When the Ambassadors were departed, the king entending to aduance the honoz and reputation of the prince his sonne, furnished hym with monei and money largely, and sent him agayne into Wales, where he was before, to keepe liberall hospitalitie, and to minister to the rude & elshemen in different iustice. And least by reason of lack of experience he might erre, he appointed to him wise and expert counsaylers, as s<sup>r</sup> Rycharde Poole his kinsman, which was his chiefe Chamberlayne, with whome were associate s<sup>r</sup> Henry Vernon, Sir Rycharde Croftes, Sir Paup Philip, Sir Wylliam Udale, S<sup>r</sup> Thomas Englese de, Sir Peter Newton knightes, John Waleston, Henry Watton, & Doctor Wylliam Smyth who was President of his Counsaile, and Doctor Charles, both were with hym associate, the one was afterwarde Bishop of Lyncolne, and the other Byschop of Hereford. But as of one fountayne cometh often both ioye and sorowe, so I leane here to speake more of ioye of thys mariage, considering the chaunce that shortly after succeeded.

A few Moneths before the mariage of Prince Arthur, Edmond Poole Erle of Suffolke, sonne to John Duke of Suffolke, and Lady Elizabeth sister to King Edward the fourth, beyng stoute and bolde of courage, and of wyrt rather and headie, was endited of homicide and murther, for slaying of a meane person in his rage and furie: And although the king pardoned hym whome he might iustly haue condemned for that offence, yet because he was brought to the kings Benche barre and arreyned (which fact he reputed to be a great mayme and blemishe to his honoz) took it seriously, and shortly after for this displeasure, fled into Flaunders, without any licence or safe conduyte geuen hym of the kyng, to the Ladie Margaret his Aunt on the mothers side. Neuerthelesse, whether he was stirred by hys priuie friendes therunto moued by the king, or whether he trusting on hys innocencie and truth feared no daunger nor penaltie, he returned agayne, and exercised himselfe so to the king that he was thought to be guiltlesse and inculpable in any crime that could be obiected to hym, and therefore he was permitted to goe frankly at his libertie and pleasure.

But when this mariage of prince Arthur was kept at London wyth great pompe and solempnitie, and that all the nobilitie were set on pleasure and solace, and the king himselfe was principally geuen to ioy and reioysing. Thys Edmonde, eyther for that he had bene at great and excessive charges at the same triumph and solempnitie, and by reason therof sore charged with debt. Eyther sollicit, allured & prouoked by that olde venemous Seruant the Duches of Burgoyne, euer beyng the sower of sedition, and beginner of rebellion agaynst the king of Englande, or else prouoked and pricked wyth enuy, which could not patiently wth open eyes see and beholde king Henry, beyng of the aduerse lynes to his lignage, so long to reigne in wealth and felicitie, in conclusion with his brother Rycharde fled agayne into Flaunders. This sad chaunce (I thinke) happened among the great ioyes and solaces of king Henry, least that he might not by ouermuch gladnesse sodenly forget himselfe: which displeasure at an other tyme before to haue chaunced, it is manifest and well knowne to you.

When

Edmond de la poole Erie
of Suffolke.

When the King vnderstoode certaynly that this Erie was departed and returned agayne, he was not a litle vexed and vnquieted, mistrusting that some newe tumultuous busynesse should be begonnie againe, and chiefly therfore blamed hymselfe of foolish follie that he had giuen hym his pardon for hys offence, lately committed. Although it was manifest ynough that he dyd it for thys purpose, that he myght dissemble and wyne at the matter so long vntill such time, he had some sure token and perfite knowledge of his conu-ration, the which he perceyued now to be surely attempted and begun. As sene as Edmond de la Poole Erie of Suffolke was fled agayne into Flaunders, Syr Robert Curson, whome the kyng had promoted to the order of knight-hooide, and made capitayne of Hammes Castle, a valiaunt and a circumspect man, dissimuling hymselfe to be one of that conspiracye went into Flaun-ders, doubtlesse to espy what was done there by the Lady Margaret against kyng Henry. This opinion was fetted in euery mannes head at the first broching of the matter, and so yet continueth, groundyng vpon this principle, that he neyther vexed noz molested woth any poynnt of displeasure oz iniurie by his Prince oz anye other fled to the kings enimies. And after all thinges were knowne, pacified & suppressed, he willingly returned and was receiued into high fauour with the kyng his mayster and souereigne Lord. Howbeit, the king like a wise Prince, knowing the faithfull intent of thys syr Robert, & intending to put hun out of al iualowise and suspicion with the Ladye Margaret, and Edmond de la Poole, caused the said Erie and the said Sir Robert Curson, and five persons moze to be accursed at Pauls crosse the first Sundaye of Nouember, as enimies and rebels to him and his realme. But howsoeuer it chaunced, whether it were for the easing of his hart, oz for some pry-uye pollicye, the King after the mariage of his sene Prince Arthur, was so vigilant, and so intentiue, that he espyed and tryed out such as he knew, partly to bee the inuentours of mischief against him, and partly to beare no good will towarde his person, that he coude redily name and reherse their names and surnames, whereof a great part were within few dayes after apprehended and taken. And among them, Lord William Courtney, sonne to Edward Erie of Deuonshire, a man of great nobilitie, estimation and vertue, which married Ladye Katheryn, daughter to King Edward, Lorde William brother to Edmond, Erie of Southfolke, syr James Tyrrell, Sir John Windham. Both these Williams befoze rehersted were rather taken of suspicien and ilowse, because they were nere of blood to the couerators, then for any proued offence oz crime. Wherefore the Lorde William sonne to the Erie of Deuonshire, after the death of King Henry the seventh, was deliuered and set abroad at libertie, by the noble and famous Prince King Henry the eyght, sene to the said kyng, with whome after he was in great fauour and estimation: but shortlye after, when he beganne to exercise him selfe in marciall feates and warlike study he sickened of a disease, called Pluresis, of which malady because it was strange & rare to the Physicians of England, he at the kings Maiour of Greenwich decessed, leauing one some behinde him, to continue hys stirpe and familie. The Lorde William, brother to Edmond the Erie of Southfolke had also greater fauour shewed in prison, then hee had befoze. And syr James Tyrrell, and John Windham, because they were Traytors and so attaynted the first daye of Maye, they were on the Towre hyl beheaded. But when the Erie of Southfolke hard that some of his friends were put to executio, and some other committed to perpetuall pryson and captiuitie, he was in a great agony and feare of himselfe. And so being clerely desperat to haue any fortunate successe in his pretended enterprize, wandered about all Germanye and Fraunce for ayde and succour, prouing if he coude finde any ayde oz succour at their handes. But when he perceyued no stedfast ground to catch anchor holde vpon he submitted him selfe vnder the obeysaunce and defence of Philip Archduke of Austrich and Burgoyne and Erie of Flaun-ders: But Richard his brother being an expert and politique man, so crafti-lye conueyed, and so wisely ordered himselfe in this stormy tempest, that he was not attrapped eyther with net oz snare. The King, not yet being out of doubt of all domesticall and seditious ciuill discord, studied busily how to restrein & kepe in a streyte closure diuers malefactorz, which being partakers of this conspiracy fled to sundry sanctuaries, taryng there til a faire day came to auance forward their enterprize. Where vpon he deuised to kepe the gates of all sanctuaries & places priuiledged, shut & well locked, so that none should issue out from thence to perturbe and vnquiet him, his realme oz people. And for that entent he both wrote and sent Ambassadors to Alexander then Bishop of Rome, desiring him by his authorizy to iudge and decerne all Englishmen, being fledde to Sanctuaries oz other places for treason, as enimies to Christes faith, and scismatiques to Christen religion, & as comon perturbers of the quyet people, and Capytaines and prouokers of trayterous rufflings inhibiting & prohibiting the refuge & priuilege of Sanctuary to all such persons as once had enioyed the immunity & libertie of the same, & after had fled out, & estones returned again. Which thing after y the bishop had graunted, it was greatly to the quietnesse and comfort of King Henry, & many through the feare of that reproch, conuerted themselues to goodnesse & due subiection of their Prince: Other also that were in securitie, & out of all perill & dainger, durst not hazard themselues for feare of galtroppes oz slippyng into the fyre.

When the kyng by his high pollicie had compassed and framed his affaires thus to his purpose, sodeinly happened a lamentable chaunce & losse to the King, Queene, and all the people. For that noble Prince Arthure, the kinges first begotten sonne, after that he had bene married to the Ladie Katherin his wyfe siue moneths, departed out of this transitorie lyfe, in his Cathedrall Church of Worcester. After whose death the name of Prince belonged to his brother the Duke of Yorke, for y his brother dyed without issue, and so without any creation ought to be called, except some cause apparaunt were the let and obstacle of the same. Howbeit the sayde duke vpon suspicien of his brothers wife to be with childe, and that doubtfully thought by the expert and sage men of the Princes counsaile, was by a moneth and moze delayed from his title, name, and preheminance, in the which season the truth might to women easily appere. It is reported that this Ladie Katheryn thought and feared such dolorous chaunce to come: For when she had embraced her father, and taken her leaue of her noble and prudent mother, and sailed towardes England, she was continually so tossed and tumbled hether and thether, woth boysterous wyndes, that what for the rage of the water, and contrarietie of the windes, her ship was prohibited diuers tymes to ap-

The next yere after Queene Elizabeth, lying within the Tower of London, was brought abed of a fayre daughter on Candlemasse day, which was there christened and named Katheryn, and the .xj. day of the same Moneth, the sayde most vertuous Princes and gracious Queene there deceased, and was with all funerail pompe carped through the Citie of London to Westminster, and there buried, whose daughter also tarped but a small season after her mother.

After the death of this noble Princes, which for her great vertue was commonly called good Queene Elizabeth, departed Sir Reignolde Bray knight of the Garter, a very father of his Countrie, a sage and a graue person, and a feruent louer of iustice. In so muche that if any thing had bene done agaynst good lawe or equitie, he would after an humble fashion plainly reprehende the king, and geue him good aduertisement how to reforme that offence, & to be more circumspect in another lyke case. Of the same vertue and honest plainnesse was John Morton Archebishop of Cauntorbury, which Bishop dyed as (it is shewed aboue) two yeres betoze. So these two persons were euer restrayners and refrayners of the kinges wilfull scope and vnbideled libertie, where as the rude and ignozant people say and affirme, that their counsaile infected and corrupted the kinges cleane and immaculate conscience, contrary to his princely disposition & naturall inclination. Such is euer the error of the comon people: but surely as long as the king would heere and obey such as warned him of his offyce royall and kingly dutie, he coude in no wise erre or swarue asyde. About this tyme also dyed Henrye Archebishop of Cauntorbury, whose rowme Doctor William Warram Bishop of London suppliyed. And to the Bishopricke of London was elected William Barnes, after whose death succeeded Richard Fitziamess. In which yere the .xviij. day of February, the king at his Palace of Westminster, wyth all solemnitie created his onely sonne Henry Prince of Wales, Erle of Chester. &c. which noble yongling succeeded his father, not onely in the inheritance and regalitie, but also was to him equiuall in honour, fame, learning and pollicie.

Marcilian the Emperour, hearing that Queene Elizabeth was deceased, sent into England a solempne Ambassade of the which Lorde Casimire, Marques of Bradenburgh his Cosyn, accompanied with a Byshop, an Erle, and a great number of gentlemen well appareled, was principall Ambassadour, which were triumphantly receaued into London, and was lodged at Crosbys place. This Ambassade was sent for thzee causes, one to visite and comfort the king, beyng sorowfull and sadde for the death of so good a Queene and spouse. The second for the renouation of the old league and amitie. The thirde which was not apparaunt, was to moue the king to marry the Emperours daughter the Ladye Margaret, Duches dowagar of Sauoye. The first two tooke effect, for the king vpon Passion Sunday, roade to Daules in great triumph, the sayde Marques ryding on his left hande. And there the Byshop made to the king an excellent and comfortable Oration, concerning the death of the Queene. And there also the king openly swore to keepe the new renouate league and amitie, during their two liues. But the thirde request, whether the let was one the mans part or womans side, neuer sorted to any effect or conclusion. And so these things done, the Ambassadours returned sumptuously and honorably rewarded.

All this Wynter was preparation made for the conueyaunce of the Ladye Margaret, affied to the king of Scottes into Scotland. And when all things were readie and prest, the king remooued the last day of June from Rychemond, hauing in his company his sayde daughter, and came to Colyweston, where the Countesse of Richmond his mother then lay. And after certayne dayes of solace ended, the king gaue her his blessing with a fatherly exhortation, and committed the conueyaunce of her to the king her husbandes presence to the Erle of Surrey: and the Erle of Northumberlande was appointed as Wardeyn of the Marches to deliuer her at the Confines of both the Marches. Thus this fayre Ladie was conueyed with a great company of Lordes, Ladies, Knightes, Esquires and Gentlemen, till they came to Berwike, and from thence to a Village called Lambzeton Kyrke in Scotlande, where the king with the floure of Scotlande was readie to receaue her, to whom the Erle of Northumberland, according to his commission deliuered her. The Scottes that day, I assure you were not behind the Englishmen, but farre aboue, both in apparell and riche Jewels and massy Chaynes: But aboue other the Erle of Northumberland, what for the ryches of his Cote, beyng Goldsmithes worke, garnished with pearle and stone, and what for the costly apparell of the Henymen and galaunt trappers of their horses, besides foure hundred tall men, well horsed and appareled in his colours, that he was esteemed both of the Scottes and English men, moze lyke a prince then a subiect. Then was this Ladie conueyed to the towne of Edenborough, and there the day after, king James the fourth, in the presence of all his nobilitie espoused the sayde fayre princeesse, and feasted the English Lordes, and shewed to them Jullies and other pastimes, very honorably, after the fashion of his rude Countrey. When all thinges were done and finished according to their commission, the Erle of Surrey with all the English Lordes and Ladyes returned into their Countrey, geuyng moze prayse to the manhood, then to the good maner and nurture of Scotlande.

In this yere began the newe worke of the kings Chapell at Westminster, which is one of the most excellent peeces of worke, wrought in stone, that is in Christendome.

In this yere the king kept his high Court of Parliament, in the which diuers actes were concluded, which were thought necessarie and expedient for the preferuation of the publique weale. And among other thinges, it was determined that theeues and murderers duely convicted by the lawe to dye, should be burned in the hande, and committed to the Byshops custodie as I haue befoze declared. After this certaine money was graunted to the king, by the whole Parliament, and the goodes of men outlawed were forfepted and confiscated. There was also called (as the maner is) a congregation of the Clergie, to the intent, that they with their Treasure and Money might auance and preferre the common welth of the realme.

Whether to we haue shewed you rough and sharpe battailles, pernicious and seditious strife, tumult, and the death of many noble and meane persons: Now therefore let vs here rehearse, the contention of familiar thinges, the gnabwyng gnawing at the hartes, and the fretting of mindes and of bowes, promises and requestes made of dyuers persons.

Kyng Henry, now drawing to age, and befoze this time euer bered and prouoked with the scrupulous stinges of sedicion and ciuill commorion, inso- much that he moze detested and abhorred intestine and pryuat warre, then death oz any thing moze terrible. Wherfoze he determined so pollitiquely to prouide that all the causes of such bnyquetnesse and mischiese to come, should be rooted out and banished : which imaginacion and purpose he doubted not to compasse and bring to effect, if he made lobe and abated the courage of his subiects and bassalles, and especially of the richest sortes, remembzng the olde prouerbe, that men through aboundaunce of riches waxe moze insolent and hedstrong, and that nothing is moze to them acceptable oz desirous, then aboundaunce of treasure and plentie of money, which people eyther soz feare of losing, oz hope of gayning of worldly ryches desyre eyther peace oz warre. But to the intent that men might not thinke noz report that he which is their King instituted of God to reuenge all iniuries to them done and committed, should oppresse and wrongfully polle and exact money of his subiects, he deuised with him selfe by what honest meane he might perfozme it. And thus deuising with himself, it came into his hed that the Englishmen did little passe bpon the obseruation and keping of penall lawes and statutes, made and ordeyned for the preseruation of the common vtilitie and welth. And therefore, if inquisition were had of suche penall statutes, there should be fewe noble men, Merchants, Farmers, Husbandmen, Brasiers noz Occupiers, but they would be found transgressours and violatours of the same statutes. After that he had taken this counsell, he sought oute the penall lawes, and put them in execution, and they that were found offenders, were easily at the beginning fined and scourged. After that he appoynted two Maisters and surueyers of his forfaytes, the one syz Richard Empson, and the other Edmond Dudley, both learned in the lawes of the Realme. And these two personnes contended, which of them by most bringing in might most please and satisfie his maisters desyre and appetite. Wherfoze in the beginning, they armed wyth a company of accusers (commonly called Promoters) which brought to them the names of the offenders, esteemed and regarded so much the gayne of money, that they clerely forgate and banished out of their remembrance their duetie present, the perill that might ensue, and the thanke and good will that they might haue obtayned, and yet they had warning of diuers sage persons to close theyz hands from such vncharitable doings and cruell extremitie, according to the Adage, the extremitie of iustice is extreme iniurie.

