inuented fraude, how to betraye the same, but also put on harnesse and rebelled against their Capitaines, menacing the death, and destruction of all the English people. The capitaines perceiuing their vntrowth, and trayterous demeanour, retrained themselues into the Castell or Palaice, where by a certaine space with arowes and handgonnes, they soze molested & vexed the vnttrue citezens. But when they considered the great puissaunce of the french king, and that they were in dispaire of all aide or reliefe, and that their victaile and artillerie beganne soze to minishe, they thought it better to compounde and agree with their enemies, rather then wilfully to be destroyed or die for famine: and so vpon condicion that all they should safely depart to Caen with all their goods and armure, and that certayne townes should be deliuered by a daye, they were permitted to depart: leauing behinde them for hostages, till the saide townes (which were agreed to be rendred) should be deliuered, the Erle of Shrewsburie and the Lozde Butler, son to the Erle of Ormond, which were sent to the Castel of Eureux, because they soze feared the malice of the Citezens of Roan. The Frenchmen folowing still the steps of victory, & elated with the bruit and fame of getting of Roan, determined, eyther by force or offer to get the towne of Harflew, & shortly assaulted the same, wherof was captain sir Thomas Conelson, a man of a great wit & of no lesse force: which hauing knowlege of the heuy tidings brought from Roan, was therewith nothing abashed, but coragiously set vpon his enemies, & them to their great hurt, manfully repulsed & draue from the walles. The frenchmen learning wit by this great perill, left their scaling, and deuised dayly, how to batter and break the walles & fortifications. This siege long continued, to the great losse of both parties. When sir Thomas saw small likelihode of ayd or gayn, but much apparance of losse & iopardy, he toke a conuencion with his enemies, and so departed with all his goods.

After which towne rendred, the fortreffe of Hunflew, vpon the same composition was yeilded. Thus you may perceiue that fortune is euer without measure. for eyther she to much fauoreth or to much hateth, for beside these townes surrendered in Normandy, the Duke of Britaine recouered againe Fongiers, saint John de Buerne, & diuers other townes. In the meane season, the king of England sent into Normandie with a crue of a M. b. C. men, a valiant Capteyn called Sir Thomas Kiriell: a man of great stomack, if he had had a great army, but his power was to small, eyther to recouer y<sup>e</sup> which was lost, either to saue that which yet remainned vngotten: but surely in him lacked neither good will nor corage, for with his small number, he recouered againe the townes of Lyseaux, and Walongnes. After which feate, he ioyned himselfe with Sir Henry Norbery, Sir Robert Aeere, Mathew Gough, and other Capteynes, so that they were aboue fine thousand men of valiaunt heartes, and haute courages. After long consultacion, they determined to fight with the french men, which were goyng to the siege of Cane, but in their iourney, they were encountered at a place called Forzigny, betweene Carentyne and Bayeux, by the Erle of Cleremont, Lieutenant to the french king, the Steward of Doyton, and the Lord of Rays, Admirall of Fraunce, with six hundzeth men of armes, and six thousand other, which skirmished with the Englishe men a great season. Durynge which skirmishe, there arryued Arthur Erle of Richmond, highe Constable of Fraunce, James of Lux-embrough, Erle of Lauall, with a great number of horsemen, and fresh footmen. After his comynge, he and all the Frenchmen set on the Englishmen beyng faynt and wery with the long skirmishe. This battail was sore fought, but in conclusion the Englishe men were discomfited, and put to flight, and of them slaine aboute foure thousand, and. viij. hundred taken prisoners, wher-of Sir Thomas Kiriell, Sir Henry Norbery, and Sir Thomas Dreye were the chiefe, Sir Robert Ueere and Mathew Gough saued themselves.

This was the first foughten fielde, that the French men gat on the Englishe men in many yeres, wherefore I blame them not though they of a little make much, and set forth all, and hide nothing, that may sound to their glozy. They declare what number they slue, but they write not howe many of them were slaine or destroyed.

After this victorie obtayned, the French king hearing that the Duke of Somerset was in the towne of Caen, thought that he had nothing done, if he permitted the Duke, still to tarie in Normandy, which by newe ayde and freshe succours might turne the whecle of Fortune into a contrary part, and peradventure recouer all þe hath bene lost, or put the realme of Fraunce in a ieopardie: wherefore like a wise prince, intending to preuent thinges, imminent and at hande, assembled an armie royall, and in his awne person, hauing in his campe Keyner, called king of Sicile, father to the Quene of Englande, the Dukes of Calaber and Maunson, the Erles of Cleremont, Richemonde, Mayne, Dumoys, Sent Polle, and Dampmartyne, beside many noble Barons and balvaunt knightes, when all things were readie, as oportunitie of time serued: He caused the towne to be environed on euery side, assigning to his Capitaynes severall places of the towne to be assaulted, and there to proue their manhood. The Erle of Dumoys, with more losse then gaine entered into a bulwarke, and was beaten back. The Englishe men within the towne kept silence, as though they knewe not of their enimies approchyng, but euery man kept his loupe, and euery Capitayne well ouerlooked his warde. The French men with querels, mozispikes, slynges, and other engines, begonne to assault the walles: but of the Englishe men within, some shot fiercely with long bowes, other cast dartes, and rolled downe great stones and barres of Iron: other cast downe Javelyns, spe-brands, hote leade, and blockes with pitch and brimstone, lyke burning fyre flaming: so that neyther courage lacked in the assault, nor manhood, nor pol-licie in the defence: for on the embattlements of the walles were set great rolles of timber, so mouing and bnfstedfast, that neyther scaling ladder could catche any holde, nor no person that should cline by, could set any sure foot-yng. The French king perceyuing that this assault little or naught preuayled him, sent for all his great ordinaunce to Paris, determining neuer to departe, till he had conquered the towne, eyther with sworde or famine. When the ordinaunce was brought, he daylie shot at the walles, and did some hurt:
but to the Castell, which stood on a rock, and in it a dongeon vnhabable to be beaten downe, he did no harme at all. In this towne was the Duke of Somerset, his wife and children, but he was not Capitaine, for the Duke of Porke owner of the towne, by the kings gift, had appointed there his Capitaine generall, Sir Daup Halle, and of the Castell, Sir Robert Ueer, and of the Dongeon, sye Henry Radford. Daylie the shot was great, but more terrible then hurtfull. Sauiug one day, a stone shot into the towne, fell betwene the Duches of Somerset, and her children, which being amased with this chaunce, prayed on her knees her husband, to haue mercy and compassion of his small infants, & that they might be delyuered out of the towne in sauegarde. The Duke more piteous then hardie, moued with the dolour of his wyfe, and loue of his children, assembled the Capitaines and Magistrates of the towne, declaring to them, the power and puyssaunce of the French king, and their debilitie and weakenesse, perswading them rather to yeelde and render vpon honest conditions, then obstinately to resist, and foolishely to perishe. Sir Daup Halle, Capitayne of the towne, answered to him, sayng: my Lorde, although you be the kings Lieutenaunt generall, within thys countrie and dominion, and may by force of your auctoritie, de-liuer, sell or geue, any of the kings townes, to suche persons, eyther friends or enemies, as shall please you: yet I am sure that you cut your leather too large, to intreate or speake of the rendering of thys towne, apperteynyng to my Lorde and mayster, Rycharde Duke of Porke, which thereof hath geuen me both the charge and custody, with other of my trusty friends and felowes, and which with the helpe of almighty God, I shall well defende, both a-gains the French king and all hys puyssaunce, till the Duke my master come to succour me, for of men, money and municions, I trust I haue sufficient. Why sayd the Duke, am not I here the kings Deputie, representing his person, and may commaunde all thinges according to my discretion? Pea sayde the Capitaine, so that you geue away no mans right but his, whose au-thoritie you haue for the same: as for this towne, I assure you, without my Lordes assent, you shall neyther render nor yeelde, by my consent or agreement. The Duke was sore moued with thys saying, and so departed, and after sent for the rulers of the towne, and the pooerest people of the same, declaring to them, that their lyues and goodes were in the french kings hands, and if they looked not shortly to their sauegarde, of death they were sure, and of mercie farre vncertaine: exhorting them to follow his louing monicion, rather then the hardened hart, of their to hardie Capitaine. The people of the towne thus perswaded (whose harts were rather french then English) beganne to rise against sye Daup, boldly affirming, that if he tooke no composition within thre dayes, they would open the gates, and let in the french king: and of this opinion were all the common souldiours. What should the pooer hare saye, when she is environed with a hundred houndes, or the silly Larke crie, when she is in the middle of a hundred Hawks, but take pa-cience, and seeke a way to escape: so this Capitaine perceyuing, that neyther his wordes serued, nor his truth towarde his Master preuayled, bad the Duke of Somerset doe what he list, for he would in no wise be named in the composition. Then the Duke partly to please the townes men, but more desirous to please the Duches his wyfe, made an agreement with the french king, that he would render the towne, so that he and all his, might departe in sauegarde with all their goodes and substance: which offer, the french king gladly accepted and allowed, knowing that by force, he might lenger haue longed for the strong towne, then to haue possessed the same so sone. After this conclusion taken, Syr Dauid Hall, with diuers other of his trustie friendes departed to Chierburge, and from thence sayled into Irelande to the Duke of Yorke, making relacion to him of all these doings: which thing kindled so great a rancour in his harte and stomack, that he neuer left persecuting of the Duke of Somerset, till he had brought him to his fatall point, and extreme confusion.

After the obtayning of this strong towne of Caen, the Erle of Cleremount besieged the City of Lysseur, wherof was Captein Mathew Gough, with three hundreth Englishe men. The Capteyne perceiuyng that when Caen was not rescued, that pooze Lysseur was in dispayre of all succour, agreed to abandon and deliuer the Citie, so that he and his people might depart to Chierburge, hauyng no yron weapon nor armure, but onely theyr goodes, & whyte stauces in their handes. After the deliuerance of this towne, the frenche men still like good begles, folowynge theyr pray, besieged the towne of Fallayse, appertaynyng to the Lord Talbot, Erle of Shrewsbury: wherof were Capteynes for the sayd Erle, Andrew Trollop, and Thomas Cotton squiers, which beyng desperate of succours, and consideryng the puissaunce of their enemies, agreed to deliuer the towne vpon two condicions, the one was, that the Erle their mayster, which remayned in pledge for certeyne condicions, agreed to be perfourmed at the deliuerance of Roan, (as you haue heard before) should be dismissed and set at libertie: the other, that if they were not rescued within .xij. dayes, that then they and theirs to depart with armure, and all their goods moueable whether it pleased them. After this agreement at the day prefixed, no rescues came, and so the towne was rendered, and incontinent after, the fortreffe of Dampford was deliuered vpon like agreement. For the Frenchmen bragged, that they regarded neyther golde nor siluer, but desired rule, glozy and fame: with which lightnesse, the other townes of Normandie beyng perswaded, voluntarily rendered themselves, bassalles and subiectes to the frenche nation.

were lost.

Nowe rested Englishe, onely the towne of Chierburge, wherof was Capteyn, Thomas Gouille, which surely and baliantly defended the towne as long as vitaille and municion serued: but when these two handes were spent and consumed, he destitute of all comfort and ayde, vpon a reasonable composition yelded the towne, & went to Calice, where the Duke of Somerset and many Englishe men then sojourned: lamentyng their losse, and desperate of all recovery. Thus was the riche Duchie of Normandie lost, the which had continued in the Englishe mens possession .xxx. yeres, by the conquest of king Henry the fift. In the which Duchie were a hundreth strong townes and fortresses, able to be kept and holden, besyde them which were destroyed by the warres, and in the same was one Archebishopske, and sixe Bishopsikes. Some say, that the Englishe men were not of puissaunce, eyther to man the townes as they should be, or to inhabite the Countrie, which was the cause that they could not kepe it: accordyng to the Frenchmens Adage, which sayth: A man can not long holde that, which he cannot grype. Other say, that the Duke of Somerset, for his awne peculiar profite, kept not halfe his number of Souldiours, and put their wages in his purse. These be mens imaginations and coniectures, but surely the losse of it, was the domesticall diuision within the Realme, euery great man desiryng rather to be

be reuenged on his fo at home, then on his outward enemye, as you now shall manifestly see and perceyue.

For while these conquestes were obteyned in the partes beyond the sea, with sword, speare, and target, by the aduersaries of the Englishmen, three mischieuous Captaines, set the people of the realme (as well of the Nobility as of the meane sort) in a ciuile warre and intestine diuision: For among the high Princes and peeres, reigned inward grudge: among the Clergie staterie, and among the Commonaltie disdain of lasciuious souereigntie, which the Queene with her Minions, and vnprofitable Counsayloz dayly tooke and vsurped vpon them. Wherefore they (not myndyng to be moze charged, then their backs would beare, and perceiuyng that by negligent prouision and improuident pollicie, the affayres and businesse in the partes beyonde the sea, dayly decayed, and moze were like to do) began first to make exclamacion agaynst the Duke of Suffolke, affirmyng him, to be the onely cause of the deliuerie of Aniole, and Hain, the chiefe procurer of the death of the good Duke of Glocester, the very occasion of the losse of Normandie, the most swallower by & consumer of the kings treasure (by reason wherof, the warres in fraunce were not mainteyned) the expeller from the king of all good & vertuous counsayloz, and the bringer in & aduancer of vicious persons, common enemies, and apparaunt aduersaries to the publike wealth: So that the Duke was called in euery mans mouth a traytor, a murtherer, a robber of the kings treasure, and worthy to be put to most cruell punishment: By reason of this exclamacion, the Queene somewhat fearyng the destruction of the Duke, but moze the confusion of her selfe, caused the Parliament, before begon at the black Friers in London, to be adiourned to Lyncolne, thynkyng there by force and rigor of the lawe, to subdue and repress all the mallice and euill will, conceyued agaynst the Duke and her: at which place fewe of the Nobility would appere, wherefore it was againe adiourned to Westminster, wher was a whole companie and a full apperaunce. In the which session, the Commons of the nether house, put vp to the king and the Lordes, many articles of treason, misprision and misdemeanour, agaynst the Duke of Suffolke: the effect wherof, with his answers, hereafter ensueth.

posed by the commons against the
Suffolke.

1 first, they alleged, that he had trayterously excited, prouoked, and counsayled, John Erle of Dumoyes Bastard of Orleans, Bertram Lorde Breigny, Wilyam Cosynet, enemies to the king, and friendes and Ambassadors to Charles, calling himselfe french king, to enter into this realme, and to leue warre agaynst the king and his realme, to the entent to destroy the king and his friends, & to make John his sonne king of this realme, marryng him to Margaret, sole heire to John Duke of Somerset, pretending and declaring her, to be next heire inheritable to the crowne, for lack of issue of the kings body lawfully begotten.

2 Item, the sayde Duke, being of the kings pryncie and neere counsayle, allured by great rewardes, and sayre promyses, made by the foresayde Erle of Dumoyes, caused the king to deliuer and set at libertie, Charles Duke of Orleans, enemye to the king, and the kings noble father, which deliuerance, was prohibited by expresse wordes, in the last will of the kings most victorious father.

3 Item, that before the departure of the sayde Duke of Orleans, the afozenamed

aforenamed Duke of Suffolke, traytorously fast cleaving to Charles called the French king, counsailed, provoked and entised the sayde Duke of Orleans, to moue the same king, to make warre agaynst England, both in Fraunce and Normandy: according to which procurement and counsaile, the sayde French king, hath recovered the whole realme of Fraunce, and all the Duchie of Normandie, and taken prisoners the Erle of Shrewsburie, the Lorde Fauconbridge, and many other valiant Capitaines.

4 Farther, it was alleged, that he being Ambassador for the King of Englande, to Charles calling himselfe French King, promised to Keyner King of Sicile, and to Charles Dangiars his brother, enemies to the King, the relese of Angeow, with the deliuerance of the Countie of Mayne, and the Citie of Maunt or Mauns, without the knowledge of the other Ambassadors, which him accompanied: which promise after his returne, he caused to be performed, to the kings disinheritance, and losse irrecoverable, and to the strength of his enemies and feblishment of the Duchy of Normandy.

¶ To this article he answered, that hys commission was to conclude, and doe all things according to his discretion, for the obtayning of a peace, and because without deliuerie of those Countries, he percepued that truce could not be obtayned, he agreed to the relese and deliuerance of them.

5 Also, they surmised that the sayde Duke being in Fraunce in the Kings seruice, and one of the priuiest of his counsaile there, traytorously declared and opened to the Capitaines and conduites of warre, appertaining to the Kings enemies, the kings counsaile, purueiaunce of his armies, furniture of his townes, and all other ordinaunces, whereby the Kings enemies (enforced by his traitorous informacion) haue gotten townes and fortresses, and the King by that meane depriued of his inheritance.

6 Item, the sayde Duke declared to the Erle of Dunoy, to the Lorde Preligny, and William Colynet, Ambassadors for the French King, being in London, the priuities of the Kings counsaile, both for the provision of farther warre, and also for defence of the Duchy of Normandy: by the disclosing whereof, the Frenchmen knowyng the Kings secretes, prevented the tyme, and obtayned their purpose.

7 Item, that the sayde Duke at such tyme as the king sent Ambassadors to the French king, for the entreating of peace, traytorously before their coming to the French Court, certefied king Charles of their commission, authoritie and instructions, by reason whereof, neyther peace nor amitie succeeded, and the kings inheritance lost, and by his enemies possessed.

8 Item, the same Duke sayde openly in the Starre chamber, before the Lordes of the counsaile, that he had as high a place in the counsaile house of the French king, as he had there, and was as well trusted there as here, and could remoue from the French king, the priuiest man of his counsaile, if he would.

9 Item, when armies haue bene prepared, and souldiours ready waged, to passe over the sea, to resist the kings enemies: the sayde Duke corrupted by rewards of the French king, hath restrayned and stayed the sayde armies to passe any farther.

10 Item, the sayde Duke being Ambassadour for the King, comprised not not in the league as the kings Allies, neyther the king of Arragon, neither the Duke of Britaine, but suffered them to be comprised on the contrary part, by reason whereof, the olde amitie of the king of Arragon, is estranged from this realme, and the Duke of Britaine become enemy to the same: Gyles his brother the kings sure friend, cast in strong prison, and there like to ende and finishe his dayes.

All these objections he bitterly denied, or faintly auoyded, but none fully excused. Diuers other crimes were laide to his charge, as enriching himselfe with the kings goods, and landes, gathering together, and making a Monopoly of officies, fees, wards, and fermes, by reason whereof, the kings estate was greatly mynished and decayed, and he and his kin highly exalted and enriched, with many other pointes, which, because they be not notable, nor of great force or strength, I omit and ouerpasse.

The Queene which entirely loued the Duke, fearing that some commotion and trouble might rise, if he were let goe unpunished, caused him to be committed to the Towre, where he was kept with as much pleasure, as he that was at large, and out of all captiuitie. But after that a moneth was expired, she imagening the people to be pacified with this open imprisonment, caused him both to be deliuered, and also to be restored to the Kynges fauour and grace, as much as euer he was before that tyme. But thys doing incensed the furye of the mutable commons, muche moze then before: openly denouncing and saying, that it was a shame to all the Realme, to see such a person, infected with so many misdeeds, either to rule aboute a Prince or to be had in honor. Of these wordes sprange dedes, and of this talking, rose displeasure, which had growne to great mischief, if politike provision had not with all celerity resisted the first furye: for the commons in sundrye places of the Realme assembled together, gathered great companies, and elected a Captayne, whome they called, Blew berde: but or they had attempted any enterprize, their heades were apprehended, and so the members sodaynely were dispersed, without any hurt committed.

After this litle rage was asswaged, a new Parliament was holden at Leicester, whither came the King and the Queene in great estate, and with them the Duke of Suffolke, as chiefe counsaillor. The commons of the lower house, not forgetting their olde grudge, beseeched the King, that such persons, as assented to the relese of Angeow, and deliuerance of Maïne, might be extremely punished, and tormented: and to be priuie to this fact, they accused, as principall, the Duke of Suffolke, with John Bishop of Salisbury, and sir James Fynes, Lord Say, and diuers other. When King Henrey perceiued that the commons were thus stomacked & bent, against the queenes darling William Duke of Suffolke, he plainly sawe that neyther glosing would serue, nor dissimulation could appease the continuall clamor of the importunate commons: wherefore to begin a short pacification in so long a broyle: first he sequestred the Lorde Say, beyng threasorer of England, and other the Dukes adherentes, from their offices, and authoritie, and after banished and put in exile the Duke of Suffolke, for the terme of fyue yeres: meaning by this exile, to appease the furious rage of the outrageous people, and that pacified, to reuocate him to his olde estate, as the Queenes chiefe friend and counsaillor. But fortune would not, that he should so escape,

for when he was shipped in Suffolke, intending to be transported into Fraunce, he was encountered with a shippe of warre, appertayning to the Duke of Excester, the Constable of the Towre of London, being capitaine of the same barke with small fight, entered into the Dukes shippe, and perceiuing his person present, brought him to Dover Bode, & there on the one syde of a cocke bote, caused his heade to be striken off, & left his body with the heade vpon the sandes of Dover, which corps was there founde by a Chaplayne of his, & conueied to Wingham colledge in Suffolke, and there buryed. This ende had William de la Pole the first Duke of Suffolke, as men iudge by Goddes punishment: for aboue all thinges he was noted to be the very organ, engine, and deuiser of the destruction of Humfrey the good Duke of Gloucester, and so the blood of the innocent man was with his dolorous death, recompensed and punished. But the death of this forward person, brought not the realme to quiet, nor deliuered it from all inward grudge and intestine diuision, which to all Realmes is more pestiferous and noysome, then outward warre, dayly famine, or extreme pestilence. For although Richard Duke of Yorke was in person (as the kinges Deputie) in the realm of Ireland, continually resiant ther: yet his breath puffed, and his winde blew dayly, in many partes of this realme. For many of the nobilitie, and more of the meane estate, wisely pondering the estate and condicion of the Realme, perceiuing more losse then encrease, ruine then aduancement, dayly to ensue: remembryng also that Fraunce was conquered, and Normandy was gayned by the frenche people in short space, thought with them selues and imagined, that the fault of all these miserable chaunces happened, either because the king was not the true enheritor to the Crowne, or that he or his counsaile were not able of wit, pollicie or circumspection, to rule and gouerne so noble a Realme, or so famous a Region. Upon this coniecture, the friendes, kinsmen, and allies of the Duke of Yorke, which were of no small number, began to practise the gouernaunce of his title: Insulung and puttyng into mens heades secretly his right to the Crowne, his politique gouernaunce, his gentle behauiour too all the Irishe Nacion, affirmyng, that he which had brought that rude and sauage nation to ciuile fashion, and English maners, would (if he once ruled in the realme of England) depose euill Counsaylors, correct euill Judges, and refozme all matters amisse, and vnamended. And to set open the flood gates of these deuises, it was thought necessary, to cause some great commocion, and risynge of peopie to be made agaynst the king: so that if they preuailed, then had the Duke of Yorke and his complices, their appetite and desyre. And because the Kentishemen be impatient in wronges, disdepyning of to much oppression, and ever desirous of newe chaunge, and newe fanglenesse: The ouerture of this matter was put foorth in Kent, and to the entent that it should not be knowen, that the Duke of Yorke or his friendes were the cause of the sodaine risynge: A certayne yong man of a goodly stature, and pregnant wit, was entyled to take vpon him the name of John Mortimer, although his name were John Cade, and not for a small pollicie, thinkyng that by that surname, the lyne and lineage of the assistent house of the Erle of Marche, which were no small number, should be to him both adherent and fauourable. This Capteine not only suborned by teachers, but also enforced by priuie Scholemasters, assembled together a great company of tall personages: assuryng them that their attempt was both honourable to God and the king, and also profitable to the common wealth, promisyng them, that if either by force or pollicie they might once take the king, the Queene, and other their Counsaylors, into their handes and gouernaunce, that they would honourably entreat the king, and so sharply handle his Counsaylors, that neither flatteres should hereafter be demaunded, nor once any impositions or tax should be spoken of. These persuasions, with many other faire promises of libertie (which the common people more affect and desyre, rather then reasonable obedience, and due conformitie) so animated the Kentish people, that they with their Capteine abouenamed, in good order of battaile (not in great number) came to the plain of Blackheath, betweene Eldham and Greenwich. And to the entent that the cause of this glorious Captaynes commyng thither, might be shadowed from the king and his Counsaile, he sent to him an humble supplicacion, with louyng wordes, but with malicious entent: affirmyng his commyng, not to be agaynst him, but agaynst diuers of his counsaile, louers of themselves, and oppressors of the poore Commonaltie, flatterers to the king, and enemies to his honoz, suckers of his purse, and robbers of his subiectes, parciall to their friendes, and extreme to their enemies, for rewardes corrupted, and for indifferencie, nothyng doynge. This proude Bill, was both of the king, and his Counsaile disdainfully taken, and thereupon great consultation had, and after long debatynge it was concluded, that such proude rebelles should rather be suppressed and tamed, with violence and force, then with fayre wordes or friendly or gentle answer.

Whereupon the king assembled a great army, & marched toward them, which had lyen on black heath, by the space of .vij. dayes. This subtill Capitaine named Jack Cade, intending to bring the king farther within the compasse of his nette, brake by his campe, and retyred backward to the towne of Seuenock in Kent, and there expecting his pray, encamped himselfe, and made his abode. The Queene, which bare the rule, being of hys retraite well aduertised, sent for Humfrey Stafford knight, and William his brother, with many other Gentlemen, to follow the chase of the Kentish men, thinking that they had fled, but verily they were deceaued: for at the first skirmishe, both the Staffordes were slayne, and all their companie shamefully discomfited. The kings armie, being at this time come to black heath, hearing of this discomfiture, begaune to grudge and murmoure amongst themselves, some wishyng the Duke of Yorke at home, to ayde the Capitaine his Cousyn: Some desiring the ouerthrow of the king and his counsaile: other openly cryed out on the Queene and her complices. Thys rumour openly spoken, and commonly published, caused the king and certayne of his counsaile not ledde by fauour, nor corrupted by rewardes (to the intent to appease the furious rage of the inconstant multitude) to commit the Lorde Say, Threasorer of Englande to the Towre of London: and if other agaynst whome like displeasure was borne had bene present, they had likewise bene serued. But it was necessary that one should suffer, rather then all the nobilitie then should perishe. When the Kentish Capitaine, or the notorious Cade, had thus obtained victorie, and slayne the two valyant Staffordes, he appareled himselfe in their riche armure, and so with pompe and glozie returned agayne towarde London: in the which retraite, dyuers pole and varabond persons, resorted to him from Suffex and Surrey, and from other partes to a great a number. Thus this glozious Capitaine, compassed about, and inuironed with a multitude of euill, rude, and rusticall persons, came againe to the plaine of Blackheath, and there strongly encamped himselfe: to whome were sent by the king, the Archebishop of Caunterbury, and Humfrey Duke of Buckyngham, to comon with him of his greues and requestes. These Lordes found him sober in comunication, wise in disputing, arrogant in hart, and stiffe in his opinion, and by no wayes possible, to be perswaded to dissolue his armie, except the king in person would come to him, and assent to all things which he should require. These Lordes perceyving the wilfull pertinacie, and manifest contumacie of this rebellious Willey, departed to the king, declaring to him his stoute and presumptuous requestes. The king somewhat hearing, and more marking the sayengs of this outrageous losell, hauing daylie repozte of the concurse and accesse of people, which continually resorted to him, doubting as much his familiar seruaunts, as his vnknown subiectes (which spared not to speake, that the Capitaines cause was profitable for the common wealth) departed in all haste to the Castell of Kylyngworth in Warwike shire, leauing onely behinde him the Lorde Scales to keepe the Towre of London. The Capitaine being aduertised of the Kings absence, came first into Southwarke, and there lodged at the whyte Hart, prohibiting to all men, murder, rape, or robbery: by which coulour he allured to him the harts of the common people. But after that he entered into London, and cut the ropes of the drawe bridge, striking his sworde on London stone, sayng: now is Mortimer Lorde of this Citie, and rode in euery streete lyke a Lordly Capitayne. And after a flattering declaration made to the Mayre of the Citie of his thether comming, he departed againe into Southwarke. And vpon the third day of July, he caused syr James Fynes Lorde Say, a Threasorer of England, to be brought to the Gylde hall of London, and there to be arraigned: which being before the kings Iustices put to aunswere, desyzed to be tryed by his peeres, for the lenger delay of his lyfe. The Capitaine perceyving his dilatorie ple, by force tooke him from the officers, and brought him to the standard in Chepe, and there caused his head to be stricken off, and pitched it on a high pole, which was openly borne before him throught the streete. And this cruell tyraunt not content with the murder of the Lorde Say, went to Hyle ende, and there apprehended syr James Cromer, then Shryefe of Kent, and sonne in lawe to the sayde Lorde Say, and caused him there likewise to be hedded, and his head to be fixed on a Pole, and with these two heades, thys bloody Butcher entred into the Citie agayne, and in dispite caused them in euery streete, to kisse together.

Philip Malpas Alderman of London.

After this shamefull murder, succeeded open rapyne, and manifest robbery in dyuers houses, within the Citie, and in especiall in the house of Philip Malpas, Alderman of London, and diuers other: ouer and besyde ransoming, and finyng of dyuers notable Marchantes, for the tuicion and securitie of their lynes and goodes, as Robert Horne Alderman, which payed five hundred marks, and yet neyther he, nor no other person was either of life or substance in a suretie or sauegarde. He also put to execution in South-

warke diuers persons, some for enfringng his rules and preceptes, because he would be sene indifferent, other he tormented of his old acquaintaunce, least they should blase and declare his base birth, and lowly lynage, disparaging him from his vsurped surname of Mortimer, for the which, he thought and doubted not, both to haue friendes and fauours, both in London, Kent, and Essex. The wise Mayor, and sage Magistrates of the Citie of London, perceyving themselves neyther to be sure of goodes, nor of lyfe well warranted, determined with force to repell and expulse this mischieuous heade, and hys ingracious company. And because the Lorde Scales was ordeyned keeper of the Towre of London, with Mathew Gough, the often named Capitaine in Normandie (as you haue heard before) they purposed to make them prmie, both of their entent and enterpryse. The Lord Scales promised to them his ayde, with shooting of ordinaunce, and Mathew Gough was by him appointed, to assist the Mayor and the Londoners: because he was both of manhode, and experience greatly renoumed and noysed. So the Capitaines of the Citie appointed, toke vpon them in the night to keepe the bridge of London, prohibiting the Kentish men eyther to passe or approche. The rebels, which neuer soundly slept, for feare of sodayne chaunces, hearing the bridge to be kept and manned, ran with great haste to open that passage, where betwene both parties was a fierce and cruell encounter. Mathew Gough, more expert in Marciall feates, then the other Chiefes of the Citie, perceyving the Kentish men, better to stand to their tackling, then his imaginacion expected, aduised his company no farther to procede toward Southwarke, till the day appered: to the intent, that the Citizens hearing where the place of the icopardie rested, might occurre their enemies and relieue their friendes and companions. But this counsaile came to small effect: for the multitude of the rebels drawe the Citizens from the stulpes at the bridge foote, to the drawe bridge, and beganne to set fyre in dyuers houses. Alas what sorrowe it was to beholde that miserable chaunce: for some desyring to eschewe the fyre, lept on his enemies weapon, and so died: fearefull women with childzen in their armes, amased and appalled, lept into the river: other doubting how to saue themselves betwene fyre, water, and sword, were in their houses suffocat and smoldered. Yet the Capteynes nothing regarding these chaunces, fought on the drawe bridge all the night balyantly, but in conclusion, the rebels gate the drawe bridge, and drowned many, and slue John Sutton Alderman, and Robert Heylande a hardy Citizen, with many other, beside Mathew Gough, a man of great wyf, and of much experience in feates of chivalrie, the which in continuall warres, had balyantly serued the king, and his father, in the partes beyonde the sea (as before you haue heard.) But it is often seene, that he which many times hath banquished his enemies in straunge Countries, and returned againe as a conquerour, hath of his abone nacion afterwarde bene shamefully murdered, and brought to confusion, as in this skirmishe and bickeryng the sayde Mathewe Gough was. This hard and soze conflict endured on the Bridge till. ix. of the clocke in the moynyng, in doubtfull chaunce, and fortunes balannce: for sometyme the Londoners were bett backe to the stulpes at Saint Magnus corner, and sodainly agayne the rebels were repulsed and driuen backe to the stulpes in Southwarke, so that both partes beyng faynt, werie and fatigate, agreed to desist from fight, and to leaue battayle till the next day, vpon condition: that neyther Londoners should passe into Southwarke, nor the Kentishe men into London.

After this abstinence of warre agreed, the lustie Kentishe Capitayne, hoping on more friends, brake by the gayles of the kings Bench and Marshalsea, and set at libertie a swarme of Gallants, both meete for his seruice and apt for his enterpryse. The Archebishop of Cauntorbury, beyng then Chauncelloz of England, and for his suretie lyeng in the Towre of London, called to him the Byschop of Wynchester, which also for feare, lurked at Halwell. These two prelates seyng the furie of the Kentishe people, by reason of their beating back, to be mitigated and minished, passed the ryuer of Thames from the Towre, into Southwarke, bringing with them vnder the kings great seale, a generall pardon vnto all the offenders: which they caused to be openly proclaimed and published. Lozde, howe glad the people were of this pardon (ye more then of the great Jubile of Rome) and how they accepted the same, in so much that the whole multitude, without bryding farewell to their Capitaine, retired the same night, euery man to his awne home, as men amased and striken with feare. But John Cade desperate of succours, which by the friendes of the Duke of Yorke were to him promised, and seyng his company thus without his knowledge sodainely departe, mistrusting the sequelle of the matter, departed secretly in habite disguised, into Suffex: but all his Metamorphosis or transfiguration little preuayled, for after a proclamation made, that whosoener could apprehend the sayde Jack Cade, should haue for his paine a thousande Markes, many sought for hym, but fewe espied hym, till one Alexander Iden Esquire of Kent, founde him in a garden, and there in his defence, manfully slue the captiue Cade, and brought his dead bodie to London, whose head was set on London bridge. Thys is the ende of all rebelles, and thys fortune chaunceth euer to traytors. For where men striue agaynst the streamie, their bothe neuer cometh to his pretended porte.

After this commocion, the king himselfe came into Kent, and there sat in iudgement vpon the offenders, and if he had not mitigated his iustice, with mercie and compassion, more then fife hundred by the rigor of his lawe had bene instely put to execution: but he considered both their simplicitie and innocencie, and howe they with peruerse people were sedured and deceyued: and so punished the stubburne heades, and deliuered the ignozant and miserable people, to the great reioysing of all his subiectes.

During this commocion about London, Raufe Bishop of Salisbury, was by his awne tenaunts and seruaunts murdered at Edington, and so from thence forth daylie succeded murther, slaughter, and dissention. And the cause, as some write, was for consenting to the geuing vp of the Duchie of Angebo and Hayne into the handes of the French king.

And about this time Quene Margaret beganne the foundation of the Queenes Colledge in Cambrige.

These variable chaunces in Englande were not vnknowne to the French king, wherfore he making foundation vpon the English discord, determined to get into his possession, the Duchie of Aquitayne, while the princes of England were in controuersie for their titles and superiortie: & therfore fore lyke a speedy Purueioz, which lacketh not time, he sent the Erles of Bonthieure, & Berigot, with many valyaunt Capitaynes to lay siege to the towne of Bergerac set vpon the ryuer of Dordone, of which towne was capitayne, John Seddyng, which heering of the yeelding of Roan, and conquest of Normandie, considering the pyssaunce of the French armie, vpon reasonable conditions rendered the towne: yet all this notwithstanding, the Lozde Cameyle, sye George Seymour, sye John Arundell, and other valyaunt Capitaynes, which had the gouernance of this countrie, maigned townes, gathered people, and animated the colde stomackes of the fearfull Gascones: requiring them to be constant in their fidelitie, true to their naturall Prince, and vndoubted soueraine Lozde, sending daylie letters to the king of Englande and his counsaile, declaring to him the weaknesse of his subiectes, and the strength of his enimies, assertheyng him for a suretie, that without speedye ayde, and ready succours, the whole Countrey was like to be gotten from his possession. Many letters were sent, and many faire answers were brought, but reliefe neither appered, nor ore man of warre was thether shipped. By reason wherof, the Gascones perceyuing their enemies at hande, intending as well to destroy the countrey, as to subdue the people, beganne euery man for himselfe, to regarde nothing, but the sauing of their townes, goodes, and corne: neglecting defence, and fearefull of assaults, least by small resistance, they might receyue more detrimment, then after they could recouer agayne, eyther with great force, or much labour. But the Englishe men (whose natures are not to be faynt hearted, euen at the very ieopardie of death) with all their wits studied, both how to repulse and conuince their enemies, and to turne away the euill chaunces which they sawe lykely (if pollicie did not helpe) sodainely to fall, and shortly to insue. But all their pollicies little preuayled in conclusion, because succours sayled, and force wanted. For after the Frenchmen had the towne of Bergerac to them rendered, the fortresses of Fonsac, of Bonefoy, and dyuers other places, wyllingly and freely yeelded themselves to the French subiection. During which time, the Lozde Dozual, thirde sonne to the Lozde Delabreth, with a great number of men, as well on horseback as on foote, departed from Basas, to conuere and destroy the Isle of Madore: where of hearing the Maire of Burdeaux, with a conuenient crewe of men, issued out of the Citie, and encountered with his enemies, betwene whome was a harde fight and a deadly battayle: but the French men more with multitude then with force, banquished the Englishe men, and killed and tooke prisoners aboute sixe hundred English men and Gascones, but of the Frenchmen which were in double number, aboute their aduersaries (as wyrters affirme) there were slayne eyght hundred persons. For which cause, the Capitaynes followed no farther the chase, least the Englishe people would agayne returne. Thys slaughter of the Englishe parte, the French wyrters set forth with the most, but of their awne losse they speake not one worde. Such indifferency, is in their Chronographiers. This discomfiture so amased the wits, and daunted the hartes of the meane Gascons, that they offered many townes to the French parte, before the same were of them demaunded.

After this, the Bastard of Orleans, Erle of Dumoys, and Longueville, Lieutenaunt generall for the French king, accompanied with his brother, ther, John Erle of Angulesme, which had bene long prisoner in England, and many valyaunt Capitaynes, and expert men of warre, besieged the Castell of Montguyon, which to them was rendered. After this, the sayde army besieged the fortreffe of Blay, standing on the ryuer of Gyzond, which towne is the very key of the porte of Burdeaux, and this towne was besieged both by water and by lande, and fiercely assaulted and manfully defended, and in conclusion by very force, for lack of resistance, conquered and gayned. The Bastarde of Kendale Capitayne of the Castell, seeing the towne lost, vpon certayne conditions deliuered his fortreffe, into the possession of the Lorde Lieutenaut.

After this towne gayned, the fortreffes of Bourge & Libourne yelded but not without five weekes besieging. The wittie Capitaynes perceiuing fortunes fauour was not towarde them, thought it necessary to take the tyme while their good planet reigned. Wherefore to prevent the ayde of the Englishe men, whom they daily looked for to come to the succor of their people: they appoynted foure armies, to make warre in foure severall partes. The Lorde Charles Delabreth, accompanied with John Lorde Tartas and Armon, Lord of Dozuall his sonnes, and the Erle of Foys, and the Count La Motte his brother, and many noble men of Guyen, layd siege to the towne of Arques, in the which be diuers hote bathes. The Erle of Arminacke extreme enemye to the realme of England, for breakyng the marriage concluded betwene king Henry and his daughter (as before you haue heard) besieged with a great puyssaunce, the strong towne of Rion. The Erle of Bentheux, with many noble barons, besieged the towne of Chastillon in Perigot, and the Erle of Dumoy, environed with a great puyssaunce the towne of Fronfacke. The Englishemen within this towne, perceiuing the great ordinaunce on the frenche part, and the small provision on their syde, conuanted with the sayd Erle, that if the towne were not succored, & the french men foughte withal, before the feast of the nativity of S. John Baptist next ensuyng, y then the towne of Fronfacke should be yelded to them, which was the strongest fortreffe of all that Country, and the very key of Guen, & their Chamber of Burdeaur: and for performaunce hereof, pledges were deliuered, and writynges autentique sealed. This agreement once blowen through the Countrey, the Citie of Burdeaur and all other townes (except Bayon) made like agreement, and deliuered pledges. So did all the noble men and Gentlemen, which were subiectes and vassalles to the Crowne of England. Mache, alacke, euery day was looking for reliefe, and euery houre was caryng for comfort, but wishyng serued not, nor hoppyng nothing helped: for the pestiferous diuision which reigned in England, so incigled the braynes of the noble men there, that the honour of the Realme was clerely forgotten, and nothing earthly, but their priuate phantasies looked on and remembred. Now to conclude, the day appoynted came, but succor looked for came not: so that all the townes of Aquitaine (except Bayon) deliuered their keyes, and became vassalles to the frenche Nation, yet the Citizens of Burdeaur, hopping of reserues, offered themselves to fight with the frenchmen, and desyred a day of battaile to be appoynted, which request was to them granted. But at the day assigned, they beyng in dyspayre of all refuge and succor, rendered themselves and the towne, to their aduersaries, their liues and

goodes reserued, with licence and safeconduite to all persons which would depart and sayle into England. When the Cities and townes of Gascoyne were set in good order, the Erle of Dumoy and Foys, with great preparation of vittaille, munition, and men, came before the Citie of Bayon, where with mines and battery, they so disinayed the fearefull Inhabitautes, that neyther the Capitaine nor the Souldiours, could kepe them from yeeldyng: so by force they deliuered the towne, and their Captayne as a prisoner, offered a great somme of money for the sauegarde of their liues and goodes. Besides these agreementes taken with townes, diuers noble men made seuerall compositions, as Gaston de Foys, Capdau of Buess, whom king Henry the first made Erle of Longuile, and knight of the Garter, whose auncestours were euer true to England, which agreed that he, and John de Foys his son, whom king Henry the first created Erle of Kendale, and made also knight of the Garter, should enjoy all their landes in Aquitaine, geuen to them by the kinges of England, or by the Dukes of Aquitaine, And because their entent was still to serue the king of Englands their souereigne Lorde, they agreed, to deliuer into the custodie of the Erle of Foys, their Colyn, the sonne and heyre of the sayd Erle of Kendale, beyng of the age of thre yeres, to the entent, that if he at his full age denied to become subiect and vassall to the french king, or before that tyme deceased, that then after the death of his father, and grandfather, all the sayde landes should wholly remaine to the next heyre of their blood, eyther Male, or female, beyng vnder the obersaunce of the frenche king, or his heyres. Many noble men, whose hartes were good Englishe, made like compositions, and some came into England, and other went to Calice, and were great officers there: as the Lorde Duras, which was Marshall there, and Monsire Wandlere, which was there Deputie, vnder the Erle of Warwike (as after shall be shewed.) Now haue I declared to you, the losse of Fraunce, Normandie, and Aquitaine: wherefore, hauing no more cause yet to speake of them, I will returne to the great trouble, dissencion and diuision, which long was cloaked, and nowe openly set a brode, and burst out in the realme of England.

You haue heard before, howe the Duke of Yorke, as heyre to Lionell Duke of Clarence, pretended priuily, a title to the Crowne, and howe hys friendes commoned secretly with diuers persons of that matter, and excited them to set forward, and aduance that part to the bittermost: and howe the sayde Duke was sent into Ireland, where he was dayly aduertised by hys assured friendes, of all thinges done in England, and by them knew in what estate he stode, both with the Nobilitie, and Commonaltie. Wherefore, he myndyng no lenger to dreame in his waightie matter, nor to kepe secreete his right title, returned out of Ireland, and came to London in the Parliament tyme, where he deliberately consulted, with his especiall friendes: as John Duke of Norffolke, Richarde Erle of Sarisbury, and Lorde Richarde his sonne, which after was Erle of Warwike, Thomas Courtney, Erle of Denonshire, and Edwarde Broke Lorde Cobham, a man of great wit and much experience: requiryng them, both of aduice and counsaile, howe hee might without spot of treason, or colour of vsurpacion, set forth his title, and obteyne his right.

After long consultation, it was thought expedient, first to seeke some occasion

occasion and picke some quarell to the Duke of Somerset, which ruled the King, ordered the realme, and most might doe with the Queene: Whome the commons, for the losse of Normandy, worse then a Code or Scorpion hated, disdained, and abhorred, in so much that diuerse euill ruled persons, brake his house, and spoyled his goods, within the blacke Friers of the Citie of London: which malefactors, according to their desertes, were iustly executed and punished. For well knewe the Duke of Yorke and his adherentes, that if the Duke of Somerset sawe or smelled any point of their purposed enterprize, that hee woulde with speare and shielde, with might and mayne, wythstande and repell the same, to the extreme point of death, and to their bitter confusion. Wherefore to abridge his power, and to minishe his aucthoritie, they determined to bynng him into the hatred of the people, and into the disdayne of the Nobyltie. And to be the stronger in the setting forth of their feate, they, what wyth rewards and faire promises, and what wyth declaration of great enormities, committed by the kyngs counsaillors, agaynst the common wealth, allected and allured to them, lustye bachelars, and actyue persons, of a great number, protesting and declaring, that they ment euill, not thought harne, eyther to the kynges person, or to hys dignitie: but that their intent was, for the reuenging of great iniuries done to the publike wealth, and to persecute and refozme diuers rulers about the kyng, which dayly contrary to right and equitie, beread and pilled the englysh people, without reason or measure: so that no man was in suretie, eyther of his owne goodes, or sure of his proper lands, or possessions. These great enormities, they caused to be published to the intent that their chiefe purpose shoulde not be espied, or perceiued.

When the Duke of Yorke had thus framed the entry into hys long ended iorney, he with helpe of his frendes, assembled a great armie in the Marches of Wales, publishing openly, that the cause of his motion was, for the publike wealth of the realme, and great profite of the commons: which faire tolde tale, allured to him much people, aswell of the chivalrye, as of the mean sort. The king much astounded w this sodain commocion, by the aduise of his counsaill, rayfed a great host, and marched forward toward the Duke: but he being of his approach, credibly aduertised, by his espials, diuerted from the kings wayes, and toke his iorney toward London: and hauing knowledge, that he might not be suffered with his army, to passe through Londen, he crossed ouer the Thamese at Kingston bridge, and so set forth toward Kent, where he knewe that he had both friends, and good willers, and there on Bientheath, a Mile from Berford, and .x miles from Londen, he embattayled himselfe, and encamped his armie very strongly, both with trenches and artillery. The king being therof aduertised, with great diligece brought his army to Blackheath, and there pight his tentes. While both the armies lay thus embattayled, the king by the aduise of his counsaill, sent the bishops of Winchester and Ely to the Duke, both to know, what was the cause of so great a tumult and commocion, and also to make a centrozd, if the requestes of the Duke and his company seemed to them consonant to reason, or profitable to the people. The Duke hearing the message of the two bishops, eyther doubting the variable chaunce of mortall battaill, or loking for a better occasion, or a more luckey daye, answered the prelates, that his coming was neyther to dampnishe the king, neyther in honoz, nor in person, nor yet any good man, but his intent was to remoue from him certaine euill disposed persons of hys counsaile, which were the bludsuckers of the nobilltie, the pollers of the cleargie, and oppresors of the poze people: amongst whom he chiefly named, Edmound Duke of Sommerset, whome if the king would commit to ward, to answer to such articles as agaynst him in open Parliament should be both proponed and proued, he promised not onely to dissolue hys armie and dispatche his people, but also offered himselfe, like an obedient subiect to come to the kinges presence, and to do him true and faythfull seruice, according to his truth and bounden dutie. When the Messengers were returned with this reasonable answer: The king perceiuyng, that without great bloodshed, he could not brydle the Duke of Yorke, nor without war he could not appease the furious rage of the common people, beyng once set on fire, except he folowed their mindes, and graunted their requestes, caused the Duke of Sommerset to be committed to warde, as some say: or to kepe himselfe priue in his alone house, as other wryte, till the furye of the people were somewhat asswaged and pacified. Which thing done, the Duke of Yorke the first day of Marche, dissolued his armie, and brake by his campe, and came to the kinges tent, where besyde his expectation, and contrary to the promise made by the king, he found the Duke of Sommerset set at large and at libertie, whome the Duke of Yorke boldly accused of treason, of bribery, oppression, and many other crimes. The Duke of Sommerset not onely made answer to the Dukes obiections, but also accused him of high treason toward the king his soueraigne Lorde, affirmyng, that he with his fauourers, and complices had consulted together, how to obteyne the Crowne and Scepter of the Realme. By meane of which wordes, the king remoned straight to London, and the Duke of Yorke as prisoner rode before him, and so was kept a while. The king assembled together a great counsaill at Westminster, to heere the accusations of the two Dukes, the one obiectyng to the other, shamefull actes, and detestable crimes. But the Duke of Sommerset, which nowe conceiued in his minde the thing that shortly folowed, incessantly exhorted the Counsaile, that the Duke of Yorke, by compulsion or otherwise might be compelled to confesse his offence, and so beyng attaynted of treason, to be put to execution, and his children to be taken enemies and aduersaries to their native Countrie: to the entent that by the losse of this onely Prince and his sequele, all ciuile warre, and inwarde diuision might cease and be repressed: beseechyng almightie God, that so great an enemy to the king and his blood, might neuer escape punishment, nor continue long in life. The Duke of Sommerset set forth this matter the more behemently, because he knewe perfectly, that the Duke of Yorke dayly studied, how to get the Crowne, and obteyne the gouernaunce, and to depose and destroy both the king and him. But the necessitie of destinie cannot by any mans deuise, be eyther letted or interrupted: for many thinges (to common iudgements) declared the Duke of Yorkes truth and innocencie in this case. First, his free and voluntary commyng to the king, when he with his power was able to encounter with the kinges puissaunce, which was an open token and manifest argument, that he neyther ment treason, nor yet fraude. Secondly, his humble submission, his reasonable requestes, and profitable petitions for the

poore commons, were iudged no poyntes of a man, that desyred souereigntie or rule aboue other, which thinges he did onely for a cautele (as afterwarde openly appered.) While the Counsaile treated of sauyng or losyng of thys Duke of Yorke, A rumoz sprang throughout London, that Edward Erle of Marche, sonne and heyre apparaunt to the sayde Duke, a yong Prince of great wit and much stomacke, accompanied with a strong armie of Marchemen, was comyng towarde London, which tydings soze astonyed the Queene and the whole counsaile. Beside this, the same very day came Ambassadors from the heddes and Magistrates of the City of Burdeaux, wherof the chiefe were, the Erle of Kendale, and the Lorde Lespar, which signified to the Counsaile, that if they would send an armie into Gascoyn, the Gascoynes would reuert and turne againe to the Englishe part: aduertisyng them, that there was in those partes no puyssaunce or garrison of Frenche men, to withstand them, and theretore there was no doubt of the regainyng or reconquest: requiryng them with all diligent celeritie, to take so sayre a pray so openly to them offered, and to minde nothing before the regainyng of so fruitfull a Countrie. These two thinges soze troubled the heades of the Kinges counsaile, which least this dissencion betwene two persons, might be the let of outward conquest, they first agreed to set the Duke of Yorke at libertie, and permitted him to returne to his sayre Castell of Wigmore in the Marches of Wales, where he studyed, both howe to displeasc his enemies, and to obteyne his purpose: And so by meanes of the absence of the Duke of Yorke, which was in maner banished the Court, and the Kinges presence, the Duke of Sommerset rose bp in high fauour with the king and the Queene, and his worde onely ruled, and his voyce was onely heard.

The Counsaile of Englarde, not forgetting the offer of the Gascons, and that they might nowe haue the Citie of Burdeaux, with the Countrie round about, by offer and request, which with great charge and long warre they could scant againe recouer or repossesse, appointed the noble souldiour, and balyaunt Capitayne John Lorde Talbot, and Erle of Shrewsburie, to be Chiefetaine of the armie, which should in all haste be transported and conueyed into Aquitayne. The Lordes of Gascoyne, both well pleased and glad of their aunswere, returned into their Countrie, in as secret maner as they from thence departed, declaring to their Nation, the Capitaynes and the power, that was to them comyng: exhortyng euery man to be firme and stable to the king of England and his heyres, vnder whose liberty and freedom they had prospered and reioysed, aboue thre hundred yeres, rather then now to fall into the French captiuitie: whose taxes were vncasonable, and whose daylie exactions were to them importable.

When all thinges were shipped, and winde and weather serued, the Erle of Shrewsbury toke his chaunce, and sayled into Gascoyne, where without resistance, he peaceably arryued in the Isle of Madie, where he reposed his armie, being scant thre thousand men, and destroyed all the Countrey, betwene Burdeaux and Blay, and toke the strong towne and Castell of Frontac, and diuers other townes and fortresses. The inhabitants of Burdeaux hearing of the Erles arriual, sent to hym messengers in the darke night, thanking and congratulating him for his thether comyng, and also requiryng him to hasten, and speede his iourney towarde their Citie, enformyng

him, that now the time serued for his purpose: and time not taken, was laboz mispent. This auncient Fox, and pollitique Capitayne losse not one houre, nor spared one minut, till he came befoze the Citie of Burdeaux. The Citizens glad of his comyng, made not the French Capitaynes, which had the gouernance of the towne, eyther parties or priues of their intent: yet some of them would, that the French men, in securitie both of lyues and goodes should departe out of the towne, but their wyll was no will: for the multitude, abhorring the French seruitude, and embracing the Englishe libertie, which they and their auncestors of many yeres had tasted, opened one gate, and let in a great parte of the Englishe armie. The French Capitaynes intending to escape secretly by a posterne, were slayne and taken by the Lorde Lesper, and other of the Englishe army. After the regainyng of Burdeaux, arrived at Blay the Bastarde of Sommerset, Sir John Talbot Lorde Lile, by his wyfe sonne to the sayde Erle of Shrewsbury, the Lorde Montgomerie, Syr John Vernon with .xxij. C. men with bittayles and munitions. When the Erle of Shrewsbury was thus according to his entent of all thinges furnished and adorned: first he fortified Burdeaux with Englishe men and bittayle: after that he rode into the Countrey abroad, where he obteyned Citie, & gat townes without stroke or dent of sworde: for the poore and needie people being weryed with the oppzession of their new Landlords rendered their townes, befoze they were of them requyred, and beside thys the townes and Citie farre distaunt from Burdeaux, sent messengers to the Erle, promisyng to him both service and obeyssaunce. And among other the towne and Castell of Chastillon in Perigot, was to him deliuered by the Frenchmen vpon composition, that they might with their liues safely depart: which towne, the Erle strongly fortified both with men and ordinaunce. The French king lyeng at Towerns in Towrayne, being of the Erles actes in Gascoyn credibly enformed, was not a little exasperate and quickned: wherfore he minding to resist the first stroke, & repulse the first surge, assembled a great army to the number of .xxij. thousand men, and entering into Aquitayne came to Lusigneum, and from thence accompanied with the Erle of Ponthuyre, the Lordes of saint Seuer and Borcat, marched towarde Calice in Gascoyn, and with sayre promyses obteyned the towne. And after that towne gayned, the French king diuided his armie into two parties, wherof the one was gouerned by the Erle of Cleremont, sonne in lawe to King Charles, and heyre to the Duke of Burbon, in the which were .xv. thousand men, in whom consisted the waight and peyse of the whole enterpryse. This army he appointed to take the next way toward Burdeaux: the other armie wherof he was Capitayn and leader himselfe, accompanied with the pceres and noble men of his realme, he kept and reteyned still beside Caley, and sent the two Marchalles of Fraunce with .xxij. C. men of armes, beside Archers, to besiege the towne of Chastillon in Perigot, & in going thether, they gat a forresse, which they manned, and so departed to Chastillon, which they emproned with a strong siege, and cast high trenches, and made deepe ditches on euery side: and in a place where their enemies must come, they layde ordinaunce both great and small, wherof so great a number was neuer before seene in Fraunce. The Erle of Shrewsbury hearing of these newes, and perceyuing that he must of necessitie encounter and fight with two armies, determined with himselfe, first to assay the least power and weaker puissance: wherfore without longer delay, he assembled together eight. C. horsemen, whereof the Lorde Lisle his sonne, the Lorde Holyns, the Lorde Cameus, Syr Edward Hull, syr John Haward, and Syr John Vernon were chiefe, and so marched forward toward Chastillon, appoynting. v. M. foote men vnder the conduyt of the Erle of Kendalle, and the Lorde Lespar to followe him with all speede. In his way he assauted the Towre, which the French men had taken, and by force entered, and slue all that he found within, and by the way he met five hundred frenchmen, goyng a forragyng, of whome he slue the greatest parte, and chased the other to the campe. The french men knowing by these good runners away of the Erles approaching, with all diligence left the siege, and retired in good order into the place which they had trenched, ditched, and fortified with ordinaunce. They within the towne seing the siege remoued, sent out worde to the Englishe men that the french men fled. The courageous Erle hearing these newes, and fearing least through long taryng the birdes might be flowne adraye, not taryng till his foote men were come, set forward toward his enemies, which were in minde surely to haue fled, as they confessed afterward, if the feare of the french kings rebuke, which was not farre of, had not caused them to tarie, and yet in this armie were present, the Marshalles and great Master of Fraunce, the Erle of Douthyeure, the Senescal of Poythiew, the Lorde Bessire, and many valyaunt Barons and knights. When the Englishe men were come to the place where the french men were encamped, in the which (as Eneas Siluius testifieth) were three hundred peeces of Brasse, beside diuers other small peeces, and subtil engines to the English men unknowne, and nothing suspected, they lighted all on foote, the Erle of Shrewsburie onely except, which because of his age, rode on a little Hackeny, and fought fiercely with the french men, and gat the entrie of their Campe, and by fine force entered into the same. Thys conflict continued in doubtfull iudgement of victorie two long houres: during which fight, the Lords of Montamban and Humadayre, with a great company of french men entered the battayle, and began a newe fielde, and sodainely the Gonners perceyuing the English men to approach neere, discharged their ordinaunce, and slue three hundred persons, nere to the Erle, who perceyuing the imminent ieopardie, and subtle labirynt, in the which he and his people were enclosed and trapped, dispising his awne sauegarde, and desiring the lyfe of his entierly and welbeloued sonne the Lorde Lisle, willed, aduertised, and counsayled him to departe out of the fielde, and to saue himselfe. But when the sonne had answered that it was neyther honest nor naturall for him, to leaue his father in the extreme ieopardie of his lyfe, and that he would taste of that draught, which his father and Parent should assay and beginne: The noble Erle and comfortable Capitaine sayde to him: Oh sonne, sonne, I thy father, which onely hath bene the terroz and scourge to the french people so many yeres, which hath subuerted so many townes, and discomfited so manye of them in open battayle, and marciall conflict, neyther can here die, for the honour of my Countrey, without great laude and perpetuall fame, nor flie or depart without perpetuall shame and continuall infamy. But because this is thy first iourney and enterpryse, neyther thy flyeng shall redounde to thy shame, nor thy death to thy glozie: for as hardie a man wisely flyeth, as a rashe person foolishly abiderth, therefore the flyeng of me shall be the dishonour, not onely of me and my progenie, but also a discomfiture of all my company: thy departure shall saue thy lyfe, and make thee able another tyme, if I be slayne to reuenge my death, and to do honoz to thy pzince, and profue to his realme. But nature so wrought in the sonne, that neyther desire of lyfe, nor thought of securitie, could withdraw or pluck him from his naturall father: he considering the constancie of his childe, and the great daunger that they stood in, comforted his souldiours, cheared his Capytaynes, and valiantly set on his enemies, and slue of them more in number then he had in his company. But his enemies hauing a greater company of men, and more abundaunce of ordinaunce then before had bene sene in a battayle, first shot him through the thighe with a handgonne, and slue his horse, and cowardly kylled hym, lyeng on the ground, whome they neuer durst looke in the face, while he stode on his feete, and with hym there dyed manfully his sonne the Lorde Lisle, his bastard sonne Henry Talbot, and syr Edward Hull, elect to the noble order of the Garter, and. xxx. valyaunt personages of the Englishe nation, and the Lorde Holyns was there taken prisoner with. lx. other. The residue of the Englishe people fled to Burdeaux and other places, whereof in the flight, were slayne, aboue a thousand persons. At this battayle of Chastillon, fought the. xiiij. day of Julij, in this yere ended his lyfe John Lorde Talbot, & of his progenie the first Erle of Shrewsburie, after that he with muche fame, more glozie, and most victorie had for his Prince and Countrey, by the space of. xxxiij. yeres and more, valyauntly made warre, and serued the king, in the partes beyonde the sea, whose corps was left on the ground, and after was found by his friendes, and conueyed to Whitchurch in Shropshyre, where it is intumulate. This man was to the french people a very scourge, and a daylie terroz, in so much that as his person was fearefull and terrible to his aduersaries present: so his name and fame was spitefull and dreadfull to the common people absent, in so much that women in fraunce to feare their yong children, would crie, the Talbot commeth, the Talbot commeth. After this discomfiture, diuers Lordes fled to Burdeaux, but the Erle of Kendall, the Lordes of Montferrant, of Rosayne, and of Bangladas, entered into the Castell of Chastillon, which they by the space of. x. dayes manfully defended, but in conclusion being desperate of all succours rendered the fortreffe, and came safe to Burdeaux. After thys towne was yeilded, the townes of Saint Million, Bybourne and all other, which the Erle of Shrewsbury had conquered, rendered themselves to the french obedience, Burdeaux onely except. The which City being the last refuge, and onely consolation of the Englishe people in Gascoyn, the french king in person with all his puissance strongly besieged and daylie assauted, in the which he more lost then gayed: beside thys, the Englishe men issued out, and courageously fought with their enemies: lykewise did the Citizens, which looking for no fauour at the french kings hande, because of their late commutation agaynst him, manfully defended themselves, and soze noyed and hurt their enemies. But in conclusion both garrisons and the inhabitants oppressed with much penurie, & extreme famine were enforced to render the

Citie vpon reasonable conditions, to them by the French king sent and offered: the effect whereof was that no offence, before time committed or done by any of the Citezens should hereafter be imputed, or layde to the charge of any of them. Also that all Englishe men and Gascons might safely depart into Englande, or to Caleys with all their substance, and that the Lordes Lespar Duras, and xxx. other, should neuer vpon payne of death, be found within any of the french kings dominions, which Lord Lesparre after being taken disguised in Gascoyne, was made shorter by the head. When this composition was agreed and sealed, the Englishe men had their shippes and all things necessary for their iourney to them deliuered, which, when winde and weather serued, were shortly transported into Englande, in the month of October this present yere.

Thus was the Duchy of Aquytaine, which had continued in the English possession from the yere of our Lorde. M. lb. which is .iii. C. and odde yeres, by the maryage of Clynor, daughter and heyre to Wyllyam Duke of Aquytaine, wife to king Henry the seconde, finally reduced, and brought agayne to the french obedience and seruitude. The keeping of which duchy was neyther costly, nor troublesome to the Realme of Englande, but both pleisant and profitable: for by the soueraigne of that country, yong gentlemen learned the experience of warre, & expert men were promoted to many ryche offices, and great liuinges within the same. For within that onelic Duchye, are foure Archebishops, xxiii. Bishops, .xv. Erledoms, two. C. and two Barones, and aboue a Thousande Capytaineshippes and Baylywickes.

Although this great losse chaunced, this yere to the English nacion, yet a greater detryment hapned the same season to the whole flocke of christen people. For Mahomet, called the great Turke, beseged the Citie of Constantynople in Greece, wyth an innumerable number of Turkes, and fifty daies together gaue to it a continuall assault, and on the fourth daye of June, toke it perforce, sleiung man, woman, and chyldren, except the Emperour Paleologus, and diuers other of the bloode Royall, whome he toke prisoners, and after caused them to be beheaded. If I shoulde write the detestable murder of men, the abhominable and cruell slaughter of chyldren, the shamefull rauishment of women and Virgins, which were perpetrate and done by the vnnmercifull Pagans and cruell Turkes, I assure you that your eares would abhorre the hearing, and your eyes would not abyde the readyng, and therfore I passe them ouer.

In this troublous season on the .xiiij. day of October, was the Queene deliuered at Westmyster of a fayre sonne, which was christened and named Edward, and after grew to a goodly and perfite man, as you shall here: whose mother susteyned not a little slander and obloquye of the common people, sayeng that the king was not able to get a childe, and that this was not his sonne, with many slanderous wordes, to the Queenes dishonour, which here neede not to be rehersed. After the birth of this childe, the king highly aduanced his two brethren, on his mothers side. For Edmond he created Erle of Richemond, which was father to king Henry the seuenth, and Jasper he created Erle of Penbroke, which died without issue.

Now when fozen warre and outward battailes were brought to an ende, and small conclusion: domesticall dyscorde, and euill discencion began againe to renewe and aryse, within the Realme of Englande, for when the care of outward hostilitye (which kepte the myndes of the Princes, in the realme occupied, & in exercise) was taken away and banished, desire of sovereignty & ambition of preheminance, sodainely sprang out so farre, that the whole Realme was diuided into two severall factions, and priuat parts. For kyng Henry, descended of the house of Lancastre, claimyng the crowne from king Henry the fourth, his graund father, first aucthor of this diuision: and Rycharde Duke of Yorke, as heire to Lionell, the thirde sonne to kyng Edward the thirde, wresteled for the game, and stroue for the wager. By reason whereof, the Nobles, aswell as the common people, were into parts diuided, to the destruction of manye a man, and to the great ruine and decay of this regyon. For whyle the one parte studied to banquishe and suppress the other, all common wealth was set asyde, and iustice & equitie was cleerely eriled. For the Duke of Yorke, which sore gaped and more thirsted for the superioritie and preheminance, studied, deuysed, and practised all wayes, and meanes, by the which he myght attayne to hys pretended purpose, and long hoped desire. And amongst all imaginations, one seemed most necessarye for his purpose, which yet againe was to stirre and prouoke the malice of all the people, against the Duke of Somerset, who onely ruled the kyng, and ordered all things at hys pleasure and will: Imaginyng, that he beyng made out of the way, hys purpose shoulde shortly come to a good conclusion. Wherefore, to the nobles of the Realme he complayned, & lamented the miserable state and dayly ruine of this noble countrey: noting and affirming, the Duke of Sommer set to be the very roote, & cause of the same, whome he named, and called, an vniust man, a mischeuous person, a tyrannicall gouernour, and a couetous counsaillor: layng also great offences to king Henry, sayng, that he was a man, neyther of wit, nor stomacke, neyther meete to be a king, nor apt to gouerne a common wealth, and therfore it was the dutie of the noble men, and great Princes, not onely to thinke on this weightie matter, but speedely to prouide a remedy, and to set the Realme in an other stay. By which complaints, and perswasions, the Duke of Yorke, so altered the myndes of many persons of highe estate, that they liked not the worlde, as it then waered, nor approued the actes of the king or his counsaile. And because that ambition and auarice was newly entred into their hartes, they studied sodainly to chaunge all things, and tourne the worlde vpsedowne. When the Duke saw mens appetites, and felt well their myndes, he chieflie entertayned two Richardes, and both Neuelles, the one of Salisburie, the other of Werwike beyng Erles, the first the father, the second the sonne. This Erle of Salisburie was second sonne to Raufe Neuell, Erle of Westmerland, whose daughter the Duke of Yorke had married, and the sayde Rycharde was espoused to Lady Alice, the only childe and sole heire of Thomas Montacute Erle of Salisburie, slaine at the siege of Orleans (as before I haue declared) of which woman he engendered Richard, John and George: Rycharde the eldest sonne espoused Anne, the sister and heire of the entire blood to Lorde Henry Beauchampe Erle, and after Duke of Warwike, in whose right and tytle he was created and named Erle of Warwike, and not by his aboue progeny or parentage. This Richard was not only a man of excellent qualities, but also from his youth, by a certaine practise or naturall inclination, to set himselfe forward with wittie and gentle demeanour, to all persons of high and of lowe degree, that among all sortes of people, he obtained great loue, fauour and credence: which things daylie more and more increased, by his abundant liberalitie, and plentifull house keeping, then by his riches, aucthoritie, or high parentage: by reason of which doings, he was in suche fauour and estimation amongst the common people, that they iudged him able to doe all things, and that without him, nothing to be well done. For which causes his aucthoritie shortly so fast increased, that which way he bowed, that way ranne the streame, and what parte he aduanced, that side gat the superiortie.

When the Duke of Yorke had fastened his Chaine, betwene these two strong pillers, he with his friendes, so seriously wrought, and so politiquely handled his businesse, that the Duke of Sommerfet was arrested in the Quenes great Chamber, and sent to the Towre of London, where he without great solempnitie kept a heauie Christmalle: agaynst whome in open Parliament, were layd diuers & heynous articles of high treason, aswell for the losse of Normandie, as for the late mischaunce which happened in Guien. The king at this tyme was sicke at Clarendon, and so conueyed to London, by reason whereof, no finall determination proceeded, in this great & waigh- tie cause, but it was put in suspence, till the next assemble of the high Court of Parliament. During which tyme the king either of his awne minde, or by the Quenes procurement, caused the Duke of Sommerfet, to be set at libertie: by which doyng, grewe great enuy and displeasure, betwene the king and diuers of his Lordes, and in especiall, betwene the Duke of Yorke and the kinges linage. And to aggravate more the malice newe begon, the Queene, which then ruled the rois, and bare the whole rule, caused the Duke of Sommerfet to be preferred to the Captainship of Calice, wherewith, not onely the Commons, but also many of the Nobilitie, were greatly grieued and offended, sayng: that he had lost Normandie, and so would he doe Calice. The Duke of Yorke and his adherentes perceiuyng, that neyther exhortacion serued, nor accusament preuayled agaynst the Duke of Sommerfet, determined to reuenge their quarrell, and obteyne their purpose, by open warre and Marciall aduenture, and no lenger to slepe in so waigh- tie a businesse. So he beyng in the Marches of Wales, associate with his speciall friendes, the Erles of Sarisbury, and Warwike, the Lorde Cobham, and other, assembled an army, and gathered a great power, and like warlike persons, marched toward London. The Londoners, heeryng of so great a multitude, commyng toward the Citie, were greatly astonied and much abashed: for euery person considered his awne part, that eyther with holdyng with the one side, or beyng contrariant to the other, or medlyng with no part, he should incurre indignacion or displeasure. The king beyng credibly enformed, of the great armie commyng toward him, assembled an host, intendyng to mete with the Duke in the North part, because he had to many friendes aboute the Citie of London, and for that cause with great speede and small lucke, he beyng accompanied with the Dukes of Sommerfet and Buckingham, the Erles of Stafford, Northumberland, and Wilshire, with the Lorde Clifford, and diuers other Barons, departed out of Westminster, the .xx. day of May, toward the towne of Saint Albones: of whose doynges the Duke of Yorke beyng aduertised by his espials, with all his power coasted the Countreys, and came to the same towne, the third day next ensuyng. The king heeryng of their approachyng, sent to him messengers, straightly chargyng and commaundyng him, as an obedient subiect, to kepe the peace, and not as an enemy to his naturall Countreie, to murder and slea his awne Countrymen and proper Nation. While king Henry, more desyrus of peace than of warre, was sendyng forth his Orators, at the one ende of the towne: the Erle of Warwike with the Marchemen, entered at the other ende of the towne, and fiercely set on the kinges forward, and them shortly discomfited. Then came the Duke of Sommerfet, and all the other Lordes with the kinges power, which fought a sore and cruell battaile, in the which many a tall man lost his life: but the Duke of Yorke sent euer fresh men, to succor the werie, and put new men in places of the hurt persons, by which onely pollicie, the kinges armie was ouerthrowne and dispersed, and all the Chieftaynes of the fielde almost slaine and brought to confusion. For there dyed vnder the signe of the Castel, Edmond Duke of Sommerfet, who long before was warned to eschew all Castelles, and besyde him, lay Henry the second Erle of Northumberlande, Humfrey Erle of Stafford, sonne to the Duke of Buckingham, John Lord Clifford, and .viii. thousand men and more. Humfrey Duke of Buckingham beyng wounded, and James Butler Erle of Wilshire and Ormond, seyng fortunes lowzyng chaunce, left the king post alone, and with a great number fled away. This was the ende of the first battaile at Saint Albones, which was fought on the Thursday before the feast of Pentecost, beyng the .xiiij. day of May. In this .xxxiiij. yere of the kinges reigne, the bodies of the noble men were buried in the Monasterye, and the meane people in other places. This Edmond Duke of Sommerfet left behinde him thre sonnes, Henry, Edmond, and John, which to the extremitie of death, tooke part with the line of King Henry.

After this victorie obteyned by the Duke of Yorke and his companions, he remembred that he had oftentimes declared and published abroad, the on- ly cause of his warre to be, for the aduancement of the publike wealth, and to set the realme in a more commodious estate, and a better condicion. Where- fore, he vsyng all lenitie, mercie, and bounteousnesse, would not once touch or apprehende the body of King Henry, whome he might both haue slaine, and utterly destroyed, considering that he had him in his warde and gouernance. But with great honour and due reuerence conueyed him to London, and so to Westminster, to the which place was sommoned and appoynted a great assemble of the thre estates, commonly called a Parliament, which beganne the .iiij. day of July, in the which session, the Duke of Gloucester was open- ly declared a true Prince, both to the king and the realme. Besyde this it was enacted, that no person should eyther iudge or reporte, any poynt of vntruth, of the Duke of Yorke, the Erles of Sarisbury, and Warwike, for commyng in warlike maner agaynst the king at Saint Albones, consideryng that their attempt and enterpryce, was onely to see the kinges person in safegarde and sure keepyng, and to put and aliene from him, the publike oppressors of the common wealth: by whose misgouernance, his life might be in hazard, and his aucthoritie hang in a very small threed. In which Parliament also the

Duke of Yorke was made Protector of the Realme, and the Erle of Sarisbury was appoynted to be Chaunceloz, & had the great Seale to him deliuered: and the Erle of Warwike was elected to the office of the Capteyne of Calice, and territories of the same. As this device was polittiquely inuented and so was the sequele therof to the first aucthoz, both honourable and profitable, if fortunes ship had sayled all one way. For by this practice, the rule and regiment of the whole realme, consisted onely in the heades and orders of the Duke and the Chaunceloz, and all the warlike affayres and businesse, rested principally in the Erle of Warwike, and so among them it was agreed that king Henry should stil reigne, in name & dignity, but neyther in dede, nor in aucthoritie: not myndyng eyther to depose or destroy the sayde king, least they might sodainely prouoke and stirre the fury and yre of the common people against them: which for his holinesse of life, and abundant clemencie, was of the simple sort much fauoured, and highly esteemed. After which aucthoritie geuen, these thre persons ruled the realme, and did all thinges after their awne discrecions (which without battail or manslaughter, might haue easely depriued the sayde king both of life and land.) And first they amoued from the priue counsaile, all such persons as the King loued, or the Queene fauored, puttyng in their places men of their sect and confederacie, & chaunging officers throughtout the realme at their will and disposition: so that the olde spoken prouerbe here tooke place: New Lordes, newe lawes: such lippes, such lettuce. And yet in all their rule, I finde no mencion made of differryng iustice, or of their pollyng, or their bybery, as was openly proued by suche as gouerned before their time: sayyng that they toke out of y<sup>e</sup> Sanctuary of Westminster, John Holland Duke of Excester, being repugnant to the order taken and concluded, in the last Parliament, and conueyed him to Pomfret Castell. Which takyng out, was accoumpted an execrable and a dampnable offence, of diuerse of the spiritualtie, and especially of the Abbot of Westminster, and his Monkes, and this is the most spot that was (as I could read) euer most to be cast in the Dukes fame, duryng his Protectorshippe, or of his counsaile.

But that benemous woyme, that dreadfull Dragon, called disdain of superiozitie, which hath consumed the blood of so many noble Princes, and destroyed the linage of so many gouernozs, in all Realmes and kingdomes, aswell Pagan as Christian, could not abstaine from incensyng the hartes of Lorde Henry Beauford, newly come to the Duchie of Sommerset, by the death of Duke Edmond his father, which at the battaile of Saint Albons, (as you haue hearde before reherfed) lost his life, and of Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, whose sonne and heyre named Humfrey, Erle of Stafforde, tasted the same cup, at the fozenamed conflict, and of other Lordes and men of authoritie, fauouryng and solowyng the part of King Henry, whiche not onely bewayled and had compassion of the vnshure condicion, and waueryng estate of hys rule and Lordshippe, perceiuyng openly, wherunto the cloaked gentlenesse, and subornate fashon of the Duke of Yorke tended and crept bype: But also thought it necessarye and conuenient, to puruey for a remedy, or the mischiese happened. Wherefore with open mouthes and fierce courages, they came to Quene Margarett, informing her that it was not honozable, but a reproche and infamy to the king, to haue one to be a Protector and gouernoz of him and his realme, as who wouide say: that he was eyther a childe, which had neede of a Roice to feede him with pappe, or an innocent creature, which must be ruled by a Tutor, after teyning her father, that the Duke of Yorke onely intent was, vnder the colour of his Protectorship, sodainely to destroy and depose the king, when he least thought of it, and therefore willed her in so quick a mischiese, to prouide a hastie remedie, if she loued the safegarde of her husbände, or the tuition of her selfe. The Quene hauing a wit, more then the common sort of women haue, and considering the estate of her husband, the condition of her selfe, and the perill of her onely sonne, thought it necessarye to plucke the sworde of aucthoritie out of their handes, which vnder colour of rulyng vnder others, desired to be gouernozs, and superioz themselves. Wherefore, a great counsaile was called at Grenewich, where the Duke of Yorke was discharged of his Protectorship, & the Erle of Sarisbury also, was dismissed of his office: which malicious mutacion among the Nobilitie, caused sodaine alteracions and sedicious commocions to spring and aryse in the commonaltie, and in especiall within the Citie of London.

For a yong Marchaunt, which before tyme had bene in diuers Cityes, within the Countrie of Italy, and there prohibited by the Magistrates and rulers, to vse or weare any weapon, eyther inuasyue or defensiu, chalenged an Italian in Chepeside, for wearing of a dagger, confutyng him with the lawes of his abone Countrey, which like a colerick knaue and presumptuous person, so disdainefully and with suche tauntes and checkes answered the Marchaunt, that he not wylling to suffer so open a reproche, in so publique a streete, and that of so proude a villeyne, toke by force from him his dagger, and with the same a little cut his crowne, and cracked his pate. This Italian in great haste, complayned to the Mayre of this offence, which at the next Courte, holden at the Cuyldhall, by the consent of the whole senate, sent for the offender, and declaryng to him his cryme, commaunded him to warde, whereof diuers other light Marchauntes within the Citie, soze abhorring the Italian nation, for licking the fat from their beardes, and taking from them their accustomed lyuing, by reason that the sayde straungers imported and transported into and out of this realme, all such marchandises, commodities, and necessaries, as the Englishe men onely were accustomed to doe, assembled together in great plumpes, and by force compelled the Mayoz to deliuer the prisoner out of Newegate: and yet this multitude, with thys doyng nothing faciate nor appeased, like madde persons and frantique foles, ranne to the seuerall houses of dyuers Venecians, Lucases, and Florentines, and them spoyled, robbed and rifled, without reason or measure. The Mayre perceiuyng this great enozmitie, assembled a great number of substantiall & graue Citezens, which not without great bloodshed, & mayming of sundrie persons, finally appealed their rage, and caused the people to depart to their houses. The beginner of this commocion, and sodaine bypzoze, eyther perswaded by his friendes or fearing his chaunce, which for his first fact might sodainely ensue, departed to Westminster, and there registred himselfe as a sanctuary man. The Quene which ruled all things, hearing of this great riote and vnlawfull misdemeanour, sent the Dukes of Excester and Buckyngham, accompanied with many other noble men to London, with a commission of oyer and determiner, for the punishment of thys outrageous offence, and sedicious crime. When the Maior of the Citie, the two Dukes, and the two chiefe Justices, were set in Gylldhall for the performance of their commission, and began to call the empanels for the enquire, as the use and order is, diuers light witted, and lesse brayned persons of the citie, priuely armed them, and by the ringing of Bow bell, thought to assemble together a great multitude of their minde and opinion, and so by force and might to take from the keepers all such prisoners, as were before apprehended, for the late committed robbery and riot, as they were goyng to their triall or arreignment. But thys great tumult and sodaine furie was by discrete and sage Citezens a little and little appeased, and finally quenched, but in the meane season, the Dukes and other commissioners, beyng vntruly aduertised, that they were in ieopardie of their lyfes, sodaynely departed from the Gylldhall, and left their inquire for that day. The Maior on the next day perceyuing how the grudge rose, called a common counsaile, where of the number was, one hundred, foure scoze and odde persons, and by auctoritie of the same, ordeyned that all Wardeyns of misteries should assemble their felowship in their particuler Hales, where they should exhort them to the obseruation of the kings peace, and keeping of good order within the Citie: and if they espied any man, eyther prone or redie to rayse a rumour or desirous of the deliuerance of such as were accused, and in captiue custody, that their names should be secretly wozitten, and couertly deliuered to the Lorde Maior: which pollitique doyng, finally ended the outrageous doing of the insolent people, after which appeasing the commissioners returned to the Gylldhall, where many of the robbers were attainted, and after condignely put to execution, beside diuers great fynes and raunsomes payde, which were set vpon many Marchaunts, for winking at these doings, or assenting to the same.

The french nacion, hearyng of this domesticall diuision, and ciuill dissension, within the realme of Englande, much desiryng to be reuenged of old displeasures, and great damages, which they had so many yeres borne, and sustayned by the englishe people, appointed two Hauies to inuade and destroy the townes and portes, adioyning to the riuage of the Sea. The Captayne of the one armye was William Lorde Bomiers, and of the other, sir Piers Bressy, a great ruler in Normandy. These two Captaynes, when oportunitie of wether serued, set by their sayles at the mouth of Sayn, & there secured themselves, the one Westward, & the other Eastward, which was sir Peter de Bressy. This lusty captayne sailyng al the coast of Suffer, and Kent, durst not once take lande, till he arriued in the dovnnes, and there hauing by a certayne espial perfite notice, that the towne of Sandwich was neyther peopled, nor fortified, because that a litle before, the chiefe rulers of the towne, were fromthence departed, for to auoyde the pestilenciall plague, which soze there infected, and slew the people, entred the haven, spoyled the towne, and after such poore stufte as he there founde, rifled and taken, he fearing an assemble of the countrey, shortly returned. The Lorde Bomiers likewise took his course Westwarde, and by night bent certayne houses in Foulney, and with a litle pillage retired into Brittain. These two aduentures and fortunate chaunces, which to them in comparison of their great expences, in their ioyneys were scant worth one poore mite, or single farthing: The French writers delate, setfoorth, and paint with penne, as though they had gotten Crelus riches, and Alexanders kingdoms: forgetting how many hundred thousande pounds they had lost in few yeres before preceding, as to all men, being indifferent readers of this History, playnely appereth. But verely some breade is better to the hungrye persone, then no breade, and a small gayne of him, which desireth recouery, is a great pleasure, and therefore the French aucthors make of a litle, much, and yet theit much, (all things considered) is in effect nothing at all.

The Scottes also not degenerating from their olde mutabilitie, nor altering their auncient conditions, from their accustomed and vsuall vntruth, entered into Northumberland, king James the second, then beyng there in person, and burned small houses, & little cotages: but in the very middes of their great enterpryse, they hearing of the Duke of Yorke, marching towarde them with a great armie, with much paine, and no gaine in all haste reuerted to their Countrey. Let vs passe ouer for a time all outward inuasions, and returne to our owne domesticall debate and daylie discorde.

First not forgetting, that whyle foreyn enimies inuaded the outwarde partes, and extreme confines of thys troublous realme, a great conflict was attempted betweene the Lorde Egremond, and the sonnes of the Erles of Salisburie: in the which fray, many persons were slayne, and a great number hurt. The Lorde Egremond in thys great tumult could not escape, but by force was taken and brought before the kinges counsaile, and there the king and the Quene to shew themselves to all persons indifferent, adiudged him to pay to the Erle of Salisburie a great summe of money, and for his heynous offence, done agaynst the kinges lawes, he was committed to the Bayle of Newgate, within the citie of London, out of the which prison, by helpe of his fautozs, he secretly escaped, and sodainely departed, to the great beration of the Shziefes of London, at the time being.

Quene Margaret whose breath ruled, and whose word was obeyed aboue the king and his counsaile, wythin the realme of Englande, entending the destruction of the Duke of Yorke and his friends, which deuise shee thought not meete to be practised neere to the Citie of London, because she well perceyued the Duke of Yorke to be had in moze estimation among the Citezens and commonaltie, then the king her husband, or her atone person: caused the king to make a progresse into Watwikesshire, for hys health and recreation, and so with Hawking and hunting, came to the Citie of Couentre, where were diuers wayes studied priuely, to bring the Queene to her hartes ease, and long desired purpose: which was the death and destruction of the Duke of Yorke, the Erles of Salisburie and Warwick. And for the furniture of thys matter, all these three noble men were sent for to Couentre by the kings letters vnder his priuic seale, to which place the foresayde Lordes, suspecting no treason, nor putting diffidence in any creature, obediently resorted, but in the Serpent lurking vnder the grasse, and vnder sugred speche, was hid pestiferous poyson, so that if these noble men admonished by their friends, had not sodaynely departed, they lyues had bene shortned, but by secret admonicion of their good wyllers (to whom no earthly treasure is comparable) they auoyded this net, and narrowly escaped the snare, whereupon for the securitie and tuition of their lyues, the Duke of Yorke departed to Wygmore in the Marches of Wales, the Erle of Salisburie resorted to his tayne Castell of Widdelham in the Northcountrie, and the Erle of Warwike sayled to the towne of Caleys. Although the bodie of these noble personages were by this seditious and fraudulent meanes a sunder separated as ye haue heard: yet their hartes were knit and coupled in one, neuer forgettyng, but daylie studyng, both howe to be reuenged of the olde dispites and malicious attempts, agaynst them committed and imagined, and also howe to compasse their purposes, and to get the superiortie and ouer hand aboue their euill wyllers, and apparaunt enemies: for which causes their letters neuer ceased, their messengers neuer slept, nor their purses were at no time shut, what for entertayning of olde friends, and obtayning of newe confederates, till king Henry and his alyes were driuen away, and expelled clerely out of this realme, as after shall appere.

Because you haue bene long troubled with reding of diuers diuisions and seditions w<sup>ch</sup> in the realme, among the temporaltie, I will now a little digresse from my continued purpose, to declare to you an ouerthwart iudgement geuen among the fathers of the spiritualltie agaynst Reynolde Perocke, then Bishop of Chichester. This man somewhat learned, but better stomacked, began to moue questions, not priuately, but openly in the Uniuersities, concerning the Annates, Peterpence, & other iurisdiccions and authorities, apperteyning to the Sea of Rome, and not onely put forth the questions, but declared his minde and opinion in the same: wherefore he was for this cause abiured at Paules Crosse, and all his bookes bzent, and he himselfe kept in his awne house, durynge his naturall lyfe. Some say that his opinion was that spirituall persons by Gods law, ought to haue no temporall possessions. Other write, that he sayd, that personall tythes were not due by Gods lawe: But whatsoener the cause was, in suche sorte as before I haue declared, he was bsd. Thus much Hall.

King Henry and his adherentes, perceiuyng that the Duke of Yorke lay still, and made no open apparaunce of assemble or commocion, returned to London, and there called a great counsaile, openly declaring how the french king perceiuyng the realme of England bereed, and troubled with ciuile disencion, and mutuall discord, was not afeard to sende his Admiralles on the coastes of Kent, and Deuonshire, and there to spoyle towones, burne houses, and murder the Englishe people: which cause also animated the Scottes to make Rodes and incursions, into the confines and Marches of the realme, to the great losse and detriment of the kinges liege people: which two Nations were set continually to grieue and bere this his realme of Englande, till they perceyued a perfite concorde, and an vnfayned amitie to be concluded and knit together, betwene him and his consanguinitie, and the other sort of the contrary part and confederacie. And to the entent that he would be the chiefe author of peare, and principall styrer of this vertuous concorde, he promised so gently to entertaine the Duke of Yorke, and his fauozers, that all olde grudges, beyng not onely inwardly forgotten, but also outwardly forgiven, should be the cause of perpetuall loue, betwene them & their friendes: of which concorde should ensue familiaritie among the Lordes, and concorde among the Commons, which to all vtter enemies should be an inwarde grudge,

grudge, and to this realme a great glozie and profite. This deuise was of all men present well taken and adiudged, both honourable to the king, and profitable to his realme. Whereupon diuers graue and sad persons were sent to the Duke of Yorke, and al other the great estates of the realme, which sence the battaile of Saint Albones neuer met, came, nor commoned together, commaundyng them for reasonable causes, and great considerations, to resort vnto the kinges Palayce, without delay. At this commaundement came to London Richard Duke of Yorke, and Richard Erle of Sarisburie, accompanied with a great number of meniall seruauntes, and friendes, least peradventure they for lacke of ayde, might haue bene betrapped, or they had knowlege, or were warned. After them came from Calice to London, the Erle of Warwike, whose seruitures were apparailled in red Cotes, embzauered with white ragged staues. These three Lordes were lodged within the Citie: the Duke, at Baynardes Castell, the Erle of Sarisbury at the Herber, and the Erle of warwike at his place besyde the Gray friers. About the same season, with no lesse companie of men, came to the Citie, the yong Duke of Sommerset, the Erle of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, whose fathers were slain at S. Albons: and after them resorted the Dukes of Brester and Buckingham, the Lorde Egremond, and most of all the nobilitie of this realme. The Duke of Yorke and his mates were lodged without the Citie, and the Duke of Sommerset and all his friendes, soiourned without Temple barre, Holborne, and other places of the Suburges: as who sayde, that as the Jewes disdaind the company of the Samaritans, so the Lancastrians abhorred the familiaritie of the Yorkishe linage. After the coming of these Lordes to the Citie, the king, the Quene, with all their familie shortly folowed, & were lodged in the Bishoppes Palayce of London. These Lordes had such great companies attendyng on them (for one had fine hundreth, other had fine hundreth, and diuers foure hundreth persons in a band) that continuall watch was kept by the Maior and senate of London, aswell by day as by nyght, for the preseruacion of the peare, and continuance of good order. The Lordes which lodged within the Citie, kept a dayly countaile at the black friers, within the Citie. The other part soiourning without the walles, assembled likewise in the Chapter house of Westminster. Thus euery part both studyed his awne profite and aduancement, and also howe to reuenge thinges done to them, by their foes and aduersaryes. But the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and other vertuous prelates, so exhorted, apolyed, and perswaded both the parties (although a great while they were neyther heard, nor regarded) that in conclusion, they brought them to a communication, where after long altercation, aswell of olde iniuries, and newe displeasures, by the one faction, agaynst the other comitted, the feare of outward hostilitie, and frozen inuasion so mollesyed their indurate hartes, that they outwardly promisyng to forget all olde rancors, and auuncient displeasures, sealed and signed writynges, the one euer after to be friend to the other, and altogether to be obedient to the king, and fauozers to his friendes, and enemies to his enemies. This concorde was so ioyfull to the superiours, and so embraced of the common people (who euer beare the burthen when Princes be at controuersy) that for the open apparaunce, and demonstracion of this godly conroz, publike Processions were appoynted, to be solempnly celebrate celebrate within the Church of Saint Paule, in the Citie of London, on the day of the Conception of our Ladie, in the Moneth of Marche. At which solempne feast, the king in habite royall hauyng his Diademe on his heade, kept his estate in Procession, before whome went hande in hande, the Duke of Sommerfet, the Erle of Sarisburie, the Duke of Excester and the Erle of Warwike, and so one of the one faction, and another of the other sect, and behinde the king the Duke of Yorke led the Queene, with great familiaritie to all mens sightes: But wo worth dissimulacion, and false flattering countenance: eye on double entendement, and cloked adulation, which hath bene the common seruitures in all Palaces, both Imperiall, and Regall, and by their onely pestiferous venime, and secrete malice, hath bene the destruction of many a noble man, and the confusion of a great number of true meanyng and faythfull persons. But the wise man, whiche sayth: wo to the that hast a double heart, meant, that dissimulacion once espyed, should be the arrowe wherewith the dissembler should be wounded. As by this cloked Pageant, and disseimbling Procession, hereafter shall plainly be declared. For their bodies were ioyned by hande in hand, whose heartes were farre asunder: their mouthes louingly smyled, whose courages were enflamed with malice: their wordes were swete as suger, and their thoughtes were all enuened: but all these dissimulyng persons, tasted the vessell of wo, as the wise man sayd: and fewe or none of this companie were vnblotted, or vnder destroyed by this dolorous drinke of dissimulacion. But this cancard worne and pestiferous Cocatrice, not onely at this tyme reigned in England, but also did much harme in the Court of France: for John Duke of Blainson, which before had bene prisoner, and well enterteyned in the realme of England, and after Captain generall of the warres in France against the Englishe men, highly fauoured, and of great estimation in the Frenche kinges house, was by such as he most trusted, and bled most familiaritie withall, and whom he had greatly promoted, and highly exalted, accused of high treason, as enemye to his king, and traytor to his Countrey, allegyng that he long before that tyme had conspired with the Englishe men, to cause them once againe to recouer the Duchie of Normandie: whereupon by the order of the lawe, he there suffered death very vniustly, as diuers Authours affirme, whereof one sayth: that kinges seekyng treason, shall finde lande, and the deniall of a princes desyre, was the inuented destruction of the innocent Fa-both. Well let vs now leaue the cloked collusion, that remayned in France, and retorne to the open dissimulacion, which now appered in England.

As fier being enclosed in a straight place, will by force vtter his flame, and as the course of water astricted and letted, will flow and burst out in continuance of tyme: so this cancard Crocodile, and subtile serpent, could not long lurke in malicious heartes, but in conclusion she must (acordyng to her nature appere and shewe her selfe. For after this apparant concord (acordyng to the very nature of dissimulacion) diuerse noble men of birth, but not stable of woorde, puttyng from them honour, truth, and honestie, forgot their oth, and brake their promise, and aduanced forth the Banner of displeasure, and the flagge of malice. So a man may see, that such persons regard neyther their awne peculiar profite, nor the publique wealth of their natie Countrey, nor yet passe of an othe, or promise breakyng, to whome dis-

corde is pleasant, and dissencion is dilectable. For not long after this dissimulacion, a certeine fray, eyther by chaunce, or of a thing prepered, was made vpon a yoman of the Erles of Warwike, by a seruiture of the kings, in the which the Assaylant was sore hurte, but the Erles man fled. The kings mayniall seruantes, seing their fellow hurt, and the offendor escaped, assembled in great number, and watched the Erle, returyng from the Cou- saile toward his Barge, and sodainly set on him the yomen with swordes, and the Blacke garde with spittes, and fyre forkes. After long fight and many of the Erles men maymed and wounded, by helpe of his friendes, he toke a Wherry, and so escaped to London: whome the Queene incontinent commaunded to be apprehended, and as a captiue and prisoner, to be sent to the Tower of London, where (if he had bene then taken) he had shortly ended his dayes. By this vnhappy fray, and sodaine chaunce of malice, there arose such dayly and terryble warre, that euery man was in trouble, and no person was in quiet. For after this displeasure done to the Erle, and the Queenes good munde toward him, by his secrete friendes priuily reueled, he with all diligence, tooke his iourney to Warwike, and after into Yorke shire, where he found the Duke of Yorke, and the Erle of Salisbury, declaring to them the assault of the kings seruantes, and the pretended purpose of the fraudulent Queene. After which complaint made, he fearyng least by long absence, he might be deposed or defrauded of his Captainship of Calice, wyth great speede embarked himselfe, and sayled thither, dayly expectyng and looking, what waye the Duke of Yorke would take, for atchieuyng his long intended purpose. After whose departure, the Duke of Yorke, and the Erle of Salisbury, somewhat styred and moued with this double dealyng, began to grudge and murmure: assyrmynge that in the Queene rested nothing but fraude and feminine malice, which rulyng the king at her pleasure and will, studeyed nothing so much, as the destruction of the nobilitie, and peeres of the realme. After long consultation had, it was agreed, that the Erle with a warlike company, should march toward the king, & complaine both to him of the manifest iniury done to his sonne, and also of the vnkinde breache of the sworne amitie and late agreement, in which sute, if he did preuaile, he then should not omit the occasion to him geuen, in reuengyng the displeasures to him done, by the Queene and her sinister Counsaylozs, which euill and vngodly ordered the subiectes of the whole Realme.

After this deuise made and concluded, the Erle of Salisburie remoued from Hiddelham castell, accompanied with foure or fiue thousand men, and toke his way through Lancashire, and Shropshire, toward London. In the meane season the Queene, which was assisted and ruled, by the Dukes of Sommerfet and Buckingham, hauing the vigilant eie and circumspect braine, of a pollytique gouernor: imagyned that the Erle of Warwike had kindled this fire, and begun this tumult, to the entent (acording to his pretended purpose) to set the Duke of Yorke in the siege royall, and high throne of the realme: For which causes, she beyng a woman of no small wit, nor litle pollecie, conceiuyng in her opinion, that it was no boote to make any farther concord or league with her aduersaries, and hearyng of the Erle of Salisburies setting forward, wyth a company of armed men and archers: assembled together a great counsaile, to prouide a remedie, for that imminent mischiefe, and celebrate within the Church of Saint Paule, in the Citie of London, on the day of the Conception of our Ladie, in the Moneth of Marche. At which solempne feast, the king in habite royall haupng his Diademe on his heade, kept his estate in procession, before whome went hande in hande, the Duke of Sommerfet, the Erle of Sarisburie, the Duke of Excester and the Erle of Warwike, and so one of the one faction, and another of the other sect, and behinde the king the Duke of Yorke led the Queene, with great familiaritie to all mens sightes: But wo worthy dissimulacion, and false flattering countenance: eye on double entendement, and cloked adulation, which hath bene the common seruitures in all Palaces, both Imperiall, and Regall, and by their onely pestiferous benime, and secrete malice, hath bene the destruction of many a noble man, and the confusion of a great number of true meanyng and faythfull persons. But the wise man, whiche sayth: wo to the that hast a double heart, meant, that dissimulacion once espyed, should be the arrowe wherewith the dissembler should be wounded. As by this cloked Pageant, and dissemblyng procession, hereafter shall plainly be declared. For their bodies were ioyned by hande in hand, whose heartes were farre asunder: their mouthes louingly synled, whose courages were enflamed with malice: their wordes were swete as suger, and their thoughtes were all enuened: but all these dissimulynge persons, tasted the bestell of wo, as the wise man sayd: and fewe or none of this companie were vnblotted, or vn-destroyed by this dolorous drinke of dissimulacion. But this cancard worne and pestiferous Cocatrice, not onely at this tyme reigned in England, but also did much harme in the Court of Fraunce: for John Duke of Blaunfon, which before had bene prisoner, and well enterteined in the realme of England, and after Captain generall of the warres in Fraunce against the Engliche men, highly fauoured, and of great estimacion in the Frenche kinges house, was by such as he most trusted, and bled most familiaritie withall, and whom he had greatly promoted, and highly exalted, accused of hightreason, as enemie to his king, and traytor to his Countrie, allegyng that he long before that tyme had conspired with the Engliche men, to cause them once againe to recouer the Duchie of Normandie: wherebpon by the order of the lawe, he there suffered death very vniustly, as diuers Authours affirme, whereof one sayth: that kinges seeking treason, shall finde lande, and the deniall of a princes desyre, was the inuented destruction of the innocēt Paboth. Well let vs now leaue the cloked collusion, that remayned in Fraunce, and returne to the open dissimulacion, which now appered in England.

As fier being enclosed in a straight place, will by force vtter his flame, and as the course of water astricted and letted, will flow and burst out in continuance of tyme: so this cancard Crocodile, and subtile serpent, could not long lurke in malicious heartes, but in conclusion she must (accoording to her nature appere and shewe her selfe. For after this apparant concord (accoording to the very nature of dissimulacion) diuerse noble men of birth, but not stable of worde, puttyng from them honour, truth, and honestie, forgat their oth, and brake their promise, and aduanced forth the Banner of displeasure, and the flagge of malice. So a man may see, that such persons regard neyther their awone peculiar profite, nor the publique wealth of their native Countrie, nor yet passe of an othe, or promise breakyng, to whome dis-

corde is pleasant, and dissencion is dilectable. For not long after this dissimulacion, a certeine fray, eyther by chaunce, or of a thing pzepered, was made vpon a yoman of the Erles of Warwike, by a seruiture of the kings, in the which the Assaylant was sore hurte, but the Erles man fled. The kings meynall seruantes, seing their fellow hurt, and the offendor escaped, assembled in great number, and watched the Erle, returnyng from the Cou- saile towarde his Barge, and sodainly set on him the yomen with swordes, and the Blakke garde with spittes, and fyre forkes. After long fight and many of the Erles men maymed and wounded, by helpe of his friendes, he toke a Whirry, and so escaped to London: whome the Queene incontinent commaunded to be apprehended, and as a captiue and prisoner, to be sent to the Tower of London, where (if he had bene then taken) he had shortly ended his dayes. By this vnhappy fray, and sodaine chaunce of malice, there arose such dayly and terryble warre, that euery man was in trouble, and no person was in quiet. For after this displeasure done to the Erle, and the Queenes good munde toward him, by his secrete friendes priuily reueled, he with all diligence, tooke his iourney to Warwike, and after into Yorke shire, where he found the Duke of Yorke, and the Erle of Salisbury, declaring to them the assaile of the kings seruantes, and the pzetensed purpose of the fraudulent Queene. After which complaint made, he fearyng least by long absence, he might be deposed or defrauded of his Captainship of Calice, wyth great speede embarked himselfe, and sayled thither, dayly expectyng and looking, what waye the Duke of Yorke would take, for atchieuyng his long intended purpose. After whose departure, the Duke of Yorke, and the Erle of Salisbury, somewhat styred and moued with this double dealyng, began to grudge and murmure: assyrmynge that in the Queene rested nothing but fraude and feminine malice, which rulyng the king at her pleasure and will, studeyed nothing so much, as the destruction of the nobilitie, and peeres of the realme. After long consultacion had, it was agreed, that the Erle with a warlike company, should march toward the king, & complaine both to him of the manifest iniury done to his sonne, and also of the vnkinde breache of the sworne amitie and late agreement, in which sute, if he did preuaile, he then should not omit the occasion to him geuen, in reuengyng the displeasures to him done, by the Queene and her sinister Counsaylors, which euill and vngodly ordered the subiectes of the whole Realme.

After this deuise made and concluded, the Erle of Salisburie remoued from Hiddelham castell, accompanied with foure or five thousand men, and toke his way through Lancashire, and Shropshire, towarde London. In the meane season the Queene, which was assisted and ruled, by the Dukes of Sommerfet and Buckingham, hauing the vigilant eie and circumspect braine, of a pollytique gouernor: imagyned that the Erle of Warwike had kindled this fire, and begun this tumult, to the entent (accoording to his pzetensed purpose) to set the Duke of Yorke in the siege royall, and high thzone of the realme: For which causes, she beyng a woman of no small wit, nor litle pollecie, conceiuyng in her opinion, that it was no boote to make any farther concord or league with her aduersaries, and hearyng of the Erle of Salisburies setting forward, wyth a company of armed men and archers: assembled together a great counsaile, to prouide a remedie, for that imminent mischiefe, and

(as in a multitude often times it happeneth), so many heades, so many wilts: so dyuers were in opinion, that neyther people nor weapon should be stirred, till the Erle approached: doubting whether he came to demaunde warre or peace, or to aske iustice, and to refozme wrong. Other, otherwise thought, and were of a contrary opinion, making the foundation of their argument, that the rayeing of pryces, and assemble of Souldiours by him, could signifie no peace, nor treatise of con corde: except a man should saye, that intreating for fauour with naked sworde in hande, were an humble submission and a meeke request: which onely consideration, moued them to say, that as force with force, ought to be repelled, so he with a great power, or he came into the middest of the realme, should of necessitie be encountered and (if fortune would serue) utterly destroyed. This sentence toke place, and without delay, Syr James Twichet Lorde Wodeley, because his seignorie and power lay in those partes, where the Erle should passe, was appointed to meete with him, and to geue him battayle, if he sawe cause or place conuenient, and the Queene followed after. The Lorde Wodeley, according to his commission, assembled aboute ten thousand men, and knowyng by his Espials, which way the Erle kept, approached neere to him on a faire plaine, called Blowe heath, within a myle of the towne of Drayton, in the countye of Salope, commonly called Shropshire. The Erle perceyuing by the liuerie of the Souldiours, that he was circumvented and likely to be trapped by the Queenes power, determined rather there to abide the aduenture with fame and honoz, then farther to flie, with losse and reproche: and so encamped himselfe all the night, on the side of a little brooke, not very brode, but somewhat deepe. In the moznyng early, beyng the day of Saint Tecla, he caused his Souldiours to shoote their flightes, toward the Lorde Wodeleys company, which lay on the other syde of the sayd water, and then he and all his company made a signe of retraite. The Lord Wodeley, remembryng not onely the trust that he was put in, but also the Queenes terrible commaundement, (which was to bring to her presence the Erle of Salisbury, quicke or deade) blew by his trumpet, and did set forth his batward, and sodainly passed the water. The Erle of Salisbury which knewe the sleightes and pollicies of warlike affayres, sodainly returned, and shortly encountered with the Lorde Wodeley and his chiefe Captaynes, or the residue of his armie coulde passe the water. The fight was soze and dreadfull. The Erle desiryng the sayuyng of his lyfe, and his aduersaries couetyng his destruction, fought soze for the obteinyng of their purpose, but in conclusion, the Erles army, as men desperate of ayde and succoz, so egerly fought, that they slue the Lorde Wodeley, and all his Captaynes, and discomfited all the remnant of his people. In this battaile were slaine .xxiiij. hundreth persons, but the greatest plague lighted on the Cheshire men, because one halfe of the shire, was on the one part, and the other on the other part, of the which number were sir Thomas Dutton, sir John Dunne, & sir Hugh Wenables. But the Erles two sonnes, the one called sir John Neuell, and the other sir Thomas, were soze wounded, which soberly iourneyng into the North Countrey, thynkyng there to repose themselves, were in their iorney apprehended by the Queenes friends, and conueyed to Chester: but their keepers deliuered them shortly, or else the Marche men had destroyed the Gayles. Such fauour had the Commons of

Wales,

Wales, to the Duke of Yorke's band and his affinitie, that they could suffer no wrong to be done, nor euill worde to be spoken of him or his friends.

Also this yere one named Johannes Faucius, a German, first found out the noble science of Imprinting in the Citie of Mentz. But Polidore sayth, it was first inuented by one Johannes Guthenbergius, a knight, who also within .xviij. yeres after did inuent the ynke which the Printers now vse.

After this battayle, the Duke of Yorke not only perceyuing that the destruction of him and his friendes was intended (as by this last conflict was apparantly declared) but also remembryng, that all his counsailes and priuie intents, were nowe opened to the king and the Queene, thought it meete neyther lenger to dissimule, nor farther to keepe seilence: did therefore with a courageous hart, as well for the obteinyng of the crowne, as for the tuition and safegard of him & his friendes, determine no lenger to sleepe in hys den, but with all diligence to set forth his businesse and auance forth his banner. And therefore sending for the Erle of Salisbury his felow and compere in all his doings, counsailes, and fortunes (after long communication had of the Queenes misgouernance, and how she without their assent, did all things at her will and pleasure) determined to raise a great armie, and by fine force eyther to die or win their purpose. What should I say, men were assembled, friends were sent for, and a pryssaunt armie was gathered, both of Northren men and Welshmen, which in good order came into the Marches of Wales, adioyning to Shropshire, where they determined eyther to abide their enimies, or to meete them if they marched forward.

The king was not ignorant of this assemble, nor yet vnaduertised of the Dukes intent: wherefore to resist the mischief at the beginning, he caused commissioners to be made, and sent into euery parte of the realme, where he suspected eyther to haue assured friendes, or indifferent fauozers, for men and money: by reason of which commaundement, a great number was assembled. Many for the loue they bare to the king, but more for the feare that they had of the Queene, whose countenance was so fearefull, and whose looke was so terrible, that to all men, agaynst whome shee tooke a small displeasure, her frowning was their vndoing, and her indignation was their death. The king accompanied with the Dukes of Sommer set & Excester, and other of the lyne of Lancaster, determined cleerely to set on the Duke of Yorke and his confederates, and them by force eyther utterly to banquish, or by pollicie to attrap, and bring to confusion, whereupon in hope of good luck, the king with his armie by long marching, came neere to the Duke of Yorke, which was strongly incamped, a little from the towne of Ludlow, neere adioyning to the confines of Wales, to whome not long before, was come his trustie friend Richard Erle of Warwike, with a great number of expert men in marciall feates, whom he had brought with him from Calice, wherof two were men of approued pollicy, in the warres of Normandie and Guyen, the one called Andrew Crollop, and the other John Blunt. These armies thus lyeng, the one in the beue and sight of the other, studied all meanes and pollicies, how to take aduantage eche of other, and how with lesse ieoperdy, the one might set on the other. The Duke perceyuing by reason of his expert Capitaynes, away how he might easely dampnie and discomfite his enimies, thought no lenger to sleepe his purpose, pose, but manfully to geue the onset and so with his secret friends and Capitaines, determined the next morning early to beginne the battayle, and set on the king and his armie, or he were readie or in aray. But of this deuise succeeded nothing, nor of this imagination proceeded any effect: For Andrew Crollop and other the Calicians, which were men of great knowlege and of much experience, and had liued by the kings wages, more then a few yeres, perceyuing now y they should fight agaynst their soueraine Lorde himselfe (whose friend they esteemed before that time, the Erie of Warwike euer to haue bene taken and reputed, and not his enemy or destroyer) in the dead of the night, before the day of battayle secretly departed from the Dukes Campe, & submitted themselves to the king, aduincing him of all things prepared and deuised, for his losse and destruction. If these auncient Capitaynes were welcome to the king, or if he ioyously them receyued, I reterre that to all men, which haue reliefe in their destresse, or haue a sodaine good chaunce, when they thinke least vpon it. When the Duke of Yorke was aduertised of their departing, no maruayle though his senses were moued, and his wittes disturbed, as a man that sodainely ryseth out of a traunce, woteth not what to doe or say: For he first considered the power and auctoritie of the king, and sawe that Andrew Crollop of his friend was sodainely transformed into the image of his extreme enemy, whose force and pellicie, as muche nowe discomforted hym, as by the trust which he put in hym, he was before encouraged: wherefore he euidently perceyuing, that all his counsaile and purpose, was by the foze named Andrew, reueled and disclosed thought it better for him and hys to depart in surety, then to abide the chaice, of mutable Fortune, which turneth the wheele at her wyll and pleasure: wherupon he with his yonger sonne Edmond Erie of Rutlande, secretly departed into Wales, and so passed into Irelande, where he was with all ioy and honoz gladly receyued. The Erie of Marche, sonne and heire apparant to the foresayde Duke, accompanied with the Erles of Salisbury and Warwike, and s<sup>r</sup> John Wenlock, stole away the same night, and came into Devonshire: where by the meanes of John Dinham Esquire (which after was high Treasorer of Englande, in the time of king Henry the. vii.) they bought a ship, which cost. C. x. Markes at Ermouth, and sayled to Serisay, and after came to Calice, and were let in at the posterne, and ioyfully welcomed of their friendes.

The next day in the morning, the king beyng aduertised of the departing of the Duke of Yorke and his partakers, caused all his horsemen to follow them by euery passage, but they were neyther seene nor espied, as they that folowed made report. The king perceyuing that the Lordes were escaped, pardoned all the poore souldiours, sauing certaine Rynge leaders, whereof some he punished and fined, and some he hanged and quartered. After this, he remoued to Ludlowe, and there dispatched his hoste, and spoiled the towne and the Castell, and sent the Duches of Yorke, with her two yonger sonnes, to be kept in ward, with the Duches of Buckyngham her sister, where she continued a certayne space. After this, he proclaimed these Lordes traytors to him, enemies to their Countrey, and rebels to the Crowne: confiscating all their landes, goodes and offices, committing the gouernance of the North partes, to the Erie of Northumberland, and the

Lorde Clifford, as to his trustie and most faithfull friends, and of his towne of Calice, he made Capitaine Henry the newe Duke of Sommerset: but the olde husband man sayeth, that as to hastie sowing often time deceaueth, so to late, neuer well proueth. For in this businesse, protracting of time onely, hurted and harmed the king and his sequele. For if he at the beginning, had dispossessed his aduersaries of that refuge and hold, no doubt but that he had eyther tamed or vanquished them, with little laboz and small daunger.

The Duke of Sommerset, reioysing much in his newe office, elected dyuers hardie and valyant souldiours, and with great pompe sayled toward Calice: and when he thought surely to haue entred into the Hauen, the artillerie shot so fiercely, both out of the towne and Rifebanke, that he suffering there a soze repulse, was faine to lande at Whitlandbay, and sent worde to the Capitaynes of the towne, to receyue him as the kings Lieutenaut, and shewed to them his letters patents, but neyther he nor hys wyrtung was once regarded or looked on: so of necessitie he resorted to the Castell of Guynes, daylie skirmishing with the garrison of Calice, more to his losse than gaine. After his arriual, as is aforesayde, diuers of his Mariners, obuyng more good wyll to the Erie of Warwike, than to this yong Duke, conueyed their shippes into the Hauen of Calice, and in them diuers of the Erie of Warwikes enemies, as Janyn Fendill, John Felowe, and dyuers other, and presented them to the sayde Erie, which incontinent caused their heades to be striken off. Thys daylie conflict, still continuing betweene the Lordes, which soioined at Calice, and the Duke of Sommerset, lying at Guynes. no small number of the commonaltie, daylie resorted to the Erie of Marche and his confederates: by reason whereof, although they daylie lost people, and had slaine many, yet their number was restored, and the gap euer filled, which was the continuall losse, and daylie detriment to the Duke of Sommerset. Yet he like a valyant Prince, nothing lesse minding, then for lacke of ayde to be expelled from the great office and renouued auctoritie, which the king had to him giuen, in the partes beyonde the sea, sent letters to the king, and messengers to the Queene, desiring of them ayde and succoz, in defence of the quarell and lawfull assistance. His postes were not vheard, nor hys requestes vnprouided. For without delay Richarde Lorde Rivers, and s<sup>r</sup> Anthony Wooduile his balyant sonne, which after was Lorde Scales, accompanied with foure hundred warlike persons, were appointed to passe the Seas, and to be coadiutors to the Duke of Sommerset. These martiall Capitaynes endeuoring themselves to the point, for the which they were assigned came to the Porte of Sandwicke, and there abode the winde and the weather, which obeyeth neyther king, nor serueth Emperour.

The Erles of Marche and Warwike, and other being at Calice, had knowledge of all these doings, and secret conuenticles: wherefore to preuent the Dukes purpose, they sent John Dinham the balyant Esquire, with a small number of men, but with a multitude of courageous hartes, to the towne of Sandwicke, which sodainely entred the same, and tooke the Lorde Rivers in his bed, and his sonne also: robbing houses, and spoiling shippes of great ryches and marchaundise, and beside this, they tooke the principall shippes of the kings nauy then lying at the Port, wel furnished with ordinance & artillerie, but not without the fauoz of the Mariners, which fauozed more the one parte then the other. But although John Dinham, Capitaine of the Lordes parte, was sore hurt and maymed on his legge, by reason whereof he euer after halted, and somewhat limped: yet his courage and pollecy was so much, that he vanquished his enimies, and brought the Shippes royall laden with pray and prisoners, to the towne of Calice, and them presented to the Erle of Marche, not knowyng then that the Lorde Riuers daughter should be the Erles wife, which then had an husband lyving, nor thinking that her father for her sake, should after be destroyed. But who can knowe the secrets of God, or without him, declare the chaunce that after shall ensue.

After this bootie gotten, and good luck obteyned, diuers of the best Shippes taken in the haven of Sandwich, were wel victualled and manned, and with them the Erle of Warwike, transfreted and sayled into Ireland, to comon with the Duke of Yorke, of his great affayres and businesse. The weather was so fayre, and the winde so fauourable to the Erles purpose, that within lesse then. xxx. dayes, he passed and repassed from Calice to Deueline, and asserteyned the Erles of Marche and of Salisbury, what was the Duke of Yorkes devise and intent, both for his entrie and theirs, into the realme of England. The Erle of Warwike had come to short home to tell these tydings, if the Duke of Excester, which being admirall of the sea, laye in the west Countrie to stop the Erles passage, might haue had his owne will: but the Capitaines of his Nauie murmoured agaynst him, and the Mariners disprayed and disdayned him, glad to heare of the Erle of Warwikes good successe, by which occasion he neyther would nor durst once meddle or cope with the Erles Nauie.

During thys tyme, the king called a Parliament, in the Citie of Conuentre, in the which the Duke of Yorke, and all his confederates were attaynted of high treason, and their goodes and landes confiscate and forfeted: and to prohibite their landing in al portes, haven townes were watched, and the sea costes were garnished with Bekons. And for Simon Montfort with a great crew was appointed to keepe the downes, and the fiue Portes, and all men passing into Flaundrys, were upon payne of death prohibited to passe by Calice, least the Lordes there should borowe of them any money, as they did prest of the Marchaunts of the staple. xliij. M. pound late before, which was a great displeasure to the king, and a more corrosey to the Queene. The Lordes lyng at Calice were not ignorant of all these doynges and provisions, but dayly were asserteyned what was done in the kings priuy chamber: wherefore first they sent a companie to Sandwicke, which conquered the towne, and apprehended sir Simond Montfort, and brought him with all his Mates to the haven of Calice, where incontinent he with. xij. of his chiefe felowes, lost their heades on the sandes, before Risebanke. After the Kinges nauie gayned, and his Capitaines on the arriuall of the Sea taken and destroyed, the Lordes lyng at Calice, hoppyng in their friendes within the Realme, determined to passe the sea, and to lande in England. And after they had put the Castell and towne of Calice, in sure and safe custodie to their onely vse, they passed the sea and landed at Sandwicke. And so passyng thorough Kent, there came to them the Lorde Cobham, John Guildefforde, William Beche, Robert Horne, and many other gentlemen, which conueyed them to the Citie of London. But the fame of their landyng once knowne,

gentlemen repayred, and yomen resorted out of all the South partes of the Realme: upon which rumoz, Thomas Lorde Scales, a man in great fauor with the King and Queene, accompanied with the Erle of Kendall a Gasconne, and the Lord Louell, resorted to London, with a great company of armed men: declaring to the Maior of the Citie, that their repayre onely was to defende, and kepe the Citie, from the spoyle and robbery of such traytors, as the king was credibly informed, would thether make accesse: to whome the Maior answered, that he well knewe both his othe, and bounden dutie toward his souereigne Lorde and Prince, and neded neither of prompter: nor yet of coadiutor, eyther to defende or gouerne the Citie, to him committed in charge. With which aunswere, the Lorde Scales and his associates not a little displeased, entered into the Towre of London, dayly with new inuencions, doyng displeasures and domages to the Citizens of the Citie, whome they sore suspected, rather to fauor then to hate, the Erles of Marche, and Warwike, and other of their band and affinitie. Which Erles with a great armie came shortly to London, and were of the Maior and Citezens ioyously receyued, to whome resorted the Archbishop of Cantorbury, the Bishops of London, Ely, and Excester, with many Prelates and religious persons. These Lordes nothing slackyng the purpose, that they came for, dayly consulted and assembled together in the house of the gray Friars within the Citie. And after long debating, and secret consultation had, it was agreed, that they with theyr whole puissance should marche forward, toward the King: determining eyther by force or fayre meanes, to bring their purpose to a conclusion. When this counsaile was dissolved, the Erles of Marche & Warwike, Thomas Lord Fauconbridge, Henry Lord Borchier, called Erle of Ewe, with a great nuber of men, which came out of Kent, Essex, Surrey & Suffex, to the number as some wyters affirme of. xxv. M. persons departed from London, toward the King, lyng at Conuentre, then called the Queenes secreete arbor, leauyng behinde them to kepe the Londoners in their fidelitie, from reuerting from theyr part the Erle of Salisbury, the Lorde Cobham, and Sir John Wenlocke: which Lorde Cobham, with certaine Aldermen of the Citie so kept the west syde against the Towre, and Sir John Wenlocke with other, so bigilantly watched the East part toward Saint Katherynes, that no person eyther could issue out, or enter in, to the great displeasure of the Lorde Scales and his companie, which dayly shot their ordonaunce out, and had likewise great ordonaunce shot at them, to the hurt, and no pleasure of both partes. The king not ignorant of all these doynges, assembled a great armie, and accompanied with the Duke of Sommerset, which was lately come from Guisnes, and the Duke of Buckingham, and diuers other great Lordes of his part and faction, came to the towne of Northampton, where the Queene encouraged her friendes, and promised great rewardes to her helpers: for the king studied nothing but of peace, quiet and solitarie lyfe.