The King, after he had gotten a large and ample sum of money, hauing pitie of the people, which cryed to God daylie for an ende of their pilfering, of his clemencie and gracious goodnesse towardes his ende thought it best, and thus determined, that these two extreme officers should be depriued of that office, and the monie from whome it was vniustly exacted and extorted to be wholly restored and deliuered againe : which being prevented with death, commaunded it by his last will & testament to be duely and truly perfozmed, but in the meane season many mens coffers were emptied.

reason wherof the inheritance of Castell (berause that Kingdoms be not partible) descended to Lady Jane her eldest daughter by king Ferdinand, the which was married to Philip Archduke of Austrich & Burgoyne, and Erie of Flaunders. Which kingdom he obtayned by hys wife, and had the possession of the same, and was named, reputed, and taken, as king of Castell and Lyon. Wherfoze the yere folowynge, about the sixt day of January, hauing a great nauy prepared, he sayled out of Flaunders with his wife towarde Spaine, but he had sayled no great way befoze that a sore tempest, by reason of contrariety of windes sodainly arose, so that the whole nauy was tossed & chased with the waues, and sodaine sourses. In so much the winde hauing the mai'try, disperfed & seperated the ships asunder into diuers places on the coast of England. The kinges ship with two other bestelles were blown by tempest on the West part of the realme to the porte of Weymouth in Dorsetshire. Then king Philip which was not expert, and had not frequented the Seas befoze, beyng weryed and bnyqueted both in minde and bodie, enterynge the shy boate to refreche and repose himselfe a little, came a land contrary to the mynd of his counsaile and Capitaynes, which foresaw and knew well that the same landyng should be the occasion of lenger taryng there. When it was knowen that straunge shippes were arrived, there came thither a great number aswell of Noble men, as of rurall persons that dwel- leth about that coast, to repulse and beate away hym if he were their enemy. But when they perceyued he was their friend and louer, and driuen thither by force of weather, Sir Thomas Trenchard knight, the chiefe of that companie, went to Philip king of Castell with all humanitie and lowlinesse, in- uityng and despyng him (if he would so vouchsafe) to visite his Manor and Mancion, which was euen nighe at hande, trustyng thereby to haue great thankes of the king his maister, if he could protract and cause him to tarye there, buttill such tyme as king Henry were certified of his arrival, to whom with all diligent celeritie, he sent diuers postes to notifie to his grace of king Philips landyng. This rumoz beyng farther blowne abroad of this straunge Princes comyng, in a short space there assembled together a great multitude of people all a long the sea coast. And among other there came first Sir John Carew with a goodly band of picked men. Which Sir John and Sir Thomas Trenchard entreated the king of Castell, not to depart buttill such tyme as he had spoken with king Henry his louyng and faythfull friend and allye, assuryng him that he would repayze thether within two or thre daies at the most. King Philip excused himselfe by the necessitie of his weightie enterprize and importunate cause, affirmyng that long taryng in matters of grauitie and doubtfull, ought to be excluded: wherfoze he alleged that pro- tractyng of tyme might turne him to great preiudice, denyng at the first to expect and tary the comyng of the king of England: but yet being perswa- ded by reason in himselfe, that he might be let and interrupted, if he would proffer once to go aboarde to his shippes againe, at their gentle desyre and lo- uynge contemplation, assented to their humble petition and request.

When king Henry was informed of his landyng, he was replenished with an exceeding gladnesse, partly for to renue the olde familiaritie and ac- quaintaunce, which they vled at their last meeting, and partly for that he trusted that hys landyng in England should turne to his profite and commo- ditie, ditie. Therfore first he wrote many and dyuers letters to syz John Carew, and syz Thomas Trenchard, wpylling and warnyng them withall kindnesse of humanitie to enterteyne the king of Castell, till he in person approched in some place meete and conuenient for the enteruiewyng and enterteynyng of so noble a personage. Beside this he sent the Erle of Arundell with manye Lordes and knights to accompany and attend vpon him. which Erle, accordyng to the kinges letters receaued him with thre hundred hoyses all by tozche light to the great admiration of all the straungers.

King Phylip seyng no remedie, but that he must needes tarie and abyde, would no lenger gase after king Henryes commyng, but tooke hys iourney towarde Wyndsoze Castell where the king laye. And syue Wyple from Wyndsoze, the Prince of Wales accompanied with fiue Erles and dyuers Lordes and knightes, and other to the number of fyue hundred persons, most gorgeously appareled and richely mounted, receaued him after the most honozablest fashon of entertaynment. And within halfe a myle of Wyndsoze, the king accompanied with the Duke of Buckyngham, and a great part of the Nobilitie of hys realme, saluted and welcommed him, and so conueyed him to the Castell of Wyndsoze, where besyde many triumphes & pastimes shewed, he was made companion of the noble order of the Garter. After him came to Wyndsoze hys wyfe Queene Jane, sister to the Princes Dowager, late wyfe to Prince Arthur. And after they two had concluded and renouate their olde league, and made a perpetuall peace and continuall amitie together: King Henry desired him to haue Edmond de la poole Erle of Suffolke his rebell to be deliuered into his handes and possession. To whome the king of Castell aunswered abohyle, that he was not within hys rule or dominion, and therefore it laye not in his power to render or deliuer hym. Although he considered it to be a heynous and great offence to be the occasion and authoz of the death of his guest, which came to hym for succour and was receaued vnder his protection and defence, yet when he perceaued that neyther excuse, nor yet reasonable argument could be accepted or allowed of king Henry (which promised faythfully of hys awne offer to pardon, Edmond de la poole, of all paynes and executions of death) he promised and graunted to doe and accomplishe all king Henryes desire and request: And so incontinent caused the sayd Edmond secretly to be sent for. After this king Henry entending to protract the time till he might possesse his praye, which he sore desired, conueyed the king of Castell vnto the Citie of London, that he might see the head Citie of his realme, and there led him from Barnards Castell by Chepe to Barkyng, and so returned by Watling streete agayne, during which time there was shot a wonderfull peale of Gannes out of the Tower, into the which he would not enter, because (as you haue heard before) he had auowed not to enter the fortreffe of any foze in Prince, in the which a garison was maynteyned: And there taryng a little space, returned back with hym. Then from London the king brought him to Richemonde, where were many notable feates of armes proued both at the tylt and at the tourney and at the barriers.

In the meane season, Edmond de la poole which euer feared and mistrusted, that the arryuing in Englande of King Phylip should be his fatall ende and finall destruction, percepying well that there was no farther hope to be had in fozeyn princes and potentates, and trustyng that after his lyfe to him once graunted, that king Henry would briezely set him at libertie and freedome, was in maner content to returne agayne into his natie Countre, casting in his minde farther, that if his hope and trust were defrauded and refelled, yet at the last he was sure to ende his lyfe, and be buried in the Countre, where he first entred into this variable worlde.

When all pactes and conuauants betwene the kings of Englande and Castell were appointed, conuauanted and agreed: King Phylip tooke hys leaue of King Henry, rendering to him most heartie thankes for his highe cheere and princely entertaynment. And beyng accompanied with dyuers Lordes of Englande, came to the Citie of Excester, and so to Fulmouth in Cornewale, and there toke his ship and sayled into Spaine, where he shortly beyng taken with a sodayne disease, departed out of thys transitorie lyfe, beyng then but .xxx. yeres of age. He had by hys wyfe Queene Jane, sixe children, two men children, Charles and Ferdinand, and foure daughters, Cleanoz, Isabell, Marie and Katherin. He was a man of stature conuenient, of countenance amiable and louely, of bodye somewhat crasse and corpulent, quick wytted, bold and hardie stomacked. Thys tempest that the king of Castell had, was wonderfull straunge to many men, because the violencie of the winde had blowne downe an Egle of Brasle, beyng set to shewe and manifest on which part the winde blew, for a pynacle or spire of Paules Church. And in the fallyng the same Egle brake, and battered another Egle that was set bp for a signe at a Tauerne doze in Chepeside. And herebpon, men that were studious of straunge tokens and mostrous wonders, did take an opinion that the Emperour Maximilian, which at that time gaue an Egle in his armes, should haue a great losse, which so happened in dedde: For he lost his onely begotten sonne Phylip, newly called to the kingdome of Castell.

The death of King Phylip.

The description of King Phylip.

Also, shortly after the departyng of king Phylip, the king of Englande began to suspect Sir George Neuell Lorde of Burgeyny, and Sir Thomas Grene, of Grene's Nozton knight, that they were confedered fauours, and partakers, in the beginnyng with Edmond de la Poole, and so vpon this suspicion, they were commaunded to the Tower. But shortly after when they had bene tryed and purged of that suspicion and cryme, he commaunded them both to be set at libertie. But Sir Thomas Grene fell sicke before, and continued in the Tower in hope to be restored aswell to his helth, as he was to his libertie, and there dyed. The Lorde of Burgeyny for hys modestie, wit, and goodnesse (because the king founde him like himselfe) alwayes true, faythfull, and constant, was of his souereigne Lorde more esteemed, fauoured and regarded then he was before.

In this yere also Sir Thomas Kneesworth Maior of London at hys awne charges builded the Conduyt at Bishopsgate. And also he gaue to the companie of the fishmongers certeyne tenementes, for the which they are bound to finde foure scholers, whereof two to be in Cambridge, and two to be in Oxforde, and eyther of them to haue foure pounde a yere for theyr exhibition. &c.

After this, the king hauyng peace aswell with fozeyn Princes, for the terme of thre yeres, as disburdened and purified of all domesticall sedition, cion, began to be diseased with a certeine infirmitie and weakenesse of bodie, which thise in the yere, but specially in the spring tyme soze vexed and tormented him. And because for the most part the harme & euill that chaunce to the Prince, is parted and communicate to his subiects and people, the olde sweatynge disease whereof you heard before amongst the Commons of the realme, came againe. Whobeyt by the reason of the remedie that was inuented by the death of many a creature in the beginnyng, it did lesse hurt and displeasure to the people at this tyme then it did before. But nowe the thirde plague egall with the pestilence ensued by the workyng of the Maisters of the forseyturs, by the king appoynted as I shewed you before. By whose meanes many a riche and welthie person, by the extremitie of the lawes of the realme, were condemned and brought to miserie.

plague.

This matter (sayth Hail) is as wonderfull to be heard, as pityfull and miserable to be done, and yet it is called the lawe, where as it is rather peruerse abuse and disorder of a lawe: polittiquely at the beginnyng inuented to cause the people the sooner to confirme themselves to suche as demaunde their right of them, but craftily practised to the bitter confusion of many by vnttrue officers. For if a man put his aduersarie in suite before the Judges, of which complaint or action he neyther thinketh nor hath knowlege, if he appere not at y last callyng of the exigent, which is called in a hire where he neuer came (for how can he appere, if he be ignoraunt of the prosecution of the cause, and dwell two hundred myles from that place) then doth hee forseyte all his substance and moueables, and his bodie to captiuitie as an enemy and rebell to the lawes of his Country. And yet the Prince shall enioy the goodes so confiscate, and the partie complaynaunt or plaintife that is wronged recouereth not one myte, and yet loseth both his paine and costes. And all such persons that be so condemned & adiudged, be called outlawes, that is depriued of all lawes of the lande, to the which he was by the custome of the Countrie inheritable. These outlawries, olde recognisances of the peace and good abering, escapes, ryottes and innumerable statutes penall, were put in execution and called vpon by Empson and Dudley, so that every man both of the spiritualtie and tempozaltie, hauing eyther land or substance was called to this plucking banket, according to the Psalmist sayng, all decayed and fell together, and no man although he were neuer so cleere and guiltlesse, in conclusion durst auenture a tryall, seing the experience of them that passed before. For these commissioners had such a garde of false periu- red persons apperteyning to them, which were by their commaundements empaneled on every quest, that the king was sure to wyne whosoever lost. Learned men in the lawe, when they were requyzed of their aduise, would say, to agree is the best counsaile that I can geue you. By this vndue meanes, these persons filled the kinges Cofers and enryched themselves. And at this vntreasonable and extort doings, all sortes and degrees of men from the highest to the lowest murmured, grudged and at the last cryed out: But the good king in his last dayes considered and pardoned his pooze subiectes of such vncharitable yokes and ponderous burdens as they were laden withall, as after shall appere.

In this season Alexander Byshop of Rome departed out of this world, and for him was elected fraunces bozne Senes, Aepheo to Pius the se- cond, cond, and was called Pius the thirde, whome king Henry had made a little before, Proctour for his realme in the Court of Rome. The king being glad of his high promotion and dignitie, sent syz Gilbert Talbot knight, Richard Bere Abbot of Glasneburie, and Doctor Robert Sherborne Deane of Paules, to declare to him what gladnesse entered into the kinges heart, when he heard tell of his high preferment and honor. But this Bishop Pius did not tary the gratulations of these Ambassadors, for within a month after that he was installed, he rendered his debt to nature, hauing final pleasure of his promotion. At this time also died Giles, Lord Daubenev, the kinges chief Chamberleyn, whose office Charles bastarde sonne of Henry last Duke of Sommerfet occupied and enioyed, a man of a good wit & great experieece.

And this yere about Christmasse the Bakers house in Warwicke Lane in London was brent, the which fyre came so sodeinly, and brent so feruently that the Maistresse of the house being a widdow with two women seruaunts were therein brent.

Some after, the king caused Guy Ubald Duke of Urbine to be elected knight of the order of the Garter, a noble warriour, and in the Greke and Latin tongues excellently learned. And this order and dignitie the Duke desired instantly to haue, that he might be equiualent in all degrees of honour and nobilitie with his ffather, duke Frederick a Prince in his time of hygh renowne and estimation, which was receaued and chosen into that order by kyng Edward the fourth. And because it was noyted that July the seconde, a Januway bozne, was after y death of Pius, elected to be Bishop of Rome. The kyng entending to stop two gaps with one bush, sent syz Gilbert Talbot and the other two Ambassadors, principally to bishop July, and by them sent also to the Duke of Urbine, the whole habite & collar of the noble order of the Garter. When Duke Guy was requested with the habite, and had taken his oth, according to the statutes of the order: He sent syz Balthaser de Castello knight a Mantuan bozne, his Oratour to kyng Henry, which was for him installed, according to the ordinaunces of that famous order.

While these things were in doing, Lewys the French king mistrusting that he should neuer haue ma child, married his eldest daughter Lady Claude to fraunces de Maloys, Dolphyn of Uien and Duke of Angulesme: which Lady was promysed a litle before to Charles the king of Castel. When king Henrye knew of this, he thought best to marrye hys daughter Ladye Marye to this Charles kyng of Castell, being almost both of one age, and therefore Ambassadors were sent to and fro, and at the last, the mariage was concluded and confirmed by the meanes of the Bishop of Winchester, chiefe Ambassador for the king at Calleyce, and so the Lady Mary being of the age of .x. yeares, was promised to king Charles. For conclusion of which mariage, the Lord of Barow, and diuers great Ambassadors were sent into England from the Emperour Maximilian, which had great rewardes and returned.

rall pardon to all men, for all offences done, & perpetrated against his lawes and statutes. But because murtherers and theues were not only offenders to him, but also to other, he excepted them and some other out of his pardon. He payed also the fees of all prisoners in the Gayles in and about London, abolyng there onely for that dutie. He payed also the dettes of all such persons as laye in the Counters of London, or Ludgate for. xl. Gyllynets and vnder, and some he relieved that were condemned in ten pound. For this his goodnesse and pitie shewed to his people, beyng soze vexed with his iniquitous, pollers and promoters, generall Procession was had dayly in every Citie and parish, to pray to almightie God, for the restoring of his health, with long continuance of the same. Neuerthelesse, he was so consumed with his long maladie, that nature could no longer sustaine his life, and so he departed out of this world, the xxij. day of Aprill in his Palaice of Windesore, the which was the yere of our Lorde. 1509. his corps was conveyed with all funerall pompe to Westminster, and there buried by the good Queene his wife in a sumptuous and solemne Chappell, which he not long before had caused to be builded: he reigned. xxij. yeres and more then seven monethes, and lived. liij. yeres. He had by his Queene Elizabeth. viij. children, foure men, and foure women children, of the which three remayned alive behinde him. Henry Prince of Wales, which after him succeeded, and was King, Ladie Margaret Queene of Scots, & Ladie Mary promised to Charles King of Castell. He was a man of bodie but leane and spare, albeit mightie and strong therewith, of personage and stature, somewhat higher then the meane sort of men be, of a wonderfull beautie and fayre complexion, of countenance merry and smiling, especiallye in his communication, his eyes gray, his teeth white, and heare thicke, of wit in all thinges quicke and prompt, of a princely stomacke, and haute courage. In great perilles, doubtful affaires and matters of waichtige importaunce, supernaturall, and in manner deuine, for such thinges as he went about, he did them aduisedly, and not without great deliberation and breathing, to the entent that amongst all men, his wit and prudence might be noted & regarded. For he was not ignorant that his actes & doings were specially noted and marked with the eyes of many a person: and therefore a Prince ought as farre to excell and surmount all meane personages in wisdom and pollicie, as he precelleth other in estate and dignitie. For what man will geue credite or regarde to him, when he hath proved to be light, wilde, and lasciuious of conditions? Besides this, he was sober, moderate, honest, affable, curteous, bounteous, so much abhorred pride and arrogancie, that he was euer sharpe and quicke to them, which were noted or spotted with that cryme. And there was no man with him, being neuer so much in his fauour, or hauyng neuer so much authoritie, that either durst or could do any thing as his awne phantasie did serue him, without the consent and agreement of other. What shall I say more? Although his mother were neuer so wise (as she was both wittie and wise) yet her will was bridled, and her doynge restrained. And this regiment he sayde he kept, to the entent that he worthily might be called a king, whose office is to rule & not to be ruled of other. He was also an indifferent & sure Justicier, by the which one thing, he allured to him the heartes of many people, because they fled quietly and in rest out of all oppression and molestation of the Nobilitie and riche personnes. And to this seuerity of his was ioyned and annexed a certeyn mercifull pittie, which he did often shewe to such as had offended, and by his lawes were hindred and merced: for such of his subiectes as were fyned or amerced by his Justices to their great impouerishyng, he at one time or another did helpe relieue, and set forward: wherby it appered that he would haue the same penalties for other offences and crimes reuiued and stirred bp againe, which was a plaine argument that he did vse his rigour onely (as he sayde himselfe) to bring lowe, and abate the high stomacks of the wilde people, nourished and brought bp in sedicious factions, and ciuill rebellions, and not for the greedy desyre of riches, or hunger of money, although such as were afflicted would crie out, and say, that it was done moze for the desire of gaine and profite, then for any prudent pollicie, or polittike prouision.

Surely, this good and modest Prince did not deuour and consume the substance and riches of his realme, for he by his high pollicie, mercifully enriched his realme and himselfe, and yet left his subiectes in high welth and prosperitie. The prooffe is wherof manifestly apparant by the great abundance of gold & siluer, yerely brought into this realme, both in plate, money and bullion, by Marchaunts passyng and repassyng out and into this realme with Marchandise. To whom he himselfe of his awne goodnesse lent money largely without any gaine or profite, to the entent that Marchandise being of all craftes the chiefe arte, and to all men, both most profitable and necessary, might be the moze plentifully used, haunted, and employed in hys realmes and dominions. And so this king liuyng all his tyme in the fauour of fortune, in high honour, riches and glory, and for his noble actes and prudent pollicies, worthy to be registred in the booke of fame, gaue by his ghost at the last, which vndoubtedly is ascended into the celestially mancion, where he hath the sure fruition of the Godhead, & the ioye that is prepared for such as shall sit on the right hande of our sauiour, euer world without ende.

About thys time (sayth Polydore) knowledge of good letters, as well of the Latyne as of the Greeke by contynuall warres beyng soze decayed in Italy, encreased greatly in Germany, Fraunce and Scotlande, in so much (sayth he) that the Germanes, who were counted in time past but the meanest learned men, are now as may appere by their wrytings most excellent. And for the furtheraunce and encrease of learning, about this time Margaret Countesse of Richemond and Darby and mother vnto thys King Henry the seventh, a woman of most verteous lyfe, at the motion of John Fisher sometime Bishop of Rochester builded two Colleges in Cambridge, the one called Christes College, the other Saint John Euangelistes, and indued the same with goodly possessions for the maintenaunce of learning. And in the same Uniuersitie also not long before, John Alcock Bpshop of Ely buylded a College, and named the same Iesus College.

And here, although in this Chronicle in diuers places there is mention made of the foundation of sundrie Colleges both in Cambridge and Oxford, yet for as much as I was by my friend assertheyned of the foundation of all the seuerall Colleges in Oxford, I thought it best to place them here altogether, minding to doe the lyke for Cambridge when I shall haue the true knowlege of the Colleges of the same.

In Oxford are these Colleges and Halles following, with the names of the Founders of the same, and the yeres they were founded in.

The

The diuinitie Schoole in Oxforde was buylded by Humfrey Duke of Gloucester the which beside the excellencie of the worke, was a foundation of no small charge.

There are also in Oxforde sixe other Halles, whose names are these: Mary Hall, Brode gates, New Ende, Gloucester Hall, Alborne Hall, Whyte Hall. which Halles are so auncient that the Founders of them are not knowne.

And first of all (as Polydore noteth) the king beyng yong as aforesayde, but yet in all hys yeres had beene brought by in good letters, did therefore prudently for the good gouernement of the realme, elect and choole of the most wisest and grauest personages to be of his priuie counsaile, namely such as were of hys fathers deere and familer friendes, whose names were.

The Counsaillers of King Henry the eyght.

These graue and wise Counsaillors fearing least that great and infinite aboundance of welth, might be a harme vnto the good nature of their young king, for vnto no king at any time before, was left greater or the like riches aswell of readye coyne as also in iewels and moueables as was left vnto hym. And therefore the aforesayd counsaillors very prudently and diligently traueyled so with hym, that they prouoked him to be present with them and to be prouie of their counsailes and deuises, and so dayly acquainted him with the politike affayres of the realme, that by litle and litle he of his owne accord applyed hym selfe to rule and gouerne, the which at the first he semed utterly to abhorre, as the yong and vntamed Dre reiecteth the yoke.

Then

Then the sayd Counsayloz traueyled with great care to put in execution the last will and testament of king Henrie deceased. And first of all, the kings grace by his proclamation made the .xxv. daye of Apryll ratified & confirmed all the pardons graunted by his father, & also pardoned all persons that were then in lute for any offence whatsoeuer it was, treason, murder, and feionye except. And farther in the sayd proclamation was contayned, that if any man had sustayned iniurye or losse of goodes by the Commissioners befoze ap-poynted, as appereth in the .xix. yere of king Henry the seventh, that he should make his humble supplication vnto the kings grace, and therein expresse their grieffe, and he was readye not only to heare them, but also to cause satisfaction to be made. When this proclamation was published and knowne abroad, all such from whome any thing had bene exacted or taken, whether it were by right or wrong, spedily came vnto the Court, and euery man alledged and shewed the occasion that they had to complayne. But the Counsaile examyned and tryed their causes, and such as they found to be manifestly & openly iniured, to them they made due restitution. The which thing beinge blabene and byted amongst the comon people, lord how they resorted in great flocks and heapes, & rushed vnto the court with the rest, whether they had bene iustly punished or not, and they also with horrible & great exclamation cryed out vpon the Commissioners, yea and many of them that most exclaymed were such as had bene touched nothing at all. But the rage and crye of the people was so grieuous against the Commissioners, whose names were Richarde Empson knight and Edmond Dudley Esquier, that the Counsaile to cease and quiet the rage of the people were enforced to apprehend and commit to the Tower of London the aforesayd Empson and Dudley, and beinge called befoze the Counsaile and other the iustices, where they (as Holidore saith) beinge both learned in the lawes of the realme, pleaded for themselves, namelye for Richard Empson which was the elder, who said, as foloweth. I am certain right honorable, you are not ignorant how expedient & profitable vnto mans life be good and wholsome lawes, without the which neyther priuate house may be mayntayned, nor publyque weale duely and orderly gouerned. Euen those lawes amonge vs by the ouersight and negligence of Magistrats, partlye were depraued, and now in some part abrogate and cleane out of memoxie, the which euill encreasinge daylie more and more, king Henrie the .vij. (now deceased) a most prudent and politike prince (as ye all know) endeuored to redresse, who vnto vs committed the charge to see, and prouide that the common and accustomed lawes might be maintayned and executed, and such as were depraued and out of vse might be reduced and restored into theyr pristinate state: And that such persones as had violated & transgressed any of them, should suffer condigne and woorthie punishment: We therfore as faithfully and byrightly as we could haue according to oure commission executed our office trulie vnto the great commoditie of the publyque weale: Wherefore we most humbly besech your Honours that of your goodnesse and loue of iustice, ye will boughsate to determine no grieuous or cruell sentence against vs, but rather counsaile and conclude howe thankfully to recompence and re-quite our great trauayle and paynes.

Richard Empson. Edmond Dudley.

The sayng of Richard Empson.

These their sayngs vnto many that were wise, vertuous and discrete seemed to be very good and right, but vnto other and that vnto the greatest number, number, who supposed that the examination and execution of lawes beinge done through auerice and coueteousnesse and for filthye desier of gayne, they iudged that euen they by putting in execution with extremitye the lawes to the losse of many an honest mans goodes, should now be recompensed with the losse of their heades, who within three dayes after were beheaded at the Tower hill, but their bodie with their heades were buried, that is to say, Richard Empson at the White Friers, and Edmond Dudley at the Blarke Friers in London aforesaid.

Empson and Dudley beheaded.

And immediatly after the execution of the aforesaid persons there were (saith Holidore) by reason of the exclamacion of the people apprehended and take a great number of such as had geuen for their (awne welth) and commo-ditie their speciall attendaunce vpon the aforesayd Commissioners, in the informinge and promotyng of many honest mens verations (commonly called Promoters) and they were committed to sundrie Prisons, and many of them set on the Pillory, and other had papers set on their heades, and so caryed thoroughout the Citie of London, and againe committed to prison, where miserably many of them ended their liues. And some other of them were con-strayned to pay most grieuous fynes, and for none habilitie to paye the same, were committed and condemned to perpetual prison.

Promoters.

Maister Hall in his Chronicle nameth diuers of the sayde Promoters, and for that to their infamie, I wishe them perpetuall memozy, I will here make mencio of Halles words. After (saith he) the apprehension of Empson, and Dudley, there were diuers Promoters apprehended, as Canby, Page, Smith, Derby, Wright, Symson, and Storton, and diuers other, of the which the most part ware papers, and stood on the Pillory: But (saith he) the craftiest knaue of them all (meanyng they were knaues all) called Iohn Baptist Bynalde, escaped and went to Westminster, and there tooke Sanctuary.

Nowe all thinges beinge in a redinesse for the buriall and funerall of king Henry the seventh, he was the .xij. daye of May with all solemnitie bur-

King Henry
the seventh buried at Westminster.

When the funeralles of king Henry the seventh was finished, then was great preparation made for the coronation of king Henry the eighth, the which was appoynted to be done on Whidsommer day next ensuyng. During which tyme the king was moued by some of his Counsaile, that it should be honourable and profitable to his Realme, to take to wife Ladie Katheryn, late wие to Prince Arthur his brother diseased, least she haung so great a dowry, might marry out of the realme, which should be vnprofitable vnto him: By reason of which motion, the king beinge young, & not vnderstanding the law of God, espoused the sayd Lady Katheryn the thirde daye of Iune, the which mariage was dispenced with by Pope Iulij, at the request of her father king Ferdinando (and as Hall sayth) contrarye to the opinion of all the Cardinals of Rome that were deuines. This mariage of the brothers wие was much murmured agaynst in the beginnyng, and euer more and more searched out by learyng and Scripture, so that at the last by the determination of the best vniuersities in Christendome, it was adiudged detestable and plaine contrary to Goddes lawe, as shall be shewed after .xx. yeres.

Nowe

The coronation of King Henry and Queene Katheryn.

Nowe was come the tyme of the coronation, wherfore king Henry and his wife Queene Katheryn were accordyng to the sacred obseruance and auncient custome, annoynted and crowned by the Archebishop of Cantuarbury at Westminster the. xxiiij. day of June.

Margaret Countesse of Richemond dead.

During the tyme that this coronation with noble triumphes and goodly shewes solempnized to the great reioysing of all men, a sodeyne occasion of sorrow happened, as often tymes it cometh in experience that swete and delicate meate in the ende is tempered with soboze savor, for at this tyme Margaret Countesse of Richemond and Darbye, Grandmother vnto the king ended her life, by whose death the publique weale was greatly endamaged, for she beyng a woman of singuler wisdom and pollicie, and also of most vertuous life, perceiuyng that the king by reason of his youthfull and lustie yeres could not execute and minister his office and function, did from the beginnyng so prouide and studie at all tymes that she brought to passe that suche men as were the worthiest and of most integritie and godlinesse was aduanced to highest auctoritie and bare the chiefest sway in the ministration of the causes of the publique weale: And where befoze least the publique weale shoulde sustaine detriment, or by any meanes go to wrecche, the same was guided and governed by the aduice of many, as aforesayde: But nowe the administration therof was committed only vnto two, that is to say, Richard Bishop of Winchester, & Thomas Erle of Surrey, betwene whom was secret grudges, and priuie malice, the which contention of auctoritie, did dayly more and more encrease, for the studies and affections of these two were diuers and contrary. The Bishop of Winchester as (sayth Holioz) contented himselfe with his auncient possessions, and therefore endeuored the more earnestly to the seruite of the common weale: But the Erle (sayth he) sought to come to higher estate, and therefore applyed and studied to please the king, more for preferment sake, then for the zeale he bare to the common weale. But the Bishop beyng a man of great wisdom, although he had no good opinion of the Erle, yet perceiuyng him to be greatly beloued and fauoured of the king, did dissemble and bare himselfe so warely, that nothing appered outward, whatsoeuer was thought inward. The Erle in wisdom beyng nothing inferiour vnto the Bishop, did in like maner dissemble hys grieffe towardes the Bishop. Howbeit at the length by the trauaile of the graue and worthie Counsaylor Sir Thomas Louell, all the olde Counsaylors were againe restored and placed in good and louyng order, and the common weale well gouerned.

John Colet Deane of Paules.

In this tyme also the ryght famous and learned deuine John Colet Deane of Paules Church in London (the sonne of Henry Colet Mercer and late Maior of London) of his atone great costes and charges buylded in the East end of Paules Churchyard in the sayd Citie one free Grammer schoole, with one Maister and Wther for the education and bringing vp of youth in learning, and buylded also two faire Tenements ioyning to the said Schoole for the sayd Maister and Wther to inhabite in, and endued them with goodlie pencions, and committed the charge and ouersight of the good gouernment and continuance of the sayd Schoole vnto the Maysters and Wardeines of the worshipfull companye of the Mercers for the time being to be ordered and kept accordyng to such ordinaunces and statutes as he had drawne for the good good gouernment of the same, which sayde company of the Mercers haue to their great prayse hetherto ordered the same to Gods high honoz and to the benefite of the common weale and to the well bringing vp of many an honest pore mans child. This man in his time was a great and diligent Preacher of Gods blessed worde and did in those dayes much reprehend and rebuke the slouthfulnesse of the Cleargie, and he was the first in his time that taught to the people the Articles of their fayth and the Commaundements of almighty God, and the Lords prayer in English, for the which he was not at that time well thought of by sundry of the Bishops and Cleargye, who then fauored in the common people ignoraunce better then knowledge.

This yere Henrie the first sonne of King Henry was bozne at Richemond vpon Neweyers daye to the great reioysing and comfort of the whole realme, for the ioye and honour of whose birth great fyers were made and diuers hessels of wine set in the stretes of London for such as would taste thereof. And that at the same time were kept noble and triumphant Iustes and sundry other pastimes, but the. xxiij. daye of february next folowing God called to his mercye the sayd chyld to the great heauinesse of the Kyng and Queene, and all the realme. Notwithstandyng the king like a wise Prince toke it with much quietnesse, and the rather to comfort the Queene: But the Queene like a naturall woman made much lamentation.

Henry the first bozne son of King Henry the eight.

This yere in februarie came from king Ferdinando the kinges father in law, and king of Aragon and Castell, certain Ambassadors, which made request to the king: on the behalfe of the king their maister, to haue an ayde of. xv. hundred Archers, with balaunt Capitaynes to gouerne and conduyt them, for his entent was to make warre on the Moores beyng Infidelles, and enemies vnto Christes faith. The king and his Counsaile heeryng this request, thought it much honourable to ayde a Christian Prince, (and in especiall his friend and father in lawe) agaynst the enemyes of Christes lawe, gently graunted them their request.

Ambassadors from King Ferdinando.

When tidyngs was spread in the Court of this iourney against the Infidelles, the Lord Thomas Darcey, knight of the order of the Garter made humble sute to the king to be Capitaine generall of that crewe or armie. The king and his Counsaile for his great balauntnesse and approued wisdom, graunted his request. And many other Lordes and knightes made sute to be in the same iourney: But the king answered them that he would retaine them still with him for other greater purposes. There were appoynted at this tyme to go with the Lorde Darcey, Lorde Anthony Gray, brother to the Marques Dorcet, Henry Gylford, Weston Browne, William Sydney, Esquiers of the kinges house, Sir Roger Hastyngs, Sir Raufe Elderkarc and diuers other Gentlemen to be Capitaynes. The Lorde Darcey and all the other Capitaynes tooke their leaue of the king, and went into their countreyes to prouide for all thinges meete and necessary for the boyage.

The king at this tyme beyng lustie, yong, and couragious, greatly delighted in feates of chivaltrie, insomuch that he made a chalenge of Iustes agaynst all commers to be proclaymed at his Maioz of Greenwich to be holden there the thre first dayes of May then next ensuyng, which noble courage all yong persons highly prayed: But the auncient fathers much doubted consideryng the tender youth of the king, and diuers chaunces and misfortunes fortunes that might happen by reason of horse and armor: In somuch that it was openly spoken that Steele was not so strong, but it might be broken, nor no horse could be so sure of foote but he may fall: yet for all these doubttes the lustie Prince proceeded in his chalenge, and honourably and ballauntly to his great prayse and renobone atchieued the same.

The Lorde Darcie is sent into Spaine with an armie to the king of Arragon.