When the Kinges hoste was assembled, and that the Queene perceyued that her power was able to matche with the force of her aduersaries, shee caused her armie to issue out of the towne, and to passe the river of Sene, and there in the newe field, betwene Harsyngton and Sandiforde, the Capitaines strongly emparked themselves with high bankes, and depe trenches. The Erle of Marche beyng lustie, and in the flower of his couragious youth, lyng betwene Towcester and Northampton, determined to set on the kings armie, without longer protractyng of tyme. And in the night season he removed his campe towarde Northampton, and in marchyng forwarde set hys men in good order of battaile, whereof the bakewarde was conducted by the Erle of Warwike, which either by strenght or stealth Hauger the Lord Beaumont, which kept a straitte goyng towarde the kinges campe, entred freshely, and began the battaile about. vij. of the clocke, the. ix. day of Julye. After whome folowed the Erle of Marche, with the banner of his father. This fight continued in doubtfull iudgement, till the houre of nine, at which tyme the kinges armie was scattered, and discomfited, and of the same slain, and drowned in the river, fewe lesse then ten thousand tall Englishe men, and the king himselfe left alone disconsolate, was taken and appzehended, as a man borne, and predestinate to trouble, miserie, and calamitie. At this battaile were slaine, Humfrey Duke of Buckingham, John Talbot Erle of Shrewesbury, a valiant person, and not degeneratyng from his noble parent: Thomas Lorde Egremont, John Viscont Beaumont, and Sir William Lucie, which made great hast to come to part of the fight, and at his first approche was striken in the head with an Axe. Divers other Gentlemen were slaine in this ciuil battaile, whose names are not remembred nor published by any authoz that I have read. Beside these dead persons, many were taken prisoners, because they left their hoxses, and disconded to fight onfoote. The Duke of Sommerset and other, which narrowly escaped, fled with the Quene and prince Edward, into the Bishoprike of Durham, in which place they determined to gather a newe armie and power, and if no hope were of recovery, then they agreed to flie into Scotland: there to abide a time of better lucke. The Erles beyng victors in this bloody battaile, conueyed the king that night againe to the towne of Northampton, and the next day with great solemnitie and small comfort, they set forwarde the king, and by easie journeyes brought him to London the. xvj. day of July, where he was faintly receyued, and feebly welcomed, and was lodged in the Bishops Palace. After whose commyng to the Citie, the Tower of London was deliuered to the Erle of Marche, vpon a certaine composition. But the Lorde Scales, suspectyng the sequele of the deliery of the same, tooke a whirry priuily, intending to haue fled to the Queene. But he was espyed by diuers watermen belongyng to the Erle of Warwike, which wayted for his footcomyng on the Chamys, and sodainly taken, and shortly slaine with many dardes and daggers, and his bodie left all bloody and naked at the gate of the Clynke, which after was buryed in the Church adioinyng. Then were diuers persons appzehended, and endited of treason, whereof some were pardoned, and some executed: But Thomas Thorpe, seconde Baron of the Exchequer, great friend to the house of Lancaster, and extreme enemy to the familie of Yorke, was taken disguised in a Monkes apparell, with a shauen crowne, and so brought to the Erle of Warwike, which sent him to the tower of London, where he long remayned. Duryng this trouble was a Parliament summoned to begin at Westminster in the moneth of October next following. Before which tyme, Richard Duke of Yorke beyng in Ireland, by swift curreys, and flyng postes, was aduertised of the great victory, gayned by his part at the fielde of Northampton, and also knewe that the king was nowe in case to be kept, and ordered at his pleasure and will: wherefore losing no tyme, nor sluggyng one houre, he sayled from Deuelyn to Chester with no small companie, and by long iourneys came to the Citie of London, which he entered the friday next before the feast of Saint Edward the Confessor, with a sword borne naked before him, and tooke his lodgyng in the kinges awne Palace, wherupon the comunon people babbled, that he should be king, and that King Henry should no longer reigne. Duryng the time of this Parliament, the Duke of Yorke, with a bolde countenance, entered into the Chamber of the peeres, and satte downe in the trone royall under the cloth of estate (which is the kinges peculier seate) and in the presence aswell of the Nobilitie, as of the spiritualtie (after a pause made) sayde these wordes in effect. My singuler good Lordes, maruaile not that I approche vnto this throne. For I sit here as in the place to me by verye iustice lawfully belongyng, and here I rest, as he to whome this Chayze of right apperteyneth, not as he, which requyrez of you fauor, parcialitie, or bearyng, but egall right, friendly indifferencie, and true administration of iustice: for I beyng the partie grieved, and complaynant, can not minister to my selfe the Medicine, that should helpe me (as expert Leches and Chirurgians may) except you be to me both saythfull ayders, and also true Counsaylers. For yet this noble realme, and our naturall Countrie shall neuer be vnbuckeled from her dayly feuer, except I (as the principall Physicion, and you as true and trusty Appothecaries) consult together, in makyng of the porcion, and trie out the cleane and pure stuffe, from the olde, corrupt and putrified drugges. For undoubtedly, the roote and bottome of this long festured canker, is not yet extirpate, nor the feble foundation of this fallible buyldyng, is not yet espyed, which hath bene, and is, the dayly destruction of the Nobilitie, and the continual confusion of the pooze Commonalty of this realme and Kingdome. For all you knowe (or should knowe) that the high and mightie Prince King Richard the seconde, was the true and vndoubted heyre, to the valiant Conquerour, and renoumed Prince King Edward the thirde, as sonne and heyre to the hardy knight and couragious Captain, Edward prince of Wales, Duke of Aquitain and Coznewall, eldest sonne to the said king Edward the thirde, which king was not onely in deed, but also of all men reputed and taken, as the very true and infallible heyre, to the wise and politique prince king Henry the thirde, as sonne and heyre to king Edward the second, sonne and heyre to king Edward the first, the very heyre and first begotten sonne of the sayde noble and vertuous prince, king Henry the thirde. Which king Richard of that name the second, was lawfully and iustly possessed of the Crowne, and Diademe of this Realme and Region, till Henry of Darby, Duke of Lancaster, and Herforde, sonne to John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, the fourth begotten sonne, to the sayde king Edward the thirde, and yonger brother to my noble auncester Lyonell Duke of Clarence, the thirde begotten sonne of the sayde king Edward, by force and violence, contrary both to the duetic of his allegiaunce, and also to his homage, to him both done and swozne, raysed warre and battaile, at the Castell of Flynt in Northwales agaynst the sayde king Richard, and him appzehended and imprisoned within the Tower of London. Duryng whose life and captiuitie, he wrongfully vsurped and entred vpon the royall potner, and high estate of this realme and region, taking kyng on him the name, stile, and aucthoritie of king & gouernoꝝ of the same. And not therewith satisfied and contented, compalled and accomplished the death and destruction of his naturall Prince, and most worthy souereigne Lord, not as a common homicide and butcherly murderer, but as a regicide and destroyer of his king. After whose piteous death and execrable murder, the right and tytle of the Crowne, and superiourtie of this realme, was lawfully reuerted and returned to Roger Mortimer, Erle of Marche, sonne and heyre to Lady Philip, the onely childe of the aboue rehearsed Lionell, Duke of Clarence, to which Rogiers daughter called Anne, my most dearest and welbeloued mother, I am the very true and lyneall heyre, which discent all you cannot iustly gayne say, noꝝ yet truely denie. Then remember thys, if the tytle be mine, why am I put from it: if I be true heyre to the crowne (as I am in dede) why is my right withholden: if my clayme be good, why haue I not iustice: foꝝ surely learned men of great science and knowledge, say and affirme, that lyneall discent, noꝝ vsurped possession can nothing preuaile, if continuall clayme be lawfully made, oꝝ openly published. Foꝝ an opening of which scruple & ambiguity: Edmond Erle of Marche, my most welbeloued Uncle, in the time of the first vsurper, in dede, but not by right, called king Henry the fourth by his Colyns, the Erle of Northumberland, and the Lorde Percy, he being then in captiuitie with Owen Glendore, the rebell in Wales, made his tytle and righteous clayme, to the destruction of both the noble persons. Likewise my most dearest Lorde and father, so farre set forth that right and tytle, that he lost his lyfe and worldly toyce, at the towne of Southampton, moꝝe by power, then indifferent iustice. Sithe whose death, I coming to my full age, haue neuer desisted to pursue my tytle, and require my right, which by meanes of sinister counsaile and iniust detention, I can neyther obtayne noꝝ recouer. So that of fine force, I am compelled to vse power in stede of prayer, and force in stede of request (not as I sayde before) foꝝ my priuate emolument and peculiar profite, but to restore peace, loue, and quietnesse to this our naturall region: which ener sythe the first vngodly vsurpation of the fozenamed Henry, vntreuly called king Henry the fourth, hath bene cleerely banished, and out of the same iniustly exiled. What murders and manslaughters hath bene perpetrated and committed within this Countrey, sythe the beginning of that vngacious vsurpation: what number of noble men haue bene slayne, destroyed, and executed, sithe that vnforsunate day: it is to lamentable and to manifest. Foꝝ although Henry of Lancaster Erle of Derby, tooke vpon him the Scepter and the crowne, and wrongfully beare the name and stile of a king, and was not much tyckeled with mine Uncle, the Erle of Marche, at that time being within age: yet was hee neuer in suretie of himselfe, noꝝ had, oꝝ enioyed any perfite quietnesse, eyther in minde oꝝ in body: foꝝ surely a coꝝrupt conscience feeleth neuer rest, but looketh when the sword of vengeance will discent and strike. His sonne also called king Henry the fift, obtayned notable victories, and immortall prayes, foꝝ his noble actes done in the realme of Fraunce: yet God foꝝ the offence of his vntreue parent sodainely touched him, vnbodiyng his soule in the flower of his youth, and in the gloꝝie of his conquest. And although he had a fayre sonne, and a yong apparant heyre: yet was this Orphan suche a one, as preachers saye, that God threatned to sende, foꝝ a punishment, nishment, to hys vnrulye and vngacious people: sayng by his prophet Esay: I shall geue you children to be your princes, and infants without wisdom, shall haue the gouernance of you. The prophet lyed not, if you note all things in an order: foꝝ after this Henry the fift (whose fame no man can iustly repute oꝝ deface) succeeded his sonne whom all we haue called our naturall prince, and obeyed as his heyre: in whose time and wrongfull reigne, I require you diligently to consider, with what great torments and afflictions God hath whyped and scourged this miserable Isle, yea, with such and so many scourges and plagues, as no nation (the Egyptians onely except) were euer tormented, oꝝ afflicted withall. I will not speake of rebellious murders and oppressions, which of late haue bene done, and exercised here among vs: but I will declare and manifest to you how the crowne and gloꝝie of this realme, is by the negligence of this silly man, and his vnrulye counsaile, minished, defaced, and dishonored. Is not Normandy, which his father gat, regayned and conquered agayne, by the insolencie of him, and his couetous counsaile: Is not the whole Duchy of Aquitayne by two hundred and odde yeres, peaceably possessed by the kings of this realme, in one yere and a little moꝝe, gotten out of our hands and seignioꝝie: What should I speake of Angeou & Mayne, oꝝ the losse of the Isle of Fraunce, with the riche Citie of Paris. Alas it is to apparaunt, neither will I molest you with the recitall of all the perticulers thereof: But nowe in the middes of this affliction, and to make an ende of the same, God of his eneffable goodnesse, looking on this countrey, with his eyes of pitie and mercie, hath sent me in the truth to restore againe his decayed kingdome, to his auncient fame and olde renoume. Whereof here in open parliament, according to my iust and true title, I haue and do take possession of this royal throne, not putting diffidence, but firme hope in Gods grace, that by his deuine ayde, & the assistance of you the peeres of this realme, I shall beuotifie and maintaine the same, to the gloꝝie of hym, honoꝝ of my blood, and to the publique wealth, as well of you all here present, as of all the pooꝝe commons and subiectes, of thys kingdome and Regiment.

When the Duke had thus ended his Oration, the Lordes sate still lyke Images grauen in the wall, oꝝ dumme Gods, neither whispering noꝝ speaking, as though their mouthes had bene solued by. The Duke perceyuing none answer to be made to his declared purpose, not well content wyth their sober silence, aduised them well to digest and ponder the effect of that which he had sayde, and so neyther fully displeased, noꝝ all pleased, departed to hys lodgyng in the kings Palace.

Whyle he was thus declaryng his tytle in the Chamber of the Peeres, there happened a straunge chaunce in the very same time, amongst the commons in the nether house, then there assembled: foꝝ a crown which did hang in the middle of the same to garnishe a braunche, to set lights vpon, without touch of any creature oꝝ rigoz of winde sodainely fell downe, and at the same tyme also fell downe the crowne, which stode on the toppe of the Castell of Douer: as a signe and pronostication that the crowne of the realme should be deuided and changed, from one line to another, such was the iudgement of the common people.

The Lordes of the realme, foꝝgate not the Dukes demaunde, noꝝ long protracted protracted the time, to see some good ende, in so waightie a cause: wherefore diuers Lordes, as well spirituall as temporall, with many graue and sage persons of the commonaltie daylie assembled at the black Friers and other places, to treat and comunon of this matter, being of no small importance. During which time, the Duke of Yorke, although he and the king, were both lodged in the Palace of Westminster, yet for no prayer or intercession, he would once visite or see the king, till some perfite conclusion were taken, in this great and waightie purpose, sayng and affirming, that he was subiect to no man, but onely to God, and he was his Lord and superiour, and none other, I will a little space leaue the Lordes consultyng together, and speake of outward attemptes and forreyn doings.

This ciuill discention within the realme of Englande, did much animate and incourage James the seconde of that name, king of Scottes, to make warre on the Englishe nation, partly for the displeasure which he conceyued for the death of Edmond Duke of Sommer set hys mothers brother, and partly to shew himselfe amongst his people, to be both valyaunt and courageous. Thys king James from his first rule, beganne to enter into suspition with Wylliam Erle Douglas, a man both of great kinne and more power, euer mistrusting that he nothing more desyred, then to depriue hym from his auctoritie, and to vsurpe the same. This cancard suspicion was so rooted in the kings harte, that sodainely it branched out, in so much that the king sending for the Erle (which trusting on his awne innocencie, humbly came to his presence) caused him shamefully to be slayne and murdered, with which iniury, his two brethren, Archibald Erle of Murray, and Hugh Erle of Dumont, not a little pricked and incouraged with the Erles of Angus and Northone, being all of one line and surname, made open warre on the saide king James: but in conclusion he prevailed, and suppressed the great power of the Douglasses. And then thinking himselfe a king, without eyther peere or fere, assembled a great armie, and entred into the Marches of Northumberlande, and besieged the Castell of Roxborough, and there caused his newe Bumbard lately cast in Flaunders, called the Lyon and dyuers other peeces to be shot agayn the Castell, whereof one being weak and slender, brake in peeces, and one of the fragmentes slue the king, standing amongst a great compaigne of his people, and wounded the Erle of Angus. The Scottes not dismayed with the death of their king, serng the Castell easie to be wonne, manfully assaulted and with much paine gat it, and the same long defended, till Rychard Duke of Gloucester it conquered and destroyed. This king James of Queene Mary his wyfe left three sonnes, James which succeeded him, Alexander Duke of Albany, and John. This yong king James, was put vnder the tuition of James Kenede, Bysshop of Saint Andrewes, which during his noneage, ruled the realme to the kings great honoz, but more to his awne profite and peculiar gayne: for he made sumptuous houses, and builded Colleges, which this yong pupill king James, neyther could, nor was able to do.

About this very season, and during this bnnaturall controuersie within the Realme of Englande: Charles the french king, which onely by trouble and calamitie gat to him a perpetuall name, and amongst his Nation aboute the starres exalted, ended the point of his fatall sine, which Prince in his youth, neuer regarded wanton pastyme, nor lasciuious dalliaunce, for his wittes were set, and his industrie onely applied, to recouer agayne hys princely inheritaunce: So that moze plainely then in a Glasse, all men may perceiue that paine often profiteth, and laboz commonly auayleth, but ydle- nesse sildome, and dalliaunce neuer. To this Charles succeeded king Lewys, of that name the .xj. of whose doings you shall heare after: and shall both study and marueile, at the straungenesse of his demeanour, and the craftie policie of his secret compasses. Now I will retorne to the great counsaile of the Lordes, celebrate about London, for the Duke of Yorkes claime.

After long arguments made, and deliberate consultation had among the Peeres, Prelates, and commons of the realme: vpon the bigile of all Saintes, it was condescended and agreed, by the three estates, for so much as king Henry had beene taken as king, by the space of .xxviiij. yeres and moze, that he should enioy the name and tytle of king, and haue possession of the realme, during his life naturall: And if he eyther died or resigned, or forfeited the same, for intringing any point of this conorde, then the sayde Crowne and auctoritie royall, should immediatly dissende to the Duke of Yorke, if he then liued, or else to the next heyze of his line or linage, and that the Duke from thenceforth should be Protector and Regent of the land. Provided alway, that if the king did closely or apertly studie or go about to breake or alter this agreement, or to compasse or imagine the death or destruction of the sayde Duke or hys bloud, then he to forfeit the crowne, and the Duke of Yorke to take it. These articles with many other, were not onely written, sealed and swozne by the two parties: but also were enacted in the high court of Parliament. For ioy whereof, the king hauing in his company the sayde Duke, rode to the Cathedrall Church of saint Paule, within the Citie of London, and there on the day of all saintes, went solempnly wyth the Diademe on his head in procession, and was lodged a good space after in the Bishops Palace, nere to the sayd Church. And vpon the Saturday next ensuyng, Richard Duke of Yorke, was by the sound of a trumpet, solempnly proclaimed heyze apparaunt to the crowne of Englande, and Protector of the realme.

After thys, the Parliament kept at Couentry the laste yere, was declared to be a deuillische counsaile, and onely celebrate for the destruction of the nobility, and no lawfull Parliament, because they which were returned, were neuer elected, according to the due order of the law, but secretly named by them, which desired moze the destruction, then the aduancement of the publique wealth and common profite. When these agreements were done and enacted, the king dissolved his parliament, which was the laste parliament that euer he ended. Such was the pleasure of almightie God, that king Henry being a good and verteous man, which had tasted innumerable aduersities and calamities of the worlde, should be depriued of his terrestrialall crowne, to be recompensed with an heauenly garlande, and a ioyfull place: for surely a perfite good man, although he be plagued with a thousand displeasures cannot be but blessed.

The Duke of Yorke well knowyng, that the Queene would spurne and impugne the conclusions, agreed and taken in this Parliament, caused her and her sonne, to be sent for by the king: but she being a manly woman, being to rule and not to be ruled, and thereto counsayled by the Dukes of Excestre and Sommerfet, not only denyed to come but also assembled together a great armie, intending to take the king by fine force, out of the Lordes handes, and to set them to a newe schoole. The Protector lying in London, hauing pefite knowlege of all these doynges: assigned the Duke of Norffolke and the Erle of Warwike, his trustie friendes, to be about the king, and he with the Erles of Salisbury, and Rutland: with a conuenient companie, departed out of London the second day of December, Northwarde, and sent to the Erle of Marche his eldest sonne to folowe him with all his power. The Duke by small iourneys came to his Castell of Sandall, besyde Wakefielde on Christmasse eue, and there began to assemble his tenants and friendes. The Queene beyng therof asserteyned, determined to couple with him while his power was small, and his ayde not come: And so hauing in her companie, the Prince her sonne, the Dukes of Excestre and Sommerfet, the Erle of Denonshire, the Lorde Clifford, the Lorde Rosse, and in effect all the Lordes of the Northpart, with. xliij. thousand men, or as some write, xli. thousand, marched from Yorke to Wakefielde, and bad base to the Duke, euen before his Castell, he hauing with him not fully fiue thousand persons, determined incontinent to issue out, and to fight with his enemies, and although sir Daup Hall, his olde seruaunt and chiefe Counsaylor, aduised him to kepe his Castell, and to defend the same with his small number, till his sonne the Erle of Marche were come with his power of Marchmen and Welthe soldiers, yet he would not be counsayled, but in a great fury sayde, a Daup, Daup, hast thou loued me so long, and nowe wouldest haue me dishonoured? Thou neuer sawest me kepe fortreffe when I was Regent in Normandie, when the Dolphyn himselfe, with his purssauce came to besiege me, but lyke a man, and not lyke a birde inclosed in a Cage, I issued and fought with mine enemyes, to their losse euer (I thanke God) and to my honour: If I haue not kept my selfe within walles, for feare of a great and strong Prince, nor hid my face from any man liuyng, wouldest thou that I for dread of a scoldyng woman, whose weapon is onely her tongue, and her nayles, should enclose my selfe, and shut my gates? Then all men might of me wonder, and all creatures may of me report dishonour, that a woman hath made me a dastard, whom no man euer to this day could yet proue a coward: and surely my mind is, rather to die with honoz, then to liue with shame, for of honoz cometh fame, and of dishonour ryseth infamie: Their great number shall not feare my spirites, but encourage them, for surely I thinke that I haue there, as many friendes as enemyes, which at ioinyng, will eyther sic or take my part: Therefore auance my Banner, in the name of God and saint George, for surely I will fight with them, though I should fight alone. The Erle of Salisbury and other his friendes, seying his courage, resolved themselves to his opinion, and ordered their men, and set them forth in warlike fashion, for their most aduantage. The Duke of Sommerfet and other of the Quenes part, knowing perfectly, that if the Duke gat the victorie, their dayes were ministred, and their liuyngs left bare, like men quickned and pricked forward, for the safegarde of their lyues, and defence of their goodes, determined to abide the chaunce, and to espie their most aduantage and so appoynted the Lorde Clifford to lie in the one skale, and the Erle of

Wiltshire

Wiltshire in the other, & they themselves kept the maine battaile. The Duke of Yorke with his people, disconded downe the hill in good order and array, and was suffered to passe forward, toward the maine battaile: but when he was in the plaine ground, betwene his Castell and the Towne of Wakefielde, he was environed on euery syde like a fishe in a net, or a Deere in a Buckstall: so that he manfully fightyng, was within halfe an houre slaine and deade, and his whole army discomfited, and with him dyed of his trustie friendes, his two bastard Uncles, sir John and sir Hugh Mortimer, sir Daup Hall his chiefe Counsaylor, sir Hugh Hastings, sir Thomas Heuel, William and Thomas Alparre, both brethren, and two thousand and eight hundred other, whereof many were yong Gentlemen, and heyres of great parentage in the South part, whose linages reuenged their deathes, within foure Monethes next and immediately ensuing. In this conflict was wounded and taken prisoner, Richard Erle of Salisbury, sye Richard Limbrike, Raufe Stanley, John Harow, Capitaine Hauison, and diuers other. While this battaile was in fightyng, a priest called Sir Robert Aspell, Chaplaine and Scholemaister to the yong Erle of Rutland, the second son to the abouenamed Duke of Yorke, scarce of the age of. xli. yeres, a fayre Gentleman, and amaydenly person, perceiuyng that flight was more sauegard, then taryng, both for him and his Mayster, secretly conueyed the Erle out of the field, by the Lorde Cliffordes bande, toward the Towne, but or he could enter into a house, he was by the sayde Lorde Clifford espied, folowed, and taken and by reason of his apparell, demaunded what he was. The yong Gentleman dismayde, had not a worde to speake, but kneeled on his knees crauyng mercy, and desirng grace, both with holdyng by his handes, and makyng a dolorous countenance, for his speeche was gone for feare. Saue him sayd his Chapleyn, for he is a Princes sonne, and paradicuture may do you good hereafter. With that worde, the Lorde Clifford marked him and sayde: by Gods blood, thy father slue mine, and so will I do thee and all thy kinne, and with that worde, strake the Erle to the hart with his Dagger, and had his Chapleyn beare the Erles mother and brother worde what he had done and sayde. In this act the Lorde Clifford was accompted a tyrant, and no gentleman, for the propertie of the Lion, which is a furious and an vnreasonable beast, is to be cruell to them that withstand him, and gentle to such as prostrate or humiliate themselves before him. Yet this cruell Clifford, not content with this, came to the place where the deade corps of the Duke of Yorke lay, and caused his head to be stricken off, and set on it a Crowne of Paper, and so fired it on a pole, and presented it to the Queene, not liyng farre from the fielde, in great despite and muche derision, sayng: Madame, your warre is done, here is your kinges raunsome, at which present was much ioy, and great reioysing, but many laughed then, that soze lamented after, as the Queene her selfe, and her sonne: And many were glad then of other mens deathes, not knowyng that their awne were nere at hande, as the Lorde Clifford, and other.

But surely, mans nature is so fraile, that thinges passed be sone forgotten, and mischiefes to come, be not foresene. After this victorie by the Quene and her part obtayned, she caused the Erle of Salisbury, with all the other prisoners, to be sent to Bomfret, and there to be beheaded, and sent all their heddes, and the Dukes head of Porke, to be set vpon poles, ouer the gate of the Citie of Porke, in despyte of them, and their linage: whose children shortly reuenged their fathers quarrell, both to the Queenes extreme perdition, and the vtter vndoing of her husband and sonne. This ende had the valiant Lorde, Richard Plantagenet Duke of Porke.

The Erle of Marche so commonly called, but after the death of his father in dede and in right very Duke of Porke, lying at Gloucester, heeryng of the death of his noble father, and louyng brother, and trusty friendes, was wonderfully amased, but after comfort geuen to him, by his faythfull friends and sure allyes, he remoued to Shrewesbury, and other townes vpon the Riuer of Seuerne, declaring to them the murder of his father, the ieopardie of himselfe, and the vnstable state and ruine of the Realme. The people on the Marches of Wales, which aboue measure fauored the linage of the Lorde Mortimer, more gladly offered him their ayde and assistance, then he it eyther instantly requyred, or hartily desyred, so that he had a pryssaunt armie, to the number of .xxiiij. thousand, redy to go agaynst the Queene, and the murderers of his father. But when he was setting forwarde, newes were brought to him, that Jasper Erle of Penbroke, halfe brother to king Henry, and James Butler, Erle of Ormond and Wilshire, had assembled together a great number, both of welthe and Irishe people, sodainly to surpryse and take him and his friendes, and as a captiue to conuey him to the Queene. The Duke of Porke called Erle of Marche, some what spurred and quickned with these nouelties, retired backe, and met with his enemies in a fayre plaine, neere to Mortimers crosse, not farre from Herford East, on Candlemasse day in the moornyng, at which tyme the Sunne (as some write) appered to the Erle of Marche like thre Sunnes, and sodainly icyned all together in one, and that vpon the sight thereof, he tooke such courage, that he fiercely set on his enemyes, and them shortly discomfited: for which cause, men imagined that he gaue the Sunne in his full brightnesse for his Cognisaunce or Badge. Of his enemyes were left deade on the ground, thre thousand, and viij. hundreth. The Erles of Penbroke and Wilshire fled, and Sir Owen Tewther, father to the sayde Erle of Penbroke, which Owen had maryed king Henryes mother (as you haue heard before) with David floyde, Mortogan ap Reuther, and diuers other were taken and behedded at the Citie of Harfforde. Duryng this season the Queene was greatly encouraged with the victorie, obteyned late at Wakefelde, partly because the Duke of Porke, her vtter enemye was rid out of the worlde, and partly, because she perceyued the Lordes of the North Countrie to adhere and cleue to her part and faction: wherefore with a great multitude of Northzen people, she marched toward London, of whose approche the Londoners were nothyng glad: for some affirmed that she brought that rustie companie, to spoyle and rob the Citie: other sayde that she would be reuenged, of such as fauored the Duke of Porke. So the pooze Citizens hangyng betwene the water and the fire, were much amased, but the Magistrates and gouernours caused great watches to be kept, and good order to be obserued. The Queene still came forwarde with her Northzen people, entending to subuert and defaict all conclusions and agreementes, enacted and assented to, in the last Parliament. And so after her long iourney, she came to the towne of Saint Albones: whereof whereof the Duke of Northfolke, the Erle of Warwike, and other whom the Duke of Porke had left to gouerne the king in his absence, beyng aduertised, by the assent of the king, gathered together a great host, and set forward toward Saint Albons, haupyng the king in theyr company, as the heade and chieftain of the warre, and so not myndyng to deferre the tyme any farther, vpon Shrouetuesday early in the moornyng, set vpon their enemyes. Fortune that day so fauored the Queene, that her part preuayled, and the Duke & the Erle were discomfited, and fled: leauyng the King accompanied with the Lorde Bonuile, and Sir Thomas Kirpell of Kent, which vpon assurance of his promise, tarped still and fled not, but theyr trust them deceyued. For after the victorie obteyned, and the King brought to the Queene, they two were deteyned as prisioners, and so continued till the Kinges departing from that towne. In this battaile were slaine .xxiiij. hundreth men, and not aboue, of whom no noble man is remembred, saue Sir John Gray, which the same day was made knight, with .xij. other at the Village of Colney. Happy was the Queene in her two battayles, but vnforsunate was the King in all hys enterpryses, for where his person was present, there victorie euer fled from him to the other part, and he commonly was subdued and vanquished. When Queene Margaret had thus well sped, first she caused the King, to dubbe Prince Edward his sonne knight, with .xxx. other persons, which in the moornyng fought on the Queenes syde, agaynst his part. After she sent to the Mayor of London, comaundyng him without delay, to send certaine Cartes, laden with Lenten vitail, for the refreshing of her and her army. The Mayor, or, incontinent made prouision, laded Cartes, and sent them toward the Queene. But the moueable Commons, which fauored not the Queenes part, stopped the Cartes at Cripplegate, and boldly sayd, that their enemyes which came to spoyle and robbe the Citizens, should neyther be relieved, nor victayled by them. And notwithstanding gentle aduertisement to them geuen, of the mischiefes which might ensue of their doyngs: yet they remained still in one obstinate minde and wilfull will, not permytting the carryages to passe or go forwarde. Duryng which controuersie, diuers of the Northzen horsemen came and robbed in the Suburbes of the Citie, and would haue entred at Cripplegate, but they by the Commoners were repulled, and beaten backe, and thre of them slaine: wherevpon the Mayor sent the Recorder to the Kinges Counsaile to Barnet, to excuse the matter, and the Duchesse of Bedford, and the Ladie Scales, with diuers sad fathers of the Spirituallie, went to the Queene to mollifie her rancoz, and asswage her melancoly, which she had conceyued agaynst the Citie. At this humble request, the Queene and her Counsaile appoynted certaine Lordes and knightes, with foure hundreth tall persons, to ryde to the Citie, and there to victwe, and see the demeanour and disposition of the people: and diuers Aldermen were appoynted to mete them at Barnet, and to conuey them to London. But whatsoeuer man purposeth, God disposeth: for all these deuises were shortly transmuted into an other forme, because true report was brought, not onely to the Citie, but also to the Queene, that the Erle of Marche had vanquished the Erles of Penbroke and Wilshire, and that the Erle of Warwike, in whome rested the chiefe trust of that faction, after the last conflict had at Saint Albones, had met with the sayde Erle of Marche at Chipping Norton, he Cottesolde, and that they with both their powers were comyng to worde London. These true tales turned the Queenes purpose, and altered all her long deuised entents, insomuch that the little trustyng Essex, and lesse Kent, but London least of all, with her husband and sonne, departed from Saint Albones, into the North Countrie, where the roote and foundation of her ayde and refuge onely consisted. But at the day of her departyng, she caused the heades of the Lorde Bonuile, and Sir Thomas Kiriell, to be cut of, in the presence of her sonne, contrary to the minde and promise of her husband, but amongst men of warre, sayth or othe, seldome is performed.

The Duches of Yorke, seying her husbände and sonne slayne, and not knowyng what should succede of her eldest sonnes chaunce, sent her two yonger sonnes, George and Rycharde ouer the sea, to the Citie of Mtrechte in Almayne: where they were of Philip Duke of Burgoyne well receyued and feasted, and so there they remayned till their brother Edward had obteyned the realme, and gotten the regiment. During which time diuers Marchaunts mistrusting the mutation of the worlde, fled out of the realme, amongst whome, one Philip Malpas a man of great ryches, sailyng into Flaunders, was taken by John Columme a french man, and payde foure thousand Markes for his raunsome. The Erles of Marche and Warwike, hauing perfite knowlege, that the king and Quene with their adherentes, were departed from saint Albones, determined first to ryde to London, as the chiefe key and common spectacle to the whole realme, thinking there to assure themselves of the East and West parte of the kingdome, as king Henry and his faction nestled and strengthened him and his allies, in the North partes: meaning to haue a bucklar against a sword, and a southrene Byll, to counteruaile a Northren bastard. And so these two great Lordes, resolyng themselves vpon thys purpose, accompanied with a great number of men of warre, entred the Citie of London, in the first weeke of Lent. What should I declare how the Kentishmen resorted: howe the people of Essex swarmed, and how the Counties adioyning to London, daylie repayed to see, ayde, and comfort this lustie Prince and flower of Chiuallrie, as he in whome the hope of their ioy, and the trust of their quietnesse onely then consisted. Thys wise and prudent noble man, perceyuing the most parte of the Realme, to him friendly and adherent, minding to take time when time serued, called a great counsaile both of Lordes spirituall and temporall, and to them repeated the tittle, and right that he had to the realme, and dignitie royall: rehering the articles of the agreement, not only concluded betwene King Henry, and hys Noble father, Rycharde Duke of Yorke, by their writings signed and sealed: but also corroborated and confirmed by auctoritie of the high Courte of Parliament: the breaches whereof, he neither forgat, nor omitted vndeclared. After the Lordes had considered and weighed his tittle and declaration, they determined by auctoritie of the sayde counsaile, for as much as king Henry contrary to his othe, honoz and agreement, had biolated and infringed the order taken and enacted in the last parliament, and also because he was insufficient to rule the realme, and vnprofitable to the common wealth, he was therefore by the aforesayde auctoritie, deprived and delected of all kingly honoz, and regall souereintie. And incontinent, Edward Erle of Marche, sonne and heyre to Richard Duke of Yorke, was was by the Lordes in the sayde counsaile assembled, named, elected, and admitted, for king and gouernour of the realme: on which day, the people of the Erles parte being in their muster in saint Johns field, and a great number of the substantiall Citezens there assembled to beholde their order: so dainely the Lorde Falwconbridge which tooke the Musters, wisely declared to the multitude, the offences and breaches of the late agreement done and perpetrated by king Henry the sixt, and demaunded of the peöple, whether they would haue the sayde king Henry to rule and reigne any longer ouer them: To whome they with a whole voyce, answered nay, nay. Then he asked them, if they would serue, loue, and obey the Erle of Marche, as their earthly prince, and soueraigne Lorde. To which question they answered, yea, yea, cryng king Edward, with many great showtes and clapping of handes. The Lordes were shortly aduertised of the louing consent which the commons frankly and freely of their free will had geuen, wherupon incontinent, they all with a conuenient number of the most substanciall commons, repaired to Baynardes Castell, making iust and true reporte to the Erle of their election and admission, and the louing assent of the saythfull commons. The Erle after long pausing, first thanked God of his great grace and benefite, then to him declared and shewed, and the Lordes and commons also, for their hartie fauor, and assured fidelitie, and notwithstanding that like a wise prince, he alleged his insufficiencie for so great a roime and weyghy a burden, as lacke of knowlege, want of experientie and diuers other qualities to a gouernour apperteyning: yet in conclusion he beyng perswaded by the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, the bishop of Excester and other Lordes, then being present, graunted to their petition, and toke vpon him the charge, and vpon the next day, beyng the fourth day of Marche, he as king rode to the Church of Saint Paule, and there offered. And after Te deum song, with great solempnitie, he was conueyed to Westminster, and there sat in the Hall, with the Scepter royall in his hand, where to all the peöple which there in great number were assembled, his tittle and claime to the crowne of England was declared by two maner of waies: the first, as sonne & heyre to Duke Richard his father, right enheritor to the same: the second, by auctoritie of Parliament and forfeiture committed by king Henry. Wherupon it was againe demaunded of the commons, if they would admit and take the sayde Erle as their prince and soueraigne Lorde, which all with one voyce cryed, yea, yea. Which agreement concluded, he entred into Westminster Church vnder a Canapy, with solempne procession, and there as king offered and after the homages taken of all the nobles there present, he returned by water to London, and was lodged in the Bishops Palace: daylie making prouision to go Northwarde agaynst his aduerse faction and open enemies, and on the morow he was proclaymed king, by the name of king Edward the fourth, throughtout the Citie. While these things were in doyng in the Southpart, King Henry being in the Northcountrie, thinking because he had slayne the Duke of Yorke, the chiefe Capitayne of the contrary lynage, that he had brought all thing to purpose and conclusion as he would, assembled a great armie, trusting with little paine, and small losse, to destroy the residue of his enemies, whome he esteemed to be of no force. But he was sore deceyued: for out of the dead stock, sprang a strong and mighty braunch, which

which by no meanes could either be brokē, or made sere: which was this king Edward the fourth, which was so beloued and fauored of the people, that no man was spoken of, no person was remembred but onely he: for he was so much esteemed, both of the nobility & commonalty, for his liberality, clemency, integrity, and courage, that aboue all other, he was extolled & praised to the very heauen. By reason wherof men of al ages & of all degrees to him dayly repayed, some offering themselves and their men to iopard their lifes with him, & other plenteously gaue him money, to suppozt his charges and maintaine his war. By reason wherof, he assembled together a purssant army, to the intent to geue to his enimies a fierce and a sharpe battaile, & so in one day to obtēin his purpose, & make an ende of al his trouble. When his army was redy, & al things prepared, he departed out of London the .xij. day of March, and by easy iourneis came to the Castel of Pomfret, where he rested, appointing the Lord Fitzwater to kepe y<sup>e</sup> passage at Ferybridge, with a great number of talle personages. Let no man thinke or yet imagine, y<sup>e</sup> either the counsaile of king Henry, or his bigilat Quene, either neglected or forgat to know or serch what their enimies did, but they prepared to their powter al the men, that they eyther could perswade or allure to their purpose to take their part. And thus thinking themselves furnished, comitted the gouernance of the armie to the Duke of Sommerset, the Erle of Northumberland, & the Lord Clifford, as men desiring to reuenge y<sup>e</sup> death of their parents slain at the first battaile of S. Albons. These noble Captaines, leauing king Henry, his wife & sonne, for their most safegard in y<sup>e</sup> City of Yorke, passed the riuer of Wharfe with all their power, intending to prohibite king Edward to passe over the riuer of Ayre, & for the moze expedition & exployt of their purpose (after many comparisous made betwene the Erle of Northumberland, and the Lord Clifford, both being in lusty youth, & of franck courage) the Lord Clifford determined with his light horsemē, to make an assay to such as kept the passage of Ferybridge, & so departed from the great armye on the Saturday before Palmsonday, & early or his enimies were ware, gat the bridge, and slue the keepers of the same, & all such as did withstand him. The Lord Fitzwater hearing the noise, sodainly rose out of his bed, and bnarmed, with a Dolar in his hand, thinking that it had bene a fray amongst his men, came down to appese the same, but or he eyther began his tale, or knew what the matter ment, he was slaine, & with him the bastard of Salisbury, brother to the Erle of Warwike, a baliant yong gentleman, & of great audacity. When the Erle of Warwike was informed of this feat, he like a man desperate moited on his hackney, & came blowing to king Edward, sayng: syr, I pray God haue mercy of their soules, which in y<sup>e</sup> beginning of your enterprize haue lost their liues, and because I see no succours of the world, I remit the vengeance & punishment to God our creator and redemer, & with that lighted down and slue his horse with his sword, sayng: let him flie y<sup>e</sup> wil, for surely I will tary with him that wil tary with me. The lusty king Edward, perceiuing the corage of his trustie friend the Erle of Warwike made proclamation that al men, which were afraid to fight, should incontinent depart, & to al them that taried the battaile, he promised great rewards with this addition, that if any Souldiour, which voluntarily would not abyde, & in or before the conflict flye, or turne his back, that then he that could kyll hym, should haue a great rewarde, and double wages.

wages. After this proclamation ended, the Lord Fawconbridge, sir Walter Blunt, Robert Horne wyth the foreward, passed the ryuer at Castelforde three myles from Ferebridge, intending to haue enuyroned, and enclosed the Lord Clyfforde, and hys company, but they being thereof aduertised, departed in great haste towarde kyng Henryes armye, but they met with some that they looked not for, and were attrapped or they were ware. For the Lord Clyfforde, eyther for heate or payne, putting of his Gorget, sodaynely wyth an arrowe (as some say) wythout an hedde, was striken into the throte and incontinent rendered his spirite, and the Erle of Westmerlandes brotch and all his company almost were there slayne, at a place called Dintingdale, not far from Cowton. This ende had he which slew the yong Erle of Rutlande, kneelyng on his knees: whose yong sonne Thomas Cliforde, was brought by with a Shepperd, in pooze habite, and dissimuled behauiour euer in feare, to publish his linage or degree, till king Henry the .vij. obtayned the Crowne, and gatte the diademe: by whome he was restored to hys name and possessions. When this conflict was ended at Ferebridge, the Lord Fawconbridge, hauing the forewarde, because the Duke of Northfolke was fallen sick, valiantly vpon Palmsonday in the twylyght, set forth his army, and came to Sarton, where he myght apparauntly perceyue the host of his aduersaryes, which were accompted .lx. M. men, and thercof aduertised kyng Edward, whose whole armye; they that knewe it, and payed the wages, affirme to be, xlviij. M. .vj. C. and .lx. persons, which incontinent with the Erle of warwike set forward, leanyng the rereward vnder the gouernance of Sir John Wenlock, and Syr John Dynham and other. And first of all he made proclamation, that no prisoner should be taken, nor one enemye saued. So the same day about nine of the clock, which was the .xxix. day of Marche, beyng Palmsonday, both the hostes approached in a plaine fielde, betwene Cowton and Sarton. When eche parte perceyued other, they made a great showte, and at the same instant time, there fell a small suite or snow, which by violence of the winde was driuen into the faces of them which were of king Henryes parte, so that their sight was somewhat blemished and minished. The Lord Fawconbridge, which led the foreward of king Edwardes battaile (as before is reherfed) being a man of great pollicie and of much experience in marciall feates, caused euery archer vnder his standard, to shoote one flight (which before he caused them to proude) and then made them to stand still. The Northren men feeling the shot, but by reason of the Snowe, not well bewyng the distaunce betwene them and their enimies, like hardy men shot their sheafe arrowes as fast as they might, but all their shot was lost, and their labor vaine, for they came not nere the Southren men, by .xl. Taylozs yardes. When their shot was almost spent, the Lord Fawconbridge marched forward with his archers, which not onely shot their whole sheues, but also gathered the arrowes of their enimies, and let a great parte of them flie agaynst their awne Maisters, and another part they let stande on the ground, which soze noyed the legges of the owners, when the battail ioyned. The Erle of Northumberland, and Andrew Crollop, which were chiefetaynes of king Henryes Watogard, seyng their shot not to preuaile, hasted forward to ioyne with their enimies: you may be sure the other parte nothing lacked, but valyauntly fought with their enimies.

This battaile was sore foughten, for hope of lyfe was set on side on euery parte, and taking of prisoners was proclaimed as a great offence, by reason wherof euery man determined, eyther to conquere or to die in the field. This deadly battaile and bloudy conflict, continued ten houres in doubtfull victorie. The one part sometime flowing, and sometime ebbing, but in conclusion king Edward so courageously comforted his men, refreshing the werie, and helping the wounded, that the other part was discomfited and overcome and like men amased fled toward Cadcaster bridge to saue themselves: but in the meane way there is a little brooke called Cock, not very broad, but of a great deepnesse, in the which, what for haste of escaping, and what for feare of folowers, a great number were drent and drowned, in so much that the common people there affirme, that men alvye passed the ryuer vpon deade carcasses, & that the great riuer of Warfe, which is the great sewer of that brooke, & of all the water comming from Cowton, was coloured with blood. The chase continued all night, and the most parte of the next daye, and euer the Northren men, when they sawe or perceyued any aduantage, returned againe and fought with their enemies, to the great losse of both parties. For in thys thre dayes were slayne (as they that knew it wrote) on both partes xxxvij. M. vij. C. lx. and. xvi. persons, all Engliche men and of one Nation, whereof the chiefe were the Erles of Northumberland and Westmerland, and the Lorde Dakers, the Lorde Welles, sye John Beuel, Andrew Trolop, Robert Horne, and many other knightes and Esquiers, and the Erle of Deuonshire taken prisoner, but the Dukes of Sommerset and Excester fled from the field and saued themselves. This conflict was in maner vn-naturall, for in it the sonne fought agaynst the father, the brother agaynst the brother, the Nephew agaynst the Uncle, and the tenant agaynst his Lorde, which slaughter did sore and much weaken the puyssance of thys realme, considering that these dead men, when they were liuyng had force ynough to resist the greatest princes power of all Europe: But also gaue a courage to outward enemies, and forreyn Potentates, to invade and make warre in this realme, which thing was not vnlikely to haue ensued, if eyther Lewys the french king had bene at this time quiet in his realme, or James king of Scottes had bene of age and Maister of himselfe, yet thanked be God, for although the gate of a conquest were opened, yet it was shut againe or it was espyed.

After this great victorie, king Edward rode to Porke, where he was with all solempnitie receyued: and first he caused the heades of his father, the Erle of Salisbury, and other his friendes to be taken from the gates, and to be buried with their bodyes. And there he caused the Erle of Deuonshire and thre other to be beheaded, and set their heades in the same places. After that, he sent out men on light horses, to espie in what part king Henry lurked, which heering of the discomfiture and losse of his friendes, departed incontinent with his wyfe and sonne, to the towne of Barwike, and leaving the Duke of Sommerset there, came to the Kinges Court of Scotland, requiring of him and his counsaile, ayde, succour, reliefe and comfort. The yong king hauing compassion on the miserable fate and great mischance of this sorowfull man, not onely comforted him with fayre words and friendly promises, but also assigned to him a competent pencion to liue on, during the

the time of hys abode within the Realme of Scotland. King Henry considering the great humilitie, shewed to him by the Scottish king, in whome onely now consisted the whole hope and especiall trust of his ayde and succour, thought to binde the sayde king with some great benefite to his parte, and for y cause deliuered to him the towne of Barwike vpon Tweede: which towne the Scottes manye yeres had desired, but yet they neyther by force nor fayre promises, could obteyne their desire or purpose before that time. Some wyters affirme that he not voluntarily, but constrained by necessitie, rendered the same towne, or else he could not be permitted once to enter, or haue any succour in the realme of Scotlande. But whatsoeuer the cause was: after king James had taken possession of the towne, he friendly entertained and faytfully supported the part and faction of king Henry, and concluded a marriage betwene his sister and the yong prince of Wales, which marriage, Philip Duke of Burgoyne, enemye to Quene Margarets father, labored much to breake and interrupt: but by the consent of both the friends the matrimony was agreed, but it was neuer solempnised, as after you shal heare. When king Henry was somewhat setteled in the realme of Scotland, he sent his wyfe and hys sonne into fraunce, to king Keyner her father, trusting by his ayde and succour to assemble a great armie, and once agayne to possesse his realme and dignitie, and he in the meane season determined to make his abode in Scotlande, to see and espie, what waye his friendes in Englande woulde studie or inuent for his restitution and aduancement. But whether it were his destinie or his follie, he so imprudently demeaned himselfe, that within short space, he came into the handes of his mortall enemies. Quene Margaret thus being in fraunce, did obteyne and impetrate of the yong french king, that all fautors and louers of her husband and the Lancastreall bande, might safely and surely haue resoorte into any part of the realme of fraunce, prohibiting all other of the contrary faction, any accesse or repaire into that Countrie.

Thus you haue hearde the variable chaunce and lamentable history of king Henry the sixt, which had reigned ouer this realme .xxxviij. yeeres and odde Monethes, which the tenth yere after his deposicion, was agayne erected to his throne and estate royall, as after shall be declared. Now leaving kyng Henry with the Princes of his faction, consultyng together in Scotland, and Queene Margaret his wyfe gathering men together in fraunce, I will returne to the actes of King Edward.

After this great victory by King Edward obteyned at the battaile of Towton, as aforesayde, he returned lyke a triumphant Conquerour, with great pompe vnto the Citie of London, where, the fourth day of Marche. 1460. by sound of Trumpet he was proclaymed king of this Realme, and the .xxix. day of June next folowing, he was at Westminster with all solempnitie crowned, and annoynted king, by the name of king Edward the fourth.

And in this yere he called his high court of Parliament, wherby the estate of the Realme was wholly set in good order, and specially such thinges as apperteyned to the common wealthe, which befoze were to much neglected and decayed. Durynge the tyme of this ciuill and intestine warre, he caused all statutes and ordinaunces made by king Henry the sixt, (which eyther touched his title or his profite) to be adnihilate and frustrate. In the which Parliament the Erle of Oxforde farre stricken in age, and the Lorde Wobrey were his sonne and heyre, whether it were for malice of their enemies, or they were suspected, or had offended the king, they both, and diuerse of their counsaylors, were attainted and put to execution, which caused John Erle of Oxford euer after to rebell. And afterwarde he created his two yonger brethren Dukes, that is to say: Lorde George, Duke of Clarence, Lorde Richard, Duke of Gloucester, and Lord John Beuell brother to Richard Erle of Warwike, he first made Lorde Mountacute, and afterwarde created him Marques Mountacute. Beside this, Henry Bourchier, brother to Thomas Archebishop of Cantorbury, was created Erle of Essex, and William Lorde Fatowconbridge, was made Erle of Kent. To this Lord Henry Bourchier beyng a noble man in martiall actes, highly approued and renoumed, Richard Duke of York, long befoze this tyme, had geuen his sister Elizabeth in mariage: Hauyng: firme hope, and a sure confidenc, that he and his generation should be a perpetuall ayde to the Duke and his sequele, aswell in prosperitie as aduersitie, associate together in all chaunces of fortune, which trust he did not defraude, as afterward appered to this king Edward the fourth, sonne to the sayde Duke Richard, which for his assured fidelitie, made him Erle of Essex: to the ende that both he the father, and his sonne should euer be to him, both an ayde and a bulwarke. This Erle Henry, begat of Ladie Elizabeth his wife, foure sonnes, William, Thomas, John, and Henry, and one daughter named Isabell, which liued but a small season. In the which sonnes, in compassyng and bringyng great thinges to passe, there lacked no industrie, nor prouidence: and they were hardye, strong, and courageous: But in Lorde William, the eldest sonne of Henry, all these vertues were surely planted and ingrauen: which William espoused Ladie Anne Woodwile, discended of an highe parentage, whose mother Jaquet was daughter daughter to Peter of Lurenborough, Erle of Saint Paule, by whom he had Lorde Henry afterwarde Erle of Essex, and Cicile, and Isabell, which dyed vnmayed: Cicile was mayed, to Walter Lord Ferrers of Chartley. But nowe to retorne to the purpose.

Ye haue heard befoze in the .xxviii. yere of the reigne of king Henry the sixt, that the Lordes borowed of the Marchantes of the Staple. xliii. thousand pound, the which money the Staplers did nowe sue for vnto king Edwarde to be repayed vnto them, for that they sayde they disbursed the same in his affayres: But their sute was finally regarded, and shortly after they were willed to silence and to demaunde it no more.

And this yere in the ende of September, the king sent the Erle of Kent and other into Briteyn, who shortly after wonne the Isle of Conquet.

When all these chaunces thus luckily happened to king Edwarde, and all thinges in maner were framed as he would haue them: Henry Duke of Sommerfet, sir Raufe Percie, & diuers other, beyng in dispayre, and out of hope of all good chaunce, that might happen to king Henry the sixt came humbly & submitted themselves, whome he gently entertained & lovingly receyued. Of which dede, the duke shortly repented him, & so did some of the other.

All this season was king Henry the sixt in Scotland, which to haue the more ayde and comfort of the Scottische king, he deliuered vnto him the towne of Barwike, (as you befoze haue hearde) which had bene continually in the possession of the English men, from the tyme of king Edward the first, which with hardie courage, manfull assautes, and slaughter of many thousandes of Scottes, valiantly conquered the same. This same season also, Queene Margaret beyng in Fraunce, by the meanes of her father & friends found such friendship at the french kings hands, that she obteyned a crue of five hundred frenchmen, which was but a small number for her purpose, and yet a greater number then her husband or she were able to enterteyne in wages, of their awne Coffers. She thus beyng accompanied, with these boastyng frenchmen, of whome syr Piers Bzacy, a Briteyne Knight was Capitaine, set by her sayles, and with a prosperous winde arryued in Scotland, where she and her company were welcome to her husband and sonne. Then the Queene and her company thinkyng to doe some great enterpryse, sayled towarde New Castell, and landed at Cimmouth. But whether shee were afrayed of her awne shadowe, or that the frenchmen cast to manye doubt, the truth is, that the whole army returned to their Shippes, and a tempest rose so sodainly, that if she had not taken a small Caruel, and arryued safe at Barwike: she had neuer bered king Edward after, as she did with a new inuasion, nor yet she had not liued all her olde age in misery, wretchednesse, & calamity, as she did, lesyng both her husband, her sonne, her realme, and her honoz. And although at that tyme fortune was so fauozable to her, yet her companie were with stormie blastes driuen on the shore befoze Banborough Castell, where they set theyr Shippes on fyre, and cowardly fled to an Island, called holy Island, where they were so assayled by the bassard Ogle, an Esquier called John Hammers, with other of king Edwardes retinue, that many of them were slaine, and almost foure hundred taken prisoners, and put to ransome. But the Captain Bzacy more coward then corageous, happened by chaunce of a fisherman, and so came to Barwike to Queene

Margaret his Mistres: whether she gaue him thanks or no, I doubt, but sure I am, he none deserued, yet she made him Capiteyn of Alnewike Castell, which he with his freshe men kept till they were rescued. This chaunce little amased the Queene, nor in any thing abated her haut courage. For incontynently she obteyned a great companie of Scottes, and other of her friendes and so bringyng her husband with her, and leauyng her sonne called Prince Edward, in the towne of Barwike, entred Northumberland, and tooke the Castell of Bambrough, and stuffed it with Scottes, and made therof Capitaine s<sup>r</sup> Raufe Grey, and came forwarde towarde the Bishoprike of Durham. When the Duke of Sommerset heard these newes, he without delay refused king Edward, and rode in poste to his kinsman king Henry the sixt: verifiyng the olde prouerbe: kinne will creepe where it may not go: Refusi- syng the surety of his estate, which king Edward did promise him, for the un- certaine gaue which he hoped to get, by supportyng king Henry: with him fled also s<sup>r</sup> Raufe Percy, and many other of the kinges friendes, but many mo followed him, for couetousnesse of spoyle and rapyne: insomuche that the puyssaunce of king Henry, was thought to be of as muche force, as the strength & armie of his enemy king Edward. The which armie was iudged to be the greater, because he spoyled, & burned townes, and destroyed fieldes where soeuer he came. King Edward (as you coulde not blame him) was with these doyngs nothing content: wherefore like a wise Prince, intending to stop the gut of king Henryes power, or it made any further issue: prepara- red all munitions, conuenient for the warre, riged and apparailled a great nauye of shippes, of which some were bitayled at Lyn, and some at Hull, and they were furnished with Souldiours. When his army by the sea was thus warlikely set forward: he sent the Lorde Montacute (whome both for his hardinesse and sage conduite in marciall affayres, he much trusted and bele- ued) into Northumberland, there to rayse the people to withstande his ene- mies. And after this, he in his royall person, accompanied with his brethren, and a great part of the nobilitie of his Realme, not without a great and puyssaunt armie, marched towarde his enemyes, and came to the Citie of Yorke, sendyng a great quantitie of his faythfull subiectes, to the ayde of the Lorde Montacute, least peradventure he geuyng to much confidence to the men of the Bishoprike and Northumberlande, might by them be deceyued and surprised. The Lorde Montacute, forgat not the office of a good Cap- itaine, and beyng well furnished with such as he knewe would neyther flye backwarde, nor stande still lookyng on, thought no lenger to tract the tyme, but with a baliant courage marched forwarde towarde his enemyes, and en- countered with the Lorde Hungerford, the Lorde Roos, s<sup>r</sup> Raufe Percy, and diuers other, at a place called Hegely More. Where sodainly the sayde Lorde, in maner without stroke strikyng fled, and onely s<sup>r</sup> Raufe Percy abode, and was there manfully slain, with diuers other, sayyng, when he was dyng: I haue saued the birde in my bosome: meanyng that he had kept, both his promise and othe to king Henry the sixt. The Lorde Montacute seyng fortune thus prosperously leadyng his sayle, was aduanced with har- die courage towarde his enemyes, and then in passyng forwarde, he had by his espialles perfect intelligence, that king Henry with all his powe, was encamped in a sayre plaine called Liuels, on the water of Dowill in Exham- shire.

shire. It was no neede to bid him haste haste, as he that thought not to leese the occasion to him so manifestly geuen, & therfore in good order of battaile, he manfully set on his enemyes in their awne campe, which like desperate persons, with no small courage receiued him. There was a soze fought field, and no partie by a long tract, could get any aduantage of the other, till at the last, the Lorde Montacute cryng on his men to do valiauntly, entred by plaine force the battaile of his enemyes, and brake their array, which like men amased, fled hether and thether, desperate of all succor. In which flight and chase, were taken Henry Duke of Sommerset, which before was reconciled to king Edward, the Lorde Roos, the Lorde Holyns, the Lorde Hunger- ford, s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Wentworth, s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Huse, s<sup>r</sup> John Fynderne, and many other. King Henry was this day the best horseman of his company: for he fled so fast that no man could ouertake him, and yet he was so nere pur- sued, that certaine of his Henchmen and folowers were taken, theyr horses beyng trapped in blew beluet: wherof one of them had on his head, the said king Henryes Helmet. Some say his high Cap of estate, called Abococket, garnished with two riche Crownes, which was presented to king Edward, at Yorke the fourth day of May. The Duke of Sommerset, was incontynently for his great mutabilitie and lightnesse, behedded at Exham, the other Lodes and knightes were had to Newe Castell, and there after a little re- spite, were likewise put to execution. Besyde these persons, diuers other to the number of. xxv. were executed at Yorke, and in other places: whereby o- ther fautoz of king Henryes partie, should be out of all trust of all victozy, consideryng that theyr Capitaines had hopped hedlesse. From this battaile escaped king Henry the sixt, s<sup>r</sup> Humfrey Neuell, William Taylboys, calling himselfe Erle of Kent, s<sup>r</sup> Raufe Grey, and Richard Tunstall, and dyuers other, which beyng in feare of takyng, hid themselues and lurked in denes and holes secretly. They were not so closely hid, but they were espyed: for the Erle of Kent was taken in a close place in Riddesdale, and brought to Newe castell, and there with an Axe lost his head. Sir humfrey Neuell after long lurkyng in a Caue, was taken in Holdernesse, and at Yorke behedded. Thus euery man almost that escaped, was after taken and scorged: so that it should seeme that God had ordeyned all such persons as rebelled agaynst king Edward, to haue in conclusion, death for there rewarde.

After this battaill called Exham fielde, King Edward came to the cy- tie of Duresme, to the intent to be moze neerer to his enemyes, if they would make any farther attempt: and sent from thence in Northumberlande the Erle of Warwicke, the Lorde Montacute, the Lodes, Faluconbridge and Scrope, and diuers other, to recouer such Castels and fortresses as his ene- mies, there helde, and wyth force defended. These Lodes first besieged the castel of Alnewike, which sir Piers Bracy and the frenchmen, by force and strong hande kept, & in no wise woulde yelde, sending for ayde to the Scots, whereupon sir George Douglas, Erle of Angus, with. xiiij. M. men well chosen, in the day time rescued the frenchmen out of the castel, the English- men looking on, which thought it much better to haue the castel, without losse of their men, then to leese both the castel and their men, considering the powe of the Scottes, and their small number: and so they entred the castel and manned it, and after the sayde lodes, besieged the castel of Dunstanbrough, and by force tooke it, and John Goy, seruaunt to the Duke of Sommerset capytaine of the sayde castle, was taken and brought to Porke: where, wyth a Hatchet he was behedded. These Lordes also tooke by force, the strong Castle of Samberough, & in it sir Raufe Gray, which was before swoorne to King Edward, for the which perurie to both the Princes, he was disgraded of the high order of knighthoode at Dancastre, by cutting of his guyll spurre, rentyng his Cote of armes, and breaking his swoorde ouer his hed: and finally, there his body was thortned, by the length of his hed.

After this victorie, king Edward returned to Porke, where, in despite of the Erle of Northumberlande, which then lurked in the realme of Scotlande, he created sir John Neuell, Lorde Montacute, Erle of Northumberlande, and in reproofe of Jasper Erle of Penbrooke, he created William Lord Herbert Erle of the same place: but after when by mediacion of friends the Erle of Northumberlande, was reconciled to his fauor, he restored hym fully to his possessions, name, and dignitie: and not intending thereby to dimynish the honor of his friend, he preferred sir John Neuell, to the stile of Marques, Mountacute, & so by that meanes, he was in estate and degree higher, then the Erle of Warwicke his elder brother, but in power, polletie, and possessions, farre baser and lower.

Although King Edward might now thinke, all things to be in a good case, and himselfe also to be of puissance sufficient against all his enemyes, (for that he had obtayned so great a victorie:) yet did he prouide with all diligence, that neyther king Henry, nor Queene Margaret his wife, shoulde by any meanes remayne in Englande: least the sight, with the perswasions of them, and especially, with olde friendes and allies, might alter and chaunge the mindes, and also wyne the hartes of the mutable commonaltie. Wherefore he edified bulwarkes, and builded fortresses on euerie side and parte of his realme, where might be any place apt and meete, for an armie to arrive or take lande. Beside this, he wrote to all them in the South partes of his realme, that in no wyse they shoulde receiue the sayde Queene, nor any thing should helpe or minister to her: and if any did presume or attempt, priuately or openly, to infringe his wil and commaundement, the offenders shoulde be taken as his aduersaries, and punished as his vtter enemyes. And on that part that marcheth vpon Scotlande, he layde watches and espyalles, that no person shoulde go out of the realme, to king Henry and his company: which then lay sojournyng in Scotlande. But whatsoeuer ioperdy or perill myght be construed or deemed, to haue ensued by the meanes of kyng Henry: all such doubtles, were now shortly resolved and determined, and all feare of his doings were clerely put vnder and extinct. For he himselfe, whether he were past all feare, or was not well stablished in his perfite minde, or coulde not long keepe himselfe secret, in a disguised apparell, boldly entred into Englande. He was no soner entred, but he was knowen and taken of one Cantlowe, and brought toward the King, whome the Erle of Warwicke met on the way, by the kings commaundement, and brought him through London, to the towre, and there he was layde in sure holde. Queene Margaret hys wife hearing of the captiuitie of hir husband, mistrusting the chaunce of her some, all desolate and comfortlesse, departed out of Scotlande, and sayled into fraunce, where she remayned with Duke Keyner her father, till shee tooke take her infortunate iorney into Englande agayne: where she lost both husbande and sonne, and also all her welth, honoz, and worthy felicitye. The new Duke of Sommerset & his brother John, sailed into Flaunders, where they also lyued in great miserye, till Duke Charles, because he was of their kinne, and descended of the house of Lancastre by his mother, succored them with a small pencion, which to them was a great comfort. The Erle of Penbrooke went from countrye to country, not alwayes at his hartes ease, nor in securitie of lyfe, or surety of lyuing. Such an vnstable and blynde goddesse is fortune: for when he that sitteth highest on the wheele falleth to the ground all that be vnderneath fall also, and can neyther haue ayde nor helpe of her, nor yet of themselves.

After the taking of king Henry the. vi. and the departing of his wife, this Realme was in more quietnesse, and tranquilytie, because that men of the contrary part and faction, durst not once attempt nor yet mooue any new tumult or conspiracie, considering that both the hed was fallen, and the chiefe members fled, and banquished. Wherefore king Edward, beyng cleerely out of doubt, of all hostilitye and daunger, set all his minde the whole foure yeres following, for both amending things preiudiciall to the common welth and also for stablishing of things, meete and necessarye, for the people of hys Realme and Dominion. And first of all, following the olde auncient adage which sayeth, that the husbandman ought first to taste off the newe growen fruite: he distributed the possessions, of such as tooke part with king Henry the. vi. to his souldiours and capitaynes, which he thought had well deserued it. And beside, he left no poynt of lyberalitie vnshewed, by the which hee might allure to him, the beneuolence and louyng heartes of his peoples: and in especiall to his nobilitie, he gaue both large and precious giftes and rewardes. And because that he would gladly haue the loue of all men, aswell noble as ignoble, aswell of riche as of poore, he shewed himselfe more familiar, both with the Nobilitie & the Commonalty, then (as some men thought) was convenient eyther for his estate, or for his honoz: which gentlenesse and friendly familiaritie he euer after bled. The lawes of the realme, in part he reformed, and in part he newly augmented. The coyne both of Gold & of Siluer, which yet at this day is currant, he newly deuised and deuided: For the Golde he named Royals, and Nobles, and the Siluer he called Grotes, and halfe grotes. After this he caused open Proclamation to be published, that all persons which were adherent to his aduersaryes part, and woulde leaue their armure, and submit themselves wholly to his grace and mercye, should be clerely remitted, pardoned, and released: and they that obstinately would so refuse, should haue such paynes, as by the lawe to suche transgressors was assigned and appoynted. What profite this gentle entertaynyng of his people brought him to, and what good will and fixed heartes of the people, he obteyned by this kinde and friendly handlyng, all men may easely coniecture. For onely by the fauor and ayde of the people, euer after in all his warres, he was a victor and a conqueror: so that all enterpryses afterwarde against him attempted, had eyther euill successe, or were soone refelled, as afterward you shall perceyue. When he had brought his realme into thys estate, he surely thinkyng, and no lesse trustyng, but that he was set in the sure stall, stable thzone, and immouable Chayre of the crowne of his realme and kingdome, was not onely desyrous of himselfe, beyng a prince of haute courage, yong, lustie, and sanguine of complexion, to haue a wyfe, but was also dayly sollicitid, requyred, and mocioned of the peeres and nobilitie of the realme, to ioyne with such a Duke, as should be both to his honour, and contentacion, and also for the securitie and establishment of the royall succession, and continuance of his progenie, in his newe possessed Countrie, and late recovered kingdome. Whereupon like a wise and circumspect Prince, very desyrous of a Quene, but more thirsting for such a Duke, by the ayde of whose parentes, allyes, and confederates: he beyng ioynd with them in perfect affinitie, might little or nothyng doubt the attemptes of his aduersarie king Henry, nor yet the malice of his secret friendes and priuie fauours. This matter (as it was of great waight and unportance) hangyng long in consultation: Amongest other it was moued, to sende to James the thirde king of Scottes, for the obtayning of the fayre Ladie Margaret his sister, to the intent, that on that syde, king Henry his aduersarye, should be destitute of all ayde, refuge, succor, and comfort: but whether it were for a priuie sicknesse, or an open impediment, to him and his Counsaile declared, or by them spyed, this mocion banished, and tooke no farther effect. Then (as many men haue sayde, and fewe or none haue writen) it was farther consulted, that the Ladie Elizabeth, sister & heyre apparant, to Done Henry king of Castell (which afterward was his heyre in deede, and maryed to Done Fernando, king of Aragon) was a maryage for him most conuenient, and them that should finally succede him, consideryng that if he might obteyne the kingdome of Castell, of the which his great Grandmother was one of the heyres, as daughter to Done Peter, late king of Castell, (by the balaunt knight, Edward Prince of Wales, restored to his Seignorie, Realme, and Kingdome, then were he in case, not only able to defend himselfe and his realme of England, agaynst all foreyn enemies, and bitter inuasions, but also he should be of puyssance sufficient to inuade, and likely to recover the Duchie of Guien, yea and whole Aquitain, beyng his awne true and lawfull inheritance, with the ayde onely of the Castillians, putting the Englishe men to little traualle and lesse charge. This mocion thus set forwarde, seemed highly to redounde, both to the honor of the king, and the high aduancement of, the estate of the Realme: Consideryng the high parentage of the woman. And this mariage agreed vpon (which semeth more likely to be intreated of then concluded.) The Erle of Warwike was sent into Spaine, well instructed, & no lesse accompanied for the conclusion of the said mariage. But who so wil diligently consider, the youth and appetite of king Edward, & the tender age & minority of this noble Damofell: may evidently perceyue, & it was neyther decent nor conuenient for him nor his realme, to abide and tarie the maturitie and decent full age of this noble princes, nor that he being a prince, wel cherished, of lusty courage, and apt to generation, would or could liue sole & unmarried without a wyfe, till she were of age, meete and conuenient for his bed. For it appereth on her goodly Sepulture, in the Citie of Granada (where she is buried) and also dyuers famous and notable Historiographers, both of Spaine and other regions write and affirme, that she changed this transitorie lyfe, in the yere of our Lord. 1506. being fiftie yeres of age, one moneth lacking. By which report she should be bozne in the yere of our Lord. 1456.

And

And when the Erle of Warwike was sent for the mariage of king Edward, in the beginning of the thirde yere of his reigne, the yere of our Lord was 1463, so that then she was sixe and not fully seuen yeres, at which time king Edward had fully accomplished. xxiiij. yeres and more. The treaty of which mariage although it be not vnpossible, yet for the causes aforesayde, it seemeth not a little vnlikely. But admit that this mariage was moued, as it peradventure might be, and that the Erle of Warwike sayled into Spaine (as he did not in deede) of lykelihood his legation was frustrate, and came to none effect: but sure it is that the same yere, he came to king Lewys the xi. then being french king, liyng at Tours, and with great honor was there receyued, and honorably enterpyned: of whome, for king Edward his mayster, he demaunded to haue in mariage the Lady Bona, daughter to Lewys Duke of Sauoy, and sister to the Lady Carlot then french Quene, being then in the french court. This mariage seemed politiquely deuised, and of an high imagination to be inuented, if you will well consider the state and condition of king Edwards affayres, which at this time had king Henry the first in safe custodie, in the strong Tower of London, and the most parte of his adherentes, he had as he thought, eyther ouerthrowne or destroyed, Quene Margaret onely except, and Prince Edward her sonne, which were then sojourning at Angiers with olde Duke Keyner of Aniuow her father, wytyng himselfe king of Naples, Sicile, and Jerusalem, hauing as much profites of the letters of his glozious stile, as rentes and reuenues out of the sayde large and riche Realmes and dominions (because the King of Aragon tooke the profites of the same, and would make no accompt thereof to Duke Keyner.) King Edward therefore thought it necessary to haue affinitie in Fraunce, and especially by the Queenes sister: trusting that by the sayde mariage, Queene Margaret whome the same Queene Carlot little or nothing regarded, although her father was called a king & she a Quene, and none of both hauing subiectes, profites nor dominions, should haue no ayde, succour, nor any comfort of the french king, nor of none of his friends nor allies, wherfore Quene Carlot much desirous to aduance her bloud and progenie, and especially to so great a prince as king Edward was, obteyned both the good will of the king her husband, and also of her sister, so that the matrimony on that side was cleerely assented to, and the Erle of Dampmar-tine appointed with other to sayle into Englande, for the cleere finishing of the same. After these things thus concluded, the Erle of Warwike was dismissed and highly rewarded, and for the great and noble courage that was in him, he obteyned such fauor of the king, the Queene, and the Nobles of Fraunce, that when he fled out of England, he was there honorably receyued, friendly mainteyned, and louingly succoured, as you shall perceyue hereafter.

But now consider the old prouerbe to be true that saith: that mariage is destiny. For during the time & the Erle of Warwike was thus in Fraunce, and had concluded a mariage for king Edward: The king being on hunting in the Forest of Wythwood beside Stonnystratford, came for his recreation to the manor of Grafton, where the Duches of Bedford sojourned, then wife to Syr Richard Wooduile, Lorde Ryuers, on whome then was attending a daughter of hers, called dame Elizabeth Grey, wydow of Syr John Grey knight, knight, slaine at the battayle of Saint Albons, by the power of king Edward. Thys wydow hauing a sute to the king, eyther to be restored by him to some thing taken from her, or requiring him of pittie, to haue some augmentation to her lyuing, found such grace in the kings eyes, that he not onely fauored her sute, but much more phantased her person, for she was a woman moze of foymall countenance, then of excellent bewtie, but yet of such bewtie and fauor, that with her sober demeanour, louely loking, & feminine smiling, (neyther to wanton nor to humble) beside her tongue so eloquent, and her wit so pregnant, she was able to rauishe the minde of a meane person, when she allured and made subiect to her, the hart of so great a king. After that king Edward had well considered all the knyaments of her body and the wise and womanly demeanour that he sawe in her, he determined first to attempt, if he might prouoke her to be his soueraigne Ladye, promising her many gites and fayre rewardes, affirming farther, that if she would thereunto condiscend, she might so fortune of his pe remour and Concubine, to be chaunged to his wyfe and lawfull bedfelow: which demaunde she so wisely, and with so couert speeche answered and repugned, affirming that as she was for his honour farre vnable to be his spouse and bedfelow: So for her awne poze honestie, she was to good to be eyther is Concubine or soueraigne Ladie: that where he was a little before heated with the dart of Cuppydo, he was now set all on a hote burning fire, what for the confidence that he had in her perfite constancie, and the trust that he had in her constant chastitie, and without any farther deliberation, he determined with himselfe clerely to mary with her, after that asking counsaile of them, which he knew neyther would, nor once durst impugne his concluded purpose.

But the Duchesse of Yorke his mother letted it as much as in her lay, alleging a precontract made by him with the lady Lucy, and diuers other lettes: all which doubtres were resolued, and all things made clere and all cauillations auoyded. And so priuily in a morning he maryed her at Grafton, where he first phantased her visage.

And in the next yeere after, shee was with great solemnitye crowned Queene at Westminster the .xviij. day of May. Her father also was created Erle Rivers, and made high Constable of Englande: her brother Lord Antony, was maryed to the sole heire of Thomas Lord Scales, and by her hee was Lord Scales. Syr Thomas Grey, sonne to Syr John Grey, the Queenes first husbände, was created Marquess Dorset, and maryed to Cicilie, heire to the Lord Bonville. Albeit this marriage, at the first apparence was very pleasaunt to the king, but moze ioyous to the Queene, and profitable to her blood, which were so highly exalted, yea, and so sodainly promoted, that all the nobilitie, moze maruayled then allowed, this sodayne rising. Yet who so will marke the sequele of this Stozy, shall manifestly perceiue, what nurther, what mystery, and what trouble ensued by reason of this marriage, for it cannot be denied, but for this marriage king Edward was expelled the Realme, and durst not abyde: And for this marriage was the Erle of Warwicke, and his brother miserably slayne: By this marriage were king Edwardes two sonnes declared bastardes, and in conclusion priued of their lyues: And finally by this marriage, the Queenes blood was confounded and in a maner vtterly destroyed.

Incommodities that sp. 3 of king Edwardes marriage.

The

The french king and his Quene were not a little discontent (as I can not blame them) to haue their sister first demaunded, and then graunted, and in conclusion reiected and apparantly mocked, without any cause reasonable. Wherefore shortly to appease her dolor, they married her to John Gaule, Duke of Millayne, where she lyued in great felicitie. But when the Erle of Warwicke had perfite knowledge by the letters of his trusty friends, that king Edward had gotten him a newe wyfe, and that all that he had done with king Lewys in his ambassade for the conioyning of this newe affinitie, was both frustrate and vaine, he was earnestly moued and sore chafed with the chaunce, and thought it necessarie that king Edward should be depofed from his crowne and royall dignitie, as an inconstaunt Prince, not worthy of suche a kingly office. All men for the most part agree, that this marriage was the onely cause, why the Erle of Warwicke bare grudge, and made warre on king Edward. Other affirme that there were other causes, which added to this, made the fyre to flame, which before was but a little smoke. For after that king Edward had obteyned his kingdome (as it was then thought) by the only helpe and meane of the Erle of Warwicke, he beganne to suspect, yea, and to doubt him, fearing least he being in such authority and estimation of the people, as he well might worke him pleasure or displeasure, when he thereunto were minded, wherefore he thought it conuenient a little, & a little to pluck away and minishe the power and auctoritie, which he and his predecessors had geue to the Erle, to the entent that he then might doe at his pleasure, both at home and in outwarde parties, without feare or dread, without check or taunt, whatsoeuer to his awne mind seemed most conuenient. By thys a man may see that often it chaunceth, that friends for one good turne will not render another, nor yet remember a great gratuitie and benefite in time of necessity to them shewed and exhibited: But for kindnesse they shewe vnkindnesse, and for great benefites receyued, with great displeasure they doe recompence. Of this the Erle of Warwicke was nothing ignorant, which although he looked for better thankes and greater benefites at king Edwards handes: yet he thought it best to dissimule the matter tyll such a tyme were come, as he might finde the king without strength, and then to imbrayd him with the pleasure that he had done for him. And farther it erreth not from the truth that king Edward did attempt a thing once in the Erles house, which was much against the Erles honesty (whether he would haue deflowred his daughter or his Neece, the certaintie was not for both their honors openly knowne) but surely such a thing was attempted by king Edward. But whether the iniurie that the Erle thought he had taken at king Edwardes handes, or the disdayne of auctoritie that the Erle had vnder the king, was the cause of dissolution of their amitie and league, truth it is, that the priuy intentions in their harts brake into so many small peeces, that England, Fraunce, and Flaunders, could neuer ioyne them agayne, during their naturall lyues.

The Erle of Warwicke being thus moued, inflamed, and set agaynst the king, least in hys furie, hys purpose might be eyspyed and brought to nought, determined hymselfe, couertly dissimulyng, so long to suffer all such wrongs and iniuries, as were to him done, tyll he might spie a tyme conuenient, and a woerde after hys awne appetite, for the setting forth of his enterprise,

lande, and with reuerence saluted the king, as he was wont to doe, and declared hys Ambassade & the exployt of the same, without any spot of grudge to be perceyued, as though he were ignorant of the newe matrimonie.
And when he had taried in the Court a certaine space, moze for to shew that he was the same person, and of the same good minde toward the king, as he was before the time of his Ambassade, then for any great affection that he bare, eyther to the king or to the Queene, he obteyned lycence of the king to depart to his Castell of Warwike, both for his helth and recreation, whether with great honour he was accompanied with diuers of the kings fami-lier seruitors, as though none inwarde grudge or couert dissimulation had bene hidden betwene them, where he remayned tyll all his priuie imaginations were made open, and all hys enterpryses were readie to be set forward.
And in the ende of thys yere, that is to say, the .xj. daye of februarye, the

ced a certaine
Sheepe to be transported vnto Spaine.

When king Edward had reigned thys, full the terme of fīue yeres, not all in pleasure, nor yet so in displeasure, but eyther by pollicie or friendship, he euer was superiour, and had the vpper hande of his enemies: He daylie studied and applyed hys whole minde with all labor and diligence to obteyne the loue, fauour, and amitie of outward princes. First to haue a Rotolande for an Olyuer, for the French king whome he knew not to be his friend, by reason of the refusall of his Quenes sister, he procured an amity with Henrie, king of Castell, and John king of Arragon. At the concluding of which amitie he graunted lycence and libertie for certayne colfolde Sheepe to be transported into the Countrie of Spayne (as people report) which haue so there multiplied and encreased, that it hath turned the commoditie of Eng-lande muche to the Spanishe profite, and to no small hynderaunce of the lucre and gayne which was before times in Englande, raysed of wolle and fell. Beside this to haue an amitie with his next neighbor the king of Scots, he wynting at the towne of Warwike, was content to take a truce for fiftene yeres.

But Lorde what happie chaunce and good luck had king Edward, for beside these newe friendes and confederates (of the which, some were moze farther off, then he could call to for helpe with a whistle, when he stode in most daunger and distresse) Fortune beside all his expectation prouided him euen at his elbowe, a brother in lawe, a perpetuall ally and friendly neygh-bour: which offered allpance and newe amitie, if he had eyther refused or missed. Surely of all his other supposed friends, for al their league, in his extreme necessitie, had cleerely left him without comfort. This happie chaunce came by this occasion. In this same season was Lorde and Prince in Flaunders, Brabant and Zelande, and other the lowe Countries there about, Philip Duke of Burgoyne, a man as he was of great age and yeres, so was he had in muche honoz, great estimation and high reuerence amongst all kings and Princes in his dayes: which Duke as you haue heard before, was enemye mortall to king Henry the sixt. This Duke had onely one sonne legitimate, called Charles Erle of Charoloyse, a man of such haute courage and auda-

Philip Duke

citie, as fewe or none was in his time: For how he discomfited king Leuoyse the .xj. then the French king at the battayle of Montleherrie, the Frenchmen hath not yet forgotten. The lande of Luke also hath in freshe memorie his sore scourge and cruell plague. This Erle Charles was at thys time a widower, hauing only a sole daughter, & no sonne, wherfore both by his father and himselfe and the companions of the order of the golden fleece, being of their counsaile, it was thought not onely expedient but much moze neces-sarie, that he should take a wyfe, yea and in such a place, as they might by that matrimony haue both alliaunce and ayde against all their outward enemies, and especially agaynst the French king, whome they knew daylie to wayte, and watch lyke a Serpent, how he by fraude might swallow or catch them or their possessions: vpon which communication it was declared by certayn, there being present, that king Edward of Englande had a fayre Virgin to his sister, called Lady Margaret, a Lady of excellent bewtie, whose good qualities, beside the giftes of nature, grace and fortune, were so seriously set forth to Duke Philip, and the Erle of Charoloyse his sonne, that both the father and the childe iudged that mariage to be the most meetest matrimony in Christendome, not onely for the excellent vertues imprinted in the person of the noble Virgin, but also for the great profite, alliaunce and continuall friendship that should growe and rise betwene the realme of England, and the Dukes landes.

After this mariage was fully resolved vpon, the Duke appoynted his bastard sonne Lord Antony, commonly called the bastard of Burgoyne, chiefe Ambassadoz for this purpose: a man of great wit, courage, valiantnesse and liberalitie, which beyng richly furnished of plate, and apparell, necessary for his estate, hauing in his companie gentlemen and other expert in all feates of chivalry, and martiall prowesse, to the number of foure hundred horses, (as the Brabanders write) tooke his ship, and with prosperous winde arri-ued in England, where he was of the Nobilitie receyued, and with all honorable entertainment conueyed to the kinges presence, which like a Prince, that knewe what apperteyned to his degree, louyngly welcomed, and familiarly embraced him, and other Nobles that came with him. And after his Commission seene, and his message declared, the king gaue to him a gentle answere for that tyme, and so the Ambassadors departed to their lodgyng, where they kept a great household, and made triumphant cheare. You may thinke that king Edward was not so vnwise, nor yet so vnpruiced of counsaile, to forsake this beneficiall alliaunce, thus frankly to him profered and graunted, but that he and all his counsaile endeuoured themselves to byng the same to passe (the Erle of Warwike onely except) which bearyng his hartie fauour to the French king by euill reportes, did as much as in him lay to hinder this mariage and affinitie, of whose good will the Erle Charles was well enformed.

But for all his opinion at a certain day, the king sent for the Ambassadors, and there declared to them how he gladly did both accept & graunt theyr louyng request & demaund, promising them in the word of a prince, & he would be durying his lyfe friend to the friendes of the Duke and the Erle, and ene-mie to their aduersaries and enemies, which wordes much pleased the Bur-gonions. After this he caused the Ladie Margaret his sister to be sent for,

Anthony the Bastarde
sonne of Phi-
Burgoyne.

A mariage concluded betweene Charles the son of Philip Duke of Burgoyne and Ladye Margaret sister to king Edward the fourth.

which being richly apparelled, accompanied with a great multitude of Ladies and gentlewomen, entered into the kinges great Chamber with so sober a demeanour, so fayre a visage, so louyng a countenance, and so princely a port, that she was esteemed for her personage and qualities, both of the Burgonions and other, not to be unworthy to matche in matrimonie, with the greatest Prince of the worlde. And after the king, she and the Ambassadors, had communed a good tract of tyme, the Lorde Anthonie Bastard of Burgondie, contracted openly the sayd Lady Margaret, for and in the name of his brother the Erle Charles, and there in the name of the Duke his father, and the Erle his brother, he presented to the Ladie Margaret a riche and a costly Jewell, which she toyously receyued with great thankes given, both to her father in law, and her newe contracted husband.

A Chalenge.

After this mariage thus concluded and contracted. The Bastard of Burgoyne, a man of a haute courage, challenged Anthonie Lorde Scales, brother to the Queene, a man both egall in hart and balauntnesse with the Bastard, to fight with him both on foote and on horseback, the Lorde Scales gladly receyued his demaunde, and promised him on the othe of a Gentleman, to aunswere him in the field at the daye appoynted: Like chalenges were made by other Burgonions, to the gentlemen of England, which were not refused. The king entending to see this martiall sport, and balaunt challenge performed, caused listes royall for the Champions, and costly Galleries for Ladies to looke on, to be newly erected in West Smithfield in London. And at the daye by the king assigned, the two Lordes entred within the Listes well mounted, richly trapped, and curiously armed. On which day they ranne together certaine courses with sharpe Speres, and so departed with egall honoz. The next day, they entred the fielde, the Bastarde sitting on a baye courser, being somewhat dimme of sight, and the Lorde Scales had a graye courser, on whose schaffron was a long and a sharpe pyke of steele. When these two balaunt persons coped together at the Cornay, the Lorde Scales horse by chaunce or by custome, thrust his pike into the nosethilles of the horse of the Bastard, so that for very paine he mounted so high, that he fell on the one syde with his mayster, and the Lorde Scales roade rounde aboute him, with his sworde thakng in his hande, till the king commaunded the Marshall to helpe by the Bastard, which openly sayd, I cannot holde by the Clondes, for though my horse fayled me, surely I will not fayle my counterpanion. And when he was remounted, he made a countenance to assaile his aduersary, but the king eyther fauouryng his brothers honour then gotten, or mistrustyng the shame which might come to the Bastard, if he were againe foyled, caused the Heraldes to crie, a Lostel. and euery man to depart. The Morowe after, the two noble men came into the fielde on foote, wyth two Polares, and there fought balauntly like two coragious Champions, but at the last, the poynt of the Axe of the Lorde Scales happened to enter into the sight of the helmet of the Bastard, and by fine force might haue plucked him on his knees, the king sodainly cast downe his warder, and then the Marshalles them seuered. The Bastard not content with this chaunce, being desirous to be reuenged, trustyng on his cunnynge at the Polare (the which feate he had greatly exercised, and therein had a great experiment) required the king of iustice, that he might perfoyme his enterprize: the Lorde Scales

not refused it. The king sayde he would aske counsaile, and so calling to him the Constable, and Marshall, with the officers of Armes, after long consultation had, and lawes of armes reherfed, it was declared to the Bastarde for a sentence diffinitue, by the Duke of Clarence, then Constable of England, and the Duke of Norfolke Erle Marshall, that if he would prosecute farther hys attempted challenge, he must by the lawe of Armes be deliuered to hys aduersary in the the same case and lyke condicion, as he was when he was taken from hym, that is to saye, the poynt of the Lorde Scales Axe to be fixed in the sight of his helme, as depe as it was when they were seuered. The Bastarde heeryng this iudgement, doubted much the sequele, if hee should so proccede againe, wherefore he was contented to relinquish his challenge, rather then to abyde the hazarde of his dishonour. Other Chalenges were done, and balauntlye atchieued by the Englishe men, which I passe ouer. When all these couragious actes were thus wyth ioye accomplished, sorowfull tidynges were brought to the Bastard, that Duke Philip his father was passed this transitorie lyfe, of which tidynges he was not a little sorowfull, and thereupon takyng hys leaue of king Edward and his sister, the newe Duches of Burgoyne, liberally rewarded with Plate and Jewelles, with all celeritie he returned to the newe Duke Charles his Nephew, accompyting to him what exploit he had made in his Ambassade & message, which aunswere was to the great contentacion and accomplishment of the desyre of the sayde Duke, and thereof most hartly thanked the Lady for her consent, as for the thing that he most desired, not forgettyng to gratifie king Edward for his preferment and furtheraunce in his louyng request.

Now to returne to Charles Duke of Burgoyne, which with great victory, and triumph, returned from the conquest of the land of Luke to Bruselles, he not forgetting the contract, which his bastard brother the Lorde Anthonie had made in his name, wyth the noble Princesse Lady Margaret, sister to Edward King of Englande, deuised alwayes howe he might with all honoz and royalty, haue her receyued into his countrey. And first he wrote to the king of Englande, to sende her ouer the sea with all diligence, according to the pact and league betwene them concluded, which being nothing slacke, and especially in such a cause, as so highly magnified his blood, prepared shippes and all things necessarye, for the honorable conduite of her and her company, and so accompanied with the Dukes of Excester, and Southfolke, and their wives, being both her sisters, and a great company of Lords, and Ladies, and other to the number of five hundred horses, and in the beginning of June departed out of London to Douer, and so sayled to Schuce, where shee and her company were receyued, and from thence conueyed to Bruges, where mariage was celebrate and Solempnized.

After the departure of this Lady Margaret. Sir Thomas Cooke late Mayor of London, which before had bene accused of treason by a seruaunt of the Lorde Wenlockes, called hawkins, and at the request of the saide Ladye Margaret, was suffered upon suretie to go at large, was nowe arrested, and sent to the Tower, and his goods seased by the Lorde Rivers, then treasurer of Englande, and his wife put out of his house, and she was committed to the charge of the Mayor, where she laye a great while after. And after the sayde sye Thomas was brought from the Tower to the Guldhall and there arreigned of treason, and was quit by sondy enquestes, and yet after was committed to the Counter in Bredstrete, and from thence to the Kings bench in Southwarke, where he lay vntill his friendes did agree with Sir John Brandon, then keper of the sayde prison, to take him home to his place, where to his great charge he remayned prisoner long after. In which time he lost great riches, and two places, the one in the country, the other in London, besides a great value of Jewelles, Plate, and money, with sondy riche merchaundises, as cloth of Gold, Syluer, Veluet, Satten, and other silkes. And finally after many persecutions, and losses, he was compelled by a fyne set vpon him for misprison of treason to paye vnto the king eyght thousande pounde, and so set a large. But shortly after he was newly troubled by the Queene, who demaunded of him of euery thousande pounde that he paid to the king for his fine, one hundreth marke that was due to her, for the which he was compelled also to agree, to his exceeding charges, beside his great and long vexacion.

But now let vs retorne to the History of the Erle of Warwicke, who at his retorne from beyonde the sea, for the continuall grudge that lurked in his stomacke, towarde king Edwarde, ye must thinke that of very necessity it would at length eyther burst the vessell, and by some meanes issue out, as it did now euen at this tyme: he beyng at his towne of Warwicke, accompanied with his two brethren the Marques Mountacute, and the Archebishop of Yorke, framed communication to make them mery and to passe forth the time two or thre dayes, at the last hauyng occasion to speake of the king and his doings and proceedings, he then first moued and excited them by all waies possible to helpe and ayde, and to restore king Henry the sixt, to the Crowne and royall dignitie againe.

And after the Erle of Warwicke had bittered a number of flattering and glosing wordes, the Archebishop consented vnto him, but the Lorde Marques could by no meanes be reduced to take any part against king Edwarde, till the Erle had both promised him great rewardes and high promotions, and also assured him of the ayde, and power of the greatest Princes of the Realme. Euen as the Marques vnwillingly, and in maner constrained, gaue his consent, to this unhappy coniuration, at the intisement and procuring of the Erle, so wyth a faynt harte, and lesse courage, he alwayes shewed himselfe enemy to king Edwarde, except in his last day: which luke warme hearte, and double dissimulation, was both the destruction of him, and his brethren. The Erle of Warwicke beyng a man of a great wit, farre castyng and many things foreseeing, eyther perceyued by other, or had perfite knowledge of himselfe, that the Duke of Clarence, bare not the best will to kyng Edward his brother, (as he did not in deede) thought first to proue him a far off, as it were in a probleme, and after to open to him (if he saw him flexible to his purpose) the secret imaginations of his stomacke: thinkyng that if he might by pollicie, or promise, allure the Duke to his partie, that king Edward should be destitute, of one of his best Hawkes, when he had most neede to make a flight. So at tyme and place conuenient, the Erle began to complayne to the Duke, of the ingratitude and doublenesse of king Edward, sayyng that he had neither handled him like a friend, nor kept promise with him,

according as the estate of a Prince required. The Erle had not halfe tolde his tale, but the Duke in a great fury answered, why my Lorde, thinke you to haue him kind to you, that is unkind, yea, and vnaturall to me beyng his owne brother, thinke you that friendship wil make him keepe promise where neyther nature nor kindred, in any wise can prouoke, or moue him, to fauour his owne bloode? Thinke you that he will exalte and promote his Cousin or Alic, which little careth for the fall or confusion, of his owne line and lineage? This you know well enough, that the heyre of the Lorde Scaces he hath married to his wiues brother, the heyre also of the Lorde Beuile and Harrington, he hath geuen to his wiues soune, & the heire of the Lord Humberford, he hath graunted to the Lord Hastings: thre marriages more meete for his two brethren and kynne, then for such new foundlings, as he hath bestowed them on. But by sweete Saint George I sweare, if my brother of Gloucester woulde toyne with me, we woulde make him knowe, that wee were all thre one mans sonnes, of one mother, and one lineage descended which should be more preferred and promoted, then straunges of his wyfes bloode.

When the Erle of Warwicke had harde the Dukes wordes, he had that which he both fore thirsted, and lusted for, and then began boldly to disclose to the Duke, his intent and purpose, euen at the full, requiring him to take parte with him, and to be one of the attempted confederacy. And least the Duke might thinke, that the matter was lightly, and vncircumspectly begun, he declared to him, how warily, how secretly, how speedily all things concerning this purpose, had bene compassed, studied, and foreseene, requiring him in so great, and vrgent a cause both to take paine and trauayle, and also to study with all circumspection and foresyng, how these things thus begun might be brought to a certayne and finall conclusion. And the rather to wyne the Dukes hart, the Erle beside diuers and manye sayre promises made to the Duke, offered hym his eldest daughter (beyng of ripe age, and elegant stature) in marriage with the halfe dele of his wiues inheritance. The Duke at the perswasion and request of the Erle, promised to doe all thinges which he woulde or coulde, in any manner require, or desyre. After that the Duke and the Erle had long consulted, concerning their straunge and dangerous affayres, they first determined to sayle to Calice, of the which towne the Erle was chiefe captaine, where his wife and two daughters then sojourned, whom to visite, the Duke of Clarence beyng in amoures had no small affection. But the Erle continually remembryng the purpose that he was set on, thought to begyn and set forward the same, before his departure: wherefore he appointed his brethren the Archebishop, and the Marques that they shoulde by some meane in his absence, stirre vp some newe Commotion or Rebellion, in the Countie of Yorke, and other places, nere therabouts, so that this ciuill warre should seeme to all men, to haue begun without his consent or knowledge, he being in the partes beyonde the Sea.

When all these thinges were thus determined, and in graue counsaile allowed, the Erle and the Duke sayled directly to Calice, where they were solempnly receyued, and toyously interteyned of the Countesse, and of her two daughters. And after that the Duke had swozne on the Sacrament to kepe his promise and pact inviolate, made and concluded with the Erle of Warwike, he married the Ladie Isabel, eldest daughter to the sayde Erle, in our Ladie Church at Calice, with great pompe & solempnity. After which mariage so solemnized, the Duke & the Erle consulted sadly together, by what meanes they should continue the warre, (which as it was by them appoynted) was quickly and within fewe dayes begon in Yorke shire, not without great rumoz and disturbance, of all quietnesse in that Countrie.

Comotion.

The mother of this pernicious commocion, was uncharitie, or very impietie, for there was in the Citie of Yorke, an olde and a riche Hospitall, dedicated vnto saint Leonard, in the which Almshouse the poore and indigent people were harbored and refreshed, and the sick and impotent persons were comforted and healed. For this good purpose and charitable intent, all the whole prouince of Yorke, gaue verely to this Hospitall certeine measures of cozne, in maner as an oblation of the first frutes of their newe grayne, thin- kyng theyz gyft geuen to so good a place, and for so good a purpose, should be to them meritorious, and befoze God acceptable. Certaine euill disposed persons, of the Erle of Warwikes faction, entending to set a broyle in the Countrie, perswaded a great number of husbandmen, to refuse and denie to geue any thing to the sayde Hospitall, affirmyng and sayyng, that the cozne that was geuen to that good intent, was not expended on the poore people, but the Maister of the Hospitall wared riche with such almose, & his priests wared fat, and the poore people lay leane without succoz or comfort. And not content with these sayyngs, they fell to doyns, for when the Proctors of the Hospitall, accordyng to theyz vsage went about the Countrie, to gather the accustomed cozne, they were soze beaten, wounded, and very euill intreated. Good men lamented this vngodly demeanoz, and the peruerse people much at it reioysed, and tooke such a courage, that they kept secret conuenticles, and priuie communications, insomuche that within fewe dayes, they had made such a confederacie together, that there were assembled to the number of. xv. thousand men, euen redie prest to set on the Citie of Yorke. When the fame of this commocion and great assemble, came to the eares of the Citizens of Yorke, they were first greatly astonied: but leauyng all feare ashyde, they were in a great doubt and vncerteinty, whether it were best for them to issue out of theyz walles, and to geue battaile to the rebelles, or to keepe theyz Citie, and repulse the violence of theyz enemies, by the manfull defendyng of theyz walles and portes. But the Lorde Marques Mountacute, gouernoz and president of that Countrie for the king, did shortly put the Citizens out of all feare and suspicion of inuasion, for he takyng spedie counsaile, consideryng the oportunitie of the tyme, with a small number of men, but well chosen, encountered the rebelles befoze the gates of Yorke: tohere after a long conflict, he tooke Robert Hilderne theyz Capitaine, and befoze them commaunded his heade there to be smitten off, and then he caused all his souldi- ors (because it was darke, to enter into the Citie of Yorke) and after theyz long labor to refresh the them.

Here is to be marueyled why the Marques thus put to death, the Cap- tayne and ruler of the people, stirred and raysed by by him, and the felowes of his conturation and conspiracy. Some saye he did it to the intent, that he would seme faultlesse and innocent of all hys brothers doings and priuie ima- ginations: But other affirme and saye, that he for all his promise made to his brother, was then fully determined to take part with king Edward, with whome (as it shall after appere) he in small space entred into great grace and high fauour. The people beyng nothing abashed at the death of their Capitayne, but rather the moze eger and fierce, by sayze and gentle speche and craftie perswasions: founde the meanes to get to them Henry, sonne and heire to the Lorde Filz Hugh, and Sir Henry Neuell, sonne and heire to the Lorde Latimer, the one being Nephew, and the other Cousyn Germaine to the Erle of Warwike. Although that these yong Gentlemen, bare the names of Capitaynes, yet they had a Tutor and gouernour called Sir John Conyers a man of suche courage and balauntnesse, as fewe was in his dayes, in the North partes. And first considering that they could not get Yorke for want of ordinaunce and artilerie, which they did lack in deede, they determined with all speede to marche toward London, intending by the way to rayse suche a phantasie in the peoples hartes, that they should thinke that king Edward was neyther a iust Prince to God, nor profitable to the common welth of the realme.

Sir John Conyers a chiefe Captayne of the
rebelles,

When king Edward (to whome all the doings of the Erle of Warwike and the Duke his brother were manifest) was by diuers letters sent to hym, certefied that the great armie of the Northzen men, were with al speede comming toward London. Therfore in great haste he sent to William Lord Herbert, whom within two yeres befoze, he had created Erle of Penbroke, that he should wythout delay encounter with the Northzen men, with the ex- tremitie of al his power. The Erle of Penbroke, commonly called the Lord Herbert, was not a little ioyous of the kings letters, partly to deserue the kings liberalitie, which of a meane gentleman, had promoted him to the e- state of an Erle, partly for the malice that he bare to the Erle of Warwike, beyng the sole obstacle (as he thought) why he obteyned not the Wardship of the Lorde Bonuilles daughter and heire, for his eldest sonne. Whereupon he beyng accompanied with his brother Sir Richard Herbert, a balyaunt knight, and aboue sixe or seauen thousand Welshmen well furnished, mar- ched forward to encounter with the Northzen men. And to assist and furnish him with archers, was appointed Humffrey Lorde Stafforde of South- wike (named, but not created) Erle of Deuonshire, by the King in hope that he balyantly would serue him in that iozney, and with him he had eight hundred archers. When these two Lords were met at Cottishold, they made diligent inquiry to here where the Northzen men were, and so by their espi- als they were asserteyned, that they were passing towarde Northampton, whereupon the Lorde Stafforde, and Sir Richard Herbert with two thou- sand well horsed Welshmen, sayde: they would go betwe and see the demea- nour and number of the Northzen men, and so vnder a woodes side, they couertly espied them passe forward, and sodainely set on the rereward: but the Northzen men with such agillitte so quickly turned about, that in a mo- ment of an houre the Welshmen were cleane discomfited and scattered, and many taken, and the remnaunt returned to the armie with small gaine.

King Edward being nothing abashed of thys small chaunce, sent good wordes to the Erle of Penbroke, encouragyng and bydding hym to be of good chere, promisyng him not al only ayde in short time, but also he himselte in person royall, would folow him with all his puyssaunce and power. The Yorkshire men being glad of this small victory, were well cooled and went no farther Southward, but tooke there way toward Warwike, looking for ayde of the Erle, which was lately come from Caleis, with the Duke of Clarence his sonne in lawe, and was gathering and raising of men, to succour his friends and kinsfolke. The king likewise assembled people on euerie side, to ayde and assist the Erle of Penbrooke and his company. But before or any part receyued comfort or succour, from his friend or partaker, both the armies met by chaunce, in a fayre playne, nere to a towne called Hedgecot, thre myle from Banbery, wherein be thre hils, not in equall distaunce, nor yet in equall quantitie, but lying in maner, although not fully triangle; the Welshmen gat first the West hill, hoping to haue recouered the East hill: which if they had obteyned, the victorie had bene theirs, as their vnwise prophesiers promised them before. The Northren men incamped themselves on the South hill. The Erle of Penbrooke and the Lorde Stafforde of Southwyke, were lodged at Banbery the day before y<sup>e</sup> field, which was S. James day, and there the Erle of Penbrooke, put the Lord Stafford out of an Inne wherein he delighted much to be, for the loue of a damosell that dwelled in the house: contrarie to their mutuall agreement by them taken, which was, that whosoener obteyned first a lodging, should not be deceyued nor reuened. After many great wordes and crakes, had betwene these two Captaynes, the Lorde Stafforde of Southwyke, in great despite departed with his whole company and band of archers, leauing the Erle of Penbrooke almost desolate in the towne, which with all diligence returned to hys helle, lying in the field vnprotected of archers, abiding such fortune as God would sende and proude. Sir Henry Denell sonne to the Lorde Latimer, tooke with him certaine light horsemen, and skirmished with the Welshmen in the evening, euen before their campe, where he did diuers balyarnt feates of armes, but a little to hardy, he went so farre forward that he was taken & yeldded, and yet cruelly slayne: which vnnecessfull act, the Welshmen sore rued the next day or night. For the Northren men being inflamed and not a little discomfited, with the death of this noble man, in the morning balyarntly set on the Welshmen, and by force of archers caused them quickly to defende the hill into the baley, where both the hostes fought. The Erle of Penbrooke behaued himselfe like a hardy knight, and an expert Capitaine, but his brother syr Richard Herbert so ballyauntly acquitted himselfe, that with his pollax in his hande (as his enemies did afterward report) he twice by fine force passed through the battaile of his aduersaries, & without any mortall wound returned. If every one of his felowes and companions in armes, had done but halfe the actes, which he that day by his noble prowes achieved, the Northren men had obteyned neyther safetie nor victorie.

Beside this, beholde the mutabilitie of fortune, when the Welshmen were at the very voynt, to haue obteyned the victorie (the Northren men being in maner discomfited) John Clappam Esquire, seruaunt to the Erle of Warwike, mounted by the syde of the East hill, accompanied enely with five C. men gathered of all the rascall of the towne of Northampton & other Villages about, hauing borne before them the standard of the Erle, with the white Beare, crying a Warwike a Warwike. The Welshmen thinking that the Erle of Warwike had come on them with all his puyssaunce, sodainly as men amazed fled: the Northren men them pursued and slue without mercy, for the crueltie that they had shewed to the Lorde Latimers some. So that of the Welshmen there were slaine aboue fise thousand, besyde them that were fled and taken.

The Erle of Penbrooke, syr Richard Herbert his brother, and diuers Gentlemen were taken, and brought to Banbery to be beheaded, much lamentacion, and no lesse entreatie was made to saue the lyfe of syr Richard Herbert, both for his goodly personage, which excelled all men there, and also for the noble chualtrie, that he had shewed in the fieldes the day of the battaile, insomuch that his brother the Erle, when he should lay downe his head on the blocke to suffer, sayde to sir John Coniers and Clappam: Masters, let me die, for I am olde, but saue my brother, which is yong, lustie, and hardie, mete and apt to serue the greatest prince of Christendome. But syr John Coniers and Clappam, remembryng the death of the yong knight syr Henry Denell, cosyn to the Erle of Warwike, could not heare on that syde but saued the Erle and his brother, with diuers other Gentlemen, to the number of ten, to be there beheaded. The Northamptonshyre men, with diuers of the Northren men by them procured, in this fury made them a Capitaine, and called him Robin of Kiddelisdale, and sodainly came to the mannoz of Grafton, where the Erle Riuers, father to the Queene then lay, whome they loued not, and there by force toke the sayd Erle, and syr John his sonne, and brought them to Northampton, and there without iudgement stroke off theyr heddes, whose bodie were solemnly interred in the blacke friers at Northampton. When King Edward was aduertised of these vnforsunate chaunces, he wrote in al haste to the Shyrefes of Sommersetshyre, and Devonshyre, that if they could by any meane take the Lord Stafford of Southwyke, that they vpon paine of theyr lyues, shoulde without delay put him in execution, which accordyngly to the Kinges commaundement, after long inquiry and serche made, found him hid in a billage in Brentmarche, called where he was taken and brought to Bridge water, and there cut thorow by the head. This was the order, maner, and ende of Hedgecot field, commonly called Banberie fiede, foughten the morow after Saint James day, in the. viij. yere of King Edward the fourth, the which battaile euer syce hath bene, and yet is a continual grudge betwene the Northren men, and the Welshmen. After this battaile the Northren men resorted toward Warwike, where the Erle had gathered a great multitude of people, which Erle gaue high commendacions to syr John Coniers, and other Capitaines of the North much reioysyng, that they had obteyned so glorious a victorie, requiryng them to continue as they had begon. The King likewise sore thyrstyng to recouer his losse late susteyned, and desyrous to bee reuenged of the deathes and murders of his Lordes and friendes, marched toward Warwike with a great armie, and euer as he went forward his company encreased, because he commaunded it to be noysed and published to the common people, that his onely intent was to destroy, and vtterly to confound the vnhappy flock of such pernicious persons as would disturbe and bring in thraldoms, the quiet commons and peaceable people. The Erle of Warwike had by his espials perfect knowledge how the king with his armie was bent toward him, and sent in all haste possible to the Duke of Clarence (which was not farre from him with a great power requirynge him that both their hostes might ioyne in one, for as farre as he could imagine, the tyme of battail was very neere. The Duke heeryng these newes, in good order of battail, came and incamped himselfe with the Erles host. When all things were redie prepared to fight: by the meanes of friends, a meane was found how to common of peace, for the which letters were written from eche parte to the other, declaryng their griefes and the very bottomes of theyr stomackes: Heraultes spared no horsefleshe in ridyng betwene the king and the Erle, nor in returnyng from the Erle to the king: The king conceiuyng a certeine hope of peace in his awne imaginacion, toke both lesse heed to himselfe, and also lesse feared the outward attemptes of his enemies, thinkyng, and trustyng truly that all things were at a good poynt, and should be well pacified. All the kinges doyngs were by espyals declared to the Erle of Warwike, which like a wise and pollitique Capitaine entendyng not to leese so great an advantage to him geuen, but trustyng to bring all his purposes to a small ende and determination, by onely obteynyng this enterprize: in the dead of the night, with a chosen companie of men of warre, as secretly as was possible set on the kinges fielde, killyng them that kept the watche, and oz the king were ware (for he thought of nothing lesse then of that chaunce that happened) at a place called Wolney, foure mile from Warwike, he was taken prisoner, and brought to the Castell of Warwike. And to the entent that the kinges friendes might not knowe where he was, nor what was chaunced of him, he caused him by secrete iourneys in the night to be conueyed to Middelham Castell in Yorke shire, and there to be kept vnder the custodie of the Archebishop of Yorke his brother, and other his trustie friendes, which enterpyned the king, like his estate, and serued him like a Prince. But there was no place so far off, but that the takyng of the king was shortly knowen, which newes made many men to feare, and greatly to dread, and many to wonder and lament the chaunce.

King Edward beyng thus in captiuitie, spake euer fayre to the Archebishop, and to the other keepers (but whether he corrupted them with money oz fayre promyses) he had libertie diuers dayes to go on huntynge, and one day, on a plain there met with him syr William Stanley, syr Thomas of Brough and diuers other of his friendes, with such a great band of men, that neither his keepers would, nor once durst moue him to returne to prison againe.

Thus as you haue heard was king Edward deliuered: Some say that he was set at large by the Erles consent and commaundement, as who say I had him in my keeping, and might haue destroyed him, but yet of mine awne free will and gentlenesse, without pact oz raunsome, I am contented to set him at libertie and to deliuer him. This doing might seeme to be some countenance of truth, if the Erle after this had left of from prosecuting the warre by him newlye begon: But for a truth this good chaunce hapned to king Edward, by the yll luck of king Henry, for surely by this yll fortune a man may plainely coniecture, that the extreme poynt of decay of his house and estate was apparauntly at hande, considering that neyther by mannes pollicie, nor by worldly riches his unhappie predestinate chaunce could not be put by, such was Gods pleasure, for if you consider how that the Erle of Warwike and his friendes, onely to the intent to ayde, conserue and defend

king Henry the sixt haue dispended their substances, aduentured their liues, and taken paynes intollerable, hauing a sure determination, fixed in their mindes, that as long as king Edward liued, that king Henryes faction should neuer prosper, and yet now when he was by the Erle taken prisoner and in captiuitie, he by fortune escaped, oz was wilfully deliuered. By thys you may plainely perceyue that the luck of king Henry was infortunate, and that all that was done for him, and in his quarell, euer redounded to his misfortune and detriment, euer noting thys, that when thinges contriued and imagined come to an vnlucky successe, all the senses of our bodies are there by anger, feare, oz madnesse rauished, & in maner distract from themselves. But to returne to the purpose.

When king Edward had escaped the handes of his enemies, he went straight to Yorke, where he was with great honor receyued of the Citizens and there taried two dayes to prepare some small armie, to accompany him in his iorney, but when he perceyued that he could haue no hoste meete and conuenient to passe to London, through the middest of his enemies (as he was appointed to doe) he returned from Yorke to Lancaster, where he found the Lorde Hastings his Chamberlayne well accompanied. He then wyth the ayde of the Lorde Hastings, and such other as drew to him, beyng well furnished, with speedy iourneys, came safe to his Citie of London.

When the Erle of Warwicke and the Duke of Clarence, had knowledge howe the king by treason of them that they put in trust, was escaped their handes, and that in one moment of tyme, all their long studies and forecastes were brought to none effect oz conclusion, they wared angrie, and chafed without measure, & by and by calling together all their chiefe friends began to consult agayne of newe, and to enquire the state of their enemies, to the intent that they might make a beginning of a new warre, which they coniectured to haue taken an ende when the king was brought into captiuitie. The mindes of these Princes were much satisfied, and their courage greatly kindled, by reason that a great number of men hauing moze pleasure in discord then in concord, louing better strife then vnitie, offered themselves to begin newe warre of their awne desire and request. King Edward tooke euen lyke studie for the warres as his enemies did, minding eyther to bring them to conformitie oz reason, by dent of sword, oz else by power of battail utterly to destroy and extirpate them and their affinitie, to the intent that all men might lead a more quiet lyfe, and liue in more safetie and rest: for Churches and Temples were euery where robbed and spoiled, houses burnt, and men slaine in euery place, all the realme was replenished with blood, slaughter, sorrow, and lamentation. Cornefields were destroyed, Citie & townes were made desolate and languished with famine and dearth, beside many other things, which happen by the crueltie and furie of warre and rebellion. This tumult and trouble in the common wealth of thys realme soze vexed and troubled many, but in especiall the nobilitie much lamented and pittied the state of the commonalty, which with all diligence rode betwene the king, the Erle and the Duke to reconcile them eche to other, and exhorted them rather to deserue the loue of all men, by keeping of peace and vnitie, then by fighting and vnnatural warre to destroy the realme, and winne the hatred and malice of all the nation: The aucthoritie first of the Nobilitie of the realme, realme, and secondarily their charitable motion, so mitigated the mindes, both of the king, the Duke and the Erle, that eche gaue sayth to other to go and come, safely without ieopardy. In which promise the Duke and the Erle hauing perfect trust and confidence, came both to London, accompanied with to small a number of men, in comparison to the great daunger that they were in. And at Westminster, the king, the Duke and the Erle had a long communication together, for some ende to be taken or made betweene them: But they fell at such great words with such imbraydings and casting in the teeth of olde benefites shewed, or of olde vnthankfulnesse receyued, that in a great furie, without any conclusion they departed, the king to Canterburie, and the Duke and the Erle to Warwike, where the Erle of Warwike prepared a newe hoste to ryse in Lyncolnshire, and made thereof Capitaine Syr Robert Welles, sonne to Richard Lorde Welles, an expert man in armes, and very pollitique in warre.

These newes sodainely brought to the King, did not a little bere and tickle hym, because he euer feruently hoped that his aduersaries would rather come to some honest conditions of concoorde, then so rashly and so sodainely to renue the warre. And the more rumoz that was spread (contrary to his expectation) of thys newe begon battayle, the sooner he gathered together an hoste for the resistance of the same, and out of hande he sent to Richard Lorde Welles, wylling him vpon the sight of his letters with all haste to repayre vnto him, which oftentimes he had excused by sicknesse and debilitie of hys body. But when that excuse serued not, he thinking to purge hymselfe sufficiently before the Kings presence, toke with him Sir Thomas Dymock, which had married his sister, & so together came to London. When he was come vp, hys friendes certified hym that the King was with hym highly discontented. Wherefore for very feare, he with his brother in lawe tooke Senuarie at Westminster, intending there to abide till the Princes yre were somewhat asswaged & mitigate. King Edward which thought to pacifie all thys busie tumult, without any farther bloodshed, promysing both those persons their pardons, caused them vpon his promise to come out of Senuary to his presence, and calling to him the Lorde Welles, wyllid him to write to Syr Robert his sonne to leaue of the warre, and not to take the Erles parte. And in the meane season, he with his armie went forward toward his enemies, hauing with him the Lorde Welles, and Syr Thomas Dymock, and being not passe two dayes iorney from Stamford, where his enemies had pitched their fielde, had perfect knowledge that Syr Robert Welles nothing moued with hys fathers letters, still kept his campe, abiding the king and his power. The king hauing high indignation at his presumption, and minding to be reuenged in parte, contrary to his sayth and promise caused the Lorde Welles, father to the sayde Sir Robert, and Syr Thomas Dymock, to be beheaded there, to the terrible example of other, which shall put their confidence in the promise of a Prince. When Syr Robert Welles harde that the King drew nere, and that hys father and Syr Thomas Dymock were beheaded, he stode first in a great perplexitie, studying whether he should geue battayle or no, because it was both perillous and doubtful to fight with so great an armie, before the Erle of Warwike with hys power were assembled, but yet hauing a yong and a lustie courage, and with manly boldnesse stirred and pricked forward, he set on his enemies,

The battayle was soze fought on both partes, and many a man slayne, and in conclusion, whyle Syr Robert was exhorting and prouoking his men to tarie, which were in maner discomited, and readie to flye, he was enuyroned and beset about wyth his enemies, and so was taken, and with him Syr Thomas Delaund Knight, and many mo. After hys taking, the Lyncolnshire men amased, threwe away their coates, the lighter to runne away and flye, and therefore thys battayle is yet there called Loscote field. The king glad of this victorie, commaunded out of hand Syr Robert Welles and diuers other, to be put to execution in the same place. The same was, that at thys battayle were slaine ten thousand men at the least.

The Erle of Warwike lay at this tyme at his Castell of Warwike, and was commyng with a honge host the next day towarde his armie in Lyncolnshire, but when he harde say that they had fought soner then he thought epyther they could or would, and that his partie was ouerthrowne and vanquished: Although he might nolwe be discouraged, yet he thought it necessarie to dissimule the case, because oftentimes in battaile, vaine thinges be regarded before true, and to the entent to comfort certaine of hys companie (being in dispayre and redie to flie) both in word and dede, he gathered together and prepared a newe hoste, and with all the studie and industrie that he could practise or vse, he imagined how to compasse Thomas Lord Stanley, which had married his sister, that he might be one of the confederacie and conuiration: which thing when he could not bring to passe, for the Lorde Stanley had answered him plainely, that he would neuer make warre against king Edward, he thought to spend no lenger tyme in waste, and mistrustyng that he was not able to meete with his enemies, he with the Duke of Clarence his sonne in lawe, departed to Excester, and there taryng a fewe dayes, and perceyuing that all thinges lacked, which were apte and necessarie for the warre, determiend to sayle to king Lewys the French king, to renewe the familiar acquaintaunce, which he had wyth him, when he was there of Ambassade for the marriage of King Edward as you haue heard, hauing a sure confidence and hope, epyther to haue a great ayde of the French king, or else to incense him earnestly to make battayle against king Edward. And resting vpon thys opinion, they hyred shippes at Dartmouth in Devonshyre, well armed, and at all points trimmed and decked. And when wind and weather serued them, the Duke and the Erle with thair wyues, and a great number of seruaunts plucked by the sayles, and toke their way first toward Caleys where the Erle of Warwike was chiefe Capitayne, and thought there to haue left hys wyfe and daughters, tyll he had returned out of Fraunce.

This sodaine departyng of King Edwardes aduersaries, did not onely bere and bite him at the very stomacke, but also did kindle and quicken him to looke the more diligently to his affayres and businesse, and especially, because that the absence of the Erle of Warwike, made the common people daily more and more to long and be desyrous to haue the sight of him, and presently to beholde his personage. For they iudged that the Sunne was clerely taken from the world, when he was absent; In such highe estimacion among the people, was his name, that neither no one man, they had in so much honor, neyther no one person they so much prayed, or to the Cloudes so highly highly extolled, what shall I say? His onely name sounded in euery song, in the mouth of the comon people, and his person was represented with great reuerence, when publique playes, or open triumphes should be shewed, or set forth abroad in the stretes: which hartie fauor, was the apparaunt occasion why his faction and companie within a few days, merueylously increased and augmented. For the which cause, the King was vexed with a double mischiefe, for he doubted much, whome he should most feare of two, eyther the familiar enemies abyding at home, or the outwarde foes, linyng beyond the sea: but chiefly he prouided to withstand the Erle of Warwikes landing. And first he wrote to Charles Duke of Burgoyne, which had married the Ladie Margaret his sister, to helpe that y<sup>e</sup> Erle nor his companie, should haue neyther ayde nor refuge in any part of his, nor his friendes territorics, or Dominions. These tidyngs were ioyfull to the Duke of Burgoyne, as to him which (accozdyng to the olde prouerbe) hated the Erle of Warwike, worse then y<sup>e</sup> curre dog, or serpent: partly, because he was the ouerthrower and confounder of the house of Lancaster, of the which the Erle was lineally descended, by the Duchesse his mother, partly because the Erle had suche high offices, and was so renowned in Englande, that King Edward the Dukes brother in lawe, might not do liberally all thinges in his Realme, as he himselfe would (which the Duke esteemed to be a great bondage.) And partly, because the Erle withstood with all his power and might, the conclusion of the marriage, betwene the Kinges sister and the sayd Duke: But the chiefe rancor was, because the Erle of Warwike fauoured the French king, whom the Duke loued not, for at his last beyng in Fraunce, he promised the French King to be friend to his friendes, and vtter enemy to his foes and aduersaries. This rooted hatred, and cankerd malice, which the Duke bare to the Erle, caused him to attempt mo displeasures, and to inuent mo mischiefes against the Erle, then eyther King Edward could imagin, or was of the Duke requyred, as you shall plainly perceyue, by the sequele of this Historie.