The Lorde Darcie and other appointed to the boyage aforesaide made suche diligence that they and all their people were readie at Plymmoth by the middest of Maye, and there mustered their souldyours before the Lorde Brooke and other the kings commissioners, the sayde Lorde Darcie as Capitayne generall ordeyned for his prouost Marshall, Henry Gylford Esquire, a lustie yong man and welbeloued of the king. Now when the winde serued to their purpose they passed to the sea with foure ships royall, and the wether so fauoured them that they arryued within ten dayes next folowynge beyng the first day of June, at the Port of Kales in Southspayne, and immediatly the Lorde Darcie dispatched to the king of Arragon two Gentlemen called John Bartholomew and Wyllyam Symond, with letters to certefie the King of their arriuall, and what paine they had taken to come into his Countrie, in fulfilling the king their maisters commaundement. The messengers did so much that they came vnto the king beside the Citie of Ciuill, where he then lay & declared vnto him how the Lorde Darcie by the king their maisters appointment, was come thether with .xviij. hundred Archers, accordyng to the sayde king of Arragons request, and laye still at Kales to knowe his pleasure. The king of Arragon answered them gentlye, that the Lorde Darcie and all the other that were come from his most best beloued sonne were welcome, and hartely thanked them of their paynes, and prayed the messengers to returne to their Capitayne, shewing him that the king in all hast would send his counsaile vnto him, and so they departed from the king, and made report to the Lorde Darcie, which kept his ship in great estate and would not land, but onely suffred such as were sick and feeble, and fewe other to go a land. And those English that went a lande fell to drinking and were scarce maisters of themselves, some ranne to the stewes, some brake hedges and spoyled Orchardes and Wyneyardes, and did many other outrageous dedes: wherfore the chiefe of the towne of Kales came to complayne to the Lorde Darcie in his ship, which sent forth his prouost Marshall, who with much a doe brought them agayne on boord to their ships.

The next daye folowynge beyng Saturday, a Bishop and other of the kings counsaile arryued at Kales and there aboade vntill Wednesday next folowynge, at which day the Lorde Darcie tooke lande, and was honorably receaued of the king of Arragons counsaile, and on the moztow highly feasted both at dinner and supper. And after supper the Bishop declared the king of Arragons pleasure sayng: my Lorde Capitayne, the king my maister in most humble wise geueth you thankes for your great paynes and trauaile, as much as though he proceeded in his pretended enterpryse: But he with the aduise of his counsaile circumspectly considering the suretie of his awne realmes and dominions, hath persite knowlege that his aduersarie of Fraunce, prepareth to inuade his Countreies in his absence: wherfore he entending not to leaue his realmes boyde of men and ships (which might be a great comfort to his enemies to inuade) hath therefore taken an abstinence

of warre with the Moores vntill another time.

Well sayde the Lorde Darcie, sith it is fully concluded that we shall doe no seruite to your maister, we may not saye against his determination, considering that we were sent to him: But surely it is against my heart, which euer hath desired to fight against Gods enemies: But with your conclusion, I and all mine must be content.

You doe as you should doe, sayde the Bishop, and the king my maister geueth lyke thankes to the king his sonne, and to you all as though he had proceeded on his iourney. And you shall haue wages for al your souldyours, and if it shall please you to come to the Court, you shall receyue high thanks of the king, and such chere as there can be made you. That is not my desire saide the Lorde Darcie, for my men shall not say that I brought them out of their Countrie, and nowe to doe my selfe pleasure to leaue them without an head, as men of me forsaken: Nay, nay my Lorde, the Banquet is not my desire. So the Lordes parted for that night, and the next day in the moztowg was sent wages to conduct the armie into England, with dyuers gites geuen to the Lorde Darcie and other Gentlemen.

The same day beyng the .xiiij. day of June and Friday, an Englishman desired of a mayde that had bene at the bakers to buy bread for her maisters horse, and not to sell, to haue a toke for his money, she answered that she had none to sell, he saide he would haue one, and followed her: And when shee perceaued that shee was a force a force. The townes men of Kales shales soddenly rang their common Bell, and all the towne went to harnesse, and the fewe English men that were on land went to their Bowes. The Spanyardes cast dardes and fore annoyed the Englishmen, and they lykewise hurt and due dyuers Spanyardes. Then the Captaines of Englaunde for their part, and the Lords of the counsaile for their part tooke such payne that the fray was ceassed, and but one English man slayne, and of the Spanyards dyuers slayne. Then all the English men were commaunded to go on boord of their shippes. The Lordes of Spaine came to the Lorde Darcie, sayng: Sir we pray you sith you knowe the kings pleasure, that you with all your people will go with your shippes away, for we perceare yet owe vs some displeasure. Then he boldly answered sayng, that he would al the world knew, that he was as hable to conduct his men home ward, as he was to bring them out of their Countrie, without the king of Arragons wages (sayng his honor) and as for the fray, it was against his will, and without his knowledge: And so that nyght hee and all his men went aboode their shippes.

When this iourney was come to this point, Henry Gylford, Weston Browne, and William Sydney Esquires, yong and lustie Gentlemen, desired licence to see the Court of Spaine, which was to them graunted: And then they departed from Kales and came to the Court of the king of Arragon, where they were highly enterteyned, and he dubbed Henry Gylford and Weston Browne knights, and gaue to Syr Henry Gylford a Canton of Granada, and to Syr Weston Browne an Eggle of Sicill on a chiefe to the augmentation of their armes. Wyllyam Sydney so excused himselfe that he was not made knight. And when they had sojourned there a while, they toke their leaue of the king and Queene and so returned through Fraunce into England, where they demeaned themselves so, that they had the kings fauour, notwithstanding it was thought to the contrarie. In this meane tyme the Lord Darcie the .xxij. day of June sayled toward England and arriued at Plymnoth, and came to the king at Windsoze in the Month of August, and thus ended this boyage.

Margaret Duchess of Sauoy.

During the time that the lord Darcy was in Spaine, the Lady Margaret Duches of Sauoy & daughter to Maximilian the Emperoz and gouernour of the countries of Flaunders, Brabant, Holland, and Seland, & other the lowe Countries apperteyning to Charles the yong Prince of Castell, then beyng of tender age sent in the ende of May to the king of England, to haue .xv. hundred Archers to ayde her against the Duke of Guelders, which sore troubled the Countries afoze sayde. The king tenderly regardyng the request of so noble a Lady, and also for that there was then a communication of marriage to be had betwene the yong prince Charles and the Ladie Marie his sister, most gently graunted her request, and appointed Syr Edward Poyninges knight of the Garter, and Comptroller of his house, a valiant Capitayne and a noble warrour to be Lieutenant and conductor of the sayde .xv. hundred Archers, which beyng accompanied with the Lord Clinton his sonne in lawe, Syr Mathewe Browne, Sir John Digby, John Werton, Richard Wetherill and Sherley Esquires, and dyuers tallie Gentlemen and yomen, well knowen and tryed to the sayde number of .xv. hundred, tooke their shipping at Sandwicke the .xxij. day of July, and landed at Armeu the .xix. day, not without some trouble by reason of a storme. And being landed he sent Lancaster an Herault to aduertise the Lady of their arriual, which forthwith sent to them Lorde Breshy knight of the Coyson (the which is commonly called the golden fleete) and dyuers other to welcome them, and so conducted them to Barowe, where the Lord of the towne made them great cheere. And the same day at after noone came the Ladie Margaret to Barowe, where the Capitayne with all his vnder Capitaynes receaued her at the gate, whome thee welcommed most hartlye, and so thee did all the Souldiours which stood along ranged in the strete. And the next day folowynge thee saw all the companie shoote: And the same night the Capitayne and other tooke his leaue of her and departed to Rossynda'e, and on Thursday beyng the last day of July he came to Buldike, and that day the Ladie Margaret came thether. And the next day the whole armie of Almaynes, Flemings and other apperteyning to the sayde Ladie, met with the Englishmen without Buldike, where they set forth in order, the Lady Margaret beyng present, who there tooke her leaue of all the Capitaynes and went to Buldike, whom Sir Edward Poyninges conducted to the gate, and then returned to the armie.

The armie to the number of ten thousand of the Ladies part, and .xv. hundred Englishmen passed through Brabant, and came the tenth day of August next folowynge before a little Castell standyng on the higher syde of the ryuer of Hase, called Brimuoyst, strongly Bulwarked, in the which were an hundred men belongyng to the Bastard of Gelders, with a Capitayne called Langhessell van Gelder, which robbed and spoyled al the partes of Brabant. They within shot fiercely at the armie as it passed by, but dyd them little hurt. The same night Thomas Heart chiefe Gonner of the English part, made his approche with his ordinaunce, and in the moornyng beat downe as much as might be beaten downe for the Bulwarkes, and the next day beyng the .xi. day of August, the Castell was assaulted valiantly and taken by force, and the Capitayne and .lxxx. and odde men were slaine, and .xix. taken, of the which a .xj. were hanged. John Horton Capitayne of an hundred Englishmen, and one Guyot an Esquier of Burgoyne, cryng Burgoyne, Saint George, there was one Englishman slaine and no more. The .xii. day of August, the army ferped ouer the ryuer of Hase into the land of Gelders, and there sojourned at a little Church that night, and the next day they came to a towne called Elke, belongyng to the Bastard of Gelders, where all the people were fled, and there was vndermyned and cast downe a little Castell standyng vpon the sayde ryuer newly builded. The .xx. day of August they brent the towne of Elke, and all the Countrie rounde about it, and came at the last to a towne called Strawly, a strong towne & double ditched and walled, and within it thre hundred .lx. good men of warre beside the Inhabitauntes, which at the first commyng shot Gonnes fiercely, and hurt many, and there they planted their siege.

Sir Edward Poyninges which euer was in the forwarde with hys archers, caused fagottes to be made, and Trenches to be digged, and his men were so diligent, that his Trenches in the Moornyng approached so nigh the towne gate, that they within were halfe dismayed, and desired to speake with the Lordes, and so they did, and the .xxiiij. day of August were six men sent out of the towne to treat, and six hostages deliuered for them, and then it was agreed that all men of warre shoulde depart the towne with a whyte sticke in their handes, and to forseyre all other thinges: And all the Towne dwellers to be prisoners at the will of the Prince of Castell. The next day after that the men of warre were departed, early in the Moornyng Sir John Digby knight, and John Horton Esquier toke possession of the towne with two hundred Englishmen. And at after noone, the Admirall of Flaunders, Sir Edward Poyninges, and the Lorde Disclaine chiefe Capitaynes of the Armie, with all other noble men with Trompets, and their Heraultes in their Cotes of armes before them, as Arthoys, Lancaster, and Ostriche, entered the towne, and in the towne Hall tooke the othe of the Inhabitauntes, and that night returned againe to the armie.

The .xxvi. day of the sayd Month, Sir John Digby and John Horton came out of the towne with all their Englishmen, and for them entered a Capitayne called Ponker Otes, with two hundred and fiftie Almaynes to kepe there a garrison, the which day the armie went before Wenlowe, and they sent Arthoys with a Trompet to summon the towne: But they would not heere them speake, but shot Gonnes at them. The .xxviiij. day the armie removed vnto the Northside of Wenlowe, and part went ouer the water, and made Trenches to the water. The Capitayne of the Englishmen made Trenches euen to the towne dicke, and the Artillary bet downe the Towres of the walles. The siege thus continuynge not without daily skirmishes .xxix. daues, Sir Edward Poyninges, and Sir John Digby dined one day with Hounfire de Romp, and all other English Capitaynes and petie Capitaynes dynd with an Almaine called Cleue Anderlyne, except Sir Mathewe Browne, and John Fogge which kept the fieelde, & Richard Wetherill which kept the Trench, and was sore beset. And in the dinner tyme they of the Towne issued out vpon the English men, and hurt and toke one Sheldwiche of Cauntozbury prisoner, and one Miles: But the English men slue and hurt many of them, and compelled them to returne by force of arrowes, and so they reculed with one prisoner. For Miles which was led betwene two of the Gelders, perceiuyng rescue comyng, after as he came to an hill, thrust the two Gelders downe the hill before him, and so ranne backe to his companie, which the two Gelders that led him perceiuyng, came to Sheldwiche and slue him. After long siege layde to this towne, and no good done, for the towne was so great that they had not men enough to compass it, they all agreed to breake by their siege and armie for that yere, and so departed. Sir Edward Poyninges went to the Court of Burgoyne, where he was highly enterceined of the yong Prince, and of the Ladie Margaret his Aunt, and receiued great giftes and thankes for his paynes. And after that Sir Edward Poyninges with all the other Capitaynes of the English men had bene highly feasted, and more prayed for their valiauntesse, than he with all his companie returned into England, and had lost by warre and sicknesse not fully an hundreth persons.

The returne of Sir Edward Poyninges.

In June the king beyng at Leicester, tidynges was brought vnto him, that Androw Barton a Scottishe man and a Pirate of the Sea, sayng that the Scottes had warre with the Portingales, did rob every nation, and so stopped the kinges streames, that no Marchaunt almost coulde passe. The king beyng greatly moued with this craftie Pirate, sent Sir Edmond Haward Lorde Admirall of Englande, and Lorde Thomas Haward, sonne and heyre to the Erle of Surrey, in all the haste to the Sea, which hastily made redie two shippes, and without any lenger abode tooke the Sea, and by chaunce of weather were seuered. The Lorde Haward lying in the Downes, perceiued where Androw was makyng toward Scotland, and so fast the sayd Lorde chased him, that he overtooke him, and there was a sore battaile: The English men were fierce, and the Scottes defended themselves manfully, but in the ende the Lorde Haward and his men entered the maine decke, and in conclusion Androw was taken, beyng so sore wounded that he dyed there, and the remnant of the Scottes were taken, with their Shippe called the Lion.

Androw Barton a Scottishe pirate taken and slayne.

All this while was the Lorde Admirall in chate of the Barke of Scotlande called Jenny Pirwyn, which was wont to sayle with the Lion in company, and so much did he with other that he layed him aboord and fiercely assailed him, and in the end the Lorde Admirall entred the Barke and slawe many and tooke all the rest. Thus were these two shippes taken and brought to Blacketwall the second daye of August, and all the Scottes were sent to the Bishoppes place of Porke, and there remayned at the kings charge vntill other order was taken for them.

After this the kyng sent the Bishop of Winchester and certayne of his Counsaile to the Archbishop of Porke's place where the Scottes were prisoners. And there the Bishop reherfed to them, where as peace was yet betwene England and Scotland, that they contrarie ther vnto as theues and Pirates had robbed the Kinges subiectes within his streames: wherfore they had deserued to dye by the lawe and to be hanged at the lowe water marke.

Then

Then sayde the Scottes we knowlege our offence and aske mercy and not the lawe: Then sayd a Priest we appeale from the kings iustice to his mercy. Then the Bishop asked him if he were aucthorised by them to say so: and they cried all yea, yea: Then sayd he you shall finde the kings mercie aboute his iustice. For where ye were dead by the lawe, yet by his mercie he will reuiue you: wherfore ye shall departe out of this realme within .xx. dayes, vpon paine of death if ye be found here after .xx. dayes, and praye for the kyng, and so they passed into their countrey.

The king of Scottes hearing of the death of Androw Barton and taking of his two shippes was wonderfull wroth, and sent letters vnto the kyng, requiring restitution according to the league & amitie. The kyng wrote with brotherlye salutation to the king of Scottes, for the robberies and euill doings of Androw Barton and that it became not one Prince to laye a breache of a league to another prince in doing iustice vpon a Pirate and a theefe: and that all the other Scottes had deserued to die by iustice if he had not extended his mercy: and with this answer the Scottishe Heralde departed home.

During this season there began great warre betwene Pope Iulie and the frenche king Lewys the twelue. The occasion began by one John Bentiuoyle a great Lord of Italy, which kept the Citie of Bolonia le grace from the Pope which by the ayde of the french kyng gate the sayd Citie from the aforesaid John Bentiuoyle. But afterward because the sayd Pope Iulie tooke peace with the Venecians, the french king turned from the Pope and made warre on him on the behalfe of John Bentiuoyle, and tooke from him againe the sayd Citie of Bolonia.

The kyng of England wrote often to king Lewys of fraunce to desist from the persecuting of the Pope which was his friend and confederate. To the which writing the french king gaue litle care: wherfore the king sent him word to deliuer his lawful inheritaunce, both of the Duchy of Normandie and Guyan and the Countreys of Anieow and Hayne, and also of his Crowne of fraunce, else he would come with such a power, that by fine force he would obtaine his purpose. For all these writings the french king made warres still in Italie, and the king could haue of him no certaine answer. Wherfore after great deliberation had, he by the aduice of his counsaile determined to make warre on the french king and his Countreys, and calling to him Maximilian the Emperour and Ferdinand king of Arragon and diuers other Princes, he made great preparation both by Sea and land, and fortified his frontiers against fraunce, and set forth shippes to the Sea for defence of his Marchaunts, which were dayly in icoperdy vnder a pretended peace of the french king Lewys the twelue.

King Lewys the eight taketh the Popes part.

The fiftenth daye of Januarie next following the king held his high Court of Parliament at Westminster and there was graunted vnto him toward the maintenance of his warres with fraunce two fiftenes of the tennporaltie and two Dimes of the Clergye. And during the time of this parliament one Newbolt yoman of the Kinges gard whome the king highly fauoured, neww fully a seruaunt of the Lorde Willoughbyes in the Pallace of Westminster, where he longe two daies in example of other.

rupt, and had bene conueied out of the realme for debt, was now in such fauour with Pope Iulij, that he made him his Collector and Procter in England, & so he kept a great porte and oftentimes resorted to the kyng and his counsaile for the Popes affayres which then was sore troubled by the French king, so that he knew both the Popes counsell and the kinges, and falsly and vntrewe-ly resorted in the night vnto the French Ambassadors liyng in London, and to them discouered what the king and Pope intended, which was not so close-ly done but the king knew it: and so he was layd for, and was taken commo-ning with one of the sayd Ambassadors late in the night, and was brought to the Tower of London, where he remained vntill by the sute of his friends he was deliuered, and shortly for shame he boyded the realme.