Now let vs speake of the Erle of Warwikes doynge. The Erle as you haue heard before, sayled from Dartmouth towarde Calice, where he was Capitaine generall, and with a prosperous winde came before the towne, in which fortreffe was deputie for the Erle, the Lorde Watclere a Gascoyne, besyde dyuers of the Erle of Warwikes seruantes, which bare great offices and aucthorities in the towne. This Watclere, whether he did it by dissimulation, or bearyng his good minde to King Edward (as by the sequele hereof I doubt whether he did or no) In steede of receiuyng of his maister with triumphe, he bent and discharged agaynst him, diuers peeces of ordinaunce, sendyng him worde, that he should there take no lande. This nauye thus linyng before Calice at anker, the Duches of Clarence was there deliuered of a fayre sonne, which childe the Erles Deputie bnneth would suffer to be christened within the towne, nor without great entreatie, would permit two wagons of wine to be conueyed aborde to the Ladies linyng in the haue. This was a great rygor and extremitie, for the seruant to vse agaynst the maister, or the inferior to vse agaynst the superior, for the Erle hoped, and nothing lesse mistrusted, then to be assured and purueyed in that place: But he was faine to keepe the Seas, without comfort or ayde of any of his seruantes.

uantes. The King of England was quickly aduertised of the refusall that Monsieur de Watclere made to his Capitaine the Erle of Warwike, which manfull doynge, so much pleased the King, that incontinent he made him chiefe Captain of y<sup>e</sup> towne of Calice, by his letters patents, which were sent to him out of hand, and therof discharged clerely the Erle, as a traytor, and a rebell. Duke Charles of Burgoyne, linyng at Saint Hoiners (which would nedes haue an owre in the Erle of Warwikes boate) beyng aduertised also of Monsieur de Watcleres refusall made of his maister, sent to him his trustie seruant, Philip de Comines (which wrote all these doynge in a Chronicle) and gaue to him yerely a thousande Crownes in pencion, (a small rewarde God wote, for so high a seruice, as vntruly to kepe his maister from his office) prayng and requiryng him, to continue in truth and fidelitie towarde King Edward, as he had shewed and begon. The Messenger found him so towarde, and of such conformitie, that he was content to swere in his presence, truely to take King Edwardes part agaynst all men, and onely to his vse to keepe and defend the strong towne of Calice. But the sayde Philip de Comines soze mistrusted Monsieur de Watclere, because he sent worde to the Erle of Warwike priuily, linyng at Whitsandbay, y<sup>e</sup> if he landed he should be taken and lost, for all England (as he sayde) tooke part agaynst him, the Duke of Burgoyne and all the Inhabitanes of the towne, were his enemies, the Lord Duras the Kinges Marshall, and all the retinue of the garison were his aduersaries: so that for a finall conclusion, his only sauegard and comfort, were to withdrawe him and his companie into Fraunce, where he knewe he should be highly receyued, and better welcomed, and as for the towne of Calice, he should take no thought, for the sayde Monsieur de Watclere promised thereof to make him a good reconyng, when time and oportunitie should serue. This counsaile was profitable to the Erle of Warwike, but not to the king of England, and lesse pleasant to the Duke of Burgoyne: which Princes might very well thinke both the office of the Capitainship of Calice, and the pencion of the thousand Crownes (if it were payed) on such a deepe dissembler, to be euill employed.

The Erle of Warwicke as he was both before his departure oute of Englande, determined, and also now by Monsieur de Watclere, newly counsailed and aduised, with his nauie sayled towarde Normandy, and in the meane way, robbed, spoyled, and toke many riche ships of the Duke of Burgoynes countreies, (which soze netted the Duke, and caused him to prepare a strong, and a great armie on the sea, to take the Erle prisoner, as he returned homewarde) and at the last with all his nauie, and spoyle, he toke lande at Deepe in Normandy, where the gouernor of the countrey for the French king, friendly welcomed him, and lauingly entertayned him, certifying King Lewys of his landing and arriual.

King Lewys a great season before, had so much maruayled at the publique fame, and common renoume, of the noble actes, and high prowes, of the Erle of Warwicke, and he thought nothing might more pleasauntly happen, or chaunce towarde him, then to haue a cause, or occasion to hym ministered, whereby he might doe the Erle some profite or pleasure. Which long lust according to his desire, was nowe lykely to take effect, to his contentacion, and the Erles great commodity: wherfore beyng ioyous of his landyng in Fraunce.

Philip de Comines the writer of this Historie.

Fraunce, he sent vnto him certayne Princes, which declared to him on the kings behalfe, that as the king had long tyme sought wayes, and meanes, howe to doe him pleasure, ayde, and comfort: So seying that nowe the tyme was come, that the Erle had necessitie of all those things, he assured him that he would neyther forget him, nor yet desist to doe for him anye thing, which might be consonant to his request and friendly desire, requiring him with the Duke his sonne in law, to take paine to come to his Castell of Amboys, set on the Riuer of Leyre, affirming that they should neither lose their laboz, nor thinke their iorney to haue euill successe in the conclusion.

When Duke Charles knewe that the Erle was landed in Normandy, he sent in all haste a Post to King Lebys, with whome he was then ioynd in a league, requiring him neyther to helpe with men nor money, the Erle of Warwicke, nor the Duke of Clarence, open enemies to King Edward, his fellow, friend, and brother in lawe, and his perpetuall alye, and trusty confederate, adding therto sharpe wordes, and threates, if he woulde in any case, be to them a refuge or succoz.

The French king did not only contempne his proud wordes, and laughed at his threating, and bolde bragging, but soberly aunswere, that without breaking of any league, or treatie, he lawfully might and woulde helpe his friendes: Of which number, he affirmed the Erle of Warwicke to be one, which thing if he did, he sayde, it should be neyther cost, charge, nor burthen to the Duke of one blanke. When the Duke had certified the king of Englande of this aunswere, he was sodainely in a dompe, and began earnestly, to imagyne and consyder who were his friendes, and who were his foes, apprehended some, whom he thought guiltie, and began with them to question, who were friendes to his enemyes, and of their coniuration (which was the occasion that many fearyng themselves, fled vnto Sanctuary) and manye trustyng the kings pardon, submitted and yeelded themselves to the Kings clemency. Amongst whome, John Marques Montacute, humbly yeelded himselfe, and bowed to be euer true to the kyng (as he had done before tyme) whome he with much humanity and fayre wordes, did receiue and entertaine, to the intent to draw and allure the hartes of other men, to ioyne and knit with him, against all hostility and bitter enemyes.

Whyle these things were thus treated in Englande, the Erle of Warwicke and the Duke of Clarence, rode wyth great pompe toward Amboys, where the frenche King laye, and by the way, the people gathered together, and in great number flocked, to see and beholde, the person and visage of hym of whose valiaunt actes, and wonderfull doynges, their eares had manye times bene fylled and replenished. When he came to the kings presence, hee was with all kindnesse of curtesie and humanity receyued and welcomed. To whome by long tract of tyme, he declared the causes, and considerations of his comyng into Fraunce. King Lebys aswell hauing nowe delectation, with the presence of his friende, as he was accustomed to reioyce and be ioyous, when he hard eyther laude or prayse of him in his absence, promised him hys power, his ryches, and all things that he might, or coulde doe, to helpe hym in his trouble, and to refresh him in his aduersitie.

When Queene Margaret, which sojourned with Duke Keyner her father, called king of Sicile, &c. Harde tell of the Erle of Warwicke and the Duke

Duke of Clarence, had abandoned Englande, and were come to the French Court, hoping of newe comfort; with ail diligence came to Amboys, wyth her onely sonne Prince Edward, and with her, came Jasper Erle of Penbrooke, & John Erle of Orenfozde, which after diuers long imprisonments, lately escaped, fledde out of Englande into Fraunce, and came by fortune to this assemble. After that they had long comuned, and debated diuers matters, concerning their suretie and wealth, they determined by meane of the french king, to conclude a league and a treatie betwene them. And first to be- gynn with all, for the moze sure foundation of the new amitie, Edward prince of Wales, wedded Anne seconde daughter to the Erle of Warwicke, which Lady came with her mother into Fraunce. This mariage seemed very straunge to wisemen, considering that the Erle of Warwicke, had first disherited the father, and then to cause his sonne to mary wyth one of his daughters, whose syster the Duke of Clarence before had married, which was euer extreme enemye to the house of Lancaster: whereupon they deuined that the mariage of the Prince, should euer be a blot in the Dukes eye, or the mariage of the Duke, a mote in the eye of the Prince, eche of them looking to be exalted, when the Erle on him synled, and eche of them againe thinking to be ouerthrowne, when the Erle of him lowred. After this mariage, the Duke & the Erle toke a solempne othe, that they should neuer leaue the warre, vntill such tyme as king Henry the sixt, or the Prince his sonne, were restored to the full possession and Diademe of the realme, and that the Queene and the Prince, should depute and appoynt the Duke and the Erle, to be gouernors and conseruators, of the publique welth, till such tyme as the Prince were come to mans estate, and of habilitie, meete and conuenient, to take vpon him so high a charge, and so great a burden. There were many other condicions concluded, which both reason, and the weightinesse of so great a businesse, required to be set forwarde.

Whyle these Lordes were thus in the french Courte, there landed at Calice a damosell, belonging to the Duches of Clarence, (as she sayd) which made Monsire de Wadclere beleue, that she was sent from king Edward to the Erle of Warwicke, with a playne ouerture and declaration of peace. Of the which tidynge, Wadclere was very glad for the Erles sake, whome he thought (by this peace) to be restored to all his olde possessions, romes, and dignities. But he was sore by this damosell deceiued for her message (as it after proued) was the beginning of the Erles confusion. For she perswaded the Duke of Clarence, that it was neyther naturall, nor honorable to him eyther to condiscende or take parte against the house of Yorke, (of which he was lineally discended) and to set by agayne the house of Lancastre, which lineage of the house of Yorke, was not onely by the whole Parliament of the realme declared to be the very and indubitate heires of the Kingdome, but also kyng Henry the sixt and his blood affirmed the same, and thereupon made a composition, which of recorde appereth. Furthermore she declared, that the mariage of the Erles daughter with prince Edward, was for none other cause but to make the Prince king, and clerely to extinguishe all the house of Yorke, of whome the Duke himselfe was one, and next heire to the Crowne, after his eldest brother, and his children. These reasons, and the mariage of the Prince to the Erles daughter, so sancke in the Dukes stomacke, that he pro-missed at his returne, not to be so extreme an enemy to his brother, as he was taken for, which promise afterwarde he did not forget. With this answer the damosell departed into Englande, the Erle of Warwicke thereof being clerely ignorant.

When the league was concluded (as you before have heard) the French King lent them ships, money, and men, and that they might the surer sayle into Englande, he appointed the Bastard of Burgoyne Admirall of Fraunce with a great Flaue, to defend them agaynst the armie of the Duke of Burgoyne, which was stronger then both the French Kings Flaue, or the English flete. King Reynier did also help his daughter to hys small power, with men, and munitions of warre. When this armie (which was not small) was gathered and come together to Harflete, at the mouth of the river of Seyne, abiding winde and weather. The Erle of Warwicke receyued letters out of Englande, that men so much daylie and hourly desired and wished for hys arrivall and returne, that almost all men were in harnesse, looking for hys landing: wherefore he was requyred to make haste, yea, haste more then haste, although he brought no succor with hym. For he was farther assured, that as soone as he had once taken lande, there should meete him many thousandes (as after it proved in deede) to doe him what service or pleasure they could or might: When the Erle had receyued these letters, he not a litle regarding suche an offer, and so many great benefites to hym even at hande apparantly proffered, fully determined with the Duke, and the Erles of Orenford and Benbroke (because Queene Margaret and her sonne, were not fully yet furnished for suche a journey) to go before with parte of the Flaue, and part of the armie, and to attempt the first brunt of fortune and chance, which if it well succeeded, then should Queene Margaret and her sonne, with the residue of the Flaue and people followe into Englande. The Erle of Warwicke thinking this weightie matter, not worthy to be lingered, but to be applyed with all diligence possible, taking his leaue of the French King Lewys, geving him no small thanks, both on the behalfe of King Henry, and also for his owne part, and so being dismissed, came where his Flaue laye at Anker, commaunding his men to go on ship boarde, minding to take his course toward England.

The Duke of Burgoyne which was not content that the Erle of Warwicke and hys company was succoured and ayded of the French King agaynst his brother in lawe, King Edward of Englande, to withstande that armie, and to take the Erle of Warwicke prisoner, if it were possible. He prepared suche a great Flaue, as lightly hath not bene sene before, gathered in maner of all Nations, which armie lay at the mouth of Seyne, ready to fight with the Erle of Warwicke, when he should set out of his harborow.

See the worke of God, the same night before the Erle departed, there rose suche a sodayne winde and a terrible tempest, that the Dukes shippes were scattered one from another, some drowned, some weather driven into Scotlande, so that two of them were not in companie together in one place. In the morning next following, the weather waxed fayre, and the winde prosperous, whereupon in hope of a bone voyage, the Erle and his company hoysed by their sayle, and with good speede landed at Dartmouth in Devonshire, from which place he passed into Fraunce, almost the sixt Moneth last past.

The Erle of Warwicke returneth into England.

Before this time the Duke of Burgoyne Charles, which more hated the Erle of Warwicke, and envied his prosperie, then he loved King Edward, saving for hys ayde that he trusted of in time of necessitie, wrote to King Edward, both of the doings of the Erle of Warwicke in Fraunce, and of hys armie and power, & also certefied him by his trustie seruauntes of the place, where the Erle purposed with all his people to take lande, King Edward passed little on the matter, trusting to much to the moueable comunons of hys Realme, and without any army layde, eyther to kepe the Erle from landing, eyther to encounter with him at the first arrivall, to the intent that his friends should not drawe in heapes to him for his strength, lest all purveyance for defence alone, and rode on huntynge, hawking, and vsing all maner of pastimes, with Ladyes and Damosells, for his disport and solace that could be imagined or invented. When the Erle of Warwicke had taken land, he made a proclamation in the name of King Henry the sixt vpon high paynes, commaunding and charging all men apt, or able to beare armoure, to prepare themselves to fight agaynst Edward Duke of Yorke, which contrary to all right, iustice, and lawe, had vntreuly vsurped the crowne and imperiall dignitie of this realme. It is almost incredible to thinke how sone the fame of the Erles landing was blowen ouer, thozow all the whole realme, and how many thousand men of warre, at the very first tydings of his landing, were sodainely assembled and set forward to welcome him. When he was thus, according to hys desire, fully furnished on euery side with his kindred and friendes, he tooke his way toward London, where he iudged and saythfully beleueed, to finde more open friendes then priuie enemies.

When King Edward knew of the Erles landing, and of the great repaire of the people, that to him incessantly without intermission did resorte, he then began to thinke on hys businesse, and studied howe to finde a remedie for a mischief (but this was to late.) And first he wrote to the Duke of Burgoyne, requyring him to haue a bigylant eye to the sea, and so to see the streames kept and scoured with hys Flaue, that the Erle neyther shoulde nor might returne agayne into Fraunce, if he should be agayne propulsed out of the realme. And as for the doings in England he bade let him alone, for he was both of pryssaunce and abilitie, sufficient to ouercome and defende all his enemies and rebels, within his owne realme and countrie. Chys sayng little or nothing pleased the Duke of Burgoynes messengers, for they thought that it had bene much more profitable to King Edward to haue circumspectly forsene afoze, and provided to stop his landing, then now sodainly to abyde the fortune of battayle, which is euer doubtfull and vncertaine. King Edward accompanied with the Duke of Gloucester hys brother, the Lorde Hastings hys Chamberleyn, which had married the Erles sister, and yet was euer true to the King hys Mayster, and the Lorde Scales brother to the Quene, sent out Curriers to all hys trustie friendes, for the furniture of able persons, meete for the warre & conuenient for the defence of his owne royall person, entending if he might by any pollicie, or subtile engine to circumuent or trap the Erle of Warwicke, knowing perfetely that if he had once maistred the chiefe Belwether, the flock would sone be disperced.

Of them that were sent for, fewe in effect came, but the greatest heddes wincked and sayde they could not, but they ment they would not come. King

for feare of
Warwike.

Edward beyng in perplexitie, and in diffidence of rasyng any army, with such trustie friendes as he had departed into Lincolneshire, consulting what was best to be done, but sodainly or he was fully determined on any certayne purpose, newes were brought to him, that all the towne, and all the Countreis adjoining was in great roze, and made fiers and sang songes, calling King Henry, King Henry, a Warwike, a Warwike: King Edward was much abashed with these newe tidynges, and more and more his espials and Messengers declared and accompted to him, that all the Realme was by, and by open Proclamation commaunded to make warre agaynst him, as enemy to King Henry and the Realme: wherefore his neere friendes aduised and admonished him to flie ouer the sea to the Duke of Burgoyne, his brother in lawe, there to tary tyll God and fortune shoulde sende him better lucke and chaunce, he beyng somewhat ruled by his counsaill, but much more quickned by hauing knowlege, that some of the Erle of Warwikes power, was within halfe a dayes iourney, and lesse of his tayle, with all hast possible passed the washes (in greater iopardie then it becomed a Prince to be in) and came to the towne of Lynne, where he founde an English ship and two Hulkes of Holland redy (as fortune woulde) to make sayle and take theyr iourney, whereupon beyng in a maruaylous agonye, and doubtyng the mutabilitie of the towne men, takyng no farther leysure for his sure succor and sauegard, with his brother the Duke of Gloucester, the Lorde Scales, and diuers other his trustie friendes entred into the ship, without bagge or baggage, without cloth sacke, or ma's, and perchaunce with a great purse and little treasure, for he nor his had no leysure to prouide, accordyng to their degrees and estates. Thus the King beyng accompanied with one small ship of his owne, and two Hulkes, and. viij. or. viij. hundreth persones with him hauing no prouision, and but small stoze of money, sayled towarde Holland. At which tyme the Easterlynges were mortall enemies, aswell to the Englishmen, as to the French nacion, and had done the last yeres past much preiudice and domage to the English marchauntes, both in taking and spoylynge of Shippes.

And as the King with sayle and ower was makyng his course as fast as he could possible, the Easterlynges, which had many Shippes of warre on the sea, him espyed (accordyng to the olde prouerbe) one yll cometh neer alone, and with. viij. or. viij. gallant Shippes, began to chase the king and his companie. The Kinges Ship was good with sayle, and so much gat of the Easterlynges, that she came on the coast of Holland, and so discented lower, before a towne in Holland called Alquemare, and there cast Ancker as nere the Towne as was possible, because they conlde not enter the Hauen at an ebbing water. The Easterlynges also approached the English ship as nere as their great Shippes could come at the lowe water, entending at the flood to haue obteyned theyr pray, and so they were likely to do, if Poulre de Gronture, gouernour for Duke Charles in Holland had not at that season bene personally present in those parties.

What a miserable chaunce and straunge lucke was this to happen so sodainly to a King, and in especiall to such a King, as by his owne valiantie and prowesse had overcome his foes, and destroyed his enemyes in more then fife or sixe great and mortall battayles. First to be persecuted, criled, and expulsed his owne Realme and Kingdome, by his owne seruants, subiectes, and kinsmen. Secundarily, beyng destitute of all helpe and comfozt, flyng to his onely friend and brother in law Duke Charles, for refuge and succor, to be chased on the sea by his mortall enemyes and deadly foes, and like to be taken prisoner, and brought into captiuitie, which thing, if it had happened (as God would that it should not) he had lien long bntaunfomed, (King Henry beyng restored to his pristinate estate and dignitie royall) or else he had died prisoner in great wretchednesse and misery. These sower saueres he tasted as a penaunce for his wanton liuyng, and negligent ouerleyng of thinges, that he might well haue forescene and preuented, but his minde was so geuen to pastyme, daliaunte, and sensuall pleasure, that he forgat the olde adage, sayng in tyme of peace, prouide for war, and in the tyme of war, prouide for peace, which thing if he epyther had well remembred, or polittically prouided for, he had not bene chased and expulsed his Realme within. xi. dayes as he was in deede.

King Edward thus liyng at Ancker in great feare of the Easterlynges, was by great chaunce comfozted and relieued, or he wist howe, for the same tyme lay in the towne of Alquemare the Lorde Gronture, chiefe gouernour of Holland for Duke Charles of Burgoyne, which beyng incontinent aduertised of the Kinges arrivall, and also of the great iopardie that he was in, prohibited first the Easterlynges in no wise on paine of death, to intermit or meddle with any Englishmen, which were both the Dukes friendes and allyes: which commaundement so bered and troubled the Easterlynges, makyng sure reconyng to haue had theyr pray and pryse, a King, a Duke, dyuers Barons, and riche gentlemen, that they cryed out of God, rayled and cursed the Duke and his officer, and in a rage hopled by theyr sayles, and without more expectacion of good lucke, departed home to theyr Countrey. The Lorde Gronture came aborde the ship where King Edward was, and him honourably saluted, and required him to come to lande, offeryng him his seruice with all pleasures that he coulde do or imagine to be done. The King him hartily thanked, and was well reuiued and comfozted with his wordes, and so he with all his company were set on lande, and well refreshed. The Lorde Gronture like a noble man, consideryng in what pooze estate and necessitie the King and his people were in, ministred to them abundantly all thinges conuenient and necessary, accordyng to euery mans estate and degree, at the Dukes charge and cost. And after they had bene well refreshed, and newly apparayled, he conduyted them to the Hage, a riche towne in Holland where they arriued on the Churche holy day, not long after Michaelmasse. The Lord Gronture, of all this aduenture wrote to the Duke bys Hayster, which thereat, was at the first so abashed and amased, to see the Erle of Warwike, whome he hated more then a Crocodile, to haue the byper hande of his brother, that he had rather heard of King Edwardes death, then of his discomfiture, and in especially by the Erle of Warwike, whom he more feared and disdayned, then any one man liuyng, yet he willed the Lorde Gronture, to see him and his companie well enterteyned at the Hage, tyll he sent for them.

Now let all Englishmen consider (as before is reherfed) what profite, what commoditie, & what helpe in distresse, the mariage of the Ladie Margaret, garet, King Edwardes wife, sister to the Duke Charles, did to him in hys extreme necessitie: and but by that meane incurable extremitie, for his allies and confederates in Castell and Arragon, were to farre from him, either speedily to flie to, or shortly to come fro with any ayde or armie. The frenche king was his extreme enemy, and friend to King Henry, for whose cause, in the King of Scottes (for all the league betwene them) he did put little confidence and lesse trust. The Stebes and all Castland were with him at open warre, and yet by this marriage, God provided him a place to flie too, both for refuge and for reliefe.

When the fame was spred of King Edwardes flyng, innumerable people resorted to the Erle of Warwike to take his part, but all King Edwardes trustie friendes went to diuers Sentuarjes, dayly lookyng and hourly harknyng, to heere of his helth and prosperous returne, who afterwarde serued him manfully and truly. Amongest other, Queene Elizabeth his wife, almost desperate of all comfort, tooke Sentuarie at Westminster, and there in great penury forsaken of all her friendes, was deliuered of a faire sonne called Edwarde, which was with small pompe, like a poore mans childe christened and baptised, the Godfathers beyng the Abbot & Prior of Westminster, and the Godmother, the Ladie Scrope.

The Kentishemen this season, whose wittes be euer moueable at the chaunge of Princes, came to the Suburbes of London, and spoiled houses, robbed berehouses, & by the counsaile of sir Geoffrey Gates and other Sentuary men, they brake by the kinges Benche, and deliuered prisoners, and at the last fell at Radclife, Lynchouse, and saint Katheryns, to burnyng of houses, slaughter of people, and rauishyng of women: which small sparck had growen to a great flame, if the Erle of Warwike with a great power had not sodainly quenched it, and punished the offenders: which benefite by hym done, caused him much more to be praised and accepted among the Commons than he was before. When he had settled and put an order in all thinges, according as he thought most conuenient, upon the, xii. day of October he rode to the Tower of London, which was to him without resistance deliuered, and there tooke King Henry the sixt out of the warde, where he before was kept, and brought him into the kinges lodgyng, and there was serued, according to his degree. And the, xxv. day of the sayd moneth, the Duke of Clarence accompanied with the Erles of Warwike, Shrewsbury, and the Lord Stanley, and other Lords and Gentlemen, some for feare, and some for loue, and some onely to gale at the waueryng worlde, resorted with a great companie to the Tower of London, and from thence with great pompe brought King Henry the sixt apparayled in a long Gowne of blewe Weluet, through the high streetes of London, to the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paule, the people on the right hande and on the left hande, reioysyng and cryng, God saue the King, as though all thing had succeeded as they would haue it, and when he had offered as kinges vse to do, he was conueyed to the pallace of the Bishop of London, and there kept his householde like a king.

King Henry the sixt thus againe recoveryng (by the meanes onely of the Erle of Warwike) his Crowne and dignitie royall, began newly to reigne, likely within short space to fall againe, and to tast more of his accustomed captiuitie, and vsuall miserie. This ill chaunce and misfortune, by many mens opinions happened to him, because he was a man of no great wit, such as men commonly call an innocent man, neyther a foole, neyther very wise, whose studie alwayes was more to excell other, in Godly liuyng and vertuous example, then in worldly regiment, or temporall dominion, in somuche, that in comparison to the study and delectacion that he had to vertue and godlinesse, he little regarded, all worldly power and temporall aucthoritie: But his enemies ascribed all this to his coward stomach, affirmyng that he was a man apt to no purpose, nor meete for any enterpryse, were it neuer so small: But whoso euer dyspyleth or dysprayseth, that which the comon people allow and maruayle at, is often taken of them for a mad and vndiscreete person, but notwithstanding the vulgar opinion, he that foloweth, & embraceth the contrary, doth proue both sad and wise (verifying Salomons Proverbe) the wisdom of this worlde, is foolishnesse before God. Other there be that ascribe his infortunite, only to the stroke and punishment of God, affirming that the Kingdome, which Henry the fourth his Grandfather wrongfully gat, and vniustly possessed agaynst King Richard the seconde and his heyres, could not by very deuine iustice, long continue in that iniurious stocke: And that therefore God by his diuine prouidence, punished the offence of the Grandfather, in the sonnes sonne.

When King Henry had thus obteyned agayne, the possession and dominion of the realme, he called his high Court of Parliament to beginne the, xxvj. day of Nouember at Westminster, in the which King Edward was declared a Traytor to his Countrey, and vsurper of the realme, because he had vniustly taken on him, the crowne and Scepter, and all hys goods were confiscated and adiudged forfayt: and lyke sentence was geuen agaynst all his partakers and friendes. And beside this, it was there enacted that extreme punishment should be done without delay ouer such persons, as for his cause were taken or apprehended, and were eyther in captiuitie, or went at large vpon trust of their sureties, amongst whome Lorde John Tiptoft, Erle of Worcester Lieutenaunt for King Edward in Irelande, exercysing there more extreme crueltie (as the same went) then princely pitie, or charitable compassion, and in especiall on two infantes, beyng sonnes to the Erle of Desmond, was eyther for treason to hym layed or malice agaynst hym conceyued, attempted and behedded. Beside thys, all estatutes made by King Edward were clerely reuoked, abrogated, and made frustrate. The Crownes of the Realmes of Englande and Fraunce, was by the aucthoritie of the same Parliament entayled to King Henry the sixt, and the heyres Males of hys body lawfully begotten, and for default of such heyre Male of his body begotten, then the sayde crownes and dignities were entayled to George Duke of Clarence, and to the heyres Males of his body lawfully engendred, and farther the sayde Duke was by aucthoritie aforesayde enabled to be next heyre to hys father, Richard Duke of Yorke, and to take by descent from hym all hys landes, dignities, and preheminences, as though he had bene his eldest sonne and heyre, at the time of his death. Jasper Erle of Penbroke, and John Erle of Orenford, and diuers other by King Edward attaynted, were restored to their olde names, possessions, and auncient dignities (kepe them euen as long as they might.) Beside thys, the Erle of Warwike as one to whome the comon welth was much beholdyng, was made made ruler and gouernoz of the realme, with whom as felow and companion was associated, George Duke of Clarence hys sonne in lawe. So that by these meanes the whole estate, both of the realme, and the publique welth of the same, were newly altered and chaunged. To thys parliament came the Lorde Marques Montacute, excusing hymselfe that onely for feare of death, he declyned to king Edwards part, which excuse was so accepted that he obteyned hys pardon, which after was the destruction of hym and hys brother: For if he had manfully and boldly taken king Edwards part, surely he being an open enemy, had much lesse hurted, then being a fayned & coloured friend: for suche things as we see before our eyes, we be well ware off, and seldome things before knowne, doe vs any hurt.

Queene Margaret, after that the Erle of Warwicke was sayled into Englande, euer forecasting and doubting the chaunce that might happen, did neuer cease to pray to God, to send victorie to her friends and confederates: which when she knewe by her husbandes letters to be obteyned, shee wyth Prince Edward her sonne and her trayne, entred their shippes, to take their voyage into Englande: but the wynter was so sore, the weather so stormy, and the winde so contrary, that she was fayne to take lande againe, and deterrc her iorney tyll another season. Her enemies sayde, that it was Gods iust prouision, that she which had bene the occasion of so many battayles, and of so much manslaughter in Englande should neuer returne thither agayne, to doe more mischief. Her friendes on the other side, sayd that she was kept away, and her iorney emperched by Sorcerers and Spectromancers: thus as mens imaginations ranne, so their tongues clacked.

In thys season Jasper Erle of Penbroke, went into Wales, to visite hys Countie of Penbroke, where he founde Lorde Henry, sonne to his brother Edmond Erle of Richmond, hauing not fully ten yeres of his age complete, which was kept in maner like a captiue: but well and honozably educated, and in all kind of ciuillie brought vp, by the Lady Harbert, late wife to Wylliam Erle of Penbroke, beheaded at Banbery, as you before haue heard, This Lorde Henry was he, that after king Richard, brother to king Edward, was banquished and ouerthrowne, obteyned the crowne and regalitie of thys realme, whome we ought to beleue, to be sent from God, and of him onely to be prouided a king, for to extinguishe both the factions and partes, of king Henry the sixt, and of king Edward the fourth (which had almost brought the Nobilitie of thys realme to a finall destruction, and an bitter decay.) And thys Jasper Erle of Penbroke as aforesayd tooke this child being hys Nephew, out of the custodie of the Ladie Harbert, and at hys returne brought the same childe to London, to king Henry the sixt, whome when the king had a good space by himselfe, secretly beholden and marked, both hys wyt and hys lykely towardnesse, he sayed to such princes, as were then wyth him: Lo, surely this is he, to whome both we and our aduersaries leauing the possession of al things, shal hereafter geue rome and place. So this good man: he wedd before, the chaunce that should happen, that this Erle Henry so ordeyned by God, should in time to come (as he did in deede) haue and enjoy the kingdome, and the whole rule of the realme.

This was king Henry the seuenly.

As I haue shewed to you before, what things were done in Englande after that king Henry had obteyned the new possession of hys olde kingdome, thinking thinking surely to haue possessed and enioyed the same lenger season then eyther he did, or could by his aduersaries be permitted or suffered to doe: so must I of necessitie declare vnto you, what great perplexitie, what sodaine trouble, and what great store of immaginations, the landing of king Edward in Friseland, brought to and encombered with all, Charles Duke of Burgoyne: and how deceitfully for his owne aduantage he dissimuled, first with king Edward, and after with his partie aduersc, and how that he openly denied ayde to king Edward, when he priuily ministered great and large succours to him and his. I thinke you would not, that these things should be forgotten: And first call to your remembraunce, howe that Duke Charles had before this (as you haue heard) great intelligence or conference wyth Monsire de Wawclere, as he list himselfe to be called, cyther chiefe Capitaine of Caleys, or else deputie Capitayne to the Erle of Warwicke, which had promised to him by the Duke, a pencion yerely of a thousand Crownes, to the intent to stand still true to king Edward, and to relinquish the king Henry, but in especiall to abandon the Erle of Warwicke. The Duke although that he had small confidence, but rather great diffidence in the othe and promyse of Monsire de Wawclere: thought it necessarie to know in what case Caleys stode, and what alterations were there, because it was his nexte neighbor (for that time Bulleyn, and Bullenoy, and all Artoys, were in the handes of Duke Charles) as a pledge deliuered to hys father, as is before reherfed. Wherefore in all haste (before he sent for king Edward or spake with him) he sent his trustie counsayler Philip de Comines Lorde of Argenton, accompanied with two gentlemen to Caleys, which two gentlemen fauored more the partie of Lancaster then of Porke. The Lorde of Argenton met with the people of the Countrey of Bullenoy, flyng from euery parte lyke wyld Dere: for the Erle of Warwicke had now lately sent to Caleys, foure hundred Archers on horseback, which forayed and spoiled all the Countrey of Bullenoy. The Dukes messengers, which had not sene so sodaine a chaunge of worldly things, durst not kepe on their iorney, but the same night taried at Turnoham, and sent to Monsire de Wawclere for a safe conduyt, and also wrote to the Duke of the feare that they were in. The Duke sent worde to Philip de Comines, that he and his with all speede, should passe towarde Caleys, and if they there were taken, he would shortly for a ransome, buye or redeeme them agayne. For he passed little eyther of the payne of his seruaunt, or of his charge and expence, so that his purpose might be serued. When this word was brought to the messengers at Turnohan, at the same tyme they receyued a letter from Monsire de Wawclere, wyth louing wordes and gracious termes, declaring that they might safely come, and freely depart, as before they were liberally accustomed: so that sir Philip and his companions came to Caleys, wythout any meeting or solemne entertaintment contrary to the olde fashion that he had sene. When they entred into the towne, they might perceyue euery man did weare the Erle of Warwikes badge, and on euery doze were set white Crosses, and ragged staves, with times and poesies, which purposed the french king, and the Erle of Warwicke were all one. These things seemed very straunge, and nothing pleasaunt to the Burgonions. The Lorde Wawclere sent for them to dinner the next day being well accompanied, and did weare on hys

Cap,

Cap, a whyte ragged staffe of Golde enamyled, and so did many other, and he that could haue it neyther of Golde nor of Siluer, had it of silke or cloth. Thys badge was taken by within one quarter of an houre, after the newes came out of Englande: suche is the mutation of the common people, lyke a reede with euery winde bowing and bending. While these Burgonions lay thus in Caleys, they had knowledge that the Erle of Warwike had prepared foure thousande valyaunt men, to make frontier warre on the Dukes Countries, whereof by poste they certified the Duke, which so fumed and smoked at the matter, that he wist neyther well what to doe, nor of whome to aske comfortable or wholesome counsaile. For warre he was compelled to haue with the French King, which had taken from him certayne townes: and if he succoured king Edwarde, he was sure that with the Erle of Warwike, he should haue no peace: and if he left king Edward his confederate and allye, in the time of hys tribulation, destitute of ayde and succour, all the worlde of him might speake shame, vnfaithfulnesse and dishonor. When the Duke had well aduised thys matter, he wrote to hys messengers, that they should require to haue the league made betwene the two realmes, kept and obserued, with dyuers other priuy instructions. Philip de Comines, being wise and well learned, declared to the counsaile of Caleys, that the Duke hys Maister not a little marueyled why the Englishe men should ouer runne, and destroy his Countries, hauing a league so sure, so strong, and with so many wordes of efficacie enforced, lately made betwene the two Countries, their territories and dominions, affirming that the mutation of the Prince, is no dissolution of the league: For although the princes be named, as chiefe contractors in euery treatie and amitie concluded, yet the Countries are bounden, and the subiectes shall make recompence, if any thing be altered wrongfully out of his course. And the rather to obtaine their desire, they caused all the Marchauntes goodes of Englande, being in the Dukes Countries, to be attached for the redresse of the spoyle, that the Englishe men had done in the Dukes Countrie. Which sore grieved the Marchauntes, and much hindered their voyages: beside thys, the Marchauntes of the Staple of Calice, wrote to the king, and to the Erle of Warwike: how, if their wolle and fell at Calice, were not solde and htered, as it was wont to be (the greatest parte whereof, was bought by the Dukes subiectes and Vassals for readie money) the Souldiours of the garrison, should lack their wages, the King should not be payde his custome, and the Marchaunt in conclusion should stande in aduerture both of losse of stock and credence. These perswasions mollified the Erle of Warwikes minde, and especially, because the King had no great store of money to furnishe Caleys withall, which store if he had had, surely the Duke of Burgoyne for al the league, had bene a little disturbed, and greuously molested. But considering that all thinges were not correspondent at thys time to the Erles appetite: he was content that it should be thus condescended and agreed, that the alyauce made betwene the realme of Englande and the Dukes deminions, should still remayne inuolated, sauyng in the steede of Edwarde, should be put for the king, this name Henry. This conclusion thus brought to an ende, came (euen as a man would wishe) to passe, for the Duke of Burgoyns purpose, for at this same time, the French king had wonne from him, the fayre towne of Amias, and saint Quintines, so that if the Duke should haue had warre both with Fraunce and Englande, he had bene lykely to haue bene shortly a poore Duke, or else vtterly vndone and brought to destruction. And to pacifie and please the Erle of Warwike, whome he neuer loued and lesse fauored: he wrote louingly to hym, declaring that as he was lineally descended, and naturally procreated of the noble stocke and familie of Lancaster, by his Graundmother, being daughter to the high and mightie Prince John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster: so was he by nature bound, and by alliance enforced to maintaine and defende the sayde noble house and linage, during his lyfe, as euer he hath done, both in worde and deede, agaynst all maner of persons and estates: furthermore, promising to beare hys good hart, louing minde, and friendly fauor, to king Henry the sixt and his sequele, before all other Princes and Potentates, wyth many other flattering termes and glosing wordes: which fayre promises, I thinke neyther the Duke himselfe inwardly minded, nor yet the Erle outwardly beleued.

Nowe to returne to king Edwarde, being in the Duke of Burgoyns lande, which, although he were out of his countrey, yet did he neuer dispayre but had a firme hope, to haue a iust and ready occasion to him geuen, howe to obtayne his kingdome, and dominion, and that in short space. For partlye, he hoped of a great helpe, of his brother in lawe, the Duke of Burgoyne, and partlye he was dayly solicited, by the letters, and messages of men of his faction in Englande, to returne with all speede, promising him company and comfort. Many other there were which eyther for feare of the rigor of the lawe, which they had offended, or else disdainyng that the worlde was so altered: or else being brought into king Edwardes fauor, had hope to erre cyse their pollyng roomes, as they did before his flying out of Englad, dayly came to him from Englande, and prouoked him more and more, to take his iorney homeward. King Edwarde in maner rauished with their golden promises, came to the Duke of Burgoyne, to the towne of Saint Doll, and there declared to him what great intelligence he had in the realme of Englande, and what assured friendes he had in the same, requiryng him to ayde him by thys speede, as his onely trust, and sole hope of reliefe was in him, being not onely his brother in lawe, but eche being companion of others order: for the king wore the golden fleece, and the Duke wore the Garter. The Duke of Somerset, which was cosin germaine remoued to the Duke of Burgoyne, and brought by and had a pencion in the Dukes house. (For surely the Duke of Burgoyne loued better the house of Lancaster, then the house of Yorke) sore labored to the contrary, affirming that it was both vngodlye, and vnnaturall, to exalte and set by a straunger, hauing no ryght, and to depose and depyue his naturall kinsman, hauing a iust title descended to hym, from the king his father, and the king his Grandfather, from his scepter and regalitic. Duke Charles was in a great perplexitie, not knowyng well what to say, whether consanguinitie should preuaile more, or affinitie, or nature before fauor, not willing if he might, to displease any of both the partyes. But because the war was ouert at his nose, with the French kyng: he concluded openly (but intending another thing secretly) to ayde the Duke of Somerset, and other that were with him, takyng of them certayne promises, for thinges to be done agaynst the Erle of Warwicke: when they should espie their tyme, most apt and conuenient: The Duke of Sommerfet ioyous of these newes, sailed into Englande, and made report to king Henry. King Edward was present, and hearde all this determination, which brought him into a great heauinesse and a deepe perplexitie: howbeit he was priuily aduertised by a friende, that these cloked dissimulations, were onely for this cause, that Duke Charles would in no wise, haue warre with both the realmes at once, and further, if the saide Duke were put to the worse, or vanquished by the French king, then he were not able, neyther to ayde, nor to succor king Edward. Wherfore to blind withall the French king, which sore desired, that the Duke might haue warre with England: for then he knewe that his enterprise, were more then halfe gotten. The Duke declared openlye, that he would in no wyse minister any succors to king Edward, streightly charging and commaunding, vpon payne of the hart, that no man should once passe the sea with him, or in his armie. But all this proclamation notwithstanding when the Duke saw that king Edward, vpon hope of his friends, would needes repaire into Englande agayne (he hauyng compassion of his vnfortunate chaunce) caused priuily to be deliuered to him fiftie. Of which returnyng, the Esterlinges were glad, trusting that by that meane, if he obtained agayne the possession of the realme, they should the soner come to a concozde and a peace, and to the restitution of their liberties, and franchises, which they claimed to haue within England. The Duke of Burgoyne as men reported, cared not much on whose side the victorie fell, sayyng for payment of his money. For he would oft say, that he was friend to both parts, and eche part was friendly to him.

King Edward hauing nowe in a readinesse onely, two thousande men of warre, beside mariners, in the spring of the yere, sayled into England, and came on the coast of Yorkechire, to a place called Raucenspur, and there setting all his men on lande, he consulted with his Captains, to knowe to what place, they should first for succor resort vnto: for he imagined that no waye could be for him sure, hauing so small a company of souldiours.

After long debating, it was concluded, that diuers persons hauing light horses, should skoure the countrey on euery side, to see if by any perswasions, they might allure the hartes of the rusticall and bylandishe people, to take king Edwards part, and to weare harnesse in his quarell: which with all diligence, folowed their commission. It seemeth somewhat to leane to the truth, that king Edward beyng a wise and circumspect Prince, would not haue bene so foolish hardy, as to enter Englande with halfe a handfull of men of warre, except he had bene sure of speedy succor and faithfull friendship: In which argument there is no doubt, but that the Duke of Clarence and he, were secretly agreed before, and that the Marques Montacute, had secretly procured his fauor, of which priuy signes, and cloked workings, open tokens, and manifest doynge, afterwarde appered. The light Horsemen, which were sent about, after they had felt the minds and intents, of the rude people (as much as they might) they returned to king Edward the next daye, making relation that all the townes round about, were permanent and stiffe on the part of king Henry, & could not be remoued: and that it was but a folly farther to sollicite or attempt them, considering that when they were moued and exhorted to be true to king Edward, not one man durst speake for feare of the Erle of Warwicke.

Which aunswere, when king Edward had perfectly digested, of very necessitie he chaunged his purpose: for where before his clayme was to be restored to the Crowne and kingdome of England, nowe he caused it to be published, that he onely claymed the Duchie of Yorke, to the entent that in requirynge nothing, but that which was both iust and honest, he might obteyne the more fauor of the common people. It was almost incredible to see what effect this newe imaginacion (although it were but fayned) sorted and tooke vpon the first openyng (such a power hath Justice euen amongst all men) when it was blowen abroad that king Edwards desyre was not for the kingdome, but onely requyred his iust patrimonie and inheritance of the Duchie of Yorke. By reason wherof, all men moued with mercy and compassion, began out of hande either to fauor him, or else not to resist him, so that he might obteyne his Duchie of Yorke. When he had found these meanes to pacifie mens mindes, and to reconcile their hartes, he determined to take his iorney toward Yorke, and so went to Beuerley. The Erle of Warwicke which then lay in Warwikechire, beyng informed that king Edward was landed, and goyng toward Yorke, with all haste wrote to the Marques Mountacute his brother, which had lyeen at the Castell of Pomfret all the last winter, with a great company of Souldiours, geuing him warnyng, and aduertisyng him in what perill they whole affayres stode in, if their enemy should obteyne the possession, or enter into the Citie of Yorke, willyng and commaundyng him to set on king Edward with all expedition, and bid him battaile, or else to kepe the passage, that he should passe no farther, till he himselfe had gathered a greater host, which with all diligence, he was assembling to come and ioyne with his brother the Marques. And because that the Erle knew not by what way his enemies would take their iourney, he wrote to all the townes of Yorke shire, and to the Citie also, commaundyng all men on the kinges behalfe, to be redie in harnesse, and to shut their gates agaynst the kinges enemies. King Edward without any wordes spoken to him, came peaceably nere to Yorke, of whose commyng, when the Citizens were certified, without delay they armed themselves, and came to defend the Gates, sendyng to him two of the chiefest Aldermen of the Citie, which earnestly admonished him on their behalfe to come not one foote nerer, nor rashly to enter into so great a leopardie, considering that they were fully determined, and bent to compell him to retract with dent of sworde. King Edward well marking their message, was not a little troubled and vnquieted in his minde, and driuen to seeke the furthest poynt of his witte, for he had both two mischionous and perillous chaunces, even befoze his eyes, which were hard to be aduoyded, one was, if he shoulde go backe againe, he feared least the rurall and common people for couetousnesse of pray, and spoyle, would fall on him, as one that fled away for feare and dread. The other was, if he should proceede any farther in his iourney, then might the Citizens of Yorke issue out with all their power, and sodainly circumuent him, and take him: wherefoze he determined to set forward, neyther with armour nor with weapon, but with lowly wordes, and gentle entreatynges, requiring most hartly the messengers that were sent, to the Citizens, that he came neyther to demaund the realme of England, nor the superioritie of the same, but onely the Duchy of Yorke, his olde inheritaunce, the which Duchy, if he might by theyr meanes reconer, he would neuer let passe out of his memorie their friendship and gentlenesse. And so with fayre wordes and flatterying speche he dismissed the Messengers, and with good speede he and his folowed so quickly after, that they were almost at the gates as sone as the Messengers. The Citizens heeryng his good answer, that he ment nor intended nothing prejudicial to king Henry, nor his royall aucthoritie, were much mitigated and cooled, and began to comon with him from their walles, willyng him to conuey himselfe into some other place without delay, which if he did they assured him, that he should haue neyther hurt nor dammage, but he gently speaking to all men, and especially to such as were Aldermen, whome he called worshipfull, and by their proper names them saluted, after many fayre promises to them made exhorted and desired them that by their favourable friendship, he might enter into his awne towne, of the which he had both his name and title. And thus all the whole day was consumed in doubtfull communication. The Citizens partly wonne by his fayre wordes, and partly by hope of his large promises, fell to this pact and conuention, that King Edward would swere to entertaine his Citizens of Yorke after a gentle sort and fashion, and hereafter to be obedient, and saythfull to all king Henryes commaundementes and preceptes.

King Edward

that then they would receyue him into their Citie, and ayde and comfort him with money. King Edward (whom the Citizens called only Duke of Yorke) beyng glad of this fortunate chaunce, the next moornyng entred in at the gate where the Mayor and Aldermen stode redie to receyue him, and there they ministred vnto him a solompne othe, which he tooke vpon the holy Gospels, which was to obserue the two Articles aboue mentioned and agreed vpon, when it was farre vnlike, that he eyther entended or purposed to obserue any of them, which plainly afterwarde was to all men manifest, euidently perceiuyng, that he tooke no more studie or diligence for any one earthly thing, then he did to persecute King Henry, and to spoyle him of his Kingdome. So it is dayly seene that aswell Princes, as men of lesser reputacion, led by blinde auarice, and deuillish ambition, forgetting the scruple of conscience, and the ende of all honestie, vse to take an othe by the immortal God, which they know perfectly shal be broken & violate hereafter, befoze the othe be first made or sworne: yet these persons (as examples thereof be not very straunge to finde) at one time or other be worthily scourged for their perjury, inso much oftentimes that the blot of such offence of the parentes is punished in the sequele and posteritie as shall appere hereafter in the lyfe of Richard the thirde.

obedience to

When King Edward had appesed the Citizens, and that their fury was past, he entred into the Citie, and clerely forgetting his othe, he first set a garison of Souldiours in the towne, to the entent that nothing should be mooued agaynst him by the Citizens, and after he gathered a great host by reason of his money. When all thing was redie, accor dyng as he desired, because he was informed that his enemies did make no great preparacion to resist him, he thought it necessary therfoze, with the more speede and diligence to make haste toward London: and as it were for the nonce, he left the right way toward Donfret, where the Marques Montacute with his armie lay and tooke the way on the right hande, not fully foure myle from the campe of his enemies. And when he saw that they made no stirryng, nor once shewed themselves in sight, he returned into the common high way againe, a little beyond their campe, and came safely to the towne of Rottyngham, where came to him sir William Parre, sir Thomas a Borough, sir Thomas Montgomerie, and diuers other of his assured friends with their aydes, which caused him at the first commyng to make Proclamacion in his awne name King Edward the fourth, boldly sayng to him, that they would serue no man but a King. This Proclamacion cast a great shame and dolor into the heartes of the Citizens of Yorke, for that they might apparantly perceyue, that they were seduced, and for their good will vnjustly (if it might be sayd) deluded and mocked. But when the fame was blowen abroad, that King Edward, without any detriment was in safetie come to Rottyngham, Princes and noble men on all sydes began to fall to him, firmly beleuyng, that either the Marques Montacute, beyng fauor to King Edward, would not once with him encounter, or that he was astrayde to set on or to geue battaile, knowing not to what part his Souldiours would incline. But whatsoever the occasion was, the most part thought it more for the securitie and auantage of themselves, to take part and ioyne with King Edward, beyng at all poyntes furnished with men of warre, rather then to cleue to King Henry, and to be al-

wayes in ieopardy both of life and land. King Edward (as you can not blame him) beyng with these good fortunes encouraged, and with his armie furnished at all pointes, came to his towne of Leicester, and there heeryng that the Erle of Warwike, accompanied with John Erle of Orford, were together at Warwike with a great power, and were both determined to set on him, hee politiquely imaginynge to prevent their inuencion, determined in great haste to remoue his whole armie, hoppng surely, either to geue them battaile, either to allure and bring to his syde his brother George Duke of Clarence, and to common with him in some priuie place, before he came to his confederates: least peraduenture he should be by them trapped and compassed, knowynge that the Duke was in nothing constant.

In this very season, to tell you how the Erle of Warwike was displeas- ed, and grudged against his brother the Marques, for letting king Edward passe, it were to long to write: for where he himselfe had politiquely prouid- ed and foreseene all things, the Marques neuertheless where the power of their enemies first began together, neuer moued foote, nor made resistance as he was commaunded, but besydes this, suffered them with so smal a num- ber of Souldiours, before his eyes, and in his open sight, without any bat- taile to passe by: wherefore the Erle considerynge that king Edward did day- ly encrease his power (as a runnyng ryuer by goynge more and more aug- menteth) thought it most necessary for him, to geue him battaile with speede, and thereupon he called together his armie, and in all hast sent for the Duke of Clarence to ioyne with him, which had gathered and assembled together a great hoste about London. But when he perceyued that the Duke lingered, and did all thinges negligently, as though he were in doubt of war or peace, he then began somewhat to suspect that y<sup>e</sup> Duke was of his brethren corrup- ted and lately chaunged, and therefore without delay marched forwarde to- warde Couentrie, to the entent to set on his enemies. In the meane season, king Edward came to Warwike, where he found al the people departed, and from thence with all diligence aduanced his power toward Couentrie, and in a plaine by the Citie he pitched his fielde. And the next day after that he came thether, his men were set forwarde, and marshalled in arraye, and he valiantly bade the Erle battaile: which mistrustynge that he should be decey- ued by the Duke of Clarence (as he was in dede) kept himselfe close with- in the walles. And yet he had perfect worde that the Duke of Clarence came forwarde toward him with a great armie, king Edward beyng also there- of informed, rayfed his campe, and made toward the Duke. And least that there might be thought some fraude to be cloked betwene them, the king set his battayles in an order, as though he would fight without any lenger de- lay, the Duke did likewise. When eche hoste was in sight of other, Richard Duke of Gloucester, brother to them both, as though he had bene made Ar- bitrer betwene them, first rode to the Duke, and with him commoned very secretly: from him he came to king Edward, and with like secretnesse so bled him, that in conclusion no vnaturall warre, but brotherly friendship was concluded and proclaymed, and then leauynge all armour and weapon asyde, both the brethren louingly embraced, and familiarly commoned together. It was no maruaile that the Duke of Clarence, with so small perswasion, and lesse exhortynge, turned from the Erle of Warwikes parte, for as you haue haue heard before, this marchandice was labored and concluded by a Dam- sell when the Duke was in the frenche Court, to the Erles bitter confusion, After this King Edward caused to be proclaimed, that the Duke and all that came with hym, should be taken as hys true friendes, wythout fraude or yll suspicion. But this notwithstanding, it seemeth that God did neyther forgeue nor forget to punishe the Duke wyth condigne punishment, for bio- layng and breaking his othe solempnely, and aduisedly taken and made to the Erle of Warwike, for God not many yeres after, suffred him lyke a per- iured person to die a cruell and a straunge death.

Then was it concluded amongst the thre brethren to attempt the Erle of Warwicke, if by any fayre meanes he might be reconciled or by any pro- mise wonne to their parte: To whome the Duke of Clarence sent dyuers of his secret friendes, first to excuse him of the act that he had done, secondarily to require hym to take some good ende, nowe whyle he myght wyth King Edward.

When the Erle had hard patiently the Dukes message, Lorde, how he detested and accursed him, cryng out on him, that he contrary to hys othe, promise, and fidelitie, had shamefully turned hys face from hys confederates and allies: But to the Dukes Messengers he gaue none other answer but thys, that he had liefer be alwayes lyke himselfe, than lyke a false and a periured Duke, and that he was fully determined neuer to leaue warre till epyther he had lost his aboue naturall lyfe, or utterly extinguished and put vnder hys foes and enemies.

From thence King Edward thus being furnyshed of a strong hoste, went wythout any maner of diffidence or mistrust toward London (where after it was knowen that the Duke of Clarence was come to hys brethren, and that all they came together in one knot to the Citie, such a feare rose sodain- ly amongst the Citizens, that they were driuen to their wits ende, not know- yng epyther what to doe or to say, but at the last very feare compelled them to take King Edwardes parte. The selfesame season, the Erle of Warwike sent Letters to King Henry, to the Duke of Sommerset, the Archebyschop of Yorke, and other of hys counsaile, that they should keepe the Citie from their enemies handes, by the space of two or thre dayes after the comynge of their enemies, and that he shortly would be at hande, wyth a puyssaunt armie. They as they were commaunded defended the Citie strongly, but it was to small purpose, for the Citizens in the same time began earnestly to consult, what part they should folow for their most indemnitie: and in con- clusion, when they considered that King Henry was such an innocent person, as of hymselfe was not most apt to rule and gouerne the publique welth of the realme. And that on the other side, King Edward by no other mens tea- chyng, but onely by hys aboue pollicy and wytt could order the realme and go- uerne the Kingdome. And farther that King Edward was such a person as was able both to defende himselfe and also all hys, from iniurie and hosti- litie: whereupon all men were glad to leane to him, and to take hys parte, wherefore they concluded to receyue him into the Citie: which determinati- on being blowen abroad (as the nature of the people is euer to delight in no- uelties) the commonaltie could not be compelled by no commaundement to tarye at home, but ranne in heapes out of the City to meete him, and saluted him him as their king and souereigne Lorde. When the Duke of Sommerfet and other of King Henries friendes sawe the worlde thus sodaynly chaunged, euery man fled, and in haste shifted for himselfe, leauing King Henry alone, as an host that should be sacrificed, in the Bishops Palace of London, adioyning to Paules Church, not knowyng of whome, nor what counsaile to aske, as he which with trouble and aduersitie was clerely dilled, in which place he was by king Edward taken, and agayne committed to prison.

Thys was a sodayne chaunge, for the same daye the Archebysshop of Yorke to the intent that the people might more firmly stick on hys syde, caused hym to ryde about London, appareled in a gobone of blew Weluet, with a great companie cryng king Henry, king Henry (which sight as much pleased the Citizens, as a fyre paynted on the wall warned the olde woman) not knowyng that or night, his triumphing should be turned to tremblyng, and his solempnitie conuerted into mourning, such chaunce was to him prouided.

King Edward returned to London agayne the .xj. daye of Aprill, sixe Moneths after that he had sayled into Flaundyrs, and first calling befoze him a great assemble of people, highly commended the fidelitie of the Citizens, which they constauntly bare vnto hym, rendring to the Aldermen most hartie thanks for that, that they had kept, and caused the people to continue, and be permanent in their good mindes and loyaltie towarde hym, blaming farther and rebuking as well Marchaunt straungers as Englishe men, whom he knewe to haue prested, and lent money to king Henry, for the arraiyng and setting forth of a new armie agaynst him. But when he had grieuouly with terrible wordes declared to them their seditious cryme and trayterous offence, he bade them be of good comfort, and to expell all feare, for he released to them both the punishment of their bodyes and losse of goodes, and graunted to them pardon for their faultes and offences, by which gentle meane, he reconciled to hym the hartes of the whole multitude, obeyning that by fayre and louing wordes, which he coulde not haue achieved wyth sharpe strokes, and bloody woundes.

The Erle of Warwike pondering that the gayne of the whole battayle stood in making hast, with all diligence folowed hys enemies, hoping (that if they were let neuer so little, with any stop or taryng by the waye) to fight wyth them befoze they shoulde come to London: the which he thought, shoulde be muche to hys aduantage, consideryng that he perfectly knewe the Cytie to be destitute of men of warre for defence, and to haue no maner of municions, to set on the walles or Towres, so that they were not able to abide a siege, and for that cause, euer they enclined to the victorious and stronger part. But when he folowynge his enemies, had passed a great part of his iourney, he was informed that king Edward peaceably was entred into London, and had taken, and sent King Henry to prison againe: which things deeply considered, he sawe that all cauillacions of necessitie, were now brought to this ende, that they must be committed to the hazard and chaunce of one battaile, wherefoze, he rested with his armie, at the towne of Saint Albons, partly to refresh his Souldiours, and partly to take counsaile what was best to do. In the Erles armie were John Duke of Excester, Edmond Erle of Sommerfet, John Erle of Drenford, and John Marques Montacute, whome the Erle his brother well knewe, not to bee well minded (but foze agaynst his stomacke) to take part with these Lordes, and therfoze stode in a doubt, whether he at this time, might trust him or no, but the brotherly loue betwene them, washed away and diminished all suspicion: But whatsoeuer opinion the Erle conceyued of him or any other, the Erle as a man past all feare, determined couragiously to set on his enemyes. And from Saint Albones, he remoued to a village in the meane way, betwene London and Saint Albones, called Barnet, beyng ten mile distant from both the townes. This towne standeth on an hill, on whose top is a faire plain for two armies to ioyne together. On the one part of this plaine, the Erle of Warwicke pitched his fielde, taryng for his enemies. The rumoz of the Erles comyng, was spred in an instant ouer all London, which quickned King Edward not a little: wherefoze with all speede he adioyned to that hoste, that he brought with him first to London, a company of picked, and chosen persons, strong, yong, and mete for all assayes, besyde other new aydes, that were then come to him: Harnesse, weapons, horse, and all other engines and instrumentes mete for the warre, he neyther forgat nor slackly furnished. What shall I say more, he determined clerely to spende all his riches, yea, and all that he could imagine vpon the chaunce of this battaile: firmly beleuyng, that this conflict should knit by the knot of all his labor, and bring hym to quietnesse. So with a pupysant armie, he marched forwarde, and to put his people in bre, that they might be the more redie to fight, whensoever they should encounter with their enemies, he deuided them in foure partes, and he brought with him also King Henry the sixt. On Easter eue at after noone he came to Barnet, and there not farre from his enemyes, he encamped his armie, and least his enemies should compell him to fight that night, he enuironed his campe with newe fortifications, and trenches, for taryng that night was to him a singuler profite, and to his enemies a great dammage, considering the lenger he taryed, the more people came to his ayde. Thus both the armies lodged that night on the plaine, but not out of their harnesse, for their tentes were so nere together, in the which, what for neyng of horses, & talkyng of men, none of both the hostes could that night take any rest or quietnesse. At the breaking of the day, the Erle of Warwicke set his men in array, in this maner: in the right wing he set the Marques Montacute, and the Erle of Drenford, with certaine horsemen, and he with the Duke of Excester, tocke the left wing, and in the middelt betwene both, he set Archers, and to them hee appoynted the Duke of Sommerfet to be Capitaine. And when he had set his men in an order, he encouraged his men to fight, with many comfortable wordes, willing them to striue with a good and fierce courage, and to remember that they fight, not onely for the libertie of the Countrie, agaynst a tyrant, which wrongfully and against all right, had invaded and subdued this realme, but that they fight in the quarell of a true & vndoubted king, against a cruell man, and a tyrannous vsurper, in the cause of a Godly, and a pitifull Prince, agaynst an abhominable manqueller, and bloodie butcher: In which cause beyng so good, so godly, and so iust, God of very iustice must needes be their shield and defence.

King Edward likewise ordred his battayles. In the foreward he set the Duke of Gloucester, the middle ward, he himselfe with the Duke of Clarence hauyng with them king Henrye, did rule and gouern, the Lorde Hastings tynges led the rewarde, and besides these three battayles, he kept a company of fresh men in store, which did him great pleasure, and this done, he encouraged his men, saying: that their aduersaries were onely Traitors to the realme, spoylers of the poore commonalty, and people destitute of all grate, good fortune, and good liuyng. Which mischeuous persons, if they shoulde preuaile through the faintnesse of your heartes, all you gentlemen and richmen, were in ieperdye of your lyues, all meane men in doubt of robbing and spoyling, and all inferiour persons in hazard of perpetuall bondage and seruitude.

When the day began to spring, the trumpets blew by coragiously, and the battaile fierly began, Archers first shot, and bill men folowd them. King Edward hauing y greater number of men, valiantly set on his enemies. The Erle on the other side, remembreing his auncient fame and renoume, manfully withstode him. This battaile on both sides was sore fought, and manye slayne, in whose roomes succeeded euer fresh, and fresh men. In the meane season, while all men were together by the eares, euer loking to which way fortune woulde encline. The Erle of Warwicke after long fight, wisely did perceiue his men to be ouer pressed, with the multitude of his aduersaries: wherfore he caused new men to relieue them that fought in the foreward, by reason of which succors, king Edwards part gaue a little backe (which was the cause that some lokers on, and no fighters, galloped to London, saying: that the Erle had wonne the fielde) which thing when king Edwarde byd perceiue, he with all diligence sent fresh men to their succors.

If y battail were fierce & deadly before, now it was crueller, more bloody, more feruent, and fiery, & yet they had fought from morning almost to noone, without any parte getting auantage of other. King Edwarde beyng wery of so long a conflict, & willing to see an ende, caused a great crew of fresh men (which he had for this onely pollicye, kept all day in store) to set on their enemies: but although the Erle sawe these new succors, of fresh men to enter the battayll, beyng nothing a fraide, but hoping of the victoery (knowyng perfectly that there was all king Edwardes power) comforted his men beyng wery, sharply quickning, and earnestly desiring them with hardy stomakes, to bere out this last and finall brunt of the battail, and that the fielde was euen at an ende. But when his souldiers beyng sore wounded, wcried wyth so long a conflict, did geue litle regarde to his wordes, he beyng a man of a mind inuincible, rushed into the middest of his enemies, where as he (aduentured so farre from his owne company, to kill and slay his aduersaries, that hee coulde not be rescued) was in the middest of his enemies, stricken doone and slayne. The Marques Mountacute, thinking to succor his brother, which he saw was in great ieperdye, and yet in hope to obtayne the victoery, was likewise ouerthrowne and slain. After the Erle was dead, his part fled, and many were taken, but not one man of name, nor of nobilitie.

Some aucthors write, that this battaile was fought so neere hand that king Edwarde was constrained to fight his owne person, and fought as sore as any man of his partie, and that the Erle of Warwicke, which was wont euer to ride on horsebacke, from place to place, from ranke to ranke, comforting his men, was now aduised by the Marques his brother, to relinquish his horse, & trie the extremitie by handie strokes, which if he had bene on his horsebacke,

This ende had Richarde Neuell, Erle of Warwicke, whose stoute stomacke, and inuincible corage, after so many straunge fortunes, and perilous chaunces, by him escaped, caused death before he came to any olde age priuily to stele on him, and with his darte to take from him all worldly affections: but death did one thing, that lyfe coulde not, for by death he hadde rest, peace, and quietnesse, which his lyfe euer abhorred, and coulde not suffer nor abide. On both partes were slaine at this battaile, more than ten. Th. men. Of pri-soners, the number could not be certainly knowne: On the Kings part were slaine sy Humfrey Burchier, sonne to the Lord Barnes, else no man of estimation. The occasion of this great slaughter was, because that where King Edwarde was wont, after the battaile obtayned, to crye: saue the commons, and kil the Captaynes, now he spared them not, because they not only so highly fauored the Erle of Warwicke, but also because they came with the Erle, against him in battaile. After this fielde ended, the Duke of Sommerset, with John Erle of Orenforde, were in all poste haste, flyng towarde Scotlande, but fearyng the ieperdies, that might chaunce in so long a iorneye, altered their purpose, and turned into Wales, to Jasper Erle of Penbrooke, euery man fledde whether his minde serued hym. The Duke of Excester wyth much difficultye, escaped into Westmynster dysguised, and there tooke Sen-uarpe.

King Edwarde after this victoery, although he wanne it not wythout great effusio of blood, aswell on his owne part, as the part of his enemies was greatly retoyced, & comforted: and after the maner of a victorious conquerer leadyng with him king Henrye like a captyue, in most triumphant maner, on Easter day at after noone, made his entry solemnly into the City of London, and at the Church of saint Paule, offered his standerd, and rendred to almighty God, for his great victoery, most humble and hartie thanks. The dead bodies of the Erle, and the Marques, were brought to London in a coffin, and before they shoulde be buried, by the space of thre dayes, they lay open bisaged, in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paule, to the intent that all men might evidently perceiue, that they vnsaynedly were dead, least perad-venture the common people hereafter, heeryng of some dissimulyng person, to take on him the name of the Erle of Warwicke, thinking him to be liuyng, might stire a new sedicion, and rebellion.

The common people sayde, that the king was not so ioconde, nor so ioyous, for the destruction of the Erle, but he was more sorowfull, for the death of the Marques, whome both he knewe, and it appered to other, to be inwardely his faythfull friende. For whose onely sake, hee caused both their bodies, to bee wyth their Ancesters, solempnly buried at the Priory of Bissam.

In the meane season, Queene Margaret hauing knowledge, that all thinges in Englande, were nowe altered and brought into trouble & broyle, by reason of king Edwardes late returne into the realme: gathering together no small company of hardy, and valiaunt souldiours, determined with al hast and diligence, with Prince Edwarde her sonne, to sayle into Englande, but yet once agayne (such was her destinie) beyng letted for lacke of prosperous wind, and encombered with too much & rigorous tempest, a day after the faire faire as the common prouerbe saith, landed at the Poynte of Weimouth, in Dorset shire. When she had passed the sea and taken lande, it was to her declared, how that king Edward had gotten agayne the Garlande, and that king Henry her husbände, was desolately left post a lone, and taken prisoner, how the Erie of Warwicke and his brother were both slaine, and deade, and all their armie destroyed, scattered, or taken, and in conclusion, that her parte had susteined, the most bitter plague, and scourge, considering both the chaunce and the tyme, that in many yerres befoze, had beene reade or seene. When she harde of these miserable chaunces, and misfortunes, so sodainely one in anothers necke, to haue taken their effect, she like a woman all dismated for feare fell to the grounde, her harte was pierced with sorowe, her speche was in a manner passed, all her spirites were tormented with Malencholy. The calamitie and misery of her tyme, she detested, and abhorred her vnstable and contrariant fortune, she stedfastlye blamed and accused her painefull laboz, her care of minde, turned into infelicitie she much lamented, and bewailed the euill fate and destinie of her husbände, which iminentlye befoze her eyes shee sawe to appzoch, she accused, repzoued, and reuiled, and in conclusion, her senses were so bered, and she so afflicted, and cast into such an agony, that she preferred death befoze life, rather desiring soner to die, then longer to liue, and peraduenture for this cause, that her enterioz eye sawe priuily, & gaue to her a secrete monicion of the great calamities, and aduersities, which then did hang ouer her head, and were likely incontinent to fall and succede, which other persons, neither looked for, nor regarded.

This Quene Margaret might well consider and thinke, that these euill aduentures chaunced to her for the most part, for the vnwoorthy death of Humfrey Duke of Gloucester, Uncle to her husbände: Of the which mischaunce, although she were not the very occasion and prouoker, yet she greatly offended in that she consented thereto, and did not saue hys lyfe, when she ruling all other, might conueniently haue stayed and letted it. For surely he beyng a lyue, and hauing the moderation and gouernaunce of the common welth, king Henry had neuer wauered in so many hasardes, and ieopardies of hys lyfe as he did. I would desire of God that all men would in egall Balance ponder and indifferently consider the causes of these misfortunes and euill chaunces, the which being eleuate in aucthoritie, doe meete and measure, iustice and iniury, right and wrong, by high powter, blinde aucthoritie, and vnbridled will.

But nowe to the purpose, when Quene Margaret sawe, that to bid battayle was to no purpose, and in maner in dispaire of the welth of her selfe, and her sonne: she with the Prince and her company, departed to a Sentuarie there by called Beaulieu in Hamthyre (where was a Monasterie of Honkes, of the order of Cisterciens) and registered her selfe and hers, as persons there priuiledged. When it was knowne that shee was landed, Edmond Duke of Somerset with Lord John hys brother, Thomas Courteney Erie of Devonshire, the which befoze euer toke the contrary part, whose sodaine chaunging, shortly turned to his awne confusion, Jasper Erie of Penbroke, John Lorde Wenlocke (a man made onely by King Edward) and John Longstrother, Prior of saint Johns in Englande, came in great haste to Beaulieu, and presented themselues to the Queene. Although that she

she were almost drowned in sorow and plunged in payne, yet when she sawe and beheld these noble and princely personages to resozte vnto her presence, she was somewhat comforted and greatly reuiued.

And first, least it should be layed to her charge, that she had done any thing misaduisedly: shee declared and shewed the cause, why she could not come to them in tyme, as she gladly would haue done, and for what purpose and intent, she had then taken the priuilege of Sentuarie: Beseeching them all to studie, and prouide with all diligence, for the welth and conseruation of her onely Jewell the Prince her sonne, and where for thys tyme, shee dispaired to doe anye thing by force of armes, that might be to her profite, shee thought it most conuenient for her (if the time of yere and her enemies did not let or stop her) to sayle agayne into Fraunce, and there to tarie till God would sende her better luck.

After that the Duke and other with comfortable wordes, somewhat had eased the dolorous harte of thys vnfortunate Quene: the sayde Duke began wyth a long processe to enter communication of warre to be renewsed, and wyth all haste possible, and extreme diligence, least their company by tariyng might be diminished, and king Edwardes powter encreased and augmented, considering that all thys time, he had no army gathered together, for so much that at the laste battayle, the very strength of his chiefe souldiours, was weakened: And that notwithstanding, that fortune shone on hym in obteyning the victorie agaynst the Erie of Warwicke, yet now it was not lykely that he should obteyne agayne a lyke victorie: affirming farther, that the more number of the nobilitie, bare toward king Henry her husbände, their good minds and fired hartes, and would helpe him both wyth men and money. And of hys awne free wyll, if she would take vpon her, the name of Capitayne agaynst her enemies, as she befoze that often tymes had enterprised: he offered a great power of able men, at hys awne expence and charge, promising that the two Eries should assure her of a farre greater number of valyaunt and expert warriors, then she would esteeme. And when he had shewed that, the victorie was now (if they list) in their handes, he merily required them all, to be of hardie harte and good cheere, and because the matter required great expedition, he thought it not necessarie farther to reason the cause of battayle, but determined out of hande how the battayle should be geuen and ordered.

The Quene whose minde gaue her, that thys mocion, should come to no good conclusion, answered: that she could well allowe thys sentence, if she thought that there might happen no great losse to some other, then the losse of her awne lyfe. But she suspected that whyle they would helpe things that they most phantasped and affected, the lyfe of Prince Edward her sonne, in wjome, all the whole hope of that familie stode and remayned, should be in perill and ieopardy: and therefore shee either thought it necessary to deferre the battayle till another time, or else to conuey her sonne into Fraunce agayne, there to lye sure and secret, till the chaunce of the first battayle were tryed and assayed. And no maruayle, although the naturall mother, much minded and studied for the sauegarde and tuition of the life of her sonne, pondering that next her husbände, whome shee reputed for cleene vndone, and vtterly cast away, she had nothing moze to be beloued, nothing moze derer, nor nothing to be made moze off.

Thus this prudent and politique Quene required the Chiefteynes expert in martiall feates, that they should before hande consider with themselves, discretely and advisedly of these thinges by her first moued, and after that done, if they thought it conuenient to geue battaile, she would to there agreement with all her heart be conformable: But there was no longer disputation of the matter, for the Duke sayde that there was no neede to waste any more wordes, for all they were determined (while their liues lasted) still to kepe warre agaynst their enemies, and therefore that thing which wryth great counsaile and deliberacion is concluded, ought to be aduanced and set forward with a whole consent and agreement.

Thus euery man together clerely bent and encouraged to the battaile, gathered his power by himselfe. The Duke through all his dominions, raysed a chosen companie of men of warre: likewise did the Erle of Devonshire, the Erle of Penbrooke, who went into Wales to his Erledome, to prepare his people with all diligence. The Quene, at the last was brought into this hope of good fortune, that she sayd, well be it, and so as the Duke had aduised her, she with her companie departed to Bathe, entending there to make her abode, till more of her asmitie were together assembled. But whether soeuer she went, fewe or none had therof knowledge, mistrustyng least her counsaile should by some Carptale, be published and opened to her aduersaryes, before she came to the place appoynted.

When king Edward knew that Quene Margaret was landed in England, & that the Duke of Somerset with her complices had prepared a newe armie, out of hand he dispatched certaine Currozs on light horses, into euery part to see what number his enemies were, and what way they entended to take. The Spyes, accordyng to their instructions, searched and sought the partes by West, and made relation diligently at their returne, what they had knowen and seene. The king beyng in a great agonie, because he knewe not what way his enemies tooke, determined, surely to encounter them at some one place before they came to London. And vpon this conclusion, with such an armie as he had gotten about London, he set forward into Oxfordshire, and there seekyng a place apt and meete to pitche his tentes, was conducted to Abyndon, where he encamped himselfe, commaundyng all men appoynted for the warre, with all diligence to folowe him to that place. All the Kinges hoste there beyng assembled and gathered into one companie, newes were brought to him, that his enemies were come to Bathe, and there did soiozne and tary purposely to augment and encrease their number of such as dayly to them did resorte: wherefore the king without delaye remoued straight to Marleborough, beyng distant from Bathe. xv. miles, makyng hast and great diligence, if by any possibilitie he might to geue them battaile before they returned into Wales, whether he thought (as they entended in dede) that they would take their iourney to ioyne themselves with the Erle of Penbrooke, which had gathered a great hoste in those parties.

When the Quene knewe that king Edward was come so nere to her, she taried not long at Bathe, but remoued in great hast to Bristow: and sent out certeine horsemen, to espie whether she might safely passe over the riuer of Seuerne by Gloucester into Wales, whether she determined first to go to augment her armie, and then without any delay, with spere and shield, courageously to set on her enemies, wheresoeuer they would abyde. They that were sent, returned to her agayne, declaring that the towne of Gloucester was vnder the obeyfance of Richard Duke of Gloucester, the Kinges brother, and that although they had solicited the Lord Beauchampe of Wobike, which lay there in the Castell, and had the rule of the towne, and the townes men first by rewardes, after by manacing, eyther to take their part, or peaceably to suffer her to passe over their bridge, they were therewithall, neither once moued, nor once would speake comfortably to the Messengers. When she hard these newes, she shortly departed from Bristow with her armie, to a proper towne on Seuerne syde, called Tewkesbury, leauyng Gloucester vnbassaulted, least peradventure she might there spend her tyme with much losse and litle gaine, but in her passage towarde Tewkesbury, the Lorde Beauchampe tooke from her rereward more ordinaunce then she might haue well spared, which did to her no small prejudice. When the Quene was come to Tewkesbury, and knewe that king Edward folowed her with his horsemen at the very backe, she was sore abashed, and wonderfully amased, and determined in her selfe, to flie into Wales, to Iaspur Erle of Penbrooke: But the Duke of Somerset, willyng in no wise to flie backward, for doubtes that he casted might chaunce by the way, determined there to tary, to take suche fortune as God would sende, and beyng fixed in a fayre Parke, adioynyng to the towne, he pitched hys fielde agaynst the will and consent of many ether Capitaines, which would that he should haue drawne asyde, for a while till the Erle of Penbrooke with his armie were with him associate, but his will serued for his reason, and so the chaunce folowed. The Duke of Somerset entending to abyde the battaile, like a politique warrour, trenched hys campe rounde about of such an altitude, and so strongly, that his enemies by no meanes easily could make any entry, and farther perceiuyng that his part could neuer escape without battaile, determined there to see the finall ende of his good or yll chaunce: wherefore he marshalled his hoste in this maner: he and the Lorde John of Somerset his brother led the foreward: The middle ward was gouerned by the Prince, vnder the condypte of the Lorde of Saint Johns, and Lorde Wenlocke (whome king Edward had highly before preferred, and promoted to the degree of a baron.) The rereward was put in the rule of the Erle of Devonshire.

When all these battayles were thus ordered and placed, the Quene and her sonne Prince Edward rode about the field, encouragyng their soldiers, promisyng to them (if they did shew themselves valiaunt against their enemies) great rewardes and high promotions, innumerable gaine of the the spoyle, and bootye of their aduersaries, and aboue all other fame and renoume through the whole Realme.

King Edward likewise which the day before was come within a mile of Tewkesbury, put his brother the Duke of Gloucester in the foreward, and himselfe in the middleward, the Lorde Marques, and the Lorde Hastings led the reregard. The Duke of Gloucester, which lacked no pollicy, valiantly with his battaile assaulted the trenche of the Quenes Campe, whome the Duke of Somerset with no lesse courage defended, the Duke of Gloucester for a very politique purpose, with all his men reculed backe. The Duke of Somerset, perceiuyng that: lyke a knight more couragious then circum-spect, came out of his trench with his whole battaile, and folowed the chase, not doubtyng but the prince and the Lorde Wenlocke, with the middlewarde had folowed iust at his backe. But whether the Lorde Wenlocke dissuuled the matter for King Edwardes sake, or whether his hart serued him not, still he stode looking on. The Duke of Gloucester takyng the aduantage that he aduentured for, turned againe face to face, to the Duke of Sommersets battaile, which (nothing lesse thinkyng on, then of the returne) were within a small season shamefully discomfited. The Duke of Sommerset seeyng hys unfortunat chaunce, returned to the middleward, where he seeyng the Lorde Wenlocke standyng still, after he had reuled him, and called him Traytor, with his Axe strake the braynes out of his head. The Duke of Gloucester entred the trench, and after him the King, where after no long conflict, the Queenes part went almost all to wrecke, for the most part were slaine. Some fled for succor in the thicke of the Parke, some into the Monastery, some into other places. The Queene was found in her Chariot almost dead for sorow, the Prince was apprehended and kept close by sir Richard Crofts: the Duke of Sommerset, and the Lorde Prior of Saint Johns, were by force taken prisoners, and many other also. In the field and chase were slain Lorde John of Sommerset, the Erle of Deuonshire, sir John Belues, sir Edward Hampden, sir Robert Wychingham, and sir John Lewkenor, and thize thousand other.

After the field ended, King Edward made a Proclamation, that who so euer could bring Prince Edward to him alive or dead, should haue an annuall of an hundred pound duryng his life, and the Princes lyfe to be saued. Sir Richard Crofts, a wise and a valiant knight, nothing mistrustyng the kings former promise, brought forth his prisoner prince Edward, beyng a goodly feminine, and a well featured yong Gentleman, whom when King Edward had well aduised, he demaunded of him, howe he durst so presumptuously enter into his realme with banner displayed. The prince beyng bold of stomack, and of a good courage, answered sayng, to recouer my fathers Kingdome and enheritage, from his father and grandfather to him, and from him, after him, to me lineally descended. At these wordes King Edward sayde nothing, but with his hand thrust him from him, (or as some say, stroke him with his gauntlet) whom incontinent, they y<sup>e</sup> stode about, which were George Duke of Clarence, Richard Duke of Gloucester, Thomas Marques Dorset, and William Lord Hastings, sodainly stroke & cruelly murdered him. The bitterness of which murder, some of the doers, after in their latter dayes tasted and assayed by the very rod of Justice and punishment of God. His bodye was homely entred with the other simple corfes, in the Church of the Monastery of blacke Monkes in Tewkesbury. This was the last ciuile battaile that was fought in King Edwardes dayes, which was foughten the thirde day of May, then beyng Saturday. And on the Monday next ensuyng was Edmond Duke of Sommerset, John Longstrother Prior of saint Johns, sir Garuays Clifton, sir Thomas Cressham, and xii. other knightes, and Gentlemen behedded in the Market place of Tewkesbury.

Quene Margaret lyke a prisoner was brought to London, where shee remayned till King Reynet her father ransomed her wyth money, which summe (as the French wyrters affirme) he borrowed of King Lewys the xi. and and because he was not of power nor abilitie to repay so great a duty, he solde to the French king and hys heyres the kingdomes of Naples, and both the Sicilies, with the Countie of Prouynce, which is the very tytle that king Charles the seauenth made, when he conquered the realme of Naples. After the ransome payde, she was conueyed into Fraunce with small honor, which with so great triumph & honorable enterteynment, was with pompe aboute all pride, receyued into thys Realme. xxiiij. yeres before. And where in the beginning of her tyme, she lyued lyke a Queene, in the middle she ruled lyke an Emperesse, toward the ende she was vexed with trouble, neuer quyet nor in peace, and in her very extreme age she passed her dayes in Fraunce, more lyke death then lyfe, languishing and mourning in continuall sorowe, not so much for her selfe and her husbnde, whose ages were almost consumed and wome, but for the losse of prince Edward her sonne (whome she and her husbnde thought to leaue, both ouerlyuer of their progeny, and also of their kingdome) to whome in thys lyfe nothing could be eyther more displeasunt or grieuous.

After thys battaile, King Edward rendred to God hys most humble thanks, and with good diligence returned toward London, for he was enformed how one Thomas Neucl, Bastard sonne to Thomas Lorde Fauconbridge the valyaunt Capitayne, a man of no lesse courage then audacitie (who for hys euill conditions was such an apt person, that a more meeter could not be chosen to set all the world in a broyle, and to put the estate of the realme in an yll hazarde) had of newe begon a great commocion. Thys Bastarde was before thys tyme appoynted by the Erle of Warwike to be Viceadmirall of the sea, and had in charge so to keepe the passage betwene Dover and Calice, that none which either fauored King Edward or his friends should escape vntaken or vnderwound. And when by the death of the Erle of Warwike, he was brought into pouertie, he robbed both on the Sea and the lande, as well hys enemies as also his friendes: By reason whereof he gat together a great flauie of shippes, and spoiled on euery side, and at the laste tooke lande in Kent, and gathered together a great company of Kentish men, suche as were most meete for hys purpose, and so marched toward London, where the Essex men hauyng wyldc whay woymes in their heades, ioyned them wyth him, sayng that their comming and quarell was to deliuer out of captiuitie King Henry the sixt and to bring him to his wife, but whatsoeuer their outward wordes were, their inward cogitations were onely hope of spoyle, & desyre to rob and pill. For the Bastard himselfe assaulted the Drawbridge of London, and a Capitayne of his called Spisyng scaled Algate with the Essex men, harnessed in their wyfes Cheesecloutes, which assaults were deadly geuen, and manfully resisted, in so much that on both partes manye were slayne and hurt, but at the last the Citizens put back the rebelles, and slue and wounded a great number of them, and draue the Bastard from all hys pray to hys shippes, lying at Radclyffe, which hauing a good and prosperous winde, made sayle with all haste, and roued on the Sea, as before he was accustomed.

Thys stirring, although it were but little to thinke on at the first, yet if it had begon not long afoze, it had brought all King Edwards businesse into a doubtfull difference: for King Edward in these his last battayles was twice more then fortunate for that, that he at sundry and severall times (and not all at one time) was persecuted and invaded of hys enemies: for surely, at the time when the Erle of Warwike with hys pitched armie was comming towards London, if Quene Margaret with her company had taken lande (which enterprize she thys in great ieopardy coragiously attempted.) Then if she had set on behinde, whyle the Erle of Warwike gave the onset before both at one moment, or if Edmond Duke of Sommerfet had not geuen battayle at Tewkesburie, before Jasper Erle of Penbroke was come with hys trayne, or if Bastard Fauconbridge had bered the Londoners even at that time: One or the other of these two things should consequently have followed, that king Edward must of necessitie once againe flie out of the realme, or else with shame and rebuke yeelde hymselfe, eyther to slaughter or captiuitie: But as in all meane chaunces and small gaynes, good luck is desired and prayed, so much more in battayle, is good fortune to be most made off, and chiefly to be aduanced.

Now to retorne to Bastard Fauconbridge, wauering hether & thether in the doubtfull surges of the Sea, as sure of hys lyfe on the water as on the lande, which eyther thinking that no man would see him, or that all men were blinde, and could not espie him (and especially in so secret a place) came into the open hauen of Southampton, and there tooke lande, where he was not long butaken, but shortly beheaded.

When Jasper Erle of Penbroke was credibly assertheyned that Quene Margaret had lost the battayle at Tewkesburie, and that there was no more trust of any comfort or reliefe to be had for the part of pooze king Henry, he with such men of warre as he was bringing to his confederates, returned back out of the way to the towne of Chepstow, where he tariyng, bewayling and lamenting, that haste to much hasted, and that vnperceyued and blinde wyll had at the small conclusion, not onely destroyed and brought to naught all king Henries estate, ryches and preheminance, but farther had left all his friendes readie to tolle the waues of fortune, and to seeke their lyuing where they might safely get them, beganne to thinke and prouide what waye was best to take.

Vaughan sodainely taken
and beheaded

King Edward at thys season, not beyng out of feare of the Erle of Penbroke, sent priuily into Wales, Roger Vaughan, a man there both strong of people and of friendes, to the intent by some guyle or engyne sodainely to trap and surprize the Erle: but he hauing intelligence of certaine friendes, how that the watch was priuily layde for him, sodainely in the same towne, tooke Roger Vaughan, and without delay stroke of his head, so Roger Vaughan, by Gods prouidence, receyued the death hymselfe, which he by decept prepared for the other.

The Erle in good haste departed thence to Penbroke, whome incontinent Morgan Thomas, by king Edwards commaundement so strongly besieged, and so enuironed his Castell with a ditche and a trench, that he could not lightly flie or escape thence: but he was after eyght dayes deliuered, and the siege rayled by his faythfull and trusty friends David Thomas, brother to the foresayde Morgan, and from thence conueyed to Tynbye, a Hauen towne in Wales, where he getting conuenient shippes for to transport him and his ouer the Sea into Fraunce, with his Nephew Lozde Henry Erle of of Richemond, and a few of his familiers toke ship, and by fortunes landing landed in Britaine.

After his arriual, he first went to Duke Fraunces of Britayne, and him reuerently saluted, expounding to him the cause, the case, and the necessitie of their thether comming, committing the lynes, the goods, and al the chaunces both of him and his Nephew, wholly to the Dukes discretion and ordynance. The Duke receyued both the Erles with all benignitie, and shewed to them no lesse honoz, fauoz, and humanitie, with suche entertainment as if they had bene his naturall brethren, and geuing to them his fayth, that being with him, they should sustayne no maner of wrong, nor no iniurie should be to them by any creature offered: assuryng them, that they might within hys dominions, at all times, and in all places, go in safe and good suretie.

When King Edward had appealed, by the meanes afoze reherfed, his kingdome and people, to the intent that there shoulde insurge hereafter, no newe commocion within the realme againe: he made a iorney into Kent, and there sat in iudgement on such, as in the last tumultuous businesse, tooke part with bastard Fauconbridge, where many were, (not vnworthy) straightly punished and ransomed, which businesse once perourmed, to the entent that all men might see apparantlye, that vndoubted peace was come into the realme, and that all feare of exterior hostilitie, was banished, and exiled for euer: Dooze King Henry the sixt, a litle before deperied of his Realine, and Imperiall Crowne, was nowe in the Tower of London, spoyled of his life, and al worldly felicity, by Richard Duke of Gloucester (as the constant fame ranne) which, to the entent that king Edward his brother should be cleere out of all secret suspicion, of sodayne inuasion, murdered the sayde king with a Dagger. But whosoever was the manqueller of this good man, it shal appeere, that both the murtherer, and the consentor, had condigne and not vnderferued punishment, for their bloodye stroke, and butcherly act: and because they had nowe no enemies risen, on whome they might reuenge themselves, as you shall hereafter perceiue, they exercised their crueltie, against their owne selues, and with their proper blood, imbrued and polluted their owne handes, and members.

The dead corps of king Henry, with billes and gleues pompeously (if you call that a funerall pompe) was conueyed from the Tower, to the church of Saint Pauls, and there layed on the Beere, where it laye the space of one whole daye, and the next daye, without Priest or Clarke, Torch or Taper, singyng or sayyng, it was conueyed to the Monastery of Chertsey, beyng distant from London. xv. mile, and there was buried, but after he was removed to Windsor, and there in a newe babote, newlye buried. This King Henry reigned full. xxxiiij. yeres, and xvij. dayes, and after that he repossessed his kingdome sixe monethes, and so he lyued in all. xlix. yeres and three monethes, hauyng by his wyfe one onelye sonne, called Edward Prince of Wales.

King Henry was of stature goodlye, of body slender, to which proporti- on, all other members were correspondent: his face beautifull, in the which continually was resident, the bountie of minde, with which he was inwardly endued. He did abhorre of his owne nature, all the vices, as well of the body, as of the soule, and from his very infancie, he was of honest conuersation and pure integritie, no knower of euill, and a keeper of all goodnesse: a despiser of all things, which be wont to cause, the myndes of mortal men to slide, fall, or appaie. Beside this, pacience was so rooted in his hart, that of all the iniuries to him committed, (which were no small number) hee neuer asked vengeance nor punishment, but for that rendered to almighty God, his hartie thanks, thinking that by his trouble, and aduersitie, his sinnes were to him forgotten, and forgiven. What shall I saie, that this good, this gentle, this meeke, this sober, and wiseman, did declare and affirme, that these mischiefes, and miseries, partly came to him for his owne offence, and partly for the heping of sinne vpon sinne, wretchedly by his aunceters and forefathers: wherfore, he little or nothing esteemed, or in any wise did torment or bere himselfe, what so euer dignitie, what honoz, what state of lyfe, what childe, what friende he had lost, or missed, but if it did but sounde an offence toward God, he looked on that, and not without repentaunce, and both mourned and sorrowed for it: This king Henry was of a liberall mind, & especially, to such as loued good learning, and them whom he saw profite in any vertuous science, he hartlye fauored and imbrazed: wherfore he first holpe his owne yong scholars, to attaine to discipline, and for them he founded a solempne schoole at Eton, a towne next vnto Wyndsoze, in the which he hath stablished, an honest Colege of sad Priestes, with a great numbze of Children which be there, of his cost frankly, and freely taught, the rudiments and rules of Grammer. Beside this, he edified a Princely Colege, in the Uniuersitye of Cambridge, called the Kings Colege, for the further erudicion, of such as were brought by in Eton, which at this day so flourisheth, in all kindes, as well of literature, as of tongues, that aboue all other, it is woorthye to bee called, the Prince of Colleges

But nowe to returne to king Edward, which was releued of the most part, of his pricking feare, and inwarde suspision, to the intent that no print, or shadowe, shoulde remayne of the aduerse faction, in his realme. He diligently inquired, and searched out, all the fragmentes and leauings, of his enemies part, intending to expresse, and vtterly to extinguishe them. And first to begyn with all, he sent George Deuell, brother to the Erle of Warwicke, and Archbyschop of Yorke, vnder a strong conduite, to the Castle of Guines there to be kept in extreme captiuitie, where he long continued, and at the last by friendship deliuered: which of very pensiuenesse and grudge of minde, shortly after deceaied, whom Laurence Bathe, and after him Thomas Rotheram, in the See of Yorke, did ordinarily succede. Besyde this, John Erle of Orenford, which after Barnet field, both manfully gat, & valiantly leut, Saint Michaels Mount in Cornewall: eyther for lacke of ayde, or persuaded by his friendes, gaue by the Mount, and yelded himselfe to King Edward (his life onely saued) which to him was graunted: but to be out of all doubtfull imaginacions, King Edward sent him ouer the sea, to the Castell of Hammes, where, by the space of .xij. yeres, he was in strong prison, miserably kept, and diligently looked to. Many other besyde these, in diuers partes of the realme, beyng very little or nothing suspected: were either committed to prison, or grieuouly fined and taxed. Besyde this, least his neighbors Countie, might be an harborough, or receptacle of his foes and aduersaries, he concluded a newe league, with James the thirde King of Scots, for the terme of .xx. yeres. And yet, whatsoeuer he thought, by his imagination, for all his buste deuises, and polletique forswarages: his minde and phantasie, was not clerely exhorozate and dispatched, of all feare and inwarde trouble: For tidynes were brought to him, that the Erles of Penbroke and Richemond, were arriued in Briteyn: and there of the Duke, highly cherished and entertayned.

This thing nipped King Edward hardly at the very stomach, as though his minde casting some euill to come after: did signifie befoze, that the Erle of Richemond, shoulde once attaine to the Crowne and diademe of the realme: which mischiefe, when he had well digested, he secretly sent wise and close Messengers to the Duke of Briteyn, the which shoulde not stricke, to promise the Duke great and sumptuous rewardes, (knowyng that meede manye thinges corrupteth) so that he would deliuer, both the Erles into their handes and possession. The Duke gladly heard them that were sent, but when he knewe the two Erles to be a pray, of such a great value, he determined not to deliuer them, but rather to entertaine them with him more diligently, then they were accustomed. The Duke answered the Ambassadors, that it stood not with his honoz, nor he would not deliuer the two Erles, to whom he was bound and obliged, by his sayth and promise: but this he promised to doe for the Kinges pleasure, that they shoulde be kept, and with such bigilant persons continually watched, that the King shoulde haue no maner of cause, once to thinke, that they could or shoulde attempt any thing, that might sounde, either to his displeasure or prejudice. When the Messengers sawe, that they could not obteyne that which they desired, like wise men held themselves contented with that, which by the Duke was offered, and so returned into Englande. The King wrote to the Duke of Briteyn, louyngly requiryng him, to accomplithe with all speede, that which he of his awne motion offered, promisyng him not onely, men and great rewardes, but yerely to rewarde him wyth a full hande, and a well stuffed purse. The Duke perceiuyng the swete gaine, which rose to him, by the abode of the two Englishe Erles, in his Countie: least they for any cause, shoulde abandon his Dominions, and seeke succors in some other foreyn Region, caused the one to be seperated from the other: and remoued from them such Englishe men, as were dayly on them attendant, and came with them into Briteyn, and in their places appoynted Britons, to be theyr seruitors, to minister, and continually to attende and waite on them.

When King Edward had thus pollitiquely (as he thought) compassed the Duke of Briteyn: he thinkyng nothing lesse, then to take a damage at the Duke of Burgoynes hande, yea, and such a damage, as by all similitude, was both like, continually to grieue the realme of England: and further to be an occasion, of a common stoppe, and puttyng backe of the commodities, growen within this realme, to be transported into outward partes, North, Eastwarde, was yet eftsones brought into a newe doubt and perplexitie. For the declaration wherof, you must vnderstand, that Lewis the Frenche king, had a brother called Charles, which was not the wisest, nor yet a man of the greatest experience: and of a certaine curtisie, loued better to haue other men to rule him, then he to take vpon him to rule other. And although that the king at this tyme had no soune, nor other brother, but him, his open

heyrre apparant: he little fauored, and lesse loued him, nothing geuyng him of his good will, for his part and portion, of his fathers landes, but that to the which he was compelled by his counsaile, and that he gaue him this Honeth, in the next Honeth, he would by flattery, or by threathynge, by warre or corruption of his brothers seruautes, obteyne and bring to his handes, and possession againe. For first he gaue him the Duchie of Berry, and after that whole Normandie, whereof in no long time, he bereft him the possession, regiment, and title, without any cause geuen, on the partie of yong Charles. And when the sayde Charles, had after ward departed with the Countreies of Bze, and Champaigne, by a fraudulent feate: King Lewys caused him to relinquish the same, and to take for his parentage, the Duchie of Guien, and so was called and named the Duke of Guyen. This euill entreating of the Duke of Guyen, by the frenche King his brother, caused diuers other princes, of no small puyssaunce, to fauor, ayde, and succor the sayde Duke, of the which the chiefe were, Charles Duke of Burgoyne, Fraunces Duke of Briteyn, and Lewys Erle of Saint Poll, Constable of Fraunce. This Duke of Guyen, by the sollicitynge of his adherentes, soze labored to haue in maryage, the sole daughter and onely heyrre, of Charles Duke of Burgoyne, by whom he hoped to be Lord and souereigne, of all Duke Charles inheritaunce. To the furtheraunce of this maryage, holpe with all his powere, the Duke of Briteyn, as who sayd, that it should be onely his acte. The Constable of Fraunce on the other part, thought that he alone, was able to compasse this maryage, and to haue onely the thankes of the Duke of Guyen. The French King did all that he coude, to let and stop this maryage: for if his brother had obtained the yong Lady with all her possessions, then he saw wel enough, that y Duke of Guien, beyng ioynd with the Duke of Briteyn, should be strong enough, or at the least of puyssaunce to encomber the French king and his children. But King Edward of England, soze smoked, when he heard first tell of this maryage, & not without a cause: for he considered, that the frenche King had no heyrre male, but one weake boy, and that the Duke of Guyen, was likely to weare the crowne of Fraunce, after his brother or nephewe. And if this maryage should proceede, all Burgoyne, Brabant, Holland, Feland, Flaunders, and all the lowe Countreies, where the Englyshe men for the most part, made their martes, and vttered there their marchandice, should be vnited and annexed to the Crowne of Fraunce, and in the handes of the olde and auncient enemies of the realme: for so had pooze England, and little Calice, beene continually in the daunger of their enemies, almost with them enuironed round about. These thinges considered, king Edward and his Counsaile, tooke the matter in great earnest, and seriously wrote to Duke Charles, that if he would conclude any maryage in Fraunce, to the hurt and prejudice of the realme of Englande: that he should knowe that he had, not onely broken his league and amitie, but also finde, that he had beene better to haue dissimuled, with the best friend that he had, then priuily without reason, to haue inggelled with the realme of England. The Duke of Burgoyne made reasonable answers, and honest excuses, but the Counsaile of England, in no wise would geue credite thereto: ever surmisyng that the maryage should take effect. And certainly at this season, the Englysh men had rather haue taken part, with the French King then with the Duke of Burgoyne: if it had not bene onely, to empeche and stop this maryage, so much the Englyshmen disdayned, to haue the house of Burgoyne, conioyned and vnited to the crowne of Fraunce. But the Duke of Burgoyne dailed, and dissimuled with all parties, in this matter, geuyng them sayze wordes, and makynge large promises, by the which he first deceyued other, and in conclusion himselfe. He promised his daughter, to Nicholas Duke of Calaber, with whom, he had rather haue had her buried, then bedded. Duke Philbert of Sauoy, had an outward answer assuredly, when nothing was so minded inwardly. Maximilian Duke of Austriche, and after king of Romaynes, some to the Emperour Frederick, could neuer obteyne during the lyfe of Duke Charles, but onely glosyng and paynted promises; but all wordes, writings and promises, what soeuer they were, clerely set asyde, he was surely fixed and determined (as Comines his Counsaillor doth write) that no maryage as long as he liued, should soze to any effect, at the least by his consent.

Nowe let vs leaue the Duke of Burgoyne about hys affayres for a while, and returne to king Edward: which in the. xiiij. yere of hys reigne called hys high Court of parliament, at his Palace of Westminster, in the which, all lawes and ordinaunces, made by hym before that day were corroborated and confirmed: and suche Lawes made by him, as King Henry the sixt, had caused to be abrogated and adnichilated, he agayne reuued and reuued. He made farther lawes as well for the confiscation of the goodes of the rebelles to his person, as also for the restoring of suche as fled out of the realme, for the quarell and occasion: which by his aduersaries, as traytors to their king and Country, a little before were of high treason attaynted, and to death condemned. Toward hys charges of late susteyned, a competent somme of money was demaunded, and frankly graunted: and in conclusion, all inward grudges and open discordes, the which had of long continued, in the hartes of the Nobilitie, which now were very fewe (the more part being consumed in the warres) he cleerely extirped, and brought to vnitie and concord. King Edward holpe to this agreement, as much as in him lay: And to the intent that other men should forget iniuries to them done, and put away all rancor and malice: followyng hys good and godly example, he clerely pardoned almost all offences, and all men then being within the realme, he frankly discharged, although they had taken part with his aduersaries agaynst hym, of all high treasons and crimes.

Whyle King Edward was thus setting an order, and pacifyng of all things, which were out of square: Charles Duke of Burgoyne, whose spiritie was neuer in quiet, desyryng as well to amplifie, and enlarge his territories and dominions, lying on the syde of the ryuer of Ryne, toward high Burgoyne, as also to recouer agayne Amias and other towne, which the French king more by fraude, than by feates of warre, had from him wrongfully vsurped: and further about all things, couetyng to haue the French king to haue some great shame, losse, or hinderaunce, could not inuent no one waye so apt and meete for his imagined purpose, as to entise and persuade the king of Englande by his Ambassadors, to make warre vpon the sayde king and hys Countreie: for the recouering of his olde right and auncient tytle in the same, by the French king and his father, agaynst all right and equitie, withholden and deteyned. King Edward began a litle to harken on that side, not so much for to helpe the Duke of Burgoyne (to whome he was much bounde, for his ayde in the time of hys exile, as you before haue heard) as for to be reuenged of king Lewys, whom he reputed for his mortall enemy. First for ayding the Erle of Warwike and hys complices agaynst him: secondarily, for the long maintayning and fostering of Queene Margaret, and her sonne Prince Edward (whome for a farther affinitie, he made Godfather to hys sonne Charles the Dolphyn) within hys Countreyes and dominions. Wherupon, when he had consulted with the Nobilitie & the chiefe and sage persons of þe realme (which in maner haue a certain naturall inclination to make warre in Fraunce, eyther for hope of great spoyle and gaine, or of a certayne priuie canker engendred in the hartes of their forefathers, in time long past, and after by lyneall succession descended into the stomacks of their Nephewes) he answered the Dukes messenger, that in the beginning of the yere, he would land at Calice with such a puylsaunt army, that the french king should well perceyue that he lacked neyther men, nor þe hys men lacked stomacks, both for to reuenge their souereignes quarel, & also to recouer his right. And for a truth, at thys season there was mortall warre betwene king Lewys and the Duke of Burgoyne: And moze lykely to fall betterene hym and other, for king Lewys of nature was hard of spech, and churlishe in answer, froward and bngentle as wel to his friends as to his foes. By reason wherof many great men within the realme of Fraunce, not content with hys grosse rudenesse, and rude dissimulation began to haue intelligence, and to cleue to the Duke of Burgoyne, amongst whome was Lewys of Luxemborough, Erle of Saint Paule, and Constable of Fraunce, which being confedered wyth the Duke and other noble men, determined so to bere & scourge king Lewys with some plague, by the which eyther he should be transformed into a man, clere altered from hys olde qualities, or else should be in jeopardy both of losse of life and realme, for it was determined that Fraunce should be set on and assaulted both with outward enemies, and inward dissimulers. All these things the Duke of Burgoyne with king Edward, did communicate, to the intent the sooner to allure and prouoke him, to enterprise the warre, according to hys desire. These things as tokens of victorie before, encouraged king Edward, and enforced him in maner to make warre on Fraunce, and so with all expedition prepared all things necessarie, both for water and lande. And because no small summe of money was sufficient for so great a charge, and that the money the yere before to him auanced by the realme, was consumed in his household, and other necessarie affayres, he conceived a newe deuise in hys imagination, by the which engine he might couertly perswade and entise hys riche friends to geue and graunt him some conuenient summe of money toward his great charges, and incredible costs, which thing if they did not wyllingly assent to, he then would impute to them much unkindnesse, wherupon he caused hys officers to bring to him the most riche persons, one after another, and to them he explained the cause, and the purpose, and the necessitie of the warre begon, and the faintnesse and weakenesse of hys treasure, and the great importunate lack of money, hartly requiring them for the loue and affection that alwaies they had borne to him, being their naturall Prince, of their aboue gratuitie and free wyll to geue to him some aide of money, for maintenaunce of hys warre and armie: what should should I saye moze? Thys inuention came to thys effect, that some calling to their remembraunce, the benefites of hym receyued, some wyth shame, some wyth feare moued and encouraged, gaue to hym liberally both of their substance and treasure, which wythout grudge he could not haue otherwise obteyned. But here I will not let passe a pretie conceyt that happened in thys gathering, in the which you shall not onely note the humilitie of a king, but moze the phantasie of a woman. King Edward had called before him a Widow, much abounding in substance, and no lesse growen in yeres, of whom he merily demaunded what shee gladly would geue him towarde hys great charges? By my truth quoth she, for thy louely countenance thou shalt haue euen. xx. pound, the king looking scarce for the halfe of that summe, thanked her and louingly kyst her, whether the flauoz of his breath did so comfort her stomack, or she esteemed the kisse of a king, so precious a iewel, shee swore incontynently that he should haue. xx. pounde moze, which she with the same will payde that she offered it. The king wylling to shewe that thys benefite was to him much acceptable, and not woorthy to be put in obliuion, called this graunt of money a beneuolence, notwithstanding that many with grudge and maleuolence gaue great summes toward that new found beneuolence. But the blessing of suche gentle fashions toward them, with friendly prayer of their assistance in his necessitie, so tempted them that they could no other wise doe, but frankly and freely yeelde and geue hym a reasonable ayde.

And here I finde noted that Doctor Woodlarke, Prouost of the kings College in Cambridge, did at this time builde Katheryn Hall in Cambridge.

When all things conuenient for such an enterprise were in a readinesse. King Edward with his armye went to Douer, where he founde fine hundred shippes and Hoyes, readie to transport him and his armie ouer the sea. And so he himselfe with his nobilitie warlikely accompanied, passed ouer betwene Douer and Calice, the fourth day of July, and landed at Calice wyth great triumph, his armie, horses, and munitions of warre scarce passed ouer in. xx. dayes (whome the French men bragged shoulde haue bene taken if they had well considered the chaunce before, as they knew it after.) When king Edward with all his armye royall, was without any trouble landed, and in suertie, he caused euery man according to his degree, to be ordered and lodged. This armie by the wyting of Comines, was the fayrest and the strongest armie that passed out of Englande into Fraunce manye yeres before, for the men were so well armed, and so surely in all things appointed, and prouided, that the French nacion were not onely amased to behold them, but much moze praysed them, and there order. In this armye, were. xx. C. men of armes, well horsed, of the which the most part were barbed and richlye trapped, after the most Galiarde fashion, hauing manye horses decked in one luyte. There were farther. xx. M. Archers, bearyng bowes & arrowes, of the which a great part were on horseback. There were also, a great number of fightyng men, and other, as well to set by tents & Pavillions (where of the Englishmen had great plenty) as to serue their artillery & to enclose their campe, or other wise to labor. And in all this army there was not one page.

The King of Englande was at his arriual highlye displeased with the Duke of Burgoyne, which in the worde of a Prince, promised him to meete him at his landyng with two. M. men of armes, and light horsemen, besyde

a great number of Launcelknightes, and Halberders, and that he would haue begonne the warre thre moneths befoze the kings transporting, the more to bere and greue the French king, and to cause him to seeke his wittes. The Duke of Burgoyne at this season, laye at seerge befoze the strong towne of Auyce, with a puissant army, against whome were of Auyce assembled the Emperoz Frederike, and almost the whole Empire, for the rescue of the towne, to whome the king of Englande sent the Lorde Scales in post, requirynge him to leaue his boyde seerge befoze the strong towne of Auyce, and to returne in all haste with his people and armie to make warre in Fraunce, according to his promise, and othe, declaryng farther that the time passed and the Sommer would be lost, with this charge the Lord Scales departed in all haste toward the Duke, whom we will leaue, ridyng towarde Auyce for a while.

O Fraunce, Fraunce, how much art thou bound to laude and prayse thy Sauour, for thy deliuerance, in the time of thy affliction. For if God had not permitted the cankered hart of the Duke, to be indurate, nor his weake brain to be bered, nor yet his ambitious affection to be enflamed, so that he with all his power had ioyned with the army of Englande on the one side, hauing on the other side, the Duke of Britaine with his power: These thre princes had bene like to haue made Fraunce, either to bow, or to breake.

a letter of defiance vnto

Before king Edward departed from Douer, he sent to the French king an officer of armes (whome Comines vntrelye calleth Garter bozne in Normandy, for the roome of Garter was neuer geuen to no straunger) which herault deliuered to the French king with all due reuerence, a letter of defiance, both for the stile and the penning excellently endited, which the Frenchmen would scant beleue to be framed by an Englishman. The letter required the French king, to render to the king of Englande, the realme of Fraunce to him of right, and by lineall enheritance, appertaining, and belonging, to the intent that he might put agayne the church, the Nobilitie, and the commons, into their auncient estates, and liberties, and to disburden, and exonerate them of the great charges, trauailes, & labors, that they nowe were in. And in case that he did refuse so to doe, then he dyd protest the harme that should ensue, in the forme and maner, that in such a case is requisite, and accustomed to be done. King Lewys red the letter secretly to himselfe, and after all alone in a great study withdrew himselfe into his warderobe, and sending for the English Herault, sayde to him, sye, I knowe, and well wot, that the king of Englande your maister, is neither descended in these partes of his owne free mocion, nor yet of vs required, but onely entised and prouoked by the Duke of Burgoyne, & somewhat enforced by the commons of his realme. But nowe you may see that the season of the yere passeth, and the Duke of Burgoyne is in pooze estate, returning from Auyce all most discomforted. The Constable also, with whome the king your soueraigne Lorde, I am sure hath some intelligence, for fauour that your mayster hath married hys Dece, is not so sure a friend as he is taken for, and if all the worlde knewe how I haue promoted him, and what I haue done for him, they would little thinke, that he would so vntrely handle me as he doth, for I assure you, he is a deepe dissimuler, and in continuall dissimulation entendeth to lead his lyfe, enter tayning all men for his awne profite. And although the king your
maister

maister be vnshure of all his other promises, yet of one thing he shall be sure, that is, he shall be euer dissimuled withall, & therefore I saye to you, and not to your maister, that he were better haue a peace with an olde enemye, then the promises and familiaritie of a newe dissimuling friend, which peace most pleaseth God, and is the thing that I most doe desyre. When he had sayde, he gaue to the Herault thre hundred Crownes, promising him a thousande crownes, if any good appointment came to passe. The Herault being more couetous of the crownes, then secret, according to the dutie of his office, promised to doe all things that in him laye, not doubting but that the king hys maister would be conformable to any reasonable offer, aduysing the French king (after king Edward were once landed) to send hym a Herault, to fetch a saueconduyt and pasport, for such as should labor and trauaile in that treatie. And that the sayde Herault should first resort to the Lord Standley, or to the Lorde Haward, for the conducting of him to the kings presence, when the Herault should departe, the king gaue him a peece of Crimosen velvet of .xxx. yardes long, commaunding and straightly charging, that no man should be so hardie once to commen with hym, but to let him passe in all gentle fashion. When the Herault was gone, king Lewys calling to hym, vij. or. viij. of his familiers, caused the letter to be red, of the which he was but a little afrayd and lesse abashed, considering the English Herault had shewed hym playnely how to enter into the port of the treatie, and in maner howe to gayne and conquer the fortreffe, of which information he was not a little ioyous, and wisely and secretly according to the same, when he saw his time, he prosecuted his purpose. In this very season, the Lorde Scales came to the Duke of Burgoyne befoze Auyce, accompting to hym his message, as he was commaunded. The Duke of Burgoyne, being so sore set to conquer the towne of Auyce, answered the Lorde Scales, that his honor was lost, and shame should be spoken of him throught all christendome, if he should raise his fieelde and breake his siege, but he hoped shortly to gayne the towne, and then with triumphant victorie, to come to ayde king Edward with hys whole army: with this answer the Lorde Scales departed, which onely answer was commen without any other augmentation, to all such as king Edward sent, to haue the Duke to kepe hys promise. What a folly was thys in Duke Charles, to besiege a towne impregnable, even at the same time when the English men at his request had passed the sea, which thing all the time of his regiment, he had both trauailed in, and sore required, and neuer could compasse till thys season, and also all things being well disposed for his purpose, both in Britayne & in other places, except he more regarded to conquer a newe towne, then to defend all hys olde possessions and seigniories. But shortly after by the Byshop of Romes aucthoritie, he left Auyce vnto the French, but leeing a great number of hys people, and the remnaunt he sent into Lozayne and Barrois, there to lye and trouble Duke Keyner of Lozayne, which a little befoze had defied him, lying befoze Auyce. And he himselfe wyth a small company came to king Edward befoze Calice, wyth whome king Edward at the first comming began somewhat to be grieved, laying to hys charge that at hys mocion, request, and desyre, he with all hys armie had passed the Seas onely to the intent wyth mortall warre, to plague and scourge the proude realme of Fraunce. And that he leauing all things
Rrr. ij. (which)

(which should molest or trouble the French king) a part, applied himselfe to matters of Lozayne, and externe Nations, more then to reuenge the open iniuries to hym done by hys neighbour the French king. The Duke excused himselfe wth ieoparding the losse of hys honoz, if he had returned from Auyce, and also that of necessitie, he was compelled to leaue his armie in Lozayne, to be reuenged ouer Duke Reyner, which had him before Auyce with spitefull wordes and rayling termes defied and detested: affirming farther, that nowe in the beginning with a small companie, a great enterpryse might be gayned. In proufe whereof he deliuered to the king letters of credence, sent from the Constable of Fraunce, which wyllled the king to geue credite and perfite fayth to the Duke, in making relation of such secrets as were to him geuen in charge to declare to the kinges aboue person. First he shewed that although the Constable had promised to the king and the Duke, to render hp to them the towne of Saint Quintines, yet it had not come to so good effect, if it had bene yeilded, the Duke beyng in Germany, as it now shall, the King and the Duke being both personally present, at the deliuerance. Wherefore he exhorted the king to set forwarde, and to display hys Banner, and to set forth his standard. And so by hys moction, the king accompanied wth the Duke, hys armie departed out of Calice, and passed by Boleyne to Perone, where the Englishe men thought themselves of the Duke, more lyke enemies then friendes to be enterteyned, for at the gates entred but a fewe that were appointed, the remnant lodged in the fieldes, better purueyed of their aboue, then of the Dukes prouision.

The king of England thinking surely that the Constable ment all truth, and the sooner endured to that credence, because the Constable was great Uncle to the Quene hys wyfe, where in very deede, he nothing lesse minded then trouth, remoued hys Campe from Peron, the Duke of Burgoyne beyng in hys armie, and marched towarde Saint Quintines: certayne Englishe men ranne before the towne, against whose comming they thought that the belles should haue bene rong, and the gates set open. But when they approached the towne, the artillarie began to shote, and they of the towne came out both on foote and horseback, and skirmished with the Englishe men, of which two or thre were slayne. This welcome seemed very straunge to king Edward, pondering together yester dayes promise, and thys dayes doing. The Duke would not that the king should desist from his purpose, because the towne was not yeilded at the sight of a handfull of people, which thing he sayde, although the Constable would gladly haue done, at the first, yet he would haue a couler to doe it, as though it should appere that he did it by very compulsion and force: and therefore if the King would make but semblance to besiege the towne, he would warrant, that incontinent it should be rendred. The king of England perceyuing that he was deluded in his first enterpryse, thought it more surer to heare the sayre wordes of the Constable, and the Duke, then to geue credite to their vntrue and deceptfull doings. The Englishe men returned to their campe, verie yll content, murmuring against the Constable, calling him Traytor, periured and vntrue Gentleman. Beside thys anger, there came the next day another cossep, that smarted a little sozer, for Duke Charles of Burgoyne, by whose meanes king Edward had taken vpon him thys warre, either perceyued that all the Constables

Constables promises were but faire sunne shynng, sweetely spoken, and soverly performed, or else he sawe that he himselfe lacked men or money, to proceede farther with King Edward in his iorney: tooke his leaue sodainely of the king of Englande, sayng that he must needes visite, and see his armie in Bercoys, promising shortly with all puyssaunce to returne agayne to the great aduantage and commoditie of them both, and so in haste departed.

This departyng was both displeasent and straunge to the king of England, consideryng that in hope to haue the Duke his continuall fellow in armes, and to haue his counsaile in the order of his people (which of late had not frequented the warre of Fraunce, nor yet perfectly knewe the force, the agilitie and the maner of the French nation) had passed the Seas, rayfed hys Standard, and by the Dukes procurement entred into the lande of his enemies, and nowe to be left alone without guyde or leader, without ayde or succoz, in the middle of his foes, he could no lesse thinke, but that the Duke neuer bled him like a Prince, nor yet kept his promise like a true man, which vnstable & dissimuling working, caused, yea, & rather enforced king Edward both to thinke that he neuer thought, and to do that he neuer intended to doe. The Englishe men soze murmured agaynst the Constable, & no lesse against the Duke, sayng they determined neuer to geue confidence to y<sup>e</sup> Constables wordes, and greatly doubted, whether they might geue any credite to the Dukes promise. Thus lay the Englishe men in the fieldes, when the colde nightes began to wax long, without any gaine of conquest, which caused the common people, which be not alwayes content with hardnesse, rather to desire to turne homewarde, then to proceede any dayes iourney forwarde. The French king which was both willie and wittie (and especially for his awne purpose) knewe by his espials, the vntrue refusall made by the Constable, the vnfriendly departyng of the Duke of Burgoyne, and the dayly murmuring of the Englishe men, agaynst them both: wherefore he thought now, that it was very expedient, to folow the counsaile of the Englishe Herault, in sendyng for a safeconduite, for metyng of Ambassadors, to comon of a treatie, if it might be well compassed. But yet to auoyde all doubttes, he rayfed an armie, and the more he perceyued the power of his enemies to encrease, the more he studied how by powet to resist them, and ouer that armie he made Capitaine, Monsire Robert de Estoteuile, a valiant man, whome, he sent into Arthoys, to defende the frontiers there, agaynst the king of Englandes entrie and inuasions: and he himselfe tarped still at Senlis. The French king beyng thus priuily desirous of peace, although he outwardly shewed the countenance of Mars: meanyng quietnesse, and settyng foorth warre, caused a barlet to be suborned, in a cote armure of Fraunce (which for haste, was made of a Trompet banner) because king Lewys was not much desirous, nor greatly passed on honour, and seldome had in his Court, eyther officer of Armes or Trompet: which barlet was wel encouraged, and no lesse instructed, howe to do his message (which was deliuered to him in wytyng) both with a bolde countenance, and a sober demeanure. This counterfette Herault, although he was but a barlet in dede, was both wittie and well spoken, and so rode in sad maner, nere to the Englishe armie, and there put on his cote of Armes. The Englishe outscourers perceyuing by his cote, that he was an officer of Armes, gently saluted him, and enquired of him, whether ther his iourney lay: he sadly answered, that his message was from the French king, to the King of Englande. Then was he conueyed to the tent, where the Lord Haward, and the Lord Stanley, with other were at dinner, where he was highly enterteyned, and no lesse welcomed. And after dinner, he was brought before the King, in whose presence, with a bolde audacitie, and no fearefull speche, he declared first his credence, because he was an officer of Armes, (to whome, credite by the law of all nacions ought to be geuen) and secondarily, he published the thinges, to him geuen in charge and commaundement, sayng.

Right high and mightie Prince, if your excellent wisedome did perfectly knowe: what inward affection, and feruent desyre, the King my Master hath alwayes had, to haue a perfect peace, a sure bunitie, betweene your noble person, and your Realme, and his honourable personage, and his Dominions, you would (and for truthes sake) should confesse & say, that neuer Christian Prince, more thirsted for an amitie, to the entent that the subiects of both the Realmes, quietly liuyng vnder two Princes, confederate and combined together, in an indissoluble confederacie and league, may mutually embrace eche other in their heartes, and frequent eche others Princes, territories, and Dominions, with their Marchandises and wares: And finally, the one to liue with the other, as friend with friend, and brother with brother, in continuall lone, rest, and tranquillitie. And for his part he doth affirme and saye, that sith he receyued first the Crowne of his Kingdome, he neuer attempted nor yet once imagined, any warre, or thing preiudiciall towarde your royall person, your realme, or your people. If you peradventure will say, that he supported, and mainteyned the Erie of Warwicke, agaynst your Maestie, he surely that doth and will denie: For he ayded him agaynst the Duke of Burgoyne, whom, he knewe not onely to be his extreme enemy, but also to lay in waite, both by sea and lande, eyther to take him, or bitterly to destroye him. Which Duke of Burgoyne, onely for his awne cause, hath excited and sollicited your highnesse, to come ouer the troublous Seas, to the entent to cause (yea, in maner to compell) the King my maister, to condescend to suche treatie and appoyntment, as should be to his onely profite, and neyther to your honour, nor yet to your gaine. For if he and such other, as daily flattered him for their peculiar profites, (as he had many in dede, that daily sucked at his elbow) had once obeyned the thing, that they breathed for, all your affaires were put in oblivion, and left at large for them, or their assistance, euen as they be at this day. Hath not the Duke of Burgoyne caused you, first to come into Fraunce: after to set forwarde your armie, and in conclusion, for lacke of his promise, to leese the fayre season of the yere, and to lye in the fieldes in Winter: which warre if it continue, shall neyther be profitable to you, nor yet to your nobilitie: And finally to both the Realmes, and especially to Marchant men, shall bring both miserie, pouertie, and calamitie. Came the Duke of Burgoyne from Ruce to Calice, onely to visite you: Rode he all that poste haste, onely to blinde you: Returned he backe into Lozeyn againe for any cause, but onely to leaue you desolate, and to abandon you: Did he or the Constable kepe any one promise with you: Why do you then beleue, and yet still trust them, in whom you neuer founde fayth nor fidelitie: But if God will it so ordaine, that you and my Master, may ioyne in a league and amitie, tie, I dare both say and swere, that the fine Steele neuer cleued faster to the Adamant Stone, than he will strike and claspe with you, both in welth and wo, in prosperitie and aduersitie: And if it shall please you, to harken to any reasonable treatie, I beyng a poore man, shall on teopardie of my lyfe (which is my chieftest treasure) vnder take, that this communication shall sozt, and come to such an effect, that both you and your Nobilitie, shall be glad and reioyce, and your Commons shall be contented and pleased, and they that haue deceyued you, shall be both abashed and ashamed: Most humbly beseechynge your highnesse, if your pleasure shall encline this waye, that I may haue a sure safeconduyte, for one hundred hozes, for such personages as the King my Master shall sende to you, with farther intimation of his minde & purpose. And if your pleasure shall be, to haue the communication in any place, indifferent betwene both armies, then I shall warrant you, a like safeconduit for your men, as you do send for ours.