The King of Arragon, which also had warre wth the French king, and heering that his sonne, the kyng of England would make warre in Fraunce, did write to hym that the Duchy of Guyan was his true inheritance, which adioyned to his country of Biskey: wherfore if the king of England would entend to recouer his Duchy fyrst, and send an armie of men to Biskey, and so to begin at Bayon, which is the keye of Guyan, he woulde ayde them with ordinaunce, horsemen, and beastes for cariage, with other necessaries apper- taining to the same. The king and his counsaile putting their affiaunce in the promise of the king of Arragon prepared a noble army al of footemen & small ordinaunce trusting to the king of Arragon for the ayde of horsemen and great ordinaunce, and of the same made Capitaine the noble Lord Thomas Graye Marques Dorset to whome he assigned manye other Gentlemen as after shall apere.

The kyng nowe greatlye studiyng to furnishe his warre which he had begon against the frenche king, caused Sir Edward Haward his Admy- rall, with all dilligence to take the Sea, which with all speede possible, made readie diuerse goodly and talle shippes, as the Soueraigne and other to the number of .xxviii. beside litle shippes: and in his companie were Capitaynes, Sir Weston Brovne, Griffith Donne, Edward Cobham, Thomas Wyn- dam, Thomas Lucye, William Birton, Henrie Sherborne, Stephin Will, George Witwange, John Hopton, William Grimstone, Thomas Draper, Edmond Cooke, John Bordet, with diuers other. When all these were ship- ped, they sayled to Douer, and skowzed the seas, and so came befoze Portel- mouth about the middelt of Meye.

The thirde daue of Meye a Gentillman of Flaunders called Guyot of Guye came to the king with five hundred Almains all in white, which was cut so small that it could scarce hold together. After they had mustered at the Blackheath, the king made him knight, and gaue him a great chayne and a yerely pencion, and sent hym with his band to Southampton, there to tary the comming of the Marques Dorset.

About myd Meye the Lorde Marques Dorset and other noble men appointed by the king for the iourney of Biskey as the Lord Haward sonne and heire to the Erle of Surrey the Lorde Brooke, the Lorde Willoughbie, the Lord Ferrers, the Lorde John, the Lorde Anthony, and the Lorde Leo- nard Grege, all three brethren to the Marques, Sir Griffith Alrice, Sir Maurice Berkeley, Sir William Sandes, The Baron of Burforde, Sir Richard Cornewale, his brother William Husey, John Helton, William

Kingston

Kingston Esquires, Sir Henr Willoughby and diuers other with Souldi- ours to the number of ten thousand men, came to Southampton and there mustered, and hauing a freshe winde they were all shipped and passed to the Sea the .xviij. daue of May, and he with all his Flaue arrived in Biskey at a Port called Passagh, Southwest of Fountrabye: And the thirde daue of June the Lorde Marques and all his whole company landed and tooke the fielde, & him wisely embateled for his safegarde. The Biskeyngs that brought victuall to the armie, sayde to the Souldiers, Sirs you are arrived here in trust that the king of Arragon will helpe you with ordinaunce and cariages, we here of no pzeparatio that he maketh, nor neuer sent vs worde to prepare for your comming, of the tohich we marueil much. These wordes ranne daily through the Hoise, which made many men sad and to muse, and the Biskeyngs sore feared least the Englishmen would destroy their Countrie, because their king kept not promise with them. But the Marques made such streight pro- clamacion, that no souldier durst do any iniury vnto them. Within thre daues after the armie had lyen in the fielde, there came to him an Erle and an other Noble man to welcome him and his companie. Then the Lorde Capitayne remoued his fielde, and tooke another place nerer Fountraby, more plente- ous of Water and Wood, and there pitched his fielde, euerie daue lookyng for ayde of the king of Arragon, but he heard of none. Then he called a coun- saile and deuised how they might haue Beastes to drabe ordinaunce and ca- riages. Then one Sir John Stile an Englishman caused to be bought two hundred Mullettes and Asses of such price as the Spanyards gained great- lie: but when they were put to carpe, they woulde neyther beare nor drabe, for they were Beastes which were not exercised befoze. Then the Lorde Marques much lamented the chaunce: for if he had had ready two hundred drawing Beastes, he myght haue ronne a great waye into Guyan with his power, which then was not forstefied neither of men, of warre, nor munition, nor artillarie.

The Frenchemen of Bayon, hearing of the English mens campe, made a great ascrie betwene the ryuer of Saint Maria and Bayon: the English men perceuyng the same, passed the ryuer in good order of battayle, all be- yng on foote for lack of the horsemen that the king of Arragon promised, and so with arrowes chased the Frenchmen on horsebacke that they fled, and many horses foundered, and many a man was brosed or they came to Bayon, at the tohich the Englishmen laughed and lamented. First to see their co- wardnesse, second, to remember what they might haue done, if they had had horses meete for their purpose: yet all this notwithstanding, they retired to their Campe in such order, that the Spanyardes wondered much, both at their fierce courage and sober order.

The king of Nauerre hearing of the pyssaunt armie of the Englishmen liyng in Biskey so neere to his Countrie, was sore trembled, and wondered much what the matter should meane: wherfore, he sent to the Lorde Mar- ques, a Bpshop and dyuers other, to shewe to him and all his counsaile, that if it pleased them, his Countrie should sende them vittayle, and all things ne- cessarie for their money, and to doe any other pleasure that they could doe, which might be to the pleasure of him and all his armie, so that his realme should be sure of any inuasions to be made by his people.

Biskey.

The Marques being Capitaine generall, with the aduise of the other Lords and counsaile, much highly thanked the king of Nauerre of his good will, aide, and comfort, which things only they required: and if it pleased him that his people will and maye bittaille vs, we shall not onely pay them for it, but also warrant their passing and repassing for vs and oures in safetie, and that by vs no preiudice shall be done to his realme, nor by our consent. With which aunswere the king of Nauerre was ioyous, and suffered his people to bittaille, and resort to the hoste, with all thyngs necessarie and belongyng to the same, in great windes and stormes, for that time happened much winde and raine, which sore encombered the souldiours, that lay nightly on the bare ground, for euery man had not a tent or pauilion, wherof some were lame, and some deaffe, with other diseases.

When the armie had lien there. xxx. dayes, in the second Moneth there came from the king of Arragon, a Byshop and other nobles of his counsaile: but when it was knowne that it was the same Byshop that made the aunswere to the Lord Darcie at Kales Wales, as you haue heard the last yere, then many said, he came for no good but for delays: but he required the lord Marques to take pacience, for shortly such preparation should be made, that he should see and prooue, that it should be to the honoz of his maister, and his great renoume. To whome the Marques aunswere, that vpon confidence of the king of Arragons promise, that they should lacke no beastes meete for drawyng, and horsemen, the king of Englande had sent him and his companions thether, whereof we haue trusted sithe our first hether comyng, which things if we had had, we had done other enterpryses then we haue done: for now we haue lye here in Campe, to the great charge of our maister the king of Englande, and to no profite, and to our losse and great hurt. For at our arryual the Country of Guyan for the which we came, was vnprouided of men of warre, munitions, and ordinaunce, by reason wherof, (if al things had bene accomplished of the part of your maister as we trusted) we might haue had that which we came for, and if our commission had not bene to folow the king your maisters will, as to whome we be sent, I assure you we would haue done otherwise or this: but now the Frenchmen haue fortified, bittayled, and manned their townes, and we haue spent time and done nothing at all, luygering for the king your maister, to the losse of vs and great blemishing of our honours.

The Byshop perceyuing that the Englishe Capitaynes were courageous and discontent with their ydle abode, flatteringly desired them to tarie a whyle for the best, for a backe enemye sayde he, is to be regarded. Then said the Lorde Marques Capitaine generall, if we knewe the kinges intent, it would suffice vs. Then sayde the Byshop, you shall knowe it shortly: and so he departed from the armie.

The armie this luygering, euer desirous to be at the businesse that they came for, their bittaille was much part Carlike, and the Englishe men did eate of the Carlike with all meates, and dranke hote wyne in the hote weather, and did eate all the hote frutes that they could get, which caused their bloud so to boyle in their bellies, that there fel sick thre thousand of the sike, and thereof died. xxiiij. hundred men.

The Lord Marques and other Capitaynes perceyuing this mischief, sent sent to the king of Arragon certaine Lordes of the hoste to knowe his pleasure. The which aunswere them with gentle fashion, that the counsaile of Englande and hys counsaile, had taken an order in all thyng of late, and howe the Duke Dalua a great Prince of Spaine, should shortly with an armie royall ioyne with them, and so to proceede in their enterpryse. Wherwith which aunswere and small cheere, the Lordes of Englande departed, and made report to their Capitaine according, which thought it verie sleight, but euer hee regarded his Maysters commaundement, and counsailed all the Lordes to be content with the same.

The armie lying thus, still, and the sicknesse not slaked, the people being ydle, some euill disposed persons sayd, that euery Capitaine was allowed viij. pence for euery common Souldiour, which was vntreue, for they had allowed onely sixe pence, and so began to gather companies. The Lordes perceyuing this, tooke with them their trustie seruautes, and toke the beginners of the mischief, which were of the retinue of the Lorde Willoughby, and put them in warde. When they were arrested, other of like euill disposition began to crake and face: which thing being perceyued, the Lord Marques by the aduise of other Capitaynes caused serch to be made, and so found out the beginner of the mischief, which was deliuered to William Kingston Esquier, then Prouost Marshall, and so was put to death to the terror of all other.

The English men thus lying ydely abiding the ayde of the king of Arragon, tidynges came dayly into the hoste, howe the Duke Dalua was comyng with a great puyssaunce to ioyne with the Englishe armie, and so to invade Guian: the Englishe Capitaynes were ioyfull of these tidynges, not so much for the ayde of the Spaniardes, which they little regarded, but for the beastes for Cariage of great Artillarie.

Nowe they thus looking for the Duke Dalua, heard euery day howe he marched towarde them, and was within a dayes iourney or little more of them, of the which the English men were marueylous ioyfull, but the Duke which pretended another thing, sodainly remoued his armie in a night with such diligence that he entered the realme of Nauerre, and was before the Citie of Pampilona the chiefe Citie of Nauerre, before the king wist of it, which nothing suspected of that pollicie.

Thus the king was sodainly trapped, supposing the armie of Spaine to haue bene raised to inuade Guyan, and hauing nothing defensible for the war, in y night fled out at a posterne into Fraunce, where he after died. The Citie of Pampilona and all the Countrie of Nauar, being vnprouided of artillarie and other defences, yeelded themselves to the Spaniardes, and thus was the realme of Nauerre wonne, which thing made the Lord Marques and his companie not a little to maruaile. So shortly after came to the Lorde Capitaine of the Englishe men, dyuers Lordes sent from the king of Arragon, which sayde: The king our soueraigne Lorde sendeth to you great gramercie, and highly thanketh you for your paine, and so it is, that by Gods grace and your good abode, he with his power hath taken and conquered the realme of Nauerre, and if that countrie had not bene taken, they might haue intercepted all such ordinaunce and bittaille, as the king of Arragon our maister might haue sent to you, but nowe you be in such a suretie and his pupssaunce with you, and yours with his, that ye maye safely ioyne, which you shall see shortly, yea, & he himselfe in proper person to ioyne with you. Well sayde the Lorde Marques Capitaine generall, we have iourneied long here abidyng his comming, and if the commission and expresse commaundement of the king my soueraigne Lorde were not, that I should doe nothing without the assent of the king your maister, I assure you that the french men should haue knowne that Englishe men had bene here, and not to haue lpen so long in ydlenesse as we haue done: but if the king your maister do as you report, it shall be much to his honoz and to our great comfort, and so the Lordes of Spaine departed.

Thus the armie lay till the Moneth of October, and Winter began soze to encrease, and the Lorde Marques Capitayne generall fell soze sicke, and then the Lorde Harward had vnder him the whole gouernaunce of the army, to whome were sent diuers Lordes of the priuie Counsaile of Spaine, sayng: the king our Maister sendeth you woerde, that he would gladly come to you, but the season is spent, the grounde is so moyst that cariage can not be conuened, the fieldes so barren that beastes can not feede, and the weather so troublous that people can not well lye abrode in campe: therefore he would desire you all these things considered, to breake by your field, and seuer your selfe to the towne and billages of his Country, till the spring of the yere, at which tyme there shall resort to you, freshe succors out of Englande, and he himselfe will be with you with all ordinaunce necessary, as becometh to such an armie, and then shall procede the first pretended enterpryse, to the honoz of the king your maister and ours, and not to your small fame and renowne. When this message was heard by the whole Counsaile, no man was contented, but the Lorde Harward which had the whole gouernaunce vnder the Marques sayd: What report of honoz can we make of the king of Arragon your maister, for at his desyre we be come hether, & here haue lpen in campe a long space, euer tariyng for perfozmaunce of his promise, and yet nothing hath he perfozmed, our people be dead of the fire in great number: we gentlemen eche one doth much lament this long ydlenesse, by reason wherof many a tall man hauyng nothing to doe, but abidrug your Maisters pleasure, hath fallē into some mischiese, or by sicknesse, or else for misdoing executed by iustice. What shall the king our maister report of our slouthfulnesse, which hath spent him innumerable treasure and nothing gayned? And yet we would make Winter warre, and the king of Arragon your maister bs denieth of such thinges as he promised, and willeth bs like Cowardes to our dishonour to rayse our campe without any notable act done on the frenchmen, for which cause we came.

The Spanyardes perceiuing the grudge of the Englishe men, sayd that time passed could not be reuoked, and that they had not lpen ydly, for the frontiers of Guyan had susteyned suche damage, as in many yeres they shall not recouer againe, and all this while the frenchmen durst not meddle with you, so that you haue lost no honoz, and if you tary here this Winter by your daylie skirmitshing, they shall receyue great damage: during which tyme, the king our maister hath commaunded, that things meete and necessary for you shall be at your commaundement, and in the spring of the yere, he shall ioyne with you, so that your enemies & his shall well know your pupssaunce, for he taketh all enemies to you, to be his, so with fayre woordes the counsaile of Spaine departed.

Then the Lorde Harward beyng chiefe, because the Marques was sick, counsailed with all the other Lordes and Capitaines, and so in the ende of October they agreed to breake by their Campe, and so they did, and the Lorde Marques and his people went to Saint Sebastian, the Lorde Harward and his retinew to Remde, and the Lorde Willoughby to Garschang, Sir Wylliam Sandes and manye other Capitaines to Fountrabie, and so euery Capitayne with his retinew were seuered in diuers Villages.

The Englishe souldiours, what for sicknesse, and what for miserie of the Countrey, euer desired to retorne into England. The king of Englande aduertised by the king of Arragon of his intent, and how he would set for ward the first spring, sent Wynsoze his Herauld of armes to his armie wyl ling them there to tarie, and that he would send them newe ayde, vnder the conduite of the Lord Harbert, his Chamberlaine: which letter when it was red, the Souldiours began to murmure and grudge after suche a sort, say yng: that they would not abide and die of the fire in such a wretched Coun trie, to be defrauded and mocked of the king of Arragon the next yere, as they were this yere, and spake such outrageous woordes, that the Capitaine could not stay them, insomuch that they in a furie had slayne the Lorde Har ward and dyuers other, if they had not folowed their mindes, and so they hi red shippes and put the Lorde Marques in one, which was so weake that he asked where he was: and then euery man shipped, which was in No uember, and in the beginning of December they landed in Englande. The king of Arragon was soze discontent with their departing, for they spent much money and substaunce in his Countrey, and sayde openly, that if they had taried, he would haue inuaded Guyan, and the Englishe men were glad that they were departed out of such a Countrey, where they had little helth, lesse pleasure, and much losse of time: but by their lpyng there, the king of Ar ragon stole the realme of Nauerre, and the Englishe men left as much mo ney there, as he sent into England with his daughter.

When the Marques sayled into Spaine in the Moneth of Maye, the same time Sir Edward Harwarde Lorde Admirall of Englande, as you haue heard befoze, sayled toward Britaine, and on Trinitie Sunday arri ued at Bertram Bay in Britaine, with twentie great shippes, and sodainely set his men on lande: then the Britaynes made an ascrie, and set their Bea cons on fyze, and shot out of a Bulwarke that they had fortiefied at the poynt of the Bay: but the Englishe men which were in the ship of Wylliam Gon stone Grocer of London, tooke first lande naugre them all, and all other after, and so manfully they set on the Bulwarke that they wanne it, and the Britons fled and many slayne. Then the Admirall set hys men in an order, and passed in the Countrey seuen Myles, burning and waisting towne and Villages: and in hys retorne he skirmitshed with diuers men of armes and Que dyuers of them, and notwithstanding the Britons fought valyauntly for defence of their Countrey, yet they lost and nothing wanne: and so the Lorde Admirall returned to his ship.

Upon Monday the .xxiiij. daye of May he landed in the morning, and commaunded to burne the Lorde Piers Reguns place, and the towne of Conket

Conket and dyuers other places, and chased the Byttons to the Castell of Brest, and for all assemblies and howes that the Byttons made, yet they suffered the Englishe men peaceably to returne with their prayes & gaines. The Byttons seying the hurt that the name of England did to them, sayde: alas the King of England hath euer befoze this time succoured vs, and now he intendeth to destroy vs, shame come to him that is the cause thereof.