When he had accomplished his message and instructions, the King of England and his counsaill, highly commended his audacitie, his tongue, and his sobernesse, geuyng to him in rewarde, a faire gylt cuppe, with a hundred aungelles: Deliuering him a safeconduit, according to his request, and demaunde, with the which, he with speede departed, hauyng with him an English Herault, to bryng a like safeconduite, from the French king. After both the Princes had diligently consulted on this matter, and that the safeconduites, were deliuered on both partes. The Ambassadors mette at a vilage beside Amias, where were sent by the king of Englande, the Lorde Hawarde, sir Thomas Sentliger, Doctor Horton, after Chaunceler of Englande, and Cardinall. For the French king were sent, the Bastard of Burbon Admirall of Fraunce, the Lorde of saint Pierre, the Bpshop of Eureux called Heberge.

It may of some be not a litle maruailed at, why the French king thus labored, and sought for peace, and did make so humble, and large offers as he did: But if they consider in what case, the realme of Fraunce stode in at that tyme, hauyng the king of England, the Duke of Burgoyne, the Duke of Britaine, their enemies, and all furnished to set vpon them at one instaunt: They may say, that the French king was both wise and circumspect, to humble himselfe for auantage, or else if God had not holpen: the realme of Fraunce had bene troubled, and tossed in great teoperdie, and dangerous extremitye. The Ambassadors met at the place appoynted, the English men demaunded, the whole realme of Fraunce, or at the least Normandie, and whole Aquitaine, the allegations were well proued by the Englishmen, and pollytically defended by the French men, so that with argumentes, without conclusion the day passed, and the Commissioners departed, and made relation to their Masters. The French king and his counsaill, woulde in no wyse consent, that the king of Englande, should haue anye part, or parcell of lande, within the realme of Fraunce: but rather fully determined, to put himselfe, & his whole realme in hazarde, and aduenture: so loth, yea moze aferde, then loth, he was to haue the Englishmen, to be his next neighbors. The Commissioners at the next meting, concluded & agreed vpon certayne articles, which were by both the Princes, accepted and allowed. It was couenanted and agreed, that the French king should pay to the king of Englande without delaye

laye. lxxv. M. Crownes of the sunne, & yerely fiftie M. Crownes to be payd at London, during king Edwardes life. And farther it was agreed, that Charles the Dolphin, shoulde marry the Lady Elizabeth, eldest daughter to king Edwarde, and they two to haue for the maintenaunce of their estates, the whole Duchy of Guyen, or else fiftie Thousande Crownes, yerely to be paid within the towre of London, by the space of .ix. yeres: and at the ende of the sayde terme, the Dolphin and his Dolphines, peaceably to enioye the whole Duchie of Guyen, and of that charge the French king against the king of Englande, then to be cleerely exonerate. And further, it was agreed and appointed, that the two Princes, both for the increase of loue, and for the continuance of amitye shoulde enteruew eche other, in some place most expedient, and mete, for so great a purpose: and after their metyng eche of them to take a corporall othe, in presence of the other. This peace to endure .ix. yeres betwene both the realmes, and inuolably to obserue and kepe all thinges, concluded, agreed, and appoynted. And on the king of Englandes part, were comprised as alyes in the league, the Dukes of Burgoyne, and Briteyne, if they woulde assent. And that after the whole summe aforesayde, was to king Edwarde payed: he shoulde leaue in hostage the Lorde Haward, and sir John Chepney maister of his hores, till he with all his armie, was passed ouer the sea. This peace much reioyced the French king, to whome, nothing could be either more pleasaunt, or more acceptable, then to haue the Englishmen in short space (how shortly he cared not) cleerly auoyded, and transported out of his Realme: imaginynge euer that by their tariyng, they would so like the wholesome and sweete ayre of his fruitfull Countrie, that a great number would be continually sicke and bered till they returned: wherefore, to rid them with all hastie speede, he borrowed the saide summe of. lxxv. M. Crownes, of euery man that might lend a porcion.

King Edward likewise, although he was of puyssaunce strong enough, to atchieue a great enterprize on his enemies, and farther encouraged, because he was renoumed for the famous actes, by him befoze time brought to passe, in so many battayles: Desiring also, rather to haue warre, with the frenche nacion beyng the olde and auncient enemye, to the English name and blood: yet when he called to his remembrance, that the ciuil warre had so consumed and wasted his substaunce and treasure, that if bzgent necessitie should requyre, he were of scant abilitie to furnishe and set forth a new army: knowyng his treasure at home, to be so boyde and faynt, that it was not able long to wage his Souldiours, thought it both reasonable and profitable, to obey to necessitie, and to abstaine from battaile, seyng both honourable offers was to him offered, and agreementes of auantage to him morioned: Considering chiefly beside all this, that neyther the Duke of Burgoyne, nor the Constable of Fraunce, did, nor would obserue or perforce the promises by them made and swozne. Whereupon he and the most of his counsaile agreed to this conclusion and concord. But the Duke of Gloucester and other, to whome the frenche nacion, was more odious then a tode, whose swordes thyrted for frenche blood, detested, abhorred, and cryed out on this peace, sayng: that all their trauaile, paine, and expences, were to their shame losse and employed, and nothing gayned, but a continuall mocke, and dayly derision of the French king, and all his Minions. This imagination toke effect

without delay, for a Gentleman of the Frenche Kinges Chamber, after the peace was concluded, did demaund of an Englishman, how many battayles king Edward had banquished, and he answered nine: wherein he himselfe personally had bene. A great honoz sayd the Frenche man: But I pray you, quod he, similyng: how many hath he lost: the English man perceuyng what he ment, sayd: one which you by pollicie and by no strength haue caused him to leese. Well sayd the French man, you may ponder in a payze of Ballance, the gaine of the nine gotten battayles, and the rebuke of this one in this manner lost: for I tell you, that we haue this sayng, the force of England hath, and doth surmount the force of Fraunce: but the engenious wit of the French men, excell the dull bzaynes of Englishmen. For in all battayles you haue bene the gayners, but in leagues and treaties, our wittes haue made you losers: so that you maye content your selues, with the losse in treaties, for the spoyle that you gat in warres and battayles. This communication was reported to the French king, which priuily sent for the English man (as saith Hall) to supper, and not onely made him good cheere, but also gaue him a thousand Crownes, to prayse the peace, and to helpe to maintaine the same: yet neuerthelesse, he beyng not a little moued with these bragges, declared all the communication to the Duke of Gloucester, which swore, that he would neuer haue set foote out of England, if he had not thought to haue made the frenchemen, once to haue assayed the strength and puissaunce of the English men: But whatsoeuer he thought, all thinges were transformed into another kinde, then he could imagine.

The Duke of Burgoyne beyng enformed, that there was a peace entreating betwene the two kings: came in no small hast from Luxenborough onely accompanied wyth sixtene hores, into the king of Englandes lodgyng, whereof the king being not a litle abashed, seyng both his sodaine coming, and his fierce countenance, like one that woulde rather bite than whyne, demaunded of him the cause, of his so sodaine coming. The Duke sharply answered, to knowe whether he had, eyther entred into any communication, or onely had absolutely concluded a peace, betwene the French king and him. King Edward declared, how that for sondry, and diuerse great and bzgent causes, touching aswell the vniuersall publique wealth, of the whole Christianitie as their owne priuate commoditie, and the quietnesse of their realmes, he and the French king had concluded a peace and amitie, for terme of. ix. yeres, in the which were comprised, as felowes and friendes, both he and the Duke of Britayne, requiring him to condescende, and agree to the same. Oh Lorde, quoth the Duke of Burgoyne, haue you thus done in dede: haue you passed the seas, entered into Fraunce, and without killing of a poore sie, or burnyng of a siely shepe cote, haue taken a shamefull truce: did your noble auncester, king Edwarde the thirde, euer make armie into Fraunce (as he made many) in the which he did none either gayne victory in battaile, or profite in conquering, Cities, Townes, Countreys. That victorious Prince, as dere kinne to mee, as to you king Henry the fift, I meane whose blood you haue, eyther rightfully or wrongfully, God knoweth, exsirate and destroyed, with a small puissaunce entred into Fraunce, conquered whole Normandy, and not alonly conquered it, but peaceably kept it, and neuer woulde either common, or agree to anye league, till he had the whole

realme of Fraunce offered him, and was thereof made Regent and heire apparant, & you without any thing doyng, or any honoz, or profit gainyng, haue condiscended to a peace, both as honozable, and as profitable to you, as a Pomegranat, and not so holesome as a Pomegranat: think you that I either moued you, or once entised you, to take this iorney for my peculiar aduantage, or commodity (which of my power am able, to reuenge mine owne causes, without helpe of other) but onely to haue you recouer, your olde rightes, and possessions, which were from you both vniustlye, and wzongfullye withholden. And to the entent that you shall know, that I haue no neede of your ayde, I will neyther enter into your league, nor take truce with the French King, till you be passed the sea, and haue bene there thzee monethes. When Duke Charles had sayde, he furiously thzew downe his Chayze, and would haue departed. But the king him stayed and sayde: Brother Charles, sith you haue spoken at leysure, what you would, you must and shall heere again what you would not: And first, as concernyng our entrie into Fraunce, no man liuyng knoweth that occasion, neither so well, nor hath cause halfe so wel to remember it as you: For if you be not to forgetfull, ye remember howe the Frenche king for all your power, tooke from you the faire towne of Amias, and the strong Pile of Saint Quintines, with diuers other townes, which you neither durst, nor yet were able, either to rescue or defende. Sith which time, how he hath plagued you, how he hath taken from you your friends, yea, of your priuie Chamber, and seeret counsaile (by whom all your secretes be to him reueled and made open) you knowe or haue better cause to remember, and not to forget them. And when you determined, to besiege the towne of Reuse, you thought your selfe, in a great doubt, whether you should leese more at home, by your absence (the Frenche King dreamyng, and waityng like a Fox for his pray) or else gaine more in Germanie, by your power and presence, and to kepe the Wolfe from the folde, that is the French King, from your Castels and Dominions, was the chiefe and principall cause, why you so faire prayed me, and so soze laboured and entised me to passe ouer the sea, promisyng Mountaynes of Golde, which turned into snowe, and wasted into water, boastyng that ye would send horsmen and footemen, and yet becomyng neither Lackey nor Page. If we had made our enterprize for our selfe solye, and in our owne quarell, thinke you that we would haue tarped your comyng: Nay, nay, you should haue well knowne, if we had entended a conquest, that we would haue so strongly inuaded, and set on the Realme of Fraunce, that your Countries of Flaunders, and Brabant, should haue had cause enough to wonder at, trustyng that, that which wee had gotten, we would haue kept as well as any of our auncestours haue done: But because the very occasion of the warre was yours, and that you did not prosecute the same, the French King, which neuer offended me nor my subiectes (except in mainteinyng the Cite of Warwicke, for the displeasure that you bare him agaynst me) offered me, beyng destitute of all your succoz and ayde, both honozable and honest condicions of peace, which offers I was in maner enforced by very reason to accept, and so haue concluded a truce, which God willyng I will both kepe and obserue. God send you ioy, quod the Duke, and sodainly tooke his horse, and rode againe to Lurenborough. After this day the king and the Duke, neuer loued, and neuer sawe eche other, such is the ende

of vntrustinesse and promise bzeakyng.

The Constable of Fraunce, tearing lest that by this conclusion he might be reputed of the French king vnttrue, as he had well deserued it: Wherefore he sent his confessor to King Edward, with letters of credence, requirng him hartely little to regarde the French kings wordes, and lesse to trust to his promise, affirming that the French king would no lenger kepe promise then king Edward were on that side of the sea: and rather then he should agree with the French king, for a small summe of money, he offered to lend him fiftie thousand crownes, with many other faire proffers. The king of England made answer that the truce was concluded, and that he would nothing chaunge, concerning the matter, and that if he had kept promise wyth hym, he would not haue made that appointment nor agreement.

Then was the Constable in maner on all sides in dispayze, but yet he wrote to the French king by his messengers, beseeching hym to geue no credite or beliefe to any tale tolde or sayned agaynst hym, without heering hys answer, affirming that the king had alwayes knowne hys truth and fidelitie towarde the crowne of Fraunce, and so should he still finde him tyll his dying daye, promisyng and warranting hym, if that it should stande with hys pleasure, that he would so compass the Duke of Burgoyne, that they two should vterly destroy the king of Englande and his armie or they returned.

The Counsaylers of the French king made answer, that their maister and the king of England were ioyned and confedered in a sure amitie: wherefore they would in no wise knowe or condiscend to any thing that might be prejudiciall, or once sounde to the detriment of the English men: But they sayde, that the king their maister much trusted the Constable, and that for his sake he would talke with them in his priuie Chamber. The French king before their entrie into his chamber, caused the Lorde of Countay seruant to the Duke of Burgoyne, accompanied with the Lorde of Argenton, one of his priuie counsaile, to stand seeretly behinde a seeling or a hanging in his chamber, and he himselfe sat in a Chayze, directly before that place, so that whatsover were purposed to him, they standing behinde the cloth, might easely see and here the same. Lewys de Creuell and his felow entred into the Kings Chamber of nothing thinking lesse then of the spirites enclosed: they declared what payne their maister had taken for the French kings sake, to send, mooue, and entise the Duke of Burgoyne to leaue, and cleerly to forsake the king of Englande, which Duke they founde in suche a rage and furie against the English men, that at their request, he was not onely vterly determined to forsake and refuse their amitie, but also would sende out aduenturers and Launceknights, to rob and spoyle them in their returning. And in speaking these wordes (thinking surely much to please the king) the saide Lewys counterfeited the fashion and gesture of the Duke of Burgoyne, and began to stampe with his foote on the ground, and beate with hys fist on the table, swearing by Saint George that the King of Englande was not extracted of any noble house, but was a yomans sonne, and that when he was not worth one halfpenny, he was restored to hys kingdome, and made king onely by his ayde, reproouing and reuiling him with such yll wordes, and so shamefull termes, that all the hearers abhorred it. The French king sayning that he was thicke of hearing, caused him to reherse his sayng agayne, gayne, which so counterfeyted the very gesture of the Dukes angry countenance and rozing boyce, that no man hath seene a better counterfayture or Player in any Comedie or Tragedie. The Lorde of Contay was soze displeased to see hys maister made a testing stock, but he kept all these things secret, tyll his returne to his master.

When the Bagiaunt was played, the king bad the messengers of the Constable, to haue him commended to hys brother their maister, and to declare to him that as newes rose and grewe, he would thereof aduertise him, and so gaue them licence to departe to their maister, who thought himselfe now to be in great suretie of his estate, when in deede he was neuer so nere his fall and perdition: Esteeming the Duke of Burgoyne to be hys assured friend, which hated him more then a Panyme, or a Turke, accompting also the French King to haue no yll suspicion in him, which neyther trusted nor yet beleued any worde, writing or message that was epyther wrytten or sent from him: Such ende hath all dissimulation, such fruite springeth of double dealing and craftie conueying: for if epyther the Constable had bene fapthfull to the King his maister, as of bounden duetic and allegeaunce he ought to be, or else had kept his promise, made to the king of Englande and Duke of Burgoyne, and had not dalyed and dissimuled with them, he had surely in his extremitie bene ayded, succoured and comforted of one of these thre at the last, where now he was of all thre forsaken, and yet not forsaken, but fought for, looked for, and watched for, not for his profite or promotion, but for his vndoing and destruction: Now let vs leaue of the Constable, and returne to the conclusion of the peace.

When all thinges were appointed, wrytten and established, the peace was proclaymed in both the campes, and the king of Englande, the soner to consumate the amitie by othe as it was agreed, came within halfe a league of Amias, where the french king was, which to the entent to obtayne the more fauor of the Englishmen, sent into their armie a hundred Cartes laden with Wyne, the best that might begotten. And farther, because the English men resorted to the towne of Amias, both for their pastime and busines, he ordayned at the very entrie of the gate of the towne, two great and long tables, to be set on euery side of the streate, where the Englishmen shoulde passe, and euery table was abundantly furnished with all sortes of delycate byand, and especially of such as woulde prouoke an appetite to drinke, there lacked no wine of no sorte, seruitours were readye to serue and minister all things necessary. And farther to accompany and familiarly to entertayne the English nation, at euery table were appointed fiue or sixe gentlemen, of the best companyons of the whole countrey, not onely to see them serued wythout lacking, but also to drinke and make good cheere, and keepe company with them, and euer as they entred into the towne, they were taken by the bydles and in maner enforced to drinke, wheresoeuer they came, they payde no money, but were set scot free, which there lasted thre or foure dayes, to the french kings cost, and in conclusion to hys no small vniquieting. For one day they entred into the towne of Amias. ix. M. English men well armed, so that no frenche man durst once forbid them to enter. Their occasion of entring into the towne was onely to refreshe them, and to buy things necessary for their busineses and affayres. When the french King was thereof enforced, enforced, he was somewhat bered and more amased, fearing either the losse of his towne or hurt of his people: he sent to the English Capitaynes requiring them to withdraw their souldyers to their campe, the Capitaynes performed the kings desire, as much as in them lay, but if they sent out twenty, ten came back agayne, and brought more company with them. The french king sent Monsieur de Guye, Marshall of Fraunce, and other into the towne to see the Englishemens behauiour, they found some drinke, some singing, and some sleeping, so that they might perceyue, that they ment neyther deceit nor vntreuth: yet the french king which of hys nature was very suspicious, & especially towarde the English men, came to the gate of Amias, strongly accompanied, and caused thre hundred men of armes to be kept secretly in their Capitaynes houses, and other company he set on the Portall, where the English men entred, a small number God wot, to haue resisted the great companye of English men, if they had epyther intended any thing towarde the french king or his towne. The king of England was prouidly enforced of the french kings doabtfull imagination and vntreue suspicion: wherfore he sent worde to him, that he should make a proclamation, that no English man should enter into the towne vpon a paine. The french king made answer, that it neyther stood wyth hys honor, nor yet with any princely humanitie, that he should forbid his friends (as he called them) to take their pleasure in hys towne, but if it might please the king of Englande, to appoint certayne of the yomen of hys crowne, to stande at the gate, and to appoint, not onely who should enter, but also the number of them, he thought that this moderation should be both suretie and pleasure to both the parties. Which request the king of Englande wyth quick speede caused to be performed, to the great quietnesse of the french king and his counsaile, casting farther perilles then reason required.

You haue still in your remembrance, how an article of the treatie was, that the two princes should enteruiew, and meete in a place by both parties to be appointed. The king of Englande appointed the Lorde Haward, and sye Thomas Sentliger, and a Herault: for the french king were assigned the Lorde Bonchace, and the Lorde of Argenton. When they had bewed the ryuer, they agreed the most conuenient and surest place to be at Picquegny, on the water of Some thre leagues fro Amias. The towne standeth lowe, and the ryuer passeth through. On that syde the french King should come, the Countie laye and open, and so likewise the other part was very pleasant: but toward the riuer there was a caluise of two arrow shots in length, which was enuironed with marshes, surely it was a dangerous passage to carry a prince in a straunge realme, by such a strayte, if the french men had ment any fraude, but verily the king of Englande had so great a trust and confidence in the honor and promise of the french king and his nobilitie, that he would vpon their assuraunce haue aduentured farther then thys, if his will might haue bene performed. Then it was concluded by these foure commissioners, that a large bridle should be made over the ryuer of Some, in the middle of which bridle was made a great strög grate of timber, like to the grate where the Lyons be kept, the holes of which grate did extende into no longer quantitie, then that a man might easely put through hys arme, which bridle was made and covered wyth bozdes, onely to keepe of the weather, that vnder the couerture, there might stande twelue persons on euery side of the grate, which extended from the one side of the bridge, euen directly to the other, so that there was no way for one prince to come to the other (as was in the grate, where John Duke of Burgoyne was slayne) and ouer the riner was onely one ferie Bote. When the bridge and all other things necessary were ended and performed for so great a purpose, and well and diligently beved on both the sides, there were appointed twelue noble personages to be attendant on euery prince to the barres, and foure Englishe men were assigned to stand with the French men on the bridge, to see their doing and behauiour, and likewise foure French men were limited to the English men for that same cause and pollicie. At the day appointed, which was the. xxiij. day of August, eche king approached the riner syde with his armie, so that eche armie might see other. The Frenchmen say and write, that the armie of the Englishe men was greater and much fairer then their battayle, but they excuse it (in thys case as they doe in all other) sayng that the fourth parte of their armie was lacking, you may allow their excuse if it please you. When the token of meeting by the shot of the Artillerie was knowen, the French king with twelue noble men entred the bridge, and came to the closure, with whome was John Duke of Bourbon, and the Cardinall hys brother, a prelate more meete for a Ladies Carpet, then for an Ecclesiasticall Pulpet, and ten other, amongst whom the Lord of Argenton was in like apparell, as the French king ware, for so was hys pleasure that day to haue him adourned. The king of England came all a long the causey that I haue spoken of well accompanied that he seemed well to be a king, and with hym was hys brother the Duke of Clarence, the Erle of Northumberland, the Bisshop of Ely his Chauncelour, the Lorde Hastings his Chamberlayne, and eyght other Lordes. King Edward and foure other were appareled in cloth of Golde frised, hauing on his bonet of black Veluet a floure deluce of Golde, set with very riche and orient stones, he was a goodly, sayre, and a bewtiful Prince, beginning a little to grow in fleshe, and when he approached neere the grate, he tooke of his Cap, and made a lowe and solempne obeysance: the French king made to him an humble reuerence, but after his fashion somewhat homely. King Lewys embrased king Edward through the barriers sayng: Cosyn you be right hartely welcome into these parties, assuring you that there is no man in the world that I haue more desired to see and speak with, then with you, and now lauded be almightie God, we be here met together for a good and godly purpose, whereof I doubt not, but that we shall haue cause to reioyse. The king of England him thanked and answered to hys wordes so soberly, so grauely, and so princely, that the French men there at not a little mised.

The Chauncelour of England made there a solempne oration, in laude and prayse of peace, concluding on a propherie, that sayde that at Pyrcuegny should be concluded a peace, both honorable and profitable to the realmes of England and Fraunce. The Chaunceler opened the letters of both their agreements to the treatie, demanding of them if they therewith were contented, they answered yea, then eche Prince layd his right hand on the Alfal, and hys left hande on the holy Crosse, and tooke there a solempne othe, to obserue and keepe the treatie of the truce for. ii. yeres concluded betwene them, them, with all their confederates and allies comprised, mencioned and specified in the same, and farther to accomplish the marriage of their children, with all things thereon depending, according as it was agreed and concluded betwene their ambassadors: when the othe was taken and sworne, the French king sayde merily to King Edward, brother if you will take payne to come to Paris, you shall be feasted and entertayned wyth Ladies, and I shall appoint you the Cardinall of Bourbon for your confessor, which shall gladly asfoyle you of such finnes, if any be committed. The king of Englande tooke these wordes pleasauntly and thankefully, for he was informed that the Cardinall was a good companion, and a Chaplayne meete for suche a dallyng pastyme. When this communication was merily ended, the French king intending to shewe himselfe like a maister amongst his seruants, made all his companye to drawe backe from him, meaning to common with the king of Englande secretly, the Englishe men withdrew them without any commaundement, then the two kinges commoned alone secretly, I thinke not to the profite of the Constable of Fraunce. The French king demanded of King Edward, whether the Duke of Burgoyne would accept the truce, King Edward answered that he would once agayne make an offer, and then by on the refusall, he woulde referre and report the truth to him. Then king Lewys began to speake of the Duke of Britayne, whome he would sayne haue excepted out of the league. To whom the king of England answered: Brother I require you to moue no warre to the Duke of Britayne, for on my fidelity, in the time of my neede and aduersitie, I neuer found a more friendlye, sure and stedfast louer then he.

Then king Lewys called his company againe, and with most lowly and amiable comendations, toke his leaue of the king of England, speaking certain friendly wordes to euery Englishman. King Edward doying likewise to the Frenchmen, they both at one tyme departed from the barriers and mounted on horse backe, and departed the French kyng to Amias, and King Edward to his army, to whome was sent out of the French kings house all things necessary for a Prince, in so much that neither Torchis nor Torchettes lacked vnent. When the French king was departed from Picquegny, he called to him the Lord of Argenton, sayng, by the peace of God, the king of England is an amorous and a faire prince, he at the first beck would gladly see Paris, where he might fortune to fynde such pleasaunt or talkatue Dames, which with sayre wordes, and pleasaunt pastimes might allure him to their fantasies, that it might breede an occasion in him to come ouer the sea agayne, which I woulde not gladly see, for his progenitors haue bene to long and to often both in Paris and Normandy (on this side the sea) therefore I loue neither his sight, nor his companye, but when he is at home, I loue him as my brother, and take him as my friende.

The French king after this departyng, sore desirous to make warre on the Duke of Britayne, which he could not do, except he were left out of the treatie: wherefore he sent the Lorde Bouchage, and the Lord of S. Pierre, to the king of England, entreatyng him by all wayes and mocions possible, to leaue the Duke of Briteyn for his alie, and not to haue him comprehended in the league: the king of England heeryng them so seriously, and so feruently speake agaynst the Duke of Briteyne, with an earnest countenance answered,

swered, sayng: My Lordes I assure you, if I were peaceably at home in my realme, yet for the defence of the Duke of Briteyne and his Countrey, I woulde passe the Seas againe, agaynst all them that either woulde doe hym iniurie, or make warre vpon him. The French Lordes nothing farther sayng, much maruelled why the king of Englande, so surely claue to the Duke of Briteynes partie: But they knewe not (or else at the least remembered not) that Henry Erle of Richmond, was within the power and Dominion of the Duke of Briteyne, whom king Edwardes phantasie ever gaue him, would make once a title to the Crowne of England, as next heire to the house of Lancaster: For he knewe well, that if the Duke of Briteyne, would transport him into England, where he had both kinnsfolke and friends, with neuer so small an ayde (yea, although it were but a shadowe of an armie) then were he enforced, newly to begin againe a conquest, as though he had neuer wonne the Crowne, nor obteyned the possession of the Realme, which was the very cause, why he stakke so soze on the Duke of Briteynes part. The same night the Lordes returned to Amias, and reported to their Maister king Edwardes aunswere, which therewith, was not the best pleased, but pleasure or displeasure, there was no remedie, but to dissimule the matter. This same night also, there came the Lord Haward, and two other of the king of Englandes Counsaile (which had bene helpers forwarde of the peace) to the frenche king to suppur. The Lord Haward sayde to the frenche king, secretly in his eare, that if it stode with his pleasure, he coulde perswade the king of England, to come to Amias, yea, peradventure as farre as Paris, familiarly and friendly to solace himselfe with him, as his trusty friend and faythfull brother. The frenche king, to whom this mocion was nothing pleasaunt, callyng for water, washed and rose without any answere makyng: but he sayde to one of his Counsaile, that he imagined in his awne conceipt, that this request would be made: the Englishe men began againe, to conuision of that matter, the frenche men pollitiquely bzake their communication, sayng: that the king with all speede must marche forward, agaynst the Duke of Burgoyne. Although this mocion seemed, onely for to encrease loue, and continuall amitie betwene the Princes, yet the Frenchmen hauyng in their perfite remembrance, the innumerable dammages & hurtes, which they of late dayes had susteyned by the Englishe nacion: wherby cotinually hatred encreased, agaynst him in fraunce, thought by pollicie and wisdom, with faire wordes, and friendly countenaunce, to put by this request, and to mocion them rather, to depart homeward, then to pricke them forward to Paris. This peace was sayde to be made, onely by the holy Ghost, because that on the day of meeting, a white Doue sat on the berie top of the king of Englandes Tent: whether she sat there to drie her, or came thether as a token geuen by God, I referre it to your iudgement. At this treatie and meeting, was not the Duke of Glocester, nor other Lordes, which were not content with this truce, but the Duke came afterwarde to Amias, with diuers other Lordes of England, to the frenche king, which both highly feasted them, and also presented them with plate and horses, well garnished. King Lewys consideryng, what gaine the Englishe men had gotten, by makyng warre in fraunce, and what miserie, and what pouertie, the French nacion had suffered, by reason of the sayd warres, determined clerely, rather to pac-

fic and enterteine the Englishe nacion, by fayre wordes, and great rewarde, (although it were to his great charge) then by to muche hardinesse, to put himselfe, his nobilitie, and realme, in a hazarde, by geuing them battaile, as his predecessors, had vnwisely done at Doyters, and at Agincort: wherfore, to buy peace, he graunted to king Edward, for a yerely tribute fiftie thousand Crownes, as is mencioned before, to be payde at London, which accompting a Crowne at foure shillings, amounteth to ten thousande pounde. And to haue the fauor and good will, of his chiefe counsayloz, he gaue great pensions, amountyng to the somme of .xvi. thousand Crownes a yere, that is to say: to his Chaunceloz, to the Lorde Hastynge, his chiefe Chamberleyn, a man of no lesse wit, then vertue, and of great aucthoritie with his Maister, and that not without a cause: For he had aswell in time of aduersitie, as in the faire flatteryng worlde, well and truly serued him, and to the Lorde Hawarde, to sir Thomas Mountgomerie, to sir Thomas Sentliger, to sir John Cheuney, maister of the kinges horses, to the Marques Dorset, sonne to the Queene, and diuers other, he gaue great and liberall rewarde, to the entent to kepe himselfe, in amitie with England, while he waime and obteyned his purpose and desire in other places.

These persons had geuen to them great giftes, beside yerely pensions: For the lord of Argenton his Counsaile, affirmeth of his awne knowlege, that the lord Haward, had in lesse then the terme of two yeres, for rewarde in money and plate, .xxiiij. M. Crownes, & at the time of his meeting, he gaue to the Lorde Hastynge, the kinges chiefe Chamberlaine, as the Frenchmen write, a hundreth Markes of siluer made in Plate, whereof euery Marke is .viiij. ounces sterlyng: but the Englishe writers affirme, that he gaue the said Lorde Hastynge, .xxiiij. dosen boules, that is to say, .xii. dosen gylte, and .xii. dosen vngilte, euery Bolle wayyng .xviij. nobles, which gift, either betokened in him, a great liberall nature, or else a great and especial confidence, that he had in the sayd Lorde Chamberleyn. Beside this, he gaue him yerely, two thousand Crownes pension, the which somme he sent to him, by Piers Cleret, one of the Maisters of his house, geuyng him in charge, to receyue of him an acquittance, for the receipt of the same pension, to the entent that it should appere in time to come, that the Chaunceloz, Chamberleyn, Admirall, Maisters of the horses, to the king of England, and many other of his counsaile, had bene in fee and pensionaries, of the frenche king, whose yerely acquittances (the Lorde Hastynge onely except) remaine of recorde to be shewed, in the Chamber of accomptes, in the Palace of Paris. When Piers Cleret had payed the pension to the Lorde Hastynge, he gently demaunded of him an acquittance, for his discharge, which request when he denied, he then onely required of him a letter of three lines, to be directed to the king, testifyng the receipt of the pension, to the entent that the king his Maister, should not thinke the pension to be imbeisled. The Lord Hastynge although he knewe, that Piers demaunded nothing but reason, answered him: Sir this gift cometh onely, of the liberall pleasure of the king your maister, and not of my request: if it be his determinate wil, I shal haue it, then put you it into my sleue, and if not, I pray you render to him his gift againe: for neither he nor you, shal haue either letter, acquittance, or scrow, signed with my hande, or the receipt of any pension, to the entent to brag another day, that the kings

Chamberlain of England, hath bene pencionarie, with the French king, and shewde his acquittance, in the Chamber of accomptes, to his dishonor. Piers left his money behinde, and made relacion of all thinges to his maister, which although that he had not his will, yet he muche moze praysed the wiledome and pollicie of the Lord Hallynges, then of the other pencionaries, commaundyng him yetely to be payed, without any discharge demaundyng.

When the King of Englande had receiued his tribute, and his nobilitie their rewardes of the French King: he trusted by his tentes, and laded al his bagage, and departed toward Calice, but or he came there, he rememberyng the craftie dissimulation, and the vnttrue dealing of Lewis Erle of S. Poule, high Constable of Fraunce, entending to declare him, to the French King, in his verie true likenesse, and portrature: sent vnto him two letters of credence, written by the sayde Constable, with the true report of all suche words and messages, as had bene to him sent, and declared by the said Constable & his Ambassadors, which letters, the French King gladly receiued, and thankfully accepted, as the chiefe instrument, to bring the Constable to his death: which he escaped no long season after, such is the ende of dissimulers.

of King Ed: ward into Englande.

When King Edward was come to Calice, and had set all things in an order, he toke ship, & sailed with a prosperous winde, into England, and was receyued by the Maior of London, and the Magistrates clad in Scarlet, and b. C. commons, apparelled in Hurry, the xxij. daye of September, in the xiiij. yere of his reigne, vpon blacke Peath, and so receyued with a great triumph, through the Citie of London vnto Westminster, where after hys long labor, he reposed himselfe a while: euery daye almost talking with the Queene his wife, of the maryage of his daughter, whom he caused to be called Dolphynesse: thinking nothing surer, then that marriage to take effect, according to the treatie. The hope of which marriage, caused him to dissimule and doe things, which afterward chaunced greatly to the French kings profite, and smally to his.

When King Edward was arrived in England, the French King thinking by no meane possible, to haue his will on the Constable, but onely by the Duke of Burgoyne, determined to conclude a truce, for ix. yeres, vpon covenant, euery man to haue his owne: but the Ambassadors, would not haue the truce proclaimed, thinking therby, to saue the Duke from perurie, which had sworne, neuer to conclude a peace, till the King of Englande had bene thre monethes in his realme, after his returne from Calice. The King of Englande, was of all these doyngs, ascertained by his friendes: wherefore, in all hast he sent hys Thomas Mountgomerie, a wise, and a sage knight, to the French King, being then at Veruyns, concluding with the Duke of Burgoyne's Ambassadors, requiryng him to take none other truce, with the Duke Charles, then that which was by them concluded, desiryng him farther, in no wyse to depart with saint Quintines, to the Duke: Offering that if he woulde, any longer continue the warre, against the sayde Duke, that he woulde for his pleasure, and the Dukes displeasure passe the seas again, the next Sommer: so that the French King, shoulde paie to him fiftie thousande Crownes, for the losse which he should sustaine, in his custome by reason that the wolles at Calice, because of the warre, coulde haue no bent, nor be bitted, and also paye halfe the charges, and halfe the wages of his Souldiers, and men of warre.

The French King, most hartly thanked the King of Englande, of hys kynde offer, and faithful friendship, excusing hym, that the peace was already assented to: howbeit, it was the verye same peace, that was betweene them concluded, sauyng onely, that the Duke woulde be a contractor in the league, and not comprehended in the same, as another Princes alie. This matter was thus answered, and faintlye excused, and with the same, hys Thomas Mountgomerie dispatched, which was with plate convenientlye rewarded: and wyth him returned, the Lorde Hawarde, and hys John Cheiney, which were hostages wyth the French King, tyll King Edward were returned into Englande. The French King marvelled not a litle, at King Edwardes offers, and thought it perilous to cause the Englishmen to passe the sea again, and to ioyne with the French men, whome they neuer loued, coniecturyng farther, that the Englishmen, and the Burgoyne, would sone agree, by reason of their olde acquaintaunce and familiaritie, and by chaunce, both become enemies to the French men: wherefore, in auoyding of all ambiguities, hee determined to conclude the truce.

When King Edward had after this maner established, as well his affaires of outwarde warre, as hys priuate and perticuler businesse at home: not withstanding, that he beyng the most valyaunt, & fortunate victor, of such and so many terrible and bloody battailes, myght thynke to leade his life, in perfect quietnesse, and sure safety: Yet considering, that Henry the yong Erle of Richmonde, one of the offsprings, of the blood of King Henry the sixt, was yet liuyng and in good health, he iudged hymselfe, to be farre from hys purpose, and that onely thing, did so bere and trouble hys ioye and felicitie, that he thought hymselfe neuer to be in a sure estate. Wherefore, he determined yet once agayne, to sollicite and moue, Fraunces Duke of Britayne, eyther for gittes, promises, or prayers, to deliuer the Erle into his handes. Wherefore he sent Doctor Stillington, & two other, his Ambassadors, well laden wyth no small somme of Gold, with al haste to the Duke of Briteyn: And to the content y their desire shoulde appeere more honest, in the open face of the world, he willed them to declare to the Duke, that their request, to haue the Erle deliuered to them, was only for this purpose, to ioyne with him aliance by marriage, & so to extirpate & pluck by, all the dregges and leuyngs of the aduerse part, and contrary faction. The Duke gently harde the Ambassadors, and first he began to deny, and after to excuse, why he might, nor ought not agree to their request: but in conclusion, what with prayers requiring, and monies sollicitryng, the Duke beyng weryed and overcome, deliuered the Erle to the Ambassadors, whom in his letters he highly commended, to King Edward, not thinnyng that he deliuered the shepe to the wolfe, but the sonne to the father, beleuyng surely, without scruple or doubt, that King Edward would geue in marriage to him Lady Elizabeth his eldest daughter, whome in deede he married, after her fathers death, as you hereafter shall here. When the Ambassadors had the pray that they so much desired, they departed to the towne of Saint Malo, standyng on the sea syde, where they reckned to haue taken shippyng, and so to haue sayled into England. The Erle of Richmond knowyng, that he was goyng toward his death, for verye pensiuenesse, and inwarde thought, fell into a freuent and soze ague. In this verye season, one John Cheulet, so esteemed among the Princes of Briteyn, as fewe were in all the Countrey

Coumtry, and in much credite, and well accepted with the Duke, was when these thinges were thus concluded, for his solace in the Countrey, but being thereof certified, being chased with the abhominacion of the fact: resorted to the Court, and familiarly came to the Dukes presence, and there stood so sadly, and so pale, without any worde speakyng, that the Duke was much amazed, and sodainely maruayled at his sad and frownyng countenance, and demaunded of him what should signifie, that dumpishenesse of minde, and inward sighing, the which by his countenance manifestly appered: he modestly answered, most noble and redoubted Lorde, this palenesse of visage, and deadly looke, doth prognosticate the tyme of my death to approche and be at hande, whiche if it had chaunced to me, before this day, I assure you, it had much lesse hurted me. For then had I not bene preserved, to seele the dolorous pagues which a fact by you done (that I thought impossible to be obtained) hath imprinted in my stomacke: so that I well perceiue, that either I shall leese my life, or else liue in perpetuall distresse, and continuall miserie: For you my singuler good Lorde, by your vertuous actes, and noble feates, haue gotten to you, in maner an immortall fame: which in euery mannes mouth, is extolled and eleuated, aboue the high Clowdes, but alas me seemeth (I pray you pardon me my rudenesse) that now that you haue obteyned, so high a laude and glozie, you nothing lesse regarde then to keepe and preserve the same inuiolate, considering that you forgetting your faith and faythfull promise, made to Henry Erle of Richmond, hath deliuered the most innocent yong gentleman, to the cruell tormentors, to be afflicted, rent in pieces, and slain: wherfore all such as loue you, of the which number I am one, cannot chose but lament and be sozie, when they see openly the fame and glozy of your most renoumed name, by such disloialtie & vntyruth against promise, to be both blotted and stayned, with a perpetuall note of slaunder and infamie. Peace mine awne good John, quod the Duke, I pray the beleue me, there is no such thinge like to happen to the Erle of Richmond: for King Edward hath sent for him, to make of him, being his suspectt enemy, his good and faire sen in lawe. Well, well, quod John, my redoubted Lorde, geue credence to me: the Erle Henry is at the very brinke to perishe, whome if you permit once to set but one foote, out of your power and dominion, there is no mortall creature able hereafter to deliuer him from death. The Duke being moued with the perswasions of John Cheulet, which either little beleued, or smally suspected King Edward, to desire the Erle, for any fraude or decept, or else seduced by blinde auarice and loue of money, more then honestie or wisdom would require, did not consider, what he aduisedly did, or what he aduisedly should haue done. Wherfore, with all diligence, he sent forth Peter Landoyse, his chiefe treasurer, commaundyng him to stay the Erle of Richmond, in all hast possible. Peter not sluggyng, nor dreamyng his businesse: came to the Englishe Ambassadors, to Saint Malos, there abidyng the winde. And first he inuented a cause of his coming, and kept with them a long communication, to protract the time, till his men in the meane season, had conueyed the Erle (almost halfe dead) into a sure Sanctuarie, within the towne, which in no wise might be violat: where he being deliuered, from the continuall feare of dreadful death, recouered his health, and in good plight was brought to the Duke.

Here a man maye evidently perceiue the olde Greeke Proverbe to be very true, which is that a man, to a man shall sometime be as a God, for the yong Erle Henry without desert deliuered to his death, todaynely by the labor of John Cheulet, and the fauour of the good Prince was preserved, saved and deliuered. God graunt that suche examles maye be a doctrine and myrror to such as be rulers aboue other, lacking counsaylors to monish and warne them of their duety and office. That they remembryng thys good act, may learne to take into their counsayle and family, such as will well and truly admonishe and warne them, and they likewise with good minde and glad intent to be followers of the same.

The Englishe Ambassadors complayned and murmured, that they were both spoyled of their money and marchaundise, requiring Peter Landoyse that they in no wise should returne so deluded without pray or penny. The treasurer effectuously promised them, that y Erle either should be surely kept in the Sentuary, into the which he escaped (by their negligence as he layed to their charge) or else should be againe in the Dukes house put in prison, so that they should not neede no more to feare him then his shadowe. And so the king of England for his money, purchased the keeping of his enemy by the space of thre dayes and no more.

King Edward in the meane season, sore longing, and desiring to knowe what effect his Ambassage toke with the Duke of Britaine, was therefore euery houre troubled and vniquieted with harkening and looking, and at the last was certified from thence, how the Erle of Richmond was deliuered, and at a point to be brought home to him as prisoner in captiuitie: but that he escaped, which newes he tooke most grieuouly, but after being somewhat appeased, when he had heard that he should be safely kept in prison, determined clerely hereafter to banishe that care out of his minde and phantasie, and to employ all his whole studie and diligence for the keeping of his house, after a more bountifull and liberall propoztion, then before he was accustomed. And when he had sufficiently stored his Chesse with treasure, remembryng hys honor, least he peradventure should be noted with the spot of Negardship, he shewed himselfe lyke a liberall and beneficiall Prince to hys commons, and lyke a good and a profitable king to the common wealth, and to the poore people of his realme and dominion.

Now as this good king Edward sought & studied daylie and hourly to bring himselfe to quietnesse & rest, and hys realme to a continuall amitie, and a perpetuall peace, so likewise at the same tyme Charles Duke of Burgoyne, whose wytt neuer loued peace, nor yet was weary or abhorred trouble, whose intollerable paines in the warres were to him pleasure, & especially where he thought to obteyne any newe seignorie, or else to be reuenged of auncient enemies, for olde griefes and displeasures to him done. So that desyre of rule mixte with hatred and malice, ioynd with couetousnesse, kindled and prouoked so his courage this yere, that he partly to be reuenged of the Duke of Lozayne & the Swytchers, and partly for the couetous desire that he had to certayne landes, lying betwene his low countreies of Brabant and Flaunders and his Duchye of haute Burgoyne, assembled a great army and a mighty puyssaunce, & besieged a towne called Granson in Lozayne, which when he had receyued, without mercy lyke a tyraunt he caused all the inhabitants

truelly to be put to death, wherof hearing the Switchers manfully encountred wth him, and discomfited his whole armie, where the Duke lost both honor, prayse, and such abundaunce of ryches, that fewe princes in his time were able to shewe such Jewels, and so many, and of such high price and value. And after not content wth these chaunces, but ever in hope of renewing, he fought with the Switchers agayne at Moxrot, where of. xliij. M. good men of warre, he lost ten thousande, beside them that were wounded and hurt: yet this fierce and couragious Capitayne, more couragious then circumspect, gathered agayne a newe armie, and contrarie to the mindes of hys whole counsaile, in the deepe of wynter, besieged the towne of Nancy, belonging to the Duke of Lozayne, where he was encountred with the said Duke and the Switchers, and there by them agayne overcome, discomfited and slayne.

Grantson, Moxrot,
Nancy.

Thus in one yere he lost three great battayles, the first at Grantson, where he lost honor, and all hys ryches: the second at Moxrat, where he lost honor, and almost all hys men: the thirde at Nancy, where he lost life, honor, ryches, men, and all wordly felicitie, on the Vigile of the Epiphany.

This ende had the valyaunt hart and stonite courage of Duke Charles of Burgoyne, who in hys time could neuer agree with peace and concord, till death more puyssant then life may resist, brought his bodie to quietnesse, which bodie is interred in the Church of saint George in Nancy, leaving behinde him one sole daughter lawfully begotten to be his heire, which afterward was married to Maximilian Archduke of Austriche.

At this battayle were taken Anthony and Bauldwoyn, bastard brethren to Duke Charles, whome the French king bought of the Duke of Lozayne, to the intent that they should not withstand his pretended purpose in Flaunders. If any man were sozie of the Duke of Burgoyne's death, you may be sure that he was not so inwardly sozie, as the French king was in hart joyous and glad: for nowe having peace with Englande, he knew no creature that was able to matche with him, in earnest or in game, & because he would leese no time, he vnder couler that women be not able to enioye any thing, that is or hath bene apperteyning to the Crowne of Fraunce, tooke of the yong damosell of Burgoyne the townes of Moundedier, Perone, Abbeuile, Moustreul, Roy, and all the townes on the ryuer of Some: Beside this, he with no great paine obeyned Hesdyng, Arras, and the towne of Bulleyn, with the Countie of Bullonoyes, which king Charles his father had before engaged, and empledged to Duke Philip of Burgoyne, as before is mentioned. But this wylie and wittie king Lewys, comming to the towne of Bullern, perceyved that if it were fortifed with a garrison, it should not onely be an ill neighbor to the townes of Calice and Gynnes, but also a port necessarie and conuenient for all hys subiects, when they should be, eyther by enemies assailed, or by stormie tempestuous weather driuen on the narrow Seas: wherefore to cast a sure Ancker, knowing the Lorde Bartrame de la Cour, Erie of Flanderie, to be the verie true and vndubitate heire of the said towne and Countie: He first obeyned of him his right and tytle in the same, rewardyng hym with a greater summe, and a more yereley value of reuenues, in the Countie of Forest and other places. And after to the intent to haue a port cuer open vpon Englande, he annexed the same towne of of Bulleyn, and the Countie of Bullonoyes, with the partes adiacent to the crowne and regalitie of Fraunce. And because the forenamed towne and Countie were holden of the Erledome of Artoys, he chaunged the tenure, and solemnly auowed to hold the same towne & Countie of our Lady of Bulleyn, and therefore did homage to the Image in the great Church called our Lady Church in Bulleyn, offering there a Harte of Golde, waiyng two thousand Crownes, ordcyning farther, that all his heyres and successors, at their entrie into the estate and dignitie royall, by themselves, or their depute should offer a Hart of like waight and value, as a reliefe and homage done, or made for the same towne and Countie.

You may be sure that the kyng of Englande woulde not haue suffered the French kyng to haue buylded such a couert nest so nere his towne of Calice, and the territories of the same, except hys league had bound him, or that he had to much affiaunce in the French king, whose hart was double, & whose wit was euer inconstant, but surely the hope of the preferment of his daughter, both brought him to blindness, and dotage. Let these doyngs ouer passe and see how politikely the French king wrought for his aduantage. During these doings in the lowe partes, he caused the Duke of Lozayne to enter into high Burgoyne with a great army, which by policie and promises brought the whole Duchie vnder obedience of the French kyng, which then claymed to haue the order and mariage of the yong Ladye, as a pupille, warde, and orphan, apertayning to the Crowne of Fraunce, for the which title after rose no small mischiefe and trouble in Flaunders, and the countreyes there about. Let vs leaue a whyle to speake of outward businesse, and retourne to our owne.

In this yere, then beyng Mayor of London syr Raufe Jossyn draper, the wall of the Citie of London, that is to say, from Creplegate to Bishopsgate, was buylded, at the costes, and charges of the Citizens.

In the. xvij. yere of kyng Edwarde, there fell a sparckle of priuie malice, betweene the kyng, and his brother the Duke of Clarence, whether it rose of olde grudges before time passed, or were it newly kindled, and set a fire by the Queene or her bloud, which were euer mistrusting and priuily barking at the kings linage, or were he desirous to reigne after his brother: to men that haue thereof made large inquisition, of such as were of no small authority in those dayes, the certaintye therof was hid, and could not truely be disclosed, but by coniectures, which as often deceyue the imaginacions of fantastical folke, as declare truth to them in their conclusion. The same was that the king or the Queene, or both, sore troubled with a folishe Prophecie, and by reason thereof began to stomach and greuously to grudge against the Duke: The effect of which was, after king Edwarde should reigne, on whose first letter of hys name should be a G. and because the Deuill is wont with such witchcrafts, to wrap and entangle the myndes of men which delite in such deuillish fantasies, they sayde afterwarde that that Prophecie lost not his effect, when after kyng Edwarde, Gloucester vsurped his kyngdome.

Other allege this to be the cause of his death: That of late, the olde rancor betweene them beyng newly reuined (the which betweene no creatures can be more behement then betweene brethren, especially when it is firmlye fixed fixed and rooted) the Duke being destitute of a wyfe, by the meanes of Lady Margaret, Duchesse of Burgoyne, his sister, procured to haue the Lady Marye, daughter, and heyre to Duke Charles, her husbande, to be geuen to him in matrimony: which maryage king Edwarde (enuyng the felicitie of hys brother) both agayne sayde and disturbed. This priuie displeasure was openly appeased, but not inwardly forgotten, nor outwardly forgotten, for that, notwithstanding a seruaunt of the Dukes was sodainely accused (I can not say of truth, or vntrely suspected by the Dukes enemyes) of poisoning, sorcery, or inchantment, and there of condemned, and put to tast the paynes of death. The Duke which might not suffer the wrongfull condemnation of his man (as he in hys conscience adiudged) nor yet forbere, nor patiently suffer the vniust handling of hys trusty seruaunt, dayly did oppugne, and wyth ill wordes murmur at the doing thereof. The king much greued and troubled with his brothers dayly complayntes, and continuall exclamation, caused him to be apprehended, & cast into the Tower, where he being taken and adiudged for a traytor, was priuily drowned in a Butte of Walmesey.

But sure it is, that although king Edward were consenting to his death, and destruction, yet he much did both lament hys infortunate chaunce, and repent hys sodayne execution. In as much, that when any person sued to him for pardon or remission, of any malfactor condemned to the punishment of death, he would accustomably say and openly speake, O infortunate brother, for whose lyfe not one creature would make intercession, openly speakyng, and apparantly meaning, by the meanes of some of the nobility he was succummented, and brought to his confusion.

This Duke left behinde him two yong infantes, engendered of the bodie of the daughter to Richard late Erle of Warwicke, which children by destiny, or by their awne merites, folowing the steppes of their auncestors, succeeded them in like infortune, and semblable yll chaunce. For Edwarde hys heire, whome King Edward had created Erle of Warwicke, was. xxiii. yeres after in the time of King Henric the seventh, attainted of treason, and on Tower hill behedded. Margaret his sole daughter was married to sir Richard Pole knight, being much bound to king Henry the seventh, for her aduancement in marriage, beside manifold benefites, by her of him receyued: But most of all obliged to that excellent Prince king Henry the eighth, for restoring her aswell to the name and title of Countesse of Salisbury, as to the possessions of the same: He forgetting the miserable chaunce of her father, and lesse remembering the kindnesse and kindred of her sayd soueraigne Lorde, committed against his maiestie and his realme, abhominable and detestable treason, for the which she was in open Parliament, adiudged and attainted, and sixtie and two yeres after her father was put to death in the Tower, she on the greene within the same place, with an Axe suffered execution. In whole person died the very surname of Plantagenet, which from Geoffrey Plantagenet, so long in the blood roiall of this realme, had flourished and continued. After the death of this Duke, by reason of great heate and butemperate aire, happened so fierce and so quicke a Pestilence, that fiftene yeres warre past, consumed not the thirde part of the people, that onely foure monethes miserably and pitifully dispatched, and brought to their sepulture.

med the rule, gouernaunce, and mariage of the yong Princesse, and Damofell of Burgoyne, but also howe he, what with pollicie, and what with force, had plucked from her the fairest feathers of her taile, that is to meane, whole haute Burgoyne, and the strong townes of Picardie, which in time to come might (as they were very like) happen to proue yll neighbors to the English nation. All these thinges were polittically pondered, and ripely digested by the wise counsaylors of England, which first considered the olde amitie, betwene the house of England and Flaunders, and the dayly entercourse, trafficke and cominutacion, which no small season had bene practised, frequented, and exercised, mutually and friendly betwene the subiectes, and all nations hauyng resort to either of the sayd Countries, save it open before their eyes, that if the french king, either by force or by coniunction of mariage to Charles Erle of Angulesme (to whome he promised his good will, for the obeyning of the yong Princes) should get the bypper hande of the Damofell or of her seignories and dominions, that then damage might ensue to the whole realme of England, both for uttering of their commodities in those partes, and also for the impediment or stop of their entercourse, beside new imposition and gabels, to be set within the sayde Countries, vpon the Marchaunts, their goodes and wares. Wherefore the whole Nobilitie and sage fathers, made humble request to king Edward to helpe and ayde the yong Ladie and Princes of Burgoyne, alleging that as farre as they could perceyue, the mariage of his daughter with the Dolphin, was but dissimuled and fayned, for in the treatie concluded at Picquegnie, betwene him and king Lewys, it was appointed, agreed, and openly sworn, that the french king, within a yere folowing, should send for the Lady Elizabeth, entituled Dolphine of France, to be conueyed into Fraunce, which yere with foure more were passed and gone, without any worde speakyng of her sendyng for, or goyng into Fraunce.

The Queene of Englande also had written in this season to the Ladye Margaret, Duchesse of Burgoyne, for the preferment of her brother Anthoine Erle Riuers, to the mariage of the yong Damofell, but the counsaile of Flaunders, considering that he was but an Erle of a meane estate, and she the greatest enheritricke of all Christendome at that time, gaue but deafe heeryng to so vnnete a request: the which desire, if the Fleminges had but geuen good eare to, or with gentle wordes delayed the suite, shee had both bene succoured and defended with a good number, and not sustained so great losse as shee did. Whether king Edward were not content with this refusall, or that he trusted more the frenche kinges promise, then all his Counsaile coulde see cause, or that he was loth to leese his yerey tribute of fiftie thousande Crownes, he would in no wise consent to sende any armie into Flaunders against the frenche king: But he sent Ambassadors to king Lewys with louing and gentle letters, requiring him to conclude some reasonable peace, or else at the least to take a certaine truce with her at his request.

The Ambassadors of England, were highly receyued, bountifully feasted, and liberally rewarded: But aunswere to their desire had they none, but that shortly the french king would send Ambassadors, hostages, and pledges to the king of England their Maister, for the concluding and performance of all thinges, depending betwene them two: So that their soueraigne Lorde and they, should haue good cause, to be contented and pleased. All these faire wordes, were onely delays to protract time, and in the meane season, to winne towne and countries, from the Damofell, or any ayde or succor could be to her administrated.

A great offer made by the French king to king Edward the fourth.

And beside this, to stave king Edward, from taking parte with her. He wrote to him, that if he would toyne with him in ayde, or personally make warre, in any part of the Ladies territories, or dominions, that then king Edward, shoulde haue, and enioye, to hym and hys heyres, the whole Countye, and Contrey of Flaunders, discharged of all homage, superioritie, and ryght to be claymed by the French kyng, and hys heires and successors, and farther, he shoulde haue the whole Duchie of Brabant, whereof the French kyng offered, at his owne charge and cost, to conquere foure, the chiefe and strongest towne, within the sayde Duchie, and them in quiet possession, to deliuer to the king of Englande, graunting farther to paye to him, tenne thousand Hun- gelles, towarde hys charges, besides municions of warre and Artillerie, which he promised to lende hym, with men and cariage, for the conueyance of the same.

The king of Englande answered, that the towne of Flaunders were of no small strength, nor of no little quantitie, verie vncasie to be kept, when they were conquered: and of no lesse force was the Duchie of Brabant, with whome his subiectes were both loth, and not verie wylling to haue warre there, considering that thether was one of their common traffiques and ventes, of all their Marchandise: But if the French king would make him partener of his conquest in Picardy, rendering to him part of the towne, already gotten and gaped, as Bolcine, Thounstrell, and Abbeville, then he would surely take hys part, and aide him with men at his owne costes and charges. While this matter was in answering, and repliing againe, the French king spoiled the pong Princes of towne and Regions, and of the best Capitaines that her father lett, as the Lorde Cordes and other: wherefore for pure necessitie of aide and strength, shee married with Maximilian, sonne to Frederike the Emperoz, which to his power, sore resisted the French king, for making any inuasions into Flaunders, or other his wifes landes and seignories. This Princesse conceived of her husbände, in the first yere of her marriage, a faire Ladie called Margaret, whome king Lewys so phantised, eyther to haue a publique peace with Maximilian her father, by the which he might stay all warre and hostilitie betwene them, and so by that meane peaceably to enioy the Countries and towne, by him stollen and faintly conquered, or else imagining by that onely damofell, in conclusion to conuey the whole Countrey of Flaunders, and the other dominions thereunto apperteyning to the crowne of Fraunce, (as he had no fewe times, before attempted and assayed.) That he cleerely forgetting his promise made, written, and sworne to the King of Englande, for the marriage of his daughter, solicited priuily the Lordes of Flaunders, to haue the sayde Lady Margaret to be conioyned in matrimonie with the Dolphin his sonne, wytyng and sending to the king of Englande faire promises and flattering letters, when his purpose was cleerely banished out of England and fixed in Flaunders, as you shall hereafter well vnderstande.

King Edward in the xix. yere of his reigne, forgetting as well all exterior inuasions, as ciuill warre, and intestine trouble: which before that time, he had abundantly tasted, and more then he was wylling had both felt and had in continuall experience, began first more then he was before accustomed, to serch out the penall offences, as well of the chiefe of his Nobilitie, as of other Gentlemen, being proprietaries of great possessions, or abundantly furnished in goods, beside Marchaunts and other inferior persons. By the reason whereof, it was of all men adiudged more then doubted, considering his new fame of ryches, and his greedy appetite of money and treasure, that he would proue hereafter a sore and an extreme prince amongst his subiectes, and this imagination in especiall, wandred through the heades of all men, that after his brother the Duke of Clarence was put to death, he should say, that all men should stande and liue in feare of hym, and he to be byrdeled and in doubt of no man. But his newe inuented practise, what for other forrein and outwarde affaires, and what for the shortening of his dayes in this transitorie worlde (which were within two yeres after consumed) toke some, but no great effect. Howbeit experience teacheth, that profperitie often times is as great a trouble as a mischief, and as vniquiet a profite to the possessioners of riches and such as haue the fruition of the same: as pouertie and aduersitie are profitable & laudable, in other persons which can with patient stomach, and meeke hart, beare and suffer the stormes and surges of euill fortune, and peruerse mischaunce.

Here I finde noted that about thys tyme, that one Thomas Iland a Shrieve of London, builded of his owne costes the great Conduyt in Chepe in London.

After this king Edward hauing all things brought to that effect, which he had long desired, except the marriage of his daughter with Charles the Dolphyn, much studied and no lesse desired to haue this affinitie, according to the appoyntment made and concluded, to be accomplished and solemnized, and therefore not only wrote, but sent diuers messengers to the French king for the perfozmaunce of the same. The French king which neuer intended to haue that marriage take effect, considering that the Dolphin, was muche yonger then the Ladie Elizabeth, and for other causes sent Ambassadors to the king of England with faire wordes, and triuolous delays, making hys excuse that he had not sent for the kings daughter to be married to his sonne the Dolphin, according to the league and treatie concluded by the occasion of his great troubles, and busie warres enterprised in high Burgoyne, and the lowe countries, so that he was disgarnished as well of his nobilitie, as of other men of honour to receiue her into his realme, according to her estate and degree: promising faythfully, shortly to sende for her, and to conuey her with such a pompe and royall traine, that it should be to both their honors and laudes, and to the high contentation of the king of England and hys Quene, which he no lesse then her husband desired, and sore longed to see the conclusion of the sayde marriage take effect.

These Ambassadors were well feasted, and lykewise rewarded, and so toke their leaue. And wythin a conuenient season after, he sent other Ambassadors, which were neuer in Englande before, to the entent that if their predecessors, had sayde or concluded any thing, (although they were authorized so to doe) yet if it myght tourne, to the French kings preiudice or damage, they might without blame, excuse themselves by ignorance, of that matter, affirming that they had no commission to common, or else once to enterpryse, to meddle wyth that matter. Or if he perceiued that any thing was like to be concluded, which sounded not to his pleasure or profite, he woulde sende for his Ambassadoz, in great hast, and after sende another, with new instructions nothing depending on the olde.

This fashion kyng Lewys, bled with all Princes, to whome he sent anie Ambassadoz, by the which he compassed many things, to his purpose and to their losse: But most of all, he thus dalyed with the king of Englande concerning this marriage, onely to the entent, to keepe him styll in amytie, aboue all other Princes. And for a truth the king of Englande beyng of no suspicious nature, so much trusted, and gaue to hym so much confidence, that hee thought the Sunne, would soner haue fallen from his circle, than that kyng Lewys, eyther would haue dissimuled, or broken his promise wyth him.

But who soner breaketh promise, then he that is most trusted, or who soner deceiueth, then he to whome most credence is attributed. And on the other part, who is so sone beguiled, as he that least mistrusteth, and who soner falleth, then he that casteth no perill, but as in nothing, mistrustynge, is no small lightnesse, so into much trustynge, is to much folly: wherefore if king Edward had eyther not to much trusted, or mistrusted the French kings sayre promises, (as I woulde he had done in dedde) the Crowne of Fraunce, had not so increased in possessions and dominions, to the great glozy, and strength of that realme, nor the Princes of Burgoyne, had not so bene plucked, harried, and spoyled, of her sayre towncs and Castles as she was, which chaunce, she being destitute of friends, and without comfozt of defenders, by patience perforce, was compelled to suffer and susteyne.

Thus is the league made with Lewys the French king, fraudulently glofed and dissimuled. Thus is the oth made, and swozne vpon the holy Euangelistes, violated, and contrary to the worde, and honor of a Prince, broken and falsified: by which vntreue dealing, and couert dissimuling, with his especiall and trustie friende, all men may easely see, and more apparauntly then in a glasse beholde that the verie naturall condicion of the French nation, is pleasauntly to flatter, plentifully to reward, and gloriously to glorie, till they haue once obteyned, their pretended purpose, and haue their ambitious desire accomplishd and satisfied, and that game once gotten on their side, neither othe holdeth, nor friendship continueth, nor yet humanity and kindnesse before they wed, is once regarded, or of them remembred: wherefore (sayth Hall) mine aduise is, let all men trust them, as they finde them.

And in this verie season, James the thirde of that name king of Scottes, sent into England a solempne Ambassage, for to haue the Lady Cirile, king Edwardes second daughter, to be married to his eldest sonne, James prince of Scotlande, Duke of Rothesay, and Erle of Caricke. King Edward and his counsaile, thinking that this affinitie should be as well honorabile as profitable to the realme, did not onely graunt to his desire and demaund, but also before hande disbursed certaine summes of money, to the onely intent, that the marriage should hereafter neither be interrupted nor broken, vpon this condition that if the sayd matrimony by any fortune or chaunce should in time to come, take no successe nor perfection: or that king Edward would notefie to the king of Scottes or his counsaile, that his pleasure was determined to

haue the sayd marriage, to be infringed and dissolued: Then the Princes and Marchaunts of the towne of Edenborough, should be bound for the reparation of the sayde somme agayne. All which things were with great deliberation concluded & sealed, in hope of continuall peace. But this king James being a man of a sharpe wit, more wedded to his awne opinion then reason would scarce beare, would neither here nor geue credite to them, that spake contrarie to his awne phantastie, or his imagined opinion: And to the intent that no man should finde fault with his doings, or reprehende his actes, he promoted and made counsaylers, men of base linage and lowe bloud, and in especiall Cochzane and his company, by whose euill aduise and mischievous instigation, he so punished and grieued his nobilitie, both with imprisonment, exactions and death, that some of their voluntarie will went into exyle, and other sayning cause to depart, fled into other landes, and strange Countries. For the Duke of Albanie called Alexander, brother to king James, was exiled into Fraunce, but passing through Englande, he taried with king Edward as you shall here. The Erle of Mar a wise and polittique counsayler, was in Edenborough behedded: And beside this he forgetting his othe, promise and affinitie, concluded with king Edward, caused armies to be made into England, spoyling, burning, and kyllyng the kings saythfull subiectes: at the which vnprincely doyng, the king of Englande being not a little moued and chafed, determined to be reuenged on him by battayle and dent of warde. Yet notwithstanding, because king James craftily excusing himselfe, alledging the mischief late committed to be attempted & done without his consent, knowledge, or counsaile, this matter had bene lightly pacified and blowen ouer, if the Duke of Albany being with king Edward, had not incensed and prouoked him to make warre on the Scottish king his brother, both to reuenge the iniuries of late, to the sayde king done, contrarie to all lawes of armes and princely demeanure, and also to helpe to restore the sayde Duke to his possessions and dominions agayne: out of the which he was by the king his brother dispossessed and reiected, promising to king Edward great ayde and assistance, when his armie was once entered into the confines of Scotland.

King Edward beyng thus perswaded by the Duke, and trustynge on his aide, was somewhat agreeable to this: but the inwarde remembraunce how that king James, had supported against him, with men and money, his olde enemy king Henric the sixt: and also trustynge, that if Alexander Duke of Albanie by his ayde should vanquish his brother, and obtaine the Crowne of Scotland, he would be alwayes to him, sure, faithfull, and trustie: whiche did so enflame his courage, and set his heart on fire, that he determined with all diligence, with an armie royall, to inuade the Countrie of Scotland, and make the king to knowe that he had neither honourably nor truly kept his league and promise: wherefore, all the winter season, he mustred his souldiours, prepared his ordinaunce, rigged his shippes, and left nothing apperteyning to the warre vnprucied or vnloked for: so that in the begynnyng of the yere, all thinges were prepared, and no thing was missed.

And when all thinges apperteyning, to the furniture of suche an enterpryce, were put in a redinesse, and redie to be set forwarde: King Edward appointed, to be chieftaine of his host, and Lieutenant generall, his brother

Richard

The king
senoeth a great army
to invade Scotland.

Richard Duke of Gloucester, and to him associated, Henry the fourth Erle of Northumberland, Thomas Lorde Stanley, Lorde Steward of his household, the Lorde Louell, and the Lorde Greystocke, and diuers other noble men and knightes. These valiaunt Capitaines set forward in May, and made such diligence, with pollitique conuepaunce of their souldiours: beside the troubleous cariage of their ordinaunce, that they came to the towne of Alnewicke, in Northumberland, about the beginnyng of July, where they first encamped themselues, and marshalled their hoste. The forward was led by the Erle of Northumberland, vnder whose Standard were, the Lord Scrope of Bolton, sir John Middleton, sir John Richfield, and diuers other knightes, Esquiers and Souldiours, to the number of sixe thousand, and seuen hundred men. In the middle warde was the Duke of Gloucester, and with him the Duke of Albanie, the Lorde Louell, the Lorde Greystock, sir Edward Wooduile, and other, to the number of fiue thousand, and eight hundred men. The Lorde Neuell was appoynted to folowe, accompanied with thre thousand men. The Lorde Stanley, led the wing on the right hand of the Dukes battaile, with foure thousand men, of Lancashire, and Cheshire: The left wing was guided by the Lorde fitz Hewe, sir William a Parre, sir James Harryngton, with the number of two thousand men, & beside all these, there was a thousand men appoynted to geue attendaunce on the ordinaunce. This royall army, not entending to slepe, but to geue the Scots knowlege of their arriual in those parties, came sodainly by the water syde, to the towne of Berwicke, and there what with force, and what with feare of so great an armie, tooke and entered the towne: But the Erle Bothwell, being Capitaine of the Castell, would in no wise deliuer it, neither for flatterynge wordes, nor for manacing bragges: wherfore, the Capitaines deliberately consultyng together, planted a strong siege, and enuironed it round about. When this siege was thus layde, the two Dukes, and all the other Souldiours, except the Lorde Stanley, sir John Clrington, treasurer of the kinges house, sir William a Parre, and foure thousand men, that were left behinde to keepe the siege before the Castell, departed from Barwicke toward Edenborough: And in marchyng thitherward, he burnt and destroyed in Scotland more then .xlviij. townes.

While these thinges were in doynge, King James of Scotland, hauing small confidence in his Commonaltie, & lesse trust in his Nobilitie, did voluntarily enclose himselfe into the strong Castell of Maydens in Edenborough, perfectly trustyng there to be out of all doubts and daunger, except famine, or treason should cause him violently to open the portes or gates: wherfore the Duke of Gloucester entred into the towne, and at the especiall request & desire of the Duke of Albany, saued the towne, & the inhabitants of the same, from fire, blood, and spoyle, takyng onely such presentes as the marchaunts gently offered him, and his Capitaines: Causyng Garter, principall king at armes, to make a publike Proclamacion at the high Crosse, in the Market place of Edenborough, in the which he warned and admonished, James king of Scottes, to keepe, obserue, and performe all such promyses, compactes, couenauntes, and agreementes, as he had concluded and sealed to, with the high and mightie Prince Edward, by the grace of God king of England. &c. And also to make condigne and sufficient recompence to his Subiectes, for the

the great tirannie, spoyle, and crueltie, that he and his people had perpetrate, and committed contrary to his league, within the marches and territories of his Realme of Englande, before the first day of August next ensuyng.

And farther without delay to restore the high & mighty Prince Alexander, Duke of Albany, hys naturall brother to hys estate, and all hys offices, possessions, and authorities, in as ample and liberall maner, as he before occupied and enioyed the same: or else the high and balaunt prince Richard Duke of Gloucester, Lieutenant generall, and chiefetain for the kyng of Englande, was redy at hande to destroy hym, his people and country with slaughter, fyre, and famine.

King James would make no aunswere, neyther by woerde nor by wrytyng, knowyng that his power nowe fayled, either to performe the request demaunded, or to defende his countrie beyng with such a puissant armye invaded. The Lordes of Scotlande, lyng at Haddington wyth a great puissance, hearynge the kyng of Englandes reasonable desire, determined first to prattise wyth the Duke of Gloucester for a peace, and so to haue the castle of Berwicke to their parte and after by some meanes to allure the Duke of Albanie, from the English amitie, and vpon this motion, the .ij. day of August, they wrote to the Duke of Gloucester, that the maryage betwene the Prince of Englande should be accomplished in all poyntes, according to the conuantes agreed, and the instrumentes therof engrossed, requiring farther that a peace from hence forth might be louingly concluded betwene both the Realmes. The Duke of Gloucester wisely and circumspectly certified them agayne, that as touchyng the article of mariage, to take effect betwene their Prince and the Lady Cicilie of England, he knew not the determinate pleasure of the kyng his maister and brother, cyther for the affirmance or denyance of the same, but he desired full restitution of all such summes of money, as for the said mariage before time had bene disbursed, or prested out in loane. And where the sayde Lordes desyred to haue a peace concluded from thenceforth, betwene both the sayde realmes. He first required to haue the Castell of Barwicke to him deliuered, at the least if he did agree to the sayde peace, that then his siege lyng about the sayde Castell, should be hereafter in any wise, neither troubled, vexed, nor molested, nor the king of Scottes, nor none of his subiectes, nor any other by his procurement or prouoking, should ayde, comfort, or assist with bittaille, ordinaunce, or other wyse the Capitaine, Constable, or souldiours of the sayd Castell, duryng the siege.

The Lordes, Prelates, Barons, and estates of the realme of Scotland, perceiyng and well pondering, both the aunswere and the demaundes of the Duke of Gloucester, sent to him sufficiently instructed with these conclusions the reuerend father Andrew, Erle of Murray, and the Lord John Darnell, which thus aunswered, that where the sayde Duke desired repayment of the summes of money deliuered in part of payment for the contract of mariage, to be made betwene the Prince of Scotland, and the kinges daughter of England: the time of lawfull contract of mariage is not yet come, because of the minozitie of the sayde Prince and Princesse. And the fault hereof is, that no day was appoynted for the money, to be payde before the contract began. And if the king your brother would demaund farther assurance, either for the contract to be made, or for the payment of the money, they promise thereunto, unto, according to reason to agree. Secondly as touching the Castell of Barwicke, they sayde, all we knewe well enough, that it is the olde enheritance of the Crowne of Scotland, of many hundreth yeres past, and that our soueraigne Lord hath right therunto. And if it be alleged, that it belonged to the realme of England by conquest, it is well knowen that it standeth in Scotland, and ouer the Scottishe ground. The Duke notwithstanding their sayings, would condescend to no peace, without the Castell of Barwicke were rendered to the king of Englande, and so the Messengers departed, and on the same daye the Archebyschop of Saint Andrewes, the Byschop of Dunkelle Colyn, Erle of Argyle, Lorde Cambell, and Lorde Andrewes, Lorde Auandale, Chauncelour of Scotlande, wrote vnto the Duke of Albanie a solempne and autentical Instrument, signed and sealed wryth their seales, bindyng their bodies, landes, and goodes, to the sayde Duke, that if he would hereafter be obedient to the king of Scottes, and keepe and obserue his fayth and promise to be made to the sayde Lordes, that he should not onely bee restored to all his landes, hereditamentes, offices and possessions, whiche he enioyed at the daye of hys departure out of Scotlande, but also should haue and enioy to him, and his seruantes and familiers, a free and a generall pardon, which restitution and pardon, they likewise promised to be ratified and approued by the King and the three estates assembled at the next Parliament. The Duke beyng glad to be restored againe to his olde estate and possessions, and especially in his aboue native Countre, receyued their offer, which was truly performed, and so tooke his leaue of the Duke of Gloucester, thanking him (as he was no lesse bound) for the great labor, trauaile and paine, that he had taken in his aboue person for his restitution. And promised both by worde, and by wrytyng of his aboue hand to doe and performe all such thinges, as he before that tyme had sworn and promised to king Edward, notwithstanding any agreement, now made or to be made with the Lordes of Scotland: and for the performance of the effect of the sayde Scedule, he againe tooke a corporall othe before the Duke of Gloucester, and sealed the wrytyng the thirde day of August, in the Englishe campe at Lewington, besides Haddington, & departed to his aboue possessions. After he was thus restored and reconciled, the Lordes of Scotland proclaimed him great Lieutenant of Scotland, and in the kinges name made Proclamation, that all men shoulde be readie, vpon paine of death within .viij. dayes at Crauthanes, both to raise the siege before the Castell, and for the recovering againe of the towne of Barwicke. The Duke of Albanie wrote all this preparacion to the Duke of Gloucester, humbly requiring him to haue no mistrust in him, promisyng to keepe his othe and promise, made to King Edward and to him. The Duke of Gloucester wrote to him againe, that it should neither be honozable nor comendable in him, to helpe to raise the siege, at the layng whereof he was counsaylor and partener, nor yet to reward the king of England with such a displeasure for his kindenesse, costes, and expences, to him in his extreme necessitie, louyngly shewed, and liberally exhibited. But he assured him in the worde of a Prince, that if he and all the power of Scotland attempted to come to raise the siege, planted before the Castell of Barwicke, that he himselfe with his armie would defende the besiegers, or else die in the quarell.

The

The counsaile of Scotlande sagely and politiquely sawe before, that if they shoulde come to raise the siege, that the Duke of Gloucester would with them shortly encounter, and that if they lost the fielde, both the strength of the realme was brought to an imbecillitie, the nobles soze minished, and the Castell lost and taken. And on the other side, if they obteyned victoize, nothing was gotten but the poze towne of Barwicke, & they were likely soone to be inuaded wryth a greater powze shortly agayne, wherfore they sent Lyon king at very reasonable, the one was, that if he would promise on hys honoz, to subuert and cast downe the towne walles of Barwicke, they would likewise race, and cleuely deface the walles, Towres, and portes of the Castell, or else the Duke of Gloucester to put in a capytayne, and a garrison of men of warre into the towne, and the Duke of Albanie, likewise to doe with the Castell, for the Tuticion of the same. And farther the forsayde Lion desired an abstinence of warre to be taken, till the two Dukes might haue communication, of thys and other graue matters, concerning the welthes of both the Realmes. The Duke of Gloucester refused both the offers, sayng, that he had long maintained the siege before the Castell of Barwicke, to no small wast and consuming of hys brothers treasure and riches, and to the great trauaile & payne of the Lordes, Gentlemen, and men of warre, that continuallye made there abode and dayly residence, at the sayde siege: wherfore he said, that he in this poynt was firmly resolved, not to departe tyll the castell were yelded by apoyntment, or taken by force, or else his siege were by the power of Scotlande rayled, or he and his armie vanquished: wherfore hee would by no meane harken to the petition of the Scottishe Lordes, concerning the abstinence of warre, tyll he were eyther vanquished or possessed of the Castell of Barwicke. With which aunswere the Herald departed, and thereof made relation to the Lordes and counsaile of Scotlande. When the Dukes aunswere was of them well digested, they evidently perceiuyng that the Castell of Barwicke was the onely maker of the peace, and that the not deliuerie of the same, should be the nozice and continer of warre and hostilitie: consyderyng farther, that the nobilitie nor commons of Scotlande, did not draw together by one line, nor were sorted in one leuell, electyng and chosing the better parte, and reiectyng and auoyding the worse, agreed and determined to deliuer the Castell of Barwicke to the Englishe partie, so that there should be truce or abstinence of warre taken and concluded for a determinate season. And thereupon they sent to the Duke of Gloucester a league indented, which was dated the .xxiiij. day of August, in the yere of our Lorde a .M .CCCC .lxxiiij. in the which it was contracted and agreed betwene the Duke of Gloucester, lieuetenaunt generall for the king of Englande, and Alexander Duke of Albanie, lieuetenaunt for James kyng of Scottes, that an especiall abstinence of warre shoulde be kept and obserued betwixt the realmes of Englande and Scotlande and the people of the same, aswell by sea, as by lande, to begyn the .iiij. day of September next ensuing, & to endure till the fourth day of Nouember, next folowynge. And in the meane season, the towne and Castell of Barwicke, to be occupied, and bee in the reall possession of such as by the kyng of Englandes deputie shoulde be apoynted and assigned with all and singuler such boundes, limites, and territories as the Englishe nacion, last used and possessed, when the Castell and towne were in the subiection of the Englishmen, and all other marches & boundes, beyng in difference betwene the sayde realmes, to stande and to be holden in lyke case and condicion, as they were before the last truce concluded. The Duke of Gloucester, which well perceived that the Scottes more graunted to his demaunds, for reliefe of their owne necessitie, then to gratitie him or the kyng his brother in any poynt: lyke a wise counsayler, toke his aduantage when it was offered, and especially because these things made for his long desired purpose.

struction of the towne & the Castell of

First the deliuey of the Castell of Barwicke, he voluntarilye without counsayle (as a praye priuily gotten) both accepted and alowed, and for that only cause he did not refuse the abstinence of warre but to that gently agreed. As touching the possession, to be kept in the landes dependyng in variance betwene the realmes (commonlye called the batable ground) he woulde not, nor durst not conclude wyth the Duke of Albanie, without hauing farther intelligence of the king hys soueraigne Lordes pleasure and counsaile, meynyng thereby euer to keepe them, as suiters to him, and he no farther to seke on them, and in the meane season to let that matter be in suspence. When he had sealed to the first two Articles, & that they were sent againe to the Lords of Scotlande, they them gladly receiued, and with good will embraced, and lykewise truly performed the same: for the Castell of Barwicke was incontinent deliuered to the Lorde Stanley, and other thereto appointed, which therein put both Englishe men and Artillerie, sufficient for the defence of all Scotlande for .viij. monethes. By this meanes as you haue harde, the Englishmen repoussed agayne the towne and castell of Barwicke, which .xxj. yeres before by kyng Henry the sixt was to the Scottes, as you haue hard, given by & deliuered. And lest peradventure the Duke of Gloucester might thinke that the Duke of Albanie did not in all things set forwarde, preferre, and auance his first requestes, and demaundes, made and required of the Lordes of Scotland, and in especiall one which was for the assurance to be made for the repaiment to the king of Englande, of all such summes of money, as he had before hande prested and disbursed to the kyng of Scottes for the mariage to be solempnised and consummate betwene their childre, as before is reherfed. Therefore the sayde Duke of Albanie caused the Prouost and Burgesles of Edenborough to make a sufficient instrument obligatoye, to kyng Edward, for the true satisfaction and contentation of the same money, which he also sent by the sayde Prouost to the Duke of Gloucester to Alnewyke.

When the Duke of Gloucester had thus obtained his purpose, and receiued writings signed and sealed for the performance of the same, he sent the instruments to kyng Edward his brother, which much comended both his valiant manhood, and also hys prudent pollicy in conueying his businesse, both to his aboue purpose, and also to the profite of the realme. King Edward not a litle mused, and much more debated with his counsayle, whether it were more profitable and honorable to him and his realme, to suffer the sayd mencioned mariage to take effect, and proceede to a conclusion, or else to require a repayment and redeliuey of the summes of money layde out for the same purpose. After long consultation had, and it was considered in what case the realme and the king of Scottes stood in, for it was well known that he and hys hys Nobilitie were at great disorde as you before haue heard: it was considered farther, that if the nobilitie preuayled and gat the souereignie, the lyne and succession of James the thirde were likely to be vtterly extirpate, and disinherited for euer: It was also alleged that the Prince of Scotlande neuer condiscended, nor as he himselfe sayde would agree to this motioned mariage. These things thus debated, the king by great aduise, refused and reuoked all things to be done for the more forwardnesse of the sayde matrimonie, and elected and chose the repayment of all such summes of money, as for the occasion of the sayde betruisted mariage was payde, and before hande contented and deliuered. And according to the wordes of the obligation, made by the towne of Edenborough, he sent Garter hys principall king at Armes and Northumberlande Herault, to declare and intimate to the Prouost and Burgesles of Edenborough, the determinate refusall of the matrimonie, and the election and choise of the repayment of the money and duety. And for the farther ouerture of the whole conclusion, Garter was instructed by wytyng what he should saye and declare: and so by conuenient iourneys came to the towne of Edenborough, eyght dayes before the feast of all Saintes, where he openly sayde as foloweth: I Garter king at armes, seruaunt, protectour and messenger vnto the most high and mightie prince, my most dread soueraigne Lorde, Edward by the grace of God, King of Englande and of Fraunce, and Lorde of Ireland, by vertue of certaine letters of procuracie here redie to be shewed by mee, by my sayde soueraigne Lorde made and geuen, make notice and geue knowlege vnto you Prouost, Burgesles, Marchauntes and communalte of the towne of Edenborough in Scotland, that where as it was sometime commoned & agreed, betwene my sayde soueraigne Lorde on the one partie, and the right high and mightie prince James king of Scottes on the other party, that mariage and matrimonie should haue bene solempnised and had betwene James the first begotten sonne of the sayd king of Scottes, and Ladie Cicilie daughter to my sayde soueraigne Lorde the king of England. And for the sayde mariage to haue bene performed, certain and diuers great summes of money, haue bene payde and contented by my sayde soueraigne Lord: which summes of money in case of refusall of the sayde mariage, by my sayde soueraigne Lorde to be made and declared, ye the said Prouost, Burgesles, Marchauntes and communalte, and euery one of you are bounde and obliged by your letters vnder your common seale of your towne of Edenborough, to repaye vnto hys highnesse vnder like forme, and at such termes as they were first payde. So that the king my soueraigne Lorde woulde make notice and knowlege of his pleasure and election, in taking or refusing of the sayde mariage, of the repayment of the sayde summes of money, before the feast of Allhalowes next to come, lyke as in your sayde letters, bearing date at Edenborough the fourth day of August last past, it was conteyned all at large. The pleasure and election of my sayde soueraigne Lorde, for diuers causes and considerations him moouing, is to refuse the accomplishment of the sayde mariage, and to haue the repayment of all such summes of money, as by occasion of the sayde betruisted mariage, his highnesse had payde. The sayde repayment to be had of your Prouost, Burgesles, Marchauntes, and communalte, and euery of you, your heires and successours, according to your bond and obligation gation afore rehearsed. And therefore I geue you notice and knowlege by this wryting, which I deliuer to you within the terme in your saide letters lymitted and expressed to all entents and effects, which thereof may ensue.

When Garter had thus declared all things geuen to him in charge, the Brouost or other Burgeses made aunswere, that they nowe knowing the kings determinate pleasure, would accordyng to their bonde, prepare for the repayment of the sayde summes, and gently entertayning Garter conueyed him to Barwike, from whence he departed to newe Castell, to the Duke of Gloucester, making relation to him of all his doings, which Duke with all speede returned to Sheryhutton, and there abode. Shortly after Garters departing, the Duke of Albanie, thinking to obteyne agayne the high fauour of the king his brother, deliuered him out of captiuitie and prison, wherein he had a certaine space continued (not without the Dukes assent, which besieged him in the Castell of Edenborough a little before) and set him at large, of whome outwardly he receyued great thanks, when inwardly nothing, but reuenging and confusion was in the kings stomach incorporate, so that shortly after in the kings presence, he was in leopordie of his life, & all improuided for dread of death enforced to take a small Balinger & to saile into Fraunce, where shortly after ryding by the men of armes, which encountered at the Tilt, by Lewys then Duke of Orleans, after French king, he was with mischarging of a speare, by fortunes peruerse countenance pittifully slayne and brought to death, leauing after him one onely sonne named John, which being banished Scotlande, enhabited and married in Fraunce, and there died. How sorrowfull is it to wryte, and to remember the chaunces and infortunites that happened within two yere in England and Scotlande, betweene naturall brethren. For king Edward set on by such as enuid the estate of the Duke of Clarence, forgetting nature, and brotherly friendship, consented to the death of hys sayde brother. James king of Scottes, putting in obliuion that Alexander his brother was the onely Organe and instrument by whome he obteyned libertie and freedom, seduced and led by hyle and malicious persons, which maligned at the glory and indifferent iustice of the Duke of Albanie, imagined and compassed his death and exiled him for euer: what a pernicious Serpent, and what a pestiferous Scorpion is that deuillish whelp, called priue Enuie? Agaynst it no fortreffe can defend nor caue can hide, no wood can shadowe, nor foule can escape, nor no beast can auoyde, her payson is so strong.

Wherefore let euery indifferent person searche histories, read Chronicles, looke on authours, as well holy as prophane, and they shall apparantly perceyue, that neyther open warre, daylie famine, nor accustomed mortalitie, is not so much an enemy, nor so great a Malice to destroye, and ouerthrowe high power and Nobilitie, as is rooted malice, inward grudge, and dissimuled hatred.

Although that king Edward were glad & ioyous of all the prosperous successe of all enterprizes in the realme of Scotlande, yet euen now hys feuer tercian, of the which he had languished sore, sithe hys boyage royall into Fraunce, was sodainely turned into a vncurable quartain: For where he was before tossed betweene hope and dispaire, that the matrimonie of hys daughter and Charles the Dolphyn, should come to the solempnization, ac-

cordyng to the league, betwene him & the french king, concluded at Picquene: Now he was out of all doubt. For the Lorde Haward which was returned out of Fraunce, with many faire wordes & painted promises but without tribute or conclusion of the mariage, certified the king of his awne knowlege: howe that he beyng present, sawe the Ladie Margaret of Austriche, daughter to Duke Maximilian, sonne to the Emperour Fredericke, receyued into Fraunce, with pompe more then Emperiall, by the Duke of Bourbon, the Lorde Delabret, and many other Lords and magistrates of the realme, and so with great triumph, conueyed to Amboise, where the Dolphyn laye, and there was to him contracted and espoused.

King Edward now beyng certein, how the French king had with pleasant language, & colourable aunsweres, foded him forth, and allured him to geue credence, to his dissimulyng wordes, neither meanyng as he sayde, nor shewyng what he ment, determined with himselfe, no longer to suffer so apparant wrong, nor so intollerable an iniurie. Wherefore, he called his Nobilitie together, and declared to them the manifolde wrong, which he had receyued of late at the handes of the French king, and howe he vntreuly and vnprinckly, had broken the league and amitie, aswell in denyng the paymēt of the tribute, as also in refusyng the accomplishment of the mariage of his daughter, accordyng as in the treatie was concluded. Requiryng them therefore to studie how to reuenge and punish so great a villanie, offered to their native Countrie. The nobilitie not a little glad of this mocion, aunswered: that their whole desyre was to fight with the French men, whome they often times had banquished, and ouercome in battaile, and that for the dignitie and fame of their Countrie, they would let nothing be vnattempted, offering him in an instant, to be redie in harnesse, to fulfill his minde and desire. When the king knewe the towarde myndes of his subiectes of the Temporalitie, he moued the Spiritualitie (because by the ecclesiasticall lawes, they be prohibited to weare armure) to ayde him with money, for maintenaunce of his warres, & suppressyng of his enemies, who also condiscended to his request.

And in this yere I find noted that Edmond Shaw Goldsmith who had bene Mayor of London, of his awne costs redefied Cripple gate in London.

But now behold, while king Edward was intentiue, & employed his whole labor diligence, and industerie, to furnishe & set forward this warre, which he newly had attempted & begon: whether it was with the melancholy, & anger that he toke with the French king, for his vntreuth and vnkindnesse, or were

The description of King Edward the fourth.

King Edward of that name the fourth, after that he had liued .liij. yeres and .viij. monethes, and .viij. dayes, and had reigned king .xiiij. yeres, one moneth & .viij. daies, as is afore expressed, died at Westminster the .ix. day of April, the yere of our redemption .1483. leauing much sayre issue, that is to witte. Edwarde the Prince .xiiij. yeres of age: Richarde Duke of Yorke two yeres yonger, Elizabeth whose fortune and grace was after to be Queene, wyfe vnto King Henry the .viij. and mother vnto King Henry the .viii. Cicilie not so fortunate as sayre: Biget, which representyng the vertue of her, whose name she bare, professed and obserued a religious life in Dertforde a house of close Nonnes: Anne that was after honorablye maryed vnto Thomas then Lorde Hawarde, and after Erle of Surrye, and Katheryn which long tyme tossed in eyther fortune, sometyne in wealth, and often in aduersitie, at the last, if this be the last (for yet she lyueth) is by the beningtye of her fephewe king Henry the eyght in very prosperous estate, and worthy her birth and vertue.

After that this noble Prince was deceased at Westminster as afore sayde, he was wyth great funerrall honor and heauynesse of his people from thence conueyed and enterred at Windsor. A kyng of such gouernance and behauior in tyme of peace (for in warre each part must be others enemye) that there was neuer any prince of this lande attayning the Crowne by battayle, so heartily beloued with the substance of the people: nor he himselfe so specially in any part of his lyfe, as at the tyme of his death. Which fauour and affection yet after his death, by the crueltie, mischief and trouble of the tempestuous worlde that folowed, highly towarde him more encreased. At such tyme as he dyed, the displeasure of them that bare him grudge for King Henries sake the sirt, whom he deposed was well asswaged, & in effect quenched, in that that many of them were dead in more then .xx. yeres of his reigne (a great part of a long lyfe) and many of them in the meane season growen into his fauor, of which he was neuer straunge. He was a goodly personage and very princely to beholde: Of hart couragious, pollitique in counsayll, in aduersitie nothing abashed, in prosperitie rather ioyful then proude, in peace, iust and mercifull, in warre, sharpe and fierce, in the felde, bolde and hardye, and nathelasse no farther then wisdom would, aduenturous, whose warres whoso well consider, he shall no lesse commend his wisdom where he boyded, then his manhood where he banquished. He was of bisage louely, of body mightie, strong and cleane made, howbeit in his later dayes with ouer liberal diet, somewhat corpulent and bowzelye, and nathelasse not vncomelye. He was in youth greatly geuen to fleshy wantonnesse: From which health of bodye in great prosperitie and fortune without a speciall grace hardlye refrayneth. This faulte not greatly greued the people: for neyther could any one mans pleasure, stretch and extende to the displeasure of very many, and was without violence, and ouer that in hys later dayes blessed and well left. In which tyme of his later dayes, this realme was in quiet & prosperous estate, no feare of outward enemyes, no warre in hande, nor none towarde, but such as no man looked for. The people towarde the Prince not in a constrained feare, but in a willyng and louyng obedience among themselves, and the commons in good peace. The Lordes whome he knew at baryaunce, himselfe in his death bed appeased. He hadde left all gatheryng of money (which is the onely thyng that wythdraweth the hartes of the Englishe men from the Prince) nor any thing entred he to take in hand by which he should be dyuen thereto: for his tribute out of fraunce hee had before obtayned. And the yere fore goyng his death he had obtayned the towne of Bartwike, And albeit that all the tyme of his reigne, he was with his people so benigne, courtesie, and so familiar, that no part of his vertues was more esteemed, yet that condicion in the ende of his dayes (in which many princes by a long continued souereintye decline to a proude port from debonayr behauior of their begynnynge) inuicelouslie in him grew and encreased: so farforth that in the Sommer last that euer he sawe, his highnesse beyng at Wyndsoz in hunting sent for the Maior and Aldermen of Londo vnto him, for none other arrand but to haue them hunt, and to be mery with him, where he made them not so stately, but so friendly & so familiar cheere, & sent venison from thence so frely into the Citie, that no one thing in many dayes before gat him moe harts, or more hartie fauor among the common people, which oftentimes more esteem, and take for great kindnesse a little courtesye then a great benefite. So deceased as I haue saide, this noble kyng, in that tyme, in which his lyfe was most desyred, whose loue of hys people and entier affection towarde hym, had bene to his noble chyldren (hauing in themselves also as many giftes, of nature, as many princely vertues, as much goodlye towardnesse as theyr age could receiue) a merueilous fortesse and sure armor, if deuision, and dissension of their friendes, had not vnarmed them, and left them destitute, and the execrable desyre of souereintie; prouoked him to their destruction, which if either kind, or kindnesse had holden place, must nedes haue bene their chiefe defence. For Richarde the Duke of Glocester, by nature their vncle, by office their protectoz, to their father beholden, to themselves by oth and allegaunce bounden, all the bandes broken, that bindeth man and man together without respect of God or the worlde, vnaturally contruyed to bereue them, not onely of their dignitie, but also of their lyues. But forasmuch as this demeanoz ministreth in effect all the whole matter, whereof this speciall storye shall intreate, it is therfore conuenient somewhat to shewe you ere we farther go, what maner of man this was that coulde fynde in his hart so much mischief to conceiue.

Richard Duke of Yorke, a noble man and a mightie, began not by warre but by lawe to chalenge the Crowne, puttyng his clayme into the Parliament, where his cause was either for right or fauor so farforth aduanced, that king Henry his blood (albeit he had a goodly Prince) vtterly reiected, the Crowne was by auctoritie of Parliament entayled vnto the Duke of Yorke and his issue male in remainder immediately after the death of king Henry. But the Duke not induryng so long to tary, but entending vnder pretext of dissention and debate arising in the realme, to preuent his tyme, and to take vpon him the rule in king Henryes life, was with many Nobles of the realme at Wakefelde slaine, leauyng thre sonnes, Edward, George, and Richard. All thre as they are great states of birth, so were they great & stately of stomacke, gredie, and ambitious of aucthoritie, and impacient of partners.

George Duke of Clarence was a noble Prince, and at all poyntes fortunate, if either his awne ambition had not set him agaynst his brother, or the enuy of his enemyes, his brother agaynst him. For were it by the Queene and the Lordes of her blood, which highly maligned the kinges kindred (as women commonly not of malice, but of nature hate them tohome theyr husbandes loue) or were it a proude appetite of the Duke himselte entenyng to be king: at the last heynous treason was there layd to his charge, and finally were he faultie or faultlesse, attainted was he by Parliament, and iudged to the death, and therebpon hastily drowned in a Butte of Malmesie (as is aforesayde) whose death king Edward (albeit he commaunded it) when he wist it was done, pitifully bewayled it, and sorrowfully repented it.

Richard the thirde sonne, of whome we nowe intreate, was in wit and courage egall with either of them, in bodie and prowesse farre vnder them both, little of stature, euill featured of limnes, crooke backed, his left shoulder much higher then his right, hard fauoured of visage, and such as is in states called warlike, in other men, otherwise, he was malicious, wrathfull, enuyous, and from afoze his birth euer froward. It is for truth reported, that the Duches his mother had so much a do in her trauaile, that she could not be deliuered of him bncut: and that he came into the world with the feete forward, as men be borne outward, and (as the same runneth) also not vntoethed: whether men of hatred report about the truth, or else that nature chaunged her course in his beginnyng, which in the course of his life many thinges vnaturally committed, I cannot tell. None euill Capitaine was he in the warre, as to the which his disposicion was moze meetly then for peace. Sundry victories had he, and sometyme ouerthrowes, but neuer in default as for his awne person, either of hardinesse or of pollitique order: free was he called of dispence, and somewhat about his power liberall: with large giftes he gate him bnfedfast friendship, for which he was faine to pill and spoyle in other places, which gat to himselte stedfast hatred: He was close and secret and a depe dissimuler, lowly of countenance, arrogant of heart, outwardly compisable where he inwardly hated, not lettynge to kisse whome he thought to kill: despiteous & cruell, not for euill will alway, but oftener for Ambicion, and either for the suretie or the encrease of his estate: friend and foe was much what indifferent vnto him: where his aduantage grew, he spared no mannes death, whose life withstoode his purpose. He stue with his awne handes king Henry the first beyng prisoner in the Tower of London, as men constantly say, and that without commaundement or knowlege of the king, which would vndoubtedly, if he had entended that thing, haue appoynted that Butcherly office to some other then to his awne borne brother. Some wyle men also weene that his drift couertly conueyed, lacked not in helpyng forth his brother Duke of Clarence to his death: which he resisted openly, how be it somewhat (as men demed) moze faintly then he that were hartily mynded to his

to his welth. And they that thus deeme, thinke that he long time in king Edwardes life foze thought to be king, in case that his brother (whose lyfe he looked that euill diet should shorten) should happen to decrease (as in dede he did) while his children were yong. And they deme that for this intent, he was glad of his brothers death the Duke of Clarence, whose life must nedes haue hindered him so entenyng, whether the same Duke of Clarence had kept him true to his nephew the yong king, or enterprised to be king himselte. But of all this matter concernyng the Duke of Clarence, there is no certeinie, and whoso deuineth vpon coniectures, may as well shote to farre, as to short. Howbeit this I haue by credible informacion learned, that the selfe night in which king Edward died, one Hittlebrooke long before morning came in great haste to the house of one Pottier, dwelling in Redcrose streete without Crepelgate: And when he was with hastie rapping quickly letten in, he shewed vnto Pottier that king Edward was departed: by my troth man quod Pottier, then will my maister the Duke of Gloucester be king. What cause he had so to thinke, hard it is to say, whether he beyng towards him any thing knewe that he such a thing purposed, or otherwise had any inckelyng therof: for he was not likely to speake it of naught.

But nowe to retorne to the course of this historie, were it that the Duke of Gloucester had of olde fozenynded this conclusion, or was now at earst therevnto moued, and put in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the yong Princes his nephewes (as oportunitie and likelihood of speede, putteth a man in courage of that he neuer entented) certeinie it is that he contriued their destruction, with the vsurpacion of the Regall dignitie vpon himselte. And forasmuche as he well wylled, and holpe to maintaine a long continued grudge and heart brennyng betweene the Queenes kindred and the Kings blood, either partie enuyng others aucthoritie, he now thought that their deuision should be (as it was in dede) a fortherly beginnyng to the pursuite of his entent, and a sure ground for the foundation of all his buyldyng, if hee might first vnder the pretence of reuengyng, abuse the anger and ignorauce of the one partie, to the destruction of the other: and then winne to his purpose as many as he could: and those that could not be wonne, might be lost ere they looked therfore. For of one thing was he certaine, that if his entent were perceyued, he should soone haue made peace with both the parties, wylth his awne blood.

King Edward in his life albeit that this discention betweene his friends somewhat pzed him, yet in his good health he somewhat the lesse regarded it, because he thought whatsoener businesse should fall betweene them, himselte should alway be able to rule both the parties. But in his last sicknesse, when he perceaued his naturall strength so fore enfeebled, that he dispaired of all reeuery, then he considering the youth of his children, albeit he nothing lesse mistrusted then that which happened, yet well foze seing that many harynes might grow by their debate, while the youth of his children should lack discretion of themselues, and good counsayle of their friends, of which either party would counsayle for their awne commoditie, and rather by pleasant aduise to winne themselues fauour, then by profitable aduertisement to doe the children good, he called some of them before him that were at variance, and in especiall the Lozde Marques Dorset the Queenes sonne by her first husbnde, and Richard the Lorde Hastings a noble man, then Lorde Chamberleyn, agaynst whome the Quene especially grudged, for the great fauour the king bare him, and also for that she thought him secretly familiar with the king in wanton company. Her kindred also bare him sore, as well for that the king had made him Capitaine of Calice, which office the Lorde Ryuers, brother to the Quene claymed of the kings former promise, as for diuers other great giftes which he receyued, but they looked for. When these Lordes with diuers other of both the parties were come in presence, the king lifting by himselfe, and vnder set with pillowes, as it is reported, sayde on thys wise vnto them.

My Lords, my dere kinsmen and alies, in what plight I now lye, you see, & I well fee: by which the lesse while I loke to liue with you, the more deeply am I moued to care in what case I leaue you, for suche as I leaue you, such are my children lyke to finde you. Which if they should as God forbid, finde you at variaunce, might hap themselues to fall at warre, ere their discretion would serue them to set you at peace. See see their youth, of which I reckon the onely suretie to rest in your concord. For it sufficeth not that all you loue them, if eche of you hate other. If they were men, your faithfulness would happily suffice: but childhood must be mainteyned by mens auctoritie, & slipper youth vnder propped with elder counsaile, which neither can they haue, but you geue it, neither can you geue it, if ye agree not. For where eche laboureth to breake that the other maketh, and where hatred is of eche others counsaile, there must it needes be long ere any good conclusion go forwarde. And also while eyther partie laboureth to be chiefe, flatterie shall haue more place, then plaine and faithfull aduise, of which must needes ensue the euill bringing by of the Prince, whose minde in tender youth infect, shall redily fall to mischief and ryot, and draw downe this noble realme to ruine, but if grace turne him to wisdom: which if God send, then they that by euill pleased him before best, shall after fall farthest out of fauour, so that euer at the last, euill drifts driue to naught, and good playne waies prosper. Great variaunce hath there long bene betwene you, not alway for great causes. Sometime a thing right well entended, oure misconstruction turneth it to worlde: or a smal displeasure done vnto vs, either our awne affection or euill tonges maketh it much more grieuous. But this wot I wel, & ye neuer heretofore had so great cause of hatred, as ye haue now of loue. That we be al me and all christen men, this will I leaue vnto preachers to tell you (& yet I wot not whether any preachers words ought more to moue you, then his that is by and by goyng to the place that they all preach off.) But this shall I desire you to remember that the one part of you is of my bloud, the other of mine alies, & ech of you with other eyther of kindred or affinity, which spiritual kindred of affinity, if the sacraments of Christes church beare that weight with vs, that I would God they did, should no lesse moue vs to charitie, then the respect of fleschly consanguinitie. Our Lorde forbid that ye loue together the worlde for the selfe same cause that ye ought to loue together the better. And yet that happeneth sometime: and no where finde we so deadly debate as among them which by nature and lawe, ought most best to agree together: Such a pestilent Serpent is ambition, and desire of vaine glorie and soueraigntie, which among states where he once entereth, creepeth so farre forth, till with diuision and variaunce he turneth all to mischief. First longing to be next to the best: Afterward egall with the best, and at the last chiefe and aboue the best. Of which immoderate appetite of worship, and thereby of debate and discention, what losse, what sorowe, what trouble hath within these fewe yeres growen in this realme, I praye God as well to forget, as we well remember. Which things if I could as well haue foreseene as I haue with my more pain then pleasure proued: By Gods blessed Ladie (that was euer his othe) I would neuer haue wonne the curtesie of so many mens knees with the losse of so many mens heads. But sithence things passed cannot be called agayne, much ought we the more to beware, by what occasion we haue taken so great hurt before, that we eftsones fall not into that occasion of daunger againe. Now be those griefes passed, & al is (God be thanked) quiet, and likely right well to prosper in wealthfull peace vnder your Cousins my children, if God send them lyfe and you loue. Of which two things the lesse losse were they, by whome though God bid his pleasure, yet should the realme alway finde kings, and paradiuenture as good kings. But if you among your selues in a chilles raigne fall at debate, many a good man shall perishe, and happily he to, and ye to, or this land finde peace agayne: wherefore in these last wordes that euer I looke to speake to you or with you, I exhort and require you all for the loue that ye haue euer borne to me, for the loue that I haue euer borne to you, and for the loue that our Lorde and sauiour Christ beareth to vs all, from this time forward, all griefes forgotten, eche of you loue other. Which I verily trust you wil, if you any thing earthly regard, either God or your king, affinity or kindred, this realme your awne Countrie, or your awne suretie. And therewithall the king not able to endure any lenger to sit by, layd him downe on his right side, his face toward them: and none was there present that could refrain from weeping. But the Lordes comforting him with as good wordes as they could, and answering for the time, as they thought to stand with his pleasure, there in his presence, as by their wordes appered, eche forgave other, and ioyned their hands together, when (as it after appered by their deedes) their hartes were farre a sunder.

Asone as the king was departed, Edward the Noble Prince his sonne drewe towardes London, which at the time of his fathers decease, kept his house at Ludlow in Wales: which Countrie being farre of from the lawe and recourse to iustice, was begonne to be farre out of good rule and wahren wynde, so that Robbers and Ryuers walked at libertie vncorrected. And for this encheason the Prince was in the life of his father sent thether, to the ende that the auctoritie of his presence, should refraine euil disposed persons from the boldnesse of their former outrages. And to the gouernaunce and ordering of this yong Prince at his sending thether, was there appointed Syr Anthony Wooduile Lorde Ryuers and brother to the Quene, a right honorable man, as balyaunt of hande as pollitique in counsaile. And there were adioyned vnto him other of the same party, and in effect euery one as he was neere of kinne vnto the Queene, so was he planted nere about the Prince. That drift was by the Queene not vntwisely deuised, whereby her bloud might in the youth of the Prince be rooted in his fauour. But all thys the Duke of Gloucester turned vnto their destruction, and vpon that ground he set the foundation of all his vnhappy building. For whome soeuer he perceaued

ued cyther at variance with them, or bearing himselfe their fauour, he brake vnto them, some by mouth, some by wytyng and secret messengers, that it neither was reason, nor in any wise to be suffred, that the yong King their maister and kinsman should be in the hands and custody of his mothers kindred, sequestred in maner from their company and attendance, of which euery one of them ought him as faithfull seruice as they, and many of them of farre moze honorable part of kinne then his mothers side: whose bloud (quod he) sauing the kinges pleasure, was full vnmeete to be matched with hys: which now to be as who saye remoued from the king, and the lesse noble to be left about him, is (quod he) neither honorable vnto his maiestie, nor vnto vs, and also to his grace no suretie to haue the mightiest of his friendes from him, and vnto vs no little ieopardie to suffer our well proued euill willers to growe in ouer great aucthoritie with the Prince in his youth, namely which is light of beliete and sone perswaded. Ye remember I trow King Edward himselfe, albeit he was a man of age & discretion, yet was he in many things ruled by the bende, moze then stode cyther with his honoz or our profite, or with the comodity of any man else, except only the immoderate aduancement of themselves: which whether they thurst after their awne weale, or our woe, it were hard I wene to gesse. And if some folkes friendship had not holden better place with the king then any respect of kindred, they might easely haue trapped and brought to confusion some of vs or thys: and why not as easely as they haue done some already, as nere of his royall bloud as we are? But our Lorde hath wrought his will, and thanks be to his grace that perill is past. Howbeit, as great is growyng, if we suffer thys yong king in our enemies hande, which wythout his witting might abuse the name of hys commaundement to any of our vndoing, which thing God and good prouision forbid. Of which good prouision none of vs hath any thing the lesse neede for the late made attonement, in which the kinges pleasure had moze place, then the partie willes. Nor none of vs I beleue is so vnwise or ouersene, to trust a newe friend made of an olde foe: Or to thinke that an hourely kindnesse, sodainely contract in one houre continued, should be deeper settled in their stomackes, then a long accustomed malice many yeres rooted.

With these wordes and wytynges, and such other, the Duke of Gloucester soone set on fire them that were of themselves ethe to kinde, and in especially twaine, Edward Duke of Buckingham, and Richard Lorde Hastings and Chamberlanie, both men of honour and of great power. The one by long succession from his auncestrie, the other by his office, and the kinges fauour. These two not veryng eche to other so much loue, as hatred both vnto the Quenes part: in this poynt accorded together with the Duke of Gloucester, that they would bitterly amoue from the kinges companie all his mothers friendes, vnder the name of their enemyes. This beyng concluded, the Duke of Gloucester vnderstandyng that the Lordes which were about the king, entended to bring him by to his coronacion, accompanied with suche power of their friendes that it should be hard for him to bring his purpose to passe, without the gatheryng and assemble of people, and in maner of open warre, whereof he wist the ende was doubtfull, and in which the king beyng on their side, his part should haue the face and name of a rebellion: He secretly therefoze by diuers meanes, caused the Queene to be perswaded and brought brought in minde, that it neither was neede, and also shoulde be ieopardous the king to come by so strong. For where as now euery Lord loued other, and none other thing studied vpon, but about the coronacion and honoz of the king: If the Lordes of her kindred should assemble in the kinges name much people, they should geue the Lordes an occasion, betwene whome had bene before some debate, to feare and suspect, least they should gather this people, not for the kinges sauegard, whome no man impugned, but for their destruction, hauyng moze regarde to their olde variaunce, then to their newe attonement: For which cause they should assemble on the other partie much people againe for their defence, whose power she wist well stretched farre, and thus should all the realme fall on a roare. And of all the hurt that thereof should ensue, which was likely not to be little, and the most harme there like to fall where she lest would, all the world would put her & her kindred in the wight, and say that they had vnwisely and vntuly also broken the amitie and peace that the king her husband had so prudently made betweene his kin and hers in his death bed, and which the other partie faythfully obserued.

The Queene beyng in thus wise perswaded such woerde sent vnto her soune, and vnto her brother beyng about the king, and ouer that, the Duke of Gloucester himselfe and other Lordes the chiefe of his bend, wrote vnto the king so reuerently, and to the Quenes friendes there so louingly, that they nothing earthly mistrustyng, brought the king by in great haste, but not in good speede, with a small companie. Now as the king passed towarde London, from the towne of Northampton, leauyng behinde him the Lorde Ryuers, the kinges vnckle, who thought the next day to be with the king at Stony Stratforde, ten miles from thence, thether came the Dukes of Gloucester, and Buckingham. So was there made that night much friendly cheere betwene these Dukes, and the Lorde Ryuers, a great while. But incontinently that they were openly departed with great courtisie, and the Lord Ryuers lodged, the Dukes secretly, with a fewe of their most priuie friendes, set them downe in counsaile, wherein they spent a great part of the night. And at their risyng in the dawnyng of the day, they sent about priuily vnto their seruantes in their Innes and lodgynges, geuing them commaundement to make them selues quickly redie, for their Lordes were redie to horsebacke. Upon which Messages many of their folkes were attendant, when many of the Lord Ryuers seruantes were vnreadie. The Dukes also at that tyme, had taken the keyes of their Inne into their custodie, that none should passe forth without their license. And also in the highway towarde Stonie Stratforde, where the king lay, they had bestowed certaine of their folke to stoppe the passage, that no person shoulde passe from Northampton towarde Stonie Stratforde, but should be either stayed, or compelled to retorne againe, vntill they shoulde geue other licence: because sayd they, that the Dukes themselves entended for the shewe of their diligence, to be the first that should attend that day vpon the kinges highnesse out of that towne: thus bare they folke in hande.

But when the Lorde Ryuers vnderstode the Gates to be closed, and the wayes on euery syde beset, neither his seruantes, nor himselfe suffered once to go out, and perceuyng well that so great a thing without his knowledge could not be begon for naught, comparvng also with himselfe this maner of doynge present, with the last nightes cheere, in so fewe houres, so great a chaunge, which he maruclously misliked. Howbeit, sith he could not get away, and to keepe himselfe close he would not, least he should seeme to hide himselfe for some secreete feare of his awone fault, whereof he saide he had cause in himselfe, he determined vpon the suretie of his awone conscience to go boldly vnto them, and to inquire what this matter did meane. Whom assone as they saw, they began to quarrell with him, and sayde, that he extended to set distaunce betwene the king and them, and to bring them to confusion, but it should not lie in his power. And when he began, as he was a verie well spoken man, in goodly wise to excuse himselfe, they taried not the ende of his answer, but shortly tooke him and put in ward, and that done went forthwith to horsebacke, and tooke the way to stonie Stratford, where they found the king with his companie readie to scape on horsebacke, and to depart forward and to leaue that lodgyng for them, because it was to streight for both companies. And assone as they came in his presence, they light downe with all their companie about them. To whome the Duke of Buckingham sayde, go afoze Gentlemen, and yomen, kepe your rowmes. And thus in a goodly aray they came to the king, & on their knees in humble wise saluted his grace, which receyued them in verie ioyous and amiable maner, nothing earthly knowyng nor mistrustyng as yet: But euen by and by in his presence, they picked a querell to the Lorde Richard Gray the kinges other brother by his mother, sayng that the Lorde Marques his brother, and the Lorde Ryuers his Uncle, had compassed to rule the king and the realme, and to set variance among the states, and to subdue and destroy the noble blood of the realme. Toward the accomplishyng whereof, they sayde that the Lorde Marques had entred into the Tower of London, and thence taken out the kinges treasure, and sent men to the sea. All which thinges these Dukes wist well, were done for good purposes, and necessary by the counsaile at London, sayng that somewhat they must say. Unto which wordes the king answered, what my brother Marques hath done, I cannot tell: But in good fayth I dare well answer for my Uncle Ryuers, and my brother here, that they be innocent of any such matters. Yea my leege, quod the Duke of Buckingham, they haue kept their dealyng in these matters farre from the knowlege of your good grace. And forthwith they arrested the Lorde Richard Gray, and sir Thomas Vaughan knight, in the kinges presence, and brought the king and all backe vnto Northampton, where they tooke againe further counsaile. And there they sente away from the king whome it pleased them, and set newe seruautes about him, such as liked better them then him. At which dealyng the king wept, but it booted not. And at dinner the Duke of Gloucester sent a dishe from his awone table to the Lorde Ryuers, prayng him to be of good cheere, all should be well enough. And he thanked the Duke, and prayed the messenger to beare it to his Nephew the Lorde Richard Gray, with the same message for his comfort, as one to whom such aduersitie was straunge: But himselfe had bene in all his dayes imbred therewith, and therefore could beare it the better. But for all this comfortable curtise of the Duke of Gloucester, he sent the Lorde Ryuers, and the Lorde Richard, with sir Thomas Vaughan into the North Countrie to diuers places into prison, and afterwarde, they were all sent to Pomfret Castell, where in the ende they were beheaded.

In this wise the Duke of Gloucester tooke vpon him selfe the order and gouernance of the yong kyng, whome with much honoz and humble reuerence, he conueyed vnto the Citie of London. But auone the tidyngs of this matter came hastily to the Queene a litte before the midnight followyng, and that in the sozest wise, that the kyng her sonne was taken, her brother, her sonne, and her other friends arested, and sent, no man wist whether, to be done wyth, God wot what. With which tidynges, the Queene in great flight, and heauinesse, bewailyng her childes reigne, her friends mischaunce, and her owne infortune, cursyng the time that euer shee was disswaded the gatheryng of power about the king, gotte her selfe in all the hast possible wyth her yong sonne and her daughters out of the palaice of Westminster, in which she them lay, into the Sanctuarie, lodgyng her selfe and her company there in the Abbots place.

Now came there one in likewise not long after midnight from the Lord Chamberleyn, vnto the Archebishop of Yorke, then Chaunceloz of England, to hys place not farre from Westminster. And for that hee shewed his seruantes that he had tidynges of so great importaunce, that his maister gaue him in charge not to forbear his rest, they letted not to wake him, nor he to admitte this messenger vnto his bed syde. Of whome hee heard that those Dukes were gone backe with the kinges grace from Stony Stratford vnto Northampton: Notwithstanding, Syr quoth he, my Lord, sendeth your Lordship worde, that there is no feare: For he assureth you that all shall be well. I assure him quod the Archebishop, be it as well as it wil, it will neuer be so well as we haue seene it. And therupon by and by after the messenger was departed, he caused in all the hast, all his seruautes to be called by, and so with his owne household about him, and euerye man weaponed, he tooke the great scale with him, and came yet before daye vnto the Queene. About whome he founde much heauinesse, rouble, hast and businesse, cariage, and comeyng of her stuffe into the Senuary, Chestes, Cofers, Packes, Ferrels, Trusses, all on mens backes, no man vnoccupied, some lading, some goyng, some discharging, some comyng for moze, some brekyng downe the walles to bring in the next way, and some yet drew to them that holpe to carrie a wrong way. The Queene her selfe sate alone alowe on the rushes all desolate, and dismayed, whome the Archebishop comforted in the best maner he coude, shewyng her that he trusted that the matter was nothing so soze as shee tooke it for, & that he was put in good hope, and out of feare by the message sent him from the Lord Chamberleyn. Ah, wo worth him quoth she, for he is one of them that laboureth to destroy me and my blood. Madam quoth he, be ye of good cheere, for I assure you, if they crowne any other king then your sonne, whome they now haue with them, we shall on the morow crowne his brother, whome you haue here with you. And here is the great Seale, which in likewise as that noble Prince your housbande, deliuered it vnto me, so here I deliuer it vnto you, to the vse and behofe of your sonne, & therewith he toke her the great Seale, and departed home agayne, yet in the dawning of the day: By which time he might in his chamber window se al the Chamis full of boates of the Duke of Glocesters seruautes, watching that no man shoulde go to the Senuary, nor passe vnserched, and examined. Then was there great commocion, and murmoz aswell in other places about, and specially ally in the Citie, the people diuerslye deuinyng vpon this dealing. And some Lordes, knights, and gentlemen, either for fauor of the Queene, or for feare of themselues, assembled in sundry companies, and went flocking in harness: and many also, for that they reconed this demeanour attempted, not so specially against the other Lords, as against the king himself in the disturbance of his coronation: therefore they assembled by and by together, to comen of thys matter at London: At which meeting, the Archebishop of Yorke fearing that it woulde be ascribed (as it was in dedde) to his ouermuch lightnesse, that he so sodainely had yelded by the great seale to the Queene, to whome the custody thereof nothyng appertayned, without especiall commaundement of the king, secretly sent for the great Seale agayne, and brought it with him after the customable maner. And at this meting the Lord Hastings, whose troth toward the king no man doubted, nor needed to doubt, perswaded the lords to beleue that the Duke of Glocester was sure & fastly faithfull to his prince, and that the Lord Ryuers, and Lord Richard with the other knights were for matters attempted by them against the Duke of Glocester, and Buckingham put vnder arrest for their suretie, not for the kinges ieopardie: and that they were also in safegarde, and there no longer to remaine, then till the matter were, not by the Dukes onely, but also by all the other Lords of the kings counsaile indifferently examined, and by their discrecions ordered, and either iudged or appeased. But one thing he aduysed them to beware, that they iudged not the matter to farre forth, ere they knewe the truth, nor turning their priuate grudges into the common hurt, irritating and prouoking men into anger, and disturbing the kings coronacion, toward which the Dukes were comyng by, that they might peraduenture bring the matter so farre out of ioynt, that it should neuer be brought in frame agayne. Which strife if it should hap, as it were likely to come to a fiede, though both parties were in aliother thinges egall, yet shoulde the auctorite be on that side, where the kyng himselfe is: with these perswasions of my Lorde Hastings, wherof parte himselfe beleued, of part he wist the contrary: these commocions were somewhat appeased, but specially, by that that the Dukes of Glocester and Buckingham, were so nere and came so shortly on with the kyng, in none other maner, nor with none other boyce or semblaunce, then to his coronacion, causing the fame to be blownen about, that these Lords & knightes that were taken, had contrived the destruction of the Dukes of Glocester & Buckingham, and of other the noble blood of the realme, to the ende that themselues woulde alone demeane and gouerne the king at their pleasure. And for the colorable prooffe therof, such of the Dukes seruaunts as rode with their cartes of their stuffe, which were taken, among the which stuffe no marueyll though some were harness, which at the breaking by of such an housholde must nedes be brought away, or cast awaye, they shewed to the people all the way as they went and sayde: lo, here be the barrelles of harness, that these traitours had priuilye conueighed in their cariages to destroy the noble Lordes wythall. This diuerselye, (although it made the matter to wise men more vnlkely) well perceiuyng that the entendours of such a purpose woulde rather haue hadde their harness on their backes, then to haue bounde them by in barrelles, yet many of the common people were therewith right well satisfiied, and saide it were almoste to hang them.