The first day of June the Englishe men toke lande in Cropton Bay: then the Lordes of Brittain sent word to the Lord Admirall, that if he would abyde, they would fight with him in playne fielde. The Admirall rewarded the messenger, and sayde, go say to them that sent thee, that all this day they shall finde me here tariyng their comming. Then he to encourage dyuers Gentlemen dubbed them knightes, as Syr Edward Brooke, brother to the Lord Cobham, Syr Griffithe Doune, Syr Thomas Wyndam, Syr Thomas Lucie, Sir Willyam Pirton, Sir Henry Shirborne, Sir Stephen Bull, Sir John Burdett: Then the Lorde Admirall highly encouraged his men when he sawe the Byttons come, which were ten thousande at the least, the Englishe men but onely. xxv. C. or fewe aboue, bydding them remember the honor and renoune that should come to them, if they garded the iorney, and yet if they were slayne, their valyauntnesse was to be praysed, and their true diligence to doe their mayster service much to be allowed.

When the Byttons sawe the order of the Englishe men, and their Banners displayed, they were sodenly astonied: then a Gentleman of Briteyn of much experience, advised the other Capitaynes not to fight, but to returne a little and to take a strong ground, and to watch the Englishe men, when they returned to their shippes, and then to take the aduantage. And so the Capitaynes began to returne: and when the Commons sawe them returne, all they ranne away as fast as they might, supposyng that their Capitaynes had scene or knowen some great perill towarde them, because they were not priue of their Capitaynes Counsaile. And when they came home to their houses, some sayd the battaile was great, and some sayde that the Englishe men were xl. thousand. The Lord Admirall seying this chaunce, when night came departed to his shippes: but yet they knew not why they fled, till after he heard the truth. The Gentlemen of Briteyn called a great counsaile, sayng: that the Englishe men daily wasted the Countrie on the Sea coste, and that there was no trust in the Commonaltie, and that the Gentlemen alone could not defende the Countrie: wherefoze, they concluded to sende a Messenger to the Lord Admirall, desiryng him of a safe conduite for diuers persones to speake with him, the which he gently graunted. Then certaine Lordes of Briteyn toke a Boate, and came to the ship of the Lorde Admirall, where he was set with all the Counsaile of the Capitaynes about him. Then they desired him humbly to successe off his rigorous and cruell warre, and especially of burning of townes which to you is no profite, and if you will haue the Castell of Brest, it shall be at your commaundement, so that you be able to defende it, and we desire nothing so much as peace. Nay sayde the Lorde Admirall, we are sent hether to make warre and not peace. Then they humbly required him for Goddes sake to graunt them peace for sixe dayes, so that they might send to the King their Lorde, to aduertise him of their trouble and calamitie. Then the Lord Admirall answered, that Gentlemen ought to defende defende their Countrie by force, rather then to sue for peace: with the which sayng the Byttons were ashamed: yet they hartily thanked him, and so he made them a banket, and they departed: and they sent a land for fresh water and other freshe vitayles, and then heeryng that there were men of warre upon the sea, he coasted from them alongst all the coastes of Normandie, still scouryng the Seas, so that no enemye appered: & at the last came and lay by the Isle of Wight, to see if any enemies would appere on the Englishe coast: duryng which tyme diuers shippes kept the North seas, vnder the conduite of Sir Edward Ichyngham, John Lewys, and John Loueday, which diligently scoured the seas.

The king euer remembryng his warres, caused all his Shippes and Galies to be rigged and prepared, with al maner of ordinaunce and artillery, meete for shippes of warre. And amongst all other, he decked the Regent a ship royall, as chiefe ship of that nauie, and then caused Shouldours meete for the same shippes to muster on Blacke heath, and he appoynted Capitaynes for that tyme, Sir Anthony Dughtred, Sir Edward Ichyngham, William Sidney, and dyuers other Gentlemen, which shortly shipped and came before the Isle of Wight, but in their passage a Galley was lost by negligence of the Mayster.

The King desiryng to see his nauie together, rode to Portesmouth, and there he appoynted Capitaynes for the Regent, Sir Thomas Kniuet, Mayster of his horse, and Sir John Carew of Deuonshire. And to another ship royall called the Souereigne, he appoynted Sir Charles Brandon, and Sir Henry Guilford, and with them in the Souereigne were put. lx. of the tallest yomen of the kinges Garde, and manye other Gentlemen were made Capitaynes. The king made a great banquet to all the Capitaynes, & euery one sware to another euer to defende, ayde, and comfort one another, without failyng, and this they promised before the king, which committed them to God, and so with great noyse of Minstrelsie they tooke their shippes, which were. xxv. in number of great burden, and well furnished of all thinges.

The French king heeryng what dammage the Englishe men had done in Briteyn, strongly furnished his Nauie in the Hauen of Brest, to the number of. xxxix. sayle, and for chiefe ordeyned a Caricke of Brest, apperteinyng to the Queene his wife, which was Duchesse and heyze of Briteyne called Cordelier, which was a strong ship furnished in all poyntes, and so they set forward out of Brest, the tenth day of August, and came to Briteyne Bay, in which place the selfe same day, the Englishe nauy was arryued.

When the Englishe men perceyued the French nauie to be out of Brest Hauen, then the Lorde Admirall was very ioyous, then euery man prepared accordyng to his duetie, the Archers to shooft, the Gonners to lose, the men of armes to fight, the Pages went to the top Castell with Dartes: thus all thinges beyng provided and set in order, the Englishe men approached toward the Frenchmen, which came fiercely forward, some leauyng his Ancre, some with his foresayle onely to take the most aduantage: and when they were in sight, they shot ordinaunce so terribly together, that all the Sea coast sounded of it. The Lorde Admirall made with the great Shippe of Depe, and chased her still: Sir Henry Guilford and Sir Charles Brandon, beyng in the Souereigne, made with the great Caricke of Brest, and layde stemme stemme to stemme to the Caricke, but by negligence of the Maister, or else by smoke of the ordinaunce, or otherwise, the Soueraigne was cast at the sterne of the Caricke, with which aduantage the frenche men thought to toy: but when Sir Thomas Knivet which was readie to haue boarded the great ship of Depe, saw that the Soueraigne had missed the Caricke, which sir Anthony Doughtred chased hard at the sterne, and bowged her in diuers places, and set a fire her powder as some say, but sodeinly the Regent grappled with her a long boorde, and when they of the Caricke perceyued that they could not depart, they let slip an Ancre, and so with the streame the ships turned, and the Caricke was on the weather side, and the Regent on the lee syde, the fight was very cruell, for the Archers of the Englishe part, and the Crosbowes of the French part did their bittermost: but for all that the Englishe men entered the Caricke, which seeyng a Wretlet Conner beyng desperate, put fire in the Gonpowder, as other say, and set the whole ship of fyre, the flame whereof, set fire in the Regent, and so these two noble ships which were so grappled together that they could not part, were consumed by fyre. The French nauie perceiuyng this fled in all hast, some to Brest, and some to the Isles adioyning. The English men in maner dismayed, sent out Boates to hepe them in the Regent, but the fyre was so great that no man durst approach, sayng that by the James of Hull were certaine Frenchmen that could swim saued. This burnyng of the Caricke was happie for the French nauie, or else they had bene better assayed of the Englishmen, which were so amased with this chaunce, that they folowed them not. The Capitaine of this Caricke was sir Piers Morgan, and with him. cc. hundred men slaine and dead: And with sir Thomas Knivet, and sir John Carow, were seven hundred men drowned and brent, and that night all the Englishe men lay in Bartram Bay, for the French fleete was sparkeled as you haue heard.

The Carick and the Regent burned.

The Lord Admirall called all the Capitaines together, desiring them not to be ashamed with this chaunce of warre, for he thought nowe that this was the worst fortune that coulde happen to them, therefore to studie how to be reueged, and so they concluded all to goe to the Sea, which they did, and on the coast of Britaineooke many shippes, and such as they coulde not carie awaye they set on fire, small and great to a great number on all the coast of Britaine, Normandy and Picardy, and thus they kept the Sea. The king of England hearing of the losse of the Regent, caused a great ship to be made suche another as was neuer seene befoze in Englande, and called it Henrye grace de dieu.

Henry grace de dieu.

The French kyng heering that his fleete was thus deuided, and of the losse of his great Caricke, he sent to a knight of the Rhodes called Prior John, which had thre Gallies of force, wyth diuers foystes and Kobogalies so well ordinaunced and wyth such peces as was not seene in shippes befoze his comyng: for he laye one the coast of Barberye, to defend certaine of the religion of the Rhodes comyng to Tripoly, and at the French kinges request came into Britaine and ther taried.

Parliament wherunto was agreed that the king should ouer France with an armie royall.

In Nouember the king called his high court of Parliament, and there was concluded that the king himselte in person, wyth an armie royall would invade his realme of Fraunce, with fyre and Swoorde, which thing being knowne to his Subiectes, and especially to such as shoulde go with him, no man can doubt, but that preparation was made of harnesse, weapon, artillery, banners, and all other thinges necessarie for such an enterpryce.

And after the Purification of our Ladie, the king created Sir Charles Brandon Viscount Lisle. In Marche following, the kinges Nauie of shippes royall, and other mete for the warre set forth to the number of .lxxij. beside other Balangers: the Lorde Admirall was chiefe, and wyth hym Sir water Deuereux Lorde Ferrers, Syr Weston Browne, Sir Edward Tychyngham, sir Antony Boyntz, sir John wallop, syr Thomas Windam, sir Stephen Bull, William Fitz Wilyam, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidney Esquires, and diuers other noble and valiant Capitaines: they sayled to Portemouthe, and there laye abiding wynde: during which time the kyng sent into Flaunders for suche thinges as he needed, and caused them to be brought to Calice against his comyng.

When the wynde serued, the nauie royall of Englande wayed anker and made saile into Britaine, and came into Bertram Bay, and there laye at Anker in the sight of the French nauie. Now you must vnderstande, that all the great nauie which the French kyng had prepared, laye in the Hauen of Brest, so well furnished in all thinges, that no doubt it was a wonder to see: but when they were readie to set forth, and saw the English fleete on the coast, they determined to saue themselves in Brest hauen. Then the Englishmen determined cleuely to set on them in the hauen, and so in good order of battaile sayled forwarde, but at the first entrie one shippe, whereof Arthur Plantagenet was Capitaine, fell on a blinde Roche and brast a sunder, by reason whereof, all the other stayed to the great displeasure of all the remnant, and not to the litle ioye of the French men which shot at them without doyng anye harme. So the Englishe Capitaines perceiuyng that the Hauen was dangerous to enter without an expert Lodestman cast about and returned to their harborough at Bertram Bay againe.

The French men perceiuyng that the English men entended to assaule them, moored their shippes as nigh to the Castell of Brest as they could, and set Bulwarke on the lande on euery side to thooze at the Englishmen. Also they strapped together .xxiiiij. great Bulckes, that came to the Baye for salte, and set them on a rowe, to the entent that if the Englishmen would haue assaulted them, they would haue set them on a fier, and let them drie with the streame amongst the English nauie. Prior John also laye still in Blaque Sabble or Whitesande Baye, and plucked his Gallies to the thore, and set his Balsykes and other ordinaunce in the mouth of the Baye, which Baye was bulwarked on euery side, that by water it was not possible to be wonne.

The Lord Admirall perceiuyng the nauie of Fraunce to lye thus in feare and not willing nor daring to come abroad, but to lie as prisoners in a Dungeon, wrote to the king to come thether in person, and to haue the honor of so high an enterpryce: which wyting y kings counsaill nothing allowed, for putting the king in iesperdy by the chaunce of the sea. Wherfoze the king wrote sharply to him to accomplish y which appertayned to his duety: which caused him to take courage & to put things in aduenture as after you shal heare.

As you haue heard befoze, the Lorde Admirall of England laye still on the coast of Britayne in the Baye, called Bartrames Baye, so that for feare of him and the Englishe nauie, neyther the great shippes in Brest hauen

durst once mooue to the sea warde, nor yet Prioꝛ John for all hys strong Galies would once set out a sayle: sayng nowe and then sende forth hys small foystes, to make a thewe before the Englishe Hauie, which chased them to their Baye, but because the Englishe Shippes were so great they could not enter the Bay, and so manned out Boates and tooke one of the best foystes, and that with great daunger, for the Galies and the Bulwarke shot all at one time, that it was a wonder howe the Englishe men escaped.

The Admirall of Englande perceyving the Frenche mens pollicie, called a counsaile, and there determined first to assaile Prioꝛ John and his Galies, lying in Whitland Baye, and after to set on the remnant in the haven of Brest. Then first was appointed that Water Lorde Ferrers, Syr Stephin Bull and other Capitaynes, should go a lande with a convenient companie, to assault the Bulwarke of Whitland bay, while the Lord Admirall entered with rowe Barges and little Galies into the Bay, so that the Frenchmen should be assailed both by water and lande. Thus was it fully agreed by the whole counsaile: but alas, this Noble Capitaine counsailed by a Spanishe knight called Sir Alphons Charant (which sayde that he might enter the Baye with little ieopardie) called to him William Fitz William, William Cooke, John Colley, and Sir Weston Browne, as the chiefe and his most trustie friends, and declared to them that the matter was little, and the honoz great, if they onely took on them that enterprize, and let none other know of it. They like men of haute courage and desiring honoz, gladly assented: so on the .xxv. day of Aprill, the sayde Admirall put himselfe in a small rowe Barge, with thre other small rowing shippes, and his owne ship Boate, and so rowed sodainely into the Baye, where Prioꝛ John had moored his Galies iust to the grounde, which Galies with the Bulwarke on the lande, shot so terribly that they that folowed were afrayde: but as soon as he came to the Galies, he entred and drave out the French men. William Fitz William within his ship was soze hurt with a quarell. The Baye was berie halowe, and the other shippes could not enter, for the tide was spent, which thing the Frenchmen perceyving, and that there coulde come no succour to the Admirall, with Moris pikes entered agayne the Galies, and fought with the Englishe men in the Galies. And the Admirall perceyving their approaching, thought to haue entred agayne into his rowe Barge, which by violence of the tide was driuen downe the streine, and so with a pike was throwne ouer the boorde and so drowned, and there the sozenamed Alphons was slayne, and all the other Boates and vessels scraped hardly, for if they had taried, the tide had sayled them, and then all had bene lest. The Lord Ferrers and other Capitaines much were grieved with this chaunce, and some sayde he did it without counsaile, and so he hath sped. And therefore although that they would haue set on the Hauie in Brest haven, yet having no Admirall nor commission, they determined to do no farther till they knewe the kings pleasure, and so sayled into Englande. The French Hauie perceyving that the Englishe men made toward England, came out of their Hauens, and Prioꝛ John set forth his Galies and foystes, and coasted Britayne and Normandie, and crossed over to the coast of Suffer and all hys companie, and landed on the sca coast, and set fire on the pooze Cotages. The gentlemen that dwelt neere, shortly raysed the Countrie, and came to the the coast and drove Prioꝛ John to hys Galles. This was all the hurt that this stoute Capitaine of so great fame did to Englande, saving he robbed certayne pooze fishermen of Whytings. The king hearing of the death of his Admirall was not a little soze, considering both the nobilitie of his birth, and the valyauntnesse of his person, but all soze awaileth not when the chaunce is past. Therefore the king hearing that the French Hauie was a-broade, called to him the Lorde Thomas Hawarde, elder brother to Syr Edward Haward late Admirall, and sonne and heire apparant to the Erle of Surrey, and made hym Admirall, wylling hym to reuenge his brothers death, which with great reuerence, thanked the king of the highe trust that he had put in him. And then immediatly went to the sea, and so nobly and valyauntly did scowze the sea, that the Frenche men had no lust to keepe the coast of Englande, for he fought with them at their owne portes.

The Lorde
Thomas
Hawarde
made Lorde Admirall.

The king which had all things necessarie and meete for the warre, intending to passe the sea in proper person, appoynted the valiant Lord George Talbot Erle of Shrewesburie, and high steward of his household to be Capitaine generall of his foreward, and in his companie were Lorde Thomas Stanley Erle of Darbie, Lorde Decowrey Prioꝛ of Saint Johns, Syr Robert Radcliffe, Lorde Fitzwater, the Lorde Hastings, the Lorde Cobham, Syr Rice ap Thomas, Syr Thomas Blount, Syr Richard Sachuerell, Syr John Dighby, Syr John Alskew, Syr Lewys Bagot, Syr Thomas Cornewall, and many knightes and Esquiers and souldiours, to the number of eyght thousand men, which all passed the sea to Calice in the middle of May.

The Lord Herbert called Sir Charles Sommerfet, chiefe Chamberlaine to the king: the ende of the same Moneth with, .viij. M. men passed the Sea in whose companie were these Erles, of Northumberland Percy, of Kent Gray, of Wilshire Stafford, the Lord Fitzwater, the Lord Dudley, the Lord Delaware, Syr Thomas West his sonne, Syr Edward Hulse, Syr Robert Dimmocke, Syr Dauy Owen, with many other Gentlemen, some with speares on horsebacke, some with pikes on foote, some with Dimlaunces, and thys was the rereward. Such good diligence was made that these two Captaynes withall their companie, furnished with artilerie, powder, tents, cariages, & all thinges necessary for the warres were landed at Calice the last day of May.