When the king approached nere the City, the Shaior, and Aldermen and five hundred commoners receiued his grace reuerently at Barnesay Parke, and so conueyed him to the Citie, where he entred the fourth day of May, in the first and last yere of his reigne, and was lodged in the bishop of Londons Pallace: but the Duke of Gloucester bare him in open sight so reuerently, sayng to all men as he rode, beholde your Prince and souereigne Lorde, and made suche semblaunce of lowlynesse to his Prince, that from the great obloquy that he was in so late before, he was sodainely fallen in so great trust that at the counsaile next assembled, he was made the onely chiefe ruler, and thought most mete to be Protector of the king and his realme: so that, were it destenie, or were it folly, the Lambe was betaken to the Wolfe to kepe. At which counsaile the Archebishop of Yorke was sore blamed for deliuering the great seale to the Queene, & the seale taken from him and deliuered to Doctor John Russell Bishop of Lincoln, a wise man and a good, & of much experience, and one of the best learned men vndoubtedly that Englande had in his time, & diuers lords & knights were apointed to diuers rowmes, the Lord Chamberlaine & some other kept the rowmes that they were in before, but not many.

Now were it so that the Protector (which alwayes you must take for the Duke of Gloucester) sore thirsted for the achieuyng of his pretended enterprise, and thought euery daye a yere till it were perfourmed, yet durst he no farther attempt, as long as he had but halfe his praye in his hande, well witting that if he deposed the one brother, all the realme woulde fall to the other, if he remayned eyther in Sanctuarie, or should happily be shortly conueyed to his farther libertie. Wherefore incontinent at the next meeting of the Lordes in counsell, he purposed to them that it was a heynous dedde of the Queene, and proceeding of great malice toward the kings counsellors, that she should kepe the kings brother in Sanctuarie from him whose special pleasure and comfort were to haue his brother with him, and that to be done by her to none other intent, but to bring all the Lordes in an obloquy and murmour of the people, as though they were not to be trusted with the kings brother, which Lordes were by the whole assent of the Nobles of the Realme appointed as the kings nere friends to the tuition of his royall person, the prosperitie whereof (quod he) standeth not alonely in keeping from enemies and euill dyet, but partly also in recreation and moderate pleasure, which he can not take in his tender youth in the company of old and auncient persons, but in the familiar conuersation of those that be not farre vnder nor farre aboue his age, and neuerthelesse of estate conuenient to accompany his noble maiestie, wherfore with whome rather then with his aboue brother: and if anye man thinke this consideration light (I am sure no man so thinketh that loueth the king) let him consider that sometime without small thinges, greater cannot stande, and verily it redoweth greatly to the dishonour both of the kinges highnesse, and of all bys that be about his grace to haue it runne in euery mans mouth, not in this realme onely, but also in other landes (as euill wordes walke farre) that the kings brother should be faine to kepe sanctuarie. For euery man will iudge that no man wil so do for nought, & such opinion once fastened in mens harts, hard it is to be wrested out, and may growe to more grieffe then any man here can diuine. Wherefore me thinketh it were not the worst to send to the Queene some honozable

and trustie personage, such as tendereth the kings weale and the honour of his counsell, and is also in credite and fauour with her: for all which considerations none seemeth moze meetely to mee, then the reuerend father here present, my Lorde Cardinall Archebysshop of Yorke, who may in this matter doe most good of all men, if it please hym to take the payne, which I doubt not of hys goodnesse he will not refuse for the kings sake and oures, and wealth of the yong Duke himselte the kinges most honozable brother, and for the comfort of my souereigne Lord himselte my most deare Nephew, considering that thereby shall be ceassed the slaunderous rumour and obloquy now going abrode, and the hurtes auoyded that thereof might ensue, and much rest and quietnesse growe to all the realme. And if thee percase be so obstinate and so precisely set vpon her aboue will and opinion, that neither his wise and faythfull aduertisement can moue her, nor anye mans reason satisfie her, then shall we by mine aduise by the kings authoritie fetch him out of that prison, and bring him to his noble presence, in whose contynuall company he shall be so well cherished and so honozably intreated, that all the worlde shall to our honour and her reproche, perceyue that it was onely malice, frowardnesse, and foly, that caused her to keepe him there. Thys is my mynde for thys tyme, except that any of you my Lordes any thyng perceyue to the contrary, for neuer shall I by Gods grace so wced my selfe vnto mine awne wyll, but I shall be ready to chaunge it vpon your better aduises.

When the Protectour had sayde, all the counsayle affirmed that the motion was good and reasonable, and to the king and the Duke hys brother honozable, and a thing that should cease great murmur in the realme, if the mother might by good meanes be induced to delyuer him: which thing the Archebysshop of Yorke, whome they all agreed also to be most conuenient thereunto, tooke vpon him to moue her, and thereto doe his vttermost endeavour. Howbeit, if she could in no wise be intreated with her good wyll to delyuer him, then thought he and suche other of the spiritualtie as were present, that it were not in anywise to be attempted to take him out against her wyll, for it would be a thing that should turne to the great grudge of all men and high displeasure of God, if the priuilege of that holy place should now be broken, which had so many yerres beene kept, which both kings and Popes so good had graunted, so many had confirmed, and which ground was moze then fife hundred yerres ago sanctified by saint Peter himselte, in his awne person (sayth Sir Thomas Moore) in spirite accompanied, with a great multitude of Angells by night so specially halowed and dedicate to God, for the prooffe whereof they haue yet in the Abbey, saint Peters Cope to shewe, and from that time hetherward, was there neuer so vnderoute a king, that euer enterprised the sacred priuilege to violate, nor so holy a Bysshop that durst presume the Church of the same to consecrate: and therefore, quod the Archbishop, God forbid that any man should for any earthly enterpryse breake the immunitie and libertie of that sacred Sanctuarie, that hath bene the safegarde of so many a good mans lyfe, and I trust quod he we shall not neede it, but for any maner of nede I would we should not do it, I trust y<sup>e</sup> the with reason shall be contented, and al thing in good maner obteyned. And if it hap that I bring it not so to passe, yet shall I further it to my best power, so that you all shall perceyue my good wil, diligence and endeour: But the mothers

May womannish frowardnesse, quod the Duke of Buckingham, for I dare take it on my soule, that she well knoweth that she nedeth no such thing to feare, either for her sonne or for her selfe. For as for her, here is no man that will be at warre with women, would God some of the men of hir kinne were women to, and then should all be sone in rest. Howbeit there is none of her kinne the lesse loued for that they be of her kinne, but for their owne euill deseruyng. And put the case that we neyther loued her nor her kinne, yet there were no cause why we should hate the kinges noble brother, to whose grace we our selues be of kinne, whose honour if she as much desired as our dishonour, and as much regarde toke to his welth, as to her awne will, shee would be as loth to suffer him to be absent from the king as any of vs be, for if she had any wit, as would God she had as good will, as she hath frowarde wit: she would thinke her selfe no worse then some that are here, of whose faythfull myndes she nothing doubterh, but verily beleueth and knowlegeth, that they would be as soye of his harme as her awne self, and yet they would haue him from her, if she abyde there.

And we all I thinke be content that both her childzen be with her, if she come from thence, and abide in such place where they may be with their honour. Nowe then, if she refuse the deliurance of him to folow the wise dome of them, whose wisdom she knoweth, whose truth she well trusteth: it is easie to perceyue that frowardnesse letteth her, and not feare. But go to, suppose that she feareth (as who may let her to feare her awne shadow) the moze she feareth to deliuer him, the moze ought we to feare to leaue him in her handes, for if she cast such fond doubties that she feare his hurt, then will she feare that he shall be fet thence, for she will sone thinke that if men were set (which God forbid on so great a mischief) the Sanctuarie will little let them, which Sancturay good men as me thinketh might without sunne, somewhat lesse regard then they do. Nowe then, if she doubt least he might be fetched from her, is it not likely enough, that she will sende him somewhere out of the Realme: verily I loke for none other. And I doubt not but she nowe as sore mindeth it, as we minde the let thereof. And if she might hap to bring that purpose to passe, as it were no great maisterie to doe, we lettynge her alone, all the world would say that we were a sort of wise counsaylozs about a king, to let his brother be cast away vnder our noses. And therfore I ensure you faythfully, for my minde, I will rather mauer her stomack fetche him away, then leaue him there till her feare or fond frowarde feare conuey him away, and yet will I breake no Sanctuarie, for verily sith the priuilege of that place and other of that sort haue so long continued, I woulde not go about to breake it, and in good fayth if they were nowe to begin, I would not be he that should go about to make them: yet will not I say naye, but it is a dede of pittie that such men as the chaunce of the sea, or their euill debtors haue brought into pouertie, should haue some place of refuge to kepe their bodies out of daunger of their cruell creditours. And also if it fortune the Croume to come in question as it hath done befoze this tyme, while eche part taketh other for traytozs, I thinke it necessary to haue a place of refuge for both. But as for theues and murderers, whereof these places be full, and which neuer fall from their craft, after they once fall thereunto, it is pittie,

that euer Sanctuary should serue them, and in especiall wilfull murderers, whome God commaundeth to be taken from the Altar, and to bee put to death. And where it is otherwise then in these cases, there is no uede of sanctuaries, appoynted by God in the olde lawe. For if necessitie of his owne defence, or misfortune driue him to that neede, then a pardon serueth him, which eyther is graunted of course, or the king of pitie & compassion geueth. Then looke me now how fewe sanctuary men there be whome necessitie or misfortune compelleth to go thither? And then see on the other syde, what a sort there be commonly therein of such, whom wilfull buthristnesse hath brought to naught? what a rable of theues, murderers, and malicious heynous traytors be there? and that in two places speciallly, the one at the elbowe of the Citie, and the other in the very bowels. I dare well auowe it, if you wey the good that they doe, with the hurt that cometh of them, ye shall finde it much better to lesse both, then to haue both. And this I say, although they were not abused (as they nowe be, and so long haue bene) that I feare me euer they will be while men be ascarde to set to their handes to the amendment, as though God and Saint Peter were the Patrones of vngodly liuyng. Now buthristes riott and runne in debt vpon boldnesse of these places, yea, and riche men runne thether with proze mennes goodes, there they builde, there they spende and byd their creditors go whistle. Mens wyues runne thether with their husbandes plate, and say they dare not abide with their husbandes for beatyng, thercres bring thether stolne goodes and liue thereon. There they deuise newe robberyes nightly and steale out and rob, rye, and kill men, and come againe as though those places gaue them not onely a sauegarde for the harme that they haue done, but a licence also to doe more mischiefe: howbeit much of this great mischiefe (if wise men would set their handes therevnto) might be amended, with great thankes of God, and no breche of the priuilege. The conclusion is, sith it is so long a go, I wote not what Pope, nor what Prince, more piteous then polittique, hath graunted it, and other men since of a certeine religious feare haue not broken it, let vs take a paine with it, and let it stande a Goddes name in his force, as farre forth as reason will, which is not fully so farre forth as may serue to let vs of the fetching forth of this noble man to his honour and welth, out of that place in the which he neither is nor can be a sanctuarie or priuiledged man. A sanctuarie euer serueth to defende the bodie of that man that standeth in daunger abroad, not of great hurt onely, but also of lawfull hurt: for agaynst vnlawfull hurtes and harmes, no Pope nor king entended to priuilege any one place, for that priuilege hath euery place. Knoweth any man any place wherein it is lawfull for one man to do another man wrong? That no man vnlawfully take hurt that libertie the king, the lawe, and very nature forbiddeth in euery place, and maketh to that regarde for euery man euery place a Sanctuary, but where a man is by lawfull meanes in perill, there needeth he the tuition of some speciall priuilege, which is the onely ground and cause of all Sanctuaries, from which necessitie this noble Prince is farre, whose loue to his king, nature, and kindred proueth, whose innocencie to all the worlde his tender youth affirmeth, and so Sanctuary as for him is not necessary, nor none he can haue. Men come not to Sanctuary as they come to baptisme, to require it by his Godfathers, he must aske it himselfe that must haue it, and

reason, sith no man hath cause to haue it, but whose conscience of his owne fault maketh him haue neede to require it. What will then hath yonder babe which if he had discretion to require it if neede were, I dare say would be now right angry with them that kepe him there? And I would thinke without any scruple of conscience, without any breche of priuilege, to be somewhat more homely with them that be there Sanctuary men in deede; for if one go to Sanctuary with another mans goodes, why should not the king leauyng his bodie at libertie, satisfie the partie of his goodes euen within the Sanctuary, for neither king nor Pope can geue any place suche a priuilege that it shall discharge a man of his debtes beyng able to pay.

And with that diuerse of the clergie that were there present, whether they sayde it for his pleasure, or as they thought, agreed playnly by the lawe of God, and of the church, that the goods of a sanctuary man, should be deliuered in payment of his debtes, and stolen goods to the owner, and onely libertie reserued to him to get his liuyng with the labour of his handes. Verily, quod the Duke, I thinke you saye verie truely. And what if a mannes wife will take sanctuary, because she list to runne from her husband, I would thinke if she can allege none other cause, he maye lawfully without any displeasure done to saint Peter, take her out of saint Peters church by y arme. And if no body may be taken out of sanctuary because he saith he will abyde there, then if a Childe will take sanctuary, because he feareth to go to schole, his maister must let him alone. And as simple as that example is, yet is there lesse reason in our case then in it, for there, though it be a childish feare, yet is there at the least some feare, & herein is no feare at all. And verily I haue often hard of sanctuary men, but I neuer heard befoze of sanctuary choldren: and therefore, as for the conclusion of my minde, whosoeuer may deserue to haue neede of it, if they thinke it for their surety let them kepe it, but he can be no sanctuary man that hath neither discretion to desire it, nor malice to deserue it, whose lyfe nor libertie can by no lawfull processe stande in ioperdy, and he that taketh one out of sanctuary to doe hym good, I saye playnly he breaketh no sanctuary.

When the Duke had done, the temporall men wholly, and the most part of the spirituall men also thinking no hurt earthly ment toward the prying Babe, condiscended in effect, that if he were not deliuered, he should be fetched out. Howbeit, they thought it all best in aduoyding of all maner of rumour that the Lorde Cardinall should first assay to get him with her good wyll. And thereupon all the counsaill came to the Sterre chambze at Westminster, and the Cardinall leauyng the Protector & other Lords in the Sterre chamber, departed into the sanctuary to the Queene, accompanied with certaine Lords, were it for the respect of his honoz, or that she should by the presence of so many, perceiue that this arrand was not onely one mans mind, or were it for that the protectour entended not in this matter to trust one man alone, or else if she finally were determined to kepe him, some of the company had peradventure some secret instruction incontinent maugre her will to take hym and to leaue her no respite to conuey hym, which shee was likely to minde after this matter broken to her if time in any wise would haue serued her.

When the Queene, and these Lordes were come together in presence, the Cardinall shewed vnto her, that it was thought to the lorde protector and the whole counsaile that her keepyng of the king his highly sounded, not onely to the grudge of the people and also to the importable grieffe and displeasure of the king to whose grace it were a singuler comfort to haue his naturall brother in companie, and it was their dishonoures and theirs and hers also to suffer him in Sanctuary, as though the one brother, stode in daunger, and perill of the other. And he shewed her farther, that the whole counsaile had sente him to require of her the deliuerie of him, that he might bee brought to the king his presence at his liberty, out of that place which men reckoned as a prison, and there should he be demeaned according to his estate and degree, and she in this doyng shoulde both doe great good to the realme, pleasure to the counsaile, profite to her selfe, succour to her friendes that were in distresse, and ouer that which he wist well she specially tendered, not onely great comfort and honour to the kyng, but also to the yong Duke himselfe, whose both great wealth it were to be together, aswell for many greater causes, as also for their both disport, and recreation, which things the Lordes esteemed not light, though it seemed light, well pondering that the youth without recreation and play cannot endure, nor any estraunger for the conuenience of both their ages and estates so metely in that point for anye of them, as the eyther of them for the other.

My Lorde (quod the Queene) I say not nay, but that it were very conuenient that this gentleman whome you require were in the company of the king his brother, and in good faith me thinketh it were as great commoditie to them both, as for yet a while to be in the custody of their mother, the tender age considered of the elder of them both, but in especiall the yonger, which besides his infancie that also nedeth good loking to, hath a while bene so sore diseased with sicknesse, and is so newly rather a lytle amended then well recovered, that I dare put no person earthlye in trust with his keeping, but my selfe onely, considering that there is as the physicians say, and as we also find, double the perill in the resoluacion that was in the first sicknesse, with which disease, nature beyng sore laboured, forewried, and weakened, wereth the lesse able to beare oure a newe surfet. And albeit, there might be founden other that woulde happily doe their best vnto him, yet there is none that eyther knoweth better how to orde him then I, that so long haue kept him, or is more tenderly lyke to cherish him then his owne mother that bare him.

No man denieth good Madame, quod the Cardinall, but that your grace of all folke were most necessary about your children, and so would all the counsaile not only be content, but also glad that you were, if it might stand with your pleasure to be in such place as might stande with their honor. But if you appoint your selfe to tarie here, then thinke they it more conuenient the Duke of Yorke were with the king honorably at his libertie to the comfort of them both, then here as a Sanctuarie man to their both dishonour and obloquie, sith there is not alway so great necessity to haue the childe to be with the mother, but that occasion sometime may be suche that it should be more expedient to kepe him else where, which in this well appeareth, that at such time that your most dearest sonne, then Prince, and now king, should for his honor and good order of the Countrie kepe household in waales, farre out of your keping, your grace was well content therewith your selfe. Not very well content (quod the Quene) and yet the case is not like, for the one was then in helth and the other is now sick, in which case I maye greatly why my Lorde Protectour is so desirous to haue him in keeping, where if the childe in his sicknesse miscaried by nature, yet might he run into slander and suspicion of fraude. And they call it a thing so soze agaynst my childs honor and theirs also, that he abideth in this place, it is all their honors there to suffer him to abide where no man doubteth he shall be best kept, and that is here while I am here, which as yet entend not to come forth and iopard my selfe after my friendes, which would God were rather here in suretie with mee, then I were there in iopardie with them. Why Madame (quod the Lorde Haward) knowe you any thing, why they should be in iopardie? Nay verily, (quod she) nor why they should be in prison neyther, as they now be, but I trowe it is no great maruell though I feare least those that haue not letted to put them in duraunce without colour, will let as little to procure their destruction without cause. The Cardinall made a countenance to the Lorde Haward that he should harpe no more vpon that string: and then sayde he to the Quene, that he nothing doubted but those Lords of her kinne the which remayned vnder a rest, should vpon the matter examined doe well ynough, and as towarde her noble person, neyther was, nor could be anye maner of iopardie. Whereby should I trust that (quod the Queene) in that I am guiltlesse, as though they were guiltie, in that I am with their enemies better beloued then they, when they hate them for my sake, in that I am so neere to the king, and how farre be they of that would helpe, as God send grace they hurt not. And therefore as yet I purpose not to depart hence: as for this gentleman my sonne, I mind he shall be where I am till I see further, for I assure you for that I see some men so greedy without any substantiall cause to haue hym, this maketh me much more further and scrupulous to deliuer him. Cruely Madame (quod the Cardinall) the further that ye be to deliuer hym, the further be other men to suffer you to kepe him, least your causelesse feare, might cause you farther to conuey him, and many be there that thinke he can haue here no priuilege, which can haue neyther wyll to aske it, nor yet malice nor offence to neede it. And therefore, they recon no priuilege broken, although they fetch him out of Sanctuarie, which if you finally refuse to deliuer him, I thinke verily the counsaile will enfranchises hym, so much dread hath my Lorde his Uncle, for the tender loue that he beareth him, least your grace should sende him away. Ah Syr, quod the Quene, hath he so tender a zeale to him, that he feareth nothing, but least he should escape him? Thinketh he that I would send him hence, which is neyther in the plight to sende out: and in what place could I recon hym sure, if he be not sure in this Sanctuarie: whereof was there neuer tyraunt yet so deuiliche, that durst attempt to breake the priuilege, and I trust God is now as strong to withstande his aduersaries, as euer he was. But my sonne can deserue no Sanctuarie you say, and therefore he can not haue it, forsooth the Lorde Protectour hath sent a goodly glose, by the which that place that may defende a Theefe, may not saue an innocent: but he is in no iopardie nor hath no neede thereof, I would God he had not. Troweth the Protectour (I pray God he may proue a Protectour, rather then a destroyer, wherevnto his paynted processe draweth) that it is not honourable, that the

Duke bide here? it were more comfortable to them both that he were with his brother, because the king lacketh a play felow, yea be you sure, I praye God send them both better play felowes then him that maketh so high a matter vpon such a trisleyng pretext, as though there could none be found to play with the king, but if hys brother which had no lust to play for sicknesse, must come out of this sanctuary, & out of his safegard to play with him, as though that Princes so yong as they be, could not play without their peeres, or children could not play without their kindred, with whom for the moze part they agree much worfe then with straungers. But the childe you say cannot require the priuilege, who told the Protector so? Aske him and you shall heare him aske it, and so shall he if he wyll. Howbeit, this is a straunge matter, suppose he could not aske it, and thinke he would not aske it, and imagine he would aske to go out, if I say he shall not: Note if I aske the priuilege but for my selfe, I saye, that he that agaynst my will taketh out him, breaketh Sanctuarie. Serueth this libertie for my person onely, or for my goods to? you may not from hence take my horse from me, if I stole him not, nor owe you nothing: then foloweth it, that you may not take my childe from mee, he is also my ward, for as farre as my learned counsayle the woeth mee, he hath nothing by dissent holden, by knightes seruire, but by forage, then the lawe maketh me his garden, then maye no man lawfully (I suppose) take my warde from me out of this place, without the breche of Sanctuarie, and if my priuilege could not serue him, nor he aske it for himselfe, yet sith the lawe committed to me the custodie of him, I maye require it for hym, except the lawe geue the infant a garden onely for his goods, discharging him of the cure and safe keeping of his bodye, for which onely both goodes and landes serue. And if examples be sufficient to attaine priuilege for my childe, I neede not farre to seeke: For in this place in which we now be, and which is now in question, whether my childe may take benefite of it? Mine other sonne now king, was bozne and kept in his Cradell & preserued to a moze prosperous fortune, which I pray God long to continue. And as you all know, this is not the first time that I haue taken Sanctuarie: For when my Lorde my husband was banished and thrust out of his kingdome, I fled hether being great with childe, and here I bare the Prince, and when my Lorde my husbände returned safe agayne, and had the victorie, then went I hente to welcome him home. And from hence I brought my babe the Prince vnto his father, when he first tooke him in his armes: And I pray God that my sonnes Palace may be as great a safegarde to him now reingning, as thys place was sometime to the kings enemy: In which place I entend to kepe his brother, sith mans lawe serueth the garden to keepe the infante, and the lawe of nature wylleth the mother to keepe the childe, and Gods lawe priuilegeth the Sanctuarie, and the Sanctuarie priuilegeth my sonne, sith I feare to put him to the Protectors handes, that hath hys brother already, which is (if both sayled) inheritor to the crowne as heire Male, as he sayth. The cause of my feare no man hath to doe to examine, and yet feare I no farther then the law feareth, which as learned men tell me, forbiddeth every man the custody of them, by whose death he may enherite lesse lande then a kingdome. I can say no moze, but whosoever he be that breaketh this holie Sanctuarie, I praye God send him shortly neede of Sanctuarie, when he may may not come to it, for I would not that my mortall enemy should be taken out of Sanctuarie.

The Cardinall perceyued that the Queene wared euer the longer the farther o, and also that she began to kindle and chafe, and speake soze byting words agaynst the Protector, and such as he neither beleued, and also was loth to heare, he sayde to her, for a finall conclusion, that he would no moze dispute the matter, & if she were content to deliuer the Duke to him and to the other Lordes there present, he durst lay his awne body & soule both in pledge, not onely for his suretie, but also for his estate, and surely he knew no suspected cause but he might so doe, (but he knewe not all.) And further he sayde, if she would geue him a resolute answer to the contrary, he would therewith depart incontinent, and thyst who so would with this businesse afterwarde, for he neuer intended further to mooue her in the matter, in the which she thought that he and all other also, saue her selfe, lacked eyther wit or truth. Wyt if they were so dull that they nothing could perceiue what the Protector entended, and if they should procure her sonne to be deliuered into his handes, in whom they should perceiue towards the childe any euill will entended, then she might thinke all the counsaill both euill advised and of little fidelitie to their Prince.

The Queene with these wordes stode a good while in a great studie, and forasmuch as she sawe the Lorde Cardinall moze redier to depart then the remnant, and the Protector himselfe redie at hande, so that she verilye thought that she could not kepe them there, but he should be incontinent taken thence: and to conuey him else where, neither had she time to serue her, nor place determined, nor persons appoynted to conuey him, and so all thing was vnredie, when this message came so sodainly on her, nothing lesse loking for, then to haue him out of Sanctuarie, which she knewe now men to be set in all places about, that he could not be conueyed out vntaken, and partly as she thought it might fortune her feare to be false: so well she wist it was either nedelesse or bootelesse. Wherfore if she should nedes go from him, she demed best to deliuer him, and specially of the Cardinalles sayth she nothing doubtyng, nor of some other Lordes whome she sawe there, which as she feared least they might be deceyued, so well was she assured, that they would not be corrupted: then thought she that it would make them the more warily to looke to him, and the moze circumspectly to see his suretie, if shee with her awne handes betoke him to them of trust, and at the last shee tooke the yong Duke by the hand, and sayde vnto the Lordes, my Lord quod she, and all my Lordes, neyther am I so vnwise to mistrust your wittes, nor so suspicious to mistrust your truthes: of the which thing I purpose to make you suche a prooffe, that if either of both lacked in you, might turne both me to great sorrow, the realme to much harime, and you to great reproche. For lo, here is quod she thys Gentleman, whome I doubt not but I could keepe safe if I would, whatfoeuer any man saye, and I doubt not also but here be some a-brode so deadly enemies vnto my bloud, that if they wist where any of it laye in their awne body, they would let it out: we haue also experience that the desire of a kingdome knoweth no kindred, the brother hath beene the brothers bane, and may the Nephewes be sure of the Uncle: eche of these children are others defence, while they be a sunder, and eche of theyr lyues lyeth in others body: kepe one safe and both be sure, and nothing to both more perillous then both to be in one place: for a wise Marchant neuer aduenu- reth all his goodes in one ship. All this notwithstanding here I deliuer him and his brother in him, to keepe to your handes, of whome I shall aske them both before God and the worlde. Faithfull you be and that I wote well, and I knowe you be wise and of power and strength to keepe him, if you list to keepe him, for you lack no helpe of your selues, nor neede to lack no help in this case, and if you cannot elsewhere, then may you leaue him here: But onely one thing I beseeche you, for the trust that his father put you in euer, and for the trust that I put you in nowe, that as farre as you thinke that I feare to much, ye be well ware that you feare not as farre to little. And therewithall she sayde to the chylde, farewell mine awne sweete sonne, God sende you good keeping, let mee once kisse you or you go, for God knoweth when we shall kisse together againe, and therewith she kissed him, and blessed him, and turned her back and wept, going her waye, leauing the poore innocent childe weeping as fast as the mother.

Whene an
simulation.

When the Cardinall and the other Lordes had receyued the yong Duke, they brought hym into the starre Chamber, where the Protector tooke him into his armes and kissed him with these wordes: nowe welcome my Lorde euen with al my very hart, & he sayd in that of likelihood euen as he inwardly thought, & thereupon forthwith brought him to the king his brother into the Bishops palace at Paules, and from thence through the Citie honorably into the tower, out of which after that day they neuer came abzode.

When the Protector had both the children in his handes, he opened himselfe more boldly both to certaine other men, and also chiefly to the Duke of Buckyngham, although I know that many thought that thys Duke was priue to all the Protector's counsaile, euen from the beginning: and some of the Protector's friends sayde, that the Duke was the first mouer of the Protector to thys matter, sending a priue messenger vnto him streight after king Edwardes death: But other agayne which knew better the subtile wit of the Protector, denied that he euer opened hys enterpryse to the Duke, vntill he had brought to passe the things before reherfed. But when he had imprisoned the Quenes kinfolk, and gotten both her sonnes into his awne hands, then he opened the rest of his purpose with lesse feare to them whom he thought meete for the matter, & especially to the Duke, who being worne to his purpose, he thought his strength more then halfe increased. The matter was broken vnto the Duke by subtile folkes, & such as were their craftes maisters in the handelyng of suche wycked deuyfes, who declared vnto him that the yong king was offended with him for his kinfolkes sakes, and that if he were able he would reuenge them: who would prick him for ward ther- vnto, if they escaped (for they would remember their imprisonment) or else if they were put to death, the yong king without doubt would be carefull for their deathes, whose imprisonment was grievous vnto him. And that both repenting, the Duke should nothing auayle, for there was no way left to redeeme his offence by benefites: but he should soner destroy himselfe then saue the king, who with his brother and kinfolkes he sawe in such place impriso- ned, as the Protector might with a beck destroy them all, and that it were no doubt, but that he would doe it in deede, if there were any new enterpryse attempted, attempted, and that it was likely, that as the Protector had prouyded a priuy garde for himselfe, so had he espialles for the Duke, and traynes to catche him, if he should be agaynst him, and that peradventure from them whome he least suspected. For the state of things, and the dispositions of men were then such that a man could not tell whome he might well trust, or whome he might feare. These things & such lyke, being beaten into the Dukes minde, brought him to that point, that where he had repented the way that he had en- tred, yet would he go forth in the same. And sithence he had once begonne, he would stoutly go thowoe, and therefore this wicked enterpryse which he be- leued could not be aduoyded, he bent himselfe, and went thorough, and de- termined that sithence the common mischief could not be amended, he would turne it as much as he might to his awne commoditie.

Then it was agreed that the Protector should haue the Dukes ayde to make him king, and that the Protector's onely lawfull sonne should marry the Dukes daughter. And that the Protector should graunt him the quiet possession of the Erledome of Hertford, which he claymed as his inheritance and could neuer obteyne it in king Edwardes time. Beside these requestes of the Duke, the Protector of his awne minde promised him a great quan- titie of the kings treasure and of his household stuffe. And when they were thus at apoint betwene themselves, they went about to prepare for the coro- nation of the yong king, as they would haue it seeme: And that they might turne both the eyes and mindes of men from perceyuing of their driftes, they had caused the Lordes beyng sent for from all the partes of the realme, to come thicke to that solempnitie. But the Protector and the Duke, after that they had set the lord Cardinall the Archbishop of Yorke, then lord Chaunce- lour, the Bishop of Ely, the Lorde Stanley, and the Lord Hastings, then Lorde Chamberleyn, wyth manye other noble men, to comen and deuyse about the coronation in one place, as fast were they in another place con- tryuing the contrarie, and to make the Protector kyng. To which coun- saile albeit there were called verie fewe, and they verie secret: yet then began there, here and there some maner of mutterung amongst the people, as though all thing should not long be well, though they wist not what they feared nor wherefore: were it, that before such great thinges mennes hartes (of a secret instinct of nature) misgeneth them, as the sea without winde some- time swelleth of himselfe before a tempest: or were it that some one man hap- pily somewhat perceiuyng, filled many men with suspicion though he shew- ed fewe men what he knewe: howbeit somewhat the dealing it selfe made men to muse on the matter, though the counsaile were close, for little and little all folke drewe from the Tower where the king was, and drewe to Crofoies place in Bishops gate streete, where the Protector kept his hous- houlde. The Protector had the resort, and the king in maner desolate. While some made sute vnto them that had the doying, some of them were by their friendes secretly warned, that it might happely turne them to no good to be to much attendant on the king, without the Protector's appoyntment, which remoued diuerse of the king his olde seruautes from him, and set newe in their rowmes about him.

Thus many things comming together, partly by chaunce, and partlye by purpose caused at length, not common people onely, which wauer with the wynde, wynde, but wise men also and some Lordes, to marke the matter, and muse thereupon: in so much that the Lord Stanley, which afterwarde was Erie of Darby, wisely mistrusted it, and sayd to the Lord Hastings, that he much mislyked these two seuerall counsailes, for while we, quod he, talke of one matter at the one place, litle wote we whereof they talke in the other: peace myn Lozde, quod the Lord Hastings, on my life neuer doubt you, for while one man is there, which is neuer thence, neyther can there be any thing once minded that shoulde sounde amisse toward me, but it shoulde be in mine eares or it were well out of their mouthes. This ment he by Catesby which was nere of his secret counsaile, and whom he familiarly vsed in hys most weightie matters, putting no man in so speciall trust as him, recoming him selfe to no man so lief, sith he wist well there was no man to him so much beholding as was this Catesby, which was a man well learned in the lawes of this lande, and by the speciall fauour of the Lord Hastings in good aucthority, and much rule bare in the counties of Leicester, and Northampton, where the Lord Hastings power lay. But surely great pitie was it that he had not had either more truth, or lesse witte, for his dissimulation onely, kept all that mischief by, in whome if the Lord Hastings had not put so speciall trust, the Lord Stanley and he with diuerse other Lordes had departed into their countries, & broken all the daunce, for many euill signes that he sawe, which he now construed all for the best, so surely thought he that there coulde be no harme toward him in that counsaile entended where Catesby was. And of truth the Protectour and the Duke of Buckingham made very good semblance vnto the Lord Hastings and kept him much in their company. And vndoubtedly, the Protectour loued him well, and loth was to haue lost hym, sauing for feare, lest his life shoulde haue quayled their purpose, for y<sup>e</sup> which cause he moued Catesby, to proue with some worde, cast out a farre off, whether he coulde thinke it possible to winne the Lord Hastings to their part. But Catesby, whether he assayed him, or assayed him not, reported vnto them that he founde him so fast, and heard him speake so terrible wordes that hee durst no farther breake, & of a truth the Lord Hastings of very trust shewed vnto Catesby the mistrust that ether began to haue in the matter. And therefore, he fearing lest their motions might with the Lord Hastings minish his credence, wherevnto onely all the matter leaned, procured the Protectour, hastily to ryd him, and much the rather, for that he trusted by his death to obayne much of the rule which the Lord Hastings bare in his countrie, the onely desire whereof, was the thing that enduced him to be the procurer and one of the speciallest contriners of all this horrible treason. Whereupon the Lord Protectour caused a counsaile to be set at the Tower on the Friday, the thirtene day of June, where was much commonyng for the honourable solemnitie of the coronation, of the which the time appointed apzoched so nere that the pageauntes were a making day and night at Westminster, and by-falle killed, which afterwarde was cast away.

These Lordes thus sitting, commonyng of this matter, the Protectour came in among them first about nine of the clocke, salutyng them curteously, excusing himselfe that he had been from them so long: sayng merily that he had bene a sleper that day. And after a litle talking wyth them, he said to the Bishop of Ely, myn Lozde you haue very good strawberries in your Garden at

Holborne, I require you let vs haue a messe of them. Gladly (my Lozde quod he) I would I had some better thing as redie to your pleasure as that, and with that in all haste he sent his seruaunt for a dishe of Strawberies. The Protectour set the Lordes fast in commonyng, and thereupon prayng them to spare him a litle, and so he departed and came againe betwene .x. and .xi. of the clocke into the Chamber, all chaunged with a wonderfull sorwe angry countenance, knittynge the browes, frownyng and stettyng and gnawynge on his lippes, and so set him downe in his place. All the Lordes were dismayed, and soze marueyled of this maner and sodaine chaunge, and what thing shoulde him ayle. When he had sitten a while, thus he began: What were they worthy to haue that compasse and ymagine the destruction of me beyng so nere of blood to the king, and Protectour of this his royall realme? At which question, all the Lordes sate soze astonied, musyng much by whom the question shoulde be ment, of which euery man knewe himselfe clere.

Then the Lord Hastings as he that for the familiaritie that was betwene them, thought he might be boldest with him, answered and sayd, that they were worthy to be punished as heinous traitors whatsoener they were, and all the other affirmed the same, that is (quod he) yonder Sorceresse, my brothers wife and other with her, meanyng the Queene, at these wordes many of the other Lordes, were soze abashed which fauoured her, but the Lord Hastings was better content in his minde that it was moued by her then by any other that he loued better, albeit his hart somewhat grudged, that he was not afoze made of counsaile of this matter, as well as he was of the takyng of her kindred, and of their puttyng to death, which were by hys assent befoze deuised to be behedded at Bomfret, this selfe same daye, in the which he was not ware that it was by other deuised, that he himselfe shoulde the same day be behedded at London: then sayd the Protectour, ye shall all see in what wise that Sorceresse and other of her counsaile, as Shozes wife wyth her affinitie haue by their sorcerye and witchecraft wasted my bodie, and therewith plucked by his Doublet sleue to his elbow on his left arme, where he shewed a werithe withered arme, and small, as it was neuer other. And thereupon euery mans minde soze misgaue them, well perceiuyng that this matter was but a quarell, for well they wist that the Queene was both to wise to go about any such folly, and also if she would, yet would she of all folke make Shozes wife least of her counsaile, whome of all women she most hated, as that Concubine whome the king her husband most louted.

Also there was no man there present, but knewe that his arme was euer such sith the day of his birth. Neuerthelesse the Lord Hastings, which from the death of king Edward kept Shozes wife, whom he somewhat docted in the kinges life, sayng as it is sayde, that he, that while forbare her for reverence toward his king, or else of a certaine kinde of fidelitie toward his friend: yet now his heart somewhat grudged, to haue her whome he loued, so highly accused, and that as he knewe well vntruely, therefore he answered and sayde, certainly myn Lozde, if they haue so heynously done, they bee worthy of heynous punishment, what quod the Protectour, thou seruest me I wene with if and with and, I tell thee they haue so done, and that will I make good on thy bodie traytor. And therewith (as in a great anger) he clapped his fist on the boorde a great rappe, at which token geuen, one cried treason, without the Chamber, and therewith a dooze clapped, and in came rushing men in harnesse as many as the Chamber could holde. And anone the Protector sayde to the Lorde Hastynge, Arrest thee traytor, what me, my Lorde quod he: yea, thee traytor quod the Protector. And one lett sitte at the Lorde Stanley, which shonke at the stroke and fell vnder the Table, or else his head had bene cleft to the teeth, for as shortly as he shanke, yet ranne the blood about his eares. Then was the Archebishop of Yorke, and Doctour Morton bishop of Ely, and the Lorde Stanley taken, and diuers other which were bestowed in diuers Chambers, saue the Lorde Hastynge (whom the Protector commaunded to speede and thriue him apace) for by Saint Paule (quod he) I will not dine till I see thy head off, it booted him not to aske why but heauily he toke a priest at aduerture, and made a horse christ, for a longer would not be suffered, the Protector made so much haste to his dinner, which might not go to it till this murder were done, for sauynge of his vngacious othe. So was he brought forth into the greene besyde the Chappell within the Tower, and his head layd on a logge of Tymber, that lay there for building of the Chappell, and there tyrannously stricken off, and after his bodie and hed were enterred at Windsor by his maister king Edward the fourth.

A marueylous case it is to heare, eyther the warnynge that he shoulde haue boyded, or the tokens that he could not boyd. For the next night before his death, the Lorde Stanley sent to him a trustie and secret messenger at midnight in all the hast, requiryng him to rise and ryde away with him, for he was disposed vtterly no lenger for to abyde, for he had so fearefull a dreame in the which he thought that a Boze with his tuskes, so rased them both by the heads that the blood ranne about both their shoulders, and forasmuch as the Protector gaue the Boze for his Cognisaunce, he imagined that it should be he. This dreame made such a fearefull impzeccion in his heart, that hee was thoroughly determined no lenger to tarie, but had his horse redie, if the Lorde Hastynge would go with him: So that they would ryde so farre that night, that they should be out of daunger the next day. Ah good Lorde (quod the Lorde Hastynge) to the messenger, leaneth my Lorde thy maister vnto such tryfles, and hath such fayth in dreames, which either his awone feare phantastick, or do ryse in the nightes rest, by reason of the dayes thought. Tell him it is plaine witchcraft to beleue in such dreames, which if they were tokens of thinges to come, why thinketh he not that we might as likely make them true by our goyng, if wee were caught and brought backe, (as friendes faile flyers) for then had the Boze a cause likely to rase vs with his tuskes, as folkes that fled for some falschoode, wherefore either is there perill, nor none there is in deede, or if any be, it is rather in goyng then abidyng. And if we should nedes fall in perill one way or other, yet had I liefer that men shoulde see it were by other mens falshead, then thinke it were eyther our awone fault or faint feble heart, and therefore go to thy maister, and commend me to him, and pray him to be mery & haue no feare, for I assure him, I am assured of the man that he wotteth of, as I am sure of mine awone hand. God send grace (quod the messenger) and so departed. Certaine it is also, that in ryding toward the Tower the same moznyng, in which he was beheaded, his horse that he accustomed to ryde on stumbled with him twyse or thirse almost to the fallyng, which thing although it happeneth to them dayly to whome no mischauce is toward, yet hath it bene as an olde euill token obserued as a goyng toward mischiese. Now this that foloweth was no warnyng but an enuious scozne, the same moznyng ere he were bp from his bed where Shores wife lay with him all night, there came to him sir Thomas Haward sonne to the Lorde Hawarde (which Lorde was one of the priuieft of the Lorde Protector's counsaile and doynge) as it were of curtesye to accompanie him to the counsaile, but of truth sent by the Lorde Protector to hast him thetherward. This sir Thomas, while the Lorde Hastynge stayed a while commonyng with a priest whome he met in the Towerstrete, brake the Lorde's tale, sayng to him merrily, what my Lorde? I pray you come on, wherefore talke you so long with that priest, you haue no nede of a priest yet, and laughed vpon him, as though he would say, you shall haue nede of one sone: But litle wist the other what he ment (but or night these words were well remembred by them that heard them) so the true Lorde Hastynge litle mistrusted, and was neuer merier, nor thought his life in moze suretie in all his dayes, which thing is often a signe of chaunge: but I shall rather let anye thing passe mee then the bayne surety of mans minde so neare his death, for vpon the berye towre wharffe, so nere the place where his head was of not so farre of as a man might wel cast a balle, a Pursuaunt of his awone called Hastynge mette with him, and of their meting in that place he was put in remembraunce of another tyme, in which it happened them to mete before together in the same place, at which other tyme the Lorde Hastynge had bene accused to king Edward by the Lorde Ryuers the Queenes brother, insomuch that he was for a while, which lasted not long, highly in the kinges indignation, forasmuch as he now mette the same Pursuaunt in the same place, the ieoperdy so well passed, it gaue him great pleasure to talke with him thereof with whome he had talked in the same place of that matter, and therefore he sayde: Ah Hastynge, art thou remembred when I met thee here once with an heauy hart. Ye my Lorde (quod hee) that I remember well, and thanked be to God they gat no good, nor you no harme thereby, thou wouldest say so (quod he) if thou knewest so much as I do, which fewe knowe yet, and mo shall shortly, that meant he that the Erie Ryuers and the Lorde Richard, and Syr Thomas Waughan shoulde that day be beheaded at Dounstret, as they were in deede which act he wist well shoulde be done, but nothing ware that they are hong so nere his awone heade. In faith man (quod he) I was neuer so sozry nor neuer gooder in so great daunger of my life as I did, when thou and I mette here, and lo the worlde is turned now, now stande mine enemies in the daunger as thou maist happe to heare moze hereafter, and I neuer in my life merier nor neuer in so great suretye, I pray God it proue so (quod Hastynge, proue quod he: doubttest thou that) nay may I warrunt thee, and so in manner displeased, he entered into the Towre, where he was not long on lyue as you haue heard. O Lord God the blindnesse of our mortall nature, when he most feared, he was in most suretie, and when he reconed himselfe most surest, he lost his life, and that within two houres after. Thus ended this honorable man a good knight and a gentle, of great auctority with his Prince, of luyng somewhat dissolute, plain and open to his enemies, and sure and secret to his friend, easie to beguile, as he that of good heart and courage forsaue no perilles, a luyng man and passyng well beloued, very faythfull and trusty enough, but trusting to much was his destructiō as you may perceiue. Now fiewe the fame of this Lozdes death throught the Citie and farther about, like a winde in euery mans eare, but the Protector immediately after dinner (entending to set some colour vpon the matter) sent in all the hast for many substanciall men out of the Citie into the Tower, and at their coming himselfe with the Duke of Buckyngham stode, harnessed in olde euill fauored Briganders, such as no man would wene that they would haue bouchsafed to haue put on their backes, except that some sodeine necessitie had constrained them. Then the Lozde Protector shewed them, that the Lord Hastings and the Duke of Buckyngham there the same day in counsaile, & what they entended farther, was yet not well knowen, of which their treason he had neuer knowlege before ten of the clocke the same forenoone, which sodeine feare draue them to put on such harnesse as came next to their handes for their defence, and so God had holpen them, that the mischief turned vpon them that would haue done it, and thus he required them to report. Euery man answered fayre, as though no man mistrusted the matter, which of truth no man beleued. Yet for the further appeasynge of the peoples mindes, he sent immediately after dinner an Herald of armes with a Proclamacion to be made throught the Citie of London which was proclaymed in the kings name, that the Lord Hastings with diuers other of his trayterous purpose had before conspired, the same day to haue slain the Protector, & the Duke of Buckyngham sitting in counsaile, and after to haue taken vpon them the rule of the king, and the realme at their pleasure, and thereby to pill & spoyle whome they list vncoutrilled, and much matter was there in the Proclamacion deuised to the slaunder of the Lozde Hastings, as that he was an euill Counsaylor to the kinges father, entisyng him to many thinges highly redounding to the diminishyng of his honour, and to the vniuersal hurt of his realme by his euill company & swifter procuring and vngacious example, as well in many other thinges, as in vicious liuing & inordinate abusion of his body, both with many other and especially with Shozes wife, which was one also of his secret counsaile of this heynous treason, with whome he lay nightly, and namely the night passed next before his death, so that it was the lesse maruaile if vngacious liuyng brought him to an unhappie ende, which hee was now put to by the commaundement of the king his highnesse, and of his honourable and faythfull Counsaile, both for his demerites beyng so openly taken in his false contriued treason, and also least the delayng of his execution might haue encouraged other mischionous persons parteners of his conspiracie, to gather and assemble themselues together, in makynge some great commocion for his deliuerance, whose hope now being by his well deserued death pollitikely repressed, al the realme shall by Gods grace rest in good quiet and peace. Now was this Proclamacion made within two houres after he was beheaded, and it was so curiously endited, and so fayre wrytten in Parchement in a fayre set hande, and therewith of it selfe so long a processe, that euery childe might perceyue that it was prepared and studied before, (& as some men thought by Catesby) for all the time betwene his death & the Proclamacion proclaymyng, could scant haue suffised vnto the bare wrytynge alone, albeit that it had bene in paper, and scribled forth in hast at aduenture.

The Protector

So that vpon the proclaymyng thereof, a certayne Scholmayster standing by and comparynge the shortnesse of the time with the length of the matter, sayde to them that stode about him, here is a gaye goodly cast, foule cast away for hast: And a Marchaunt that stode by him sayde that it was wrytten by inspiration and prophesie. Now then by and by, as it were for anger and not for couetous, the Protector sent Sir Thomas Hawarde to the house of Shozes wyfe (for her husband dwelt not with her) which spoiled her of al that euer she had, about the value of two or thre thousand markes, and sent her bodie to prison. And the Protector had layde for the maner sake that she was a counsaile with the Lozde Hastings to destroy him. In conclusion, when no colour could fasten vpon these matters, then he layde heynously to her charge that thing that she coude not denie, for all the worlde knewe that it was true, and that notwithstanding euery man laughed to here it then so sodeinly, so highly taken, that she was naught of her bodie. And for this cause as a godly continent prince cleane and faultlesse of himselfe, sent out of heauen into this vicious worlde, for the amendment of mens maners, he caused the bishop of London to put her to open penance, goyng before a Crosse on a Sunday at Procession with a taper in her hand. In the which she went in countenance and pace so womanly, and albeit she was out of all array sayng her kytell onely, yet was she so fayre and louely, and namely, when the woding of the people cast a comely red in her chekes, of the which she before had most misse, that her great shame wanne her muche prayse amongest them that were more amorous of her bodie, then curious of her soule, and many good folke that hated her liuyng, and were glad to see sinne corrected, yet pitied they more her penance, then reioyced in it, when they considered that the Protector did it more of corrupt minde, then of any vertuous affection.

This woman was bozne in London, well friended, honestly brought vp, and very well married, sauing somewhat to sone, her husbände an honest and a yong Citezen, godly, and of good substance, but forasmuch as they were coupled or she were well type, she not verye feruently loued for whome she neuer longed, which was the thing (by chance) that the more casely made her to encline to the kings appetite, when he required her. Howbeit the respect of his royaltie, the hope of gaye apparell, ease, pleasure, and other wanton welth was able sone to pierce a soft tender hart: but when the king had abused her, anone her husbände beyng an honest man, and one that could his good, not presuming to touch a kinges concubyne left her by to hym altogether. When the king dyed, the Lozde Hastings took her, which in the kings dayes albeit that he was sore enamoured with her, yet he forbore, eyther for a Princely reuerence, or for a certayne friendly faithfulness. Proper she was, and fayre, nothing in her body that you coude haue chaunged, but if you would haue wished her somewhat higher. This say they that knewe her in her youth, some sayde, & iduged that she had becne well fauoured, and some iudged the contrary, whose iudgement seemeth like as men gesse the beautie of one long before departed, by a skalpe taken out of a charnel house, and this iudgement was in the time of king Henrre the eight, in the eightene yere of whose reigne she dyed, when she had nothing but a reuyled skynne and bone. Her beautie pleased not men, so much as her pleasaunt behauiour, for she had a proper witte, and could both reade and write, merry in company, redy and quick of answer, neither mute, nor full of bable, sometime taunting without displeasure, but not without disport. King Edward woulde say that he had three concubines, which in diuerse properties diuersely excelled, one, the meriest, the other the boyliest, the thirde the holiest harlot in the realme as one, whom no man coulde get out of the Church to any place lightly, but if it were to his bed, the other two were somewhat greater personages then myltes Shore, and neuerthelesse of their humilitie were content to be namelesse and to forbear the praise of these properties. But the meriest was Shores wife in whome the king therfore toke great pleasure, for many he had, but her he loued, whose fauour to say the truth (for it were sinne to lye on the deuill) she neuer abused to any mans hurt, but to many mens comfort, and reliefe. For where the king toke displeasure, she would mitigate and appeare his munde, where men were out of fauour, she would bring them into his grace, for manie that had highlie offended, she obtayned pardon, & of great forfeitures she gat remission, & finally, in many weightie suites she stode many men in great steade, either for none, or for very small rewarde: and those rather gaye then riche, either for that she was content with the deede well done, or for that she delighted to be sued vnto, and to shewe what shee was able to doe with the king, or for that that wanton woman, and welthie be not allwayes couetous, I doubt not some man will thinke this woman to be to slight a thing to bee written of, among so graue and weightie matters, which they shall specialy thinke that happily salve her in her age, and aduersitie, but me semeth the chaunce so much moze worthy to be remembred, in howe much after wealth she fell to pouertie, and from riches to beggery vnfriended, out of acquaintance, after great substance, after so great fauour with her Prince, after as great suite and sekynge to with all those, which in those dayes had businesse to speede as manye other men were in their tymes, which be nowe famous onely by the infamy of their euill deedes, her doynges were not much lesse, albeit they bee much lesse remembred, because they were not euill, for men vse to write an euill turne in marble stone, but a good turne, they write in the dust, which is not worst proued by her, for after her welth, shee went begging of manye that had begged themselves, if shee had not holpen them, suche was her chaunce.

The Lordes Riners and other beheaded

Now was it so deuised by the Protector and his counsaile, that the same day that the Lord Chamberlayne was beheaded in the Towre of London and about the same houre should be beheaded at Poumfred the Erle Ryuers and the Lord Rycharde the Quenes sonne, Syr Thomas Vaughan, and Syr Richard Haute, which as you heard were taken at Northampton and Stony Stratford by the consent of the Lord Hastings, which execution was done by the order and in the presence of Syr Richard Ratcliffe knight, whose seruice the Protector specially vsed in the counsaile, & in the execution of such lawlesse enterprises, as a man that had bene long secrete with hym, hauyng experience of the worlde, and a shrewde wyf, short and rude in speech, rough and boysterous of behauiour, bolde in mischief, as farre from pittie as from all feare of God.

This knight brought these foure persons to the Scuffolde at the daye appointed, and shewed to all the people that they were Traytors, not suffering ring the Lordes to speake, and to declare their innocencie, least their words might haue enclined men to pittie them, and to hate the Protector and hys part, and so wythout iudgement and processe of the lawe caused them to be beheaded, wythout other earthly guilt, but onely that they were good men and true to the king and to nie to the Queene, in so much as Syr Thomas Vaughan goyng to his death, sayde: Al woe worth them that tooke the prophetic that G. should destroy king Edwardes children, meaning that by the Duke of Clarence Lord George, which for the suspicion is now dead, but now remaineth Richard G. Duke of Gloucester, which nowe I see is he that shall and will accomplishe the prophetic, and destroye king Edwardes children and all their alyes and friends, as it appereth by vs thys day, whom I appeal to the high tribunall of God for his wrongfull murder and oure true innocencie. And then Ratcliffe sayde, you haue well appealed, lay downe your head, yee quod Syr Thomas, I dye in right, beware you dye not in wrong, and so that good knight was beheaded and the other three, and buried naked in the Monastery at Poumfred. When the Lord Hastings & these other Lordes and knights were thus beheaded and rid out of the waye, then the Protector caused it to be proclaymed that the coronation for diuers great and bigent causes should be deferred till the second daye of Nouember, for then thought he, that whyle men mused what the matter ment, and whyle the Lordes of the realme were about him, out of their awone strengthes, and whyle no man wiste what to thinke, nor whome to trust, or euer they should haue time and space to digest the matter, and make parts, it were best hastily to pursue his purpose, and put himselfe in possession of the Crowne, or men could haue tyme to deuise any waye to resist. But now was all the studye, thys matter beyng of it selfe so heynous might be first broken to the people in such wise as it might well be taken. To thys counsaile they tooke diuers suche as they thought meete to be trusted and likely to be enduced to that part, and able to stande them in stead, eyther by power or by policie. Among whome they made a counsaile Edmond Shaa then Maior of London, which vpon trust of his awone auancement, where he was of a proude hart highly desirous, tooke on him to frame the Citie to their appetite. Of spiritual men they tooke such as had wyf, and were in auctoritie amongst the people for opinion of their learning, and had no scrupulous conscience. Amongst these had, they tooke Raufe Shaa Clarke, brother to the Maior, and Fryer Wynkynne prouinciall of the Augustine Fryers, both Doctors in diuinitie, both great preachers, both of moze learning then vertue, of moze fame then learning, and yet of moze learning then truth. For they were before greatly esteemed among the people, but after that, neuer none of these two were regarded. Shaa made a Sermond in prayse of the Protector before the coronation, and Wynkynne made one after the coronation, both so full of tedious flatterie, that no good mans eares could abyde them, Wynkynne in his Sermond so losse his voyce, that he was fayne to leaue off and come downe in the middelt, Doctor Shaa by his Sermond losse hys honestye, and sone after his lyfe, for very shame of the worlde, into the which he durst neuer after much come abroad, but the Fryer forced for no shame, and so it harmed him the lesse. Howbeit, some doubt and manye thinke that Wynkynne was not of counsaile before the coronation, but after the common maner fell to flatterie after, namely because his Sermonde was not incontinent upon it, but at Saint Mary Spittle the Easter after. But certaine it is that Doctor Shaa was of counsaile in the beginning, in so much that they determined that he should first breake the matter in a Sermond at Paules crosse, in which he should by the aucthoritie of his preaching, induce the people to encline to the Protectours ghostly purpose. But now was all the labour and studie in the deuise of some conuenient pretexte, for which the people should be content to depose the Prince and accept the Protector for King. In which diuers things they deuised, but the chiefe thing, and the weight of all that inuention rested in thys, that they should allege bastardy in King Edward himselfe, or in his children, or both, so that he should seme disabled to inherite the crowne by the Duke of Yorke and the prince by him. To lay bastardy in King Edward, sounded openly to the rebuke of the Protector his owne mother, which was mother to them both. For in that point could be none other colour, but to pretende that his owne mother was an auentresse, but nevertheless he would that point should be lesse and moze finely and closely handled, not euen fully playne and directly, but touched a slope craftily, as though men spared in that point to speake al the truth for feare of his displeasure. But that other point concerning the bastardie, they deuised to surmise in King Edward his children, that would he should be openly declared and enforced to the vttermost. The colour and pretext whereof cannot be well perceyued, except we first repete some thinges long before done about King Edward his mariages.

After King Edward the fourth had deposed King Henrie the sixt, and was in peaceable possession of the realme, determining himselfe to marry (as was requisite) both for himselfe and for the realme, he sent ouer in Ambassade the Erle of Warwike, and diuers other noble men to the French King to intreat a mariage betweene the King and the Ladie Bona sister to the French Quene, then being in Fraunce, as before in the storie of King Edward the fourth ye haue heard. In which thing the Erle of Warwike founde the parties so toward and willing, that he speedily without any difficultie according to his instructions, brought the matter to a good conclusion. Now happeneth it in the meane season, there came to make a sute to the King by petition Dame Elizabeth Gray (which after was his Quene) then a widow, borne of noble bloud, specially by her mother, which was Duchesse of Bedford, which was married to Sir Richard Woodville, Lorde Rivers, her father.

Howbeit this dame Elizabeth being in seruice with Queene Margarete, wife to King Henry the sixt, was married to one John Gray Esquire whome King Henry made knight at the last battayle of Saint Albones, but little whyle he enioyed his knighthood, for at the same fielde hee was slayne.

After when that King Edward was King and the Erle of Warwike being on his Ambassade, this poore Lady made sute to the King to be restored to such small lands as her husbande had geuen her in ioynture, whom when the King beheld and heard her speake, as she was both fayre and of good fauour, moderate of stature, well made, & very wise, he not all onely pittied her, but also waxed enamored on her, and taking her after ward secretly aside, began gan to enter into talking more familiarly, whose appetite when she perceyued, she vertuously denied hym, but that shee did so wisely and that with so good maner & words so well set, that she rather kindled his desire then quenched it. And finally after many a meeting and much woynge and many great promises she well espied the King his affection toward her so greatly encreased, that she durst somewhat the moze boldly say her minde, as to him whose hart she perceyued moze feruently set then to fall of for a worde. And in conclusion she shewed hym playne, that as she wist her selfe to simple to be his wyfe, so thought she her selfe to good to be his Concubine. The King much marueyling of her constancie, as he that had not bene wont else where so stiffly sayde nay, so much esteemed her continencie and chastitie, that he set her vertue in stead of possession and ryche: And this taking counsaile of his owne desire, determined in all possible haste to marry her. And after that he was thus appointed, and had betwene them twayne ensured her, then asked he counsaile of his secret friends, and that in such maner that they might easily perceyue that it booted not to say nay.

Notwithstanding the Duchesse of Yorke his mother was so sore moued therewith, that she dissuaded that mariage as much as shee possibly might: alleging that it was his honor, profite and suretie, to marry in some Noble progeny out of his realme, whereupon depended great strength to his estate by that affinitie, and great possibilitie of increase of his dominions. And that he could not well otherwise doe, considering the Erle of Warwike had so farre forth entred into the matter all ready, which was not like to take it well if all his boyage were in such wise frustrate, and his appointment deluded. And she sayde farther, that it was not princely to marry his owne subiect, no greater occasion, leading thereto no possessions, nor other commoditie depending thereupon, but only as a riche man would marry his mayden onely for a little wanton dotage upon her person. In which mariage many men commended moze the maydens fortune then the mans wisdom, and yet she sayd that there was moze honesty then honor in this mariage, for as much as there is not betwene a Marchant and his mayde so great a difference as betwene a King and his subiect, a great Prince and a poore widow. In whose person, although there were nothing to be misliked, yet was there saide shee, nothing so excellent but that it might be found in diuers other that were moze discreetly (quoth she) for your estate: yea and maydens also, the onely widowhed of Dame Elizabeth Gray (although she were in all other points and things conuenient for you) should suffice as me thinketh to refraine you from her mariage, sith it is an vnfitting thing & a great blemish to the sacred maiestie of a Prince, that ought as nere to approach priesthood in cleanness, as he doth in dignitie, to be defiled with bygamy in his first mariage. The King made his mother an answer part in earnest and part in play merily, as he that wiste himself out of her rule: & albeit he would gladly that she should take it well, yet was he at a point in his owne minde, toke she it well or otherwise. Howbeit somewhat to satisfy her he said, & albeit mariage being a spiritual thing it ought rather to be made for the respect of God, where his grace inclineth, the parties ought to encline to loue together (as he trusted it was in his case) rather then for the regarde of any temporall aduantage: yet nevertheless him seemed that this mariage well considered not to be vnprofitable, table, for he reconed the amitie of no earthly nacion to be so necessary for him as þ friendshipp of his awne, which he thought likely to beare him so much the moze hartly fauor, in that he disdeined not to marry with one of his awne land: and yet if outwarde aliaunce were thought so requisite, he would finde the meanes to enter therinto much better by other of his kinne where all þ parties could be contented, then to marry himself wherin he should neuer happily loue, and for the possibilitie of possessions, lese the fruite and pleasure of thys that he had alredie. For small pleasure taketh a man of all that euer he hath besyde, if he be wined agaynst his appetite, and I doubt not (quod he) but there be as you say other that be in euery poynt comparable with her, and therefore I let not them that like them to marry them, no moze is it reason that it mislike any man that I marry where it liketh me. And I am sure that my Cousyn of Warwicke, neither loueth me so little, to grudge at that that I loue, nor is so vnreasonable to looke that I should in choyse of a wife, rather be ruled by his eye then by mine awne, as though I were a warde that were bounden to marry by the appoyntment a guarden. I would not be a king with that condition to forbear mine owne libertie in choyse of mine awne marriage. As for possibilitie of moze inheritaunce by newe affinitie in straunge landes, is oft the occasion of moze trouble then profite. And we haue alredie title by that meanes, so much as suffiseth to get and keepe well in one mans dayes. That she is a widdowe and hath alredie children: By God his blessed Lady, I am a Bachelor and haue some to, and so eche of vs hath a prooffe, that neyther of vs is like to be barren. And therefore Madame, I pray you be content, I trust to God she shall bring forth a yong Prince that shall please you. And as for the bigamye, let the Bischoppe hardly lay it to my charge when I come to take orders, for I vnderstand it is forbidden a priest, but I neuer wist that it was forbidden a Prince. The Duchesse with these wordes nothyng appeased, and seyng the king so set on that she coulde not plucke him backe, so highly she disdeyned it, that vnder pretext of her dutie to Godward, she deuised to disturbe this marriage, & rather to helpe that he should marry one dame Elizabeth Lucy, whome the king not long befoze had gotten with childe: wherfore þ king his mother objected openly against this marriage (as it were in discharge of her conscience) that the king was sure to dame Elizabeth Lucy, and was her husband befoze God, by reason of which wordes such obstacle was made in that matter, that eyther the Bischop durst not, or the king would not proceede to the solemnization of the marriage, till his fame were cleerely purged, and the truth well and openly testified. Whereupon Dame Elizabeth Lucy was sent for, and albeit she was by the king his mother and manye other put in good comfort to affirme that shee was assured to the king, yet when shee was solemply swozne to say the truth, shee confessed shee was neuer ensured. Howbeit she sayde, his grace spake suche louyng wordes to her, that she verily hoped that he woulde haue maryed her, and that if such kinde of wordes had not bene, she woulde neuer haue shewed such kindenesse to him, to let him so kindly get her with childe. This examination solempnly taken, when it was cleerely proued that there was no impediment to let the king to marrie, wherfore he shortly after at Grafton besyde stonie Stratford maryed the Ladie Elizabeth Gray very priuily, which was his enemies wife, and had prayed hartily for his losse, in the which God loued her better then to graunt her her bone, for then had she not bene hys wife: And after that she was crowned Quene, then her father was created Erie Riuers, and her sonne created Marques Dorset. But when the Erie of Warwike vnderstoode of this marriage, he tooke it so highly, that thereof ensued much trouble and great bloodshed as is declared befoze in the stoye of king Edward the fourth.

I haue reherfed this marriage somewhat the moze at length, because it might thereby the better appere vpon howe slipper a ground the Protector builded his colour, by which he pretended king Edward his children to be bastardes, but the inuencion, as simple as it was liked them to whome it suffiseth to haue somewhat to saye, while they were sure to be compelled to no larger prooffe then themselves list to make.

Nowe to retorne where I left, as I began to shewe you, it was by the Protector and his counsaile concluded that this Doctor Shaa should in a sermon at Paules Crosse signifie to the people, that neither king Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence were lawfully begotten, nor were the very children of the Duke of Yorke, but begotten vnlawfully by other persons, by aduoutery of the Duches their mother. And that Dame Elizabeth Lucy was the very wife of king Edward, and so Prince Edward and all the children begotten on the Queene were bastardes. And accordyng to this deuise, Doctor Shaa the Sunday after at Paules crosse in a great audience (as alway a great number assembled to his preaching) came into the Pulpit takyng for his Theme. Spuria vitulamina non agent radices altas. Sapien. 4. that is to say, Bastard slippes shall neuer take depe rootes: whereupon when he had shewed the great grace that God geueth and secretly in foundeth in right generation after the lawes of matrimonie, then declared he that those children commonly lacked the grace (and for the punishment of their parentes) were for the most part vnhappy which were gotten in haste, and speciallye in aduoutrie, of which, (though some by the ignorance of the worlde and the truth hid from knowlege) haue enherited for a season other mens landes, yet God alway so prouideth that it contineth not in their blood long, but the truth comyng to light, the rightfull enheritors be restored, and the bastard slippes plucked vpon it can be rooted depe. And when he had layde for the prooffe and confirmation of this sentence, examples taken out of the olde testament and other auncient Hystories, then began he to discende to the prayse of the Lord Richard, late Duke of Yorke, calling him father to the Lord Protector and declared his title to the crowne by enheritaunce, and also by entaile authorized by Parliament after the death of king Henry the sixt. Then shewed he that the Lord Protector, was onely the right heyre, of his bodie lawfully begotten. Then declared he that king Edward was neuer lawfully maryed to the Queene, but his wife befoze God was dame Elizabeth Lucy, and so his children were bastardes. And besydes that, that neyther king Edward himselfe, nor the Duke of Clarence (amongst them that were secret in the Duke of Yorke's household) were neuer reconed surely to be the children of the noble Duke, as those that by their fauors moze resembled other knowen men then him, from whose vertuous condicions he sayde also that king Edward was farre off. But the Lord Protector (quod he) that very noble prince, the speciall patrone of knightly prowesse, as well in all princely behauior, as in the liliaments and fauour of his visage representeth the very face of the noble Duke his father. This is (quod he) the fathers awne figure, this is his awne countenance, the very print of his visage, the sure vndoubted image, the plaine expresse likenesse of this noble Duke. Nowe was it before deuised, that in the speaking of these wordes, the Protector should haue come in amongst the people to the Sermond ward, to the ende that these wordes, so meetyng with his presence, might haue bene taken amongst the hearers, as though the holy ghost had put them in the preachers mouth, and should haue moued the people euen there to haue cried king Richard, king Richard, that it might haue bene after sayde, that he was specially chosen by God, and in maner by miracle: but this deuise quayed, eyther by the Protector's negligence, or the preachers ouer hasty diligence. For while the Protector staied by the way, sayyng, least he should haue preuented these wordes, the Doctor fearyng that he should come or his sermon could come to those wordes, hastyng his matter therto, he was come to them, and past them, and entred into other matters or the Protector came, whome when he behelde commyng, he sodainly left the matter which he had in hand, and without any deduction therevnto out of all order, and out of all frame, began to repete those wordes agayne. This is the very noble prince, the especiall patrone of knightly prowesse, which aswell in all princely behauiour, as in the liaments and fauour of his visage, representeth the very face of the noble Duke of Yorke his father. This is the fathers awne figure, this is his awne countenance, the very print of his visage, the sure and vndoubted image, the plain expresse likenesse of that noble Duke, whose remembraunce can neuer die while he liueth. While these wordes were in speaking, the Protector accompanied with the Duke of Buckingham, went through the people by into the place where the Doctors commonly stand in the upper stoye, where they hearde out the Sermon: but the people were so farre from cryyng king Richard, that they stode as they had beene turned into stones, for wonder of this shamefull Sermon: after which once ended, the preacher gate him home, and neuer after durst looke out for shame, but kept him out of sight as an Owle, and when he asked any of his olde friendes, what the people talked of him, although that his awne conscience well shewed him that they talked no good, yet when the other answered him, that there was in every mans mouth of him much shame spoken, it so strake him to the heart, that in fewe dayes after, he withered and consumed away.

Then on the tuesday after next folowing this sermond, beyng the .xxij. day of June, there came to the Gyld hall of London, the Duke of Buckingham and diuers Lordes, and knightes mo then happily knewe the message they brought. And there in the east ende of the hall, where the hoystinges be kept, the Duke and the Mayor, and the other Lords sate downe, and the Aldermen also, all the commons of the Citie beyng assembled and standing before them. After silence comaunded vpon a great payne in the Protector's name. The Duke stode vp, and as he was well learned, and of nature mercifully well spoken, he sayde to the people, with a cleare, and a lowd voyce: friendes, for the zeale, and hartye fauour that we beare you, we be come to breake of a matter right great, and weightie, and no lesse weightie, then pleasing to God, & profitable to all the realme, nor to no parte of the realme moze profitable, profitable, then to you the Citizens of this noble Citie. For why, the thyng that you haue long lacked, and as wee well knowe soze longed for, that you woulde haue geuen great good for, that you woulde haue gone farre to fetch: that thyng be we come hether to bring you, without your labour, paine, coste, auenture, or ieoperdie. What thyng is that? Certes, the suretye yo your owne bodies, the quiet of your wyues & daughters & the sauegarde of your goods, of all which things in tyme passed you stood in doubt. For who was there among you all that could recon himselfe Lord of his owne good, among so many gynes, & traps as were set therfore, among so much pilling and polling among so many taxes & tallages, of the which there was neuer ende, or oftentimes no nede or if any were, it grew rather of riote, or of vnreasonable wast, then any necessary or honozable charge, so that there was daily plucked, & pilled from good & honest men great substance of goods, to be lashed out among vnyusts so far forth y fiftenes suffised not, nor any vsuall termes of knowen taxes, but vnder an easy name of beneuolence & good will, the commissioners so much of euery man toke, as no man would with his good will haue geuen. As though the name of beneuolence had signified, that euerie man should pay not what he of himselfe of his good wyll lust to graunt, but what the kyng of his good will lust to take, who neuer asked tittle, but euery thyng was haunfed aboute the measure, amerciamentes turned into fines, fines into ransomes, final trespasses, into mesprisyon, mesprisyon into treason, whereof I thinke that no man loketh y we shal remeber you of examples by name, as though Burdet were forgotten which was for a worde spoken, in hast cruelly behedded. This Burdet was a Merchant dwelling in Chepeside, at y signe of crowne, which now is y signe of the flower de luse ouer against soper lane: This man merily in the ruffling tyme, betwene king Edward the fourth, and king Henry the sixt, said to his owne sonne, that he woulde make him inheritor of the crowne, meaning his owne house: but these wordes king Edward made to be misconstrued, and enterpreted, that Burdet ment the Crowne of the realme: wherefore within lesse space then foure houres, he was apprehended, iudged drawn and quartered in Chepeside, by the misconstruing of the lawes of the realme for the princes pleasure, with no lesse honour to Werham chiefe Justice then, which lost his office, rather then he woulde assent to that iudgement: then to the dishonestie of those, that either for feare, or flattery, gaue that iudgement. What nede I to speake of sir Thomas Cooke Alderman, and Mayor of this noble Citie, who is of you either for negligence that woteth not, or so forgetfull, that he remembreth not, or so harde harted that he pitieth not that worshopfull mans losse? What speake I of losse, his wonderfull spoyl, and vnderferued distruction, onely because it happened those to fauour him, whome the prince fauoured not. We nede not reherse of these any mo by name, sith I doubt not that here be many present, that either in themselves, or nigh friendes haue knowen aswell their goodes as their persons greatly endaugered, either by fained quarels or small matters aggrauated with heinous names, and also there was no crime so great, of which there coule lacke a pretext. For sith the king preuentyng the tyme of his inheritance attayned the crowne by battaile, it suffised in a riche man for a pretext of treason, to haue bene of kindred or aliaunce, nere of familiaritie, or longer of acquaintaunce with any of those, that were at any tyme the kings enemies

Thus were neither your goods, neither lands in surety, and yet they brought your bodies in ieopardie, beside the common auenture of open warre, which albeit, that it is euer the well and occasion of much mischief, yet is it neuer so mischeuous as where any people fall in deuision, and at distaunce among themselues, and in no realme earthly so deadlye, & so pestilent, as when it happeneth amongst vs. And among vs neuer continued so long discention nor so many battailes in any season, nor so cruell, nor so deadly foughten, as were in the kinges his dayes that dead is. God forgeue it his soule. In whose time, and by whose occasion, what about the getting of the garlande, keping it, lesing, and buyning agayne, it hath cost more English blood, then hath the twise winnyng of Fraunce. In which inward war amongst our selues hath bene so great effusion of the auncient noble blood of this realme, that scarcely the halfe remaineth, to the great enfebling of this noble lande, beside manye a good towne ransaked and spoyled by them that haue bene going to the fieldes, or returning from thence, and peace long after, not much surer then warre. So that no tyme was there in the which rich men for their money, & great men for their landes, or some other, for some feare or for some displeasure were out of peril, for whom trusted he, that mistrusted his owne brother? Whome spared he, that killed his owne brother? Or who coude perfectly loue him, if his owne brother coude not? What maner of folke that he most fauoured (we shall for his honour spare to speake of) howbeit, this ye wot well all, that whoso was best, bare euer the lest rule, and more suite in his daies was to Shores wife, a vile and abhominable strompet, then to all the Lordes in Englande, except vnto those that made her their protectour, which simple woman was yet well named, and honest, till the king for wanton lust, and sinful affection, bereft her from her husbande, a right honest yong man, and substanciall amongst you. And in that point which in good faith I am sorry to speake of, sauing that it is in bayne to kepe counsaile in that thing, that all men knoweth, the king bys greedy appetite was insatiabile, and enery where ouer all the realme intolerable. For no woman was there any where yong or olde, poore or riche, whome he set his eie vpon, whome hee any thing liked, either for person, or beautie, speche, pace or countenaunce, but without anye feare of God, or respect of his honour, murmure or grudging of the worlde, he woulde importunately pursue his appetite and haue her, to the great destruction of manye a good woman, and great doloure to their husbandes and friendes, which being honest people of themselues, so much regarded the cleanness of their houses, the chastitie of their wiues, and children, that them were liefer to lose all that they haue beside, then to haue such a vilany done to them. And albeit that with this, and other importable dealing, the realme was in euery place annoyed, yet speciallye you the Citezens of this noble Citie, as for that amongst you is most plentie of all suche thinges as minister matter to suche iniuries, as for that you were nereest at hande, sith that nere here about was his most common abiding. And yet be ye the people whome he had as singuler a cause well and kindly to entreat, as any part of his realme: not onelye for that the prince by this noble Citie, as of his speciall chamber, and renoumed Citie of this realme, much honourable fame receiveth amongst all other nations, but also for that, yea not without your great cost & sundry perilles and ieopardies in al his warres bare euer your especiall fauor to his part: which your kinde mindes borne to the house of Yorke, sith he hath nothing worthily requited you, there is of that house now, which by God his grace shall make you full recompence, which thing to shew you, is the whole some and effect of our arrande. It shall not I wote well neede, that I reherse vnto you agayn that you already haue heard of him that can better tell it, and of whome I am sure ye will better beleue it (and reason it is that it so be) I am not so proud to loke therfore that you should receiue my words of so great authority as the preachers of the worde of God, namely a man so cunning, and so wise, that no man wotteth better what he should doe & say, and thereto so good and vertuous he would not say the thing, which he wist he should not say in the pulpit, namely, into the which no honest man cometh to lie: which honourable preacher ye well remember, substancially declared to you at Paulies Crosse on Sunday last paste, the right and tytle of the most excellent Prince Richard Duke of Gloucester now Protector of this realme, which he hath vnto the crowne of the kingdome of the same. For that worshipfull man Edward the fourth were neuer lawfully begotten, for as much as the King (liuing his berie wyfe dame Elizabeth Lucie) was neuer lawfully married to the Queene their mother, whose blood, sauing that he set his voluptuous pleasure before his honour, was full vnnaturally to be matched with his (the mingling of which two bloodes together hath bene the effusion of a great part of the noble blood of this realme, whereby it maye well be seene, that mariage was not well made of which there is so much mischief growen. For lack of which lawfull copulation, and also of other things which the said worshipfull Doctor rather signified then fully explained, and which thing shall not be spoken for me, as the thing that enery man forbearth to say that he knoweth, in aduoyding the displeasure that my noble Lorde Protector bearing as nature requireth a reuerence to the Duches his mother. For these causes before remembred I saye, that for lacke of issue lawfully coming of the late noble Prince Richard Duke of Yorke, to whose royall blood the crownes of Englande and of Fraunce, are by the high auctoritie of a parliament entayled, the right and title of the same is by iuste course of inheritance according to the common law of this land, dissended and come vnto the most excellent prince the Lorde protector, as to the berie lawfull begotten sonne of the fore remembred noble Duke of Yorke. Which thing well considered, and the knightly prowesse of him pondered, with many vertues which in his noble person singularly do abound: The nobles and commons also of this realme, and specially of the North partes, not mylling anye bastard blood to haue rule of the lande, nor the abusions in the same before used and exercised any longer to continue, haue fully condiscended and vnterly determined to make humble petition vnto the puyssaunt prince the Lorde protector, that it maye like his grace at our humble request, to take vpon him the guyding and governaunce of this realme, to the welth and increase of the same, according to his berie right and iust tytle, which thing I wote well he will be loth to take vpon him, as he whose wisdom well perceyeth, the labour and studie both of minde and body that shall come therewith to him, whosoener shall occupie that roome. I dare say he will if he take it (for

I warrunt you that rome is no childes office ) and that the great wise man well perceyued, when he sayd Væ regno, cuius Rex puer est, woe to that realme whose king is a childe, wherefoze so much the more cause haue we to thanke God, that this noble personage, which is so righteously entituled thereto, is of so sad age, and thereto of so great wisdom, ioyned with so great experience, which albeit, he will be loth as I haue sayde to take vpon him, yet shall he to our petition in that behalfe the more graciously encline, if ye the worshipfull Citizens of thys Citie, being the chiefe Citie of the realme, ioyne with vs the Nobles in our sayde request, which for your awne weale we doubt not but that ye will. And yet neuerthelesse we pray you so to do, whereby ye shall doe great profite to all this realme: Beside that, in chosing them so good a King, it shall be to your selfe a speciall comoditie, to whome his maiestie shall euer after beare so much the more tender fauour in howe much he shall perceyue you the more prone and beneuolently minded towarde his election: wherein deare friendes, what minde you haue we require you p'aynely to shewe vs?

When the Duke had sayde and looked that the people whome he hoped that the Maior had framed befoze, should after this flattering proposition made, haue cryed king Richard, king Richard, all was still and muete, and not one worde answered to: wherewith the Duke was maruellously abashed, and taking the Maior neere vnto him, with other that were about him priuie to the matter, sayde vnto them softly. What meane thys, that the people be so still? Sir quod the Maior, percase they perceyue you not well, that shall we amende quod he, if that wyll helpe, and therewith somewhat louder rehearsed the same matter agayne, in other order and other words so well and ornately, and neuerthelesse so euidently and plaine, wyth voyce, gesture, and countenance so comely and so comenient, that euery man much marueyled that heard him, and thought that they neuer heard in their lyues so euill a tale so well tolde. But were it for wonder or feare, or that eche looked that other should speake first, not one worde was there answered of all the people that stood befoze, but all were as still as the midnigh, not so much as rouning among them, by which they might seme once to common what was best to doe. When the Maior sawe thys, he wyth other parteners of the counsaile, drewe about the Duke and sayde that the people had not bene accustomed there to be spoken to, but by the Recorder, which is the mouth of the Citie, and happily to him they will answer. With that the Recorder called Thomas Fitz William, a sadde man and an honest, which was but newly come to the office, and neuer had spoken to the people befoze, and lothe was with that matter to beginne, notwithstanding thereto commaunded by the Maior, made rehersall to the commons of that which the Duke had twise proponed himselfe, but the Recorder so tempered his tale, that he shewed euerything as the Duke his wordes were, and no part of his awne, but all this no chaunge made in the people, which alway after one, stood as they had bene amased. Wherbyon the Duke roured with the Maior and sayde, this is a marvellous obstinate scilence, and therewith turned to the people agayne with these wordes. Deare friendes we come to moue you to that thing which paraduventure we so greatly needed not, but that the Lords of this realme and commons of other partes might haue suffe-ffed, sauing such loue we beare you, and so much set by you, that we would not gladly do without you, that thing in which to be parteners is your weale and honour, which as to vs seemeth you see not or way not: Wherefoze we require you to geue vs an answer, one or other, whether ye be minded as all the nobles of the realme be, to haue thys noble Prince now Protector to be your king. And at these wordes the people beganne to whisper among themselves secretly, that the voyce was neyther loude nor base, but lyke a swarme of Bees, tyll at the last, at the nether ende of the hall a bushment of the Dukes seruants & one Paschfield, and other belonging to the Protector, with some prentices and laddes that thrust into the hall amongst the prease, began sodainely at mens backs to cry out as loude as they could, King Richard, King Richard, and there threw by their Cappes in token of ioy, and they that stood befoze cast back their heads maruaillyng thereat, but nothing they sayde. And when the Duke and the Maior sawe this maner, they wisely turned it to their purpose, and sayd it was a goodly cry, and a ioyfull, to here euery man with one voyce & no man sayng nay. Wherefoze friendes (quod the Duke) sithe we perceyue that it is all your whole mindes to haue this noble man for your king, whercof we shall make his grace so effectuell report, that we doubt not but that it shall redownde to your great welth and comoditie. We therfoze require you that to morowe ye go with vs, and we with you to hys noble grace, to make our humble petition and request to him in maner befoze remembred. And therewith the Lords came downe and the company dissolved and departed the more part all sadde, some with glad semblaunce that were not bery meris, and some of them that came with the Duke, not able to dissemble their sorowe, were fayne at hys backe to turne their face to the wall, whyle the dolour of their hartes brast out of their eyes.

Then on the morow the Maior and Aldermen, and chiefe Commoners of the Citie in their best maner apparelled, assembled themselves together at Paules, and resorted to Bainerds Castell where the Protector lay, to which place also accordyng to the appointment repayred the Duke of Buckingham and diuers Nobles with him, besydes many knightes and gentlemen: And therebpon the Duke sent worde to the Lorde Protector of the beyng there of a great honourable companie to moue a great matter to his grace. Wherebpon the Protector made great difficultie to come to them, except he knewe some part of their errand, as though he doubted and partly mistrusted the comynug of such a number to him so sodainly, without any warnyng or knowlege, whether they came for good or harme. Then when the Duke had shewed this to the Maior and other, that they might thereby see howe little the Protector loked for this matter, they sent agayne by the messenger such louyng message, and there so humbly besought him to bouchesafe that they might resort to his presence to propose their entent of which they would to none other person any part disclose. At the last he came out of his Chamber, and yet not downe to them, but in a Galozy ouer them, with a Bishop on euery hand of him, where they beneath might see him and speake to him, as though he would not come nere them, till he wist what they ment. And therebpon, the Duke of Buckingham first made humble petition to him on the behalfe of them all, that his grace would pardon them, and licence them to purpose vnto his grace the entent of their comynge without his displeasure, without which pardon obteyned, they durst not be so bolde to moue him of that matter. In which, albeit they ment as much honour to his grace as welth to all the realme besyde, yet were they not sure howe his grace would take it, whom they would in no wise offende. Then the Protector, as he was very gentle of himselfe, and also longed soze apparauntly to know what they ment, gaue him leaue to purpose what him liked, verily trusting for the good mind that he bare them all, none of them any thing would entend to himward wherewith he ought to be grieued. When the Duke had this leaue and pardon to speake, then wered he bolde to shewe him their entent and purpose, with all the causes mouyng them therunto, as ye befoze haue heard. And finally, to besech his grace that it would like him of his accustomed goodresse, and zeale vnto the realme, nowe with his eye of pitie to beholde the long continued distresse and decay of the same, and to set his gracious hand to the redresse and amendment thereof, by takyng vpon him the Crowne and gouernance of the realme, accor dyng to his right and title lawfully descended vnto him, and to the laude of God, profite and suretie of the lande, and vnto his grace so muche the moze honour and lesse paine, in that that neuer Prince reigned vpon any people that were so glad to liue vnder his obeysaunce, as the people of this realme vnder his.

When the Protector had heard the proposition, he looked very straungely thereat and made aunswere, that albeit he knew partly the things by them alleged to be true, yet such entier loue he bare to king Edward and his children, & so much moze regarded his honour in other Realmes about, then the Crowne of any one, of which he was neuer desirous, so that he coulde not finde in his heart in this poynt to enelyne to their desire, for in all other nations where y truth were not well knowen, it should peradventure be thought that it were his awne ambitious minde and deuise to depose the Prince, and to take himselfe the Crowne, with which infamie he would in no wise haue his honour steyned for any Crowne, in which he had euer perchaunce perceued much moze labour and paine, then pleasure to him that so would vse it as he that would not and were not worthe to haue it. Notwithstandyng, he not onely pardoned them of the motion that they made him, but also thanked them for the loue and hartie fauour they bare him, prayyng them for his sake to geue and beare the same to the Prince, vnder whome he was and would be content to liue, and with his labour and counsaile as farre as it should like the king to vse it, he would doe his vttermost deuoyer to set the realme in good estate which was alredie in the little tyme of his protectorship (lauded be God) well begon in that the malice of such as were befoze the occasion of the contrary, and of newe entended to be, were now partly by good pollicie, partly moze by God his speciall prouidence, then mans prouision, repressed and put vnder.

Vpon thys aunswere geuen, the Duke of Buckyngham by the Protector his licence a little rounded, as well with other noble men about hym as with the Maior and Recorder of London. And after that (vpon lyke pardon desired and obteyned, he shewed aloude vnto the Protector, for a finall conclusion that the realme was appointed that king Edward his line should no longer reigne vpon them, both for that they had so farre gone that it was now no suretie to retreat and for that they thought it for the weale vniuersal to take that way, although they had not yet begon it. Wherfoze if it would lyke his grace to take the crowne vpon him, they would humbly beseeche hym therunto, and if he would geue them a resolute aunswere to the contrary (which they would be loth to here) then must they seeke and should not sayle to finde some other noble man that would. These wordes much moued the Protector, which as euery man of small intelligence may weete would neuer haue enclined thereto: but when he sawe there was none other way but that eyther he must take it, or else he and his both to go from it, he sayde to the Lordes and commons, sithe it is we perceue well that all the realme is so set (wherof we be very sozy) that they wyll not suffer in any wise king Edward his line to gouerne them, whom no man earthly can gouerne against their wys: And we also perceue that no man is there to whom the crowne can by so iust tytle appertayne as to our selfe as verie right heire lawfully begotten of the body of our most dread and dere father Richard, late Duke of Yorke, to which tytle is now ioyned your election, the nobles and commons of the realme, which we of all tytles possible take for most effectuell, we be content and agree fauourably to encline to your petition and request, and according to the same, here we take vpon vs the royall estate of prehemynence and kingdome of the two noble realmes, Englande, and Fraunce, the one from this day forward by vs and our heyres to rule, gouerne and defend, the other by God his grace and your good helpe to get agayne, subdue and establish for euer in due obedience vnto this realme of England, the auancement wherof we neuer aske of God longer to liue then we entende to procure and set forth. With this there was a great cry and shoute, cryyng king Richard, king Richard, and so the Lords went by to the King. But the people departed talking diuersly of the matter, euery man as his phantasie gaue him, but much they maruelled of this maner of dealing, that the matter was on both partes made so straunge, as though neuer the one parte had communed with other part thereof befoze, when they wold that there was no man so dull that hearde them, but he perceiued well ynough that all the matter was made betwene them. Howbeit, some excused that agayne, sayyng: all thinge must be done in good order, and men must sometime for the maner sake not be a knowen what they knowe. For at the consecration of a Bishoppe, euery man perceiuech by payment of his Bulles, that he entendeth to bee one, yet when he is twise asked whether he will be a Bishop, he must twise say naye, and at the thirde time take it vpon him, as compelled thereto by his awne wil. And in a stage playe, the people know right well that he that playeth the sobdaine, is percase a sowter, yet if one of acquaintance perchaunce of little nurture should call him by his name, while he standeth in his maisterie one of his tormentours might fortune breake his heade for marring of the play. And so they saide, these matters be kynges games, as it were stage playes, and for the most part plaid vpon scaffoldes, in which poore men be but lokers on, & they that wise be, wil meddle no farther, for they that steppe by with them when they cannot play their partes, they disorder the play and doe themselues no good.

After

to take vpon him the royall estate and Kingdome of this
realme.

After that the Protector had taken upon him the royal estate, preheminnence and kingdome of this realme, as is aforesaid in the historie of king Edward the fift, he the next day folowynge with a great traine, went on foote to Westminsterhall, & there when he had placed himselfe in the Court of the kings Benche, he declared to the audience, that he would take vpon him the crowne there in that place where the king himselfe sitteth, & ministereth the lawe, because he considered, that it was the chiefest duty of a king to minister the lawes. Then with a pleasaunt oracion as he coude, he went about to wyne the hartes of the nobles, the merchautes, & artificers, and in conclusion all kinde of men, but speciall the Lawyers of this realme. And finally to the entent that no man should hate him for feare, and that his deceptfull clemency might get him the good will of the people, when he had declared the discommoditie of discorde, and the commoditie of concord, and vnitie, he made an open proclamation, that he did put out of his minde all enimities, and that he there did pardon all offences committed against him. And to the entent that he might shew a prooffe thereof, he commaunded that one fogge, whome he had deadly hated, should be brought before him, who being brought out of the Sanctuarie, for thether had he fled for feare of him. In the sight of the people he took him by the hand, which thing the common people reioysed at, and prayesd: But wise men tooke it for a banitic. And in his retourne homeward, whom so euer he met, he saluted: for a mind that knoweth it selfe guilty, is in a maner delected to a scruple flattery.

When he had begonne his reigne the .xix. daye of June, in the yeare of our Lorde. 1483. after this mockish election, then was he proclaymed king openly by sounde of trompet the next day folowing, and the sixt day of Julye next ensuyng, was solemnly crowned at Westminster. And that solemnitye was furnished for the most parte with the selfe same prouision that was appointed for the coronacion of his nephew. But forasmuch as the maner of the same coronacion came vnto my hands, & also for that no mention is made of the maner of the Coronacion of any prince in al this Chronicle, I thought it not amisse in this place to expresse the same.

The fourth day of July he came to the tower by water with his wyfe, and there he created Edward, his onely begotten sonne, a childe of ten yeres olde, Prince of Wales, and John Harwarde, a man of great knowlege, and vertue, (aswell in counsaile, as in battaile) he created Duke of Norffolke, and sir Thomas Harward his sonne, he created Erle of Surrey, & William Lord Barkley was then created Erle of Nottingham, and fraunces Lord Louell was then made vicount Louell and the kings chamberleyn, and the Lord Stanley, was deliuered out of ward for feare of his son the Lord Strange which was then in Lancasthire gathering men (as it was saide) and the sayd

But Morton Bischop of Ely was deliuered to the Duke of Buckingham to kepe in ward, which sent him to his manor of Brecknock in Wales, from whence (as ye shall after here) hee escaped to kyng Richardes confusion. The same night the king made .xxij. knights of the Bath, whose names were these.

On the morow beyng the first day of July, the king with Queene Anne his wife, came doone out of the white Hall into the great Hall at Westminster, and went directly to the kinges Benche. And from thence the king and the Queene goyng upon raye cloth barefooted, went unto Saint Edwardes Shryne, and all his Nobilitie goyng with him, every Lorde in his degree. And first went the Trompets, and then the Heraltes of Armes in their rich Cotes, and next folowed the Crosse with a solempne Procession, the priestes hauyng fine Surpleses, and gray Amysses upon them. The Abbottes and Bishops Mytred and in riche Copes, and every of them carryed their Crossiers in their handes. The Bishop of Rochester bare the Crosse before the Cardinall. Then folowed the Erle of Huntingdon, bearyng a payre of guilt Spurres, signifyng Knighthood. Then folowed the Erle of Bedford bearyng Saint Edwardes staffe for a Relique. After them came the Erle of Northumberland bare hedded, with the poynlesse sword naked in his hand, which signified mercy. The Lorde Stanley bare the Mace of the Constablenesship. The Erle of Kent bare the second sword on the right hande of the king naked, with a poynnt which signified iustice to the Temporalltie. The Lorde Louell bare the thirde sword on the left hande with a poynnt, which signified signified iustice to the Clergie. The Duke of Suffolk folowed with y Scepter in his hande, which signified peace. The Erle of Lincolne bare the Ball and Crosse, which signified a Monarchy. The Erle of Surrey bare y fourth sword before the king in a rich skaberd, and that is called the sword of estate. Then went three together, in the middelt went Garter king at armes in his riche Cote. And on his left hande went the Mayor of London bearing a Mace, and on his right hand went the Gentleman Usher of the priuie chamber. Then folowed the Duke of Norfolke bearing the kinges crowne betweene his handes. Then folowed king Richard in his robes of purple velvet, and ouer his head a Canapie borne by foure Barones of the five portes, and on euery side of the king there went one Bishop, that is to say, the Bishop of Bathe, and the Bishop of Durham. Then folowed the Duke of Buckyngham bearing the kings trayne, with a whyte staffe in his hande, signifyng the office of the high Steward of England. Then there folowed a great number of Erles and Barons before the Queene. And then came the Erle of Huntington, who bare the Queenes Scepter, and the Lorde Lisle Count bare the rod with the dosse, which signifieth innocencie. The Erle of Wiltshire bare the Queenes crowne before her. Then folowed Queene Anne daughter to Richard Erle of Warwike in robes lyke to the king, and hauing a Canapy ouer her head, and on euery corner of the same was a Bell of Golde. And on her head was a Circlet of Golde, set with manye precious stones. The Countesse of Richmond bare the Queenes trayne. And after them came the Duchesse of Suffolke in her robes of estate, and on her head a Cronicle of Golde. Then folowed the Duchesse of Norfolke appareled in lyke maner as was the Duchesse of Suffolke, and then folowed twentie Ladies richely appareled, and after them a great number of knightes and Esquires, and then a great number of Tymbales, and passed forwarde until they came unto Saint Edwardes Shryne to their seates of estate. And shortly the king and the Queene sat doone in their seates of estate. And shortly with there came by before the king & the Queene both priestes and Clarkes, that song most delectable and excellent Musick. And so soone as thys was done, the king and Queene were shifted from their robes, and had dyuers places open from the middle bywarde, in which places they were annoynted. And that beyng done, the king and Queene chaunged their robes into cloth of Golde. And then forthwith the Cardinall beyng accompanied with all the Bishops, crowned the king and Queene with great solempnity, with the crowne of Saint Edward, and then they sang Te deum and the Organs went, and then they put upon the king Saint Edwardes Cope (as an holy relique.) And the Bishops deliuered to the king the Scepter in his right hande, and the Ball with the Crosse in his left hande, and to the Queene the Scepter in her right hand, and the rod with the Dove in her left hande. And then the Cardinall and Bishops went to Masse, and the king and Queene went to their seates agayne. And shortly after came by before the king two Bishops and kneeled doone before him a little while, and then they arose by and kissed the king one after another: on euery side of the king stode a Duke, and on euery side of the Queene stode a Bishop. And before the king stode the Erle of Surrey with a sword in hys hande, and before the Queene was a Lady kneeling. And there kneeled before the Queenes seate the Duches ches of Norfolk and sundrie other Ladies. And so they sate still vntill the Dore was geuen, and then the King & Queene dissended and came downe to the highe aultar, and there receyued the Sacrament, the same beyng deuided betweene them. And then they went by vnto S. Edwards Shyrne, and there the king offred saint Edwards crowne with many other reliques. And then the king returned agayne to his seat, and the Lordes set hys abene crowne vpon his head. And so in order as they came they departed to Westminster hall, and so to their Chambers for a season. During which time the Duke of Norfolk came into the hall, his horse being trapped to the ground in cloth of Golde as high Marshall, and boyded the Hall.

About foure of the clock the King and Queene entred the Hall, and the King sate in the middle, and the Queene on the left hande of the table, and on euery side of her stode a Countesse, holding a cloth of pleasaunce when she list to drinke. And on the right hande of the King sate the Archebyschop of Caunterburie. All the Ladies sate on one side at a table, in the middle of the hall, and at the table agaynst hym sate the Chauncelour and all the Lordes. At the table next the Cupbord sat the Maior of London. At the table behind the Lordes sate the Barones of the five Portes. And at the other bordes sate dyuers noble and worshipfull personages.

When all persons were set, the Duke of Norfolk Erle Marshall, the Erle of Surrey Constable for that day, the Lorde Stanley Lorde steward, sye William Hopton Treasorer, and sye Thomas Percy Comptroller came in and serued the King solemnly with one dishe of Golde, & another of Syluer, and the Queene all in guilt Wessell, and the Byschop in Silver. At the second course came into the hall sye Robert Dymmock the kings Champion makynge proclamation, that whosoeuer would saye that King Richard was not lawfull King, he would fight with him at the vtterance, and threwe downe his gauntlet, and then all the hall cryed King Richard, King Richard. And so he did in thre parties of the hall. And then one brought him a Cup of Golde with Wine couered, and when he had dronke as much as he would, he threwe out the rest and departed with the Cup. After that the Heraultes cryed a largesse thrise in the hall, and so went by to their stage. At the ende of dynner the Maior of London serued the king and Queene with Sporras, and had of eche of them a Cup of Golde with a couer of Golde. And by that tyme all was done it was darke night, and so the King and Queene returned to their Chambers, and euery man to his lodging.

Incontinent after thys feast he sent a solempne Ambassade to Lewys the French king to conclude a league and amity with him, trusting also to obteyne the tribute that king Edward his brother had before out of Fraunce. But the French king so abhorred him and his crueltie, that he would neyther see nor here his Ambassadors, & so in vaine they returned home agayne.

Now after this triumphant coronation, there fell mischiefes thicke and thicke, & as the thing euill gotten is neuer well kept, so through all the time of his vsurped reigne, neuer ceased their cruel murther, death, and slaughter, till his abone destruction ended it. But as he finished his time with the best death and most rightwise, that is to say his awne, so began he with the most pitteous and wicked, I meane the lamentable murther of his innocent Nephew the yong king and his tender brother, whose death and finall fortune hath neuertheless so farre come in question that some remayned long in doubt whether they were in his dayes destroyed or no. Not for that onely that Barkyn Warbeck by many folkes malice, and mo folkes folly so long space abusing the worlde, was as well with princes as with poore people reputed and taken for the yonger of these two: But for that also that all things were in late dayes so couertly demeaned, one thing pretended and another ment, that there was nothing so playne and openly prooued, but that yet for the common custome of close and couert dealing, men had it euer inwardly suspect, as many well counterfeit Jewels, make the true mistrusted. Howbeit, concerning y opinion, with the occasions mouing either party, we shall haue place more at large to intreate, in the storie of the late Noble Prince of famous memorie king Henry the seuenth, in the processe of Barkyn. But in the meane season, for this present matter I shall reherse to you the dolorous ende of these two Babes, not after euery waye that I haue heard, but after that waye that I haue so heard by such men and such meanes as me thinketh it were hard but it should be true.

King Richard after his coronacion, taking his waye to Glocester, to visite in his newe honour, the towne, of which he bare the name before of old, deuised as he rode to fulfill that thing which he before had entered. And forasmuch as his minde gaue him that his newe tows lying, n. n. would not recon that he coude haue right to the realme: he thought therfore without delay to ridde them, as though the killiug of his kynsmen might ende hys cause, and make him a kindly king. Where vpon he sent one John Greene, whome he specially trusted, vnto sir Robert Brakenburie, constable of the towre, with a letter and credence also, that the same sir Robert in anye wyse shoulde put the two children to death. This John Greene did his errand to Brakenburie, kneeling before our Ladye, in the Towre, who plainly answered that he would neuer put them to death, to die therfore. With y which answer John Greene returned, recompting the same to king Richard at Warwicke yet on his iourney, wherwith he toke such displeasure, & thought, that the same night, he sayd, to a secret page of his: Ah, whome shall a man trust: they that I haue brought by my selfe, they that I went would haue most surely serued me, euen those sayle me, & at my commaundement wyll do nothing for me. Sir quod the page, there lieth one in the palet chambze without, that I dare well say, to do your grace pleasure, the thing were right hard that he would refuse, meanyng this by sir James Tirrell, which was a man of right goodly personage, and for the giftes of nature worthy to haue serued a much better Prince, if he had well serued God, & by grace obteyned to haue as much truth and good will, as he had strength and witte. The man had an high hart, and soze longed bywarde, not risiug yet so fast as he had hoped being hindered and kept vnder by sir Richard Ratcliffe, and sir William Catesby, which longyng for no more partners of the Princes fauour, namelye not for him, whose pride they knewe would beare no pere, kept him in secret driffes out of all secret trust: which thing this page had well marked, and knowen: wherefore, thys occasion offered, of very speciall friendship spied his time to set him forward, and in such wise to do him good, that all the enemies that he had (except the Deuill) coude neuer haue done him so much hurt and shame, for vpon the Pages wordes, king Richard arose (for this communi-ration had he sitting on a Jaques, a conuenient carpet for such a counsaile) and came out into the palet chambze, where he did find in bed the sayd James Tyrrell, and sir Thomas Tyrrell, of person like, & brethren of blood, but nothing of kinne in condicions. Then sayde the king merely to them, what sirs, be you in bed so sone: and called by James Tyrrell, and brake to him secretly his minde, in this mischeuous matter, in the which he founde him nothing straunge. Wherfore on the morowe he sent him to Brakinburie with a letter by the which he was commaunded to deliuer to the sayd James all the keyes of the Towre for that night, to the ende that he might there accomplishe the kings pleasure in such things as he there had geuen him in commaundement. After which letter deliuered and the keyes receyued, James appointed the next night ensuyng to destroy them, deuilsyng befoze & preparyng y meanes.

The lamencable wordes of the yong king.

The Prince as sone as the Protectour toke vpon him to be king, and left the name of Protectour, was thereof aduertised and shewed, that he shoulde not raigne, but his vnckle shoulde haue the croone. At which word the prince soze abashed began to sighe, and sayde: Alas I woulde mine vnckle woulde let me haue my life, although I lese my kingdome. Then he that tolde him the tale bled him with good wordes, and put him in the best comfozt that hee coulde, but forthwith he and his brother were both shut vp, and all othet remoued from them, one called blacke Myll, or William Slaughter onely except, which were set to serue them, and foure other to see them sure. After which time, the Prince neuer tyed his pointes, nor any thing rought of hyrselfe, but with that yong babe his brother lnygered in thought & heauna lie, till this traiterous dede deliuered them of that wretchednesse.

Myles
Forest.
John Dighton.

For James Tyrrell deuised that they shoulde be murthured in their bras and no blood shed: to the execution whereof, he appointed Myles Forest one of the foure that befoze kept them, a felow fleshy bred in murthet befoze tane, and to him he ioyned one John Dighton, his awne horsekeeper, a big, brace square, and strong knaue. Then all the other beyng remoued from them, this Myles Forest, and John Dighton about midnight, the sely children lyng in their beddes, came into the chambze, and sodenly lapped them by anongest the clothes, and so be wrapped them, and entangled them, keepyng downe by force the fettherbed & pillowes hard vnto their mouthes, that within a while they smored, and stifled them, & their breathes saylyng, they gaue vp to God their innocent soules, into the ioyes of heauen, leauing to y tormentors their bodies, dead in y bed, which after the wretches perceued, first by the strugling, with the pangs of death, & after long lyng stil to be thoroughly dead, they layd the bodies naked out vpon the bed, & fetched James Tyrrell to see them, which when he saw them perfittly dead, he caused y murtherers to bury them at the stayre foote, metely deepe in the ground vnder a great heape of stones.

The yong
king and his brother murdered.

Then rode James Tyrrell in great haste to king Richard, and shewed him all the maner of the murder, who gaue him great thankes, and as men say, there made him knight, but he allowed not their buriall in so vile a corner, sayng that he woulde haue them buried in a better place, because they were a kings sonnes: To the honourable courage of a king, for he woulde recompence a detestable murthet with a solemne obsequie. Wherevpon a priest of Sir Robert Brakenburies toke them vp, and buried them in such a place secretly as by the occasion of his death (which was very shortly after) which onely knew it, the very truth coulde neuer yet be well and perfectly known. Some say that king Richard caused them to be taken by, and closed them in lead, & to put them in a Coffin full of holes, hooked at the endes with two hookes of yron, and so cast them into a place called the blacke Deepes, at the Thames mouth, so that they shoulde neuer rise by nor be seene againe. This was the verye truth vnknewen by reason that the sayde priest died so shortly, and disclosed it neuer to any person that woulde vtter it. And for a truth, when sir James Tyrrell was in the Tower for treason committed agaynst king Henry the seventh: both he and Dighton were examined together of this poynt, and both they confessed the murder to be done in the same maner as you haue heard, but whether the bodies were remoued, they both affirmed they neuer knewe. And thus as I haue learned of them that much knewe, and little cause had to lye, were these two noble Princes, these innocent tender children, borne of the most royall blood, and brought vp in great wealth, likely long to liue, to reigne & rule in the realme, by trayterous tyrannie taken and depriued of their estate, shortly shut vp in prison, and priuily slaine and murdered by the cruell ambition of their naturall vnckle and bys dispiteous tormentors: which thinges on euery part well pondered, God gaue this worlde neuer a more notable example, either in what vnfortunetie standety this worlde weale, or what mischiete worketh the proude enterpryce of an high heart, or finally what wretched ende ensueth of such dispiteous crueltie. For first to begin with the ministers, Myles Forest, at Saint Martines le graund, by pece meale miserably rotted away, John Dighton liued at Calice long after, no lesse disdeyned and hated then poynted at, and there dyed in great misery: But Sir James Tyrrell was behedded at the Tower hill for treason: And king Richard himselfe was slaine in the fielde, hacked, and heluen of his enemies hands, haried on a horseback naked being dead, his heare in dispite torne and tugged like a curre Dogge. And the mischiete that he tooke in lesse then thzee yeres, of the mischiete that he did in thzee monethes be not comparable, and yet all the meane time spent in much trouble and paine outwarde, and much feare, dreade, and anguillie within. For I haue heard by credible report, of such as were secret with his chamberers that after this abhominable deed done, he neuer was quiet in his mind, he neuer thought himselfe sure where he went abroade, his bodie priuily fainted, his eyen whirled aboute, his hande euer on his dagger, his countenance and maner like alwayes to strike againe, he toke euill rest on nightes, lay long wakyng and musyng, forweryed with care and watch, rather slumbered then slept, troubled with fearefull dreames, sodenly sometime start vp, leapt out of his bed and looked about the Chamber, so was his restless heart continually tossed and tumbled with the tedious impression and stormie remembrance of his abhominable murthet and execrable tyrannie.

King Richard by this abominable and mischicuous act, thinkyng himselfe well relieved both of feare and thought, woulde not haue it kept counsaile, but within a fewe dayes caused it to runne in a common rumor that the two children were sodainly deade, and to this entent as it is to be demed, that now none heyre male beyng alyue of king Edwardes bovie lawfully begotten, the people woulde be content with the more patient heart, and quiet mind to obey him and suffer his rule and gouernance: but when the fame of this detestable fact was reueled, and demulged through the tohole realme, there fell generally, such a dolor and inward sorow into the heartes of all the people, that all feare of his crueltie set asyde, they in euery towne, streete, and place, openly wept, and piteously sobbed. And when their sorow was somewhat mittigate, their inwarde grudge could not refrayne but crie out in places publike, and also priuate, furiously sayng, what creature of all creatures is so malicious and so obstinate an enemy either to God, or to Christian religion, or to humaine nature, which would not haue abhorred, or at the least absteyned from so miserable a murder of so execrable a tyranny. To murder a man is much odious, to kill a woman is in maner vnnaturall, but to slay and destroy innocent babes, and yong infantes, the whole world abhorreth, and the blood from the earth cryeth, for vengeance to almighty God. If the common people cryed out, I assure you the friendes of the Queene, and her children made no lesse exclamation and complaint with lowde voice, lamentably cryng and sayng, alas what will he doe to other, that thus shamefully murdereth his owne blood without cause or desert: whom will he saue when he slaieth the poore Lambes comitted to him in trust: now we see and behold that the most cruell tyrannie hath invaded the common welth, now we see that in him is neither hope of iustice nor trust of mercie, but abundance of crueltie and thirst of innocent blood. But when these newes were first brought to the infortunate mother of the deade children yet beyng in Sanctuarie, no doubt but it strake to her heart, like the sharpe darte of death: for when she was first informed of the murder of her two sonnes, she was so sodainly amazed with the greatnesse of the crueltie, that for feare she sounded and fell downe to the ground, and there lay in a great agonie like to a dead corps. And after that she came to her memoire, and was reuiued againe, she callyng by name diuers tymes her sweete babes, accounted her selfe more then mad that she deliuered her yonger sonne out of the Sanctuarie to his enemy to be put to death, thinkyng that next the othe made to God broken, and the duetic of alleageance toward her children violated, she of all creatures in that poynt was most seduced and disceyued. After long lamentacion, when she saw no hope of reuengyng otherwise, she kneeled downe and cried on God to take vengeance for the deceptfull periury, as who sayd that she nothing mistrusted but once he would remember it. What is he lyuyng that if he remember and beholde these two noble infantes without deseryng, so shamefully murdered, that will not abhorre the fact, yea and be moued and tormented with pitie and mercie. And yet the worlde is so frayle, and our nature so blinde that fewe be stirred with such examples, forgetting and little considering, that oftentimes for the offences by the parents perpetrate and committed, that sinne is punished in their line and posteritie. This chaunce might so happen to this innocent children, because king Edward their father and parent offended in staynyng his conscience: he made his solemne othe before the gate of the City of Yorke (as you haue heard before) and promised and sware one thing by his worde, thinkyng cleane contrarie in his heart, as after did appere. And afterwarde by the death of the Duke of Clarence his brother, he incurred (of likelyhoode) the great displeasure toward God.

Gloucester which he for his olde dignity both loued and with ample liberties and priuileges endued and garnished, he toke his iorney toward the Countie of Yorke, where the people abusing hys lawfull fauour, as he both fauored and trusted them in hys hart, had of late presumed to attempt diuers rootes and riots contrarie to his lawes and enfringing of his peace, and by on hope of his maintenaunce, were so exalted, that no Lorde, were he neuer of so great power could eyther pacifie or rule them till the king himself came personally thether to set a concord and an vnitie in that Countie, and so he by long iourneying came to the Citie of Yorke, where the Citizens receyued him with great pompe and triumph, and made diuers dayes playes and Pageants in token of ioy and solace. Wherefore King Richarde magnified and much commended them and also did shewe himselfe apparantly before them in habite royall with Scepter in hande and Diademe on his head, and made proclamation that all persons should resort to Yorke on the day of the Assention of our Lorde, where all men should both beholde him and his Queene and Prince in their high estates and degrees, and also for their good wylls shoulde receyue many thankes. At the daye appointed the whole Clergie assembled in Copes richelye reuested and so with a reuerent ceremonie went about the Citie in Procession, after whome folowed the king with his Crowne and Scepter appareled in his circote Robe royall accompanied with no small number of the Nobilitie of hys Realme: after whome marched in order Queene Anne hys wife lykewise crowned, leading on her left hande Prince Edward her sonne, hauing on hys head a Demy Crowne appointed for the degree of a Prince. The king was had in that triumph in such honoz, and the common people of the North so reioysed that they extolled and praysed him farre aboue the starres. After thys solemne feast and glorious pompe he kept great counsailes there, as well for the ordering of the Countie in time to come, as for the byrdeling and punishing of such as there had misgouerned themselves: and farther of the gentlemen of that Countie, he augmented the number of hys household, ministers and seruants, in the which persons he put his whole trust and affiaunce. When all things were thus discreetly ordered, he returned by Notyngham, and after came to London: whome more for dread then for loue, the Citizens receyued in great companies. Thus king Richard by a newe inuented cruelty and late practised tyrannie obteyned and grewe to high praise and honoz, and then by the admiration and iudgement of the common multitude, he was most esteemed to be exalted into heauen, when he couertly had intelligence that he was lyke to lose hys estate, and could by no meanes haue long continuance in hys vsurped power: for assuredly after the death of king Edwards children, when any blustering winde, perillous thunder, or terrible tempest chaunced or were apparauntly like to happen: Sodainly the people hauing in there fresh memoire the mischicuous act of their king and Prince, would openly speake and cry that God did take vengeance, and punish the poore English men for the crime and offence of their bngnacious king, whom they blamed, accursed, and wished to haue extreme tortures. Although king Richard harde often of these slanderous wordes and malicious sayngs and knewe well by what persons they were spoken, yet he durst not wyth strong hande be on the first inuantoys reuenged, knowyng that some time it is no wisdom to refuse or disdain them that tell a ruler his duetie, or declare to him his misbehauour toward the common welth or counsaile him to amende and chaunge hys yll lyfe. After this great felicitie, he fell agayne into a great feare and pensiuensse of minde, & because he could by no meanes eyther correct or amend things that were passed, he determined by doing his duetie in all things to his commons, to blot and put out of memorie that noie of infamie, with the which his fame was iustly spotted & stayned, and to cause the people to conceyue so good an opinion in him, that from thence forth no calamitie or trouble should be adiudged to happen to the common welth, eyther by his negligence or by his misgouernance (although it is harde and straunge shortly to turne and pluck out such qualities and vsages as haue of long time bene engrauen in a mans minde and rooted in his maners and conditions.) Therefore whether it was for the perfoimaunce of his former entent of amendment, or (as the common fame flue abroad) that he tooke great repentaunce of hys mischieuous actes, and deuillike doyngs, and pretended to haue the name of a good and vertuous man, by reason that he shewed himselfe more iust, more meeke, and more liberall (especially amongst the poore people) then befoze he had accustomed to doe, and so by thys meanes he surely trusted first to obteyne of God forgiuenesse, and after to remooue by little and little the enemic and inward grudge that the common people bare in their mindes toward him, and in conclusion, to obteyne their friendly loue and assured fauour. He further more beganne and enterprised diuers things as well publike as priuate, the which he bring prevented by sodaine death did neyther accomplishe nor bring to conclusion, for he began to founde a College of a hundred prestes, which foundation with the founder shortly tooke an ende. To please the common people also, he in his high Courte of Parliament enacted diuers and sundrie good lawes and profitable statutes and in especiall one agaynst straungers and forreyn wrought wares, not to be transported into this realme, which comodious act for the common welth if he had liued he fully purposed to haue auanced and set forward and put in execution. But afterward evidently to all persons it appeared, that onely feare (which is not a mayster long in office and in continuall auctoritie) and not iustice, caused king Richard at that berie time to waxe better and amend his sinnefull lyfe, for shortly the goodnesse of the man which was but painted and deceauable, sodainly waxed colde and banished away. And from thenceforth not onely all hys counsailes, doyngs and proceedings, sodainely decayed and sorted to none effect: But also fortune began to frowne and turne her wheele downward from him, in so much that he lost his onely begotten soune called Edward in the thirde Moneth, after he had created him Prince of Wales.

And shortly after he was inquieted by a conspiracy, or rather a confederacie betwene the Duke of Buckingham and many other gentlemen against him as ye shall here: But the occasion why the Duke and the king fell out, is of diuers folke diuersly pretended. Thys Duke as you haue heard befoze alioone as the Duke of Gloucester after the death of King Edward was come to Yorke, and there had solempne funerall seruice done for king Edward, sent to him a secret seruaunt of hys called Perfall, with such messages as you haue heard befoze. And after the Duke of Buckyngham came with three hundred horse to Northampton and still continued with him, as partner and chiefe organe of his deuises till after his coronation, they departed to all seeming berie friends at Gloucester. From whence as soon as the Duke came home, he so highly turned from him and so behemetyly conspired against him, that a man would marueyle whereof the chaunge grewe in so short space. Some say this occasion was that a little befoze the coronation, the Duke required the King amongst other things to be restored to the Earle of Hertfordes landes: And for as much as the tytle which he claymed by inheritance, was somewhat interlaced with the tytle of Lancaster, which house made a tytle to the crowne, and enioyed the same thre discentes, as all men knewe, till the house of Yorke depriued the thirde king, which was Henry the sixt, king Richard somewhat mistrusted and conceyued suche an indignation, that he reiected the Dukes request with many spitefull and knappishe wordes, which so wounded the Dukes hart with hatred and mistrust, that he could neuer after endure to looke right on king Richard, but euer feared hys awne lyfe, so farre forth, that when the Protector should ryde to his coronation, he feyned himselfe sicke, because he would doe him no honor. And the other taking it in euill part, sent him worde to rise and ride, or he would make him to be caried. Whereupon gorgeously apparelled and sumptuously trapped with burning cart naues of Golde embroidered, he roade befoze the King through London with an euill wyll and worse hart. And that notwithstanding he rose the daye of the coronation from the feast, faying himselfe sicke, which King Richard sayde was done in hate and spight of him. And therefore men sayde that eche of them euer after lyued continually in such hatred and distrust of other, that the Duke looked berily to haue bene murdered at Gloucester, from which he in fayze maner departed: but surely suche as were right secret with both, affirme all this to be vntreue, and otherwyse men thinke it vnlikely, the deepe dissimuling nature of both these men well considered. And what neede in that greene worlde the Protector had of the Duke, and in what perill the Duke stood if he fell once in suspicion of that tyrant, that eyther the Protector would geue the Duke occasion of displeasure, or the Duke the Protector occasion of mistrust: And surely men thinke that if king Richard had any suche opinion conceyued in him, he would neuer haue suffered him to auoyde his handes or escape his power: but berie true it is that the Duke of Buckyngham was an high minded man, and euil could beare the glorie of another, so that I haue heard of some that sawe it, that he at such time as the crowne was set vpon the Protectors head, his eye coulde neuer abide the sight thereof, but wynded his head another way: but men said he was not well at ease, and that was both to king Richard well knowne and well taken, nor any demaunde of the Dukes request vncourteously reiected, but gently deferred, but both he wyth great giffes and high behestes in most louing & trustie maner departed from the King to Gloucester. This euery man iudged as he thought, but soone after his coming home to Brecknocke, having there by king Richardes comaundement Doctor Morton Bishop of Ely, who befoze as you haue hard was take at the counsaile at y towre, waxed with him very familiar, whose onely wisdom abused his pride, to his awne deliuerance, and the Dukes destruction. The bishop was a man of great naturall witte, very well learned, and of honourable behauiour, lacking no wise wayes to winne fauour. Hez was first vpon the part of kyng Henry, while that part was in welth, and neyther left it nor forsoke it in no wo, but fled the realme with the Queene and the Prince. And whyle king Edward had king Henrye in prison, hee neuer returned but to the fielde at Barnet: after which fielde lost and bitterly subdued and all parte takings extinguished, king Edward for his fast fayth & wisdom, was not onely content to receyue him, but also wooed him to come, & had him from thenceforth both in secret trust, and speciall fauour whome he nothing deceyued. For he beyng after king Edwardes death first taken by the tyraunt king Richard, for his truth to king Edward found the meane to set the Duke of Buckingham in his topp, & ioyned Gentlemen together in ayde of the Erle of Richmond, which after was named king Henry the seuenth: first deuising the mariage betwene the Ladie Elizabeth, daughter to king Edward the fourth, by the which his faithfull & true seruice declared to both his maisters at once, was an infinite benefite to the realme, by the coniuntion of the bloods of Lancaster, and Yorke, whose seuerall titles had long iniquited the realme. This man afterwarde escaped from the Duke of Buckingham, and fled the realme, and went to Rome, neuer minding to meddle with the world, till king Henry the seuenth sent for him, and after made him Archebishop of Caunterbury, and Chauncelour of Englande, and after was made Cardinall, & lined well to all mens iudgements, and died well. But to returne to the former purpose he by the long, and often chaunges, as well of prosperitie, as aduerse fortune, had gotten by great experience the very mother and maistrisse of wisdom, and depe insight in pollitique and worldly driftes, whereby perceiuyng nowe the Duke to common with him, fed him with faire woordes, and many pleasant prayes, and perceiuyng by the grieve of their communications, the Dukes pride now and then to balke out a litle, braide of enuy toward the glory of the kyng, and thereby selyng him easie to fall out, if the matter were well handled, he craftely sought the wayes to pricke him forward takyng alwayes the occasion of his comming, & also kepyng himself close within his hands that he rather seemed to folow him then to lead him. For when the Duke began first to praise, and boast the king, & shew how much profite the realme should take by his reigne. Bishop Morton answered, surely my Lord, foly it were for me to lie, for I am sure if I would sweare the contrary, ye would not once beleue me, but if the world would haue gone as I would haue wysshed, y king Henries sonne had had the crowne & not kyng Edward, then would I haue bene his true & faithfull subiect, but after that God had ordayned him to lose it, and king Edward to reigne, I was neuer so mad w a dead man: to striue against the quick, so was I euer to king Edward a faithfull and true chapleyn, & glad would haue bene that his childre should haue succeeded him, howbeit if the secret iudgement of God, haue otherwise prouided, I purpose not to spurne against the prick, nor labor to set vp, that God pulleth dolone. And as for y late protectour, & now kyng: and with that worde he left, sauing that he said, that he had already medled to much with the worlde, and woulde from that daye medle with his booke and beades, and no further. Then longed the Duke sore to heare, what he woulde haue sayde, because he ended with the king, and there so sodainely stopped, and exhorted him familiarly, betwene them both to be bolde and to say whatsoeuer he thought, whereof he faithfully promised

there shoulde neuer come hurt, and peradventure moze good then he woulde wene. And that he himselfe entended to vse his faithfull secret aduice, & counsayle, which he sayde was the onely cause for the which he procured of the kyng to haue him in his custodie, where he might recon himselfe at home, or else he had bene put in the handes of them with whome he shoulde not haue founde like fauour. The Bishoppe right humbly thanked him, and sayde, in good faith my Lorde, I loue not much to talke of Princes, as of a thing not all out of perill, although the worde be without faulte, forasmuch as it shall not be taken as the partie ment it, but as it pleaseth the Prince to construe it. And euer I thinke on Ilopes tale, that when the Lion had proclaymed that on payne of death there shoulde no horned beastes come into the woode, one beast that had a bonche of flesh growyng out of bis heade, fled a great pace: the fore that sawe him stie with all the hast, asked him whether he fled? In faith quod he, I neyther wote, ne recke, so I were once hence, because of the proclamation made against horned beastes. What foole quod the fore, the Lyon neuer ment it by thee, for that which thou hast is no horne in thy heade. No mary quod he, I wot that well ynough, but if he saye it is a horne where am I then? The Duke laughed merely at the tale, and sayde, my Lorde I warraunt you, neyther the Lion, nor the Boze shall picke any matter at anye thing here spoken, for it shall neuer come neere their eares. In good fayth, sir sayde the bishop, if it did, the thing that I was about to saye taken as well as before God I ment, it could deserue but thanke, and yet taken as I wene it woulde, might happen to tourne me to little good, and you to lesse.

Then longed the Duke much moze to wete what it was, wher vpon the bishop sayde. In good faith my Lorde, as for the late Protectour, sith he is nowe king in possession, I purpose not to dispute his title, but for the welth of this realme, whereof his grace hath nowe the gouernaunce, and whereof I my selfe am a pooze member, I was about to wishe that to those good abilities whereof he hath alreddie right many, little needyng my prayse, yet might it haue pleased God for the better stoz to haue geuen him some of such other excellent vertues mete for the rule of the Realme, as our Lorde hath planted in the person of your grace, and there left of again. The Duke somewhat marueyllyng at his sodaine pauses, as though they were but Barrentheses, with a high countenance sayde: my Lorde I evidently perceyue and no lesse note your often breathing, and sodaine stoppyng in your communication, so that to my vnderstandyng your woordes neyther come to any direct or perfect sentence in conclusion, wherby either I might perceiue & haue knowlege what your inward intent is now toward the king, or what affection you beare toward me. For the comparison of good qualities ascribed to vs both, (for the which I my selfe knowlege and recognise to haue none, nor loke for no prayse of any Creature for the same) maketh mee not a litle to muse, thinking that you haue some other priuie imaginacion, by loue or by grudge engraued and imprinted in your heart, which for feare you dare not, or for childishe shamefastnesse you be abashed to disclose and reueale, and especially to me beyng your friend, which on my honour doe assure you to be as secrete in this case as the desse and dumme person is to the singer, or the tree to the hunter. The Bishop beyng somewhat bolder, consideryng the Dukes promise, but most of all animated and encouraged because he knewe the Duke

Whereto is written by Sir Thomas Moore, that is to say, from the beginning of the history of king Edward the first until this marke - setting one place which is noted in the first yere of this king.

desirous to be exalted and magnified, & also he perceyued the inward hatred and piniue rancor which he bare toward king Richard, was now boldened to open his stomack euen to the very bottome, entending therby to corasse how to destroy and bitterly confound king Richard & to depriue him of his dignity royall, or else to set the Duke so a fyre with the desire of ambicio, that he himselfe might be safe & escape out of al daunger & perill, which thing he brought shortly to conclusion, both to the kings destruction, and the Dukes confusion, & to his awne safegard, & finally to his high promociō. And so (as I said before) vpon trust & confidence of the Dukes promise, the Bishop sayd: my singuler good Lord, sith the time of my captiuitie, which being in your graces custody, I may rather call it a liberall libertie more then a straight emprisonment, in annoyding ydolnesse mother and nozisher of all vices, in readyng bookes and auncient Phamphlets, I haue found this sentence wozitten, that no man is bozne free and in libertie of himselfe onely, for one part of duetie he oweth or should owe to his parentes for his procreation due by nature: another part, to his friendes and kinsfolke for nerenesse of blood: But the native Country in the which he tasted first the sweete ayers of this pleasaunt and flatterynge worlde after his natiuitie, demaundeth as a debt by a naturall vnderstanding to be forgotten, which sayng causeth me to consider in what case this realme my native Country now standeth, and in what estate and assurance before this time it hath continued: what gouernour we nowe haue, and what ruler we now haue, and what ruler we might haue, for I plainly perceyue the realme beyng in this case must nedes decay and be brought to bitter confusion. But one hope I haue incorporate in my bzeast, that is, when I consider and in my minde doe diligently remember, and dayly beholde your noble personage, your iustice and indifferencie, your feruent zeale and ardent loue toward your naturall Country, and in like maner the loue of your Country toward you, the great learnyng, pregaunt witte, and goodly eloquence, which so much doth abound in the person of your grace, I must nedes think this Realme fortunate, yea twise more then fortunate, which hath suche a prince in store, mete and apt to be a gouernour, in whose person being endued with so many Princely qualities, consisteth and resteth the very vndoubted similitude and ymage of true honour. But on the other syde, when I call to memorie the good qualities of the late Protector, and now called king, so violated and subuerted by tyrannie, so chaunged and altered by vsurped authoritie, so clouded and shadowed by blind and insatiablen ambition, yea and so sedeinly (in a maner by a metamorphosis) transformed from polittike ciuilitie, to detestable tyrannie: I must nedes say and iustly affirme, that he is neither mete to be a king of so noble a realme, nor so famous a realme mete to be gouerned by such a tyraunt: Was not his first enterpryse to obteyne the Crowne begun by the murder of dyners noble, valiaunt, true, and vertuous personages? O a holy beginnyng to come to a mischieuous endyng, did he not secondarily procede contrary to all lawes of honestie, shamefully against his naturall mother, beyng a woman of much honour, and more vertue, declaring her openly to be a woman geuen to carnall affection, and dissolute liuyng, which thing if it had bene true (as it was not in deede) every good and naturall childe would haue rather mummied at, then to haue blasted abroad and especially she beyng aliue. Declaryng furthermore his two brethren, and his two nephewes to be Bastardes, and to be bozne in aduoutery, yet not therewithall this content: After that he had obteyned the garland for the which he so long thirsted, he caused the two poore innocentes his nephewes committed to him (for especial trust) to be murdered and shamefully to be killed. The blood of which stely and little babes dayly crie to God, from the earth for vengeaunce. Alas my heart sobbeth, to remember this bloody and cruell monster, what suretie shall be in this realme to any person either for life or goodes vnder suche a cruell Prince, which regardeth not the destruction of his awne blood, and then lesse the losse of other. And most especially as oftentimes it chaunceth, where a conetous or a cruell Prince taketh suspicion, the smallest swaruyng that is possible (if the thing be misconstrued) may be the cause of the destruction of many guiltlesse persons: and in especiall of noble and welthie personages, hauyng great possessions and riches: Such a Lozde is Lucifer when hee is entered into the heart of a proude Prince, geuen to conetousnesse and crueltie. But nowe my Lozde to conclude what I meane toward your noble person, I say and affirme, if you loue God, your linage, or your native Country, you must your selfe take vpon you the Crowne and Diademe of this noble Emppre, both for the mainenance of the honour of the same (which so long hath flourished in fame and renowne) as also for the deliuerance of your naturall Country men, from the bondage and thraldome (worse then the captiuitie of Egypt) of so cruell a tyraunt and arrogant oppressor. For thus I dare say, if any forrein Prince or Potentate, yea the Turke himselfe would take vpon him the regiment here and the crowne, the Commons would rather admit and obey him, then to liue vnder such a blood supper and childe killer: but how much more ioyfull and glad would they be to liue vnder your grace, whom they all know to be a ruler mete and conuenient for them, and they to be louyng and obedient subiectes mete to liue vnder such a gouernour: dispise not, nor forsake not so manifest an occasion so louyngly offered. And if you your selfe knowing the paine and trauaile that apperteyneth to the office of a king, or for any other consideration, will refuse to take vpon you the Crowne and Scepter of this realme: Then I adiure you by the fayth that you owe to God, by your honour, and by your othe made to Saint George, patron of the noble order of the gartier (whereof you be a Companion) and by the loue and affection that you beare to your native Country and the people of the same, to deuise some way how this realme now beyng in miserie may by your high discrecion and Princely pollicie, be brought and reduced to some suretie and conuenient regiment vnder some good gouernour by you to be named or picked out. For if you could either deuise to set vp againe the linage of Lancaster, or aduance the eldest daughter of king Edward to some highe and pridaunt Prince, not onely the newe crowned king shall small tyme enjoy the glory of his dignitie, but also all ciuill warre should ceasse, and peace, profite and quietnesse should be set forth and embraced.

When the Bishop had thus ended his sayng, the Duke sighed and spake not of a great while, which sore abashed the Bishop and made him change couler: which thing when the Duke apperceyued, he sayde, be not afraid my Lord, all promises shall be kept, to morow we wil common more: let vs go to supper, so that night they commoned no more, not a little to the inquieting of the Bishop, which nowe was euen as desirous to knowe the Dukes minde and entent, as the Duke longed the day befoze to knowe his opinion and meanyng. So the next day, the Duke sent for the Bishop, and reherfed to him in maner (for he was both wittie and eloquent) all the communication had betwene them befoze, and so pauised a while, and after a litle season putting of his bonet he sayde: O Lorde God creator of all thynges howe much is this realme of Englande and the people of the same bounden to thy goodnesse, for where we nowe be in veration and trouble, and with great stormes oppzessed, sailing and tossing in a desperate shippe without good mayster or gouernoz: but by thy helpe good Lorde I trust or long time passe that we shall prouide for such a ruler, as shall be betw to thy pleasure, and also to the maintenaunce and defence of this noble Realme. And then he put on his Bonet, saying to the Bishop, my Lorde of Ely whose true heart and sincere affection toward me at all tymes, I haue evidently perceiued and knowen, and now most of al in our last priuie communication, and secrete deuising, I must nedes in heart thinke and with mouth confesse and say, that you be a sure friend, a trustie Counsaylor, a vigilant forer, a very louer of your Countrie, & a natural Countreman: for which kindnesse for my part, I most louyngly render to you my hearty thanks nowe with wordes: hereafter trusting to recompence and reward you both decedes, if life and power shall serue. And sith at our last communication, you haue disclosed, and opened, the verie secretes and priuities of your stomake, touching the Duke of Glocester nowe vsurper of the Crowne, and also haue a litle touched the auancement of the two noble families of Porke and Lancaster: I shall likewise not onely declare and manifest vnto you, all my open actes, attemptes, and doynges, but also my priuie ententes, and secrete thoughtes. To the entent that as you haue vnbuckled your Bouget of your priuie meanynges, and secrete purposes to me: so shall all my clowdie working, close deuises, and secret imaginations, be (as cleere as the Sunne) reueled, opened, and made lightsome to you. And to beginne, I declare: that when king Edward was diseased, to whome I thought my selfe litle or nothing beholding, (although we two had married two sisters) because, he neyther promoted nor preferred me (as I thought I was worthie and had deserved) neither fauoured nor regarded me, accordyng to my degre and birth: For surely I had by him litt'e aucthoritie, and esse rule, and in effect nothing at all: which caused me lesse to fauour his children, because I found small humanitic, or none in their parent. I then began to studie, and with good deliberation, to ponder and consider, howe and in what maner thys realme should be ruled and gouerned. And first I remembzed an olde proverbe worthie of memorie, that often rueth the realme, where children rule, and woman gouerne. This olde adage so sanke, and settled in my heade, that I thought it a great error and extreme mischiefe to the whole realme, eyther to suffer the yong king to rule, or the Queene his mother to be a gouernour ouer him, considering that her brethren, and her first children (although they were not extract of highe and nob'e lynage) tooke moze vpon them, and more exalted themselues by reason of the Queene, then did the kinges brethren, or anye Duke in his Realme: Which in conclusion turned to their confusion. Then I beyng perswaded with my selfe in thys poynt, thought it necessarye both for the publique and profitable welth of thys Realme, and also for myne awne commoditie and better staye, to take part with the Duke of Gloucester: Whome I assure you I thought to be as cleane without dissimulation, as tractable without iniurye, as mercifull without crueltie, as nowe I knowe hym perfectlye to be a Dissimuler, without veritye, a Tyrant without pittie, yea and worse then the Tyrant Phaleres, destitute of all truth and clemencie: And so by my meanes, at the first counsaile holden at London, when he was most suspected of that thyng that after happened, (as you my Lorde knowe well ynough) hee was made Protector and defender, both of the Kinge and of the realme, which aucthoritie once gotten, and the two children partly by my pollicie brought vnder hys gouernaunce, he beyng moued with that gnawing and couetous Serpent, desired to raygne & neuer ceased priuie to exhorite and require (yea and some times with threating termes) to perswade me and other Lorde as well spirituall as temporall, that he might take vpon hym the crowne, till the Prince came to the age of foure and twentie yeres, and were able to gouerne the realme, as an hable and sufficient king: Which thing when he sawe me somewhat stick at, both for the straungenesse of the example (because no such president had bene seene) and also because we remembered that men once assended to the highest tye of honoz and aucthoritie will not gladly discende agayne, he then brought in instruments, autentike Doctors, Doctors, and notaries of the lawe, with depositions of dyuers wytnesses testifying king Edwardes children to be Bastardes, which depositions then I thought to be as true, as nowe I knowe them to be fayned, and testified by persons with rewardes vntreuely subornate. When the saide depositions were befoze vs red and diligently heard, he stood by bare headed saying: Well my Lordes, euen as I and you sage and discrete counsaillers woulde that my Nephew should haue no wrong: So I praye you doe me nothing but right. For these witnelles and sayngs of famous Doctors being true. I am onely the vndoubted heyre to the Lorde Richarde Plantagenet Duke of Porke, adiudged to be the verie heyre to the crowne of this realme by aucthoritie of parliament, which thyngs so by learned men to vs for a veritie declared, caused me and other to take him for our lawfull and vndoubted prince and souereigne Lorde. For well we knewe that the Duke of Clarence sonne, by reason of the attaynder of his father was disabled to inherite, and also the Duke himselfe was named to be a bastarde, as I my selfe haue heard spoken, and that vpon great presumptions moze times then one: so agayne by my ayde and fauour, he of a Protector was made a King, and of a subiect made a gouernour, at which time he promised me on his fidelitie, laying his hand in mine at Baynard Castell, that the two yong Princes should lyue, and that he would so prouide for them, and so maintaine them in honorable estate, that I and all the realme ought and should be content. But when he was once crowned king, and in full possession of the whole realme, he cast away his olde conditions as the Adder doth her skinne, veryfying the olde proverbe, honozs chaunge maners, as the parishe priest remembreth not that euer he was parishe Clarke. For when I my selfe sued to him for my part of the Erle of Harfordes landes, which his brother king Edward wrongfully detepned and withheld from mee, and also required to haue the

 ters befoze thys time haue had, and in long discent continued. In thys my first sayte shewing his good minde towarde me, he did not onely first delaye me, and afterwarde deny me, but gaue me such unkinde wordes, with such tauntes and retauntes, ye in maner, check and check mate to the bittermost prooffe of my pacience. As though I had put him downe and not set him by:
 yett all these ungratitudes and undeserued unkindnesse, I bare closlye and suffered patiently and couertly remembred, outwardlye dissimulyng that I inwardly thought, and so with a painted countenaunce I passed the last sommer in his last company, not without many fayre promises, but without any good deedes. But when I was credibly enformed of the death of the two yong innocents, his awne naturall Nephewes contrarie to his fayth and promise, to the which God be my iudge I neuer agreed nor cōdescended. O Lord how my baynes panted, howe my body trembled and howe my hart inwardly grudged, in so much that I so abhorred the sight and much moze the company of him, that I could no lenger abide in his Court, except I should be openly reuenged. The ende whereof was doubtfull, and so I faryed a cause to departe, and with a merie countenaunce and a dispitfull hart I tooke my leaue humbly of him (he thinking nothing lesse then that I was displeasid) and so returned to Brecknock to you. But in the iourney as I returned, whether it were by the inspiration of the holy ghost, or by Melencolous disposition, I had diuers and sundrie imaginations howe to depriue this unnaturall Uncle, and bloody Butcher, from his royall seate and princely dignitie. First I phantasied that if I list to take vpon me the crowne and impe-riall Scepter of the realme, now was the time propice and conuenient. For nowe was the way made plaine, and the gate opened, and occasion geuen, which now neglected, should paraduenture neuer take such effect and conclusion. For I sawe he was disdayned of the Lordes temporall, abhorred and accursed of the Lordes spirituall, detested of all Gentemen, and despised of al the communitie: so that I saw my chaunce as perfittely as I saw my awne Image in a glasse, that there was no person (if I had beene greedy to attempt the enterpryse) could nor should haue won the ring or got the goale before me. And on this point I rested in imagination secretly with my selfe two dayes at Tewkesburie. And from thence so iorneyng I mused and thought that it was not best nor conuenient to take vpon me as a conquerour, for then I knew that all men and especially the nobilitie, would with all their power withstand me, both for rescuing of possessions and tenors, as also for subuer-ting of the whole estate, lawes, and customes of the realme: Such a power hath a Conquerour as you knowe well ynough my Lorde. But at the last, in all this doubtfull case there sprang a new braunche out of my head, which surely I thought should haue brought forth fayre flowres, but the sonne was so hote that they turned to drie weedes, for I sodainly remembred that Lord Edmond Duke of Sommer set my Grandfather was with king Henrie the sixt in the second and thirde degrees from John Duke of Lancaster lawfully begotten: So that I thought sure my mother being eldest daughter to Duke Edmonde, that I was next heyre to king Henry the sixt of the house of Lancaster. This title pleased well such as I made priuie of my counsaile, but much moze it encouraged my folish desire, and entent, in so much that clerely clerely I iudged, and in mine owne minde was determinatlye resolved, that I was the vndoubted heire, of the house of Lancaster, and there by on concluded, to make my first foundacion, and erect my new buildyng. But whether God so ordained, or by fortune it so chaunced while I was in a mase, either to conclude sodainly on this title, and to set it open amongst the common people, or to kepe it secret for a while, see the chaunce: as I rode betwene worcester and Bridgenorth, I encountered with the Lady Margaret, Countesse of Richmonde, now wife to the Lorde Stanley, which is the beye daughter and sole heyre, to Lorde John Duke of Sommer set my grandfathers eldest brother. Which was as cleane out of my minde as though I had neuer sene her, so that she and her some the Erle of Richmonde be both bulwarcke and portcolice betwene mee, and the gate, to enter into the maiestie royall and getting of the Crowne. And when we had commoned a little concerning her sonne, as I shall shew you after, and were departed, she to our Lady of worceter, and I towarde Shrewesberie: I then new chaunged and in maner amased, began to dispute with my selfe, litle consideryng that thus my earnest title was turned euen to a Tittill not so good as est amen. Cyttones I imagined whether I were best to take vpon me, by the election of the nobilitie, and commonaltie, which me thought easie to be done, the vsurpoyng thus beyng in hatred, & abhorred of this whole realme or to take it by power, which standeth in fortunes chaunce, and harde to be achieved and brought to passe.

 Thus rumblyng and tossyng, in the waues of ambiguitie, betwene the stone, and sacrifice, I considered first the office, duetie, and payne of a king, which surely I thinke that no mortall man can iustly, and truly obserue, except he be called, elected, and specially appointed by God, as king David, and diuers other haue bene. But farther I remembered that if I once tooke on me the scepter, and the gouernance of the realme: That of two extreme enemies I was dayly sure but of one trusty friende (which now a dayes begon a pilgrimage) I was neyther assured, nor credibly ascertayned (such is the worldes mutation) for I manifestlye perceiued that the daughters of kyng Edward and their alies, and friendes, which be no small number, beyng both, for hys sake much beloued, and also for the great iniurie, and manifest tirannie done to them, by the newe vsurper, much lamented, and pitied, would neuer cease to barke if they cannot bite at the one side of me. Semblable my Cousin the Erle of Richmonde, his aydes and kinsfolke, which bee not of little power, will surely attempt lyke a fierce greghoude, either to bite or to pierce me on the other syde. So that my lyfe and rule should euer hang by a heare, neuer in quiet, but euer in doubt of death or deposition. And if the sayde two lina-ges of Yorke and Lancaster, which so long haue stryued for the imperiall Diademe should ioyne in one agaynst me, then were I surely mated and the game gotten. Wherefore I haue cleerely determined, and with my selfe concluded, utterly to relinquish all such phantasticall imaginations concerning the obteyning of the crowne. But all such plagues, calamities and troubles (which I feared and suspected) might haue chaunced on me if I had taken the rule and regiment of thys realme, I shall with a reredemayne so make them rebound to our common enemy that calleth himselfe King, that the best stopper that he hath at tennyre shal not well stop without a fault: for as I tolde you befoze, the Countesse of Richmonde in my returne from the

newe named King, meeting me in the high way, prayed me first for kindred sake, secondarily for the loue that I bare to my Grandfather Duke Humfrey, which was sworne brother to her father, to moue the King to be good to her sonne Henry Erle of Richemond, and to licence him with his fauour to returne agayne into Englande: and if it were his pleasure so to doe, shee promised that the Erle her sonne should marry one of king Edwards daughters at the appointment of the king, without any thing to be taken or demanded for the sayde espousals, but onely the Kinges fauour, which request I sone ouer passed and gaue her sayre words and so departed. But after in my lodging when I called to memorie with a deliberate studie, and did circumspectly ponder them, I fully adiudged that the holy ghost caused her to moue a thing (the ende whereof shee could not consider) both for the securitie of the realme, as also for the preferment of her childe, and the destruction and final confusion of the common enemy king Richard. Which thing, she neither then thought I am sure, as I by her words could make coniecture, nor I my selfe cast not her desire to be so profitable to the realme as I nowe doe perceyue, but such a Lorde is God, that with a little sparle he kindled a great fyre, and so finally to declare to you the verie conclusion to the which I am both bent and set, my mind is, and my power and purse shall helpe, that the Erle of Richmond very heyre to the house of Lancaster (in the quarell of the which linage, both my father and Grandfather lost their lyues in battayl) shall take to wyfe Lady Elizabeth eldest daughter to king Edward, by the which marriage both the houses of Yorke and Lancaster maye be obteyned and vnite in one, to the clere stablishment of the title to the crowne of this noble realme. To which conclusion, if the mothers of both parties and especially the Erle himselfe, and the Ladie wyll agree, I doubt not but the bragging Boze, which with his tuskes raseth euery mans saine, shall not only be brought to confusion as he hath deserued but þ this Empire shall euer be certayne of an vndoubted heire, and then shall a civil and intestine warre cease, which so long hath continued to the paring of many mens crownes, & this realme shall be reduced agayne to quietnesse, renoume, and glozy. When the Duke had said, the Bishop, which fauoured euer the house of Lancaster, was wonderous ioyfull, and much reioyced to here this deuice, for now carrye the winde about euen as he would haue it, for al his imagination tended to his effect to haue king Richard subdued, and to haue the lines of king Edward, & king Henry the first agayne raysed & aduanced. But Lord how he reioyced to thinke how that by this marriage the linages of Yorke and Lancaster should be conioyned in one, to the very stedfastnesse of the publike welth of this realme. And least the Dukes courage should swage, or his minde should agayne alter, as it did often before, as you may easily perceyue by his awne tale. He thought to set by all the sayles that he had, to the entent that the ship of his pretended purpose might come shortly to some sure port: And sayde to the Duke, my Lorde, sith by Gods high prouision and your incomparable wisdom and pollicie, this noble coniunction is first inoued, nowe is it conuenient, yea and necessary to consider, what personages and what friends we shall first make priuie of this highe deuice, and polittique conclusion. By my truth, quod the Duke, we will begin with my Ladie of Richmond the Erles mother which knoweth where he is, either in captiuitie or at large in Britaine. For I heard heard say that the Duke of Briteyne restored him to libertie immediately after the death of king Edward, by whose meanes he was restrained. Sith you will begin that way (sayde the Bishop) I haue an olde friend with the Countesse, a man sober, secret, and well witted, called Reignold Brey whose prudent pollicie I haue knowen to haue compassed thinges of great importance, for whome I shall secretly sende, if it be your pleasure; and I doubt not he will gladly come, and that with a good will. So with a little diligence the bishop wrote a letter to Reignold Brey, requiryng him to come to Brecknocke with speede, for great and vrgent causes touchyng his maistresse: and no other thing was declared in the letter. So the messenger rode into Lancashire where Brey was with the Countesse and Lorde Thomas Stanley her husband, and deliuered the letter, which when he had red, he tooke it as a signe or token of some good fortune to come, and so with the messenger he came to the Castell of Brecknock, where the Duke and the Bishop declared what thing was deuised, both for to set the realme in a quiet stedfastnesse, as also for the highe preferment of the Erle of Richemond sonne to his Ladie and maistresse: Willyng her first to compasse howe to obteine the good will of Queene Elizabeth, & also of her eldest daughter bearyng the same name: and after secretly to send to her sonne into Briteyne to declare what high honoz was prepared for him if he would sweare to marry the Ladie Elizabeth as sone as he was king, and in royall possession of the Realme. Reignold Brey with a glad heart for gettyng nothing genen to him in charge, in great hast and with good speede returned to the Countesse his Ladie and Maistresse. When Brey was departed, and this great doubtfull besell once set abroche, the Bishop thyrstyng for nothing more then for libertie: When he sawe the Duke pleasaunt and well minded towarde him, he tolde the Duke that if he were in his Isle of Gye, he could make many friendes to further that enterprise, and if he were there, and had but foure dayes warnyng, he little regarded the malice of king Richard, his Countrie was so strong. The Duke knewe well all this to be true, but yet loth he was that the Bishop should depart, for he knewe well that as long as the Bishop was with him, he was sure of polittique aduise, sage counsaile, and circumspect proceeding. And so he gaue the Bishop sayre wordes, sayng that he should shortly depart, and that well accompanied for feare of his enemies. The Bishop beyng as wittie as the Duke was wilpe, did not tary till the Dukes companie were assembled, but secretly disguised in a night departed (to the Dukes great displeasure) and came to the See of Ely, where he found money and friendes, and so sayled into Flaunders, where he did the Erle of Richemond good seruice, and neuer returned agayne, till the Erle of Richemond after beyng king, sent for him, and shortly promoted him to the See of Caunforburie. Thus the Bishop wound himselfe from the Duke when he had most neede of his ayde, for if he had taried stil, the Duke had not made so many blabbes of his counsaile, nor put so much confidence in the Welthemen, nor yet so rashely set forwarde without knowlege of his friendes as he did, which thinges were his fodein ouerthrow, as they that knewe it did report.

When Reignold Brey had declared his message and priuie instruction to the Countesse of Richemond his Maistresse, no maruaile though she was ioyous and glad both of the good newes, and also for the obteyning of such a high friend in her sonnes cause as the duke was: wherfore she willing not to

leepe this matter, but to further it to the bittermost of her power and abilitie, deuised a meanes how to breake thys matter to Queene Elizabeth then beyng in Sanctuare at Westminster. And therupon she hauing in her familie at that time for the preservation of her helth, a certayne Welshman called Lewys learned in phisicke, which for his grauity and experieuce, was well knobone & much esteemed amongst great estates of the realme: with whom she bled sometime liberally & familiarly to talke, now hauing oportunitie and occasion to breake her minde vnto him of this weighty matter, declared that the time was come that her sonne should be ioyned in mariage with Lady Elizabeth daughter and heyre to king Edward, and that king Rycharde beyng taken and reputed of all men for the common enemye of the realme, shoulde out of all honoz and estate be reiected, and of his rule and kingdome to be clerely spoyled and expelled: and required him to go to Queene Elizabeth (with whom in his facultie he was of counsaile) not as a messenger, but as one that came friendly to visite and consolats her, and as tyme and place shoulde require to make her prinie of this deuise, not as a thing concluded, but as a purpose by him imagined. This phisician dyd not long lenger to accomplish her desyre, but with good diligence repaired to the Queene being still in the sanctuare at Westminster. And when he saw tyme convenient for his purpose, he saide vnto her: Madame, although my imagination be very simple, and my deuise more folish, yet for the entier affection that I bere toward you and your children, I am so bolde to bitter vnto you a secret and priuy conceit, that I haue cast and compassed in my fantasticall brayne. When I well remember, and no lesse consider the great losse and dammage that you haue sustayned by the death of your noble and louing husbande, and the great dolor, & sorowe that you haue suffered, by the cruell murder of your innocent children: I can no lesse do of bounden dutie, then dayly to studie, and hourely imagin, not onely how to bring your hart to comfort and gladnesse, but also deuise how to reuenge the righteous quarrel of you, and your children en that bloody bloodsupper, and cruell tirant king Richard. And first consider, what battaile, what manslaughter, what mischief hath risen in this realme, by the diffencion betwene the two noble houses of Yorke and Lancaster, which two families (as I haue contriued) if they may be ioyned in one, I thinke, ye and doubt not but your line shall be agayne restored to the pristinate estate and degree, to your great ioy and comfort, and to the bitter confusion of your mortall enemye the vsurped king. You knowe verie well Madame that of the house of Lancaster, the Erle of Richemond is next of blood, which is lyuing and a lustie yong Watcheler, and to the house of Yorke your daughters now are heyres: if you could agree and inuent the meane how to couple your eldest daughter with the yong Erle of Richemond in matrimony, no doubt but the vsurper of the realme should be shortly deposed, and your heire agayne to her right restored.

When the Queene had hard thys friendly mocion (which was as farre from her thought as the man that the rude people say is in the Stone) Lorde how her spirites reuyued, and how her hart lept in her body for ioy and gladnesse. And first geuing laude to almightie God as the chiefe author of her comfort, secondarily to Mayster Lewys as the deuiler of the good newes and tydings, instauntly besought him that as he had bene the first inuenter uenter of so good an enterpryse, that now he would not relinquish nor desist to folowe the same: requiryng hym farther (because he was apperteyning to the Countesse of Richemond, mother to the Erle Henry) that he would with all diligent celeritie resort to her, then lodging in her husbands place within the Citie of London, and to declare on the Queenes behalf to the Countesse, that all the friends and fautours of King Edward her husbande, should assist and take parte with the Erle of Richemond her sonne, so that he would take a corporall othe after the kingdome obteyned, to espouse and take to wyfe the Ladie Elizabeth her daughter, or else Ladye Cecile, if the eldest daughter were not then lyuing.

Mayster Lewys wyth all diligence so sped his businesse that he made and concluded a finall ende and determination of thys enterpryse betweene the two mothers, and because he was a phisitian and out of all suspition and misdeeming, he was the common curre and daylie messenger betwene them apding and setting forth the inuented conspiracie agaynst king Rycharde. So the Lady Margaret Countesse of Richemond brought into a good hope of the preferment of her sonne, made Reygnold Bray her most faythfull seruant chiefe soliciter and priue procurer of thys conspiracie, geuyng him in charge secretly to enuegle and attract such persons of nobility to ioyne with her and take her part as he knewe to be ingenious, faythfull, diligent and of actiuitie. This Reygnolde Bray within a fewe dayes brought vnto his lure (first of all taking of euery person a solempne othe to be true and secret) syz Gyles Daubenei, syz John Cheiney knight, Richarde Gylforde and Thomas Raine Esquiers and diuers other. The Countesse of Richemond was not so diligent for her part, but Queene Elizabeth was as biglaunt on the other side and made friendes and appointed Counsellers to set forward and auance her businesse. In the meane season the Countesse of Richemond toke into her seruice Christopher Urswike an honest and a wise priest, and after an othe of him to be secret taken and sworne, she vttered to him all her minde and counsell, adhibityng to him the more confidence and truth for that he all hys lyfe had fauoured and taken part with king Henry the first, & as a speciall Jewell put to her seruice by syz Lewys her phisitian. So the mother studious for the prosperitie of her sonne, appointed thys Christopher Urswike to sayle into Britayne to the Erle of Richemond and to declare and bitter to him all pactes and agreements betwene her and the Queene agreed and concluded: But sodainely she remembryng that the Duke of Buckyngham was one of the first inuenteres, and a secret founder of this enterpryse, determined to sende some personage of more estimation then her Chaplaine, and so elected for a messenger Hugh Conwey Esquire and sent him into Britayne with a great somme of money to her sonne, geuyng him in charge to declare to the Erle the great loue and especiall fauour that the most part of the nobilitie of the realme bare toward him, the louing hartes and beneuolent minds which the whole commonalty of their aboue free wil frankly offred & liberally exhibited to him, wylling & aduising him not to neglect so good an occasion apparently offred, but with al speede and diligence to addict & set his minde and full intention how to returne home agayne into England where he was both wished & looked for, geuyng him farther monicion and counsell to take lande and arriual in the principlitie of Wales, where he should not doubt to find both aide, comfort and friends. Richard Gylford, lest Hugh Conwey might fortune to be taken or stopped at Plimmoth, where he intended to take shipping, sent out of Kent Thomas Hamme with the same instructions: & both made such diligence, and had such winde and weather, the one by lande from Caleys, & the other by water from Plimmoth, that within lesse then an houre both arrived in the Duke of Britaynes court, & spake with the Erle of Richmond, which from the death of king Edward went at his pleasure and libertie, and to him counted and manifested the cause and effect of their message and ambassade. When the Erle had received this ioyfull message, which was the more pleasaunt because it was unlooked for, he rendered to God his most heartie thanks, hoping that such things as he with busie minde and careful intent had wished and desired should now come to passe, and now being put in comfort of his long longing, he brake to the Duke of Britayne all his secrets and priue messages which were to him declared, advertisyng him that he was entred into a sure and stedfast hope to obteyne and get the crowne and kingdome of the realme of England desyring him both of his good wyll and friendly helpe towards the achieuyng of his offered enterprise, promysing him when he came to hys intended purpose to render to him againe equal kinnesse and condigne recompence.

Although the Duke of Britayne before that day by Thomas Hutton Ambassadoz from king Richarde had both by money & prayers bene sollicitted and moued to put agayne into safe custodie the Erle of Richmond, he neuertheless promised faithfully to aide him, and his promise he truly performed.

Wherebyon the Erle with all diligence sent into England againe Hugh Conwey and Thomas Ham, which should declare his comynng shortly into Englande, to the entent that all thinges which by counsell might be for his purpose provided, should be speedily and diligently done, and that all thinges doubtfull should of his friends be prudently forseen, in aduoyding all engins and snares which king Richarde hadde or might, set in disturbanice of hys purpose, and hce in the meane season woulde make his abode still in Britayne, till all thinges necessary for his iorney were prepared and brought in a readinesse.

In the meane season the chiefetaines of the coniuration in England began together many enterprises: Some in conuenient fortresses put strong garrisons: Some kept armed men priuily, to the entent when they should haue knowlege of the Erles landing, they woulde begonne to stirre by the warre: Other did secretly moue and sollicite the people to rise and make an insurrection: Other (amongst whome John Morton Bishop of Ely then being in Flaunders was chiefe) by priue letters and cloked messengers, dyd stirre and moue to this new coniuration, al such which they certainly knewe to haue a rooted hatred or to beare a cankerd malice towarde king Richarde and his proceedings.

Although this great enterprise were neuer so priuily handled and so secretly amongst so circumspect persons treated, compassed and conueyed, yet knowledge thereof came to the eares of kyng Richarde, which with the sodayne chaunce was not a little moued and astonnyed. First because he had no host ready prepared: Secundarily, if he should raise an armie so sodainly, he knewe not where to meete his enemies, or whether to go, or where to tary.

Wherefore

Wherefore he determined to dissemble the matter as though he knew nothing till he had assembled his host, & in the meane season either by the rumoz of the common people, or by the diligence of his espialles to search out all the counselles, determinations, ententes, and compasses of his close aduersaries, or else by pollicie to intercept and take some person of the same coniuration, considering that there is no more secret nor hyd espyall then that which lurketh in dissimulation of knowlege and intelligence, or is hydden in name & shadow of counterfeit humanitie and feined kindnesse. And because he knewe the Duke of Buckingham to be the chiefe head and aide of the coiuration, he thought it most necessary to plucke him from that part, either by faire promises or open warre. Wherebyon he addressed his louyng letters to the Duke, full of gentle wordes, and most friendly speche, geuyng farther in charge to the messenger that caried the letter, to promise to the Duke on his behalfe, golden hilles, and siluer riuers, and with all gentle and pleasaunt meanes to perswade, and exhort the Duke to come to the Court. But the Duke as wilie as the king, mistrustyng the faire flatterynge wordes, and the gaye promises to him so sodainly, without any cause offered, knowyng the craftie castes of king Richardes bowe, which in diuers affaires before tyme he had sene practised, required the king to pardon him, excusing himselfe that he was so diseased in his stomacke that skant he coude take eyther refection or rest. King Richarde not beyng content with this excuse woulde in no wise admitte the same, but incontinent directed to the Duke other letters, of a more rougher & hauier sort, not without taunting and biting termes, & checking wordes, commaundyng him all excuses set apart, to repaire without any delaye to his royall presence. The Duke made to the messenger a determinate aunswere that he woulde not come to his mortall enemy, whome he neyther loued, nor fauoured: and immediatly prepared open warre against him, and perswaded all his complices and partakers that euery man should in his quarter with all diligence raise by the people and make a commotion. And by thys meanes almost in one moment Thomas Marques Dorset came out of sanctuarie where he sith the begynnyng of king Richardes dayes had continued, whose life by the only help of sir Thomas Louel Esquier, was preserved fro all daunger and perill in this troublesome worlde, gathered together a great bande of men in Porkehire. Sir Edward Courtney and Peter his brother Bishop of Excester, rayfed another armie in Deuonshire, and Cornewall. In Kent, Richard Gylforde and other Gentlemen, collected a great companie of Souldiours, and openly began warre. But king Richard which in the meane tyme had gotten together a great strength and puissance, thinking it not most for his part beneficiall to disperse and deuide his great armie into small braunches, and perticulerly to persecute any one of the coniuration by himselfe, determined al other thinges being set aside, with his whole puissance to set on the chiefe hed which was the Duke of Buckingham. And so remouyng from London, he tooke his iourney toward Salisbury, to the entent that in his iourney he might set on the Dukes armie, if he might knowe him in any place encamped or in order of battaile arrayed. The king was scarce two dayes iourney from Salisbury when the Duke of Buckingham accompanied with a great power of wilde Welshemen, whome he beyng a man of great courage and sharpe speche in maner agaynst their willes had rather thereto thereto enforced and compelled by Lordly and strait commaundment then by liberal wages and gentle reteynour, which thing was the very occasion why they left him desolate, and cowardly forsooke him. The Duke with all his power marched through the Forrest of Deane entendyng to haue passed the riuer of Seuerne at Glocester, and there to haue ioyned in armie with the Courtneys, and other Westerne men of his confederacie and affinitie, which if he had done, no doubt but king Richard had bene in great leoparchie either of priuation of his realme, or losse of his life or both. But see the chaunce, before he could attaine to Seuerne syde, by force of continuall raine and moisture, the ryuer rose so high that it ouerflowed all the Countrie adioynyng, insomuch that men were drowned in their beddes, and houses with the extreme violence were ouerturned, children were caryed about the fieldes, swimmyng in Cradels, beastes were drowned on hilles, which rage of water lasted continually ten dayes, in so much that in the Countrie adioynyng, they call it to this day, the great water, or the Duke of Buckingham's great water. By this flood the passages were so closed that neyther the Duke could come ouer Seuerne to his Complices, nor they to him, during the which tyme, the Welshemen luyng ydely and without money, buttaile, or wages, sodainly scattered and departed: and for all the Dukes sayre promyses, threathnyngs, and enforcements, they would in no wise neither go farther nor abide. The Duke beyng thus left almost post alone was of necessitie compelled to flie, and in his flight was with this sodaine fortune marueylously disinayed: and beyng vnpurueyed, what counsaile he should take, and what way he should folow, like a man in dispaire not knowyng what to do, of very trust and confidence conueyed himselfe into the house of Humfrey Banaster his seruant beside Shrewesburie, whom he had tenderly brought vp, and whome he above all men loued, fauoured, and trusted, nowe not doubtyng but that in his extreme necessitie he should finde him faythfull, secret, and trusty, entendyng there couertly to lurke till either he might raise againe a newe armie, or else shortly to sayle into Briteyne to the Erle of Richemond.

But when it was knowen to his adherentes which were ready to geue battaile, that his hoste was scattered and had left him almost alone, and was fled and could not be found, they were sodainly amased and stricken with a sodaine feare, that euery man lyke persons desperate shifted for himselfe and fled, some went to Sanctuary and to solytary places, some fled by Sea, whereof the most part within a fewe dayes after arrived safely in the Duchie of Briteyn. Among which number were these persons, Peter Courtney Bishop of Excester, and Sir Edmond Courtney his brother, by king Henry the seventh after created Erle of Deuonshire, Thomas Marques Dorset, John Lorde Welles, Sir John Burchier, Sir Edmond Woodville, a valiaunt man in armes, brother to Queene Elizabeth, Sir Robert Willoughby, Sir Giles Daubeney, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir John Cheyne and his two brethren, Sir William Berkeley, Sir William Brandon, and Thomas his brother, Sir Richard Edgecombe, all these for the most part beyng knightes, John Halwell, and Edward Poyninges a pollitique Capitaine. At this very season John Morton Bishop of Ely, and Christopher Urswike prier, and an other companie of noble men sojourned in Flaunders, ders, and by letters and Messengers procured many enemies agaynst king Richard, which vsyng a bigilant eie, and a quick remembrance, beyng newly come to Salisbury, hauing perfect notice and knowlege howe the Duke was fled, and howe his complices intended to passe out of the Realme. First he sent men of warre to all the next portes and passages to keepe straitly the sea coast, so that no person should passe outwarde, nor take land within the Realme without their assent and knowlege. Secondly, he made proclamation, that what person coulde shewe and reuele where the Duke of Buckingham was, should be highly rewarded, if he were a bondman, he should be enfranchised and set at libertie, if he were of free blood, he should haue a generall pardon, and be rewarded with a thousand poundes. Furthermore, because he vnderstoode by Thomas Hutton, which as you haue heard was newly returned out of Briteyn, that fraunces Duke of Briteyn not onely refused to keepe the Erle of Richemond as a prisoner at his cōtemplacion, and for his sake, but also that he was redie to ayde and succor the sayde Erle with men, money, and all thinges necessary for his transportyng into Englande: wherefore he rigged and sent out Shippes of warre well furnished and decked with men and artillary, to skoure and keepe that part of the Sea that lieth agaynst Briteyn, to the entent that if the Erle of Richemond would aduenture to sayle toward Englande, either he should be taken captiue, or be braten & driven from the coast of England. And moreover, to the entent that euery coast, way, passage, and corner, should be diligently watched and kept, he set at euery doubtfull and suspected place men of warre, to seeke, searche, and enquire if any creature could tell tidings of the Duke of Buckingham, or of any of his confederation, adherents, fautours, or partakers.

Whyle this busie serche was diligently applyed and put in execution, Humfrey Banaster (were it more for feare of losse of lyfe and goodes, or attracted and prouoked by the auaricious desire of the thousand poundes) he betrayed his guest and Mayster to John Hutton then Shyefe of Shropshire, which sodainly with a strong power of men in harnesse apprehended the Duke in a little groue adioynyng to the Mansion of Humfrey Banaster, and in great haste and euill speede conueyed him apparelled in a pilled black Cloke to the Citie of Shrewesburie, where kyng Rycharde then kept hys household.

Whether thys Banaster betrayed the Duke more for feare then couetous, many men doe doubt: but sure it is, that shortly after he had betrayed the Duke his maister, his sonne and heyre wared mad and so died in a Bores Stee, his eldest daughter of excellent beutie was sodainly stricken with a foule leaperie, his second sonne very maruellously deformed of hys limmes and made lame, his yonger sonne in a small puddle was strangled and drowned, and he being of extreme age arraigned and found guiltie of a murther, and by his clergie saued. And as for his thousand pound king Rychard gaue him not one farthing, sayng that he which would be but true to so good a maister, would be false to all other, howbeit some say that he had a small office or a farme to stop his mouth withall. The Duke beyng by certayne of the kinges Counsell diligently vpon interrogatores examined what things he knewe prejudiciall to the kings person, opened and declared frankly and freely all the coniuration without dissimuling or glosing, trusting because he had had truly and playnely reueled and confessed all things that were of hym required, that he should haue lycence to speake to the king which (whether it were to sue for pardon and grace, or whether he being brought to his presence would haue stiked him with a dagger as men then iudged) he soze desired and required. But when he had confessed the whole fact and conspiracy vpon Allsoulen day without arreignment or iudgement, he was at Salisburie in the open market place on a newe Skaffold behedded and put to death. This death (as a reward) the Duke of Buckyngham receaued at the hands of King Richard, whome he before in his affaires, purposes and enterprises had holpen susteyned and set forward aboue all Gods forbode.

The Duke
behedded.

By thys all men may easely perceauie that he not onely loseth both hys laboz, traouyle and industrie, and farther steyneth and spotteth his hne with a perpetuall ignomie and reproche, which in euill and mischiefe assisteth and aydeth an euill disposed person, considering for the most part that he for his friendlye fauour should receyue some great displeasure or infortunate chaunce. Beside that God of his iustice in conclusion appointeth to him a condigne payne and affliction for his merites and desertes.

Whyle these things were thus handeled and ordered in England, Perrey Erle of Richemond prepared an armie of fyue thousand manly Britons, and fortie well furnished shippes. When all things were prepared in a readynesse, and the day of departing and setting forward was appointed, which was the twelue day of the Moneth of October, the whole armie went on Shipborde and halsted by their sayles, and with a prosperous winde tooke the Sea: But toward night, the winde chaunged and the weather turned, and so houghe and terrible a tempest so sodainely rose, that with the verie power and strength of the stozme, the shippes were disparted, seuered and seperate a sunder: some by force were driuen into Normandy, some were compelled to returne agayne into Britayne. The ship wherin the Erle of Richemond was, associate onely with one other Bark was all night tossed and turmoyled. In the morning after when the rage of the furions tempest was allwaged, and the yre of the blustering winde was some deale appeased, about the houre of noone the same day, the Erle approached to the south part of the realme of Englande, even at the mouth of the hauen of Poole, in the Countie of Dorset, where he might playnely perceyue all the sea bankes and shores garnished and furnished with men of warre and Souldiours, appointed and deputed there to defende his arryuall and landing, as before is mencioned. Wherefore he gaue straight charge and soze commaundement, that no person should once presume to take lande and go to the shore, untill such time as the whole Flaue were assembled and congregate. And whyle he tarped and lyngered, he sent out a Shipbote toward the lande side to know, whether they which stood there in suche a number and so well furnished in apparell defensiu were hys foes and enemies, or else his friendes and comforters. They that were sent to enquire, were instantly desired of the men of warre keepng the coast (which thereof were before instructed and admonished) to dissende and take lande, affirming that they were appointed by the Duke of Buckyngham there to awayte and tarie for the arryuall and landing of the Erle of Richemond, and to conduct him safely to the Campe. where the Duke not farre of laye encamped with a mightie armie and an hoste of great strength and power, to the entent that the Duke and the Erle ioyning in purssaunces and forces together, might prosecute and chase King Rycharde beyng destitute of men, and in maner desperate, and so by that meanes, and their awne laboures to obteyne the ende of their enterpryse which they had before begonne.

The Erle of Richemond suspecting their flattering request to be but a fraude (as it was in deede) after that he perceaued none of his shippes to appere in sight, he wayed by his Ancors and halsted by hys sayles, hauing a prosperous and streynable winde and a fresh gale sent euen by God to deliuer him from that perill and iopardy, and arryued safe and in securitie in the Duchy of Normandy, where he to refreshe and solace his Souldiours and people, tooke his recreation by the space of thre dayes, and clerely determined with part of his companie to passe all by land agayne into Britayne. And in the meane season he sent Ambassadors to the French King called Charles the. viii. which newly succeeded hys father king Lewys the. xi. not long before departed to God, requiring of him a safeconduite and lycence to passe thorough his Countie of Normandie into Britayne. The yong king hauing compassion of the misfortune of the Erle of Richemond, not onely gently graunted and assigned to him a pasport, but also liberally disbursed to him a conuenient somme of money for hys conduite and expenses necessarie in hys long iourney and passage. But the Erle trustyng on the French kings humanity, aduentured to sende his ships home into Britayne, and to set forward himselfe by lande on his iourney, making no great haste till hys messengers were returned, which beyng with the benefite so comforted, and with hope of prosperous successe so encouraged, marched toward Britayne with all diligence entending there to consult farther with his louers and friendes of his affaires and enterprises. When he was returned agayne into Britayne he was certesied by credible information that the Duke of Buckyngham had lost hys head, and that the Marques Dorset and a great number of Noble men of England had a lyttle before enquired and searched for him there, and were nowe returned to Cannes. When he had heard these netwes thus reported, he first sorowed and lamented the first attempt, and setting forward of hys friendes, and in especiall of the nobilitie not to haue more fortunately succeeded. Secundarily, he reioysed on the other part that God had sent hym so many balyant and prudent Captaynes to be his companions in hys martiall enterprises, trusting surely and nothing doubting in his awne opinion, but that all hys busynesse should be wisely compassed, and brought to a good conclusion. Wherefore he determinyng with all diligence to set forward hys newe begon busynesse departed to Rennes and sent certayne of his priue secretours to conduct and bring the Marques and the other noble men to hys presence. When they knewe that he was safely returned into Britayne, Lorde howe they reioysed, for before that tyme they mysted hym and knewe not in what part of the worlde to make inquirie or serche for hym.

For they doubted and no lesse feared lest he had taken lande in Englande, and fallen into the hands of King Rycharde in whose person they knew well was neyther mercy nor compassion. Wherefore in all speedy maner they galoped toward hym, and hym reuerently saluted, which meeting after great ioy and solace, and no small thankes geuen and rendered on both parts, they aduisedly debated and commoned of their great businesse and weightie enterprise, in the which season the feast of the natiuitie of our Saviour Christ happened, on which day all the Engliche Lordes went with great solempnitie to the chiefe Church of the Citie, and there eche gaue fayth and promise to other. The Erle himselfe first tooke a corporall othe, and on his honor promising that incontinent after he should be possessed of the crowne and dignitie of the realme of Englande, he would be conioyned in matrimonie with the Lady Elizabeth daughter to king Edward the fourth. Then all the company swore to him fealtie, and did to him homage as though he had bene that tyme the crowned king and annoynted Prince, promising faythfully and firmly assuring that they would not onely leese their worldly substaunce, but also be priuated of their lyues and worldly felicitie, rather then to suffer king Rycharde that tyraunt longer to rule and reigne ouer them. Which solempne othes made and taken, the Erle of Richemond declared and communicated all these doyngs to Fraunces Duke of Britayne, desiring and most hartily requiring hym to ayde him with a greater armie to conduct him into his Countrie, which so sore longed and looked for his returne, and to the which he was by the more part of the nobilitie and communaltrie called and desired (which with Gods aid, & the Dukes comfort) he doubted not in short time to obtaine, requiring him farther to prest to him a conuenient somme of money, affirming that all such sommes of money which he had receaued of hys especiall friends, were spent and consumed in the preparation of the last iourney made towarde Englande, which sommes of money after his enterprise once achiued, he in the worde of a Prince faythfully promised to repay and restore agayne. The Duke promised him ayde and helpe, vpon confidence whercof he rigged his shippes, and set forth hys flauie well decked wyth ordynance, and warlikely furnished with all things necessarye, to the intent to sayle forward shortly, and to lose no time.

In the meane season, King Rycharde apprehended in diuers partes of the realme certaine gentlemen of the Erle of Richmonds faction and confederation, which eyther entended to sayle into Britain toward him, or else at his landing to assist and ayde him. Amongst whome, sir George Brobne, sir Roger Clyfforde and foure other were put to execution at London, and sir Thomas Sentliger which had married the Duchesse of Excester the kings awne sister, and Thomas Ram and diuers other were executed at Excester. Beside these persons, diuerse of his household seruants, whome either he suspected, or doubted, were by great crueltie put to shamefull death. After this, he called a parliament, in the which he attaynted the Erle of Richemond and all other persons which were fled out of the realme for feare, or any other cause, as enemies to him, and to their naturall countrey, and all their landes goods, and possessions, were confiscate and sealed to the kings vse. And yet not content with this pray, which no doubt was of no small valour, and moment, he layed on the peoples neckes a great tare and tallage, and surely necessitie to that act in maner him compelled. For what with purging and declaring his innocencie concernyng the murther of his Nephewes towarde the world, and what with cost to obtayne the loue and fauour of the communaltrie (which outwardly glosed, and openly dissimuled with him) he gaue prodigally so many and so great rewardes, that now both he lacked, and scarce wist honestly how to bozoboe. In this troubleous season, nothing was more merueyled at, then that the Lorde Stanley had not bene taken and reputed as an enemy to the king, considering the working of the Ladye Margaret his wife, mother to the Erle of Richmonde, but forasmuch as the enterprise of a woman was of him reputed of no regarde or estimation, & that the Lord Thomas her husbände had purged himselfe sufficiently to be innocent of all doynges and attemptes by her perpetrated, and committed, it was geuen him in charge to kepe her in some secret place at home, without hauyng anye seruaunt or companie, so that from thence forth she should neuer sende letter nor messenger to her sonne, nor any of his friendes, or confederates, by the which the king might be molested or troubled, or anye hurte or prejudice might be attempted against his realme and commonaltie. Which commaundement was a while put in execution & accomplished according to his dreadfull commaundement. Yet the wilde worme of vengeance waucering in hys heade, coulde not be contented with the death of diuerse Gentlemen suspected of treason, but also he must extende his bloodye furie against a poore gentleman called Collyngborne, for making a small ryme of thre of his vnfortunate Counsaylers, which were the Lorde Louell, Sir Rycharde Radclyffe, his mischeuous Nephew, and sir William Catesbey his secret seducer, which Nephew or ryme was.

The Ratte the Cat and Louell our dogge,
Rule all Englande vnder the hogge.

Meanyng by the Hog, the dreadful wilde Boze, which was the kings cognisaunce, but because the first line ended in Dog, the Metrician could not obliuynge the regiments of meeter ende the second verse in Boze, but called the Boze an Hogge. This poeticall schoolemaister corrector of Breeues and Longes, caused Collyngborne to be abbreviat shorter by the head, and to be deuided into foure quarters.

King Rycharde beyng thus tormented, and tossed in his owne conceyte and imagination, called to his remembraunce that confederacions, amities, and other honest bandes and packes, made, concluded, and appointed betwen Princes, and politique gouernours, are the cause efficient and especiall introduction that their realmes & countreies are fortified with a double power, that is to saye, with their owne strength and the ayde of their friendes, deuised wyth him selfe to practise a league and amitie with the king of Scots, which not long before had made diuers incursions and rodes into the realme of Englande, where although he gat little, yet surely hee lost not much, and therebpon sued to haue a truce or peace concluded, which came euen as king Rycharde hadde wished it. Wherefore commissioners were assigned for both partes to meete at Nottingham the seuen daye next ensuyng, at which tyme came iether for the kyng of Englande John bishop of Lincoln chanceller of Englande, Rycharde bishop of saint Asse, John Duke of Northfolke, Henry Erle of Northumberland, Thomas Lord Stanley, George Stanley, Lord Straunge, John Gray, Lord Powes, Richard Lord Fitzhugh, John Gunthorpe, keeper of the kings priuy seale, Thomas Barow, maister of h rolles, Sir Thomas Brian chiefe Justice of the common place, Sir Rychard Radclyffe knight, William Catesby, and Rycharde Salkeld esquier. And for the king of Scottes, were deputed Colyn Erle of Ergile, Lorde Campbell and Lozde Chaunceller of Scotlande, William bishop of Aberdene, Robert lord Lyle, Laurence Lord Oliphant, John Drummond of Stobhall, Archibalde Whitelator Archdeacon of Loddene and Secretary to king James, Lion King at Armes and Duncane Duncas. These Councillers diuers times mette, and after long debating, demaunding, and denyng, in the ende of September they fullye concluded a peace, the Articles whereof are to long here to reherse.

When this league and amitie was thus concluded, finished, and sealed with all due circumstances thereunto required. Although king Richard iudged and demed himseife somewhat the moze stronger and quieter by force of this newe amitie, and concluded confederacie, yet to augment moze the familiaritie begon betwene the king of Scottes and him, and to haue a double string for his Bowe, he entreated a newe aliaunce and mariage to be concluded betwene the Prince of Rothsay, eldest sonne to the king of Scottes, and Ladie Anne de la Pole, daughter to John Duke of Suffolke, and Ladie Anne sister to king Richard, which sister he so much fauoured, that he studying al the waies by the which he might aduaunce her offspring and lineage, did not onely procure and seeke meanes how to make her daughter a Princesse, and consequently a Queene, but also after the death of his sonne, he proclaymed John Erle of Lincolne his nephew and her sonne, heire apparent to the Crowne of England, disenheriting king Edwardes daughters, whose brethren befoze as you haue heard he shamefully killed & murdered.

The king of Scottes hauyng neede of friendes, but not so much neede as king Richard, which was of necessity compelled to seeke ayders, and to enterteyne fautours, the one for fauouryng of flatterers, and base bozne persons, and the other not onely for tyranny and vnaturall homicide, but also for the vsurpation of the Crowne beyng of all the realme detested and disdeyned, gladly accepted, and ioyously consented to king Richardes desire and coniunction of amitie. Wherefoze the sayde Princes sent their Ambassadors and Counsaylors againe to the towne of Nottingham, where the saide mariage was by writynges and instrumentes, couenaunted, condiscended, and agreed, and affiaunces made and taken by Proctors, and Deputies on both partes, and she immediately called Princes of Rothsaye, which name shee shortly lost by the short life of king Richard her louyng Uncle. Here may wel be noted the vnaturall loue and disordered affection which this kinde kinsman shewed to hys blood: for he not remembryng the tirannie that he had executed agaynst his brothers somes, the wrong and manifest iniurie that he had done to his brothers daughters, both in takyng from them their dignitie, possessions, and liuyng, thought it should redound greatly to his honour and fame, if he promoted his sisters childe (to whome he was nothing bound in conscience to make restitution) to the dignitie of a Queene, rather then to preferre his brothers daughter whome he had vntruly and by force disenherited, & of all their right deprived, to the mariage of a meane esquier: such was his brotherly kindnes, and such was his large conscience towards his brothers children.

After this league and mariage thus concluded and agreed, the king of Scottes disdeinyng that the strong Castell of Dunbarre should remaine in the Englishe mennes handes and possession, wroto a gentle letter to king Richard.

Richard, declaryng to him that where in the league concluded betwene them, it was agreed and appoynted that he should within xl. dayes next ensuyng, expresse and declare his opinion and meanyng concernyng the Castell of Dunbarre, whether the sayde Castell should be occupied and stand still in the handes of the Englishe men, duryng the whole tyme of the truce, or else for the terme of sixe monethes onely. He nowe certified king Richard by his letters, that he was content that he and his should enioy the possession of the sayde Castell quietly and peaceably duryng the sayde truce and amitie: nevertheless he required him for the loue and familiaritie that nowe both by treatie and aluaunce was sprong and knit betwene them, that he would redeliuer the saide Castell into his handes, which was vntruly possessed of the Englishe Nation by deliuey of the rebels and Traytors, contrary to al right, equitie, and conscience. King Richard dalied with pleasaunt letters, and sayde wordes, and so foded forth the king of Scottes, that he neuer had Dunbar deliuered while king Richard liued, after whose death, whether it were by treason or by appoyntment, the Castell was rendered to the king of Scottes, to his great contentation and reioysing. Albeit this league and amitie thus couenaunted and concluded, it might manifestly seeme to all persons, that all coniurations and confederacies agaynst king Richard were extinct and put to scilence, and in especiall consideryng, that the Duke of Buckingham and his alies were made out of his way, some by death, and some by banishment and exilyng into farre Countries and Regions. Yet king Richard moze doubtynge then trustyng to his awne people and friendes, was continually vexed, tossed, and vnquieted, with feare of the returne of the Erle of Richemond and his complices and fautours, which dayly dread and hourely agonie, caused him to liue in dolefull miserie, euer vnquiet, and in maner in continuall calamitie. Wherefoze he entendyng to be relieued and to haue an ende of all his doubtfull daungers, determined clerely to extirpate and pluck by by the rootes all the matter & ground of his feare and doubt. Wherefoze after long and deliberate consultation had, nothing was for his purpose and entent thought either moze necessarie or expedient then once agayne with price, prayer, and rewarde, to attempt the Duke of Briteyn in whole territorie the Erle of Richemond then abode, to deliuer the sayd Erle into his handes, by which onely meanes he shoulde be discharged of all feare of perill, and brought to rest and quietnesse both of bodie and minde. Wherefoze incontinent he sent certain Ambassadors to the Duke of Briteyn, which tooke vpon them (beside the great and ample rewarde that they brought with them into Briteyn) that king Richard shoulde verely pay and aunswere the Duke of all the reuenues, rentes, and profites of the seignozies, landes, and possessions aswell belongyng and appertainyng to the Erle of Richemonde, as to any other Noble or Gentleman, which then were in the Erles companie, if he after that tyme would kepe them in continuall prison and restraine them from libertie.

The Ambassadors furnished with these and other instructions, arrived in Briteyn and came to the Dukes house, where with him they could haue no maner of communication concernyng their weightie affayres, by reason that he beyng faynt and weakened by a long and dayly infirmitie, began a little to wax ydle and weake in his wit and remembraunce. For which cause

Peter Landoyse.

Peter Landoyse his chiefe Treasozer, a man both of pregnant wit & great aucthoritie, ruled and adiudged all things at his pleasure & commaundement, for the which cause (as men set into high aucthority be not best beloned) he excited and prouoked against him the malice & euill will of the Nobility of Briteyn, which after ward for diuers great offences by him doying his aucthoritie perpetrate and committed, by their meanes was brought to death, and confusion. The Englishe Ambassadors moued their message and request to Peter Landoyse, and to him declared their maisters commaundement, instantly requiryng, and humbly desiryng him (in whose power it lay to do all thing in Briteyne) that he would friendly assent to the request of king Richard, offeryng to him the same rewardes and landes, that they should haue offered to the Duke.

This Peter which was no lesse disdeyned then hated almost of all the people of Briteyne, thought that if he did assent and satisfie king Richardes petition and desyre, he should be of power and habilitie sufficiently to withstand and refell the malicious attemptes and disdainfull irrecursions of his enuious aduersaries. Wherefore he saythfully promised to accomplish the king Richards request and desyre, so that he kept promise with him, that he might be able to withstand the cankerd malice of his secret enemyes. This act that he promised to do, was not for any grudge or malice that he bare to the Erle of Richemonde, for as you haue heard before, he deliuered him from perill of death at Saint Malos, when he was in great doubt of life and icopardie, but as cause riseth we euer offend, and that cursed hunger of golde, and execrable thirst of lucre, and inwarde feare of losse of aucthoritie, dyueth the blinde mindes of couetous men and ambitious persons to euilles and mischiefes innumerable, not remembryng losse of name, obloquie of the people, nor in conclusion the punishment of God for their merites, and desertes. But fortune was so fauourable to the publique welth of the realme of Englande, that this deadly and dolorous compact tooke none effect or place. For while Postes ranne, and letters were sent to and fro for the finishing of this great enterpryse betwene king Richard and Peter Landoyse, John Morton Bishop of Ely sojourning then in Flaunders, was of all this craftie conuynce certified by his secret and sure friendes: Wherefore he sent Christopher Urswike (which at that verye season was come out of Briteyne into Flaunders) to declare to the Erle of Richemonde howe all the deceit and craftie working was conueyed and compassed, geuyng him in charge to counsaile and advise the Erle in all haste possible with all his companie to retire out of Briteyne into Fraunce. When these newes were brought to the Erle he then kept house in Vannes, and incontinent dispatched again Christopher Urswike to Charles the French king, requiryng him that he and his, might safely passe into Fraunce, which desyre beyng obteyned, the messenger shortly returned to his Lorde and Prince. The Erle well perceiuyng that it was expedient and necessarie with all speede and diligence, to loke to this weightie matter, calling verye fewe to counsaile, he made inquirie and sarche of all secretes and by wayes, and sent before all his noble men, as though for a certaine familiaritie and kindnesse they should visite and comfort the Duke, which then for recreation and chaunge of ayre, lay on the borders and confines of Fraunce. And secretly he gaue charge to the Erle of Pembroke which was

was the leader and conductor of his companie, that when they approached the marches and limits of Briteyn, they should diuert and take the next way into Fraunce. The noble men somewhat suspicious of thinges newly imagined, without any tariyng, scouryng the wayes as fast as their hozses could runne, came out of the Duchie of Briteyn, into the Duchie of Anjou in the dominion of Fraunce, where they taryed the Erles comyng, which two dayes after departed out of Vannes, onely accompanied with five seruitors, as though he had gone secretly to visite a familiar friend of hys in a small Village adioinyng. No man suspected that he would depart, consideryng that a great multitude of Englishe men were left and continued in the Citie, but after that he had passed directly five myles forwarde, he sodainly turned into a solitarie Wood next adioinyng, where clothng himselfe in the simple Cote of his poore seruaunt, made and appoynted his sayde minister, leader and maister of his small companie, and he as an humble Page diligently followed and serued his counterfeit gouernour, neuer restyng nor themselves refreshing, except the baityng of their hozses, till they by wayes vnknown, nowe this way, nowe turnyng that way, came to their companie, abidyng them in Angiers.

The fourth day after the Erle of Richemonde was thus departed, that craftie marchaunt Peter Landoyse, trustyng still after his pray, promised by king Richard, was ready to set forwarde his crew of souldiours, which he priuily had consigned with certaine trustie capitaines for that onely purpose appointed and elected, to perfoyme and achyue his pretended enterpryse, dissimulyng and feinyng them to be conducted and hyed by him to serue the Erle of Richemonde, and hym to conduyte in his returne towarde his native countrey, meaning none other thing but to apprehende him and the other Noble men in his retinue, which no such fraude suspectyng, nor yet any treason ymaginyng, vnware and vnprouided and destitute of all ayde, and them to cast and commit sodainely into continuall captiuitie and bondage, to the entent that by this wretched & naughtie act, he might satisfie the charitable request, & louyng desire of good kyng Richard, moze for his owne profite then kyng Richards gayne. But when this craftie dissembler Peter Landoyse, which was no wyliet then an olde Foxe, perceaued that the Erle was departed, (thinkyng that to be true that he imagined) Lorde how curours ranne into euery coast, how light hozsemen galloped to euery streyt, to folow & deteyne him, if by any possibilitie he coulde be pursued and overtaken, and him to apprehende and bring captiue into the Citie of Vannes. The hozsemen made such diligence, and with such celeritie set forwarde their iorney, that nothyng was moze likely then they to haue obtayned, ye and sealed their praye. For the Erle of Richmond was not entred into the realme of Fraunce, scarce one houre, but the folowers came to the limittes and confines of Briteyne, and durst aduenture no further, but bainely without their desire sorrowfully returned. At which season were left at Vannes about the number of thre Englishe men, which not beyng called to counsaile, and vnaware of this enterpryse, but knowyng of the Erles sodaine departure were so incontinently astonied, that in maner they were all in dispayre both of him and their aduentsure and sauegarde. But fortune turned her faile, and otherwise it happened then their feare them encombred. For the Duke of Briteyne nowe beyng png somewhat recovered, was soze displeased, and nothing contented that the Erle of Richmond was in his dominion so incurteously tractred and entreated, that he should be by fraude and bnturth compelled to leaue and flie out of his Duchie and Countrie contrary to his honour. Wherefore he toke great displeasure with Peter Landoyse his Treasozer, to whome (although he knewe not and was ignozaunt that all the drift was driuen and deuyled by him) he laide the fault and imputed the crime. Wherefore he sent for Edward Wooduile, and Edward Downynges valiaunt Esquiers of England, and deliuered vnto them money sufficient for their conduite, willyng them to conuey the rest of the Englishe men beyng in Briteyn, to the Erle of Richmondes presence. When the Erle was thus furnished and appoynted wyth his trustie companie, and was escaped all the daungers, Labirinthes, and snares that were set for him, no maruaile though he were iocund and glad of the prosperous successe that happened in his affayzes. Wherefore, lest he should seeme to be blotted with the note of ingratitude, he sent diuers of hys Gentlemen to the Duke of Briteyne, the which should publish and declare to him on the behalfe of the Erle, that he and his, were onely by his benefite and fauour conserued and deliuered from the imminent daunger that they were like to be trapped in. Wherefore at that time he rendred to him his most hartie thanks in wordes, trustyng and not doubtyng but in tyme to come liberally to recompence him with actes and deedes.

After thys the Erle toke his iourney to Charles the French king, lyeng then at Langes vpon the ryuer of Leyze, to whome after great thanks geuen for manifold pleasures by him to the Erle shewed, he disclosed and manifested the cause and occasion of his accesse and repayze to his person. After that he required of him helpe and succour, to the intent that by his immortal benefite to him at that tyme shewed, he might safely returne to the nobilitie of hys realme, of whome he was greatly called to take vpon hym the crowne and Scepter of the realme, they much hated and abhorred the tyrannie of king Richard. King Charles promised him ayde and comfort, and bade him be of good courage and make good cheere, for he assured him that he would gladly shewe to him his beneuolent minde and bountifull liberalitie. Which king from thence remoued to Mountargis, leadyng with him the Erle of Richemonde, and all the noble personages of hys retinue and faction.

Whyle the Erle was thus attendaunt in the French Court, John Vere Erle of Orforde (whiche as you haue heard before was by king Edward kept in prison wythin the Castell of Hammes) so perswaded James Blount Capytayne of the same fortreffe, and Syr John Fortescwe Porter of the Towne of Caleys, that he himselfe was not onely dismissed and set at libertie, but they also abandonyng and leauing their fruitfull offices, condiscended to go wyth him into fraunce to the Erle of Richemonde and to take his part remayning in the Castell before hys departure, he fortescied the same both with newe municions and newe Souldiours. When the Erle of Richemond sawe the Erle of Orforde, he was rauyshed with an incredible gladnesse, that he being a man of so high nobilitie, of such knowledge and practise in feates of warre, and so constaunt, trustie, and assured (which alwaye had studied for the maintenaunce and preferment of the house of Lancaster) was was now by Gods prouision deliuered out of Captiuitie and imprisonment, and in tyme so necessary & conuenient come to his ayde, succour and aduancement, in whome more surer then any other he might put hys trust and confidence, and take lesse paine and trauayle in hys awne person. For it was not hid from hym that suche as had euer taken part with king Edward before thys tyme, came to doe him seruice eyther for malice that they bare to king Richard, or else for feare to lyue vnder his cruell rule and tyrannous gouernaunce.

Not long after the French king returned agayne to Paris, whome the Erle of Richemonde folowed, entending there to sollicite his matter to the conclusion. Wherevpon he besought king Charles to take vpon hym the whole tuition and defence of him and hys cause, so that he and hys company beyng by hys meanes ayded and comforted, should confesse and saye, their welth, victorie and aduancement to haue flowed and budded forth of his bountifullnesse and liberalitie, which they would God wylling shortly requite. In the meane season dyuers Englishe men which eyther fled out of Englande for feare, or were at Paris to learne and studie good litterature and vertuous doctrine, came voluntarily and submitted themselues to the Erle of Richemond, and bowed and sware to take his part. Amongst whom was Richard fore a priest, a man of great wytt and no lesse learning, whom the Erle incontinent receaued into secret familiaritie, & in bryefe tyme erected and auanced him to high dignities and promotions, and in conclusion he made hym Bpshop of Wynchester.

In the meane season king Richard was credibly aduertised what promises and othes the Erle and his confederates had made and sworne together at Kenes, and how by the Erles meanes all the English men were passed out of Britayne into fraunce. Wherefore beyng soze dismayed and in a maner desperate, because hys craftie Cheuesaunce tooke none effect in Britayne, imagined and deuised how to infringe and disturbe the Erles purpose by another meane, so that by the marriage of Ladie Elizabeth his Niece he should pretend no clayme nor tytle to the crowne. For he thought if that marriage fayled, the Erles chiefe combe had bene clerely cut. And because that he beyng blynded with the ambitious desyre of rule before thys tyme, in obtepyning the kingdome, had perpetrate and done many cursted actes and detestable tyrannies, yet according to the olde proverbe, let hym take the Bull that stale away the Calfe, he thought all factes by hym committed in times passed to bee but of small moment and not to be regarded in comparison of that mischieuous imagination, which he nowe openly began and attempted. There came into hys vngacious minde a thing not onely detestable to be spoken of in the remembraunce of man, but much more cruell and abhominable to be put in execution. For when he reuolued in his wauering minde how great a fountayne of mischiefe toward him should spring if the Erle of Richemond should be aduanced to the marriage of hys Niece, which thing he heard saye by the rumour of the people that no small number of wise and wittie personages enterprised to compass and bring to conclusion. He clerely determined to reconcile to hys fauour his brothers wyfe Queene Elizabeth eyther by fayze wordes or liberall promises, firmly beleding her fauour once obtained, that she would not stick to commit (and louingly credite) to him the

the rule and gouernance both of her and her daughter, & so by that meanes the Erle of Richemond of the affinitie of hys Nece should be bitterly defrauded and beguiled. And if no ingenious remedy could be other wise inuented to saue the innumerable mischiefes which were euen at hande and lyke to fall, if it should happen Queene Anne hys wyfe to depart out of thys present worlde, then he hymselfe would rather take to wyfe hys Colyn and Nece the Ladie Elizabeth, then for lack of that affinitie the whole realme should run to ruyne, as who sayde, that if he once fell from hys estate and dignitie, the ruyne of the realme must needes shortly ensue and folowe. Wherefore he sent to the Queene beyng in sanctuarie dyuers and often messengers, which first should excuse and purge him of all thinges befoze against her attempted or procured, and after shoulde so largely promise promotions innumerable, and benefices, not onely to her but also to her sonne Lorde Thomas Marques Dorset, that they should bring her if it were possible into some want hope, or as men say into a fooles paradise. The messengers beyng men both of wyte and grauitie, so perswaded the Queene with great and pregaunt reasons, what with fayre and large promises, that shee began somewhat to relent, and to geue to them no dreafe eare, in so much that shee faythfully promised to submit and yeelde her selfe fully and frankely to the kings wyll and pleasure. And so shee putting in oblivion the murther of her innocent children, the infamie and dishonour spoken by the king her husbände, the lying in auoutrie layed to her charge, the bastardyng of her daughters, forgetting also the faythfull promise and open othe made to the Countesse of Richemond mother to the Erle Henry, blynded by auaricious affection and seduced by flattering wordes, first deliuered into king Richards hands her five daughters, as Lambes once agayne committed to the custodie of the rauenous Wolfe. After shee sent letters to the Marques her sonne beyng then at Parys with the Erle of Richemond, wylling him in any wise to leaue the Erle and without delay to repaire into Englande, where for him were provided great honors and honorable promotions, assertheyng him farther that all offences on both parties were forgotten and forgoen, and both he and she highly incorporate in the Kings hart. Surely the inconstancie of thys woman were much to be marueyled at, if all women had bene founde constant, but let men speake, yet women of the berie bonde of nature will folowe their awne kinde. After that king Richard had thus wyth glorious promises and flattering wordes pleased and appeased the mutable minde of Queene Elizabeth, which knewe nothing lesse then that he most intended, he caused all his brothers daughters to be conueyed into his palace with solempne re- ceauing, as though with his newe familiar and louing entertainment they should forget, and in their minds blot out the olde committed iniurie and late executed tirannie. Noobe nothing was contrariant and obstacle to hys deuillish purpose, but that hys mancion was not boerde of his wyfe, which thing he in any wise adiudged necessary to be done. But there was one thing that so much feared and stayed hym from committing this abhominable murther, because as you haue heard befoze, he began to counterfeit the ymage of a good and well disposed person, and therefore he was afraid lest the sodaine death of his wyfe once openly knowne, he shoulde leese the good and credible opinion which the people had of him, without desert conceaued and re- ported.

ported. But in conclusion euill counsaile preuailed in a wyte lately minded to mischief, and turned from all goodnesse. So that his bugaricious desire ouercame his honest feare. And first to enter into the gates of his ymagined enterpryse, he absteyned both from the bed and company of his wyte. After he complayned to dyuers noble men of the realme, of the infortunate sterilitie and barennesse of hys wyfe, because she brought forth no fruit and generatio of her body. And in especial he accompted to Thomas Rotherham Archbyshop of Yorke (whom lately he had deliuered out of warde & captiuitie) these impediments of his Queene & diuers other, thinking that he would reuele & open to her al these things, trusting the sequele hercot to take his effect, that shee hearing this grudge of her husband, & taking therfore an inward thought, would not long lyue in this world. Of this the Bishop gathered (which well knewe the complexion and vsage of the king) that the Quenes daies were short, and that he declared to certain of his secret friends. After this he procured a common rumour but he would not haue the aucthor knowne to be published and spred abroad among the common people that the Queene was dead, to the intent that shee taking some concepte of thys straunge fame, should fall into some sodayne sicknesse or greuous maladie, and to proue if afterward shee should fortune by that or any other wayes to leese her lyfe, whether the people would impute her death to the thought or sicknesse, or thereof would lay the blame to him. When the Queene heard tell that so horrible a rumour of her death was sprong amongst the commonaltie, shee soze suspected and iudged the worlde to be almost at an ende with her, and in that sorowfull agony, shee with lamentable countenance and sorowfull chere, repayed to the presence of the king her husbände, demaunding of hym, what it should meane that he had iudged her worthy to die. The king answered her wyth fayre wordes, and wyth smyling and flattering leasinges comforted her, bydding her to be of good cheere, for to his knowledge shee should haue none other cause. But howsoeuer that it fortunied, eyther by inward thought and pensuennesse of heart, or by infection of popson (which is affirmed to be most likely) within a fewe dayes after the Queene departed out of thys transitorie lyfe, and was with due solempnitie buried in the Church of Saint Peter at Westminster. Thys is the same Anne one of the daughters of the Erle of Marwike, which as you haue heard befoze at the request of Lewys the French king, was married to Prince Edward sonne to king Henry the sixt.

The king thus (according to his long desire) losed out of the bondes of matrimonie, began to cast a folishe phantasie to Lady Elizabeth his Nece, making much suit to haue her ioynd with him in lawfull matrimonie. But because all men, and the mayden her selfe most of all, detested, and abhorred, this vnlawfull, and in maner bunnatural copulation, he determined to prolong and deferre the matter til he were in a moze quietnesse. For all that very season he was oppressed with great, weightie, and bygent causes, and busineses on euery side, consideryng that dayly part of the nobility failed into fraunce to the Erle of Richemond: Other priuily fauoured and aided certaine of the conituration, so that of his short ende, fewe or none were in doubt. And the common people for the most part were brought to such desperation, that manie of them had rather be reputed and taken of him in the number of his enemies, then to abide the chaunce and hazarde to haue their goodes taken as a spoyle spoyle of victorie by his enemies. Amongest the noble men whome he most mistrusted, these were the principall, Thomas Lorde Stanley, Sir William Stanley his brother, Gilbert Talbot and sixe hundred other, of whose purposes although king Richarde were not ignorant, yet he gave neither confidence nor credence to any one of them, and least of all to the Lorde Stanley because he was ioynd in matrimonie with y<sup>e</sup> Lady Margarete, mother to the Erle of Richmond, as afterward apparantly ye may perceiue. For when the sayde Lord Stanley would haue departed into his countrey to visit his family and to recreate and refresh his spirites (as he openly sayde) but the truth was to the entent to be in a perfite readinesse to receiue the Erle of Richmond at his first arriual in Englande: the king in no wise would suffer him to depart before that he had left as an hostage in the Court, George Stanley Lorde Straunge his first begotten sonne and heire. While king Richard was thus troubled and vexed with imaginacions of the troublesome time that was like to come: Loe, euen sodainly he herde newes that fyre was sprung out of the smoke, and the warre freshly begon, and that the Castell of Hammes was deliuered into the hands of the Erle of Richmond, by the meanes of the Erle of Orenforde, and that not onely he, but also James Blount captaine of the Castell, were fled into Fraunce to aide the Erle Henry. Wherefore he thinking it great pollicie to withstande the first brunt, sent the most part of y<sup>e</sup> garrison of Caleis, to recouer againe, by force the Castell of Hammes. They which were in the Castell perceauing their aduersaries to appzoch, prepared munitions and engins for their defence, and sent also to the Erle of Richmond, to aduertise him of their sodayne inuasion, requiring him of hastly ayde and speedy succour. The Erle slepyng not this first begon assault, sent y<sup>e</sup> Erle of Orenforde with an elected company of souldiours to raise the siege, and rescue the Castell: Which at their first arriuyng, pitched their campe not farre from their enemies. And while king Richardes men gaue vigilant eie, waityng lest the Erle of Orenforde, shoulde take anye aduantage of them that lay on that side of the Castell. Thomas Brandon with. xxx. appzoued men of warre, by a marsh which lay on the other side, entred into the castell. The souldiours within greatly encouraged, and much comforted by this new succour and ayde, greued the enemies by shooting from the walles more then they were accustomed to do. And they of the Castell vexed their enemies on the forepart: the Erle of Orenforde no lesse molested and vnquieted them on the other part, which was the occasion that king Richards men offered of their owne mere mocion, licence to all beyng within the Castell to departe in safetie with bagge and baggage nothing excepted: which condicion the Erle of Orenforde comyng onely for that purpose to deliuer his louyng friendes out of all perill and daunger, & chiefly of all, his olde hostesse Jane Blount wife to James Blount the capiteyne, would in no wise forsake or refuse. And so leauyng the Castell bare and vngarnished, both of bitaile and artillerie, came safe to the Erle of Richmond sojourning in Paris. During this time, kyng Richarde was credibly informed of his inquisitors and espialles that the Erle of Richmond was with long suite in the court of Fraunce sore wexed, & desiryng great ayde, coulde obtaine small reliefe: In so much that all thing went so farre backward, that such things as were with great diligence, and no lesse deliberation, purposed, and determined to be set for-

warde, were now dashed and ouerthron to the ground. King Richard either beyng to light of credence, or seduced and deluded by his craftie tale-tellers, greatly reioyced as though he had obtayned the ouerhande of his enemies, with triumph and victorie, and thought himselfe neuer so surely deliuered of all feare and dreaddfull imaginacions, so that he needed nowe no more once for that cause eyther to wake or breake his golden sleepe. Wherefore he called home againe his shippes of warre, which he had appointed to keepe the narrow Seas, and dispatched all such Souldiours as he had deputed to keepe certayne garrisons, and to stoppe certayne passages as you haue heard before. Yet lest he might for lack of prouision be sodainly trapped, he straightly charged and gaue in commaundement to al noble men and in especial such as inhabited nere to the sea coast, and on the frontiers of Wales, that according to the vsage of the Countrey, they shoulde keepe diligent watch and strong warde, to the intent that his aduersaries in no wise shoulde haue anye place oportune, easely to take lande without defence or rebuttyng back. For the custome of the Countreys adioyning nere to the sea is (especially in the time of warre) on euery hill or high place to erect a Bekon with a great Lanterne in the top, which may be sene and discerned a great space of. And when the noyse is once bzuted that the enemies appzochere nere the lande, they sodainly put fire in the Lanternes and make howtes and outrages from towne to towne, and from village to village. Some runne in post from place to place admonishyng the people to be redie to resist the ieopardie, and defend the perill. And by this pollicie the fame is soone blowen to euery Citie and towne, insomuch that aswell the Citizens as y<sup>e</sup> rurall people be in short space assembled and armed to refell and put backe the new arriued enemies.

Now to returne to our purpose, king Richard thus somewhat eased of his accustomed pensiuensse, began to be somewhat more merier, and toke lesse thought and care for outward enemies then he was wont to do, as who say, that he with polittique prouision shoulde withstande the destinie which hong ouer his heade, and was ordeyned in brieftime sodainly to fall. Such is the force and puissance of deuine iustice, that euery man shall lesse regard, lesse prouide, lesse be in doubt of all things, when he is most nereest punishment, and next to his mischaunce for his offences and crimes.

About this season, while the Erle of Richmond was desiryng ayde of the French king, certain noble men were there appoynted to rule the realme of Fraunce during the minoritye of king Charles, which amongest themselves were not of one opinion. Of which dissention, Lewys Duke of Orleans was the chiefe sturrer, which because he had married Ladie Joane sister to the French king, toke vpon him aboue other the rule and administration of the whole realme. By reason of which controuersie, no one man onely was suffered to rule all: wherefore the Erle of Richmond was compelled to make sute to euery one of the counsaile seuerally one after another, requiryng and desiryng them of ayde and reliefe in his waightie businesse, and so his cause was prolonged and deferred. During which time, Thomas Marques Dorset which was as you haue heard entised by his mother to returne againe into England, partly despairyng in the good successe of the Erle of Richmond, & partly onerate and banquished with the fayre glosyng promises of king Richarde: secretly in the night season stole out of Paris, and with all diligent expedition tooke his iourney towarde Flaunders. When relation of his departure was made to the Erle of Richemond, and the other noble men, no maruaile though they were astonied and greatly amased. Yet that notwithstanding they requyred of the frenche king that it might be lesu'l to them in his name and by his commaundement to take and stay their Companion, confederate, and partaker of all their counsaile, in what place withm his realme and territozpe so euer they could finde him. Which petition once obtayned, they sent out Curriers into every part, amongst whom Humfrey Cheiney plaiyng the part of a good blood hound, followed the tract of the fier so euen by the sent, that he ouertoke and apprehended him not far from Compeigne and so what with reason, and what with faire promises beyng perswaded, he returned again to his Companions. The Erle of Richemond vnburdened of this misadventure, least by linyng of dayes, and prolongyng of time, he might leese the great oportunitie of thinges to him offered and ministred: also least he should further wound or molest the mindes of his faythfull and assured friendes, which dayly did aspect and tary for hys comyng, determined no lenger to protract and deferre the time, but with all diligence and seueritie to attempt his begon enterprize, and so obtaynyng of king Charles a small crewe of men, and borowynge certayne summes of money of him, and of diuers other his priuate friendes. For the which he leit as debter, or more likelier as a pledge or hostage, Lorde Thomas Marques Dorset (whome he halfe mistrusted) and Sir John Burchier, he departed from the french Court, and came to the Citie of Roan. While he taryed there makyng provision at Harflete in the mouth of the riuer of Seyne for all thinges necessary for his nauye, tidynges were brought to him that king Richard beyng without children, and nowe Widower, entended shortly to marry the Lady Elizabeth his brothers daughter, and to preferre the Ladie Cicile her sister to a man found in a Clowde, and of an vnkowne linage and familie. He tooke these newes as a matter of no small moment (and so all thinges considered) it was of no lesse importance then he tooke it for. For this thing onely toke away from him and al his Companions their hope and courage that they had to obtaine an happie enterprize. And therefore no maruaile though it nipped him at the verie stomacke: when he thought that by no possibilitie hee might attaine the mariage of anye of king Edwardes daughters, which was the strongest foundation of his buildyng, by reason wherof he iudged that all his friendes in England would abandon & shrinke from him. Wherefore makyng not many of his counsaile, after diuers consultations he determined not yet to set forward, but to tary and attempt how to get more ayde, more friendes, and more stronger succors. And amongst all other, it was thought most expedient to allure by affinitie in his ayde as a Companion in armes, Sir Walter Herbert, a man of an auncient stocke, and great pover amongst the Welshemen, which had with him a fayre Ladie to his sister, of age ripe to be coupled in matrimonie. And for the achieuyng of this purpose, messengers were secretly sent to Henry Erle of Northumberland (which had before married another sister of Sir Walter Herbertes) to the entent that he should set forward all this deuice and purpose, but the wayes were so narrowly watched and so manye spyes laide, that the Messenger proceeded not in his iourney and businesse. But in the meane season, son, there came to the Erle a more ioyfuller message from Morgā Kidwelly learned in the temporall lawe, which declared that Rice ap Thomas, a man of no lesse valiauntnesse then actiuitie, and John Saunge an approued Capitaine, would with all their power be partakers of his quarrell. And that Reignold Brey had collected and gotten together no small summe of money for the payment of the wages to the Souldiours and men of warre: aduising him also to make quicke expedition, and to take his course directlye into Wales. The Erle of Richemond because he would no longer linyng and werpe his friendes, liuyng continually betwene hope and feare, determined in all conuenient hast to set forward, and caried to his shippes armour, weapons, bitaile, and all other ordinaunces expedient for warre.

After that all thing was in a readynesse, the Erle being accompanied onely with two thousand men and a small number of shippes, weyed by his ancors and halled by his sayles, in the Moneth of August, and sayled from Harflet with so prosperous a winde that the seventh daye after hys departure he arriued in Wales in the euening, at a port called Hilforde Hauen, and incontinent tooke lande and came to a place called Dalle, where he heard say that a certain company of his aduersaries were layed in garrison, to defende his arriual all the last winter. And the Erle at the some rising remoued to harford west, beyng distant from Dalle not fully ten mile, where he was ioyfully receaued of the people, and he arriued there so sodainely that he was come and entred the towne at the same time when the Citizens had but knowlege of his comyng. Here he heard newes which were as true, as they truly were reported to him in Normandy, that Rice ap Thomas, and John Saunge with bodey and goodes were determined to ayde king Richard. While he and his companie were somewhat astonied of these newe tidynges, there came such message from the inhabitauntes of the towne of Pembroke that refreshed, and reuiued their frozen hearts and daunted courages. For Arnold Buttler a valiaunt captaine, which first askyng pardon for his offences befoze time committed against the Erle of Richemonde, and that obtayned, declared to him that the Penbrochians were redy to serue and geue their attendaunce on their naturall and immediate Lorde Jasper Erle of Pembroke. The Erle of Richemond hauyng his armie thus increased, departed from Herforde west to the towne of Cardigan beyng fiue mile distant fro. n thence. While the souldiours were refreshing and trimming themselves in their campe, straunge tidynges sprong among them wythout any certayne authour, that sir Walter Herbert which lay with a great crewe of men at Carmarden, was now with a great armie ready to approach and bid them bataille. With which newes the armie was sore troubled, and euerye man assaid his armure and proued his weapon, & were prest to defend their enemies. And as they were in this fearefull doubt, certayne horsemen which the Erle had sent to make inquirie and search, returned and reported al the countrey to be quiet and no let nor impediment to be laide or cast in their iourney. And euen at the same time the whole armie was greatly recomforted by reason that the comyng of Richarde Griffith, a man of great nobilitie, the which notwithstanding he was confederate with Sir Walter Herbert, and Richarde ap Thomas, yet at that very instant he came to the Erle of Richemonde with all his company, which were of no great number. After hym

the same day came John Morgan with his men. Then the Erle advanced forward in good hast, making no repose or abode in any one place. And to the entent to passe forward with sure and short expedition, he assaulted euerie place where his enemies had set any men of warre, which with small force, and lesse difficultie he briefly did ouercome and banquish. And sodenly he was by his espialles ascertayned that Sir Walter Harbert and Rice ap Thomas were in harness before him redie to encounter with his armie and to stop their passage. Wherefore like a balaunt Capitein he first determined to set on them, and eyther to destroy or to take them into his fauour, and after with all his power and puyssance to geue battaile to his mortall enemy king Richard. But to the entent his friendes shoulde knowe in what redinesse he was, and howe he proceeded forward, he sent of his most secret and faythfull seruantes with letters and instructions to the Ladie Margarett his mother, to the Lorde Stanley his brother, to Sir George Talbot, and to other his trustie friendes, declaring to them, that he beyng succoured and helpen with the ayde & reliefe of his friends, entended to passe ouer the riuer of Seuerne at Shrewsburie, and so to passe directly to the Citie of London, requirynge them as his speciall trust and confidence was fixed in the hope of their fidelitie, that they would meete him by the way with all diligent preparation, to the entent that he and they at time and place conuenient might communicate together the depenence of all his doubtfull and waightie businesse. When the Messengers were dispatched with these commaundementes and admonitions, he marched forward toward Shrewsburie, and in his passynge there met and saluted him Rice ap Thomas with a goodly bande of Welchemen, which making an othe and promise to the Erle, submitted himselfe wholly to his order and commaundement. For the Erle of Richemond two dayes before made to him promise, that if he would sweare to take his part and be obedient to him, he would make him chiefe gouernour of Wales, which part as he faythfully promised and graunted, so after that he had obteyned and possessed the realme and Diademe, he liberally performed and accomplished the same. In the meane time, the Messengers that were sent, diligently executed the things geuen to them in charge, and laden with rewardes of them to whome they were sent, returned to him the same daye that he entred into Shrewsburie, and made relation to him that his friendes were redie in all poyntes to do all thinges for him which eyther they ought or might do. The Erle Henry brought in good hope with this pleasaunt message, continued forth his entended iourney, and came to a little towne called Newport and pitching his campe on a little hil adioining, reposed himselfe there that night. In the Euening the same daye came to him Sir George Talbot, with the whole power of the yong Erle of Shrewsburie then beyng in warde, which were accompted to the number of two thousand men. And thus his power increasynge, he arriued at the towne of Stafford, & there paused. To whom came Sir William Stanley accompanied with a fewe persons, and after that the Erle and he had comuned no long time together, he reuerted to his Souldiours which he had congregate together to serue the Erle, which from thence departed to Lichfielde, and lay without the Walles in his campe all the night. The next Morning he entred into the towne, and was with all honour like a Prince receyued. A day or two before, the Lorde Stanley ha-

uing in his hand almost fise thousand men, lodged in y same towne, but hearyng that the Erle of Richemond was marching thetherward, gaue to hym place, dislodging him and his, and repayzed to a towne called Adzestone, there abidynge the comming of the Erle, and this wylie fore did this act to aduoyde all suspicion, beyng afraid least if he shoulde be seene openly to be a fauourer or ayder to the Erle his sonne in lawe before the day of the battaile, that king Richard which yet did not vtterly put in hym diffidence and mistrust, woulde put to some cruell death his sonne & heyre apparant George Lord Straunge whome king Richard as you haue heard before, kept with him as a pledge or hostage, to the entent that the Lorde Stanley his father shoulde attempt nothing pzeiudiciall to him.

King Rycharde at thys season keepynge his house in the Castell of Notyngham was infourmed that the Erle of Richemond with such banished men as fled out of Englande to him were nowe arriued in Wales, and that all things necessarie to his enterpryse were bnyrouded, bnyruined and beerie weake, nothing meete to withstand the power of such as the king had appointed to resist him. Thys rumour so enflated his minde, that in maner disdainynge to here speake of so pooze a company, determined at the first to take little or no regarde to this so small a sparckle, declaring the Erle to be innocent and bnywise, because that he rashly attempted suche a great enterpryse with so small and thinne a number of warlike persons, and therfore he gaue a definitiue sentence, that when he came to that poynt that he shoulde be compelled to fight agaynst hys wyll, he eyther shoulde be apprehended a lyue, or else by all likelihood he shoulde of necessitie come to a shamefull confusion, and that he trusted to be shortly done by Sir Walter Harbert and Rice ap Thomas, which then ruled Wales with egall power and lyke aucthoritie. But yet he reuoluyng and caskynge in his minde that a small warre begon and wynted at and not regarded, may turne to a great broyle and trouble, and that it was prudent pollicie not to contempne and disdeyne the little small power and weakenesse of the enemy, be it neuer so small, thought it necessarie to prouide for after clappes that might happen and chaunce. Wherefore he sent to John Duke of Norfolke, Henry Erle of Northumberland, Thomas Erle of Surrey, and to other of his especiall and trustie friendes of the Nobilitie, which he iudged more to preferre and esteeme hys welth and honour then their awne ryches and priuate commoditie, wylling them to muster and biewe all their seruants and tenants, and to elect and choose the most courageous and actiue persons of the whole number, and with them to repayze to hys presence with all speede and diligence. Also he wrote to Robert Brakenbury Lieutenaunt of the Tower, commaunding him with his power to come to his armie and to bring with him as felowes in armes, Sir Thomas Burchier, and Sir Walter Hungerforde, and dyuers other knyghtes and Esquiers in whome he cast no small suspicion. Whyle he was thus ordering hys affayres, tydings came that the Erle of Richemond was passed Seuerne & come to Shrewsburie without any detryment or encombraunce. At which message he was sore moued and broyled with Melancoly and dolour, and cryed out, asking vengeance of them that contrarie to their othe and promise had so deceaued him. For which cause he began to haue diffidence in other, in so much that he determined himselfe out of hande the same day to meete with, and resist his aduersaries. And in all hast sent out Espials to view and espie what way his enemies kept and passed. They diligently doyng their duetie, shortly after returned, declaring to the king that the Erle was encamped at the towne of Lichfield. When he had perfite knowledg where the Erle wpth his armie was sojourning, he hauing continuall re- paire of his subiectes to him, began incontinently without delay to marshall and put in order his battayles (like a balvaunt Capitaine and polletique leader) and first he made his battayles to set forwarde fine and fine in a ranke, marchyng toward that way where his enemies as was to him reported en- tended to passe. In the middle part of the armie he appointed the traffick and cariage apperteyning to the armie. Then he (environed with his garde) with a frowning countenaunce and cruell visage mounted on a great wyhte cour- ser and folowed with his footemen, the wings of horsemen coastyng and ran- gyng on euery side: And keeping thys aray, he with great pompe entred the towne of Lychester after the sonne set. The Erle of Richemond rayled hys campe and departed from Lychester to the towne of Tomwoorth thereto nere adioyning, and in the mid way passing, there saluted him Sir Walter Hungerford, and Sir Thomas Burchier knyghtes, and dyuers other which yeelved and submitted them to his pleasure. For they beyng aduertised that king Rycharde had them in suspition and gealofie, a little beyonde stony Stratford left and forsooke priuily their Captayne Robert Bzakenbury, and by wandering by night, and in maner by vnknowne pathes and vncertaine wayes searchyng, at the last came to the Erle Henry. Dyuers other noble personages, which inwardly hated king Rycharde worse then a Coade or a Serpent, did likewise resorte to hym wpth all their power & strength. There happened in this progression to the Erle of Richemond a straunge chaunce worthy to be noted: for albeit that he was a man of haute and balvaunt cou- rage, and that his army encreased, and daylie more and more he waxed mightier and stronger, yet he was not a little afeard, because he in no wise coulde be assured of hys father in lawe Thomas Lorde Stanley, which for feare of the destruction of the Lorde Straunge his some (as you haue heard) as yet enclyned to neyther partie. For if he had gone to the Erle, and that notified to king Richard, his sonne had shortly bene executed. Wherefore he accom- panied with twentie lyght horsemen lnygered in his iourney, as a man mu- sing and ymagyning what was best to be done. And the more to aggrauate his pensiuensse, it was shewed him that king Rycharde was at hande with a strong power and a great armie. Whyle he thus heavily dragged behinde his hoste, the whole armie came before the towne of Tomwoorth, and when he for the deepe darknesse coulde not perceau the steppes of them that pas- sed on before, and had wandered hether and thether, seeking after his com- panie, and yet not once heering any noise or whispyng of them, he turned to a verie little Village, beyng about thre myles from hys armie, taking great thought and much fearyng lest he should be espied, and so trapped by king Rycharde's skoute watch. There he tarped all night, not once aduenturyng to aske or demaunde a question of any creature, he being no more amased with the iopardie and perill that was passed, then with thys present chaunce, sore feared that it should be a pronostication or signe of some infortunate plague afterwarde to succede. As he was not mery beyng absent from his armie likewise

The nexte morning earely in the dawning of the daye he returned, and by the conduyte of good fortune espyed and came to his armie, excusing himselfe, not to haue gone oute of the waye by ignozaunce, but for a pol- lerie deuysed for the nonce he went from hys Campe to receyue some glad message from certayne of his priuie friendes and secrete alyes. Thys ex- cuse made, he priuily departed agayne from hys hoste to the towne of Ader- stone, where the Lorde Stanley and Syr Wylliam hys brother with their bandes were abidyng. There the Erle came first to his father in law, in a li- tle close, where he saluted him, and Sir William hys brother, and after diuers and many friendly embracings, ech reioyced of the state of other, and sodainly were surprised with great ioy, comfort, & hope of fortunate successe in al their affaires, and doyngs. Afterwarde they consulted together how to geue bat- tle to king Rycharde if he woulde abide, whome they knewe not to be farre off with an hounge army. In the euening of the same day, sir John Sauage, Sir Brian Sanforde, Sir Simon Digby, and many other, leuyng king Ri- charde, turned and came to the part of the Erle of Richmonde, with an elect company of men. Which refusall of king Rycharde's parte, by men of such ex- perience, did augment and encrease both the good hope and the puissaunce of the Erle of Richmonde.

In the meane season, kyng Rycharde (which was appointed nowe to finishe hys labour by the berie deuine iustice and prouidence of God, which called him to condigne punishment for his mischieuous desertes) marched to a place meete for two battayles to encounter by a Village called Bosworth, not farre from Lychester, and there he pitched hys fielde, refreshed hys soul- dyours and toke his rest. The same went that he had the same night a dread- full and a terrible dreame, for it seemed to him beyng a sleepe that he sawe dyuers ymages like terrible Devils which pulled and haled him, not suffe- ring him to take any quiet or rest. The which straunge vision not so sodain- ly strake his hart with a sodaine feare, but it stuffed his head and troubled his minde with many dreadfull and busie imaginations. For incontinent after, his hart being almost damped, he pronosticated before the doubtfull chaunce of the battayle to come, not vlyng the cheerefulnesse and mirth of minde, and of countenaunce as he was accustomed to doe before he came toward the battayle. And lest that it might be suspected that he was abashed for feare of his enemies, and for that cause looked so pitteously, he recyted and decla- red to his familer friends in the morning his wonderfull vision and terrible dreame. But I thinke this was no dreame, but a punction and prick of hys sinnefull conscience, for the conscience is so much more charged and aggra- uate as the offence is greater and more heynous in degree.

Now to returne agayne to our purpose, the next day after king Richard beyng furnished with men and all abilitiments of warre, bzynging all his men out of their campe into the playne, ordered hys forewarde in a marueilous length, in which he appointed both horsemen and footemen to the entent to imprint in the hartes of them that looked a farre off, a sodayne terroz and deadly feare, for the great multitude of the armed Souldiours: and in the fore front he placed the archers like a strong fortified trench or Bultwarke:

ouer thys battayle was Capytaine John Duke of Nozfolke with whome was Thomas Erle of Surrey hys sonne. After this long bantgard folowed King Rycharde hymselfe, both a strong company of chosen and approued men of warre, hauing horsemen for winges on both the sides of hys battaile.

After the Erle of Richmond was departed from the communication of hys friendes as you haue heard befoze, he began to be of a better stomach and of a moze balyaunt courage, and with all diligence pitched his field iust by the campe of his enemies, and there he lodged that night. In the morning betime he caused his men to put on their armure and apparell themselves readie to fight and gene battayl, and sent to the Lord Stanley (which was now come with his band into a place indifferently betwene both the armies) requiring him with his men to appoche nere to his armie and to help to set the Souldiours in arraye, he answered that the Erle should set his awne men in a good order of battail while he would array his company, and come to him in time conuenient. Which answer was made othertwise then the Erle thought or would haue iudged, considering the oportunitie of the tyme, and the wayght of the businesse, and although he was therewithall a little vexed, & began somewhat to hang the lip, yet he without any time delatynge compelled by necessitie, after thys maner instructed and ordred hys men. He made hys forewarde somewhat single and slender, according to the small number of his people. In the ffront he placed the archers, of whome he made Capytaine John Erle of Orforde: to the right wyng of the battayle he appointed Sir Gylbert Talbot to be the leader: to the left wyng he assigned Sir John Savage, and he with the ayde of the Lorde Stanley accompanied with the Erle of Denbroke hauing a good companie of horsemen, and a small number of fofemen: For al his whole number exceded not fiue thousand men, beside the power of the Stanleys, whereof thzee thousand were in the field vnder the Standard of Sir Wylliam Stanley: The kings number was double as much and moze. When both these armies were thus ordered, and al men redie to set forward, king Richard called his Chiefetaines together and to them sayde.

Most faythfull and assured felowes and friends, although in the adoption and obteyning of the Garlande, I being seduced and prouoked by sinister counsayle dyd commit a naughty and detestable act. Yet I haue with strait penaunce and salt teares (as I trust) clerely purged the same offence, which abhominable crime I require you of friendship as cleerely to forget, as I daylie doe remember to lament the same. If you will nowe diligently call to remembraunce in what case and perplexitie we stande, and in what doubtfull perill we be in: Then, I with you, and you with me, must needes this day take labor & pain to kepe and defend with force, that preheminent and possession which by your prudent deuises I haue gotten and obteyned. I doubt not but you knowe, how the Deuill, continuall enemy to humaine nature, disturber of concord and sower of sedition, hath entred into the hart of an vnknowne Welshman, (whose father I neuer knewe nor him personally saw) exercityng him to aspire and couet our realme, crowne, and dignity, and thereof clerely to depriue and spoyle vs and our posteritie: ye see farther how a companie of traytors, theefes, outlawes, and runnagates of our awne nation be ayders and partakers of his fact and enterpryse, redie at hande to ouercome and oppresse vs: You see also what a number of beggerly Britons and faynt harted frenchemen be with him arriued to destroy vs, our wyfes and childzen. Which imminent mischiefes and apparaunt inconueniences, if we will withstande and retell, we must liue together like brethren, fight together lyke Lyons, and feare not to die together lyke men. And if you consider and wisely ponder all things in your minde, you shall perceyue that we haue manifest causes, and apparaunt tokens of triumph and victorie. And to begin with the Erle of Richmond Capytaine of thys rebellion, he is a Welsh milksop, a man of small courage and of lesse experience in martiall actes and feates of warre, brought by my brothers meanes and mine lyke a Captiue in a close cage in the Court of Fraunces Duke of Britayne, and neuer sawe armie, nor was exercised in martiall affaires, by reason whereof he neyther can nor is able of hys awne wyt or experience to guyde or rule an hoste. For in the wyt and pollecie of the Capytaine, consisteth the chiefe adaption of the victorie and ouerthrowe of the enemies: wherfore aduance forth your standards, and euery one geue but one sure stroke, and surely the iourney is oures. And as for me, I assure you, this day I will triumph by victorie, or suffer death for immortal fame.

This exhortacion encouraged al such as fauoured him, but such as were present moze for dreade then loue, kissed them openly, whome they inwardely hated, other sware outwardely to take part with such, whose death they secretly compassed, and inwardely imagined, other promised to invade the kings enemies, which fled and fought with fierce courage against the king: other stode still and loked on, entending to take parte wyth the victors, and ouercomers. So was his people to him vntrue and vnfaythfull at his ende, as he was to his Nephewes vntrue and unnaturall in his beginning.

When the Erle of Richmond knew by his foreriders that the king was so nere embattayled, he rode about his army, from ranke to ranke, from wyng to wyng, geuyng comfortable wordes to all men, and that finished (beyng armed at all peces sayng his helmet) mounted on a litle hill so that all his people might see and beholde him perfittly, to thre great reioysing. For he was a man of no great stature, his countenance was cherefull and couragious, his heare yelow, like the burnished golde, his eyes gray, shynyng, and quicke, prompt and readie in answering, but of such sobrietie, that it could neuer be iudged whether he were moze dull then quicke in speaking (such was his temperaunce.) And when he had ouer loked his armie ouer euery side, he pationis, these or like wordes folowynge.

If euer God gaue victorie to men fighting in a iust quarrell: or if he euer ayded such as made warre for the welth, and tuition of thre owne naturall countrey: or if he euer succoured them which aduenced there lyues for the reliefe of innocentes, suppressing of malefactors, and apparaunt offenders: No doubt my felowes, and friendes, but he of his bountyfull goodnesse wyll this day send vs triumphaunt victorie, and a luckey iorney ouer our proude enemies, and arrogant aduersaries: for if you remember, and consider the very cause of our iust quarrell, you shall apparauntly perceiue the same to be true, godly, and vertuous. In the which I doubt not but God wil rather aide vs (ye and fight for vs) then see vs banquished and ouercome, by such as neither feare him, nor his lawes, nor yet regarde iustice or honestie. Our cause is so iust that no enterpryse can be of more vertue, both by the lawes diuine & ciuile, for what can be a more honest, goodly, or godly quarrell then to fight against a Captayne, beyng an homicide, and a murderer of his owne blood, and progenie: an extreme destroyer of his nobilitie, and to his and our countrey, and the pooze subiectes of the same, a deadly maile, a fyre brande, and a burden buttolerable: beside him, consider who be of his bande and company such as by murther and vntruth committed against there owne kinne and bynage, ye against their Prince and soueraigne Lorde haue disherited mee, and you, and wrongfully deteyne and vsurpe our lawfull patrimony, and lineal inheritance: For he that calleth himselfe kyng, keepeth from me the Crowne and regiment of this noble realme and countrey, contrary to all iustice and equitie. Moreover I assure you, that there be ponder in that great battayle, men brought thither for feare, and not for loue, souldiours by force compelled, & not with good will assembled: persons which desire rather the destruction, then saluacion of their maister and Capitayne: And finally a multitude whereof the most part will be our friendes, and the least part our enemyes. For truly I doubt which is greater, the malice of the souldiours toward their captaine, or the feare of him conceiued of his people: for surely this rule is infallible, that as yll men dayly couet to destroy the good, so God appointeth the good to confounde the ill, and of all worldly goods the greatest is, to suppress tirauntes, and relieue innocents, whereof the one is euer as much hated, as the other is beloued. If this be true (as clarkes preache) who will spare ponder tirant, Richard Duke of Gouernour butruly calling himselfe king, considering that he hath violated, and broken both the lawe of God and man, what vertue is in him, which was the confusion of his brother, and murderer of his Nephewes: what mercy is in him that slepyth his trustie friendes, as well as his extreme enemyes: who can haue confidence in him, which putteth diffidence in all men: If you haue not red, I haue heard clerkes saye, that Tarquine the proude for the vice of the body lost the kingdom of Rome, & the name of Tarquine bannished the Citie for euer: yet was not his fault so detestable as the fact of cruell Nero, which slew hys owne mother, & opened her entrayles to beholde the place of his conception. Beholde ponder Richard which is both Tarquine and Nero: Ye a tyrant more then Nero, for he hath not only murdered his nephew being his king & souereigne lord, bastarded his noble brethren, and defamed the wombe of his vertuous and womanly mother, but also compassed all the meanes and waies that he could inuent how to deflowre, and carnally to knowe his owne Neere vnder the pretence of a cloked matrimonye, which Ladye I haue sworne, and promised to take to my make and wife, as you all knowe and beleue. If this cause be not iust, and this quarrell Godly, let God the geuer of victory iudge & determine. Therefore let all feare be set aside, and like sworne brethren let vs toyne in one, for this daye shall be the ende of our trauaile and the gayne of our labor either by honorable death, or famous victory: And as I trust, the battayle shall not be so sore, as the profit shall be sweete. Remember the victory is not gotten with the multitude of men, but with the courages of hartes & baliante of mindes. The smaller that our number is, the more glory is to vs if we banquish, if we be ouer come, yet no laude is to be attributed to the victors, consideryng that tenne men fought against one. And this one thing I assure you, that in so iust and good a cause, and so notable a quarrell, you shall fynde me this day, rather a dead carion vpon the colde grounde, then a free prisoner on a carpet in a Ladies chamber. Let vs therefore fight like men. And now auance forward true men against traitors, pitiful persons against murtherers, true inheritozs against vsurpers, the skozges of God against tirauntes, display my banner with a good courage, march forth, and begin the battaile like hardye conquerers, the battaile is at hande, and the victory appoeth, and if we shamefully recule or cowardlye fle, we, and all our sequele be destroyed, and dishonored for euer. This is the day of gayne, & this is the time of losse, get this day victory, and be conquerers, and lese this daies battaile, and be villaines, and therefore in the name of God and saint George let every man couragiously auance forth his standard.

These cherefull wordes he set forth with such gesture of his bodye and simpling countenance, as though all readie he had vanquished his enemyes, and gotten the spoyle.

He had scantly finished his sayng, but the one armie espied the other, Lorde howe hastily the Souldiours buckeled their Helmes, howe quicklye the Archers bent their Bowes, and frused their feathers, howe redily the Byllmen shooke their Billes, and proued their staves, redie to appoche and ioyne when the terrible Trompet should sound the bloodie blast to victorie or death. Betwene both armies there was a great marresse which the Erle of Richemond left on his right hande, for this entent that it should be on that side a defence for his part, and in so doyng he had the Sunne at his back and in the faces of his enemyes. When king Richard sawe the Erles companie was passed the marresse, he commaunded with all hast to set vpon them, then the Trompettes blew, and the Souldiours shouted, and the kinges Archers couragiously let fle their arrowes, the Erles Bowmen stood not still, but payed them home againe. The terrible shotte once passed, the armies ioyned, and came to hande strokes, where neither Sworde nor Bill was spared, at which encounter the Lorde Stanley ioyned with the Erle. The Erle of Orforde in the meane season fearyng least while his companie was fighting, they should be compassed and circumvented with the multitude of his enemyes, gaue commaundement in euery ranke that no man should be so hardy as go aboue ten foote from the Standard, which commaundement once knowne, they knit themselues together, & ceased a little from fighting: the aduersaries sodainly abashed at the matter, and mistrustlyng some fraude or decept, began also to pause and left strikyng, and not agaynst the willes of many which had liefer haue had the king destroyed then saued, and therefore they fought very faintly or stode still. The Erle of Orforde bringyng all his bend together on the one part, set on his enemyes freshly againe, the aduersaries perceayng that, placed their men slender and thin before, and thicke and brode behinde, beginnyng againe hardly the battaile. While the two forewardes thus mortally fought, eche entendyng to banquish and conuince the other, king Richard was admonished by his espialles, that the Erle of Richemond accompanied with a small number of men of Armes was not farre of, and as he appoched and marched toward him, he perfectly knewe his personage by certaine demonstrations and tokens which he had learned and knowen of other. And beyng inflamed with yre, and vexed with outrageous malice, he put his Spurres to his horse and rode out of the syde of the range of his battaile, leauyng the auantgardes fightyng, and like a hungrie Lyon ranne with spere in rest towarde hym. The Erle of Richemonde perceaued well the king furiously comyng towarde hym, and because the whole hope of hys welth and purpose was to be determined by battaile, he gladly profered to encounter wyth hym bodye to bodye, and man to man. King Richarde set on so sharply at the first brunt, that he ouerthrew the Erles standard bearer, & slue sir William Brandon his standard bearer, (which was father to sir Charles Brandon by king Henry the eight created Duke of Suffolke) and matched hande to hande with Sir John Cheiney, a man of great force and strength which would haue resisted him, but the said John was by him manfully ouerthrowne, and so he makyng open passage by dent of Sworde as he went forwarde, the Erle of Richmond withstoode his violence & kept him at the swordes point without aduantage longer then his companions eyther thought or iudged, which beyng almost in dispaire of victory, were sodenly recomforted by Sir William Stanley, which came to succors with three .M. tall men, at which very instant king Richardes men were driven back & fled, and he himself manfully fighting in the middle of his enemies was slaine and brought to his death as he worthely had deserved.

In the meane season, the Erle of Orforde with the ayde of the Lord Stanley, after no long fight discōfited the foreward of king Richard, wher of a great number were slaine in the chase and flight, but the greatest number which (compelled by feare of the king, & not of their mere voluntary motion) came to the field, gaue neuer a stroke, & hauyng no harme nor damage, safely departed, which came not thether in hope to see the king prosper & prevail, but to here that he should be shamefully confounded & brought to ruyne.

In this battaile dyed febe aboute the number of a thousande persons: And of the Nobilitie were slaine John Duke of Suffolke, which was warned by diuers to refraine from the field, insomuch that the night before he should set forward toward the king, one wrote on his gate.

Lacke of Norffolke be not to bolde,

For Dickon thy maister is bought and solde.

Yet all this notwithstanding he regarded more his othe, his honoz, and promise made to king Richard, like a Gentleman, and a faythfull subiect to his Prince, absented not himselfe from his maister, but as he faithfully liued vnder him, so he manfully died with him to his great fame and latode. There were slain beside him, Water Lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Katcliffe, and Robert Brakenbury Lieutenaunt of the Tower, and not manye Gentlemen mo. Sir William Catesby learned in the lawes of the realme, and one of the chiefe Counsaylors to the late king, with diuers other were two dayes after behedded at Leycester. Amongest them that ranne away, were Sir fraunces Vicount Louel, and Humfrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford his brother which tooke Sanctuary in Saint Johns at Gloucester. Of captiues and prisoners there was a great number, for after the death of king Richard was knowen and published, euery man in maner arraynyng himselfe, and castyng away his abilimentes of warre, mekely submitted themselves to the obeyssaunce and rule of the Erle of Richmond: of the the which the more part had gladly so done in the beginnyng if they might haue conueniently escaped from king Richardes espialles, which hauyng as cleere eyes as Lynx, and as open eares as Midas ranged and searched in euery quarter. Amongest these was Henrie the fourth Erle of Northumberland, which whether it was by the commaundement of king Richard puttyng diffidence in him, or he did it for the loue and fauour that he bare vnto the Erle, stode still with a great companie and intermitted not in the battaile, whiche was incontinently receyued into fauour and made of the Counsaile. But Thomas Harward Erle of Surrey which submitted himselfe there, was not taken to grace, because his father was chiefe Counsaylour, and hce greatly familiar with King Richarde, but committed to the Tower of London, where he long remayned, and in conclusion deliuered, and for his truth and fidelitie after promoted to high honors, offices, and dignities. On the Erle of Richemondes part were slaine scarce one hundred persons, amongest whome the principall was Sir William Brandon his Standard bearer.

This battaile was fought at Bosworth in Leycester shire the .xxij. day of August, the whole conflict endured little aboute two houres. King Richard as the fame went, might haue scaped and gotten sauegarde by flyng: For when they which were next about his person sawe and perceyued at the first ioyning of the battaile the Souldiours faintly and nothyng couragiously to set on their enemies, and not onely that, but also that some withdrew themselves priuily out of the prease and departed. They began to suspect fraude, and to smell treason, and not onely exhorted but determinately aduised him to saue himselfe by flight: and when the losse of the battaile was imminent and apparaunt, they brought to him a swift and a light horse to conuey him away. He which was not ignorant of the grudge and ill will that the common people bare towarde him, castyng away all hope of fortunate successe and happy chaunce to come, answered (as men say) that on that day he would make an ende of all battayles, or else there finithe his life. Such a great audacity, and such a stoute stomacke reigned in his bodie, for surely he knewe that to be the day in the which it should be decided & determined, whether he should peaceably obteyne and enioy his kingdome during his life, or else bitterly forgo and be deprived of the same. And so this miser at the same berie poynt had like chaunce and fortune, as happeneth to suche which in place of ryght iustice, and honestie, folowynge their sensuall appetite, loue, vse, and embrace, mischief, tyrannie, and vnyustice. Surely these be examplis of more behemencie, then mans tongue can expresse, to feare and astonne such euill persons as will not liue one houre vacant from doyng and exercisyng crueltie, mischief, or outragious liuyng.