After they had sojourned certayne dayes in Calice, and that all thinges requisite were readie, they caused a Trompet to blowe and made Proclamation, that euery man should depart out of the towne, and so to begyn the campe. The Erle of Shrewesburie with his companie first tooke the fielde, after him folowed the Lorde Herbert with his companie, in maner of a rereward. And after him folowed the valiaunt Rice ap Thomas, with five hundred light horse and Archers on horseback, and ioyned him to the foreward. Then was there order taken what persons should conduyte the Wittaylers, that came from Calice, and who should conduyte the Wittaylers that came out of Flaunders, for without sufficient conduyte no creature durst bring anye vitaille to the armie. These two Lordes thus embattayled removed the .xxvij. day of June to Sandisfelde, and on the .xxviij. day they came to Margison, on the farre syde of the water, as though they would haue passed streight to Bulleyn, but they thought otherwise, for the next day they tooke another way, and coasted the Countrie with such diligence, that the .xxij. day of June; they with all their people, ordinaunce, and habiliments of warre, were come before the strong City of Tirwin, & pitch their tents a mile from the towne, & for that night embattailed themselves: and as certain Capitaines were in counsaile, in the Lorde Harbertes Tent, sodainly out of the towne was shot a Sonne, the Bellet whereof slue a noble Capitaine called the Baron of Carew, sitting there in counsaile, which sodaine aduventure dismayed much the assembly. But the Lorde Harbert valiantly comforted them, saying: this is the chaunce of warre, if it had hit me you must haue beene content, a noble heart in warre is neuer afearde of death. All the Countrey of Arthops, and Picardie, fortified their holdes, and made thewes as the English armie passed, but they durst not once assaile them.

The Citie of Tirwyn was strongly fortified with walles, rampires, Bulwarkes, with diuers fortresses in the ditches, which were so broad and so plumme keepe that was wonder to beholde. The Lorde Bountrempe was Capitaine Generall, and with him were within the Citie sixe hundred horsemen furnished, and two thousand and siue hundred Almains, besyde the Inhabitanes of the City, the walles and towers were full of ordinaunce, which did oftentimes great displeasure to the Englishmen. The Erle of Shrewsburie layde siege to the towne, on the Northwest syde, and the Lorde Harbert on the East side or ende warde, the Frenchmen issued out of the towne, and skirmished with the Englishmen, but the Archers shot so fast that they drave the Frenchmen into the Citie, and slue and tooke diuers of them. The Lorde Harbert which lay in the open sight of the towne, hauing no hill or other thing to succor or defende him, caused great Trenches to be made, and so maneger his enemyes, he approached very nere the Citie: likewise the Erle of Shrewsbury with the foreward, gat into an hollow ground or valey nere to the Citie. Dayly the Frenchmen shot at the Englishmen, and diuers tymes issued out and skirmished, and euer they lost by skirmishing, but by shotyng of ordinaunce they hurt diuers Englishmen. Wherefore the Lordes commaunded the Pioners to rayse a great Trench, in which they layde the great Ordinaunce, and dayly as they might they approached: Sir Rice ap Thomas with the horsemen dayly scoured the Countrey, and many tymes encountered with the Frenchmen, and slue and tooke dyuers prisoners, so that the Frenchmen drewe not toward the siege, but turned another way. Upon the Monday beyng the .xxvij. day of June, .xxiiij. Cartes charged with bittaille, were by the garrison of Calice conducted to Guisnes, and there the crewe of the Castell and towne of Guisnes with three hundred footemen, vnder the conduyte of sir Edward Belknap, all beyng in number foure hundred, .lx. men, set forth to conduite the sayd bittayles to the armie lying before Tirwin, and so they passed to Arde. And while the Cartes passed the towne, the horsemen fell a drinkyng in the way, and the footemen were all out of order. The Duke of Vandosme Capitaine generall of Picardie, which lay in a bushment in the Forrest syde of Guisnes with .viiij. hundred light horsemen, tooke his aduantage, and set on the bittaylers: the Carters perceiuyng that, losed their horses and fled to the towne, which was but a myle off, and left their Cartes. Sir Nicholas Vaur Capitaine of Guisnes did all he coude, to bring the footemen in an order: but the Frenchmen set on so quickly that they coude not set them in order, the horsemen of Guisnes which were Gentlemen of the Garrison of Guisnes, and .xxx. Archers slaine, and manye hurt, and so they distressed the bittayles, and caused sir Nicholas Vaur, and sir Edward Belknappe to flee toward Guisnes. This misadventure fell by taryng of the horsemen, and breakyng of array, for if the Archers had taryed together, it had happened otherwise, for the fewe Archers that helde together, slue and hurt diuers Frenchmen: for on the fiede lay .lxxxvij. great horse, which neuer went thence, by the which it appered that the Frenchmen went not quite awaye without losse. When tidynges of this misadventure came to the Lordes at the siege, they were not a little displeased: and sir Rice ap Thomas caused bys Trompet to blowe to the stirrop, and he with his horsemen sought the Duke of Vandosme all the Countrey, which heeryng of the commyng of sir Rice, with great hast retreated backe to Bangey Abbey, where the French kinges great armie lay. Sir Rice heeryng that he was returned came the next day againe to the siege. The rumoz of this skirmish sprong all the English pale toward Flaunders, where the townes fiered their Belcons, and rang alarme, diuers honourable men that had passed the Sea with companies of Souldiours, and were in Calice, marched forward in order of battaile, but heeryng of the departure of Mounsieur de Vandosme, they rested. Then was newe prouision made for bittaille, and sent dayly from Calice to Tirwyn by suche conduyte, that the Frenchmen would no more meddle, and the armie also was well bittayled out of Flaunders and Henawld.

The armie of England thus lay before the strong towne of Tirwin: the noble king of England not forgetting his enterprize prepared al thing redy to passe the Sea in proper person, and caused Sir John Willshire to puruey for three hundred Hoves to cary ouer his Artillerie and habiliments of warre and all his ships of warre were on the sea skowring euerie coast of his realme. And when all thinges were prest, he accompanied with manye noble men and syre hundred archers of his garde, all in white gabberdines and capes, departed from his Manour royall of Greenwich the .xv. daye of June and so he and the Queene wyth small iorneyes came to Douer Castell and there rested, and made the Queene gouernour of the realme, and commaunded William Warram then Bishop of Cantorburie and Sir Thomas Louell a sage knight and diuers other, to geue there attendaunce on the Queene. And commaunded the Erle of Surrey to drawe toward the north partes lest the Scottes would make any enterprize in his absence. Then the king tooke leaue of the Queene and of the Ladies which made such sorowe for the departing of the Lordes their husbandes, that it was great dolour to behold, and so he with all his armie tooke shippe the last daye of June being the daye of Saint Paule.

In the morning when the kyng was shipped and made saile, all the armie folowed to the number of foure hundredth shippes, and the winde was so that they were brought euen on the coast of Picardie open vpon Saint Johnes Roade, and with the flood they haled along the coast of White land with Trumpets blowing and Connes shootyng, to the great feare of them of Bulleyn which playnely myght beholde this passage, and so came to Calyce haue.

The king was receyued into a Bote couered with Arras, and so was set on lande. He was appareled in an almaine riuet crested and bys bankrate of the same, and on his hedde a chapeau montabin with a riche coronail, the fold of the chapeau was lined with crimson Satten, and on that a rich brooch with the image of Saint George, ouer hys riuet he had a garment of whit cloth of Gold with a red crosse, and so he was receyued with procession and with his depatie of Calyce called sic Gilbert Calbotte, and all other nobles and gentelmen of the towne and countrie, and so entred in at the Lanterne Gate and passed the stretes tyll he came to Saint Nicholas Church, and there he alighted and offered, and from thence he went to the Staple Inne where he sipped.

When the kyng entred Calyce, all the banished men entered with hym and were restored to the libertie of the Towne. To tell of the gunneshole of the Towne and of the shippes at the kinges landing it was a great wonder, for men of good estimacion reported that they heard it at Dover. The king lying thus in Calyce, all his armye except a fewe of his counsaile and other that gaue their attendaunce on him, laye encamped at Newnam bridge, in which Campe about a. xi. of the clock at night there rose an eerie, so that the Towne of Calyce began alarme, with that the king waked and came to the walles, and demaunded what the matter ment, the yomen of the tentes, called Richard Gibson, shewed him howe that certaine horsemen and foote men of Fraunce proffered to come ouer the Hauen, and the archers that lay next the sea side entred into the water & defended the passage, with which defence the Frenchmen returned, and so the king was satisfied. But after this a Frenchman of Whitland Bay and one of Bullain were taken, the one called Charles de Bone, the other Peter Wernobone, which confessed that from the towne of Whitland came .lx. horsemen and two hundred footemen of the garrison of Bullayne and the countrie adioyning, intending to passe by Rite Bank at the lowe water Marke, ouer the Hauen of Calice at a certene foorde shewed to them by a fyre which serued the yoman of the tentes with vittails, and shewed them that the tentes were pitched vnder Calyce walles betwene the towne and the campe, so that they might burne them quickly or the towne could issue, or the campe remoue. But the Englishmen kept so good watch as you haue heard that their enterprize came to none effect. The morowe after being the first day of July, the noble Lorde Harward, admirall of England landed at Whitland Bay, & entred, spoyled and brent the towne, and returned to his shippes for all the Bullonays, and so recompensed the imagination that the Balle of Whitland and the Bullonoise had enterprised for the burning of the kings tentes.

On Friday at night blew such a storme that scuered all the nauie, and some were drowned. Upon the .viij. day of Julye, the Lorde Marques Dorset, Erle of Essex, the Lorde Lisle rode into Flaunders, and there took the musters of the Lord Linny, the Lorde Walon, sonne to the Lorde of Barow, and bastard Emery which with their retinue were then admitted into the kinges wages, and the Lord Linny with a hundred and fiftie speres was appointed to go to the Lorde Harbert: and the Lord Walon, and Bastard Emery with their bonds were appointed to go to the Erle of Shrewsbury lying before Tirwin: These straungers were warlike persons on light horses. While the siege laye thus before Tirwin as you haue heard, the French men diuers times issued out on horsebacke, and many a staffe was broken, and many a proper feate of armes done. Likewise the Almaynes on foote would diuers times issue out, with Handgonnes, and Mozillpikes and assaile the Englishmen, but by force of y archers, they were euer driuen home againe, and euery day the Englishmen shot at the towne and did them much displeasure.

The .xviij. day of July (when all thinges by counsaile had bene ordered concernyng the order of battaile) the king passed out of the towne of Calice, in goodly array of battaile, and toke the field: And notwithstanding that the forewarde, and the rerewarde of the kinges great armye were before Tyrwin, as you haue heard: Yet the king of his awne battaile made thre battailes after the fassion of the warre, the Lorde Lisle marshall of the hoste was Captaine of the foreward, and vnder him thre thousand men. Sir Richard Carew with thre .c. men was the right hand wing to the foreward, and the Lorde Darcy with thre hundred men, was wing on the left hande, the scouters and forewardes of this battaile were the Northumberland men on light Selounges. The Erle of Essex was Lieutenaunt Generall of the Speres, and sic John Dechy was Vicegouernour of the horsemen: before the king went .viij. hundred Almaynes all in a plumpe by themselves: after them came the Standard with the red Dragon, next the Banner of our Ladie, and next after the Banner of the Trinitie, vnder the same were all the kinges household seruantes, then went the Banner of the armes of England, borne by sic Henry Guilforde, vnder which Banner was the king himselfe, with diuers noble men and other to the number of thre thousand men. The Duke of Buckyngham with sixe hundred men was on the kinges left hande, egall with the Almaynes, in likewise on the right hande was sic Edward Bowynnges, with other sixe hundred men egall with the Almaynes. The Lorde of Burgaynie with .viij. hundred men, was wing on the ryght hande, sic William Compton with the retinue of the Bishop of Winchester, and Mayster Wolsey the Kinges Almoner to the number of .viij. hundreth was in maner of a rerewarde, sic Anthony Dughtred, and sic John Newell with the kinges speres that folowed, were foure hundred, and so the whole armie were .xj. thousand, and thre hundred men. The Mayster of the ordinaunce set forth the kinges artillarie, as fawcons, Slinges, Bombardes, Cartes with Powder, stones, Bowes, Arrowes, and suche other thinges necessary for the fiede, the whole number of the Cariages were .xiiij. hundreth, the leaders and dryuers of the same were .xix. hundreth men, and all these were reckened in the battaile, but of good fightyng men, there were not full .ix. thousande.

Thus in order of battaile the king rode to Seutreyca and there lodged the first night, on Friday the garrison of Bulleyn mustered nighe to Fines Hill, and were askied by the Northumberland men, which marched toward them, but the Frenchmen returned. On Saterday the hoste remoued to Hambwell and there rested. On Sunday, and on Monday he entered into the French grounde nye to Arde, and there euery Gentleman had on hys coate of armes, and these tydings were brought to the king that the French armie approached, which tydings pleased him well, for he desired nothing but battaile. Tuesday the. xxvj. day of Julie the king passed forward in order of battaile, and ever the French men costed a farre off to take the English men at some auantage, but they kept them so close in order, that they could not finde them out of array. Howbeit, by negligence of the Carters that mistoke the way a great Curtall called the John Euangelist, was ouerthrowne into a depe ponde of water, and could not quickly be recovered.

The king hearing that his enemies approached, leauing the Sonne because the maister Carpenter sayde that he would shortly waye it cut of the water) set forward his hoste, and in good order came to Dornham where is a fayre castell standing in a woode countrie, the Frenchmen were euer lurking in the woods beyng the kings conduite and order as he passed, and so he left the towne of Dornham on his right hand, and came to a Village on a little riuier where the ordinaunce was pitched. And when the king came to the ryuer he perceyued that many gentlemen made daunger to enter into the riuier: Wherefore he alighted downe of his horse and without any more abode entred the riuier, then all other entred and came ouer. Then was tydinges brought to him that the Frenchmen were neere at hande, and would fyght that night: the king still abode in order of battaile, euer looking for the coming of the Frenchmen, and at night worde was brought that they were reculed, and then he entred into his tent.

Wednesday the. xxvj. daye of July the reliefe of the speares brought in askrie, wherefore the king commaunded to blowe to the standarde, and auanced his banner and tooke a fayre field or banke, abidyng the coming of the Frenchmen. The Capitaynes generall of the armie of the French king were the Lorde de la Palice, and the Lorde of Piens, accompanied with the Duke of Longuy'e, the Erle of saint Polle, the Lorde of Flozenges, the Lorde Cleremound, and Richard de la Pole Traytor of Englande, sonne to the Duke John of Suffolke: with these Captaynes were coming a. xj. thousand footemen, and foure thousand horsemen, all prest in battaile and came within two myles of the king of England, and there the footemen staled and came no farther: certayne horsemen to the number of thre thousand & aboue marched forward and at the end of a wood shewed themselves open in the sight of the English armie. The king perceyuing their demeanure, commaunded all his footemen not to remoue, but to stande still. The Frenchmen remoued and came somewhat neerer to a place of execution: then the maister Gonner shot of a peece of artillarie or two. As the king lay thus still abidyng his enemyes, and that the horsemen stood still in sight, the great armie of Fraunce approached, which the Englishmen could not descry because of an hill that was betwixt them. The Northren men ranne to the Frenchmen, which manly encountered with them, and strake some of them downe, and mawger all their power brought certayne prisoners to the king of England. The Erle of Essex Capitaine of the kings speres, with two hundred speres lay in a stalle, if the french men had come neerer. Then sodainly appered in sight a great companie of horsemen, and the king knewe not what they were: but at the last it was perceyued that it was the balaunt knight sir Rice ap Thomas with his retinue, which came to the king about noone:

noone: which gently receyued him and sent him to the Erle of Essex, which incontinently departed and compassed the hill, and came to the Erle, and when they were ioyned, they drewe them about the hill accompanied with Sir Thomas Gylford Capitaine of two hundred Archers on horsebacke, to the entent to haue set on the french men, which perceyuing that, and doubtyng a moze number to come after, sodainly drewe backe and ioyned them with the great battaile. Then the Erle of Essex and the English horsemen folowed them till they came nere the great armie of Fraunce, and then staled, and sent light horsemen to know the conduite of the French armie. When the French men of armes were returned to their battaile, both the footemen and horsers reculed in order of battaile, and went backe apace. The English stirryng report of that they had seene, and then he brake by his stalle and came to the king, declar yng to him howe the Frenchmen were reculed. This day was called the drie Wednesday, for the day was wonderfull hote, and the king and his armie were in order of battaile from sixe of the clocke in the mornyng, till thre of the clock in the after noone, and some dyed for lacke of moisture, and almost in generall euery man was burned about the mouth with heat of the stomacke, for drinke lacked, and water was not nere. After this, the king remoued toward Cirwyn, hauyng his horsemen behind him, lest the french men shoulde sodainly set on him behinde, and as the king was setting forward, the Lorde Malotone of Flaunders came to the king with his horsmen which were in the kings wages, and the king declared to him what had chaunced. As the army passed by negligence the same day in a Lane, was ouerthrowne one of the kings great Bombards of Iron, called the red Gon, and there left: When the night began to approche, the king rested and tooke his campe two miles from Saint Omers on the Northsyde.

On the Thursday beyng the. xxviii. daye of July the maister Carpenter with an hundred Carpenters and laborers without knowlege of the Marshall went to waye by the great Gonne that was in the ponde as you haue heard, and by force of engines drewe it by and layde it on a Cart ready to carie: But sodainly out of a wood issued eyght hundred Frenchmen with speares, crosbowes, and handgonnes, and assailed the poore labourers which balauntly defended themselves: but oppressed with multitude, the most part was slayne and the remnant taken, and they and the peece of ordinaunce caried to Bulleyne. This misadventure fell, for the maister Carpenter would worke all of his aboue head without counsaile, with which chaunce the king was sore displeased. The Frenchmen ioyous of this chaunce, assembled a great number to take the other Gonne that laye still in the high waye. Wherefore the Lorde Barnes beyng Capitaine of the Pioners and laborers hearing of the misadventure, and considering that the other Gonne was lying behinde, prepared all maner of engines to recover the same. The morrow after the king entending to rayse his Campe, but when he heard of the great peece of Ordinaunce that was left behinde, and that the Frenchmen assembled together, he was in a great musing and so tarped and commaunded the Almaynes to retreat backe, and to succour them that went for the peece of Ordinaunce. The Almaynes went forth and staled within two myle, where the peece of Ordinaunce lay, and farther they would not go.