When the Erle had thus obteyned victory, and slaine his mortal enemy, he kneeled downe & rendred to almighty God his heartie thanks. And afterward beyng replenished with incomparable gladnesse, ascended vp to the top of a little Mountaine, where he not onely praised & lauded his baliuant souldiours, but also gaue vnto them his hartie thankes, with promise of recompence for their fidelitie and baliuant factes, willyng and commaundyng all the hurt and wounded persons to be cured, and the dead carcasses to be deliuered to the sepulture. Then the people reioysed & clapped their hands cryng bp to heauen, king Henry, king Henry. When the lord Stanley saw the good will and gladnesse of the people, he took the Crowne of king Richard which was founde amongst the spoyle in the field, and set it on the Erles hede, as though he had bene elected king by the voyce of the people, as in ancient tymes past in diuers realmes it hath bene accustomed, and this was the first signe and token of hys good luck and felicity. I must put you here in remembrance howe that king Richard putting some diffidence in the Lord Stanley, which had with hym as an hostage the Lord Straunge his eldest sennel which Lord Stanley as you haue heard before, ioyned not at the first with his sonne in lawes armie, for feare that king Richard would haue slaine the Lorde Straunge his heyre. When king Richard was come to Bosworth, he sent a Pursuant to the Lorde Stanley, commaundyng him to aduance forward with his companie, and to come to his presence, which thing if he refused to do, he sware by Christes passion that he would strike off his sonnes hede before he dyed. The Lorde Stanley answered the Pursuant that if the king did so, he had more sonnes aliue, and as to come to hym he was not then so determined: When king Richard heard this answer he commaunded the Lorde Straunge incontinent to be beheaded, which was at that very same season when both the armies had sight eche of other. The Counsaillors of king Richard pondering the tyme and cause, knowing also the Lorde Straunge to be innocent of his fathers offence, persuaded the king that it was nowe tyme to fight and not tyme to execution, aduising him to kepe the Lorde Straunge as a prisoner till the battaile were ended, and then at leysure his pleasure might be accomplished. So as God would king Richard brake his holy othe, and the Lorde was deliuered to the keepers of the kings Tentres to be kept as a prisoner, which when the fielde was done and the ymaister slaine, and proclamation made to knowe where the childe was, they submitted themselves as prisoners to the Lord Straunge, & he gently receiued them and brought them to the newe proclaymed king, where of him and of his father he was receyued with great ioy and gladnesse. After this, the whole campe remoued with bagge and baggage, and the same night in the euening king Henrye with great pompe came to the Towne of Leicester. Where aswell for the refreshyng of his people and souldiours, as for preparyng all thinges necessary for his iourney toward London, he rested and reposed himselfe two dayes. In the meane season, the dead corps of king Richard was as shamefully caryed to the towne of Leicester, as he gorgeously the day before with pompe and pride departed out of the same towne. For his bodie was naked and dyspoiled to the skynne, and nothing left about him not so much as a clothe to cover his priuie members, and was trussed behinde a Pursuant of armes called Blaunche Senglier or white Boze, like a Hogge or a Calfe, the head and armes hangyng on the one syde of the horse, and the legs on the other syde, and all by sprinkled with mire and blood, was brought to the gray Friers Church within the towne, and there lay like a miserable spectacle: but surely consideryng his mischicuous actes and vngacious doynges, men may worthely wonder at such a captive, and in the sayde Church he was with no lesse funerall pompe, and solemnitic enterred, then he would to be done at the buryng of his innocent Nephewes, whom he caused cruelly to be murdered, and vnnaturally to be quelled.

When his death was knowen, fewe lamented, and many reioysed, the prowd bragging whyte Boze (which was his badge) was violently rased and plucked downe from euery signe and place where it might be espyed, so yll was his lyfe, that men wished the memoire of him to be buryed with hys carren corps: He reigned two yeres, two monethes, and one day.

Thus ended this Prince his mortall life with infamy and dishonour, which neuer preferred fame or honestie, before ambition, tirannie, and mischiese. And if he had continued still Protector, and suffered his nephewes to haue liued and reigned, no doubt but the Realme had prospered, and he much praysed and beloued, as he is now abhorred and despyed, but to God which knewe his inwarde thoughtes at the houre of hys death, I remit the punishment of his offences committed in his life.

Henry the seuenth.

Stone as the Erle of Richemond returned from the field aforesayde, and was entred into the towne of Leicester, he was there by sounde of Trumpets proclaymed King of thys realme, by the name of King Henry the seuenth, which was the .xxij. day of August. 1485.

Now after that king Henry had not onely obteyned the triumphant battaile aforesayde agaynst hys malicious enemye King Richard, but also by that glorious victorie he gatte the Diademe and possession of the state royall and princely preheminance of this famous Empire and renoumed kingdome as aforesayde. He hauing both the ingenious forecast of the subtil Serpent, and also fearing the burning fyre lyke an infant that is a litle singed with a small flame: did first before his departure from Leicester send Sir Robert Wyloughby knight to the maner of Sheryhutton in the Countie of Yorke, for Edward Plantagenet Erle of Warwike, sonne and heire to George Duke of Clarence then being of the age of .xv. yeres, whom king Richard had kept there as a prisoner during the tyme of his vsurped reigne, and surely the king was not afeard without a cause, for he much mistrusted lea by this yong man, some euill disposed and enuious persons of hys glorie and aduancement, might inuent some newe occasion of reuengyng of battaile agaynst him, which beyng euen from his infancie with many encombrances and troubles bered & endaungered, desired nothing more hartily then nowe to lyue in peace and quietnesse. Sir Robert Wyloughby according to his commission receaued of the Constable of the Castell, the Erle Edward, and hym conueyed to London, where the yongling borne to perpetuall calamitie was incontinently in the Tower of London put Under safe and sure custodie. There was beside him in the same Castell of Sheryhutton the Lady Elizabeth eldest daughter to king Edward, whome King Rycharde foolishly phantasying and deuilishly dotyng did entende to marry as you befoze haue heard, but the Damosell did not only disagree and refuse that matrimony, but abhorred and detested greatly his abhominable desire. At the which most importunate and detestable concupiscence, the common people of the realme so much grudged and maligned that they did not onely attribute the fault and cryme to the king, but much moze cryed out and blamed hys priue Counsayloz which did not dissent, but consent to so pernicious a counsayle, and so shamefull a conclusion: But God of his onely goodnesse preserved the christian minde of that vertuous and good Virgyn, and from that shamefull and filthie art, did graciously protect and defend her: The which Lady not long after accompanied with a great number as wel of noble men as honorable Patrons, was with good speede conueyed to London and brought to her mother.

London.

In the meane season, the king remoued forward by iorneyes towarde London, and euen as he passed, the common people on euerye side of the wayes assembled in great numbers, and with great ioy clapped their hands and shouted, crying king Henry, king Henry. But when he approached nere the Citie, the Maior, the Senate, and the Magistrates of the same being all clothed in Violet, met him at Shordiche, and not onely saluted and welcomed hym with one voyce in generall, but euery person particularly pleased and aduanced himseife, gladly to touch and kisse that victorious handes which had ouercome so monstrous and cruell a tyraunt, geuing laudes and prayings to almyghtie God, and rendering immortall thankes to hym, by whose meane & industrie the comon welth of the realme was preserved from final destruction & perpetuall calamitie, & the authoers of the mischief rooted by and plucked away. And with great pompe and triumph he rood thorough the Citie to the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paule, where he offered hys three Standardes. In the one was the ymage of Saint George, in the second was a red fire Dragon, beaten vpon a hye and greene Sarcnet, the thirde was of yelowe Tarterne, in the which was paynted a dunne Cowe. After hys prayers sayde and Te deum song, he departed to the Bishops Palace and there sojourned a season, during which time, playes, pastymes and pleasures, were shewed in euery part of the Citie.

When these solemnities and geuing of thanks were done and passed: according as other kings had bene accustomed, he congregated together the sage Counsayloz of hys realme: in which counsayle lyke a Prince of iust fayth and true of promise, detestying all intestine and ciuill hostilitie appointed a daye to ioyne in matrimonye the Ladye Elizabeth heyre of the house of Yorke, with his noble personage heyre to the lyne of Lancaster: which thing not onely reioysed and comforted the hartes of the nobles and gentlemen of the realme, but also gayned the fauour and good mindes of all the common people, much extolling and prayng the kings constauit fidelitie, and his polittique deuise, thinking surely that the daye was now come that the seede of seditious factions, and the fountayne of ciuill dissention should be stopped, bannished, and cleerely ertinguished.

After thys, he wyth great pompe was conueyed to Westminster, and there

there the thirtie daye of October was wyth all ceremonies accustomed, annoynted and crowned Kyng by the whole assent as well of the commons as of the Nobilitie, and was named king Henry the seventh of that name, Frederike the thirde then being Emperour of Almayne, Maximilian hys soune then being newly elected king of Romaynes, Charles the eyght reygning ouer the french nation, and James the thirde rulyng the realme of Scotlande. Which kingdome he obteyned and enioyed as a thing by God elected and prouided, & by hys especiall fauour and gracious aspect compassed and achieved. In so much that men commonly reported that 797. yeres passed, it was by a heauenly voyce reuealed to Cadwalader last king of Wytons that his stock and progeny should reigne in thys land and beare dominyon agayne: Wherevpon most men were perswaded in their abone opinion that by this heauenly voyce he was prouided and ordeyned long befoze to enioy and obtayne this kingdome, which thing king Henry the sixt did also shew befoze, as you haue heard declared. Wherefoze he being by right and iust tytle of temporall inheritaunce, and by the prouision of deuine proueynauce thus crowned and proclaymed king: first of all vsing the antique example of the Athenians, which is to pardon and put out of memorie all crymes and offences befoze tyme agaynst hym or hys lawes perpetrated or committed, he called hys high court of Parliament at Westminster the seuenth day of Nouember for the stablyshing of all things as well concerning the preservation and mayntenance of hys royall person, as the administration of iustice and preferment of the common welth of thys realme and dominion, in the which he caused to be proclaymed that all men were pardoned acqyted and cleerely discharged of all offences, paynes of deathe and executions, and should be restored to their landes and moueable goodes, which would submit themselves to his clemencie & by othe be bound truly to serue and obey him as their soueraigne Lord, & who so would be obstinate and refuse to retorne to hys part, should be accepted and taken as a publike enemy to him and his Countrey. By reason of which proclamation, a great number that came out of diuers Sanctuaries and priuiledged places obteyned grace, forgettyng clerely the diuersitie of factious and voyce of partaking. After this he began to remember his especiall friends and fauours, of whom some he aduanced to honour and dignity, and some he enriched with possessions and goodes, euery man according to his desert and merite. And to begin, Jasper his Uncle Erie of Penbrooke, he created Duke of Bedforde, Thomas Lorde Stanley he promoted to the Erie of Darby, and the Lorde Chandew of Britayne his especiall friend he made Erie of Bathe, Syr Gyles Dabbeny was made Lorde Dabbeny, Syr Robert Wylloughby was made Lorde Brooke which he in their degree Barons and Peeres of the realme. And Edward Stafford eldest soune to Henry late Duke of Buckyngham, he restored to his name, dignitie and possessions, which king Rycharde did confiscate and attainted. Beside thys, in this Parliament was this notable act assented to and concluded as foloweth.

To the pleasure of Almighty God, welth, prosperitie and suretie of this Realme of Englande, and to the singular comfort of all the kings subiectes of the same, in aduoyding all ambiguyties and questions: Be it ordeyned, establyshed and enacted by this present Parlyament, that the inheritaunce of the Crowne of thys realme of Englande, and also of Fraunce, vwith all the preheminance and dignity royall to the same appertayning, and all other seigniories to the king belongyng beyond the sea, vvyth the appurtenances thereto in any vwise due or ppertayning, shall rest, remayne and abyde in the molt royall person of our novve souereigne Lorde king Henry the seventh, and in the heyres of hys body lawfully commyng, perpetually vwith the grace of God so to endure, and in none other.

And beside this act, all attaynders of this king, enacted by king Edward and king Richard were adnichilated, and the recozde of the same adiudged to be defaced and put out of memozy, and all persons attaynted for his cause, and occasion, were restozed to their goodes, landes, and possessions. And in conclusion, diuerse of the actes made in the time of king Edward, and kyng Richard were adnulled and reuoked and other moze expedient for the vtilitie of the common wealth were made and concluded. When all things necessary were discretly ordered and the parliament for the time dissolved, the king thought it not necessarye to put in obliuion his friendes and hostages beyng beyonde the sea: wherefore with al diligence he redemed the Marques Dorset, and Sir John Bourchier whome he hadde left as pledges at Paris for money there before borowed. And sent also into Flaunders for John oforton Bishop of Elye.

These actes perfourmed, he stablished in his house a graue counsaile of wyse and pollitique men, by whose iudgement, order, and determination, the people might be gouerned accordyng to iustice and equitye, and that all causes might be finished and ended there, without great bearing or expence in long suit. And for hearing and decyding these causes iustly and spedilye, he sware of his counsaile diuers noble and discrete persons, which for their pollicy, wit, and singular grauitie, were highly esteemed and renoumed, whose names followe, Jaspar Duke of Bedforde, John Erle of Oxenforde, Thomas Stanley, Erle of Darby, John Bishop of Ely, Sir William Stanley, Lord chamberleyn of his houtholde, Sir Robert Willoughby, Lord Brooke, Lord Stuarde of his houtholde, Gyles Lorde Dabwency, John Lorde Dynham after made Tresorer of Englande, Sir Reignold Brey, Sir John Cheiney, Sir Richard Guildforde, Sir Richard Tunstall, Sir Richard Edgercomb, Sir Thomas Louell, Sir Edmond Downyngs, Sir John Risle, with diuerse other wise men, which as the time required he called to his counsaile and seruice nowe one, and nowe another.

Although by this election of wise and graue counsellors al things semed to be brought to a good and perfect conclusion, yet there lacked a wyse to the harpe, to set all the stringes in a monacorde and tune, which was the matrimony to be finished betwene the king, and the Lady Elizabeth, daughter to kyng Edward, which like a good Prince accordyng to his othe and promise, he did both solemnise and consummat in brieve time after, that is to saye, on the .xliij. day of January. By reason of which marriage peace was thought to discende out of heauen into Englande, considering that the lynes of Lancaster and Yorke, beyng both noble families equiuolent in riches, fame, and honour, were nowe brought into one knot and connered together, of whose two bodie one heyre might succede, which after their time shoulde peaceably rule and enioye the whole monarchy and realme of Englande.

These things thus passed, albeit that apparauntly all things semed to be reduced

reduced to a good poynt and set in a sure stay. Kyng Henry beyng made wise and expert with troubles and mischiefes befoze past, remembzed that it was wisdom to feare and prouide for the crafty wyles and lurking traps of hys secret enemies, remembryng all men for the most part embzued and exercised in planting of diuision and soboyng diffencion, can not lightly leaue their pestiferous appetite, and sedicious occupation: Wherefore, for the sauegarde and preseruacion of his owne body, he constituted and ordayned a certayne number aswell of good archers as of diuers other persons beyng hardye, strong and of agilitie to geue dayly attendaunce on his body, whome he named Women of the crowne, which president men thought that he learned of y french kyng when he was in fraunce: for men remembze not anye king of Englande befoze that tyme which vsed such a furniture of daylye souldiours. Yet forasmuch as to auoyde and eschew all doubtfull daungers and perilles bnloked for, lytle auayleth outwarde warre, except there be a sure stay, and a steadfast backstande at home, aswel for the sauegarde and securitie, as for the good gouernaunce of such as be left behynde. He therefore sommoned againe hys great court of parliament, whereto he woulde that there shoulde bee elected the most prudent and grauous persons of euery countie, Citie, port, and Borough, and in especiall such as he in al his daungers, calamities, miseries and tumultuous affaires, vsed, trusted, and fauoured, as partakers, councelors, and companions both of his wo, and aduersitie, and also of his triumph and glorious victozy, whose mindes and studies he perfittly knewe to bee fixed and set in the politique regiment, and prudent gouernaunce of the publique welth of his realme and dominion. Not forgetting, but hauing in fresh memozy that he for that cause principally was so sore desired, and instantlye called of the English nacion his naturall countymen. Estemyng it as a chiefe and principall part of hys duetie to see his realme, both adourned and beautified wyth good and profitable lawes, and statutes, and also to flozish in vertuous exercises, and good and ciuyl maners, which shoulde be an occasion to cause all men to hope, that all thing would continually amend, from euil to good, from good to better, and from better to the best. Thys sure foundacion king Henry layde at the beginning of his raygne, entending theron continually to builde.

In this same yere a new kynde of sicknesse came sodainely through the whole region, euen after the first entring of the kyng into this Isle, which was so sore, so paynefull and sharp, that the like was neuer hearde of, to any mans remembraunce befoze that tyme. For sodainely a deadly and bournyng sweate inuaded their bodie and bered their bloud, & wyth a most ardent heat infested the stomacke, and the head greuously: by the tormenting and beracion of which sicknesse, men were so sore handled, and so painefully pangued, that if they were layed in their bedde, beyng not able to suffer the importunate heate, they cast away the sheetes and all the clothes lyng on the bed. If they were in their apparell and bestures, they woulde put of all their garments euen to their shirtes. Other were so dze that they dranke the colde water to quench their importunate heat & insatiable thirst. Other that could or at the least woulde abide the heate and stintch (for in deede the sweate had a great and strong fauour) caused clothes to be layde vpon them asmuch as they coulde beare, to driue out the sweate, if it might be. All in maner as sone as the sweate tooke them, or within a shorte space after yelded by theyr ghost.

ghost. So that of all them that sickned, there was not one amongst an hundred that escaped: Insomuch, that beside the great number which deceased within the Citie of London, two Maiors, successiuelie dyed of the same disease within eyght dayes and sixe Aldermen. And when any person had fully and completely sweate. xxiii. houres (for so long did the strength of this plague holde them) he should be then cleerely deliuered of his disease: Yet not so cleane rid of it, but that he might shortly relaps and fal agayne into the same euill pit, yea agayne and twise agayne, as many a one in deede did, which after the thirde tyme dyed of the same. At the length by studie of Physitions and experience of the people driuen thereto by dreadfull necessitie, there was a remedie inuented: For they that suryued, considering the extremitie of the paine in them that deceased, deuised by things mere contrariaunt, to resist and wythstand the furious rage of that burnyng furnesse, by luke warme drinke, temperate heat, and measurable clothes. For such persons as relapsed agayne into the flame after the first deliuerance, obserued diligently and marked such things as did them ease and comfort at their first beration, and bying the same for a remedie and Medicine of their payne, adding ever somewhat thereto that was comfortable and wholesome. So that if anye person euer after fell sick agayne, he obseruing the regiment that amongst the people was deuised could shortly helpe himselfe, and easily temper and auoyde the strength and malice of the sweate. So that after the great losse of many men, they learned a present and a speedie remedie for the same disease and malady, the which is this: If a man on the day time were plagued with the sweate: then he should straight lye downe with all his clothes and garments, and lye still the whole. xxiii. houres. If in the night he were taken, then he should not rise out of his bed for the space of. xxiii. houres, and so cast the clothes that he might in no wise prouoke the sweate, but so lye temperately that the water might distill out softly of the owne accorde, and to abstayne from all meate if he might so long sustayne and suffer hunger, and to take no more drinke neyther hote nor colde, then wyll moderately quenche and delay his thirstie appetite. And in this his amending, one point diligently aboue all other is to be obserued and attended, that he neuer put his hand or foote out of the bed to refreche or coole himselfe, the which to doe is no lesse payne then short death. So you may playnely see what remedie was by the daylie experience deuised and inuented for this straunge and vnkowne disease, the which at that time vexed and grieued onely the realme of England in euery towne and Village as it did dyuers tymes after. But lb. yere after, it sayled into Flaunders, and after into Germany, where it destroyed people innumerable for lack of knowlege of the English experience.

And this yere the great Conduyt in Chepe in London, at the charges and expences of Thomas Flam Alderman of London, was newly edified and made. And also this yere the Crosse in Chepe was newly buylded, and towards the charges thereof, one Thomas Fisher Mercer gaue five hundred Markes.

When all thinges by the king were appeased at London, and that he had set and appointed all his affayres in good order and sure state, as he with him selfe coniectured, he thought it best to make his progresse into the other quarters of his realme, that he might see, rote out and purge the mindes

of men spotted and defiled with the contagious smoke of dissention, and priuie factions, and especially the Countie of Yorke, which were priuie fauourers and comforters of the contrary part, and not without a cause. For king Richard more loued and regarded the Northrenmen, then any subiectes within his whole realme, which thing to king Henry was not vnknowen: Wherefore he the more studyed to kepe them in due obeyssaunce and faythfull obsequie, whome he knewe of long custome to haue borne their heartes and fauourable myndes to his aduersaries: therfore in the prime time of the yere he tooke his iourney towards Yorke, and because the feast of Easter approached, he turned to the Citie of Lincolne, where he tarped duryng the solemnitie of that feast: and making there his abode, he was certified that the Lord Louell, and Humfrey Stafford were departed out of Sanctuary in Colchester: but to what place or whether, no man as yet could tell. For which cause the king little regarding the tale, went forth his appoynted iourney to Yorke: And as soon as he was there receyued and settled, it was byruted, and openly shewed to the king himselfe, that Fraunces Lord Louell, was at hand with a strong and mightie power of men, and woulde with all diligence invade the City: also that the forenamed Humfrey Stafford, and Thomas his brother were in Worcester shire, and there had rayled a great bande of rinde and rusticall people, and had cast lottes what part shoulde assault the Gate, what men shoulde scale the walles of the Citie of Worcester, and who shoulde kepe the passages for lettynge of rescues and ayders.

At the first heeryng of this, the king esteemed it for baine and vncertain, and therefore was with it but little moued: but after that he was certified by the letters of credence sent from his friendes, that all was true that was by the common voyce spoken & published, he was afflicted with no small feare. And surely not without a cause, for he wisely considered that he had neyther a competent armie redie prepared, nor harnesse, nor weapons, for them that were present. And also he was nowe in such a doubtfull place, where he neither could nor might comueniently gather an hoste together, considering that in the same Citie, the memoire of king Richard his mortall enemy was yet recent and liuely, and not all forgotten of his friendes, but because the matter required diligent speede, least that by long taryng the power of his aduersaries by dayly aydes might be encreased and multiplied, he commaunded the Duke of Bedford with three thousand men not strongly armed, to do a great enterpryse (for their breast plates for the most part were made of tanned leather) to encounter and set upon them with all hast and diligence, and made him priuie what he himselfe intended to do. After this the king gathered together an hoste in euery place where he might retain them. The Duke setting forward after the fashion of an eger and fierce Capitaine, came nigh to the Tent and campe of his enemyes, where he consulted and communicated his minde with certaine Capitaines and sage souldiours of his companie, by what way he might traine and allure them to peace, without battaile or bloodsheddyng. After which deliberation and aduicement had, it was decreed that the Heraultes shoulde proclaime openly, that all such shoulde haue grace and pardon that would cast downe their weapons and harnesse, and as faythfull Subiectes submit themselves to their naturall soueraigne Lorde. The which proclamation auayled and much profited: For the Lord

Louell:

Fraunces Lord Louell.

Humfrey Stafford, Thomas Stafford.

Rebellion.

Louell: either for some feare or diffidence that he had in his people and sculdours, or fearyng himselfe on his awne behalfe, fled priuily in a night from his companie, and left them without a head, as a flocke of sheepe without a shepheard, which departure when it was to his armie disclosed, they put off their armure and came directly to the Duke, euery man humbly submittyng himselfe and desirynge pardon for their offences, wholly trustyng in the kings mercie and fauourable goodnesse. So by this polittique wisdom and wise meanes of the good Duke, this great rage & fierce route of sturdie and bali-ant traytors which was prepared agaynst the king & were like to haue bene the slaughter of many a man, were pacified and repressed & brought to good conformitie and obedient subiecton. And the Lorde Louell Chiefeine and chiefe leader of this tumult and rebellion, fearyng moze perill and daunger, then renoume or fame of chiuallrie, neuer tariyng the doubtfull chaunce of battaile, fled in all post haste into Lancashire, and there for a certaine space loytered and lurked with Sir Thomas Broughton knight, which in those quarters bare great swayng, and was there in great aucthoritie. Humfrey Stafford also heeryng of this mischaunce happened to the Lorde Louell, in a great dolor and agonie: and for feare, in like maner fled and tooke Sanctu-ary in a village called Culnaham, two miles from Abingdon. But because the Sanctuary was not a sufficient defence (as it was proued before the iu-lices of the kings bench) for traytors, he was taken by force from that place, and brought to the Tower, and from thence conueyed to Tyborne and there put to execution: But his yonger brother Thomas, that was with him, was pardoned and remitted, because he was thought not to haue done it of hys awne will and malicious minde, but thozow the euill counsaile and mischie-uous perswasion of his elder brother.

After that the king had thus by pollicie of his Counsaile appeased and repressed this tumultuous sedicion which greatly vexed and bnuquieted hys spirites, and had reduced to reason and conformitie the rude and bablyng people of the North parties, and in especiall the inhabitants of the Countie of Yorke, he returned to London, and shortly after that to Winchester, where Queene Elizabeth his wife was deliuered in the moneth of September, of a fayre Prince named Arthure at his baptisme. Of which name Englishe men no moze reioyled then outward nacions and foreyne Princes trembled and quaked, so much was that name to all nacions terrible and feareful: And from Winchester he returned backe againe to London.

In this meane tyme, of a small matter and the same altogether being false and fayned, there was an open pathe, and an apparant high way made for a greater inconuenience to ensue. The which matter for the subtile iug-lyng and craftie conueynce of the same, no lesse deceptfull, then lidger de meyne in the hand of a Juggler, was to be esteemed amongst all wise men at the first a very bolde and ouer presumptuous an act to be attempted: But the tyme well weyed, and considered, it was not so monstrous that it were worthe great wonderynge and admiration, consideryng that many persons of late, cyther borne in the wombe of continuall dissention, or nourished with the milke, or suckyng the pappes of ciuill sedicion, could not liue well in rest, and lesse forbear their vsuall custome of mouyng strife and dayly debate. Among the which bugaricious flocke, there was one Sir Richarde Symond

priest, a man of a base and obscure familie, which from his birth delited in fraude and craftie conueiyng, and yet was he well learned, but not so well learned as wilye, nor so wilye as bugaricious. Which Sir Richarde Symond had allected a scholer called Lambert Symenell, one of a gentle nature, and pregaunt wit, to be the organe and conduyte by whome he would conuey his false feyned enterprize and attempt. The Deuill chiefe maister of mischief, put in the wicked minde and venemous brayne of thys most pernicious, disloyall, and trayterous person, to commence, and deuise howe he might make his childe and Scholer Lambert to bee the right enhery- tour to the Crowne of Englande, and so thereof to make him king, and to promote himselfe to the chiefe Archebishopsicke, or some highe potestate within the realme. The chiefe foundation of his occasion was (by the which he was the moze bolde) that the fame went, and manye men surely suppo- sed king Edwardes children not to be dead, but to be fledde secretly into some straunge place, and there to be liuyng, and that Edward Erle of War- wicke sonne and heyre to the Duke of Clarence, eyther was or shoulde be put to death shortly. These rumours althoughe they were false and baine, and without all likelihoode of veritie or truth, encouraged this Priest much, to thinke and iudge the tyme to bee come that thys Lambert might assume and take vpon him the personne and name of one of King Edward the fourthes Children, and to clayme and make tytle both to the Realme, and Kingdome, hauyng sure knowlege that neither friendship shoulde want, nor ayde should lacke: and considering that canard hatred rooted and foun- ded vpon mischieuous factions and seditious deuisions be so perdurable and in maner euerlasting, that they can neuer be clerely expirpate or digged out of their rotten hartes, but that they will with hande and foote, tooth and nape further if they can their pretended enterprize. And thys poore priest brought into this foolishe paradise thozough his awne phantasticall imagi- nation, enformed and taught the childe diligently at Orenforde where he went to Schole, both instructing hym wyth princely behauior, cyuile maner and feutefull litterature, declaring to hym of what high parentage, and of what noble progeny he was lineally descended, thus perswadyng and teach- yng hym his lesson clarkely and craftily for hys purpose, that the people hea- ring the chylde thus rehearsyng hys stock so sagely, myght the rather gene- credite to hys deceptfull pretence and false couloured inuention: Some af- ter the rumoz was blowen abroad that Edward the yong Erle of Warwike was broken out of prison. And when Syr Symond heard of thys, he now intending thereby to bring his inuented purpose to a conclusion, chaunged the childes name of baptisme, and called him Edward after the name of the yong Erle of Warwike, the which were both of one yeres and of one stature, and then he with his pupille sayled into Irelande, there opening his minde, and declaring his matter to certaine of the Irishe nobilitie, whom he knewe by true fame and report to beare but little fauour to king Henry nor his par- takers, and hauing othe and promise of ayde to hym sworne and made, he shewed them that he had saued and preserued the Duke of Clarence some from death, and had for verie good wyll brought him into that Countrie and region tohere he knew that both king Edward and al his stock were fauou- red and loued aboue all other. This matter was beleued straight of the no- bilitie bilittie which so shewed and published this feyned fable and ymagined iuggecrowne and scepter of the realme of right apperteyned to thys yong Prince as sole heyze male left of the line of Richard Duke of Yorke: Exhortyng and desiring them both for the childes sake and his awne, as he was true inheritour to the crowne, to helpe and assist hym to obteyne the Garland and possession of the same by hys Grandfather to hym lincally descended. And so after communicatyng the same matter with other of the nobilitie, every man promised accordyng to hys power, ayde of money, men and munitions. By thys meanes the same was shortly byuted throughtout all Ireland, and eue-ry man was wylling to take his part and submit themselves to him, calling him of a'l handes king. So that nowe they of thys sect thus compassed and sorted, thought to haue in other places their companions and fortherers of their malicious purpose, and straight forth they sent into England certayne pziue messengers to desire them, to whome they knewe to haue bene true and faythfull friendes to king Rychard, now to continue in their accustomed loue and faythfull friendship toward hys Nephewe and to helpe the chylde wyth treasure and substaunce as farre as they conveniently myght. And that hys power might be the stronger to ouercome hys enemies and to obteyne hys pretensed purpose, he and his confederates sent messengers into flanders to the Ladie Margaret syster to king Edward, and late wyfe to Charles the Duke of Burgoyne, to further hys purpose wyth all her power and helpe.

sole daughter named Mary behinde hym, begotten of hys first wyfe daughter to the Duke of Burbone, which was maryed to Maximilian sonne to Frederick the Emperour, on which wyfe he had engendered two children, the one Phylip, and the other Margaret. The which two children after the death of the Ladie Marie their mother, this Ladie Margaret late wyfe to Duke Charles so entirely beloued, & so motherly nourished, that she both for her motherly loue toward the yong children, & also for the good administration of iustice in their Countreies was highly reputed and esteemed, and bare great authoritie and swyng through a'l flanders and the lowe Countreies thereto adiacent. Thys Ladie Margaret although she knewe the familie and stock of the house of Yorke to be in maner destroyed and vtterly defaced by her brother king Richard, yet not beyng faciate nor content with the long hatred and continuall malice of her parents which subuerted and ouerthre w almost the progeny and linage of king Henry the sixt, and the house of Lancaster, nor yet remembryng the newe affinitie and strong alyaunce that was lately concluded, by the which the heyzes of both the houses and progenies were vnited and conioyned together in lawfull matrimony, lyke one forget-mischiefes, displeasures and dammages that shee could deuise agaynst King Henry the seventh. And farther in her furie and frantike moode (accozding to the sayng of the wise man, there is no malice equiualent nor aboue the malice of a woman) she wrought all the wayes possible how to compasse his destruction as the principall head of her aduerse part and contrary faction. Therefoze this Ladye knowyng of this tumultuous sect and conspi-racie, prepared and sodainly deuised agaynst king Henry (although she knew it to be but a feyned and paynted matter and not woorth two strabes) yet (hauyng such an occasion to worke her malice vpon) she promised gladly to the messengers not onely to maintaine, ayde, further and succour their pur-posed entent with money and substaunce, but with all the labour and payne that she might, to encourage, stomach and entise many other to be ayders, assistes and partakers of the same conspiracie, and shortly to ioyne with the Chieuetaines of the sayde enterprize.

When king Henry was certefyed of these doyngs by messengers sent into England, no maruayle although he was none other wise then he had occasion, soze bered and mooued, considering that by the disceyte and fraude of such a dunghill knaue, and vile borne billeyne, so great a sedition should be excited and sturred agaynst him: Neuerthelesse, he lyke a circumspect and prudent Prince, well considering and foreseyng, that if this enterprize came to passe, that the finall ende would be the bloodie and mortall warre, in the which for the most part, the large campe of all mischief is commonly opened and shewed, many innocent men on both partes should perishe and come to ruine and confuson without desert or offence. For which reason befoze all things he determined to attempt and proue, if that he might without any bat-tail or stroke stryken (the end wherof is euer doubtfull) to pacifie and reduce these rebels to reason and due subiection, befoze that this euil newly planted weede should stray and wander ouer the good herbes of hys whole realme.
Therefoze he called his whole counsaile together at the Charterhouse beside his royall manner called Richemond, and there consulted how to pacifie this sodayne rage secretly begon, without any moze disturbaunce or open trouble: which mocion of all men was thought meete to be assayed and prosecuted with effect. And that befoze any other thing were attempted and be-gon, that a generall pardon should be published to all offenders that were content to receaue the same, and after would be true, louyng and obedient to the king their soueraigne Lorde accordyng to their bounden duette and alle-geaunce: Thinkyng that if that pardon were any lenger space delayed or prolonged, that in the meane season (as the prouerbe sayeth, faryng draboweth perill) Sir Thomas Broughton knight which had hid and kept the Lorde Louell from the king a great season, and was at hande with dyuers of hys friendes, in so troubleous and perillous a time, vtterly despairing of pardon and remission, and as men without hope of any grace, setting all on fire and fenen, should sodainely moue a newe insurrection agaynst hym, and bnuiet him in some place, where he had least resistance: Wherupon the king gaue a generall pardon throughtout al England (without exception of any offence) pea euen to them that had committed high treason agaynst hys maieste and royall person. Furthermoze, after long consultation had and all things well considered, it was thought by the whole senate for the time then present most necessarie and conuenient to auoyde that erronious rumour, rumb'ing and blasting abroad, that the sonne of the Duke of Clarence was in Eng- lande, and that he personally should be shewed abroad in the Citie and other publique places, whereby the vntreue opinion falsely affirming that he was in Irelande might be amongst the commonalty repressed, and accompted as a bayne and imagined fable.

In thys solempne counsaile dyuers and many thinges of the realme were there debated and concluded: and amongst other, it was determined that the Lady Elizabeth wyfe to king Edward the fourth, should lose and forseyt all her landes and possessions, because she had voluntarily submitted her selfe and her daughters wholly to the handes of King Rycharde, contrary to the promise made to the Lordes and nobles of thys realme in the begin- ning of the conspiracie imagined agaynst king Rycharde, which at her desire and request left all that they had in Englande, and fled to King Henry into Briteyne, and there receaued a corporall othe of him to mary her eldest daughter, which offer shee abode not by, but made it frustrate and boyde, through whose double doyngs it had like to haue succeeded, that neyther the marriage could take place, nor yet the Noble men which at her request toke king Henryes part, might not returne agayne without iopardie of lyfe, but liue still in perpetuall banishment and miserable exile. This was a greuous offence and a heynous crime: howbeit the sequele thereof well digested, it was thought by some men that shee deserved not by equitie of iustice so great a losse and so great a punishment: for surely shee did not so great hurt or hin- deraunce to king Henry and his confederates by her reconciliation to king Rycharde, but ten times more shee profited and aduanced their cause. For by her submission made to hym, he neglecting Gods lawes, honest order and chyrstian religion, presuming to heape mischiefe vpon mischief, desyred of her the marriage of her daughter his natural nere, which thing he would not haue thought lykely to haue obtained: The Queene & her daughters still for feare of him continuynge in Sanctuarie. Which vnlawfull desire (considering for that entent he had rid his wyfe out of the woelde) prouoked the yre of God and the sword of vengeance agaynst him, whereby his synall ruine and destruction shortly after ensued to his miserable confusion, and to the exalta- tion of king Henry and auancement of his whole company.

By this foly and inconstancie of the Queene, shee incurred the hatred and displeasur of many men, & for that cause liued after in y<sup>e</sup> Abbey of Bar- mandsey besyde Southwarke, a wretched and a miserable life, where not many yeres after shee disceased, and is buryed with her husband at Windsor. Such are all worldly chaunces, now in prosperitie and aboundaunce, mu- table and changeable, and full of inconstancie: And in aduersitie often chaunge from euill to good and so to better, to the entent that they that be in weyth and flowe in the aboundaunce of all thinges, shall not thinke them- selues in suretie to tary still in that degree and state: and that they that be in miserie and calamitie shall not despayre and mistrust God, but liue in hope, that a better day of comfort and gaine will once appere and come. And yet although fortune ruleth many things at her will and pleasure, yet one worke that this Queene hath made cannot bee forgotten nor put in obliuion. At what tyme that king Edward her husband reigned, shee founded and erected a notable College in the vniuersitie of Cambridge, for the findyng of scho- lers desirous of good lyterature and learnyng, and endued it with sufficient possessions for the long maintenaunce of the same, which at this day is called the Queenes College, a name surely meete for such a place, wherein scholers diligently studyng in all doctrine and sciences, proue excellent Clerkes, and come to great honoures.

When all thinges in this counsaile were seriously concluded and agreed to the kings minde, he returned to the Citie of London, geuyng in commaun- dement that the next Sunday ensuyng, Edward the yong Erle of Warwicke should be brought from the Tower through the streetes of London, to the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paule. This yong Gentleman (as he was commaunded) shewyng himselfe openly to euery bodie in the Procession time tarped there the highe masse, hauyng communication openly with many no- ble men, and with them in especially that were suspected, and thought to haue bene partakers of the commorion agaynst the king, to this purpose and effect, that they might perceyue the fonde Irishemen, for a vaine shadowe and vn- true fiction vnadvisedly to procure and moue warre agaynst him and hys realme, without any iust cause or lawfull occasion. Howbeit to euill disposed persones or brainelesse men, this medicine nothing auayled nor profited. For the Erle of Lyncolne sonne to John de la Pole Duke of Suffolke, and Elizabeth sister to king Edward the fourth, thinkyng it not meete to neglect and omit so open an occasion of newe trouble and mischiefe offered, determined to vpholde, forstefie, and bolster the entent and purpose of the Irishemen, least that they might be seduced, and caused to desist and leaue off their begon enterpryse: And doubtlesse the man beyng of great wit and intelligence, and of no small iudgement, but halfe infected with the venemous skab of the late ciuile battaile, could not with a quiet mynde suffer king Henrie beyng princi- pall head of the contrary faction to reigne in quiet, but consultyng with Sir Thomas Broughton, and certeine other of his trustie friendes, purposed to saile into Flaunders to his Aunt the Lady Margaret Duchesse of Burgoin, late wyfe to Duke Charles, trustyng by her helpe to make a puyssaunt army of men, and to ioyne with the Companions of the new rayfed sedicion. There- fore, after that the king had dissolved y<sup>e</sup> Parliament, which then was holden: he fled secretly into Flaunders to the Ladie Margaret, where Fraunces Lozde Louell landed certaine dayes befoze. And there they beyng altogether, euery man accordyng to his minde reasoned, and debated what was best to do. After long communication had, this finall conclusion was agreed vpon, that the Erle of Lyncolne and the Lozde Louell should go to Ireland, and there attende vpon her counterfeyt nephewe, and to honour him as a king, and with power of the Irishemen to bring him into England, and sending for all their friendes, should without delay geue battaile vnto king Henry: So if their doynges had good and prosperous successe, then the foresayde Lam- bert (misnamed the Erle) should by the consent of the Counsaile be deposed, and Edward the true Erle of Warwicke to be deliuered out of prison, and af- ter by the auctority and ayde of his friendes of the Nobilitie, should be pub- lished, proclaymed and annoynted king.

man to be so foolish to inuent, feigne, or counterfeit any thing moze of him, or any so mad or indiscrete (especially of his realme) as to beleue that Lambert was berye Edward, onely myndyng the suppressyng of the wretched Irish men, studyed how to subdue and repress there bolde enterpryse. And heeryng sodainly that the Erle of Lincolne with other were fled, and gone to his aduersaries, beyng therewith scdeinly moued: thought euen with strong hand and marciall power to ouercome his enemies and euill willers, whose maliciousnesse he could by no counsaile nor pollicie eschew nor auoide. And beyng thus determined, he commaunded certeine of his Capitaynes to prepare an hoste of men out of euery part of his Realme, and them to byng and conduite into one place assigned, that when his aduersaries should come forwarde, he might with his populous multitude and great power sodainly set on them, and so ouercome and banquish them altogether. And mistrustyng that other would folowe the Erle of Lincolne into flanders, he caused the East partes, and all the borders thereaboutes to be diligently kept, that none other might escape or geue them succour. And comyng to the towne of Saint Edmondes bury, he was certified that the Lorde Thomas Marques Dorset was comyng to excuse and purge himselfe before him, for certeine thinges that he was suspected to haue done lightly when he was in fraunce. To whome the king did send the Erle of Oxforde to apprehend him ridyng on his iourney, and to conuey him to the Tower of London, to trie his truth, and proue his patience: for if he were his friend, as he was in dede, he should not be miscontented to suffer so little a reproch, and rebuke for his Princes pleasure: If he were not his friend, there to tary in safetie that he might do no dammage nor hurt to him. And from thence the king went forth to Norwiche, and so to Walsyngham, and shortly after he returned to London.

In this meane tyme the Erle of Lincolne and the Lorde Louell, had gotten by the ayde of the Lady Margaret, about two thousande Almaines, with Martyn Swarde a noble man in Germany, and in marciall feates very expert, to be their cheuetepe, and so sayled into Irelande. And at the cytie of Dyuelyn, they caused yong Lambert to be proclaymed and named kyng of England, after the most solempne fashon, as though he were there of the very heyre of blood royall lyneally borne and discended. And so with a great multitude of beggerly Irishmen, all most all naked and unarmed sayyng skaynes and mantelles, of whome the Lorde Thomas Gerardine was capitayne and conductor, they sayled into Englande with this newe founde king, and landed for a purpose at the pyle of Fowdrey within lytle of Lancaster, trustyng there to be ayded with money by Sir Thomas Broughton one of the chiefe companyons of this unhappy conspiracy.

Lambert landeth in Englande with a great power of men.

The kyng not slepyng his matters, but mistrustyng and smellyng the stozme that folowed, before the enemies arriued, dispatched certayne horsemen throughout all the west partes of the realme, chiefly to attende the comyng and arriuall of his enemies: secondarely to wayte for such espialles as came out of Irelande, and them to apprehend and compell to shewe and declare the secretes of their enemies. When he had gathered all his host together, over the which, the Duke of Bedforde, and the Erle of Oxenforde, were chiefe captaynes, he went to Couentry, where he being, his light horsemen men according to their duety returned & certified hym that the Erle of Lincoln was landed at Lancaster with his new king. The which when the kyng vnderstoode was so, he consulted with his nobilitie and counsellors to knowe if it were for the best to encounter with them out of hande, or to let them dragge a while, for this matter both required counsaile and also speede. After they had layed their heades together, and well debated the matter, it was determyned that they should set vpon them without any further delay, least that their powre by long sufferance, and delayng of tyme, myght bee augmented and greatly multiplied. And so after such aduise ment taken, he remoued to Rottyngham, & there by a lytle wood called Bowzes, he pitched his fielde: to whome shortly after came the Lorde George Talbot Erle of Shrewsbury, the Lorde Straunge, sir John Cheynie, valyaunt capitaines, with many other noble, and expert men of warre. For the kyng hadde commaunded, and geuen in charge before, that all persons of the counties adioyning that were able and of strength to cary weapon, should be readie in an houres warning, in case that any neede should require. Therefore pycked felowes, and hardy personages, and such as were lyke men, were chosen in all the hast, and of this sort a great armie was assembled and gathered together: So the kings armie was wonderfully increased, and from tyme to tyme greatly augmented.

In this space, the Erle of Lincoln beyng entred into Porke shire, passed softly on his iourney without the spoyling, or hurtynge of any man, trustyng thereby to haue some company of people resort vnto him: but after that he perceaued fewe or none to folowe him, and that it was to no purpose to returne backe, consideryng his enemies were ail ready to set vpon him, he determined firmly to trie the fortune of battaile, remembryng that the chaunce of warre doth stande euer vpon .vj. or .vij. & that king Henry not two yeres before with a small powre of men, banquished kyng Richard and all his mightie armie. And herebpon putting a sure confidence vpon his companie, directed his way from Porke to Newwarke vpon Trent, to the entent that there he (as he trusted) augmenting his company myght set vpon the king, whome he knewe to be but two dayes iourney from him. Albeit, before he came there, king Henry was in his bosome and knewe euery houre what the Erle did, and came the night before that hee fought, to Newwarke, and there approached neere his enemies, soner then they looked for him, and there taryng a litle, went three myles farther and pitched his fielde & lodged there that night. The Erle of Lincoln certefyed of his comyng, was nothing aferde, but kept still on his iourney, and at a lytle village called Stoke nigh to the kyng and his army planted his campe. The next day folowyng, the king deuided his whole number into three battayles, and after in good array approached nigh to the towne of Stoke, where was an equal and plain place for both the parties to darraigne the battaile.

When the place was appoynted and ordeyned to trie the bittermost by stroke of battaile, the Erle set forth his armie, and geuyng a token to his companie, set vpon his aduersaries with a manly courage, desiryng his soldiors that day to remember his honour, and their aboue lyues. And so both the armies ioyned and fought earnestly and sharply, insomuch that the Almaines beyng tryed and expert men of warres and marciall feates, were in all things, as well in strength as pollicie equall and equiuolent with the Englishe men: but as for Martin Sward theyr chiefe Capitaine and leader, not many of the Englishe men, both for valiaunt courage of a stoute stomacke and strength, and symblenesse of bodie was to be compared or resembled with his manhooche. Of the other syde, the Irishe men, although they fought hardily, and stucke to it valiantly, yet because they were after the maner of theyr Countre almost naked, without harness or armure, they were stricken downe and slain lyke dull and brute beastes, whose deathes and distructions was a great discouragynge and abashement to the residue of the companie. Thus they fought for a space so fore and so egerly of both partes, that no man could well iudge to whome the victoize was like to encline: but at length, the kinges forewarde beyng full of people and well fortified with wynges, which onely both began and continued the fight, set vpon the aduersaries with such a force and violence, that first they oppressed and killed such Capitaynes one by one as resisted their might and pupsaunce, and after that put all the other to fearefull flight, the which were eyther apprehended as captiues and prisoners in their flight runnyng away, or else slain and brought to confuson in a small moment. But when this battaile was finished, and fought out to the extremitie, then it well appered what highe prowesse, and manly stomackes was in the kinges aduersaries. For there their chiefe Capitaynes, the Erle of Lyncolne, and the Lord Louell, Sir Thomas Broughton, Martyn Sward, and the Lord Gerardine Capitaine of the Irishe men were slaine and found dead. Howbeit, some affirme that the Lorde Louell took his horse and would haue fled ouer Trent, but he was not able to recover the further syde for the highnesse of the banke, and so was drowned in the riuer. There were killed at that battaile with their fiue capitaynes before rehersed, of that partie about foure thousand: Of the kings part there were not halfe of them which fought in the foreward, and gaue the onset, slaine or hurt: Then was Lambert the yonglyng which was falsely reported to be the Dukes sonne of Clarence, and his maister Sir Richard Simond priest, both taken, but neyther of them put to death, because that Lambert was but an innocent poore soule, a very childe, and was not of age to do any such enterprize of his awne deuce, and the other was a priest, which yet to the entent he might remember that the stone oftentymes falleth on the head of him that casteth it into the ayre, and that many a man maketh a rod for his awne taile when he entendeth it for another, this priest for penaunce was committed to perpetuall prison and miserable captiuitie. But this Lambert in conclusion was made the kinges faulkener, after that he had bene a turue broche, and executed such vile offices in the kings Kitchyn and Scullarie for a space. And thus was all the highe enterprize that Ladie Margaret had deuised and set forth at this tyme, turned to naught and brought to none effect, and to an euill conclusion. Of which chaunce, when shee was aduertised and enforced in the Countre of Flaunders, she was very sozie at the heart & much lamented and bewayled, that her imagined purpose sorted to such an infortunate ende and effect, incontinently deuilsyng, practisyng, and imaginynge some great and more difficile enterprize, by the which she might bere and vniquiet yet once againe the king of England & his whole region: which purpose, even as she inuented it, so she set it forward, as shall be shewed hereafter plainly.

After that king Henry had thus asswaged and appeased these matters beyng of so great a moment and weight, with no great motion, tumult, or trouble, he commaunded that no man should kyl or slep the Erle of Lyncolne, but that he should be brought to him alyue, to the entent that he might shewe and bewray both the fountayne and original beginning of thys seditious conspiracie. But the same is, that the souldiours would not so doe, fearing least peradventure the sauynge of his onely life (as it should haue bene in deede) the lyfe of many other should haue bene lost, or at the least in leoparde. This battaile was fought on a Saturday being the .xvi. day of June. In the which yere also Thomas Burchier Archebysshop of Cauntorbury dyed, into whose roome John Hoozton late Bysshop of Elye, a man of equall learning, vertue and pollicie with his predecessours, whome Alexander of that name the sixt Bysshop of Rome created Cardinall, and the king preferred him to the office of the high Chauncelour of Englande: Nowe to returne to my purpose.

After this victorie, then the king did execution of such rebels and traytours as were taken in the field, eyther at the battaile, or in the chace. And shortly after, he went into Yorke shire, and there costed the Countre, ouerthwart, searching by his espialles and priuie enquyries, whether his aduersaries gathered any other army against him, entending earnestly to weede out, and purge his lande of all seditious scede, and double harted fruyte, if it were possible, and suche as were founde culpable in any one point, were committed to prison, and eyther punished by fine or extinct by death.

In the midst of August he by toyneynge arryued at Newcastle vpon Tyne a berie proper towne, situate on the hether part of Northumberland, where he taried the remnaunt of the Sommer, and being there, sent in Ambassade into Scotland to king James the thirde, Richard Foxe which not long before was made Bysshop of Exeter, and with hym Syr Richard Edgcombe knight Comptroller of his house. The summarie of their commission was to conclude a truce for a tyme, or a long league and amitie. For king Henry esteemed it both honorable & profitable if he might haue perfite peace and assured amitie with Princes adioyning and his next neighbours. And before all other, king James of Scotlande, to the intent that his subiectes hauing knowledg of the amitie and despairyng utterly to haue anye refuge, comfort or succour of the Scottes, or other their neighbours adioyning, contrarie to their olde vsage, might the better be continued in the fapth, duetie and loyaltie towarde their Prince and soueraigne Lord. The Ambassadors when they were come into Scotlande to the king, were of him both gently entertayned, and after the most louing fashon receaued and fully harde. To whome at the first he shewed the good hart and minde, that he hymselfe continually bare, and yet did intend to shewe towards king Henry, although hys subiectes were of a contrarie minde and opinion, playnely protestyng and declaryng to them his Vassals to be both by nature & wyllfull disposition, dyuers and contrarie euer to the Englishe nation: thinking surely that they for the most part would neuer consent and long agree with the Englishe men, according to their olde subtile dealing: wherefore least that he should offende or minister cause of occasion to them (as in deede all men were not his friendes in Scotland at that tyme) he desired the Ambassadors to be content with a truce and abstinence of warre for seven yeres not onely in open audience, but on his honor promised firmly in secret communication, that he for his part would kepe continuall peace with the king of Eng- lande during their lyues, but appauntly he promised that of these seven yeres should be passed and fully fynished, that he would renewe agayne the truce for other seven yeres, so that king Henry and he should lyue in peace, and most assured amitie, during their natural lives. And this did king James conclude with king Henry, because that he knewe himselfe, his actes, yea and his name to be had in such despite and hatred of the moze part of his disloyall people, that nothing (whatsoever he did) was esteemed, regarded, well spoken of or had in any price: Such was the malicious hart burning of the Scottes against their naturall Lorde. The Ambassadors perceauing the hartie minde and faythfull beneuolence of this king towards their maister king Henry, accepted and assented to his offer, and ratified the same: And returning home shewed the king all the matter in order as it was proponed and concluded. With which tydings, he perceauing the king of Scots good minde towards him, and appauntly perceauing that as that tempestuous and stormie season requyred, it was not to his small commoditie and profite, receyued maruellously that his Ambassade came to so good an effect: & shortly reculed back agayne from Newcastle to York, and so towards his Citie of London. And in the way beyng at Leicester, diuers Ambassadors sent from Charles the frenche king came to his presence, which declared and shewed to him that their king Charles had recouered many towne, Cities and garrisons which before that time were possessed and holden of Maximilian king of Romaines and Archduke of Austryce, and that he nowe moued battayle agaynst Fraunces Duke of Briteyn, because he kept, ayded and succoured in his territorie and dominion dyuers noble princes and high personages of the realme of Fraunce, which were Traytors and rebels agaynst him, his realme and seignorie, of the which the chiefe leader was Lewis Duke of Orlyuance: And therefore he desired him for the olde friendship and familiaritie practised betweene them, that he would eyther ayde, assist, and helpe him, or else stande neuter betweene both parties, neyther helping nor hurting any of both partes.

King Henry well remembryng that although he had found much friendship at the frenche kinges hande in his necessitie, and that by him partly and his he obteyned his kingdome, yet for as much as he espied vpon what vn- sure groundz this quarell was begonne agaynst the Britones, with this mes- sage was not well contented nor yet pleased. For he which sawe as farre in the frenche kings brest as his Philosophy did in his bryne, knewe perfectly that he had neyther occasion by any iust tyt'e to invade the Duchye of Briteyn, nor yet any displeasure ministred to him, by reason whereof he might iustly haue any shadow to make a quarrell to the Duke of Briteyn, but onely to delate, amplifie and spreade forth his aucthorie, dominion, and possession. For the frenche king and his counsaile knewe well that Duke Fraunces was an impotent man, soze diseased and well stricken in age, and had neuer any heyre male to inherite and possede his Duchie, wheretoze they determined by some meanes easily to compass that the Duchie of Briteyn should shortly come vnder their rule and subiection, and so without grounde

or good cause made open warre agaynst the Duke and his Nation. King Henry perceuyng that this new attempted enterprize nothing founded to his profite, calling to mynde and consideryng, that if the Duchie of Briteyn and the people of the same which had bene euer friendly and louing to the Eng- lische Nation, and was alwayes for their entercourse to his realme both ne- cessary and profitable, should come vnder the thraldome and subiection of the frenche king, that damage moze then profite were like to ensue and folow, determined with himselfe to ayde and take part with the Duke, perceuyng well that all his affayres was nowe in perill and set in a broyle and hafard. The occasion that moued him thereto was, the kindlyng of the fatherly loue and tender affection which the Duke euer shewed him, sith his first arri- uall and entryng into Briteyn, and his fidelitie to him alway appauntly shewed during the tyme of his there abidyng and residence. On the other part when he remembred the great benefite that he had taken and receiued at the frenche kinges hande by his bountifull and princely liberalitie, thought it both necessary, honest, and consonant to reason, to forget the vnthankfull of- fence agaynst the Duke of Briteyn committed, and to perswade and aduise the frenche king to desist from beyng and inuadyng the Duke of Briteyn, least any scruple or sparke of ingratitude might growe or kyndle betweene them two. This matter was so doubtfull and so full of ambiguities, that the king in long consultation leste no question nor doubt vnasked nor vndiscussed, and yet no aunswere nor no conclusion could satisfie or please his doubtfull minde and gentle hart, loth to offende any of them, of whom he had receyued either benefite or friendship: But in conclusion, he fell to this full determination, that if battail should nedes succede and folow, then he of very dutie was specially bound not to denie nor forsake the Duke of Briteyn, to whome he was so much beholdyng, but to ayde, assist, and comfort him with all his power, and openly to kepe from him all wronges and iniuries, and to defend and resist all his aduersaryes and enemyes. Yet in the meane season, least he should of the other part make his highe friend his extreme enemye, his aunswere was to the Ambassadors that he would take traualle and study both to his great paine and cost, that betweene the frenche king theyr soue- reigne Lorde, and the Duke of Briteyn, both beyng his indifferent friendes some gentle pacification, or friendly accorde might be concluded and taken. And so as sone as the kinges Ambassadors were dismissed, he sent on message Christopher Urswike to Charles the frenche king: first to declare in his behalfe howe ioyous he was of the victorie that he had obteyned vpon Maximilian king of Romaines. Secundarily, what tumult and insurrecti- on was here in England, and howe by mere force and manhood he had van- quished and repressed the rebelles and traytors, & either destroyed or brought to subiection the whole rablement and number. Thirde, offeryng himselfe as a meane and intercessor of peace and amitie betweene the frenche king Charles and the Duke of Briteyn: geuyng him farther in charge, that if he shou'd perceue the frenche king to geue open eare to his request, and to encline to his desyre, that then he should without delay resort to the Duke of Briteyn, and desyre him to be content at his desyre to endeuour himselfe to an honourable peace and concord, rather then to warre and doubtfull dis- sention, which peace with Gods grace he little doubted, the Duke beyng wil- lyng, lyng, shortly to compasse and bring to conclusiō. While Christopher Urswike was trauallyng in this commissiō, king Henrie returned with great triumph to his Citie and Chamber of London, hauing the victoꝝ and ouerhande of his enemyes, and rebellious aduersaries, wheresof the Citizens were very glad, & greatly reioysed. And sone after this, the king bountifullly and liberally rewarded all such persons, which not onely did hazarde their goods, their possessions, liuyngs, & substance, but also their liues & bodies in his defence and quarell. And not long after, he deliuered Thomas Marques Dorset out of the Tower of London, acceptyng him to his high fauor & olde familiaritie, because his truth and fidelitie had bene tryed and proued by sundry and diuers arguments and assayes. Durynge this time, the king for the perfite loue and sincere affection that he bare to his Queene and wife Lady Elizabeth, caused her to be crowned & anoynted Queene on saint Katherines day in Nouember with all solemnitie to such a high estate and degree apperteynyng. In the meane season Christopher Urswike was come to the french king liuyng at Tholouse, and of him after the most louyng & friendly fashion that could be, receyued and enterteyned. And alsoone as he had shewed and declared his message, the french king shewed himselfe outwardly, although inwardly he other wise entended, to be therewith contented and that very well pleased that the king of England should be the meane of peace, and Arbitrer indifferent betwene the Duke and him. Chys aunswere made, the Englishe Ambassadour toke his iourney streyght thence as he was commaunded into Briteyne, and shewed the Duke vpon his maisters behalfe all things geuen him in charge and commissiō: But the Duke (because himselfe had bene long sicke, and thereby his memoꝝ and wytt was decayed and appaired) he appointed to heare the message with other of his Counsellers, Lcōys Duke of Orleans which was fled thether out of Fraunce. When this Duke had heard the Ambassadors declare their message, perceauing that it touched a peace which he thought sounded neyther to hys profite nor pleasure, wheresfore he beyng somewhat tickled with the message answered and sayde, that it was moꝝe meete and conuenient that king Henry (considering and remembryng the great kindnesse and humanitie that he had receyued at the Dukes hande) should with all the power and strength he might, helpe the Duke of Briteyne beyng by the Frenchmen inuaded with yron, fyre, and bloud, then to attempt or procure any sepueious or baine composition or concord. Yet and although he had in ynter receaued nor remembred any benefite done to hym by the Duke, yet should he consider that the Countrie of Britayne was in maner a Bulwarke and a strong wall for the Englishe men in defence of the french men, the which if it should come into the hands of the french nation, then were his continuall enemies next to the gate of his realme, which thing he would not suffer if he remembred the proverbe that sayth, when thy neyghbors house is a fyre, thy staffe standeth next the doze. After that Christopher Urswike had receaued thys aunswere then he returned agayne into Fraunce, and there taried certayne dayes, declaring to king Charles what aunswere was made to hym by the Briteyns, and shortly after returned into Englande agayne.

While these things were thus in doing, the french king besieged with a great puissaunce the strong Citie of Gauntes in Briteyne. And the moꝝe greedier that he was of his purpose, and the moꝝe hast he made for gayning his praye, so much the moꝝe did he exhort the king of England with letters, wytyngs and sayre wordes, by sundrie and diuers messengers for to treat and conclude a peace, betwixt the Duke of Briteyne and him, fearing least when he had almost runne his race, king Henry would put him beside hys sadell, whome he did halfe suspect to be a back friend of hys, and prone and readie to take the Britons part.

Wheresfore he sent in Ambassade Barnarde a Scot bozne, called the Lorde Daubeny, in all haste to king Henry, to desire him in anye wise to make some ende whatsoeuer it were of this warre and controuersie. And therebpon the king beyng desirous of the same, which had rather all things might be ended by peace then by dint of sworde, least that he should be driuen to take part with the Britons agaynst the french nation, elected among all other thre Ambassadors. The first was John Saint, Abbot of Abyndon, John Lilpe bozne in Luke, the Bysshop of Romes Collector, and Doctor of lawe, and Richarde Edgecombe knight, a fatherly, wise and a graue personage, which for the reuuing of the olde amitie, were commaunded first to repaire to the french king, and after that to the Duke of Briteyne, to whom he gaue a long commissiō with sufficient instructions. But or euer these Ambassadors proceeded on their iorney, John Lilie fell sick on the goote, so that he was not able to trauallye in so long a iorney, and so weightie a businesse, for whome was elected and chosen Christopher Urswike, and so they thre sayled into fraunce (as they were commaunded) and when they had commoned a space with the french king, concerning the foꝝme of the peace and concord to be concluded, Richarde Edgecombe, and Christopher Urswike, departed streight to the Duke of Briteyne, thinking, ye and nothing doubting, but they should knit by the knot, and finail conclusion of their Ambassade, according to their aboue request and desire, but all their hope was bayne, and turned to a banitie. For the Duke vpon great deliberation, constantly denyed and refused euery condition by them offered or demaunded. Which things, when they succeeded not according to their expectation, the Ambassadors returned back to the french king agayne, and there to him declared what was their aunswere and finail resolution, and yet making there abode in fraunce, they declared to the king of England by their letters all their actes and exploit. But or their letters came to the kings handes, Sir Edward Lorde Wooduille Uncle to the Queene, a valyaunt Capitayne, and a Champion, eyther abhorring ease and ydolnesse, or inflamed with ardent loue and affection towarde the Duke of Briteyne, desyzed very earnestly of king Henry, that if it were his will and pleasure, that he with a conuenient number of good men of warre might transport himselfe into Briteyne for the aide & defence of Duke fraunces, the kings assured and proued friend. And lest it should soto or kindle any dissention or ingratitude betwene the french king & him, he saide that he would steale priuily ouer, without any licence or passport, as though no man should thinke or doubt but he were fled y realme, But the kyng which had a firme confidence, that peace shoulde be made by the pollitique prouision & wyse inuencion of his elected Ambassadors, would in no wyse geue the bridle to his hasty desire, but straightly forbade hym to attempt any such enterpryse, thinkyng that it stode not with his honor to offende faide the french kyng, to whome he would shew as much amitie and humanity as he might. Yet this Lord Woodville hauing playne repulse and deniall of the kyng, could not thus rest, but determined to worke his businesse secretly without any knowlege of the king, & went straight into the Isle of Wight, whereof he was made ruler and captayne, and there gathered a crewe of tall and hardy personages, to the number of foure hundred, and with prosperous wynde and wether, arryued in Britayne, and ioyned himselfe with the Britons against the french power and nacion. The rumoz of thys doynge was soone blowen into the court of fraunce, which made the Ambassadors of Englande not finally abashed, who knowyng perfectly the frenche heartes to be prone and ready at all tymes to reuenge and doe out rage to such as displeased them, were sodainelye afrayde least the common people coulde not withhold their handes from quarelyng or frayng. Albeit the law of armes and the truth it selfe did defende and preserue them from iniury. But whyles the Ambassadors were in this perplexity, and feare of daunger, and whyles the frenchman suspected this fact to be done by a cautel of king Henry, there came other new messengers from him to the french kyng, to purge himselfe to his friend of the suspected ingratitude, certifying him that the lord Woodville without his knowlege or consent, was sayled ouer in to Britayne with so small a number of men, which small handefull, neither becommed a prince to sende or set forwarde, neyther yet coulde doe to the Britaynes, anye great ayde or succour: To the which message and excuse, albeit the french kyng gaue but small credence, yet he somewhat mitigate of his anger, dissimuled the matter (according to the french nature) with a flatteryng countenance. So the Ambassadors renewng a league and amitie betweene their kyng and him for .xij. monethes, returned into Englande agayne, and shewed the kyng all such thinges as they had epyther hearde or sene there. The kyng of Englande well perceyued by the report of hys newlye returned Ambassadors, that the french kyng wrought all his feates by subtil craft and cloked collusion, treating and mocioning peace and concorde, when he desired nothing so much as discorde, and warre, and that purpose he auanced and set forwarde with sayle and ower, to the uttermost point of his habilitie. Wherefore kyng Henry beyng assured of all the french kinges actes and doynge, determined now with all speede to set forth out of hande all such thinges as here before he had concluded, concerning the warre of Britayne, as you haue hearde. Wherefore he called his high court of Parliament, and there first consulted with the peres and communalty of his realme, for the aidynge of the Duke of Briteyn. Then for the maintenance of the warres, diuers summes of money were graunted and geuen, beside certayne decrees and actes made for the profite of the common wealth. And as sone as the Parliament was ended, he caused musters to be had in certayne places of his realme, & souldiours meete for the warre to be put in a readinesse. Yet least peradventure he might seeme willingly to breake the amitie, which was betwene y french kyng & him, he sent diuers notable Ambassadors into fraunce, to certifie the french kyng, that of late he had kept a solempne Parliament, in the which it was condiscended and agreed by the Lords tempozal and spiritual, & knights of counties, and magistrates of Cities, and boroughes of his realme, not onely considering the reliefe, comfort, and ayde that he hadde receyued at the

Dukes hande, both for the sauegarde of his life, and for the recouering of his inheritaunce and kyngdome, but also remembering that Britayne of auncient tyme was subiect and bassall to the realme of Englande, which countrey also hath bene friendly, and aiders to the English nacion when it was vexed, both with foreyne powers and domesticall sedicion, to ayde, comfort, and assist the British nacion with all their strength, might, and habilitie against ail their enemies, friendly admonishing him that he should epyther cease from his war in Britaine newly begon, or else not to be grieved if he did agree (as reason would) to the iudgement and determination of the Lordes and Prelates of his realme, assuryng him in the worde of a king that his armie should onely discende in the Duchie of Britayne, not to invade or make war in the french kynges realme or territories, but onely to defende the Duchie of Britaine.

With these commaundementes the English Ambassadors departed, and declared to the french kyng all the minde and wil of their king and soueraigne Lorde. Which message he dissimuled as litle to regard as the biting of a see, as though the Englishmen in the battayle, which he knewe to be at hande, coulde doe no enterpryse (as it happened in deede) epyther necessary to be feared, or worthy to be remembred. The cause of his so sayng was thys he knowyng that his army was puissaunt and strong in Britayne, and that the Britaynes had but a fewe English men with the Lorde Woodville, of whome he passed litle, and seyng that Englande had not yet sent anye armie thither for the Dukes succour, iudged surely that his army would doe some great exployt (as they did in deede) before epyther the Duke should be purueyed or anye aide ministrud. And as he imagined, so it folowed, for y french men so sore oppressed the countrey of Britayne, and byent and destroyed Cities, and besieged the towne of Fongeres, so that the Duke of Britaine was encouraged by the Duke of Orleans, and other rebels of the french king manfully to fight and geue battaile to the french army. And so the .xxv. day of July they set forwarde, and came to a towne which the frenchmen hadde gotten, called saint Aubyne. The frenchmen were not ignorant of their coming, but put themselves in a readinesse. Of which army was Capitaines, the Lord Lewys of Trenoyle, viscount of Thonars a Gascon, Adryan Lord of Mountfalcosse. On the Britons part were chiefeteynes, Lewys, Duke of Orleans, and the Prince of Orange, which because they and other of the frenchmen were all on horsebacke, were mistrusted of the Britones, least they would at their most neede flye.

Wherefore they discended on foote, and the Duke and the Prince put themselves in the battaile of the Almanes: The Marshal of Ricou was appointed to the bauntgard. The middle warde was deliuered to the Lorde Dalebret, and the reregard to the Lorde Chateaw Bryan, and to make the frenchmen beleue that they had a great number of English men (notwithstanding there were but foure hundred) with the Lorde Woodville they appareled a thousand and seven hundred Britons in Cotes with red crosses, after the English fashion, when both the armies were appoaching to the other, the ordinaunce shot so terribly and with suche a violence, that it sore damaged and encombred both the parties. When the shot was finished, both the bauntgardes ioyned together with such a force, that it was maruaile to beholde. The Englishmen shot so fast, that the frenchmen in the fore-ward, were faine to recule to the battayle where their hozsemen were. The forewarde of the french men, seying this first discomfiture began to flie, but the Capitaynes retired their men together againe, & the hozsemen set fiercelly on the Briteynes, and slewe the most part of the footemen. When the forewarde of the Briteynes perceyued that their hozsemen nor the Almaynes came not forwarde, they provided for themselves and fled, some here, and some there, where they thought to haue refuge or succor. So that in conclusion the french men obteyned the victorie, and slue all suche as ware red Crosses, supposyng them all to be Englishe men. In this conflict were slaine almost all the Englishe men, and sixe thousand Briteynes. Amongest whom were found dead the Lorde Wooduille, and the Lorde James Saleas borne in Naples. And of the Briteynes there were slaine the Lorde of Leon, the Lorde Mountfort, the Lorde Pontlabbe and many noble and nctable persons of the British nacion. Of the french nacion were slain. xij. hundred persons. The Prince of Orange, and the Duke of Orliance were taken prisoners, which Duke (although he were next heyre apparaunt to the Crowne of Fraunce) should haue lost his head, if Ladie Jane his wife which was sister to Charles the french king, had not obteyned perdon and remission of his trespassse and offence. Howbeit, he was long after kept prisoner in the great Tower at Bourges in Berry. This infortunate metyng chaunced to the Briteynes on a Monday, beyng the. xxvij. day of July. in the yere of our redemption. 1488. and in the fourth yere of king Henry the seventh.

An army sent by the king of Enn to ayde the Duke of Briteyne.

When these newes were brought into Englande, the king foresceyng what was like to chaunce, thought it necessary to hasten and set forward the matter before concluded, wherfore with al speede he sent Robert Lord Broke, Sir John Cheyney, Sir John Middleton, Sir Raufe Hilton, Sir Richard Corbet, Sir Thomas Leighton, Sir Richard Laton, and Sir Edmond Cornwall, all lusty and couragious Capitaynes with. viij. thousande men well armed, and warlike furnished to ayde and assist the Briteynes against the french men. These ioly men of warre had such prosperous wind that they arrived in Briteyn even as they would wishe or desire. But when the french men knewe of their landyng, whome they knewe by no small experience (and especially so long as they were freshe and lustie) to be of great courage: wherfore at the beginnyng they were all blanke, and for feare kept themselves craftily and pollitikely within their campe. And after that, they sent forth a small companye of light hozsemen, the which to werie and abate the stout stomackes of the Englishe men, made in diuers places of the armie, skirmishes, outcruyes, and alaromes. So for a certaine space they besed this kinde of dalirng with the Englishe men, but euer the losse turned to the french men. But beholde, while this warre was thus set forwarde, Frannces Duke of Briteyn departed out of this life, so that the Englishe men were in a doubtfull Labyrinth, and in a great ambiguitye. For the chiefe rulers of the Briteynes, beyng some of them corrupted with money, and some stirred with desyre of deuision and controuersie, fell into deuision among themselves, so that they seemed not to regarde the defence of their naturall Countrie, but rather minded the destruction and bitter confusion of the same. Which deuision the Englishe men perceyung, and also considering that it was in the midst of Winter, in the which tyme it was not wholesome for men to lie in the frostie and moyst fieldes, they were compelled in maner by necessitie, within five monethes that they went forwarde, to returne backe againe into England.

After this Charles the french king hauing thus the upper hand of the Briteynes, perceyung that Maximilian King of Romaines laboured to haue in mariage, Anne sole heyre to Frannces Duke of Briteyne, for her ponger sister was late deade, which he thought was neyther for his profite, nor aduantage, concluded a peace with the Briteynes. By which treatie he had the Lady deliuered into his possession, and after her deliuerance, he refusing the mariage of the Ladie Margaret, daughter to the forsayde king of Romaines, espoused the Ladie Anne Duchesse of Briteyn, by which meanes the Duchy of Briteyn was annexed to the Crowne of Fraunce, as hereafter shall appere when it tooke effect, which was not two yeres after.

Now to the money layde out, as concerning the charge of thys battaile. It was decreed by the three estates (as you haue heard) befoze that any souldiours were sent into Briteyne, that for the expence of that warre, euery man should be taxed and assessed at the summe of his substance, & should pay the tenth peny of his goodes, for the maintenaunce of the warre in Briteyn. Which money the most part of them that dwelt in the Bishoprike of Durhams and Yorke shire, refused bitterly to pay, eyther thinking themselves overcharged with the greatnesse of the same, and therewith greued, or excited and procured thzough the euill counsaile and seditious perswasion of certaine persons, which priuily conspired agaynst the king, to put him to newe trouble and businesse. Therfore such as were by the kings commaundement made Collectors and gatherers of the summe taxed, after that they could not get the money according to the extractes to them by the Commissioners deliuered, made their complaint priuily to Henry the fourth Erle of Northumberland, chiefe ruler of the North parties. And he immediatly vpon the knowlege thereof, signified to the kings grace by hys letters, that the people greatly grudged and murmured, making open proclamation that they haue bene charged of late yeres with innumerable incommodities and oppressions, without any default or desert, and that nowe there was a houghe some required of them, which neyther they were able to satisfie so great a demaunde, nor yet would once consent to paye any one peny of the sayde summe required. The king commaunded the Erle in any wise by distresse or otherwise according to his discretion, to exact the money of the people, and by compulsion to enforce such to payment as whyned most at it, lest that it might appere that the decrees, artes and statutes, made and confirmed by hym and hys highe Court of Parliament, should by hys rude and rusticall people be contemned and despised. The rude, rashe, and braduised people, hearing thys answer of the king, by and by, violently set vpon the Erle, by the procurement of a simple felowe called John of Chambrze, whome the Erle intreated with sayre wordes to come to reason, but they laiyng to hys charge that he was the chiefe authoz and principall causer of thys tare and tribute payng, both hym and dyuers of hys household seruants, furiously and shamefully murdered & killed. Diuers affirme that the Northren men bare against this Erle continuall grudge, sith the death of king Richard, whom they entirely loued and highly fauored, which secret Serpent caused their furie to wade farther then reason could retract or restrayne. Although thys offence were great and heynous, yet there succeeded after a more mischiefe and a greater inconuenience. For incontinent the Northren men to cloke this murder and manslaughter, by a byolence put on their armure and assembled in flockes, and elected to them a Capitane called Sir John Egremonde knight, a person no lesse seditious then factious, and desirous of trouble, and ordred themselves lyke men of warre, and passyng by the Countreyes, they published and declared that they would byd battayle to the king, onely for the defence of their common libertie and freedome, which he would pluck, and by hys extreme power take from them. But when their cause should be decided with blowes and handstrokes, their furie was asswaged and cooled, their hartes were in their heeles, and their stomackes as colde as any stone, and euerye one wyshed that thys tumult were quenched, which was nowe alreadie not smoking but enflamed: And in conclusion euery man ranne away, some this way, and some that way, as men amased when they lack counsaile. When euery man was returned, the matter was ended as they imagined, but while they diligently laboured to saue their luyes by flight, they sought their awne destruction. For the most part of them were punished by death or by imprisonment for the same offence. For the king heeryng of thys tumultuous business, sent forth Thomas Erle of Surrey, whome not long afore he had deliuered out of the Tower, and receaued to his grace and speciall fauour (as he was both for hys wyt and fidelitie well woorthy) with a competent crewe of men into the North partes, which skirmished with a certayne companye and discomfited them, and tooke a luye John a Chambrze the first beginner of this rebellion. The king himselfe roade after the Erle into Porke shire, of whose coming the slaues and sturdie rebels were so abashed and afraid, that they fled more and lesse, which afterward were apprehended and greuously punished, according to their demerites and deseruing. Yet the king of his magnificent minde, pardoned the innocent and rurall people, and plagued and executed the inuenters of the mischiefe, and the furtherers of the same. For John a Chamber was hanged at Porke vpon a gibbet, set vpon a square payre of Gallowes, lyke an Archetraytour, and his complices and lewde disciples were hanged on the lower Gallowes round about their maister, to the terrible example of all other. But Sir John Egremond, whome these seditious persons preferred to be their Capitayne, fled into Flaunders to the Ladie Margaret Duches of Burgoyne, which euer enuied the prosperitie of king Henry.

Sir John Egremond fled into Flaunders.

When thys foolish enterprise was thus quenched, the king gaue commission and charge to Sir Rycharde Tunstall knight, a man of great wit, pollicie and discretion, to gather and receaue the subsidie to him due of the people, and he himselfe returned shortly to London, leauyng the Erle of Surrey to rule the North partes, perceauing well the Englishe men, not so much to grudge at the payment of the tare or trybute, as they did grone at the excessive and importable summe vpon them assessed, remembryng the olde proverbe, loue me little and loue me long.

Maximilian king of Romanes.

Before this time, Maximilian king of Romanes, which as you haue heard in the time of king Edward the fourth, had contrarie to the minde and will of the French king espoused Ladye Marie, daughter and heyre to Le-

Wherfore the king Maximilian assembled a company of Almaines & Duerlanders (for he did not greatly put his confidence in the Brabanders nor Hollanders) & made sharpe war on the Flemings, in the which he little preuailed. For the Flemings sent to the French king for aid & succor, which being glad of y request, sent Philip de Creuecure Lord Desquerdes, commonly called the Lorde Cordes into the confines of Flaunders with a great armie of men, to ayde and succor the Flemings trusting by that meanes, to obtain both the possession of the yong infant Duke Philip & the whole coutry of Flaunders. Wherfore Maximilian entending to aliure the Flemings from the French men, began first to practise with them of Bruges, of which towne the grauest men, some condiscended and agreed to reason, requiring him to come to their towne, and sent to him with their request, the Scult called Peter Longoll with dyuers other, to aduertise him that at his coming thether, he should find them conformable to his will & request. Upon trust whereof he entred into y towne finally accompanied, thinking that the lords & Senate would ioyously haue receaued and welcommed him. But the matter turned cleane contrarie, for the light witted persons, to whome peace was treason, taking this occasion to them offered, cryed to harnesse. When they which had brought the king into the towne, saw the tumult of the people, & that no man came to their relief, they left their lord post alone, & fled into corners. The warden of the Smithes was the chiefe of the route, which bade the king to take patience a while, & he should haue a gentle imprisonment, & so conueied him to the house of John Grosse, iudge of the audience. Then the Almaines were all banished the towne, & the lords of Gaunt were sent for, which taried not long. When they had the pray y they expected, first dyuers Citizens which they thought favorable to Maximilian they behedded. Mathew Spert, one of his chiefe counsaillers & trusty friends, was sent to Gaunt, & there put to death. Then John Capenoll a busie Merchant, would in all hast haue ridden to induct the French king as their soueraigne lord, to whom the most part would in no wise agree nor consent, nor yet intended to disinherit y yong duke Philip of his grandfathers inheritance.

When execution was done of the wise and sad counsaillers, the newe made rulers caused their Prince king Maximilian to be brought to y towne house, and there they layde to his charge, that he had not obserued the treatie, which they of Gaunt and Bruges had concluded wyth the French king. Secondly, they alleged that he put high Almaynes in offices and great authoritie, which without their assent would haue chaunged and inhaunced their coyne and money to their great prejudice and detriment. Many other fond and foolish articles they layde to him, which the eares of euery honest creature knowyng the due tie of the subiect to his prince, would abhorre and detest, to the which he so wisely and boldly answered, that in part he asswaged their malice, and mitigated their rage. In somuch that he was more gentler intreated then he was before. For if his answer had bene to them displeasunt, pleasaunt, or if he had manaced them but one worde, I thinke in their furie they would haue dispatched him out of his lyfe and lande. The Gauntoys woulde haue deliuered him to the French king, but the Burgians woulde not assent. They of Gaunt desired to haue him in their custodie in Gaunt, but the Citizens of Bruges vtterly denied his deliuerie. Wherefore the Gauntoys in great displeasure departed. After whose departure the Burgians were content to set him at libertie, so that he and diuers of his nobilitie should sweare on the holy Sacrament, not onely to remit, pardon and forgive all offences perpetrated and committed by them of Flaunders, but also should sweare and promise, neyther to remember nor reuenge the same. Thys othe he sware in the great Church of Bruges, and the Lorde of Raueston called Phillip Mounseur, and the Lorde of Beuers and diuers other sware the same, adding therevnto, that if he did attempt any thing contrary to his othe and promise, then they sware to take part with the good towne of Flaunders agaynst him and his adherents. And vpon this promise he was deliuered, and frankly set at libertie.

Frederick
the Emperour

But Fredericke the Emperour coulde not forget the reproch and despite that was shewed to him in his sonne, & the great iniury and wrong that was done to his sonne, partlye to his dishonour, scourged Flaunders woth sharpe warre and mortall afflictions (Maximilian liuing in quiet, and nothing attemptyng) but Phillip Mounseur, Lord of Raueston, the which toke his othe with kyng Maximilian, to shew that the warre was renouate without his knowlege and assent, forsooke Maximilian his Lorde, and toke the townes of Yper & Scluse with both the Castles of the same Haven, which he manned, and besyged, & kept two yeres agaynst the power of Maximilian till he rendered them to Sir Edward Bowynge, sent thether by the Kyng of Englande, as you shall hereafter well perceyue. Beside this, the foresayd Phillip not only exacted and stirred the Gauntoys, Burgians & other townes of Flaunders, to rebel agaynst their soueraigne Lorde, but also sente to the Lorde Cordes to ayde him to conquere such townes of Flaunders, as were not of their opinion and confederacy. This Lorde Cordes, which vntreulye revolted from Duke Charles of Burgoyne, beyng his bringer by and chiefe preferer to Lewys the French kyng (as you haue heard before) was glad of this, and so sent to the ayde of the Flemings eight thousande Frenchmen, willyng them to take and conquer such townes, as were in the way betwene Fraunce and Burges, or Calice and Burges. The Captaynes folowynge his deuyse, besieged a litle walled towne, called Dipenew, to whome came foure thousande Flemynge with bittayle and artillery, sent from Phillippe Mounseur. They layde siege on the Northside of the towne in a Marythe grounde, then beyng drie, and so deeply ditched their campe, and so highlye trenched it, on which trench they layde their Ordinaunce, that it was in manner impossible to enter into their campe, or to doe them anye displeasure or damage. The kyng of Englande was dayly aduertised of these doynges, which nothing lesse desired then to haue the Englishe pale and territozy environed with French fortresses. For he perceaued well that if the Frenchmen gat Dipenew, they woulde afterwarde assaile Newpport and Graue-lyng, and consequentye, what with force, and what with corrupcion of rewardes, their purpose was to haue the possession of Duke Phillippe and all Flaunders.

Flaunders, which should not be to the profit of him nor his subiectes. Wherefore sodainely with great expedition he sent ouer to the Lorde Dabweney to Calice, the Lorde Mozley with a Crew of valiaunt archers and souldiours to the number of a thousand men, both priuy instructions, what they should do.

When they were landed, they published and saide that they came to defende the Englishe pale, if the Frenchmen or Fleminges woulde attempt any maistries there. But their enterpryse was all otherwise. For on a Tuesday at the shutting of the gates at night, the Lorde Dabweney Chiefetayne of the army, the Lorde Mozley, Sir James Tirrell, Capitayne of Gysnes, Sir Henry Willoughby, Sir Gilbert Talbot, Sir Humfrey Talbot, Marshall of Calice, and diuers other Knightes, and Esquiers, and other of the garrison of Hammes, Gysnes and Calice, to the number of two thousande men, or there about, issued priuily out of Calice, and passed the water of Graue-lyng in the morning betymes, and left there for a stalle and to kepe the passage, Sir Humfrey Talbot with sixe score Archers, and came to Newpport, where they found the soueraigne of Flaunders, with sixe hundred Almaynes, and there they commoned, and paused that night.

On the next day as they came secretly toward Depinew (see the chaunce) at a place of execution, neere the high way, was a Gauntoys (which was come out of the army for a spie, and apprehended by them of Dipenew) led to hangyng which amongst the Englishe men knewe Sir James Tirrell, and called to hym for comfort and succour, promising him that if he would saue hys lyfe, he would guyde them where they should enter on the Gauntoys, to their honour and aduantage, and he would be the first assaillant of all the companye. When his promise was regarded, after request made to the Borough maisters and Capitaynes of the towne, he was pardoned but not deliuered. The next day in the morning, after they had ordered their armes, their guyde conueyed them out at the Southgate of the towne by a high banke set with Wyllowes, so that the Gauntoyes could not well espie them, and so secretly came to the ende of the Campe of their enemies, and there pawled. The Lorde Dabweney commaunded all men to sende their hores and Wagons back, but the Lorde Mozley sayde he would ryde tyll he came to handstrokes (but he was deceyued) so they passed on tyll they came to a lowe banck and no deepe dicke, where their Ordinaunce laye, and there the Archers shot altogether euery man an arrowe, and so fell prostrate to the grounde, their enemies discharged their Ordinaunce all at once, and ouer-shot them, the Archers rose and shot agayne, and bet them from their Ordinaunce. The Almaynes lept ouer the dicke with their moztie pilles, the Englishe men in the forefront waded the dicke, and were hoisen by by the Almaynes. and set on their enemies, and slue and tooke many prisoners. The other Englishe men hastid by the causeway to enter in at the North gate of the Campe, where the Lorde Mozley beyng on horseback in a riche Coate was slayne with a Sonne. When hys death was knowne, euery man kylled hys prisoner, and slue all such as did withstand them to the number of eight thousand men, insomuch that of two thousand that came out of Bruges (as the Flemishe Chronicle reporteth), there came not home an hundred. There were slayne in the sayde place two chiefe Capitaynes, George Deccanet, and Anthony Newpport. On the Englishe part was slayne the Lorde Mozley, ley, and not an hundred mo. The Engliche men tooke their ordinaunce and sent it to Newport with all their spoyle and great hozses. And by the waye hearing certayne Frenchmen to be at Ostend, they made thetherward, but the French men fled, and so they burned part of the towne, and came againe to Newport, where the Lorde Dabweny left all the Engliche men that were hurt or wounded, and carped with him the dead Corpes of the Lord Dhorcy, and buried it honorably at Calice. This field was profitable to the Engliche men, for they that went forth in cloth, came home in sylke, and they that went out on foote, came home on great hozses, such is the chaunce of victozy.

The Lorde Cordes beyng at Yper with, xx. thousande men was sore discontent with this ouerthrow: wherfore he thinking to be reuenged, came and besieged the towne of Newport strongly (the which Capitaine Monsieur de Harwede, before Capitaine of Dipenew, and all the Gentlemen of Westflanders, and the three principal Cities of Flaunders, and bittayled the French hoste so well, that all thinges was to good cheepe) they without shot at the walles, and brake them in many places, and they within sore grieved them without with their artillery. But the Engliche men that were hurt at Dirmewe fielde before, and might eyther stand or drabe Bowe, neuer came from the walles. One day the Frenchmen gaue a great assault to a Tower, and perforce entered it, and set by the Banner of the Lorde Cordes: But as God would, during the time of the assault there arryued from Calice a Bark with, lxxx. fresh English Archers, which came straight to the Tower. The women of the towne, perceiuyng the English men come, cryed with lamentable and lowde voyces, help Englishmen, help Englishmen, hooote English men, shote Englishmen, so that, what with the helpe of such as before were wounded and hurt men, and of the couragious hartes of the newe come Archers, and the stout stomackes and diligencie of the women, which as fast as the Engliche men strake downe the enemies, the women were redie to cut their throttes, they waunc againe the Tower, and slue the French men, and rent the Banner of the Lord Cordes, and set by the Penon of saint George. Then the Frenchmen, supposyng a great arde of Englishmen, to haue beene come to the towne by sea, left the assault. And the night folowyng the courteous Lorde Cordes (which so sore longed for Calice, that he would commonly say, that he would gladly lye seven yeres in hell, so that Calice were in the possession of the French men) brake by his siege and shamefully returned to Hesoyng. And the English men glad of this victozy, returned againe to Calice.

This yere also, the realme of Scotland suffered an infectious and mortall plague, because the name of James the thirde, king of Scottes was so odious, so hated and disdeyned of the whole Nobilitie of the realme of Scotland, chiefly because they perceyued that he set more by vile borne billanes and light persons, then by the Princes and Nobles of his realme, as I haue declared to you in the historie of king Edwarde the fourth, which mischiefe, and vngreate discommoditie, after they had tollerated and patiently suffred no small tyme to their great grudge and displeasure. They now thought it most expedient for their purpose and welfare, even by force of armes to recouer their forme libertie, and auncient freedome. Therefore makyng priuily a conspiracie together against their Prince and souereigne Lorde, compassed his death and destruction. Yet that it might not be thought that they did en-

tend the destruction of their native Countrey, they made the kinges some named after his father James, Prince of Rothsay (a childe borne to goodnesse and vertue) their Capitaine, in maner agaynst his will, openly protestyng, that they purposed the confusion and depoyng of an eulle king, and wretched Prince, and not the subuersion and destruction of their Countrey: by which craftie unagined inuention, they might eyther cloke or put away from them all suspicion, of their purposed vntruth and shamefull disloyaltie. Whereof the king beyng credibly informed, was bered and sore tormented in his minde for this cause in especiall, that he should haue ciuile dissention with his awne subiectes and native Countreymen, yea, and agaynst his awne sonne beyng made Capitaine of that vntrue and peruerse company, whome next to himselfe he loued, fauored, and honored, imaginyng with himselfe that this conuocion sounded to none other effect, but that the head should fight and striue with the other members and partes of the naturall bodie: and yet on the other syde, not to resist shortly their newe begon enterpryse, might easily encourage and enflame the malicious heartes of his domesticall enemyes, with more boldnesse to attempt farther mischiefe and inconuenience. Therefore to the intent to make a plaister for both these sores to be healed: first to appease and asswage the fury and rumoz of the people, being this in a rage, he prepared an armie of men. After that he sent Ambassadors to his sonne and the Nobilitie assembled with him, for a loue, peace, concord, and vnitie to be concluded amongst them. Also he sent letters to the king of Englande and the French king, requiryng them that they would vouchsafe with their good and Godly counsaile to helpe and assay to mittigate and asswage this furious enozmitie of his rude and savage people, which was practised and begun through the perswasion and procurement of certein pernicious and seditious persons. And besides this, he wrote to the Bishop of Rome Innocent for the same matter, in the which he earnestly desired and prayed him that he would of his goodnesse sende some one Legate to these rebelles of his Nobilitie, to charge and commaund them, that they setting asyde all warre and hostilitie, to embrace quietnesse, rest, and vnitie.

This miserable decrepite and aged king, thinkyng that both delayng and continuance of time, and also the entreatyng and hartie prayers of his friendes and allyes would quenche their inordinate wildenesse and furious rage, and perswade them to sobrietie and good conformitie, had rather with these, and other semblable medicines remedie this yong springyng sore, then he would haue it experimented, & tryed with ciuill battaile, which he thought to be a thing both vngodly and vnnaturall. For all this, no medicine, no counsaile, no wholesome precepts could appease or pacifie the angrie mindes and ragyng wittes of the Scottische Nobilitie, so much were they addicted and bent to this folly and vnrasonable madnesse. Insomuch, as to the messengers sent from him to them beyng their souereigne Lorde they made thys vnreasonable and vn honest aunswere, that is: if he woulde resigne the title of his Crowne and Realme, and depose himselfe of his royall dignitie, then they woulde common with him of a peace, or else their eares were stopped from heeryng of any entreatie or perswasion. The same aunswere brought the Ambassadour of England and Fraunce to theyr Princes, which sore lamented the peruerse fortune and mischaunce of their friend the Scottische king.

king, as though they had bene partakers of his affliction: But Adrian the Bishop of Romes Legate, of whom we will speake moze hereafter came to late, and as who should say, a day after the faire.

James the fourth king of Scottes consented to the murder of his awne father.

When nothing could moue or pierce the stony hartes or frostie mynds of the nobilitie of Scotland: In conclusion they met together in a pitched field, where after great slaughter of many men, the pooze siely king fledde into a Myl. for succour, whether he was folowed and p[ro]secuted, and there shamefully murdered, and vnreuerently, (not like a Prince, or a crowned king) left stark naked like a stinkyng carion. Then the Princes of Scotland being faciat and filled with the blood and slaughter of their souereigne Lorde and king (thinkyng that they had well reuenged the olde displeasures to them done and committed by king James the thirde) set vp in the trone and estate royall, the Prince his sonne, & named him James the fourth of that name.

Before this time, as you haue heard, Innocent Bishop of Rome had sent in Legacie Adrian of Castella, a man of Heturia, bozne in the towne of Cornete, called in the old time Newcastle, which should haue gone to Scotland, to haue pacified by his aucthoritie and commaundement this troublesome businesse, moued and stirred betwene the king and his subiectes. Yet this man, although he made many great iourneyes, when he came to England, was informed of the king, (to whom he had certaine commaundementis and messages to say from the Romische Bishop) that he came to late to accomplishe the commission of his Legacie, ascertaynyng him that the Scottissh king was dead, gently aduysyng him, that he should not moue one foote farther but tary still in England, where he was not past two dayes, but that he was plainly certified by the Bishops of Scotland of the kinges death. This Adrian taried certaine monethes after this in England, and was made much off, and highly commended and lauded to the king by John Morton Bishop of Cauntobury, which for the good learnyng, bertue, and humanitie, that he sawe and perceyued to be in him, shewed to him all poyntes of humanitie and friendship, that a friend might do to a friend. And vpon his commendation, the king thinking this man worthe to be loked vpon, and mete to do the king pleasure, much phantasied and more fauoured this Legate Adrian, insomuch that he was Oratour and solicited his cause, both to Innocent, and also to Alexander the sixt, Bishops of Rome. And after this, for his diligent seruice, he so loued and fauored him, that he made him Bishop of Herford, and shortly after that resigned and geuen ouer, he promoted him to the Bishoprike of Welles and Bathe. And not long after this Adrian was returned with these honoures to Rome, where he was promoted successiuelly by al the degrees of spirituall dignities, into the College and societie of Cardinales. For Innocent first made him his Collectour in England, and also one of the seven Prorogonotaries. After this Alexander the sixt had him as one of his priuie counsaile, and promoted him to the degree of a Cardinall: But who is that I pray you that will maruaile at this, which aswell may be geuen to fooles and dzerdes, as to wise and learned men? There is another praise of this Adrian, and the same in maner eternall: The man was of profound learnyng, and knowlege, not bulgare, but straunge, newe, and difficile, and in especiall he was a man of a ripe iudgement, in electyng and choosyng fine termes, and apt and eloquent wordes, which first of our tyme, after that golden worlde of of Tullie, moued men with his writyng to immitate and folowe the most approbate, and allowed aucthours that were of eloquencie, and taught the trade and phzase to speake fine, pure, freshe, and cleane latyne, so that by his example and document, eloquencie flourisheth at this houre in all places of Christendome, wherefore after my iudgement, sayth Hall, he is not worthe to be put in obliuion: but nowe to my purpose.

The Britishe affayres in the meane season, because that all discozrd was not appeased, began againe now to flow out and to trouble, and set all things in a newe broyle and businesse. For Marimilian king of Romaines being without a wife, before this tyme, made suite to Fraunces Duke of Briteyn, to haue in marriage the Ladie Anne his daughter, to the which request the Duke gently condescended. And one, which by prorie wooed for him: to the entent that the Ladie should performe that she promised on her fayth and honour, he bled a newe inuention and trick, after this maner. When the Ladie did take her Chamber, the night after the affiaunce, she was layde naked in the Bride bed, in the presence of diuers noble Matrones and Princes, called thether as witneses. The Procurator or Deputie for the husband which represented his person, was layde in the place of her husband, and put one of his legges into the bed by to the hard knee, in the sight and companie of many noble personages, as who sayde that the birgin had bene carnally knowne and so the matrimonie perfite and consummate, and they two as man and wife. But this soude newe found ceremony was little regarded, and lesse esteemed, of him that onely studied and watched howe to surrept and steale this Turkie out of her mew and lodgyng. For Charles the French king (as no man can blame him) was desyrous and greedy to be coupled in marriage, with so great an inheritor, and reputing the maryage made with Marimilian, to be of no validite and effect, the more busily and incessantly he made sharpe warre, and scourged the Briteynes, to the entent he might both haue the Ladie and her Dominions also at his will and pleasure. But he imagined that the king of England would cast a trumpe in his way, and be an impediment to his purpose, by sendyng into Briteyn a newe armie of Englishe men, for he had intelligence by his priuie fauours.

King Henry, and Ferdinando king of Spaine, were fully decreed to ayde, assist, and defend the Duchesse and Duchie of Briteyn, in all heropardies and aduentures, to the entent that they agaynst theyr wil and affliction should not be by force compelled to submit themselves to the subiection & greiuous yoke of the French king, for the which cause, these two Princes were ioyned in a league and confederacie, to resist, and to remoue this manifest wrong and apparant iniurye. Wherefore he sent in all post hast the Lorde Fraunces of Lutenborough, Charles Marignane, and Robert Gaguine, minister of the bone homes of the Trinity, to king Henry for a peace to be confirmed and had, which when they came before the kinges presence, were accepted and enterpnyed after the best maner. And when they were demaunded of the effect of their message, their request was that king Charles, as chiefe and supreme Lorde ouer the seignorie and Duchie of Briteyn, might without any spot of ingratitude to be imagined or conceyued by king Henry, lawfully order and depose at his will and pleasure, the maryage of Ladie Anne of Briteyn, as his ward and Orphan, without any let and disturbance of the king of Englande, lande, or any of his alies and confederates. King Henry thereto would not condiscend, but still harped on this string, that the virgin, which was lawfully knit in matrimonie with Maximilian king of Romaynes, shoude not be compelled agaynst her will and promise (beyng contrary to all lawe, right and equitie) to take any other person then him to her spouse and husband, for that it was cleerely repugnant to all veritie and lawe, both of God and man. So when they had luyngred the tyme, and consumed many dayes in vaine argumentes and superfluous reasons, without any of theyr requestes obeyned: after long debating and consultation, they were resolued on this point, least it shoude be thought that all their Legation had bene in vaine, & brought to no efficacie or purpose, a forme of a league and amitie shoude be drawne with conditions, clauses and couenauntes. And for the farther furtherance of that purpose, it was thought necessary and expedient that the king of Englande shoude send Ambassadors to the frenche king, which in his name, and by his auctoritie might briefly conclude and finishe the league and treatie that was in communication framed and begon. Whereupon king Henry dismissed the french Ambassadors laden with great and large rewardes into their Countrey, and dispatched and sent straight after them by his commission and auctoritie, Thomas Erle of Ormond, and Thomas Godson Prior of Christes Church in Cauntorbury his Ambassadors to Charles the frenche king, instructyng them fully of all thinges that he would have either moued or determined.

In thys meane space, Alexander Byshop of Rome the sixt of that name which succeeded after Innocent, a man full of diligence, and of wit pregnant, sent Lyonell Byshop of Concorde Legate, to the french king for certayne matters, among other thinges, gaue him in charge to conclude a peace and vntie betwene king Charles and king Henry. When he had declared his message to the french king fully, and had easily obtayned all thinges that he required, then he began to moue vnto the french king and his nobles, with a long and prolix exhortation to make and conclude a perpetuall peace, betwene him and the king of Englande. And when he perceaued the french men to make no great deniall of his request, he determined to attempt and moue king Henry to consent and agree to the same desire and petition: and tooke his journey towardes England, and at Calice he encountered the Ambassadors both of Englande and of Fraunce, which receyued him into the towne of Calice, with many ceremonies and great reuerence. Where after they had communed the matter a certayne space, as concerning their affayres and busynesse, they departed toward the french king, and the Byshop was transported into England. The king honorably and gently entertayned this Legate Lyonell, and gaue good eare to his pleasaunt and eloquent oration, wherein he perswaded hym with many flattering and glosing wordes, to enter into a league and amitie with king Charles of Fraunce, and the french nation. To the which request, the king made aunswere that he would be glade and ioyous, if it might be compassed and brought about (after long trouble and pernicious dissention) to liue in peace and mutuall amitie with all christen men. Byshop Lyonell, perceyuing the kings minde and intent went back agayne to Fraunce with all speede and diligence (and as it was meete and decent for the Byshop of Concorde) he determined to extirpate and drine out out of the kings memoire all olde reconynges and iniuries done to him herebefore, and plant if it myght be, in hys hart and minde, the verie goodly and gracious prayne of concord and vntie.

The Englishe Ambassadors then beyng with the french king purposed and set forth articles and conclusions of peace. The french men prudently made aunswere, so that on both parties the matter was politiquely and artificially proponed and aunswere. The Englishe Ambassadors, to the entent that they might assent and obtayne a fewe thinges, which they much desired, required and demaunded many great and diuers thinges. The french men on the other side, minding to assent to no one demaund, at the ende, did denie and refuse all the Englishe mens desires, and conditions, and were soze angrie and mooued with their great requestes and highe demaundes. And in the meane season, trustyng more to their Coffers then to their chivalrie, as the maner of their Countrey is, for to obtayne their purpose, they spared not to disourse and launche out treasure, giftes, and rewardes innumerable, which is the very cause that they conquere more with crownes of Golde, then with speare and shield, or dynt of sward in battayle. So that shortly after the french king sent to the noble men of Briteyne great and many rewardes, solicytyng and praiyng them all to become hys subiects and vassals. And in especiall he allured and entised the Ladie Anne by such honorable Matrones and Ladyes, as had the gouernance and education of her, to confirme her selfe true to him in due obedience and loue, and not disdeyne to be coupled in such a noble marriage, with so high and mightie a Prince, as king Charles was. And least peradventure the Damosell fearing the rigour of the Ecclesiasticall lawes would not consent to him for offending her conscience and breaking of her promise: To aduoyde that scruple, he caused dyuers to perswade and put in her head and tytle in her eare, that the marriage made with Maximilian was of no strength and lesse efficacie, considering that it was concluded and made without the consent and wyll of hym, which is the chiefe Lorde and ought to haue the gouernance ouer her as his warde, and the whole Duchie of Briteyn, assuring her that she was deluded, and that the marriage with Maximilian was neuer consummate nor persite. And thys was the very cause that no sure concord or peace could be concluded and agreed betwene these two Princes. And where as the french king had long kept with hym the Ladie Margarete, daughter to Maximilian & her solemnly espoused at Amboys, he sayde that that marriage might be lawfully dissolved agayne, because the Lady was of that age, that she coude neyther be geuen nor yet taken in marriage, for the which cause he might lawfully forsake and honestly put her from hym.

By this craft and perswasion they led and entised the fayre mayden, suspecting none euill, and brought her to this poynnt, that in conclusion, she beyng proclaymed by diuers, Princes of Briteyne, subornate and corrupted with meede contrary to their duetie and allegaunce, was content to condiscende and agree to that the french men demaunded, and not onely to submit her selfe to the french king, but also to take him to her make and husbande, by the reason wherof warre might cease, which with violencie and impression of the same, had troubled and afflicted all her whole Countrey. To this marriage agreed all the Nobilitie of Briteyne, which helde of the frenche part, thinking it verily for the auancement of the common weale and their ease, because to trust to the power of Maximilian, which was of no purlaunce, they thought it bayne and of no efficacie. And when the French king had compassed and ordered his matters of thys fashion, priuily with the Ladye Anne, he hastened the mariage with all the expedition and diligence that was possible: So that the Engliche Ambassadors returned agayne to their Countrie, and nothing done or agreed vpon their matter.

King Henry, still patiently forbearyng and sufferiug till such tyme that he perceaued moze plainly what way the worlde went: and vnderstandyng before the returne of his Ambassadors, that the Frenchmen meened none other but playne guyle, and deceipt, determined no moze with peaceable messages, but with open warre to finish and determine all controuersies and displeasures betwene him and the French kyng. Wherefore he summoned his courte of Parliament, and there declared first the cause why hee was iustly prouoked to make warre against the French kyng: And after desired them of their benevolent aide of men and money for the maintenaunce of the same. The cause of this battail, euery man did allow, and to the setting forth of the same promised all that they could make. The king comending them for their true and louyng hartes, to the entent hee might not aggravate the common people, with payng of great taxes, and summes of money, whome hys minde was euer to kepe in fauour, woulde first exact mency by a litle and a litle of the benevolent minde of the richer sorte, and this kinde of exaction was first practised by king Edward the fourth, as it apcreth before in his story. Therefore he consulted with his friendes, to inuent how to gather together a great summe of money, and published abrode that by their open giftes, hee woulde measure and search their benevolent hartes and louyng minds toward him, so that he that gaue most should be iudged to be his most louyng friende, and he that gaue litle, to be esteemed according to his gift. So by this meanes the king gathered innumerable summes of money, with some grudge of the people for the extremitie shewed by the commissioners in diuerse places.

You haue heard before howe Philip Mounsure, Lorde of Rauestone by the ayde of Bruges and Gaunt had taken the towne, and two Castels of Sluce and was become aduersarie to Maximilian, by reason of the three chiefe Cities of Flaunders: Nowe ye shall vnderstande that he did not onely so fortifie as well with munitions as men, both the towne and the two Castels, but also gat into the Hauen diuerse shippes and Barkes, and by this meanes he spoyled and toke prisoners all nations, passing eyther by sea or by lande to the mart at Andwarp, or into Brabant, Zealande, or Frisslande, and was euer plentifully biteyled out of Fraunce and Bycardy to the great damage of the Engliche men, which were spoyled dayly, and taken prisoners: Which thing Maximilian king of Romaynes could not well remedy, nor the kyng of Englande without great cost and losse of men. For to it behoued an armie, both by sea and lande, for when hee was set for by lande, he fled to the sea: And when he was chased on the sea, he sought refuge in his two stronge Towers, and euer he had succours from Bruges and Gaunt. Nowe was a litle towne two myle from Bruges, and a hed spring to Sluce. The king of Romaynes did oftentimes attempt the apprehending of this towne, to the entent that the Brugians should haue no recourse to the Hauen of Sluce, nor the Sluyfians should haue no succour out of the towne of Bruges. But there were slayne a great number of gentlemen of Germany, for they with in made no signe of defence, till all their enemies were in their daunger, and so slewe and destroyed them. There was a great Duke in Almayne, called Duke Albert of the upper Saxony, a great friend to the king of Romaynes, which made himselfe Renter, and neuer intermitted with the affayres of Flaunders, a man of nolesse pollecy, then valiaunt hardinesse. This Duke required of the Lordes of Bruges, that he might enter peaceably into their towne, according to his estate, with a certayne number of men of armes to communicate with them diuers matters of great weyght, and of no smal importance, and sent before his cariages and herbingers to make prouision. The estates of Bruges little doubted to admit so small a nuber into so populous a company, ye though the number were double, and especially, because they heard saye that he woulde lodge in the towne all night, wherefore no man thought of that craftie pollicie that he had inuented. His elected and warlike company entred into the Citie in good order, and he folowed, they that went before enquired after Innes and lodgings, as though they woulde repose themselves there all night, and so went forth still in order asking for lodgyng, till they came to the gate that goeth directly towarde the foresayde towne of Dam, distant from Bruges a Flemish mile, which is called the Bulwarke of Bruges. The Capitaynes and inhabitantes of the towne of Dam suspectyng no harime to come out of Bruges, thinkyng that their friendes knowyng some sodayne chaunce comyng, to haue sent to them aide and succours, and so nothing mistrusting, did let them enter, and toke the towne of Damme, and so that towne, which coulde not be wonne by force of armes, and displeasure of the towne of Bruges, for now had they no recourse to the Sea, which stop so continuyng, no doubt, but the towne of Bruges muste nedes fall in ruyne and vtter decay.

When Duke Albert of Saxony had gotten Dam, he certified the kyng of Englande that he woulde besiege Sluyse by lande, if it pleased his maiestie to minister any ayde by the sea. King Henry which was wise, and forersayng in all his affaires, remembryng that Sluyse was the denne of theues to them that trauesse the seas towarde the East parties, incontinent dispatched sir Edward Bowninges, (a valiaunt knight and hardie Captayne) wyth thoeue shippes well furnished with bolde souldiours, and strong artillerye. Which sir Edward sayled into the hauen, and kept Philip Mounsure from stertyng by the sea. The Duke of Saxon besieged the one Castell, lying in a Church ouer against it, and the English men assaulted the lesse Castell dayly, and issued out of the shippes at the ebbe, and although they stode in the water to the knees, yet they neuer gaue their enemies one day to rest or play by the space of .xx. dayes, and euery day slue some of their aduersaries, and on the Engliche part were slaine, Werre brother to the Erie of Orford and fiftie mo.

The Lord Philip of Rauestone, had made a brydge of Boates betwene both the Castelles, by the which one might succor the other. Which Brydge the English men in a night set on fyre. Then he perceiuyng that he must nedes lese his Castelles by force, and that the Flemynge could not ayde him, yelded the Castels to Sir Edward Bononyngs, and the towne to the Duke of Saxony, upon certaine conditions. When the Duke and the English Capitaine met in the towne, there was betwene them great salutations and Sir Edward kept the Castelles a while, of whome the Almanes demaunded stipend and salary, because that the Duke had nothing to pay. Then these two Capitaines so handled them of Bruges, that they were content not onely to submit themselves to the Lorde Maximilian, but also to pay and dispatche the Almanes. And so Sir Edward Downinges tarped there a long space, and returned to the king before Soleyne. And so they which by reasonable order, would not be gouerned: by vnreasonable conditions were brought to conformitie and order.

The recouerie of the Citie of Granada from the Turkes.

The .vi. day of Aprill this present yere, the king commaunded all the nobilitie of his realme, to assemble at the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paule in London, where after Te Deum solemnly song, the Archbishop of Cantorbury standyng on the steppes before the Queere doze, declared to the people, howe the famous Citie of Granada, which many yeres had bene possessed of the Moores or Morytane nation, beyng infidels & vncristened people, and nowe of late besieged by a great tyme by Donfernando and Elizabeth his wife, King and Queene of Spaine, Aragon and Castell. And the sayde infidels, by reason of this siege brought to great penurie and miserie, for lacke of vittaille and necessary band, perceiuyng that all succours were clerely stopped and kept away from them, and so brought into vtter dispaire of aide or comfort: after long consultation had amongst them, rendered themselves and their Citie, to the sayd king.

About this season, Maximilian king of Romaynes hauing the vpperhande of the Fleminges, by the ayde of the king of Englande (as you haue heard before) entended to reuenge himselfe of the french king, for that he had forsaken and put away his daughter Lady Margaret, and sent her home to him, entending as he thought to take to his wife the Lady Anne of Briteyn. But because he was not of sufficient habilitie of himselfe to susteyne and further the warre, he determined to desire king Henry to take part with hym. Whereupon he sent James Cantibald Ambassadoz, a man of great grauitie, to exhort and require the king of England, to enter his companie and societie in armes, faythfully promising on his honour that he would in semblable matters of his, take his part with ten thousand men at the least, for the space of two yeres whensoever he should require him. And because it is his chaunce to trie the fortune of battayle and to moue the warre, he promised to certifie King Henry sixe Moneths before that he would invade or occupie the territorie of his enemies. And by thys message Maximilian greatly enflamed and set a fyre King Henryes hart to beare with hym. And as he was mynded before thys time as you haue heard to ayde and assist the Britones in the extremitie of their perill, he nowe reconed the time to be come, that he must collect an armie to helpe them nowe at a pinche in their most perill and daunger, to the intent to restore agayne the Britithe nation to their aunient libertie, and to expulse the french nation, which thirsted for the blood and destruction of the poore Britons, and he was the more ardently therunto encouraged, because he perceaued Maximilian himselfe so earnestly set and bent toward that enterpryse, and therefore he made hys aunswere to James the the Ambassadour, that he would be ashamed to be found slack or vnprovided at any time of Maximilian hys fellow and companion in armes. And so these matters well brought to effect on both parties, the king dismissed the Ambassadour from his presence.

Thys yere the gate in London called Creplegate, was new buylded at the cost and charges of Sir Edmond Shalw knight late Maior of London, And the sayde yere was the bewtiful Conduyt in Gracious strete, builded by the Executors of Syr Thomas Hill knight and Grocer of London, and late Maior of the sayde Citie, as doth appere by certayne verses written vpon the same Conduyt.

And this yere in Julie was Henry the kinges seconde somme bozne at Grenewiche beside London, which succeeded his father in the kingdom of Englande by the name of king Henry the eyght.

In this very season Charles the french king receaued Ladie Anne as his pupille into his handes, and with great solemnitie her espoused, hauing with her for her dowter the whole countrey of Briteyn: and so by thys meane the Britons became subiect to the french king. Maximilian being certefied of thys, fell into a great rage and agonye, for that he was not content with the forsaking and refusing of his daughter Lady Margaret, but also had taken and rauished away from hym his assured wyfe Ladie Anne Duchesse of Briteyne. And calling vpon God for vengeance and punishment for suche an heynous and execrable fact, cryed out and rayled on him, wyshing hym a thousand deaths. Yet after that he was pacified, and came to hymselfe agayne, & had gathered his wyts together, he thought it was most expedient to reuenge his honor and dignitie so manifestly touched with dirt of sword. And being in this minde, sent certaine Ambassadors to King Henry with his letters, desiring hym with all diligence to prepare an armie, and he himselfe would doe lykewise, to invade the french kings realmes with fyre, sword and blood.

King Henry hearing of this, and putting no diffidence in the promise of Maximilian, whome he knewe to haue a deadly hatred and long grudge agaynst the french king, caused a muster to be made in all the partes of hys realme, and put hys men of warre in a readynesse armed and weaponed, according to their feates: beside thys he rygged, manned and bitayled his flauie readie to set forward euery houre, and sent Curryers into euery shire to hasten the souldiours to the sea side.

After the message was declared, there came without any delay an honge armie of men, as well of the low sort & commonalty, as other noble men, harnessed and armed to battail, partly glad to helpe their prince & do him seruice, and partly to buckle with the french men, with whom the English men very wyllingly desyre to cope & fight in open battail. And immediatly, as monition was geuen, euery man with his bande of Souldiours repayed to London.

After that all this armie was arrayed, and euen readie to set forward, whereof were chiefetaines and leaders, Jasper Duke of Bedford, & John Erle of Orforde beside other, the king sent Christopher Warswike his Auouner, and syr John Ryseley knight to Maximilian, to certefie him that the king was all in a readynesse, and would shortly arryue in the continent lande, as sone as he were aduertised that Maximilian and his men, were readie and prepared to ioyne with him. The Ambassadors sayled into Flaunders, and alter their message done, they sent two letters in all hast to king Henry, the which not onely soze vnquieted and vexed him, but also caused him to take moze thought, care and studie on hym then he did before: for they declared that no Prince could be moze vnprovided or moze destitute of men & armure, nor no moze lacking all things, appertayning to warre, then was Maximilian, and that he lay lurking in a corner, soze sick of the fluxe of the purple, so that he had neyther men, horses, munitions, armure nor money, neuerthelesse his minde and wyl was good, if his power and habilitie had bene correspondent, and therfore there was no trust to be put in his aide or puyssaunce. Their lettres both disinayed and made soze of full the king of England, which lyke a prudent Prince did well consider, that it were both tedious and costly, for him alone to enterpryse so great a warre. And on the other part, if he should desist and leaue of his pretended purpose, all men might call him coward and recreant Prince. Beside thys, he thought that his awne nation would not take hys taryng at home in good nor favourable part, considering that lithe they had geuen so large money for the preparation of all things necessarie and conuenient for the same, they might conceaue in their heades and imagine, that vnder colour and pretence of a dissimuled warre, he had exacted of them notable summes of money, and now the treasure was once payed, then the warre was done, and his cofers well enriched, and the commons enpouerished. So that at thys time he doubted and cast perilles on euery side and part, and beside thys, he was not a little soze that Maximilian author of this warre did absent himselfe, and defraude him of his societie and assistance. And while he studied and mused what counsaile he should best take in such a doubtfull case, he lyke a graue Prince, remembryng the sayng of the wiseman, worke by counsaile, and thou shalt not repent thee, assembled together al his Lords and other of his private counsaile, by whose mindes it was concluded and determined, that he should manfully and courageously perceaue and proceede in this broched and begonne enterpryse, recordeing well with themselves, and affirming plainely that all chivalrie and martiall prowesse, the moze difficile and heard it is to attayne to, the moze renowned is the glorie, and the fame moze immortall of the vanquisher and obteyner. Therfore by thys counsaile of his friends and Senate, he made proclamation that euery man should set forthward into Fraunce, and yet openyng how Judasly Maximilian had deceaued hym, least that they knowyng the whole fact, should not be so courageous to go towarde that battayle and proceede forthwarde on their iourney. And therfore to prouide and foresee all perils and daungers that might ensue, he so strengthened and augmented his armie in suche number before he tooke ship, that he with his awne power might discourage and overcome the whole puyssaunce of his aduersaries.

When he had thus gathered and assembled his armie, he sayled to Callice the sixt day of October, and there encamped himselfe, taryng there a certeyn space to see his men harnessed and apparelled, that neyther weapon nor any engine necessary for his iourney should be neglected. At which place all the army had knowlege by the Ambassadors, which were newly returned out of Flaunders (for they did not know of it before) that Maximilian could make no preparation for lacke of money, and therfore there was no succor to be looked for at his hand. At the which report, the Engliche men were nothing abashed nor disinayed, trustyng to their awne puyssaunce & companie. In the meane season, although the French king was as well with courage replenished, as with men furnished meete to trie a battaile, yet all thys notwithstanding he made semblaunce, as though he desyzed nothing moze then peace, beyng not ignoraunt that peace to be obteyned was of no small balure and price, and yet he determined to make moze expence in gettyng of peace, then in setting forth of warre, and regarded so much the lesse the treasure to be dispensed for the acquiryng of vntie and concord, forasmuch as he was afrayde that he beyng diligent to resist the inuasion of the Engliche men, that the Britons whereof the most part bare the yoke of his subiection contrary to their hartes and mindes, would sodeinly rebell and set themselves at libertie, and plucke their heades out of his Coller, and set vp another Duke & gouernour. And at the same very time he was inuited and desired of Lewys Sforcia Duke of Millain, to warre against Ferdinand king of Naples, at whose desyre he was prest & ioyous, thinkyng that he had that occasion sent to him from God, for the which he long before thyrsted & soze wished. The which kingdome he pretended to be due to him by succession, and entended long before to acquire and conquer it by force of armes, as his very right & due inheritance. For when Reyne Duke of Angeou last king of Sicille, departed without any heire male of his woife lawfully begotten, he did adopt to his heire of all his realmes and Dominions, Lewys the .xj. father to the thirde king Charles, to the entent that he should deliuer Queene Margaret his daughter out of the handes of king Edward the fourth, as you haue well before perceyued, wrongfully and without cause disinheritynge his Colyn, Godsonne, and heire, Rene Duke of Lozayne, and Barre. For the which cause he did the moze busily procure and labour for the amitie, fauour, and friendship of his neighbours round about him, that when all thinges were appeased and set in good stay at home, he might the better employ his whole force and puyssaunce on his warre in Italy. Wherefore beyng much desyrous to haue all thinges pacified and set in a perfite concord and securitie, he sent Philip Creueceur Lorde Cordes his chiefe Counsaylor and diligent officer to entreate and perswade the king of Englande to be reconciled and made againe as a newe friend to the french king. He not forgettyng his message, sent letters to king Henry before he passed the sea, and arrived in the firme lande, by the which he notified to him, that he of his bounden dutie and obseruaunce, which he ought to the king his maister, and to the profite of his realme, would take pain to inuent some meane and way, that his highnesse and king Charles his mayster beyng discouered in amitie, and made extreme enemyes, onely for the cause of Maximilian newly elected king of Romaynes, should be reducted and brought againe into their pristine estate and accustomed familiaritie, doubtyng not to bring his ship to the port desyred, if it might stand with his pleasure to sende some of his counsaylors to the confines and borders of the Engliche pale, adioynyng to Fraunce, there to here what reasonable offers should be declared and proffered: which conditions of peace should be so reasonable and so ample, that he doubted not, but that he might with his great honour breake vp his campe, and retire his armie backe againe into his awne seignory and dominion.

king entrea-
ted the king
for peace.

The king of Englande grauely consideryng that Britayne was clerly lost, and in maner irrecuperable, beyng nowe adioyned to the Crowne of Fraunce by mariage, which Duchie his whole minde was to defende, and that Maximilian what for lacke of money, and what for mistrust that he had in his awne subiectes, lay still lyke a Dormouse nothyng doyng, perceyving also that it should be both to his people profitable, and to hym great honour to determine this great warre without losse or bloodshed, appointed for commissioners the Bishop of Excester, and Gyles Lorde Dabbeney to passe the seas to Calice, to comen with the Lorde Cordes of articles of peace to be agreed vpon and concluded.

When the Commissioners were once met, they so ingeniously and effectiuouly proceeded in their great affayres, that they agreed that an amitie and peace should be assented to and concluded, so that the conditions of the league should be equall, indifferent, and acceptable to both partes as after shall be declared.