The

The Erle of Essex with his companie of speares, Sir Rice ap Thomas, with his companie, Sir John Neuell with the Northumberlande men, set forward to helpe the Lorde Barnes for recovery of the Sonne. And sodainly the Northren horsemen espied where all the great armie of the Frenche men were coming forward, and so reported to the Erle of Essex, that to Sir John Pechy Lieutenaunt of the horsemen and speares and other Capitaines, which were in the place where the sayde Sonne was left with a hundred horsemen, which hearing thereof sent worde to Sir Rice, and he hearing thereof desired the Erle of Essex to come and to take grounde in that place where he was, which remoued in great haste: In the meane season by the diligent labor of the Lorde Barnes, the peece of Ordnance was raised and carted, and forth was it caried, by thys time the Frenche armie appeared in sight.

When the Erle of Essex sawe the great number of the Frenchmen, in all haste he sent to the Lorde Walon, willing him with his companie to come to their ayde, the Lorde Walon sayde to the messenger, go tell your Capitayne that I come hether to serue the king of Englande more then one daye, and therefore I would all the English men would returne, for with the great power of Fraunce they be not able to fight, for I esteeme them. ix. or. x. thousand men at the least: with this aunswere the messenger departed and made relation to the Erle of Essex and other Capitaynes, which therewith were sore discontent: by this time the scowzers of the French part were come hard to the handes of the English men: then began the light horsemen to skirmishe, there was solowynge and rescuing on both parties, and in open sight some of both parties slayne. Then marched forward the whole battayle of the Frenchmen with standards, penons, and banners waueryng, and sumptuous bards, and riche harnesses gylttering, the men of armes in great number were in ranges along ready to chace and charge. Sir Rice ap Thomas being a man of great experience, sagely perceyued in what case the matter stood, saide to the Erle of Essex, sir we be not seven hundred horsemen, let vs not be to folishe hardy, our comission was to fet the Sonne and none other, let vs folowe the same, the Erle agreed thereto, and so softly and not in flying maner retreated and folowed the Sonne. The Frenchmen perceyving that, cryed all is ours, let vs folowe, then pricked forward two thousand men of armes, and came iust to the backes of the English men, then the English men cryed Saint George, and cast themselves about and made returne to the Frenche men, Sir William Tylet, and Sir John Sharpe, were the first that charged and after all the other English men, there was a dreadfull chafe, for the men of armes of Fraunce fledde so fast, that glad was he that might be foremost, the whole host seeyng their horsemen returnyng in flight, sodainly in great haste returned without any more doynge. Then the Erle of Essex staled to an hill, and there caused his Trompet to blowe to the Standard for feare of subtyll dealyng: and when they were gathered together into array, he returned.

The xix. daye of July the king with his armie came to Arkus, and there embattailed himselfe in a strong grounde, and to hym came the Erle of Essex and the other Capitaines with the gonne, and made report of their aduenture, which thanked them hartily, and there he lay till Monday in which time time came many noble men of Flaunders to visit him, and many of the common people came to se him.

Mundaye the first daye of August, the king remoued his campe to a billage myddell way betwene Saint Omers and Tyrbwin, and there fell such a rayne that the ordinaunce coulde scarce be remoued, the erable ground was so softe.

Thursedaie the fourth daye of August, the king in good order of battaille came before the City of Tyrbwin and planted his siege in most warlike wise, his campe was environed with artillery, as sabacons, serpentines, cast hagbushes, and tryed harowes, spien trestyles, and other warlike defence for the sauegard of the campe. The king for himselfe had a house of timber with a chimney of Iron, and for his other lodgings he had great and goodly tentes of blew water worke garnished with yellow & white, & diuers romes within the same for all officers necessarie, on the top of the Daillions stood the kinges bestes holding fanes, as the Lion, the Dragon, the Greyhound, the Antelope, the Donne Howe: within all the lodginge was poynted full of the sunnes rising, the lodging was a hundred. xxv. foote in length.

The king lying before Tirbwin, his great ordinaunce sore beate the towne walles, and they within likewise shot out of the towne ordinaunce, and slew diuers Englishmen in the trenches, among whych hottes they had one gonne that every day and night was ordinarilie shotte at certaine howers without fayle: this gonne was of the Englishmen called the whistelyng gonne, but it neuer did harme in the kinges field. The siege thus lying before the Citie of Tirbwin, Sir Alexander Baynam a Capitaine of the Miners, perceyving that, made a counter mine and so destroyed the other mine, and diuers Miners slaine within the same. The French armie ever howed a farre to take the Englishmen at auantage as they went a forraging, and many a skirmish was done, and many good feates of armes achieved on both sides, and diuers prisoners taken. Among the Frenchmen were certayne lyght horsemen called Stradiotes with short styropes, beuer hattes, small speeres, and swordes like Semiteries of Turkey: diuers times the Northen lyght horsemen vnder the conduite of Sir John Neuell skirmished with these stradiottes and tooke diuers of them prisoners, and brought them to the king.

While the king lay thus before Tirbwin, the Capitaine of Bullen knobyng by his Espialles that manye of the garrison of Caleice were with the king at the siege, and also that daylie bittailles were brought out of Englande to Caleice to succour the campe, imagined a great enterprize, and sent for all the men of warre vnder his dominion and rule, and declared to them what honor they should obtayne if they hurted or spoyled the out partes of Caleice, the king of England being on that side the Sea. The men of warre perceyving the good courage of the Capitaine, assented to his purpose, and so with all diligence they to the number of a thousand men in the euening set forward, and came to Newnam bridge by three of the clocke in the morning and founde the Watchmen that kept the Bridge a sleepe, and so entred the Bulwarke and slew the watchmen, and toke the ordinaunce of the Bridge and then let the Bridge fall, so that all entred that would. The Capitaine of Bullepne kept six hundred men for a stalle at the bridge, and sent the other into into the marishes and medowes where the cattel fed, and some of the french men came to Calice gate, and were ascried of the watche, and so rang alarme: the Englishe souldiours ranne to the walles, and saw the frenchmen without the towne walles: then they knew that Newnam bridge was losie, and would have issued out, but Sir Gylbert Calbot Deputie there, would not suffer any gate to be opened. Nowe it happened that without Calice gates were Richarde Hunnyng and Richard Byrcks of the Caterie, and thre or foure of the kings seruaunts which lay there to send prouisions to the hoste: which heiring of this alarme, called to them the kings bakers, and cobpers and a fewe shipmen, which lay in the hauen, and courageously folowed the frenchmen. The Englishe men were not past sixe scoze persons, and set on the frenchmen as they were a forragyng or they might assemble together, and slue them downe right and toke no prisoners in maner, and so they came to Newnam bridge and toke it, & put the frenchmen back. But or the Englishe men had thus gathered themselues together, the frenchmen had forraged all within the ryuer by to saint Peters, and had driuen away the Cattel and the ordinance of Newnam bridge, and so passed till they came where the stalle lay, and there they taried looking for there company that were gone a forraging to Calice walles. About siue of the clock in the morning, the gate of Calice called Bulleyn gate was opened, and then issued out one Culpoper the bunder Marshall with two hundred archers, wyth the Banner of Saint George, and with great haste came to Newnam bridge, where they founde the kings seruautes, and the other that had vponne the bridge, and then they altogether marched towarde the frenchmen which kept the stalle. The frenchmen thought it had bene their atone company that had returned, tyll they sawe the banner of Saint George, then they knew that their company were overthroene, and that they must needes fight or dye. Then the Englishe men though they were the smaller number, valyauntly set on the frenchmen, which with great force them defended, but at the last they were all discomfited, and .xxiiiij. slayne and .xij. scoze taken prisoners and their ordinance and whole bootie recovered. These prisoners were brought to Calice, and there sold in open market: Among all other a Cowper of the towne of Calice bought a prisoner of this bootie that dwelt in Bulleyn, and had of the prisoner a hundred Crownes for his raunsome, and when the money was payde, the frenchmen prayed the Cowper to see him safe deliuered and to conduite him out of daunger, the Cowper gently graunted and without any knowlege of his friends, all alone went with the frenchman till he came beyond the cawsey and there would haue departed: but the frenchman perceived that the Cowper was aged, and that no rescues were nie; by force toke the Cowper prisoner and caried him to Bulleyn, and made him pay two hundred Crownes for his raunsome, thus throughe folly was the pooze Cowper deceaued.

The .xi. day of August beyng Thursday, the king liyng at the siege of Cirboyn, had knowlege that Maximilian the Emperour was in the towne of Nyre. The king prepared all thinges necessary to meete with the Emperour in triumph. The noble men of the kinges campe were gorgeously apparelled, their coursers barded of cloth of Golde, of Damaske and broderie, there apparell all Tissue, cloth of Gold and Siluer, and Goldsmithes worke, great Chaumes of Hawdericks of gold, and Belles of Bullion, but in especial the Duke of Buckingham, he was in purple Satten, his apparel, & his bard full of Antelops and Swannes of fine golde Bullion & full of spangles, and little Belles of golde, marueylous costly & pleasant to beholde. The king was in a garment of great riches in Jewels, as pearles & stone, he was armed in a light armure, the mayster of hys horse folowed him with a spare horse the hennemen folowed bearyng the kings peeces of harnesse, every one mounted on a great courser, the one bare the helme, the second his graugard, the thrid his spere, the fourth his are, and so every one had something belenging to a man of armes: the apparell of the .iiij. hennemen were whyte cloth of gold and crymsyn cloth of gold richly embawdered w Goldsmithes worke, the trappers of the coursers were mantell harnesse coulpenced, and in every bent a long Bell of fine gold, & on every pendant a depe tassell of fine gold in bullio, which trappers were very rich. The king & the Emperour met betwene Nyre and the campe, in the sowlest weather that lightly hath bene sene. The Emperour gently enterayned the king, & the king likewise him, and after a little communication had betwene them, because the weather was foule, departed for that tyme. The Emperour and all his men were at that daye all in blacke cloth, for the Emperesse his wife was lately deceased. After that the king was thus returned to his campe, within a day or twain there arrived in the army a king at armes of Scotland called Lion with his coat of armes on his back and desired to speake with the king, who within short tyme was by Garter chiefe king at armes brought to the kinges presence, where he beyng almost disshaped seruyng the king so nobly accompanied, with few wordes, & mee tely good reverence, deliuered a letter of defiance to the king, which receyued the letter & red it himselfe, & when he had red it, without any more delay he himselfe answered after this sort. Now we perceyue the king of Scots our brother in law & your maister to be the same person whom we euer toke him to be, for we neuer esteemed him to be of any truth and so now we haue found it, for notwithstanding his othe, his promise in the word of a king, & his awne hand & scale, yet now he hath broken his sayth & promise to his great dishonour and infamie for euer, and intendeth to invade our realme in our absence, which he durst not once attempt our person beyng present. Therefore tell thy maister, first that he shal neuer be copried in any league wherin I am a confederate, & also that I suspecting his truth (as nowe the deede proueth) haue left an Erie in my realme at home, which shali be able to defende him and all hys power, for we haue prouided so, that he shall not finde our lande destitute of people as he thinketh to doe: but thus say to thy mayster, that I am the berie owner of Scotlande, and that he holdeth it of me by homage, and in so much as now contrarie to his bounden ductie he being my ballall, doth rebell against me, with Gods helpe I shall at my returne expulse him hys realme, and so tell him. Sir sayde the king of Armes, I am his naturall subiect, and he my naturall Lorde, and that he commaundeth me to saye, I may boldly say with fauour, but the commaundements of other I maye not, nor dare not saye to my soueraigne Lorde, but your letters maye with your honoz sent declare your pleasure, for I may not say such wordes of reproche to him whome I owe onely my alleageance and faith. Then sayde the king, wherefore came you hether, will you receyue no answer? yes sayde Lp.

A letter of defiance sent by the king of Scottes to King Henry the eyght.

on,

on, your aunswere requireth doing, that is, that immediatly you should returne home: well sayd the king I will returne to your damage at my pleasure, and not at thy maisters somonyng. Then the king commaunded Garter to take hym to his Tent and make hym good cheere. And forthwith King Henry wrote to him an aunswere with verie sharpe and grieuous wordes reproving his buttrath.

After the defiance declared by the king of Scottes herauld, the king of Englande wrote to the Queene and other which he had left behinde of hys counsaile, to prepare in all hait for the defence of the sayde kyng of Scottes, which did so with great diligence as you shall heare hereafter. While the kyng lay thus at siege before Turwyn, the Frenchmen studied all the wayes possible to bittail the Towne of Turwyn, & imagined in a night by some way to convey bittayle to the Towne: wherfore everie day they sent their Stra-diates to espie by which way they might take their most auantage, and many times the English horsemen met with the Stradiates & slew diuers of them.

The frenche king would in any wise that the king of England shoulde be fought with all, wherfore he sent the Duke of Wandosme, The Duke of Longuile with diuers other baliuant Capytaynes of Blangeoy. Then was there a conclusion taken that the Duke of Anson shoulde with five thousande men fight with the Erle of Shrewsburie, or else to keepe that neyther he neyther the Lord Harbert should ayde or come to the kinges battaye, and with the king should skirmish the Duke of Wandosme and Long-uile, while in the meane season the cariages with bittayle might enter the towne. For accomplishing of this enterprize, the Frenchmen made great purueyance and all on horsebacke, this was not so secretly concluded, but the king of Englande had an inckeling thereof, and sent worde to the Emperour which lay at Ayr and knewe nothyng of this deuice: and desired him to come to the Campe to haue his aduise, which gladly answered that he would come the morrowe after. The king continuallye sent forth his light hozses to seke the countrie and to see if any apparaunce were, and they ever brought tydings of such thing as they saw, so that alwayes it was foreseene that the kyng nor hys people should be taken bypurued, nor the Frenchmen should not come on them sodainly vnasked.

While these thinges were thus in communication, the Emperour Marimilian and all his seruantes which were retayned with the king of England in wages by the day, euery person according to his degre, and the Emperour as the kinges Souldiour wore a Crosse of saint George with a Rose, and so he and all his frayne came to the kinges campe the .xiiij. daye of August beyng fryday, and there was receyued wyth great magnificence and brought to a Tent of cloth of Golde all ready apparailled according to his estate, for all the tent within was seeled with cloth of Gold and blew velvet, and all the veluet was embroidered with. H. K. of fine Golde, and his Cupboorde was richely furnished, and officers appoynted to geue on him attendaunce: and there he taried till Sunday, and from thence he went againe to Ayr for hys pleasure. The king and his Counsaile were enformed by their espyalles, and also it was confessed by certaine prisoners, howe the French army which lay at Blangeoy intended to bittaille the Citie of Turwyn. Wherfore on fryday at night the .xiiij. day of August, the Duke of Buckingham, the Erle of Essex,

Essex, the Marques Dorset, the Lorde of Burgayny, the Lord Willoughby, and diuers other Gentlemen, with sixe thousand men on foote, and the Lord Walon, and the Lorde Ligny with their horsemen, were layd at Gungate on the Southsyde of Turwyn, where they were all night in order of battaile, awaityng the rescue of the Citie, but the English men were ascrped, and so the french men brake their purpose for that time: and so the Duke of Buckingham and his companyons returned to the campe. Monday the .xviij. day of August by infortune, without any cause knowen, there fell a great debate be-twene the Almaynes of the kinges fielde, and the English men, insomuch that they fell to fightyng, and many men slaine, the Almaynes sodainly ran to the kinges ordinaunce and tooke it, and embattayled themselves, and bent the ordinaunce agaynst the king and his campe. The English men were greatly vniquieted with this matter: insomuch that the Archers set forwarde to haue ioynd wyth the Almaynes, and they likewise prepared their Pykes, but the Capitaynes tooke suche paine that the fraye was appeased, and all thinges done for that tyme, but as this commocion was in trouble, the Em-perour came from Ayr, and sawe all the demeanoz of both parties, and was glad to see the discrete handlyng of the Capitaynes. After the Emperour was come to the kinges fielde, the king called the Emperour and all the Lordes of his Counsaile together, assercinyng them that he was credibly informed that the Frenchmen intended to rescue the Citie of Turwyn: wherfore it was agreed that the mayster of the ordinaunce should in haste make five Bridges ouer the water, for the army to passe ouer, to the entent to besiege the Citie on that syde: the Carpenters did so they decuer that night, so that by day all the Bridges were made, so that all the horsemen passed ouer and ascrped the Countrie. On Tuesday the .xviij. day of August, the king raysed his campe, and with great ordinaunce, and all other artullarie and carriage he passed the ryuer, and to him came sir John Neuell with his light horsemen, and tolde him that behinde the Tower of Gungate was a great plumpe of horsemen.
In the meane season, as Sir Iohn Neuell tolde the King these tidnynges, by another waye was the Erle of Essex, sir John Pech, and the kinges Speres passed and skirmished with the plumpe of Speres that Sir John spake of, and there were many proferes made on both sydes, but in conclusion the French men were compelled to leaue their state and one horseman taken and sent to the king, which in hope of pardon of his raunsome, shewed howe that the frenche armie with their full power and strength were commyng from