While the Commissioners were thus consultyng on the Marches of Fraunce, the king of England as you haue heard, was arriued at Calice, where he prepared all thinges necessary for such a iourney. And from thence he remoued in foure battailes, nere to the towne of Woleyn, and there pitched his tentes befoze the towne, in a place mete and conuenient, and determined to geue a great assault to the towne. In the which fortreffe was such a gar- rison of warlike Souldiours, that valiantly defended the towne, and the same so replenished with artillery and munitions of warre, that the losse of the Englishemen assaultyng the towne, shoulde be greater dammage to the realme of England, then the conqueriug and gainyng of the same shoulde be gaine or profite. Howbeit the kings dayly shot, rased and defaced the walles of the sayde towne: But when euery man was prest and redie to geue the assault, a sodaine rumoz rose in the armie, that a peace was by the commissio- ners taken and concluded, which brute as it was pleasaunt and delectable to the Frenche men, so it was to the English nation bitter, sorow, and dolorous, because they were prest and redye at all tymes to set on their enemyes, and refused neuer to attempt any enterprize, which might seeme eyther to be for theyr laude or profite: they were in great fumes, angrye, and euill content, railyng and murmyryng amongst themselves, that the occasion of so glori- ous a victozy to them manifestly offred, was by certain conditions to no man, nor yet to the king commodious or profitable, refused, put by and shamefully slacked: But aboue all other, dyuers Lordes and Capitaynes, encouraged with desire of fame and honour, trustyng in this iourney to haue wonne their spurres, which for to set themselves and theyr band the more gorgeously for- warde, had exchaunged and borrowed diuers and sundrie summes of money, and for the repayment of the same, had morgaged and layde to gage theyr landes and possessions, soze grudged and lamented at this sodaine peace, and spake largely agaynst the kinges doynges, sayng and affirmyng, that he as a man fearing & dreadyng the force and puissaunce of his enemies, had con- cluded an incouenient peace without cause or reason: But the king as a wise man & most prudent Prince to asswage the indignation & to pacifie the mur- mour of the people, declared what dammage and detriment, what losse and perdition of many noble Capitaynes and strong Souldiours must of neces- sitie

sitie happen and ensue at the assault of a towne, and especially when it is so well fortified with men and munitions, as the towne of Woleyne at that present tyme was: protestyng farther, that he might bee iustly accused and condemned of iniquitie and vnt ruth, except he did preferre the sauegarde of theyr lyues, befoze his awne welth, helth, and aduantage.

When he had thus prudently quyeted and appeased the mindes of hys men of warre, he returned backe againe with his whole armie to the towne of Calice, where he began to smell certaine secret smoke, which was lyke to turne to a great flame, without it were well watched and pollitically sene to. For by the craftie inuention and deuilish imagination of the Ladie Margaret, Duchesse of Burgoyne, a newe ydoll was set vp in Flaunders, and called Richard Plantagenet, second sonne to king Edward the fourth, as though he had bene resuscitate from death to life, which sodayne newes moze stak and fretted in his stomacke, then the battaile which nowe was set late forwarde, and moze paine he had (not without great ieopardie of himselfe) to appease and quenche this newe sprong conspiracie, then in makyng peace with the French king his enemye. And so he was content to accept and receyue (and not to offer and geue) the honest condicions of peace of his enemye profered except hee woulde at one tyme make warre both at home in his awne Countrie, and also in foreyne and externe nations. Wherefoze king Henry foresepyng all these thinges concluded with the Frenche king, to the en- tent that he beyng deliuered of all outwarde enmitie, might the moze quick- ly prouide for the ciuile and domesticall commocions, which he perceyued well to bee buddyng out. The conclusion of the peace was thus, that the peace should continue both their lyues, and that the French king should pay to king Henry a certaine summe of money in hande, accordyng as the Com- missioners should appoynt for his charges sustayned in hys iourney: Which (as the king certefyed the Maior of London by his letters the .ix. day of No- uember) amounted to the summe of seuen hundred. xl. thousand durates, which is in sterlyng money. The conclu-

Also in this sojourning and besieging of Woleyne (which we spake of befoze) there was fewe or none killed, sayng onely one John Saunge knight, which goyng priuely out of hys pavilion with Sir John Kiseley, roade about the walles to biewe & see their strength, was sodaynely trapped and taken of his enemies. And he being inflamed with yre, although he were captiue, of his high courage disoeyned to be taken of such vileynes, defended his lyfe to the vttermost and was manfully (I wil not say wilfully) slaine and oppressed, albeit sir John Kiseley fled from them and escaped their daunger.

The king hauing put all things in an order beyond the Seas, did then with speede returne into Englande, and first of all things he elected into the societie of saint George, commonly called the order of the Garter, Alphonse Duke of Calabres sonne, accordyng to his desire, which Alphonse was sonne and heyre to Ferdinand king of Napels, and after king of the same realme, tyll

Arsewike, Ambassadour with the Sartier, Collet, Mantell, and other ha-biliaments apperteyning to the companions of the sayde noble order. Which Ambassadour arryuing at Naples, deliuered to the Duke the whole habite, with all the ceremonies and due circumstances thereunto belonging.
Which the Duke very reuerently receaued, and with more reuerence reuested himselfe with the same in a solempne presence, thinking that by thys ap-parell and inuestiture, he was made a friend and companion in order with the king of Englande, whose friendship obteyned, he feared nothyng the assaults or inuasions of his enimies. And thys was the cause that he desired so much to be companion of that noble order, firmly beleewing that the king of Englande souereigne of that order, should be ayder and maintayner of hym agaynst the French king, whome he knew would passe the mountaynes and make warre on hym. But this custome of assistance in orders was, ey-ther neuer begonne, or before clerely abolished: For in our time there haue bene many noble men of Italy, companions as well of the Golden Flese in Burgoyne, as of the order of Saint Michell in Fraunce, that haue bene banished and driuen away from their naturall Countrey, and yet haue not bene ayded by the souereigne nor companions of the same order. For surely the statutes and ordinaunces of all the sayde orders doth not binde them to that case, but in certayne poynts. After thys the Duke dimitted the Ambassador, and rewarded him most Princely.

But now let vs retorne to the new sonne of king Edward: And first to declare his lignage and beginning you must vnderstand that the Duches of Burgoyne so nozished and brought bp in the sedicious and unhappie factions of false contriuers and founders of discorde, coude neuer cease nor be in quyet, except she shoulde trouble and vnquyet the kyng of Englande, for no desert or displeasure by him to her committed, but onely because he came and descended of the house of Lancastre, euer being aduerse and enimie to her lyne and linage. For which only cause she compassed and inuented how to cast a scorpion in his bosome, and to infect his whole realme with pestiferous discorde. To the intent that he being vanquished and brought to confusion, both the boyling heate of her malicious hart might be fully faciated with his innocent bloude, and also aduance and preferre some darling of her faction to his Empire, rule and dignitie. And principally remembryng that the Earle of Lincoln, which was by her set forth and al his company had small fortune and worse successe in their progression and enterprize, contrarie to her hope and expectation she beganne to deuise and spinne a new webbe. And as the deuill prouideth benemous sauce to corrupt bankettes, so for her purpose she espied a certaine young man, of visage beutifull, of countenance demure, of witte subtle, craftie and pregaunt, called Peter Warbecke. And for his dastard cowardnes of the Englishmen, in derision called Perkin Warbeck, according to the duche phraise, which chaunge the name of Peter to Perkin, to yonglinges of no strength nor courage: Which yong man traueylyng many countreys, coude speake English and many other languages, and for his basenesse of stocke and birth was knowne of none almost, and onely for the gaine of his lyuing from his childehoode was of necessitie compelled to trauaile diuerse realmes and regions. Therefore the Duches thinkyng to to haue gotten God by the foote, when she had the deuill by the tayle, and ad-iudging this yong man to be a meete organe to conuey her purpose, and one not vnlike to be the Duke of Yorke, sonne to her brother king Edward, which was called Richard, kept him a certaine space with her priuily, and him with such diligence instructed, both of the secretes, and common affayres of the realme of Englande, and of the lignage, dissent & order of the house of Yorke, that he lyke a good Scholer not forgettyng his lesson coude tell all that was taught him promptly without any difficulty: & besides, he kept such a princely countenance, and so counterfeyte a maiestie royall, that all men in maner did firmly beleue that he was extracted of the noble house and familie of the Dukes of Yorke. For suerly it was a gift geuen to that noble progenie as of nature in the roote planted that all the sequele of that lyne and stocke did study and deuise how to be equyvalent in honoz and fame with their forefathers and noble predecessors.

When this Duches had framed her cloth mete for the market, and imagined that all thinges was readye and prepared for the confusion of King Henrie, sodeinly she was enforced that the sayde king of Englande prepared a puissant armie agaynst Charles the French King. Then she considering the oportunitie of the time, as who woulde saye, a time wished and a daye desyed to achieue and bring to passe her malicious inuencion. Wherefore she sent Perkin Warbeck, her new inuented Shammet first into Dortingall, and so craftelie into the realme of Irelande, to the entent that he being both wyttie and wylye might moue, inuegle and prouoke the rude and rusticall Irish nation (being more of nature enclined to rebellion then to resonable order) to a new conflict & a sedicious commocion. This worshipfull Perkin, arriuing in Ireland, whither it were more by his craftie witte, or by the ma-litious exhortacion of the saluage Irish gouernors, within short space entred so farre into their fauoures, and so serioulye perswaded and allured them to his purpose, that the greatest Lordes and Princes of the countrey gaue such fayth and credit to his wordes, as that thing had bene true in dede, which he vntruly set forth & declared: And as though he had bene the very son of king Edward, they honozed, and exalted him with all reuerence and due honoure, promising vnto him ayde, comfort and assistance of all thinges to the feat of warre, necessarie and appertayning.

In the meane season these newes were made knowne to Charles the French king, then being in displeasure with king Henry, which without deay sent for Perkin into Irelande, to the intent to sende him agaynst the King of Englande which was inuading Fraunce (as you before haue heard.) This fleming Perkin was not a litle ioyfull of this message, thinking by this onely request to be exalted into heauen, when he was called to the familiaritie and acquaintaunce of Kinges and Princes: and so with all diligence sayled into Fraunce, with a berie small nauie, not so small as smally furnished. And commyng to the kings presence was of him royally accepted, & after a princely fashion entertained, & had a gard to him assigned, whereof was gouernoz the lorde Congreshal. And to him at Paris resorted sʒ George Neuell bastard, sʒ John Tayler, Rouland Robinson and an hundred English rebelles.
But after that a peace, as before is said was apoynted and concluded betwixt him and the king of Englande, the said king Charles dimitted the yong man,
and

and would no longer kepe him. But some men saye which were there attending on him, that he fearing that kyng Charles, woulde deliuer him to the king of Englande, beguiled the Lorde Congreshall, and fled away from Paris by night. But whether he departed without the French kings consent or disassent, he deceiued in his expectation, and in maner in dispaire, returned againe to the Lady Margaret his first foolish foundresse.

The Duches thinking euery houre from his departure a whole yere, vntill such time as she heard from him, and effectuously desiring to knowe which way Ladie fortune turned her wheele, hearing him to be reiected out of the French court was in a great agony and much amased: But when shee was assured of his arrivall in Flaunders, shee no lesse reuiued, then he that hath in stead of the sword of execution, a pardon and restitution of his life. And at his comming to her presence, she receaued him with such gladnesse, and with such a comfort (as in dede she could dissemble alone about all other) as though she had neuer seene nor knowne him before, that what in trust to preferre him to the preheminece by her ymagined, and what for the hope that she had to destroy king Henry, shee fell into such an vmeasurable ioy, that she had almost lost her wyt and senses. And that thys her gladnesse might be notified and made apparant to euery man, she first reioyced of her Nephewes helth and welfare: And secondarily she much thurst and soze longed, not once, but dyuers and sundrie times in open audience, and in solempne presence to here him declare and shewe by what meanes he was preserved from death and destruction, and in what Countries he had wandered and sought friendship: And finally, by what chaunce of fortune he came to her court and presence. To the entent that by the open declaration of these feyned phantasies, the people might be perswaded to geue credite and beliefe that he was the true begotten sonne of her brother king Edward. And after this shee assigned him a garde of thirtie persons in Purrey and blewe, and highly honoured him as a great estate, and called hym the whyte Rose, Prince of Englande.

Perkyn was named the Prince of Englande.

By reason whereof the Nobilitie of Flaunders were to hym diligent, and wyth due reuerence did him all the pleasure that laye in their power or offices. And to be short, the more that this poeticall and feyned inuention was shadowed with the pretence of sincere veritie, the more fayth and assured credence, was geuen to it. In so much, that many one thought hym to be preserved, onely by the wil and mightie power of almighty God, and to be conueyed at the first daunger by some faythfull friend of king Edward his father into some straunge Countrie, and so escaped the violent tirannie of hys Uncle king Richard. The same and brute of thys iuggeled miracle was almost in one moment blodde ouer all the Countrie of Flaunders, but in England it was blased in euery place soner then a man could thinke or deuise it: In which Countrie more then in other places it was receaued for an vndoubted truth, and that not onely of the common people, but also of diuers noble and worshipfull men, of no small estimation, which swore and affirmed it to be true. After this brute that Richard sonne to king Edward was yet liuyng, and had in great honoz amongst the Fleminges, there began sedition to spring on euerie side. For not onely they that were in Sanctuaries, for great and heynous offences by them committed, but also manye other that were fallen into debt, and doubtyng to be brought to captiuitie and bondage, assembled together in companies, and were passed ouer the Sea into Flaunders to their counterfeitte Richard sonne to king Edward, otherwise named Perkyn Warbeck. After this many of the noble men conspired together some through rashnesse and hastie credite induced thereto, some beyng so earnestly perswaded in their awone conceipt, as though they knewe perfittly that thys Perkyn was the vndoubted sonne of king Edward the fourth, solicited, stirred and allured to their opinion all such as were friends and fauourers of the house of Yorke. Other through indignation, enuie and auarice, euer grudging and thinking they were not sufficiently rewarded for their paines and partes taken in the kings behalfe and quarrell. Other whome it grieued and vexed to see the worlde stande still in one stae, and all men to lyue in peace and tranquillitie, desirous of some chaunge, ranne headling into that furie, and seditious coniuration.

Thys rumour and bayne fable of this twise borne Duke Rycharde, deuised all Englande, and drewe the realme into partakings and severall factions, so that the mindes of all men were vexed eyther with hope of gayne and preferment, or with feare of losse and confusion. Albeit the king and his counsaile and other his faythfull friendes, not a little maruelled that any person (beyng in his right wyt) could induce in his minde or finde in his hart falsly to thinke that such a pernicious fable & feyned matter should haue any truth in it. Notwithstanding many of the Noble men (as he well then perceaued) tooke and reputed it to be a thing true and vnfeyned. So that he then saue as farre as Lynx with his bright eyes, that thys newe inuented fable would make some broyle and discorde in his realme: Except it were manifestly published and openly declared to be a feyned fable, and a craftie imagined mischief. Other persons, to whome warre, sedition, and strife, were as pleasant as delicate fare, were very ioyous of these newes, beleying no fraude nor decepte to be hidden vnder this golden tale, and therefore they determined to send messengers, to the Ladye Margaret to knowe when Rycharde Duke of Yorke might come conueniently into Englande, to the intent that they beyng thereof certefied, might be in a redynesse to help and succour him at his first arriuall.

So by the common consent and agreement of the coniuured confederats, sir Robert Clifford knight, & sir William Barley were sent into Flaunders, which playnely shewed to the Duches all the secret intents and priuie counsailes of the friendes and fauourers of the newe found Duke. The Duches this message did gladly accept, & louingly embrace, and of their tydings was not a little ioyous, easily by hir perswasion inducing to their heades, that all things that were spoken of Duke Rycharde were true and vnfeyned. And afterward brought them to the sight of Perkyn, the which counterfeitte the countenance and the maner and fashion of Rycharde Duke of Yorke, praising his vertues and qualities, with the which he was indued about the thone. The sayde Sir Robert Clifford, when he had sene and well aduised the yong man, beleyed surely that he was extracted of the blood royall, and the very sonne of king Edward the fourth, and thereof he wrote a letter of credite and confidence into Englande to his companyons and felowes of his conspiracie, & to put them out of all doubt he affirmed that he knew him to be king Edwardes sonne by his face and other lymaments of his body. And when these letters came to England, the Chiettaines of this businesse, to the entent to stirre the people to some new commotion and tumult, & to set forth some cause of matter apparaunt, caused it openly to be divulged & published, that it was true and not feyned that was spoken and sayde abroade of the Duke of Yorke: but it was done by such a secret craft, that no man could tell who was the authoz and founder of that rumour.

When the king perceaued that this bayne fable was not banished out of the mad brennes of the comen people, he thought it expedient both for the sauegarde of himselfe and also of his Countrey, to prouide some remedie to repress this imminent mischaunce, not a little suspecting, that some conspiracie had bene concluded and agreed, because that Sir Robert Clyfford had late fled priuily into Flaunders. Wherefore he sent certayne knightes that were chosen and picked men of warre, with a band of Souldiours into euerie part to keepe the Hoyses and the Sea costes surely, that no man might passe ouer into anye foreyne lande beyonde the Sea, nor repasse into thys realme without search or passport or saueconduyt by him geuen, & all streytes passages, and bye pathes were kept and searched, so that no man bnapprehended could passe to the Sea coast, nor make any conuenticle or assemble witho:it he were espied and taken. And to the intent that many men, beyng both of England and other places for verie malice by this newe inuention enflamed and indurate, should no farther ruine in their madnesse, he secretly sent wise espialles to all the Cities of the lower Fraunce, within the Archedukes dominion, and the confines of the same, to search and prye out of what progeny this misnamed Richard was dissended and brought forth, promising highly to rewarde and thanke such persons, which would manifest and open the secret doubtles and denises of the same matter: and beside thys he wrote to his trusty frendes to do the same. So they saylinge into fraunce deuided and seuered themselves euery man into a lymite and prouince. And when certayne of them repayed to the towne of Turnay, they were there certefied by the testimony of manye honest persons that thys feyned Duke came but of a loto stocke, and of a base parentage, and was named there Peter Warbecke. And so shortly after the kinges inquisitozs returned in Englande, reportyng to the king what they had knowen and hearde: Of which thing the king was also moze plainly certefied by his trustie and faythfull frendes, both by letters and trustie messengers.

Whereupon seying that now the fraude was openly espyed, he determined to haue it published and declared with all diligent celeritie, both in the realme of England, and also in all partes beyond the sea, in the pronynces of foreyn Princes, and straunge Potentates. And for the same cause he sent to Philip Archeduke of Burgoyne, and to his counsaylozs (because that he was not yet of full age, apt and conuenient to take the regiment of his Countreys and seignories) Sir Edward Downinges, a valiant knight, and Sir William Warram Doctor of the lawes, a man of great modestie and learning, that they should openly to them declare, that the yong man beyng with the Ladie Margaret, was dissended of a base and obscure parentage, and that he had falsely and vntuly usurped the name of Richard Duke of Yorke, which long before was murthured with his brother Edward in the Tower of London, by the commaundement of King Richard theyr Uncle, as many men liuyng can testifie. And to thinke and say otherwys then this that a- pertly is knowne, it were the highest poynt and degree of madnesse, forasmuch as it is probable by an inuincible reason, and an argument infallible, that King Richard their naturall vnckle, in dispatchyng and destroyng Prince Edward the eldest sonne of King Edward his brother, was in no suretie of his realme or usurped dominion, if he had permitted Richard the yonger son to liue and continue: for then might he as next heire to his brother haue lawfully and by iust title claymed the Scepter and Diademe royall, which was his fathers, and after diuoluted to his elder brother. And therefore they should desyre the Archeduke, and the Princes of his Counsayle, that it would please them to geue no credite, nor themselves suffer any moze to be blinded or seduced with such mere impostures and craftie illusions being full of vntuth and apparant falsehed, nor yet to ayde or assist such a craftie merchant, which had falsely fayned his name and stocke, and in especially agaynst him, which in fewe yeres passed, had succoured and relieved Maximilian their Lorde beyng sore oppressed, and almost ouercome, both with the extort power and puyssaunce of the French king, and also with the ciuile discorde, and intestine rebellion of his awne subiectes and Vassals. With these commaundementes the Ambassadors sayled into Flaunders, and were there gently receyued, and louyngly enterfeyned of the Archeduke Philip and his Counsaile. And after that they were commaunded to declare the intent of their Legation, Doctor William Warram priest, made before them a pleasant and an eloquent oration, shewing therein discretely the mynde and desyre of the king his mayster: And in the latter ende of his oration, he a little rebuked the Ladie Margaret, and hit her on the thombes, sayng that she nowe in her olde age, within fewe yeres had produced and brought forth two detestable monsters, that is to say, Lambert (of whome reherfall was made before) and the other Perkyne Warbeck. And beyng conceyued of these two great babes, was not of them deliuered in eyght or nine monethes as nature doth require, and as all other women commonly do, but in the .C. and .lxxx. monethes, she brought them forth out of her wombe: for both these at the least were fiftene yeres of age before that she woulde bee brought in bed of them and shewe them openly.

And when they were newly crept out of her wombe they were no infantes, nor suckyng children, but lustie yonglynges, and of age sufficient to bid battaile to kinges. Although these tauntes and icastes did anger and trouble the Ladie Margaret, yet Perkin was moze bered and encombred with the thinges declared, in this oration, and in especiall because his fraude, and false feyned iuggelyng was brought to light & opened: yet the Duches beyng therewith moze incenced then quenched, nothing refraynyng her olde malice and cancard hatred, but entendyng to cast hote Sulpher to the newe kindled fyre, determined clerely to arme and set forwarde pretie Perkyne agaynst the king of England with speare and shield, might and mayne.

When the Ambassadors had done their message, and the Archedukes Counsaile had long debated whether Perkyne were the true sonne of King Edward the fourth, they answered the Ambassadors: that to the entent to haue the loue and fauour of the King of England, assuredly after that tyme, the Archeduke nor they would neyther ayde nor assist Berkyne nor his Complices, in any cause or quarell. Yet notwithstanding, if the Ladie Margaret persistyng and continyng in her malice towarde the king, would be to him aydyng and helpyng, it was not in their power to let or withstande it, for because she in the landes assigned to her for her dower, might frankly and frely do and order all things at her awne wyll and pleasure without contradiction of any other gouernor.

When this aunswere was geuen to them, they returned againe into England. After that, King Henry lokyng circumspectly to his matters, purposed to pacify the stozmes and blastes that he perceyued to be growyng, rather by pollicie and counsaile, then by doubtfull warre and manslaughter, if his nobilitie would thereunto condiscend. For he well considered that of one busynesse ryseth another, and of one small sparckle cometh a great flame. And therfore stright he sent forth certain espialles into Flaunders, which should feine themselves to haue fled vnto the Duke of Yorke, and by that meanes serche forth and seeke out the whole entent of theyr conuiration, and after what way they entended to procede in the same. Other were sent also to allure and entice Sir Robert Clifford, and William Barlye to returne into England, promisyng to them franke and free pardon of all offences and crymes committed, and promotions and rewarde, for obeying to the kinges request. These Spyes so trauallyed in their affayres and busynesse, that they brought to passe all thinges to their maisters desyre. For first they had perfite knowlege of the names of certaine conspirators agaynst the king. After they perswaded sir Robert Clifford to leaue off that foolishe opinion, which had no sure ground nor foundation to stay it selfe vpon. Albeit William Barlye could not be brought from his begon enterprize, but that he would go forwarde hedlong with the same, which tarped not long in that lewde opinion. For within two yeres after this, he repentynge him of his foly, beyng reclaimed, and hauyng pardon geuen him of the king, repayed home to his native Countrie, detestynge him and his foolishe blindenesse. When the espialls had sped their purpose, one after another stole away priuily from the fayned Duke, and returned into Englande, bringyng wyth them the names of certaine, which were chiefe of that conspiracie. Other tarped still behinde to accompanye sir Robert Clifford, when he returned againe into England, whose returne marueylously discomfited and abated the courages, and hartes of the conuirators, for they perceyued dayly that their enterprize moze and moze fainted, and that they were by a little and little damnified and hurted. And yet they sawe no man whome they might perfutely put diffidence in, nor yet once mistrust.

When the king had knowlege of the chiefe Capitaynes of thys tumult by the ouerture of his spies, which were returned, he caused them all to bee apprehended, and brought to London befoze his presence. Of the which the chiefe were John Ratcliffe Lorde Fitzwater, sir Simond Mountforde, sir Thomas Cwhaytz knights, William Dabobney, Robert Ratcliffe, Thomas Cressenoz, and Thomas Astwood. Also certaine priestes and religious men, as sir William Kicheford Doctor of diuinitie, and sir Thomas Poynes, both friers of Saint Dominikes order, Doctor William Sutton, sir William Worsely Deane of Paules, and Robert Leyborne, and sir Richard Lessor.

Other that were guiltie of the same cryme, heeryng that many of theyr company were taken, fled and tooke Sanctuary. And the other that were taken were condemned all of treason, of the which there was beheaded, Sir Symond Mountford, sir Robert Ratcliffe, and William Dabobney, as authours and chiefe Capitaynes of this busynesse. The rest were pardoned, Also sir John Ratcliffe Lorde Fitzwater, was pardoned of his lyfe, but after that he came to Calice, and there layd in holde, he was beheaded, because he corrupted the keepers with many promises to haue escaped out of the same entenyng as was thought to haue gone to Berkyne.

King Henry of England, partly grieued with the king of Romaynes for breakyng his promise, when he should haue associated him in his iourney agaynst the French king, and partly displeased with the Flemynge, but principally with the Ladie Margaret, for keepyng and settyng forwarde Berkyne Warbecke, not onely banished all Flemishe wares, and marchandises, out of his realme and dominions, but also restrained all Englishe marchaunts from their repayze and traffique, into any of the landes and territories of the king of Romaynes, or the Archeduke his sonne, causyng the Martes of Marchandises and comodities of this Realme to be kept at his towne of Calice. Wherefoze the sayde king and his sonne banished out of their landes and seignories all Englishe clothes, yarne, tynne, leade, and other comodities, vpon great forfeitures and penalties. The restraint made by the king soze grieued and hindred the Marchantes, beyng aduenturers: for they by force of this commaundement had no occupiyng to beare theyr charges and support their continuance and credite. And yet one thing soze nipped their hartes, for the Easterlynges which were at libertie, brought into the realme suche wares as they were wont and accustomed to doe, and so serued their customers throughe out the whole realme: By reason wherof the maisters beyng destitute of sale and traffique, neyther retyened so many couenant seruantes and apprentices as they befoze were accustomed, and in especiall, Carters, Haberdashers, and Clothworkers, nor yet gaue to their seruantes so great stipend and salarie, as befoze that restraynt they vsed to do. For which cause the sayde seruantes entenyng to worke their malice on the Easterlynges, the Tuesday befoze Saint Edwardes day came to the Stiliard in London, and began to rife and spoyle such Chambers and Warehouses as they could get into: so that the Easterlynges had much a do to withstand and repulse them out of their gates. And when their gates were shut and made fast, the multitude rushed and beate at the gates with Clubbes and Leauers to haue entred, but the Easterlynges by the helpe of Carpenters, and Smythes, which came to their ayde by water out of the Borough of Southwarke had so strongly thored and fortified themselves, that they could not preuaile. The Maior of London heeryng of this ryot, assembled the Maiestres and officers of the Citie together, and so beyng furnished both with men and weapon, set forward toward the Stiliard. Assone as the commyng of the Maior was declared and knowen to the riotous persons, they fled away lyke a flock of sheepe: howbeit he apprehended diuers of the malefactors, and committed them to severall prisons. And vpon the inquirie befoze the kinges Commissioners, there were found guiltie aboue. lxxx. seruantes & apprentices (and not one housholder) which were confederate together to make this attempt, tempt, and sworne in no wyse to discouer or reuele the same: Whereof, some that were the Chiefeynes and beginners of this mischievous riot, were sent to the Tower, and there long continued. But in conclusion, because none of their maysters were founde trespassers of this naughtie act, the king of hys goodnesse pardoned their offence, and restored them to their libertie.

Shortly after, s<sup>r</sup> Robert Clifford, partlye trusting on the kings promise, and partly mistrusting the thing, because he knew that diuers that were accused to be partakers of that faction and conspiracie were put in execution: and therefore perceyuing that there coulde not be a more pernicious nor more desperate begonne thing then that deuillish enterprize, retourned sodeynlye againe into Englande. The kinge beinge certefied befoze of his comminge, went streight to the Towre of London the moztow after the day of Epiphany and there taried till such time that s<sup>r</sup> Robert Clifford was there presented to his person, which thing he vsed vnder this pretence, that if s<sup>r</sup> Robert Clifford had accused any of the Nobilitie to be partakers of this naughtie felowship and deuillish pretence, that then euery such person might be called thither without suspection of any euill, & there straight to be attached & cast in holde.

But befoze I go any farther I will shew the opinion that at that tyme ranne in many mens heddes of this knyghtes going into flaunderis. Some men helde this opinion, that king Henrie for a policie did send him as a spye to flaunderis, or else he woulde not haue so sone receyued him into his graie and fauour agayne: Neuerthelesse, this is not like to be true by dyuers reasons and apparant arguments, first after that attempt begon by s<sup>r</sup> Robert, he was in no small daunger himselfe, and by that he was not a litle noted, and his name blenished, but also his friendes were suspected and had in a ieclosy. Secundarily he was not after that in so great fauour, nor so esteemed with the kyng as he had beene in times past, because he was biotted and marked with that crime and offence. And therefore he bearing his fauour to the house of Yorke entending in the beginning to administer displeasure to king Henry, sayled to the Lady Margaret, being seduced and brought in beliefe that Derby was the verie sonne of king Edward. But to my purpose, when s<sup>r</sup> Robert came to the presence of the king, he kneeling on his knees most humble, besoched him of grace and pardon, which he shortly obtayned. And after that beyng requyred of the maner and order of the coniuration, and what was done in flaunderis, he opened euery poynt to his knowlege, & after disclosed the names, as well of the ayders and fauours as of the deuilers and beginners. Amongst whom he accused s<sup>r</sup> William Stanley, whom the king had made his chiefe chamberlein, and one of his priue counsaile. When he had so sayde, the king was greatly dismayed and grieved, that he should be partaker in that greivous offence, considering first that he had the gouerraunce of his chamber, and the charge and comptrolment of all such as were next to his body, and also calling to remembrance the manifolde gentlenesse and friendship, which he had receaued at his hande, but in especiall not forgetting that benefite above all other, that only by his aide and succour, he had banquished and overthrowen his mortall enemy king Richard. Wherefore, at the beginning he coulde in no wise be perswaded nor beleue that he was such a priue conspirator, or malicious offender, but when the crime was openly produced and probably affirmed, then the king caused him to be restrayned from his libertie in his aboue Chamber within the quadrate Tower. And there appoynted him by his priue counsaile to be examined. In which examination he nothing denyed, but wisely and seriously did consent and agree to all thinges layde to hys charge, if he were in anye of them culpable or blame worthe.

The report is, that this was his offence. When communication was had betwene him, and this s<sup>r</sup> Robert Clifford, as concernyng Derby which falsly vsurped the name of king Edwardes sonne, Sir William Stanley sayd and affirmed there, that he would neuer fight nor beare armoir agaynst the yong man, if he knew of a truth that he was the vndoubted sonne of king Edward the fourth. This poynt argueth and proueth him at that tyme, beyng moued with melancholye, to beare no great good will to king Henry, whereof suspicion first grewe, and after this ensued the accusation of Sir Robert Clifford.

Then the king doubtyng what to do with him, did consult and breath with himselfe of this sodaine chaunce. For he feared least that his brother Lord Thomas Stanley, in whome he had found great friendship, woulde take this matter greivously. And if he should remit that fault, that he abusing his lenitie and mercie, woulde be the more bolder to offende, and trespasse more highly. Albeit at the last, seueritie tooke place, and mercy was put back, and so he was arreigned at Westminster, and adiudged to die, and according to that iudgement was brought to the Tower hill the .xviij. day of February, and there had his head stricken off. What was the occasion and cause why the sincere and faythfull minde that s<sup>r</sup> William alwayes befoze bare to king Henry, was turned into canard hatred and despite, and why the especiall fauour that the king bare towarde him was transmuted into displeasure and displeasure, dyuers men allege dyuers causes, affirmyng that when king Henry (what other mutuall benefites the one had receyued of the other, I wyll now pretermit and ouerpasse) in that battail in the which he bereft king Richard both of his life and his kingdome, bring associate and accompanied but with a small number, and circumvented by king Richards armie, and in great leoparchie of his life, this Sir William beyng sent from the lord Stanley his brother with a good compaigne of strong and hardie men (which Lord Stanley was nere the fielde with a great armie) came sodainly and fortunately to the succours of king Henry, and saued him from destruction, and ouerthrowe king Richard as befoze you haue heard. Surely this was a benefite above all benefites to be remembred, by the which king Henry was not only preserved aliue, but also obteyned the Crowne and kingdom, which great benefite, after the kingdome once obteyned, he did neyther forget, nor yet left unrewarded. For the Lorde Thomas Stanley he inuested with the sword of the countie of Darbie, and besyde other great giftes and offices geuen to William Stanley, he made him his chiefe Chamberleyn. This Sir William, although he were in great fauour with the king, and had in great and high estimation, more remembryng the benefite done to the king, then the rewardes and gratuities of his liberalitie receyued, thinkyng that the befall of Oile (accordyng to the Gospell) would ouerflow the byminnes, and as some say, desiryng to be Erle of Chester, and thereof denyed, beganne to grudge and disdeyne the king his highe friende: and one thing encouraged him him much, which was the riches and treasure of King Richard, which he only possessed at the conflict of Bosworth: by reason of which abundance of riches, and great power of people, he set naught by the King his sovereigne Lorde and Master. When the King perceyved that his stomake beganne to canker and waxe rustie, he was with him not a little displeas'd, and so when both their hartes were enflamed with melancholy, both lost the fruit of their long continued amitie and fauour. And so it often chaunceth, that when men do not consider nor yet regarde the great benefites to them exhibited, they rendre againe hatred for liberalitie, and for bread geuen, they yelde againe a Scorpion. Nowe to returne to the matter.

At this time the King thought it best, yea and very necessary, not only to take hede about him, but also to vse some sharpe punishment and correction of the offences of his subiectes, to the entent that the late begonne sedicion might the sooner be repressed, and for this cause specially that some persons boyde of all honest feare and reuerent dread, had taken such courage and audacitie to them, that they feared not to speake euill of their King and sovereigne Lorde, with most spitefull and contumelious wordes, as though they neither feared nor would obey him, or his precepts and commaundementes, expectyng dayly and hourelly the arriuall and landyng of the farned Richard Duke of Yorke, nowe lately risen from death to lyfe. But when knowlege of the flanderous and opprobrious wordes were brought to the Kinges eares, he caused diuers persons to suffer condigne punishment for theyr heynous offences, whereby their complices well perceyving that their enterprize had no prosperous successe nor took any good effect, and especially such as rashely began to make mastries, and farther seeyng what preparation was made and provided agaynst their troubleous commocion and frantique enterprize, they of their awne swinge pacified themselves, & began to turne to their King and naturall liege Lorde.

After the death of Sir William Stanley, Gyles Lorde Dabobency, a man of great fidelitie and circumspection, was elected and made the Kinges chiefe Chamberleyne. When the King had thus polittiquely weeded out the euill and corrupt hartes of his Englishe subiectes, and had pacified and brought all his realme to a peaceable and a quiet life. Then he perceyved that it was necessary also to purge and cleanse his realme of Ireland, to the entent that the benemous seede sowne and planted two yeres past, amongst the wilde and sauage Irishe persons by Perkin Warbeck might be cleane digged and rooted by. Wherefore he sent Sir Henry Deane, late Abbot of Langton, a man of great wit and diligence (whome he made Chaunceloz of the Isle) and Sir Edward Downynges knight, with an armie of men into Ireland, to serche and purge all such townes and places where Perkin was receyved, relied on or fauoured. And if they espyed any of hys affinitie or faction, then he would they should be punished with all extremitie to the terrible example of all other that would encline to that vnfortunate parte. And first, after their arriuall into Ireland, they called in the Kinges name the nobilitie of that countrie to a counsaile, where they beyng assembled all together, the Chaunceloz with a gentle exhortation required them first to persist in due obedience and fidelitie towardes their King, and to ayde his Capitayne Sir Edward Downynges with their might, power, and strength, agaynst suche

rebelle which eyther through blindnesse and folly, or else through desyre and appetide to do euill, sustayned and ayded Perkin with harnesse, men, or money. Every man promised openly to helpe with all their power and might: But they promised not so quickly, but they performed it as slowly, for few or none eyther ayded or assisted him, as who would say, that they loued the Englishe nation more with their outwarde countenance, than in their inwarde hartes and mindes. But when they heard that Sir Edward Downynges was come to persecute all such as were fauours and friendes to Perkin Warbeck, there was no man, although he were but a little defiled with that sedicious infection, but he fled out of hand into woodes and marishes for the defence and sauegarde of themselves, there consultyng together, after the maner of their Countrie, in what places they might best lye in wayte to hurt and skirmithe with the Englishe men, or else if nede should so requyre to fight with them hande to hande.

In Irelande there be two kinde of men, one soft, gentle, ciuile, and courteous: And to these people, as to the most richest, and best nurtered persons, doth many marchant men of the Countreyes adioynyng, dayly resort. But because the most resort therether is of the Englishe nation, the Irishe men folow and counterfeyt their ciuile maners, and honest conditions. And by reason of the common trade and entercourse betwene them, they haue learned the Englishe tongue, and can both speake and vnderstand it. And all this kinde of people is vnder the subiection and dominion of the King of England. The other kinde is cleane contrary from this, for they be wyld, rusticall, foolish, fierce, and for their vnnanerly behauior, and rude fashions, are called wilde and sauage Irishe men. And these men haue many gouernours and seuerall rulers, which kepe continuall battaile, and dayly warre amongst themselves, for the which cause they be more fierce, more bolde and hardie then the other Irishe men, and they be very desyrous of newe thinges, & straunge sights and gaspings, and after robbery, theft, and rapine, & in nothing so much delightyng as with tumultuous, sedition, and continuall strife. And to these wilde Coltes, Perkin shewed himselfe first, easily perswadyng them to beleue that he was the same very person whom he falsly fained & counterfeited.

Wherefore Sir Edward Downynges accordyng to his Commission, entendyng to punish such as haue bene ayders and aduancers of Perkins foolish enterprize, with his whole armie, marched forwarde agaynst thys wilde Irishe men, because that all other beyng faultie of that offence, fled and resorted to them for succor and defence, to the entent that they both together might be able to resist and desyre there enemyes: But when he sawe that his purpose succeded not as he wished it, both because the Irishe lords sent him no succor, accordyng to their promises, & also consideryng that his number was not sufficient to set on the wilde people beyng disperfed amongst woodes, mountaynes, and marishes, was of necessitie compelled to recule and returne scettyng and vexed in his stomack, because he suspected that Gerald Erle of Kylbare beyng then the Kinges Deputie, was the cause and occasion that he had no succors nor ayde sent to him, and so he was enformed of such as bare to the Erle no good will. And therefore sodainly he caused the Erle to be apprehended, and as a prisoner brought him in his companie into England: Where when he was examined and certaine matters of treason layde to hys charge, charge, he auoyded them all, & clerely (such was his wit and innocencie) quit himselfe, and layd the burthen in other mens necks: Whom the king dismis- sed and sent hym into Ireland agayne, there to be his Deputie and Lieute- nant as he was before. The king like a polittique Prince had many great and weighty considerations, which restrained him from vsing of any leuerity or extremitie against this Erle, contrary to the minds & willes of his malici- ous aduersaries. One was the great auctoritie and swinge that he bare amongest the Irishe nacion: Also the condicion and state of the tyme, wher- in he fauoured some sedicion to be in brewyng: and chiefly of all the assured hope and affiaunce that he conceyued in hym.

So that nowe the king beyng out of all feare of battaile, did take hys progresse into Lancashire the. xxv. day of June, there to recreate his spirits and solace himselfe with his mother the Ladie Margaret, wife to the Erle of Darby, which then lay at Lathome in that Countrey. While these things were thus done in England, Perkin Warbeck then beyng in Flaunders, al- though he had taken great sorowe and care for that his craftie conueyance was espyed and openly knowen, and also that king Henry had afflicted and punished diuers of his confederates and alyes, and thereby in dispayre of all the ayde and succor that was to him promised and appointed: yet he determi- ned not to leaue the hope and trust that he had conceyued in his mad head to obtayne the Crowne and realme of England, and so gatheryng a great ar- me of balaunt Capitaynes of all nations, some bankeroutes, some false Englishe Sanctuarie men, some thecues, robbers, and bacabordes, which leauyng their bodily labour, desiryng onely to lyue of robbery and rapine, came to be his seruauntes and souldiours. And so beyng furnished with this rablement of knaues, tooke such shippes as his friends had prouided for him, and departed out of Flaunders, entendyng to arriue in England wher- soeuer the winde brought him. And by chaunce of fortune he was driuen by- on the Kentishe coast, where because the sea was calmed, he cast his anchors, and there made his abode, and sent certeine of his retinue to the land to sig- nifie to all the Countrey, that he was so furnished of all thinges meete and conuenient for his enterprize, that there was no doubt but the victory would encline to his part. And by this meanes to make serche and enquirie whe- ther the Kentishe men would take his part and folow him as their Capitain, which before tymes was not timerous nor afrayed of their abone mynde in troublous seasons to moue warre agaynst their Princes. The Kentishmen heering that this feyned Duke was come, and had heard that he was but a painted Image, doubtyng a space what to do, whether to helpe him, or to re- sist his power, at the last remembryng what euill chaunces their forefathers had, and howe small a profite such as haue rebelled haue gayned, thought it neyther expedient nor profitable for them to ayde and assist him that came ra- ther to spoyle, destroy, and waste the Countrey, then to conquere it for theyr welth and comoditie. And this they firmly coniectured because he had none other with him but Alienes and straunge people, which would take and accompt euery Church, Towne, Chappell, house, and euery priuate man as a pray and a lucre, and not as their native Countrey. Wherefore they fea- ryng the sequell, determined still to abide true to theyr king and prince, and to fall byon such as were newe come to land out of their shippes. And while they

they were assemblyng of themselves together, other should by fayre promi- ses allure and call vnto them the great number out of the ships, and so geue them battaile. And so vsyng this guile, they promised all to folow him, and to fight vnder his banner: Howbeit the prolongyng of tyme draue Perkin into a suspicion, which well remembred that a communalty is not accustomed sagely to consult, but sodainly and rashely to run hedding euer into rebellion and new stirred commocion. Wherefore Perkin determined not once to sette foote out of his ship till he sawe all thing sure without any daunger. And al- though he mynded not to take land himselfe, yet he suffered certaine of hys Souldiours to go on lande, which persons beyng a pretie way from theyr shippes, were sodainly trapped and compassed by the Kentishmen, and at one stroke banquished and driuen backe to thier shippes, and there were ta- ken prisoners an hundreth, and. lx. persons, wherof foure were named Capi- taynes, Mountforde, Corbet, Whitebelt, Quintine or otherwise Genyn. Which rebelles were brought by sir John Pechy Shirife of Kent, to Lon- don rayld in ropes like hozses drawyng in a Cart. And after vpon their ar- rainment, confessed their offence, and were executed, some at London, and other in the townes adioinyng to the sea Coast. Wherefore Perkin failyng of his purpose, fled backe into Flaunders, and there taryed, consultyng with his friendes vntill such tyme as he had better prepared for thinges to come, moze prudently then he had done before tyme.

In this very season departed to God Cicile Duchesse of Yorke, mother to king Edward the fourth & king Richard, at her Castell of Barkhamstede, a woman of small stature, but of much honour and high parentage, and was buryed by her husband in the College of Fodringey.

The king beyng aduertised that his enemyes had made entraunce into his realme, left off his progresse, and purposed to returne to London againe, but beyng certefyed the next day after of the luckie speerde and fortunate, chaunce, continued and went forth of his progresse, sendyng to them Sir Richard Silforde, both to prayse the fidelitie and manhood of the people, and also to render to them his molt hartie thanks for their good seruite to him done, with faythfull promise not to forget them hereafter in theyr suites, re- questes, and petitions. Also that they might not haue any successe hereafter into those partes, the king commaunded the watches to be kept all along the Sea coastes, and Bekons to be erected acco:dyng to the auncient blage and custome of the Countrey.

Peter and his Capitaynes takyng counsaile together in Flaunders, were of one assent resolved to this point, that there was nothing moze sure to them, then to proceede quickly with their entended enterprize. And when they perceiued that there was neyther people, towne, nor Countrey in Eng- land that would associate them in their phantasticall frenshe, which nothyng was asswaged, least that by delayng of tyme and long space, king Henry might fortify and make strong all daungerous places, and passages wyth Souldiours and men of warre, which thing they heard say that he neyther forgate nor forfellowed, and besyde that he was not a little afearde, that hys long taryng should discomfort his priuy friendes within the realme of Eng- land. Wherefore he gathered together his vngacious companie, and deter- mined first to saile into Irelande, there to augment his number. And from thence if it were possible to sayle into the west parts of England. And if there were any let or impediment in that place, then he determined to sayle straight into Scotland, knowing that seldome or neuer is perfite concord and amitie betwene the Scottes and the English nation. When this gentle counsaill was dissolved, and winde and weather serued, he set by his sailes, and hauing a prosperous gale after his phantasie, sailed into Ireland, where he repored himself a space. And remembryng that the hope of victoꝝ consisted not whole in the Irish nation, which beyng naked men without harness or armure, were not able to combat with the Englishmen: wherefore when the winde serued him, he departed from Corffe and arriued in Scotland, and comming to the kinges presence, with great solemnitie, framed his tale after the forme and fashion following.

I thinke it is not vnknowne to you, most noble king and puissant prince into what rayne the stocke, house, and family of Edward the fourth of that name king of England, is nowe of late brought to, and fallen in, eyther by Gods permission, or by diuine punishment, whose vndoubted some (if you knowe not alredie) I am, and by the power of almightie God, preserued a liue to this houre, from the mightie hand of a tyrant. For my father kyng Edward when he dyed, appoynted his brother Richard Duke of Gloucester to be our gouernour, protector, and defender, whom the more that he loued, and studied to aduance and promote, the better he thought that he would loue, fauour, and tender his children. But alas my infortunat chaunce, I may say, howe hath his trust bene turned into treason: and his hope turned into hinderance: All men knowe, and I feele. Dure Uncle was not the tutour and preseruer of our stocke and lynage, but the confounder and destroyer of our blood and progenie. For that tyrant blinded and gluted with the desyre of rulyng and souereinetie, commaunded Edward my brother and me to be slaine, and dispatched out of this mortall lyfe. Wherevpon that person, to whome the weightie and cruell charge was committed and geuen, to oppresse and destroy vs poore innocent infantes, the more that he abhorred this heynous and butcherly offence, the more he feared to commit it. And so waueryng in minde, and doubtfull what to do, at the length, willyng in part to saciate the bloodie thirst of the vnnaturall tyrant, and in part to abstayne from so mischieuous and detestable homicide, destroyed my brother, and preserued me, like the good priest Josada which saued little Ieas when all the children of the blood royall, were commaunded by Athalia the Queene to be slaine and biterly destroyed. And farther, to the entent that my life might be in a suretie, he appointed one to conuey me into some straunge Countrey, where when I was furthest off, and had most nede of comfort, he forsooke me sodainly (I thinke he was so appoynted to do) and left me desolate alone without friend or knowlege of any reliefe or refuge. And so king Richarde did obteyne the crowne as a pray mischieuously gotten, by the dispatchyng away of my brother and me. So that I thus escapyng, by reason of my tender infancie, forgot almost my selfe, and knewe not well what I was, but after long wandryng from Countrey to Countrey, and from Citie to Citie, I perceiued and learned a little and little what was my estate and degree, and so in conclusion came to mine awne Aunt the Lady Margaret lying in Flaunders, which was sometyme maryed to Charles Duke of Burgoyne, which

ioyfully receiued and welcommed mee, as the onely tpe and garland of her noble stirpe and linage, but forasmuch as she beyng one, y dowager of the Duchie of Burgoyne, and hauyng nothing but her dower proper vnto her selfe, was not of power to helpe me with men and munimentes of warre as she would gladly haue done for the recovery of my fathers realme and rightfull inheritaunce, I therefore am driuen to seeke farther ayde and succour. And therefore by her counsaile and aduertisement, with this small handfull of men of warre and Souldiours, I am repayzed to your presence for succours, of whome (as the publike fame is spred ouer the whole worlde) there was neuer man by wrong or iniury banished or driuen out of his Countrey, region, or inheritaunce, or by extort power and tyranny kept out of the same (as I my selfe from mine infancie haue bene) whose request was frustrate and repulled at your hande. Therefore by the maiestie of your realme and Countrey, I desyre, and heartily with prayer as I can, I beseech and exhort you to helpe & relieue me now in my extreme necessitie. And if it chaunce me by your ayde and succour to recouer and possesse my fathers realme and dignitie, not onely I, but all the kinges of our linage which hereafter shall obteyne the same, shall be so much bound vnto you, that they must nedes thinke that doyng to you all the pleasure and benefites that they can, yet with all the thanks that can be geuen, your great kindnesse can neuer be recompensed.

When he had thus sayde, the king bad him be of good comfort, and promysed him that whatsoeuer he were, it should neuer repent him of his coming to him. And after this the king assembled his counsell together, and demaunded of euery man seuerally what they sayde, of these things which Perkin had both declared and requyred, or whether they would take anye farther deliberation to aduise themselves what to doe in so great and weightie a matter. They that were of greatest experience and of the wysest sorte did proue by many apparant arguments that his sayngs were but dreames and phantasies, and of no force nor truth, and therefore they thought it not conuenient to encomber themselves with any lenger consultation. Another sort, which was not verie great, neyther of wyt nor experience, but greater in number, esteemed this matter very profitable to the common wealth, considering it ministred to them occasion to make warre in Englande. And although they had knowlege what good successe Perkin had enioyed in all his former attemptes, yet they esteemed that now all things should succede according to their expectation, if hys cause (although it were as light as a feather) were assumed and taken in hande to be defended, considering that when the warre was once open and begon, and if Perkin did preuaile, he would denie nothing conuenient to his friendes and helpers. Or else at the least they doubted not but king Henry would make to them large and ample offers and conditions of peace, rather then king James shoulde take part with his aduersary and mortall enemye.

When thys counsaile was geuen by the more number, it was well accepted, and the Scottische king, whether he were blynded by error, or else did dissimule the matter, began to haue Perkin in great honour, and caused him openly to be called Duke of Yorke. Also, that this might be more apperaunt to the people that he was so in deede, he caused Ladye Katheryn daughter to Alexander Erle of Huntley, hys nigh kinsman and of a highe linage in Scotland, to be espoused to him. And this affinitie he caused to be made for thys ende and purpose, partly that he might extenuate the euil wil and malice which was lyke to succede of this matter, for that it might be notoriously blasted and knowne abroad, that he had peace and amitie with the King of Englande, and partly lest he might be accused of to much light credence, if Perkyn were founde and proued to be another man then hee was reported.

When all things were prepared for the warre: Thys Perkyn swelling with ioye that he after his awne phantasie had made the Scottes to be hys partakers. And to the intent that they should put no diffidence in the sequele of his enterprise, and to encourage them the more, he pronounced surely that he should haue great succour and ayde of his friends in Englande, sent euen from the farthest part thereof, as soone as euer the Trumpet of warre was blown. The Scottes although they had but little confidence and lesse trust in his wordes, yet putting their hope more in the gayne of spoyle then in the gayning of the victorie by battail, armed themselves in all the hast, and marched toward the confines and borders of England. Albeit the Scottish king minding not to be to rashe, mistrusted the Engliche men knowing Perkyn to be arryued in Scotlande, had layde some armie for the defence of the frontiers, sent out certaine light horsemen to espie and searche if the husbandmen of the Countrey were assembled in armure to defende their enemies. The horsemen ranging ouer the fieldes and playnes belonging to their enemies, seing all things quiet returned to their king, and certified him that now was the tyme most apt and conuenient to invade the realme and set on the Engliche nation. Then the Scottish king marchyng toward Englande with all his myght, first proclaymed openly, that all such should onely be pardoned that would take part and submit themselves to Rycharde Duke of Yorke, and fight in his cause and quarell. And to the entent to discourage and daunt the hartes of the poore commons, so that for very feare they should be enforced and compelled to submit themselves to thys newe founde Marquet, they made so cruell and deadly warre and that not lyke men, whose nature is to be satisfied with the slaughter of men, and to be mercifull to the impotent and sick persons, bent to townes, spoyled houses and killed men and children, and delighted with the swetenesse of spoyle and prayes, wasted all the Countrey of Northumberlande, and had gone forth farther, but that they perceaued no ayde or succour to come out of England to attend vpon thys newe Duke. And the souldiours being fully laden with blood and spoyle, refused to go one foote farther at that tyme, and the Countrey rose on euery part, which made the king suspect some armie to approche. Wherefore he determined rather to returne with his assured gayne, then to carrie the newe named Dukes vnshure and vnertaine victorie, and so he returned agayne into Scotland.

It is a woerde to remember in this place of a certaine kynde of sonde mercie and foolish compassion, by the which Perkyn was so sore moued that it seemed him to regarde nothing more then the commoditie of another man. For whyle the Scottish king thus bered and harryed the poore inhabitants of the borders of Northumberland, so that nothing was heard but roying, weeping and lamenting. This newe inuented Duke beyng returned into Scotland, euen lyke himself, which wrought all thing with fraude and deceit, perceauing that no concourse nor resort of Englichmen shewed themselves in open apparance, to minister to him any ayde or succour, and fearyng not a little that the bove of hys craftie dealing, and bagge of his secret counterfeiting should be disclosed and set in an open glasse, by reason whereof he should be hated and had in contempt and disdayne of the Scottish people, as though he had bene therunto prouoked by a naturall inclination and pittie (to the intent to hide and cloke his subtil subornation) cried out openly, Oh, my stony and hard frozen hart which art not once moued nor yet afflicted with the losse and slaughter of thyne owne naturall subiectes and bassales. And at that glozious sighing, he beseeched the Scottish king that from thence forth he would not afflict and plague his people, nor defozme and deface his naturall realme and countrey with such terrible fyre, flame and hauck. As who would say, that he beyng overcome with the perfite loue of his native Region, began now to haue compassion and to lament the cruell destruction of the same. The Scottish king which began to perceauie which waye the winde blew, answered him agayne, Sir mee thinketh you take much paine, and very much imagine howe to preserue the realme of another prince which is not youres (but I thinke you would gladly haue it) but my mind giueth me that you be as farre from the obteyning of the same, as you be nere the soyle and sight of the Countrey, considering that you call Englande your land and realme, and the inhabitants thereof your people, and subiectes, and yet not one man, neyther gentleman nor yoman will once shew himselfe to ayde or assist you in the warre begon for your cause, and in your name within your realme, to the which you be both (as you say) inheritour, and by your people desired and called vnto. And so the king reprooued the lightnesse of this yong fond foundling, and euery day more and more neglected and lesse phantased and gaue credite to him, noting well and wisely that neyther his wordes, with his deedes, nor the sequele of factes with his promises were neyther agreeable nor consonant.

The Nobles inhabiting in the North partes, hearing the clamour of the common people, and perceauing that they fled to auoyde the crueltie of the Scottes, were sodainely abashed, and forfeited their holdes, and manned their fortresses readie to defend their enemies, layng embushments in the wayes, where they imagined that their enemies would resort. And without delay certified the king, of the Scottes invasion and enterprise. The king was not a little abashed at this todayne chaunce, and troubled also with his awne businesse at home, not onely fearing his outward enemies but also his awne nobles and naturall subiectes least anye of them would step from him to the other part, and put him to farther trouble and vexation. Wherefore as soone as he heard these newes, considering the matter to be of no small importance and meete to be foreseene, with all diligence prepared remedies to resist and withstande the first brunt of so great a sounge newly begon. But the todayne retrepte of the Scottes agayne asswaged all the Englichmens swift and speedy provisions: for when they were once laden with prayes and spoyles, they returned home agayne or the Engliche men could assemble together.

When the King was truly certified that the Scottish King was returned ned, he geuing praise to his capitaines and other inhabiting on the bordures of his realme, which had duly and truly serued him at that time, did stave to overtake, and to be reuenged for the malicious inuasions of the Scottische king. And yet fearing least his enemies should be encouraged with this great gaine of spoiles and prayes, he determined by dent of sword and mortall warre to reuenge and reforme the manifest iniurie and apparant wrong to him by king James and his people done and committed. Wherefoze he assembling his court of parliament, declared the cause of the instant warre, and what remedie he himselve had inuented and deuised, perswading with manie strong arguments and reasons, that it should be for the profite and benefite of the publicke & common welth to prosecute & follow the warre by his mortall enemies begon & attempted. To this opinion all his nobilitie (which were no lesse offended with this proud brag of the Scottish nation then he himselve) did willingly agree and gladly assent. And to the maintenance of the warre and toward the charges of the same, a certaine subsidey and tax of monie was with one assent by the whole parliament liberally & freely geuen and graunted: Which payment although it was but easy and small, yet many of the common people which euer abhorre suche taxes and exactions, grudged soze to pay the same.

A mutine of the people for a small tax.

At this parliament also and conuocation, ther was such certaine lawes, actes and statutes confirmed and made, as were thought most necessarie and expedient for the publicke weale of the realme. And thus the king dissolving his court of parliament, and prepared for warre out of hand. In this meane season the king of Scots not sleeping his matters because he perceaued well that the Englishmen would shortly reuenge their losse & harme, with no lesse diligence gathered an host and puyssant army, that either he might withstand and resist the English powze inuading his realme & coutry, or else offresh enter vpon the borderers: and going forth to spoyle, rob & make haucke againe. And so these two baliuant Princes minded nothing moze then the one to hurt and preiudice the other. But the king of Englande soze pricked and wounded with the iniurie to him committed, was so soze moued against the Scottish King, that he would not respite nor deferre one houre tyll he were reuenged. And so prepared a puyssant and strong armie to inuade Scotland, and therof ordayned for chieftaine Gyles Lorde Dalwency his chiefe chamberlaine, a man of no lesse wytt then pollycy and of no lesse pollicie then hardinesse.

When the Lorde Dalwency had his army assembled together and was in his iorney forward into Scotland, he sodainly was stayed and riuoked againe, by reason of a new sedicion and tumult begon within the realme of Englande for the subside which was graunted at the last parliament for the defence of the Scottes, which of the most part was truly satisfied and payde. But the Cornish men inhabiting in the least part of the realme, and the same part also barreyne and wythout all pleasantnesse, complayned and grudged greatly, affirming that they were not hable to pay such a great somme as was of them demaunded. And so what with angre, and what with sorow, forgetting their due obeysaunce, began rashly to speake of the king himselve. And after leauing the matter, lamenting, yellyng and cryng, maliciously said that the Kings counsaile was the cause of this pollyng and chauryng. And so being in this rage manaced to death the aucthoures (as they imagined) of this this mischiefe and sozrow, whome they threathned shortly to dispatche out of this world. And so being in a roare two of the same affinitie, the one called Thomas Flamock gentelma, learned in the lawes of the realme, & the other Highele Joseph a smith, men of high courages and stoute stomackes, tooke vpon them to be capitaines of this vngracious flocke and sedicious company. Who cryed out that it was a shame (for a smalle commocion made of the Scots, which was asswaged and ended in a moment) they should be exacted and polled, and such great exactions layde vpon their necks, and especially on the Cornishmen, which they affirmed to be but pooze men, and being in a barrein and vnscutefull countrey gate their liuing hardly by myning and digging tynne and mettall oute of the grounde both daye and night with great turmple and labour: And therfore they had rather dye and suffer extreme punishment, then liue in such calamitie and wretchednesse. And they layde the faulte and cause of this exaction to Ihon Morton Archebishop of Cantorburie, and to sir Reignold Bray, because they were chiefe of the Kings priue counsaile. Such rewards haue they that be in great aucthoritie with kings and princes. For if any thing proceede well according to the minde and pleasure of the communitie, that is euer referred and gratified to the king or gouernour. But contrariwise, if any thing be done, eyther by chaunce or by counsell that soundeth not well in their eares, or is contrarie to their opinion or phantasie, they will laye it straight to the counsell sayng that they haue perswaded him to doe this and that.

Thomas Flamock. Highele Joseph.

John Morton Archebishop of Cantorburie. Sir Reignold Bray.

These Capitaynes exhorted the common people to put on harnesse, and not to be ascarde to folowe them in this quarell, promising them that they should doe no dammage to any creature, but onely to see punishment and correction done to such persons which were the aucthoures and causers that the people were molested and bered with such vnrasonable exactions and demaunds. And if they perceued any person (as they espied many in deede) which did im:pygne and reprove their mad, vnrasonable and seditious counsell, affirming that it was the highest point of madnesse for a man to put his life in hazard for that thing, which he ought meeekely and humbly to require and desire of his Prince and souereigne Lorde. Then they called them dastardes, fooles, and cowardes, and taunted and rebuked them with most shamefull reproches. So these vnhappie Capitaynes nothing moze desired then to bring their flock and themselves to finall perdition and bitter confusion. With these bragges and mocions a great part of the people were eleuate and encouraged, and condiscended to doe as the Capitaynes and the most of the multitude would agree and appoynt. Then the Capitaynes praysing much the hardynesse of the people, when all things were prepared meete for their vnforsunate iourney, set forward with their armie, and came to Tawnton, where they slue the Drouost of Deryn which was one of the Commissioners of the subside, and from thence came to Welles, and so intended to go to London where the king then sojourned.

When the king was aduertised by his Collectors and officers of al these doings and attemptes, he was maruellously astonnyed, & especially because at that one time he was enuyroned with double warre, both externe and intestyne. And because perill did depende on both, he was in great doubt which of both he should most regarde. And as he was musing of this matter he was assertheyned that James Twichet Lord Audelay and dyuers other of the Nobilitie were associate with the Cornishemen, and were in great haste and no good speede marchyng toward London. The king perceaving the cruile warre to appoche and drawe neerer and neerer, almost to his verye Gates, determined with all hys whole powre to resist and represse the same. And after that tumult appeased and suppressed he would with all expedition set vpon Scotlande. Wherefore he reuoked agayne the Lord Dabobeny, which as you haue heard, was with a puyssaunt armie goyng into Scotlande, whose armie he increased and multiplyed with many picked and freshe warryers, that he might the better, and with lesse labor overcome these rebels. Also mistrusting that the Scottes might now (hauing good oportunitie seyng him troubled with this ciuile discorde) invade the realme agayne, and so spoyle and destroy the borderers, he appointed the Lord Thomas Haward Erle of Surrey, a puyssaunt and pollitique Capitayne (which was taken prisoner at the ouerthrow of king Rycharde as you haue heard, and after set at libertie, and within two yeres next after was made high Treasurer of England, after the death of John Lord Dynham) to gather a bande of men in the Countye Palantine of Durham, and they with the ayde and helpe of the inhabitants adioyning and the borderers, to driue out and expell the Scottes from of the borders, if they should fortune agayne to invade, buttill such time that the Cornishmen were subdued and pacified (which he thought easie to be done) he might sende to them the foresayde Lord Dabobeny agayne with all his power and armie. When the Nobles of the realme heard of this tumultuous businesse and commocion, they came to London, euery man with as many men of warre as they could put in a readynesse to ayde the king if neede should be: In the which company, there was the Erle of Essex, the Lord Hongey with diuers other.

At this time and season, Charles the French king returning from the warres that he had at Naples, sent Ambassadors to enforme the king of the prosperous successe and victorie that he had obteyned in Italie, and gaue to them in charge to desyre of the king of England nothing so much as the continuance of his amitie and fauour towarde their maister and soueraigne Lord. For the French king sore desired to continue in perfite peace and amitie with the king of Englande. And not without a cause, for he had sobered and combred himselfe and his people with suche Italian snares and craftie engines, out of the which at this day his successors can not cleane be ryd, and deliuered.

When the king was informed that king Charles Ambassadors were come to Calice, he sent certaine of his Nobilitie, honourably to receyue them, and so to conuey them to Douer, and there for a pollicie to make their abode till the rebellion were extinct and suppressed, and not one worde thereof to be sounded in the eares of the Ambassadors: which commaundement was circumspectly kept and obserued.

And now the Cornishe men departyng from Welles (where they receyued theyr chiefe Capitaine, James Lord Audelay) went to Salisbury and from thence to Winchester, and so to Kent, where they looked for helpe, but they were deceaued: for the Erle of Kent, George Lord of Burgany, John Brooke Lord Cobham, Sir Edward Bowynge, Sir Rycharde

Guldeford, Sir Thomas Burchier, John Beche, William Scot, and a great number of people were not onely prest and redie to defende the Countre from all mischief and destruction, but also bent and determined to fight and combate with such as would not be obedient to their naturall soueraigne Lord, and to his lawes and preceptes. Also the Kentishe men themselves, partly remembring that other cominocions haue bene to their damage and great hinderance, and partly beyng vnder the defence of their nobilitie, as vnder the Erle and other, would not so much as come nere to the rebelles, nor yett eyther make countenance or once speake to any of them, to the entent that the king should in no wise conceyue any poynt of vntyruth or treason in the poozest of them. Which thing so daunted and dismayed the heartes and courages of many of the brute and rurall Cornishemen (which seyng themselves deceyued and defrauded of their chiefe hope and succours, and fearing the euill chaunce that might happen to them) that they to saue themselves fled priuily in the night from their awne companie and Companions. The Capitaynes of the rebelles perceiuyng that they could haue no ayde of the Kentishe people, puttyng their onely hope to theyr awne power and fortitude (for surely they were men of great strength, and of no lesse force than balaunt courage) brought them to blacke heath foure myles from London, and there in a plaine vpon the toppe of an hill they ordered their battailes, eyther redie to fight with the king if he would assaile them, or else to assault and beat the Citie of London: For they thought verily that the king was so affrayed of theyr puyssaunce, that he minded nothing lesse then to encounter with their armie. And therefore beyng enflamed with arrogancie, nothyng mistrustyng, but firmly beleuyng that the victorie was sure in their handes, they determined to enter into the Citie of London and to assault the Tower, wherein the king (as they thought) had priuily enclosed himselfe. But king Henry wrought cleane contrary to their minde, for he neuer thought to geue them battaile till he had them farre from their dwellynges and Countre, so that they should be out of all hope, of ayde and comfort. And when they were with their long and tedious iourney weryed and tyred, and that their furye were somewhat asswaged and fell to repentaunce of their mad commocion, and frantike progression, then he would in some place conuenient for his purpose compasse and enclose them to his aduantage and their destruction as he did in dede afterward. In the meane season there was great feare throughout the Citie, and cryes were made, euery man to harnesse, to harnesse, some ranne to the gates, other mounted on the walles, so that no part was vndefended, and continuall watch was kept by the Maiestrates of the City, least the rebelles beyng pooze and nedie would dissende from their campe, and invade the Citie, and spoyle and robbe the ryches and substance of the Marchauntes. But the king deliuered and purged their hartes out of this feare, for after that he perceyued that the Cornishe men were al the day readie to fight and that vpon the hill, he sent straight John Erle of Oxforde, Henry Burchier Erle of Essex, Edmond de la Poole Erle of Suffolke, and Sir Ryes ap Thomas, and sir Humfrey Stanley noble warriours, with a great company of archers and horsemen to compasse the hill on the right syde & on the left, to the entent that all by wayes beyng stopped and forclosed, all hope of flight should be taken from them: and incontinent, he beyng as well encouraged couraged with manly stomacke and desyre to fight, as furnished with a populous armie, and store of artillary, set forward out of the Citie and encamped him in Saint Georges fiede, where he the fryday at night then lodged.

On the Saterdag in the moynng, he sent the Lorde Babobney wyth a great companie to set on them earlye in the moynng, which first gat the bridge at Detford Straunde which was manfully defended by certeyne Archers of the rebelles, whose arrowes as is reported were in length a full yeard. While the Erles set on them on euery syde, the Lorde Babobney came into the field with his companie, and without long fighting the Cornishe men were ouercome, but first they tooke the Lorde Babobney prisoner, and whether it were for feare or for hope of fauour, they let him go at libertie without any hurt or detriment. There were slaine of the rebelles which fought and resisted two thousande men and mo, and taken prisoners an infinite number, and amongest them the blacke Smith and chiefe Capitaynes which shortly after were put to death. This Highell Joseph, surnamed the blacke Smith one of the Capitaynes of this donghill, and draffe sacked ruffians, was of such stowte stomacke and haute courage, that at the same time that he was drawen on the Hardle towarde his death, he sayd (as men do report) for that mischionous and ungracious act, he should haue a name perpetuall, and a fame permanent and immortall. So (you may perceyue) that desyre of vaine glozy and fame, enflameth, and encourageth a swel poore and meane persons, as the heartes of great Lordes and puyssaunt Princes to trauayle and aspire to the same. Some affirme that the king appointed to fight with the rebelles on the Monday, and preuenting the tyme by pollicie, set on them vpon the Saterdag before, beyng vnprovidid and in no array of battaile, and so by that pollicie obteyned the field and victoery.

When this battaile was ended, the king wanted but thre hundred of al his companie that were slaine at that present conflict. Also the Capitaynes apprehended and taken he pardoned, sayng the chiefe Capitaynes and first aucthours of that mischiese, to whome he woulde neyther shewe mercie nor lenitye. For he caused the Lorde Audeley to be drawen from Redegate to the Tower hill in a Cote of his awne armes painted vpon paper, reuerfed and a l to tozne, and there to be behedded, the. xxiiij. day of June. And Thomas Flamock, and Highell Joseph he commaunded after the fashon of traytors to be drawen, hanged, and quartered, and their quarters to be pitched on stakes and set vp in diuers places of Coznewall, that their sore punishments and terrible executions for their trayterous attempts and foolish hardie enterprises, might be a warnyng for other hereafter to abstayne from committing lyke cryme and offence. But because he was certified that their Countreimen beyng at home in Coznewall were by this scourge little mollified or quieted, and were redie to moue againe and begynne newe commocions and conspiracies, if any ungracious or euill minded person woulde eyther moue or picke them forward, he turned his purpose, and caused them to be set vp in London and other places, least that by such meanes he should brayp himselfe in more trouble at that tyme when he went about with all his wit and counsaile to repressle and asswage all domesticall and ciuill sedecion, to the entent that he might the more seriously and intentiuely set forward a puyssaunt army agaynst the bragging and unfaithfull Scottes, beyng content at that

While this businesse was thus handled in England, the king of Scottes beyng certified of it by his espialles, that there was none armie raysed in England, eyther to withstand his power or destroy his Countre, and hering also that king Henrie and his Nobles were bered and sore troubled with the commocion of the Cornishe men, and in a ciuile disorde and dissention amongest themselues: Wherefore he thought it necessarye to anticipate the warre before hande. For well he knew, that assoone as king Henry had subdued and ouerturned his aduersaryes, that he would with his whole puyssaunce inuade his Realme and dominions: And therefore he inuaded the frontiers of the realme of Englande, wastying the Countre, burning the townes and murtheryng the people, sparyng neyther place nor person. And while his light horsemen were ridyng to forage, and destroy the Bishoprike of Durham, and there burned all about, he with another companie went about to assault the Castell of Norham standyng on the riuer of Tweede, which deuideth England and Scotland. The Bishop of Durham which at that tyme was Richard Fore, had well furnished it both with men & munitions, wisely foreseeing and imagining, that the Scottissh king (as sone as he knew that there was ciuile disorde and vnaturall warre moued within the realme of Englande) would with all his power inuade and harry the borders and countries adioinyng to his land. This Richard Fore was before called Bishop of Ercester, and for his singuler vertues and great grauitie was after that made Bishop of Bath and Welles, and last of all, promoted and exalted to the Bishoprike of Durham.

The Bishop from tyme to tyme aduertised the king of all thinges that there chaunced (which then was at London) and sent in all post hast to the Erle of Surrey to come to rescue, which was then in Yorkeshire and had collected a great army and a warlike company. When the Erle heard of these newes, he perceiuyng that all thinges were not boyde of ieopardie, made no long taryng, but with all diligence marched forward, and after him folowed other noble men out of all quarters of the North, euery one bringyng as many as they could gather for the defence of their naturall Countre and Region. and pollicies of warre and baliuant courage, they were to them in all feates equiualent. The number was little lesse then twentie thousande men, beside the Spanic whereof the Lorde Brooke was Admirall.

When the Scottes had dyuers dayes assailed and beaten the Castell of Roxham, to the no lytle detriment and dammage therof, and could make no battie to enter into the same, they determined of their owne minde to raise their siege and returne, and that so much the soner because they heard saye that the Erle of Surrey was within two dayes iourney of them with a great puyssaunce. Wherefore king Jany thought it to small purpose to tarie any lenger in besieging the Castell, rased his siege and returned into hys owne realme: When the Erle knewe of the kinges returne, he folowed after wyth all haste possible, trustyng surely to ouertake hym and to geue hym battayle.

When the Erle was entred into Scotland, he overthrewe and defaced the Castell of Cawdrestones, the towre of Hetenhall, the towre of Edington, the towre of Fuiden: and he sent Roxrey king at armes to the Capitayne of Hayton Castell, which was one of the strongest places betweene Berwyke and Edenborough to deliuer him the Castell, which he denied to doe, affirming that he was sure of speedie succours and swift aide. The Erle perceauing the deniall, layde his ordinaunce to the Castell, and continually bet it from two of the clock in the morning till fiue at night, in such wise that they within rendered by the fortreffe, their luyes onely saued. And when the Erle had receyued the Scottes, he with his miners rased and overthrewe the Castell to the playne grounde. The Scottishe king was within a myle of the siege, and both knewe it and sawe the smoke, and yet would not once set a foote forwarde to saue or rescue his Castell. And while the Erle laye at Hayton, the king of Scottes sent to him Marchemount, and another Heralde, desyryng him at his choyse eyther to fight with whole puyssaunce agaynst puyssaunce, or else they two to fight person to person, and hande to hande, requiring that if the victorie should fall to the Scottishe king, that then the Erle should deliuer for his raunsome the towne of Berwyke, with the fyfthgarthes of the same. The Erle ioyously, lyke a couragious Capytayne receyued this message and made aunswere, that he was readie in the playne fielde to abide the battayle with his whole armye, prayng him to come forward with hys puyssaunce, and after that he thanked him hartly of the honour that he offered him, for surely he thought himselfe much honored that so Noble a Prince would bouchsafe to admit so pooze an Erle to fight with him body to body, asserteyning him farther that the towne of Berwyke was the king his maisters and not his, & which he neither ought nor would lare to pledge nor gage without the kings assent, but he would put his body in pledge which was more precious to him then all the townes of the world, promising on his honour, that if he tooke the king prisoner in the singuler Combate, that he would release to him all his part of his fine and raunsome, and if it chanced the king to banquish and apprehende him, he would pay gladly such a raunsome as was meete and conuenient for the degree of an Erle. And when he had rewarded and dismissed the Heralds, he set his armie in a readynesse, abidyng the comming of the king of Scots, and so stood all daye. But the Scottishe king not regarding his offers, nor performing his his great crakes and boastes, beyng afrayde to cope with the Englishe nation, shamefully and sodeynly fled in the night season with all his power and company. When the Erle knewe that the king was returned, and had bene in Scotland sixe or seuen dayes, beyng daylie and nightly vexed with continuall winde and vnrmeasureable rayne, could not cause his people to continue in that tempestuous and vnfertyle and barren region, with good aduise retreated agayne with his whole armie to the towne of Berwyke, and there dispersed his armie euery man into hys Countrie, taryng there himselfe till he knewe the pleasure of the king in furthering or protracting the warres of Scotlande: But in the meane season one Peter Hyalas a man of no lesse learning then prudent wyt and pregnant pollicie, was sent Ambassadour from Ferdinand King of Spayne, vnto the King of Scottes, to mooue and entreate a peace and an vntie to be had betwene him and the King of Englande. For of King Ferdinand and Elizabeth his wife (to which woman none other was comparable in her time) there was nothing more desired nor wished then by the coniunction of marriage betwene Arthur Prince of Wales heyr apparant to King Henry, and Lady Katheryn the daughter of King Ferdynand and Quene Elizabeth a new affinity and alyuance might be knyt and begon betwene the realme of England & the Countrie of Spaine. And also he fauoured somewhat the King of Scottes, for which cause he offered himselfe as a meane and mediatour of a peace betwene both the princes, their territories and dominions.

This Peter Hyalas solicited and moued by all honest meanes and deuises kyng James to assent to a vntie and concord: and when with long solliciting he conceaued some good hope to growe in this vaightie busynesse hee wrote vnto the King of Englande, that it would please him to sende one of his Nobilitie or counsell to be associat with him in concluding with the Scottishe King. The King of England which euer (so it were not to his dishonour, hurt or detriment) was not only a louer of peace, but also a noysher, and a furtherer of amitie and quietnesse, and especially at this time when he was vexed with the civile sedition of his owne proper sheepe and flock, committed the charge of this weyghty matter to Richarde Fore Bishop of Durham, which laye on the Englishe borders in his castell of Roxham. The Bishop according to the kinges apoyntement went honorablye into Scotland, where he and Peter Hyalas at the towne of Jedwoorth reasoned with the Scottishe commissioners as concerning this peace to be had. Sixe hundred conditions were purposed on the one part & the other, but after long protracting of time & much debating and arguing, not one was accepted nor allowed, and one thing aboue all other dashed the whole treatie: For King Henrie instantly required to haue Perkin Warbeck the fountaine and chiefe cause of all this tumulte and vnquietnesse, the perturbur of hym and his whole realme: But the King of Scottes firmlye denied to consent to any article that might founde to his reproch or dishonour: And also now he beganne to smell and saoure the iuggeling and false counterfering of his new gest Perkin Warbeck: Yet because that Perkin was alied to him by matrimony, he thought it both vn honest, vnreasonable and vn naturall to betray his alie, and deliuer him to death and confusion. Wherefore when they had reasoned the matter and diuers other vrgent and weyghtie causes by diuers dayes of meeting, and that for the contrarietie of opinyons, no firme peace coulde be concluded. In stede of peace a truce was concluded for certayne yeres vpon condicion that James King of Scottes should conuey Perkyne Warbeck out of hys realme, seignories and dominions.

While these things were reasoned and at the last concluded in the confines of England and Scotlande, king Henry caused the Ambassadors of the french king, to be brought to his presence, and he them receiued with all benignitie, which as it is shewed before were stopped at Douer of their iourney vntill such time as the insurrection of the Cornishmen were suppressed and extinguished. And with lyke entertaynement he embraced at the same very season the Lorde of Camphire & other Ambassadors of Philip Archduke of Austrich and Duke of Burgoyne, comming to hym for the conclusion and continuance of an amitie, and to haue the English marchants to resort to their countrie agayne, which from thence before were prohibited and forbidden. Whych request being verie agreable to the quietnesse and tranquillity of his realme, and especially at that time, he did fauorably graunt and benignly assent vnto. And so being confederate & ayded by treaty & league with all his neighbors marchyng on euery side of his realmes and regions, he gratified with his most hartie thanks kyng Ferdynand and the Queene his wife, for they were the mediators, organes & instruments by the which the truce was concluded betwene the Scottissh kyng and hym, and rewarded Peter the ambassadour liberally and bountifullly.

So the Englishmen resorted agayne into the Archdukes Dominions and were receiued into Andwarp wyth generall procession, so glad was the Towne of their returning, which was by theyr absence sore hyndered and impouerished, at the time that this vnitie and concord was made, which was the yeare of oure Lorde a thousand foure hundred .xcviij. and the .xiiij. yeare of kyng Henries reigne.

James king of Scottes perceauing now that he was by Perkyne manifestly deluded, according as he had faythfully promised, so he now duly performed it. For he calling to his presence the foresayde Perkyne Warbecke, declaring to hym what benefites & commodities he had receiued of his princely liberalitie and gentillesse, gently required hym to depart out of the realme into some other countrie where he might make his abode more surely and more quietly, vntill such time as fortune would provide a more prosperous wind to set forward the sayles of his purpose and desyre, declaring vnto hym that he compelled in maner by necessitie had concluded a league and concord with the king of England, and by the treatie, the refuge that he should haue had of hym and hys countrey, was not onely to hym prohibited and forbidden, but also it was agreed and condiscended that neither the king of Scottes, nor any by his procurement or in his name should make warre on the kyng of England, which war he gladly tooke in hand for Perkyns sake, hauing sure confidence and perfite trust to haue bene ayded and assisted with Perkyns friendes in England. But when he perceued that all was in hayne, and that all his wordes were but wynd, he exhorted hym not to be displeased to depart, least his taryng might be to hym a detriment and a breakyng of the treatie betwene hym and kyng Henrie lately concluded: wherfore with many sayre wordes, wordes he desired hym to depart. This Perkyne knowyng the kings pleasure was very sore amased, seing there was no helpe to be looked for hereafter in Scotlande. Albeit remembryng the great benefytes which he had receaued heretofore of the Scottissh kyng, which he thought him selfe neuer hable to requyte and deserue, that he might not seme to hym ingrate or not willing to follow hys desire, he was content at his intercession to depart. And shortly after sayled into Irelande wyth hys wyfe and familie, there determining with him selfe eyther to sayle into fflaunders to the Duches of Burgoyne, or to ioyne and take part with the Cornishmen. But how so euer it was, while he laye in Irelande doubtyng what to do, he had intelligence by certayne messengers that the Cornishmen for all their discomfiture and plague not to be appeased, but sore to grudge and murmure against king Henry, and that they were prone and ready to renew the warre agaynst the King and the Prince: where he not entending to forsake so sayre an occasion so manifestly offered, he hauing with hym foure small shippes and not aboue syr skore men, sayled into Coznewalle and there landed in the moneth of September and came to a towne called Bodman, and their did so solicit, prouoke, & styre the mutable and wauering people, what with sayre wordes and large promises, that he gathered to hym aboue thre thousand persons, which immediatly called hym their Capitayne, and sayde that they would take his part and follow hym to the death, and in all things obey his preceptes and commaundements.

A peace and treatie of the entrecourte concluded betwene the house of Austrich and Burgoyne with King Henry the seventh for the free trafique into the lowe Countries.

Then Perkyne was well encouraged and made proclamations in the name of kyng Richard the fourth as sonne to kyng Edward that last dyed. And by the aduise of his thre counsellers, John Heron mercer a banquerupt, Richard Stelton a Tailer and John Asteley a Skreener, men of more dishonesty then of honest estimation, determined first of all to assault and beate all walled & strong townes and fortresses, & them to receiue into his possession and seignorie for his farther securitie and defence: And that enterprize achieved, then he would augment hys hoste and marche forward against all persons that durst once offer themselves to withstand hym.

When he & his imprudent counsaile were fully resolved on this point and conclusion, they in good order went straight to Crester, which was the next City that he could approach to, and besieged it, & because he lacked ordinaunce to make a battery to rase & deface the walles, he studied all the waies possible how to breake and infringe the gates, and what with casting of stones, heauing with yron barres & kyndling of fire vnder the gates, he omitted nothing that could be deuised for the furtheraunce of his vngacious purpose. The Citizens perceauing their towne to be inuironed with enemies & like to be enflamed, began at the first to be sore abashed, and let certayne messengers by cordes downe ouer the wall which should certefie the kyng of all their necessitie and trouble. But after that, takyng to them lusty hartes and manly courages they determined to repulse fyre by fire, & caused faggots to be brought to the inwarde part of the portes and posterns and set them all on fire, to the entent that the fire being enflamed on both the sydes of the gates, might aswell exclude their enemies from entering, as include the Citizens from running or flyng out, and that they in the meane season might make trenches and rampyres to defend their enemies in stede of gates and Bulwarkes. Thus all the ddings and attempts of the rebellious people had euill successe in their first enterprise: and thus by fire the Citie was preserved from flame and burning. Then Perkyne being of necessity compelled to leave the gates, assaulted the Towne in divers weak and unfortified places, and set by ladders, attempting to climb over the walles and to take the Citie, thynkyng surely to compell the Citezens eyther by feare or for lack of succour to render themselves and yeeld the towne. But the Citezens being nothing so mynded, so couragiously lyke balaunt champions defended the walles, that they slue about two hundred of his sedicious soldiours at this assault.

As soone as the messengers of Excester came to the Kyngs presence and shewed their instructions, he hastened with his host toward Excester with as much hast as the grauntie of the cause did require. And sent the Lorde Dabobene with light horsemen before to certefie all men of hys comming at hand. But in the meane season Lord Edward Courteney Earle of Deuonshire and Lorde William his sorne, a man of great force and balauntnesse, accompanied with s<sup>r</sup> Edmond Carew, s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Trenchard, s<sup>r</sup> William Courteney, s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Fulforde, s<sup>r</sup> John Halewell, s<sup>r</sup> John Croker, Water Courteney, Peter Egcombe, William Sentuaure, with all speede came into the Citie of Excester and holpe the Citezens, and at the last assault the Earle was hurt in the arme with an arowe, and so were many of hys company, but berye fewe slayne.

Excester.

When Perkyne with his lewde capytaynes saw that the Citie of Excester was so well fortified both with men and munitions, and that in manner impregnable, fearing the sequell of this matter, departed from Excester with his lorde's armie to the next great towne called Tabnton, and there the twenty daye of September he mustered his men as though he were readie to fight: but his number were sore diminished. For when the poze and neede people saw the great defence which was made at Excester, and that no man of honour nor yet of honestie drew to hym, contrarie to the promysse and assurance, made by hym and hys counsaylers to them at the begynnyng, they withdrew themselves by sundry secreete companies from hym, in providing their owne sauegard. Which thing when Perkyne perceived, he put small trust & lesse confidence in the remnant of his army, as afterward it did aperce because the most part of hys souldiers were harnessed on the right arme and naked all the body and neuer exercised in warre nor marciall feates but only with the spade and houell.

Perkyne be-
ton.

When the king heard he was gone to Tabnton, he hastened after him with all speede. Thether came to the king, Edward Duke of Buckingham, a yong Prince of a great courage & of a singuler good wit, and him folowed a great companie of noble men, knightes, and Esquiers, prepared and redie with all thinges necessary for the fielde and battaile. Amongest which number was Sir Alexander Baynam, Sir Hawrice Barkeley, Sir Robert Cam, Sir John Guise, Sir Robert Doyntz, Sir Henry Vernon, Sir John Mortimer, Sir Thomas Tremayle, Sir Edward Sutton, Sir Amise Pabulet, Sir John Bickenell, Sir John Sapcotes, Sir Hugh Luttrell, Sir Frannces Chepney, and many other knightes, Esquiers and balaunt personages. When the king approached nere the towne of Tabnton, whether he would not deferre and put off the battaile, or whether he doubtyng the turne of fortunes whele, sent before hym Robert Lord Brooke lord
Steward

Steward of his house, Gyles Lorde Dabobene his chiefe Chamberleyn, and sir Rice ap Thomas, to set on his enemies, and begin the battaile, and he with his power folowed, to the entent that when the armyes coped and ioyned together, he eyther should with newe succours refrethe his awne army, or else set on the backe of his enemies or they could espie him. Albeit the king had no great neede to vse such pollicie if he had knowen what sequele had ensued. For as soone as Perkyne was enformed that his enemyes were redie to geue him battaile, he that nothing lesse minded then to fight in open field with the kinges puppsaunce, dissimuled all the day tyme with his company, as though nothing could make him afeard, and about midnight being accompanied with .lx. horsemen, departed from Tabnton in poste to a Sanctuary towne besyde Southhampton called Swodeley, and there hee and John Heron, and other registred themselves as persons privileged. But whether Perkyne did this for feare, least his men should forsake hym, or for the cowardnesse of his awne timorous courage, it is as much vncertaine, as it is probable and sure, that the king tooke by his flight great comoditie and quietnesse, by reason that he was not enforced to fight with the Cornish men, whose heartes and courages were so increased and enflamed by deadly desperation that they earnestly determined and were stedfastly bent either to winne victorie and ouercome their enemies, or else not one of them all to liue any day or houre longer.

Perkyne fleth
Sanctuary
at Swodeley.

When king Henry knewe that Perkyne was fled and departed, he sent after him the Lorde Dabobene, with siue hundred horsemen toward the sea syde to stay him before he should come there. But Perkyne whome the matter touched at the quick, made such hast with the swiftnesse of his horse, and sharpenesse of his spurres, that he was so farre passed on his way before, that no person coude tell tidynges of him, before he registred and disclosed himselfe in the Sanctuarie. But his chiefe Capitaynes which fled, could not so craftily escape, for the most part of them were apprehended, and as captives and wretches miserably presented to the king. When the residue of the common people could neyther see Perkyne nor yet the Standards nor guidehomes of their Capitaynes, not knowing where he was become, doubtyng whether he were fraudulently slaine, or fearefully fled, wist not what counsell to aske or what way was most surest to follow and take. But when they were ascertayned of his most shamefull flight, euerye person oppressed with this common mischiefe, common feare, and common perill, castyng away their armure, submitted themselves to the king, holdyng by their handes in asking mercy, offeryng and promisyng hym, fayth, loyaltie and obeyssaunce. To whome the king of most gentle heart and lenitie, not onely graunted pardon but receyued them to his fauour. And so the king being a conquerour without manslaughter or effusion of christian blood, roade triumphantly into the Citie of Excester, and there not onely lauded and praysed the Citezens of Excester, but also rendered to them his most hartie thanks, as well for their dueties done, as for their balauntnesse. And there also he afflicted and put in execution diuers Cornish men which were the authours and stirrers by of this newe insurrection and false conspiracie.

The horsemen that were sent, without any stop or stay, in short space came to Saint Highelles mount, and there (as chauce was) found Lady
M m m . ii. Katheryn

Katheryn Cowden wyfe to Perkyne, and brought her straght lyke a bonde woman and captiue to the king. And the king wonderynge at her beauty and amiable countenance, thought her a pray more mete for the chiefe capitaine then for the meane Souldiours, began then a litle to phantasie her person, and sent her incontinently, accompanied with a goodly sort of sad matrones and gentlewomen (because she was but a yong woman) to London to the Queene as a true and bndoubted token of his triumph and victoꝛye. And while he reposed himselfe at Excester, he iudged that he had nothing wonne, nor yet plucked by the roote of this sedicious rebellion, except he coulde get into his possession the chiefe hed and type of thys pestiferous faction and businesse. Wherefoꝛe he emironed the Sanctuary which Perkyne was in, rounde about with two companies of light horsmen, wise and discrete persons, to the entent to bereue and plucke from Perkyne all hope of flight and escappynge away. And after that, he attempted thys yong fondlyng by trustye and polittique messengers, if he hauynge pardon and remission of all mischieuous and heynous offences by him done agaynst the king and his Realme, would gladly submit himselfe to the king, and be to him faythfull true and obedient. Perkyne beyng nowe destitute of all hope, saylynge of his dwellyng place, and lackynge comfort, ayde, and refuge, considerynge that he was now brought to the very poynt and pꝛicke of extremitie, that he wist not how nor whether to flie into any Countrie for succour, and also he was in bitter dyspayre to haue hereafter any prosperous chaunce, or fortunate successe in his enterpryse, because he had so often attempted, and so manye tymes had bene foyled and banquished, wherfoꝛe he hauynge his pardon to him offered, and trustynge to the open promise of men, of his awne will frankly and freely departed out of Sanctuary and committed himselfe to the kinges pleasure, and so by this meanes this great heate was quenched and appeased.

Perkyne submitted himselfe to the King.

Then was the king very glad that this warre was ended, and tooke his iourney immediately toward London, not without a great concourse of people meetynge him out of euery quarter to see this Perkyne as he were a Monster, because he beyng an alpen of no abilitie by his pooꝛe parentes (although it was otherwise talked and dissimuled) durst once invade so noble a realme, and it to infect with such lyes and leasynge. And chiefly of all that he by hys craftie subornations had perswaded diuerse aswell noble as ignoble (not without the confusion and bndoyng of many of them) to beleue and say that he was the very same person that he feyned and paynted himselfe to be. But when the king was come to London, he appoynted certayne keepers to attend on him which should not (the bredth of a nayle) go from his person, to the entent that he might neyther conuey himselfe out of the lande, nor flie any where, nor yet prouoked and prouered by other, should be able to soꝛue agayne no newe sedition nor sedicious tumult within his realme and countries.

Keepers were appointed to looke to Perkyne.

When these tydings came to the Ladye Margaret in Flaunders that Perkyne her deere darling had no good luck but losse, both of his enterpryse and her great studious furtheraunce, and was brought into captiuitie, shee was not weil pleased with them, but wept and lamented hys unluckie speede, and cursed her infortunat chaunce.

When these things were brought to passe according to the kings minde, he did not forget that there was not a more delectable and pleasaunt thing, nor a larger reyne of mischiefe geuen to the bu'gare people, then to haue a sure hope and trust that they may offende without any punishment or correction: Wherefoꝛe to the intent hereafter to obserue his people in due obedience and subiection, he shortly caused inquryes to be made of dyuers offences. Wherupon diuers persons as well in Sommersetshire as Deuonshire were accused and presented that they had ayded both wyth men and money the Cornish Traytoꝛs, not only after their discomfiture in returning homeward, but also in their marching forward, entending to make battayle against the king being their soveraigne and liege Lord. All which offenders he determined to plague and scourge according to the quantity of their crime and offence, with great fines and sore assessments. And theretoꝛe he committed this charge to Thomas Lorde Darcie, to Amis Paulet knight, and Robert Sherborne Beane of Paules, after Bishop of Chichester.

Commissioners Thomas Lorde Darcy Amis Paulet knight, Robert Sherborne Beane of Paules.

These Commissioners lyke a whirlewande tossed and pierced the Counters and substance of all the inhabitants of both the Countries, to the intent that no person being embꝛued or spotted with the yuke of that abominable crime, should escape the payne which he worthily had deserued: but they were gentle and remisse to a great number, and specially to such as offended by coercion and feare, rather then of malicious heart or enuious minde. Yet were they to none so fauourable but they were thought for their defaultes worthy of some punishment, so that equitie therein was very well and iustly executed.

In this yere a sodayne chaunce, ye a thing of no moment nor worthy to be regarded had almost so kindled agayne the olde displeasure and grudge betweene king Henry and king James of Scotlande, that they could scarce kepe their hands, and bꝛidle their courages from warre and fighting. The first motion of this displeasure was thus: Certayne yong men of the Scots came armed into Roxham Castell, and beheld it wonderous circumspectly, as though they had bene desirous to knowe what was done there within: But when the keepers of the Castell could not perceiue any hostilitie or damage towardes them or theirs, and seynge them departhe of their awne accord, determined it not conuenient to moue any question to them nor once to stirre out. But when they came agayne the next daye and bꝛiewed it likewise, the keepers of the sayde Castell suspecting some fraude to lurk in their looking, demaunded of them what was their intent, & why they bꝛiewed and aduised so the Castell. The Scottes euen lyke themselves, answered them proudly and rustically with many disdeynfull wordes. Insomuch that after their blustering and blowynge answers made, the Englishmen beyng vexed and moued therewithall, replied to them with hard and manly strokes, and after many a sore blowe geuen and taken on both partes, and diuers Scottes wounded and some slayne, the Scottes oppressed with the multitude of the English people, fled as fast as their horses would carie them. When they came home and certefied the king of the same, he was therewith sore moued and angry, and sware by sweete Saint Ninian there was nothing to him more inconstant and vnstedfast then the obseruyng of the league by the king of Englande, and sent worde thereof to king Henry in all haste by Marchmount his Herault.

quyet tranquillitie and perfite loue and amitie with all Princes beyng hys neyghbours and borderers, to the intent that he myght lyue in his latter dayes in an honest and quyet lyfe after so many labours and berations euen from his infancie drawen and exercised in, made him aunswere that it was not done through his default, neither by his counsell nor knowledge, but rather by the rashe folly of the keepers of the Castell, requiring him for that cause not to thinke the league infringed, promising in the worde of a king to enquire of the truth, and who were the malefactours. And if the offence were founde to be begon on the partie of the keepers of the Castell, he assured him that they should for no meede or fauour escape paine and punishment. This aunswere although it were moze then reasonable, could not mitigate or asswage the Scots anger and outrageousnesse, for the which cause Rycharde Byshop of Durham, which was moze heauie then all other because that this discorde was reneued agayne betwene these two Princes by occasion of Castell keepers, he therfore thought it best first to asswage and coole the furious rage of the Scottishe king, and wrote manye letters to hym, requiring him of peace and vnitie. The king perceauing both the good will and constant grauitie of the Bishop, appraied his furie and answered gently to the Byshops letters by wytyng agayne to him, sayng, that because he had many secret and priuy things in his mind which he would communicate onely with him touching the cause now in barpaunce, he therfore required him to take paine to come into his Countrey, trusting that he should thinke his labour well bestowed. The Byshop was very glad and sent worde to the king his maister, of king James desire, who esteemed the request and cause both iust and reasonable, and therfore willed him to accomplish the Scottishe kings honest desire.

When he came into Scotland, he was receyued with all humanitie that could be thought of the king himself at an Abbey called Helrose. And there, after that the king for a countenance had complayned muche of the cruelty and slaughter that was vsed towardes his men late at Roxham, he easily remitted the offence and pardoned it, and began secretly to common without any witnesses or arbiters nere hande with the Byshop alone. And first declared to him what olde and iust causes haue moued him before this, to seeke alyuance and amitie with king Henry, which now he desired much moze to haue confirmed and corroborate for the farther maintenaunce of loue and increase of friendship, which thing he doubted not, but should sozte to a fortunate effect and good conclusion, if the king of England would vouchsafe to geue to him in matrimony his first begotten daughter the Lady Margaret, vpon which point he determined not long agone to sende hys Ambassadors into England, which thing he would the soner doe if he knew this Byshops minde and intent readie to further his louing purpose. The Bishop aunswere red but fewe wordes, sayng that when he were returned to the king hys maister, he would doe the best in the matter that laye in his power. Which words animated much the king, and put him in good hope to sende his Ambassadors to the king of Englande to sue for the sayde matrimonie to be concluded.

Ladye Margaret eldest daughter to king Henry the seventh.

When the Bishop had taken his leaue, and was come to the king, he declared to him in order all the communication betwene king James and him.

This request pleased the king very much, to whom peace was euer a soueraigne medicine, and determined surely to minister occasion of warre to no man, nor would haue any Prince to prouoke him to the same.

Now began the fatall daye of the death of Berkyn Warbeck, and Edward erle of Warwicke to appoche: For after this fact done and committed, one fierce and strong waue deuoured and swallowed both their lyues not long a sinder, as you shall heare by the continuation of this storie. Berkyn, whether it grieued him to be kept in warde, or else that he was instigated and entised by some of his olde friendes to stirre moze coles, and begin some newe seditious faction, or at the least, because he would wilfully waste and cast away himselfe, studied how to escape and flie away, hauyng perfite hope that he should finde occasion to bring all things well to passe, if he could conuey himselfe once out of the English mens hands. And although he were not ignoraunt, that he neither could doe nor imagine any thing, but the king would both heare of it and know it: Yet he seduced with hope of euasion and flaying, which was the chiefe comfort of his captiuitie, had liefer put all things in a proofoe and hazarde, rather then lenger to suffer the present calamitie and daylie miserie. And so deceuyng his keepers tooke him to hys heeles, by the which he brought himselfe into a straighter custodie and prison, and wrapped himselfe into tortures and punishmentes: For when he came to the Sea costes, and had gone but a little forward on his iourney, when the rumour of his flight was spreade abroad, every bye way and lane was set abroad with the Kings garde, which had the custodie of hys body. wherfore he beyng sore abashed with the clamour of them that searched and made inquirie for him, and beyng in a maner destitute of wyt and counsaile, altered of necessitie from his pretended iourney, and came to the house of Bethlem, called the Priorie of Shene beside Richemond in Southrey, and committed himselfe to the Priore of the Monasterie, requiring him for Gods sake to aske and desire his lyfe and pardon of the kings maicstie. The Priore which for his verteous qualities was had in great estimation, moued with the calamitie and infortunate state of this man, came to the king and shewed him of this Berkyn, whose pardon he humblye craued, and frankly obteyned it. Incontinent after this, Berkyn was brought to the Court againe to Westminster with many a curse and reproche, and was one daye set fettered in a payre of stockes, befoze the doze of Westminster hall, and there stode one whole day, not without innumerable reproches, mockes and scozings. And the next day was caried thorough London, and set vpon a lyke Scaffolde in Chepe by the Standard, with lyke gyynes and stockes as he occupied the daye befoze, and there stode all daye and red openly his awne confession wyrtten with hys awne hande, the berie Copie whereof hereafter ensueth.

Berkyn Warbeck. Edward erle of Warwicke.

First it is to be knowne, that I was borne in the towne of Turney in Flaunders, and my fathers name is John Osbeck, which sayde John Osbeck, was Comptroller of the said towne of Turney, and my mothers name is Katheryn de Faro. And one of my Graundfathers vpon my fathers side was named Diryck Osbeck which dyed, after whose death my Graundmother was maryed vnto Peter Flamme, that was receauer of the fozenamed towne of Turney, and Deane of the Botemen that rowe vpon the water or tyuer,

ryuer, called Leschelde. And my Graundfyrer vpon my mothers side was Peter de Faro, which had in his keeping the keyes of the gate of S. Johns within the same towne of Turney. Also I had an Uncle called maister John Stalyn, dwelling in the parische of Saint Pyas within the same towne, which had married my fathers sister, whose name was Jone or Jane, with whome I dwelled a certayne season. And after I was led by my mother to Andwerp for to learne Flemmische, in a house of a Cousyn of mine, an officer of the sayde towne, called John Stienbeck, with whome I was the space of halfe a yere. And after that I returned agayne to Turney, by reason of the warres that were in Flaunders. And within a yere following I was sent with a Marchaunt of the sayde towne of Turney named Berlo, to the marte of Andwarpe where I fell sick, which sicknesse continued by on five Moneths. And the said Barlo set me to bozde in a Skimmers house, that dwelled beside the house of the Englishe nation. And by him I was from thence carped to Barowe marte, and I lodged at the signe of the olde man, where I abode the space of two Moneths. And after this the sayd Barlo set me with a Marchaunt of Middelborough to seruire, for to learne y language whose name was John Strewe, wyth whom I dwelled from Christmas til Easter, and then I went into Portyngale, in the companie of Sir Edward Bramptones wyfe, in a ship which was called the Quenes ship. And when I was come thether, then I was put in seruire to a knight that dwelled in Lushborne, whiche was called Peter Vaz de Cogna, wyth whome I dwelled an whole yere, which sayde knight had but one eye. And because I desyred to see other Countries, I toke licence of him, & then I put my selfe in seruire with a Briton, called Pzgent Meno, the which brought me with him into Irelande, and when we were there arrived in the towne of Corke, they of the towne, because I was arayed with some clothes of Silke of my sayde maisters, came vnto me and thrcaped vpon mee that I should be the Duke of Clarence sonne, that was befoze time at Deuelin. And forasmuch as I denied it, there was brought vnto me the holy Euangelists and the crosse by the Maioz of the towne, which was called John le Wellen, and there in the presence of him and other I tooke my othe as the truth was, that I was not the fore sayde Dukes sonne, nor none of his blood. And after this came vnto me an Englishe man, whose name was Stephen Poytron, with one John Water, and layde to me in swearing great othes, that they knew well that I was king Richardes Bastard sonne: To whome I answered with like othes, that I was not. And then they aduised me not to be ascarde, but that I should take it vpon me boldly, and if I would so do, they would ayde and assist me with all their power agaynst the king of England, and not onely they, but they were assured well that the Erles of Desmond, and Kildare, should do the same. For they forced not what parte they tooke, so that they might be reuenged vpon the king of England, and so agaynst my will made me to learne Englishe, and taught me what I should do and say. And after this they called me Duke of Porke, second sonne of king Edward the fourth, because king Richards bastard sonne was in the handes of the king of England. And vpon this the sayde John Water, Stephen Poytron, John Ciller, Hughbert Burgh, with many other, as the fore sayde Erles, entered into this false quarell. And within thort time after, the French king sent an Amba-

sador into Ireland, whose name was Loyse Lucas, and mayster Stephyn Fryain, to aduertise me to come into Fraunce. And thence I went into Fraunce, and from thence into Flaunders, and from Flaunders into Ireland, and from Ireland into Scotland, and so into England.

When night of the same day, which was the .xv. day of June was come (partly because the king had pardoned him his life, and partly because hee should no more runne awaye, & put the king in doubt of any mistrust or misfortune to come) he was committed to the Colver of London, where bys wickednesse brilyng so hote within his rankard stomacke, would not suffer him to escape the punishment and vengeance of God, but shortly after was most iustly and worthily put to death, as hereafter shall be shewed.

Edward Plantagenet Erle of Warwicke, of whome ye haue heard befoze, being kept in the Tower almost from his tender age, that is to say, from the first yere of the king to this .xv. yere, out of all companie of men and sight of beastes, in so much that he could not decerne a Goose from a Capon. And wjere as he by comon reason and open apparauice, could not by his awne doyngees seeke his death and destruction, yet by the drift and offence of another man, he was brought to his end and confusion. For a Frier Augustin on the border of Suffolke called Patricke, to the entent to bring this Erle into disdain and hatred, had a certaine scholer called Raufe Wilford, whome he greatly fauoured, and in whose hed he euer distilled and infused this foolish and phantasticall conceyte, that if he would folowe his counsaile and aduise, he would easily conuey him to the kingdome of England. The scholer lyke a good disciple, did not denie to folow his maisters discipline and counsaile, but more and more desired and put his Maister in remembraunce to performe and accomplishe with all speede, that thing which of his awne liberallitie, he befoze had to him both promised and assured, sayng, what Herocke or dastard is so soze asfeard of transgressing the law, or dreadeth punishment, the which to obteyne a kingdome will not attempt to do, and suffer all things that is possible to be assayed and tasted? So that when they betwene themselves secretly had taken a craftie deliberation and counsaile of their enterprise, and had deuised in their foolish wittes, howe it should be brought to passe, they went both together into Kent (which Countrie in auncient tyme hath not beene dull in setting foorth of newe phantasticall phantasies) and there begon this yong Marinet to tell priuily to many that he was the very Erle of Warwicke, and lately gotten out of the Tower, by the helpe of thys Frier Patricke. To the which sayngs when the Frier perceyued hope to be geuen, he declared it openly in the Pulpet, and desired all men of helpe.

But the head of this sedicion was Sommer topped, that it could haue no time to spring any higher, the maister and the scholer being both apprehended and cast into prison, and attainted. Of the which two, the scholer was hanged on Shrouetuesday, at Saint Thomas of Waterpurgs, and the Frier was condemned to perpetuall prison and captiuitie. For at that tyme here in England, so much reuerence was attributed to the holy orders, that a priest, although he had committed high treason agaynst his soueraigne Lord and to all other, offenders in murder, rape or theft, which had receyued any of the three higher holy orders, the lyfe was geuen, & the punishment of death released. The chiefe cause of this fauour was this, because Bishops of a long tyme

tyne and season did not take knowlege, noz intermit themselves with vicerch and punishment of such heynous and detestable offences, by reason wher they did not disgrace and deprive from the holy orders such malefactorz, and wicked persons, which without p̄ ceremony, by the canonicall law could not be put to death. Furthermoze, what should a man say, it was also vsed that he that could but only read (yea although he vnderstode not what he read) how heynous or detestable a cryme so euer he had comitted (treason onely except) should likewise as affines and alyes to the holy orders be saued, & committed to the Bishops prison. And to the entent that if they should escape, & be again taken, comitting like offence, that their liues should be no moze to them pardoned, it was ordayned that murderers should be bzent on the harte of the left hande with an hote yron signed with this letter M, and the eues in the same place with this letter T, so that if they, which were once signed with any of these markes or tokens, did againe commit like cryme and offence, should suffer the paynes and punishmentes, which they had both merited and deserued. Which device was enacted and established in the Parliament kept in the seconde yere of this kinges reigne, and taken as I coniecture of the French nation, which are wout if they take any such offender, to cut off one of his eares, as a sure token and marke hereafter of his euill doyng. And the charge of keeping such offenders, that be only imprisoned by their offences, because it soundeth to spirituall religion, is committed to the Bishops and rulers of the spiritualtie, with a penaltie set vpon them, if any such prisoner doe afterwarde escape. The which act and priuilege did nourishe and encrease aboundantly the sect and swarme of the eues and murderers, for after that time there were an hundreth waies practised and inuented, how at one time or another, to deliuer or conuey them out of prison and captiuitie, by making their purgation (by what sleight and meanes they care not) of such offences as befoze they were conuincid and found guiltie, if no man be present to lay exceptions to the same. For if the partie offended and hurt be absent at the day of the purgation making, the theefe or murderer truly found guilty from the beginning, shall be both excused and set at libertie. And oftentimes the sooner, because the Bishop would not leese so great a summe as an hundred pounce, for the escape of a poore knaue, scant worth a Dandiprat: But now to returne to our matter againe.

Murderers to be bzent in the hand with an M, and the eues with a T.

Purgation of Conuers.

Strangers Slewest, Astwood and long Rogier keepers of Berkyn were corrupted.

Berkyn (of whome reherfall was made befoze) beyng now in hold, could not leaue with the destruction of hym selfe, and confusion of other that had associate themselves with hym, but began nowe to studye which way to flye and escape. For he by false perswasions and liberall promises, corrupted Strangeweres, Slewest, Astwood and long Rogier hys keepers, being seruautes to s̄r John Dygby Lieutenaunt. In somuch that they (as it was at their arraignment openly proued) entended to haue slayne the sayd Maister, and to haue set Berkyn and the Erle of Warwicke at large, whiche Erle was by them made priuie of this enterprize, and therevnto (as all naturall creatures loue libertie) to his distruction assented. But this craftie device and subtill imagination, being opened & disclosed, sorted to none effect, and so he being repulsed and put backe from all hope and good lucke wyth all his complices and confederates, and John Awater, sometyme Maior of Corffe in Irelande, one of his founders, and hys sonne, were the sixtene day of No-

ember arraigned and condemned at Westminster. And on the three and twentye daye of the same moneth, Berkyn and John Awater were drawne to Tyborne, and there Berkyn standyng on a litle skaffolde, read his confession, which befoze you haue heard, and toke it on his death to be true, & so he and John Awater asked the kyng forgeuenesse and dyed patiently. This was the rewarde of the pernicious Alye of Berkyn Warbeck, which in his life wyth false perswasions and vntrue surmises had brought many noble personages to death and vtter perdition, so at his death he brought with him other of the same sorte to their not vnderferued punishment. And amongst other Edward Earle of Warwicke, which as the same went, consented to break prison, & to depart out of the Realme wyth Berkyn (which in prisoners is high treason) was the .xxi. daye of the sayde moneth arreyned at Westminster befoze the Earle of Orfozde, then high Countstale of England, of the sayd treason, which whether it were by the enticement of other or of his awne free will (many me doubt because of hys innocency) confessed the fact & submitted himselfe to the kyngs mercy. And vpon his confession he had his iudgement, and accordyng thereto, the .xxviij. day of Nouember. M. cccc. xcix. was brought to the skaffold on the Towre hyl, and there behedded. The same after hys death sprang abroad, that Ferdinand kyng of Spayne would neuer make full conclusion of the matrimony to be had betwene Prince Arthur & the Lady Katheryn hys daughter, nor send her into England as long as this Erle dyed. For he imagined that as long as any Erle of Warwicke lyued, that England should neuer be clenfed nor purged of euill warre and preyu seditioun, so muche was the name of Warwicke in other Regions, had in feare and gelosye.

Berkyn and John Awater drawn to Tyborne and executed.

A great death.

The next yere after there was a great plague, wherof men dyed in many places very soze, but especially & most of all in the City of London, where dyed in that yere thirty thousand. Also in this yere was burned a place of the kings called the maner of Shene, situate and lyng nigh the Chamys side, which he after buyded agayne sumpteously and costely, and chaunged the name of Shene, and called it Richemond, because his father and he were Erles of Richemond.

The king perceyuing this plague and contagious disease, rather to encrease then decrease, whether it was to auoyd the occasion of the sicknesse, or to allure the Archduke of Burgoyne to common with him, he personally toke his ship at Douer, in the beginnig of May, & sailed to Calice, to the entent to prouide and see the watches, which haue bene accustomed to be diligently kept and mayntayned against the incursions of his aduersaries, and there he made politike ordinaunces and strayght lawes. While the kyng laye thus at Calice, the Archduke Philyp sent to him diuers notable personages, not alonely to gratify and welcome him into those partes, but also to declare that the sayde Archduke offred to repayre personally to hys presence, wyth suche a number as the kyng should appoynt, so that it were within no walled towne or fortrese. For he had befoze diuers tymes made deniall to the French king to enter into any of his walled townes, and if he should, as he gladly would come to the towne of Calice, it might be a president to s̄ French king to desyre like metyng, what chaunce there of might fall, every man could not iudge. The king gently enterteined the Ambassadors, but moze thankfully accepted the Archedukes offer, and so appoynted the place at Saint Peters Church without Calice. Upon the Tuesday in Pentecost weeke, the Archeduke came thether with a conuenient companie. The king and the Queene with many a lustie Lorde and Lady rode thether to welcome him. And when the king approached, the Duke at his lightyng offred to holde hys stirrop, which the king in no wise woulde suffer to be done. When the king was dissended from his horse, he and the Archeduke embraced eche other with most princely familiaritie, and then the Queene and all the Nobles saluted him. What banquettyng, what mirth, and what pastyme there was, I ouerpasse. But to conclude there was communication of mariages, treating of farther corroboration of leagues, requestes, of tolles in Flaunders to be minished, with many other thinges, touchyng the entercourse and traffique of both their realmes. And when all thinges were set in an order, the two Princes louyngly tooke their leaue and departed, the king to Calice, and the Archeduke to Saint Omers.

After this departyng, the French king Lewys the twelue, sent to visite the king, the Lord Gronthouse gouernour of Picardie, and the Lord Herneillers, Bayly of Amvas, which declared to the king the getting of Milayn, and takyng of the Duke, which Lordes were highly feasted, and wyth great rewarde departed.

Soone after when this plague was slaked, the king returned againe to England, about the ende of June: And beyng come into Englande, soone after there came to him one Gasper Pous, a Spaniard (both for learning and good behauour very excellent) sent from Alexander Bishop of Rome, which should shew to the Engliche men the right way to heauen. Therefore that yere was called the yere of Jubile, which was the yere of our Lorde a thousand fiue hundred. And to the entent that the people of farre Countries might be eased of their labour and trauaile in commyng thether, the charitable father sent his Legates into euery Countrie to distribute the heauenly grace (as he called it) to all Christen people, which eyther letted by warre, enemies, infirmitie, weakenesse, or tediousnesse of y long iourney, were not able to perfoyme their iourney to the holy Citie of Rome. But this beneuolent liberality was not francke & freely geuen: For the holy Bishop Alexander, with helpyng and loking to the helth of mens soules, thought somewhat to doe for hys awne pryuate commoditie and singuler welth, and therefore he limited and set a certaine pryce of this his grace and pardon: and to the ende that the king should not hynder nor let his purpose, he offered part of this his gaine vnto the king. And that the people might the sooner minithe their purses, and enriche his Chestes, he promised that he would in the begynnyng of the yere make warre in all the haste against the great Turke. By this meanes and pollicie, this Alexander gat and heaped vp a great summe of money, and yet no battaile begonne against the Turke, which in the meane season had taken, conquered, and destroyed many regions, Cities, & towne belonging to Christen men.

About this time died thre Bishop in England, John Morton Bishop of Cauntorbury, Thomas Langton Bishop of Winchester, and Thomas Rotheram Bishop of Yorke. After him succeeded Thomas Savage Bishop of London, in whose place succeeded Doctoz William Warham of whom we made mencion before. And Henry Deane Bishop of Sarisburie was made Archebishop of Cauntorbury. Also Richard fore Bishop of Durham, was preferred to the Bishoprike of Winchester. Also this yere two notable mariages were concluded and agreed vpon, but neyther solemnised nowe, nor consummate as you shall heare afterwarde. For king Henry graunted hys daughter Ladie Margaret to James the fourth king of Scottes. And Ferdinand king of Spaine gaue his daughter Ladie Katherin to Arthur prince of Wales, sonne and heyre apparaunt to the king of England. And it is to be considered y king Henry did not ioyne this affinitie with the king of Scottes without cause: For he desiryng nothing moze, then to passe ouer the remnant of his lyfe in peace, rest, and tranquillitie, imagined in himselfe that by thys coniunction and couplement of matronomie, no warre or hostilitie hereafter should be attempted eyther agaynst him or his Dominions by the Scottische king or his nation, hauyng sure trust that none other of his enemies or of his rebelles should hereafter be receyued or mainteyned in the Dominions and territories of his sonne in lawe. And amongst all other articles this was concluded and appoynted, that no English man should enter into Scotland, without letters commendatory of theyr awne souereigne Lorde, or saueconduyte of his Wardein of the Marches, and that prohibition was in lyke maner geuen to the Scottes.

You haue heard before, howe that the mariage was agreed betweene Prince Arthure of England, and the Ladie Katheryn of Spaine, and howe the king her father promised to send her with great honour into England: He now this yere accordyng to his promise conueyed her with a puyssaunt navy toward England, where she arriued in the porte of Plymmouth the seconde day of October, then beyng Saterday. When the king was certified of her arryuall, incontinent he sent both for Prince Arthur his sonne into Wales to repayze to London, and sent diuers great Lords and knightes to conuey her with tryumph toward her spouse and husband. And vpon the .xij. day of November, she was conueyed from Lambeth through London with all triumph and honour that could be deuised or imagined, to the Bishops palace, by the cathedrall Church of Saint Pauls. And because I will not be tedious to you, I passe ouer the wise deuises, and the prudent speeches, set foorth in seuen goodly Pageauntes, erected and set vp in diuers places of the Citie. I leaue also the sweete harmonie, which sounded with heauenly noyse on euery syde of the streete. I omit farther, the costly apparell both of Goldsmithes woork and embraudery, the riche Jewelles, the massie Chaynes, the stirryng horses, the beautifull bardes, and the glitteryng trappers, both with belles and spangles of golde. I will not molest you with rehersyng the riche arras, the costly tapestrie, the fyne clothes both of golde and siluer, the pleasaunt silkes, which did hang in euery streete where she passed, the wine that ranne continually out of the Conduytes. But to resozt vnto the historie.

While this pryncesse soiourned for her recreation in the Bishops palace of London, not without visitation of the king, the Queene and the kinges mother, there was erected in the bodye of Saint Pauls Church, a long brydge made of timber, extending from the West doze of the Church, to the step at the entering into the Quere, which was sixe foote from the ground. On the sayd brydge or stage, euen directly before the consistorie of the church was eleuate a place lyke a mount, for eyght persons to stand vpon, compassed rounde about with steps to assend and dissend, which was couered wyth fyne red worsted, and in lykewise were all the rayles of the sayde stage. On the Northside of this mount was a place furnished for the king and Queene and such other as they appointed. On the Southside of the same mount stood the Maior & the Magistrates of London. When all preparation was made, and all things set in an order. Upon the day of Saint Erkenwalde, then beyng Sunday, the sayde Lady was led to the same mount, and there prince Arthur openly espoused her, both beyng clad in wyhte, both lustie and amorous, he of the age of fiftene and more, and she of the age of. xviij. or thereabouts. After the matrimonie celebrated, the prince and hys wyfe went by into the Quere, and there heard a solempne masse, song by the Archebyschop of Cauntorbury, associate with. xii. Prelates mytred. And after the masse finished, the Bride was led homeward to the Byschops palace, by Henry Duke of Yorke, beyng then a goodly yong prince, & the Legate of Spaine. Next after folowed the Ladie Cicile sister to the Queene, suppoztynge the trayne of the spouse. After whome folowed aboue an hundred Ladies and Gentlewomen gorgeously appareled and richely adourned. There was kept that day a sumptuous feast, but when night was come, this lustie prince and his bewtifull Bride were brought and ioyned together in one bed, and there did that act, which to the perfozmaunce and full consummation of matrimonie was most requysite and expedient. In so muche that his famillier seruitors, which had then neyther cause nor rewarde to lye or fayne, declared openly that in the morning he called for drinke, which he before times was not accustomed to doe. At which thing one of his Chamberlaynes marryng, required the cause of his drowth. To whome he answered merily sayng, I haue this night bene in the myddest of Spaine, which is a hote region, and that iourney maketh me so drie, and if thou hadst bene vnder that hote climate, thou wouldest haue bene drier then I. Then shortly after the king and the Queene with the new wedded spouses, went from Baynardes Castell by water to Westminster, on whome the Maior and Communaltie of London, in Barges garnished with standardes, streamers, and penons of their deuise, gaue their attendaunce. And there in the palace were suche martiall feates, and baliante iustes, as before that tyme was of no man had in remembraunce. Of this royall triumph Lord Edward Duke of Buckyngham was chiefe chalenger, and the Lorde Thomas Grey Marques Dorset was chiefe defendour, which with their aydes and companions, bare themselves so balyauntly that they obteyned great laude and honour, both of the Spaniards and of their Countrimen.

During the tyme of these iustes and triumph, were receaued into London, an Erle, a Byschop, and dyuers noble personages, sent from the king of Scottes into England, for the conclusion of the mariage betwene the Lady Margaret the kings daughter and hym. Which Erle by prorie in the name of king James his maister, affied and contracted the sayd sayre Lady. Which assurance was published at Paules Crosse, the day of the conuersion of S. Paule, in reioysing wherof Te deum was song, & great fires made thorough the Citie of London. Which things as you haue heard, beyng fully finished and accomplished the Ambassadors as well of Spaine as of Scotlande, took
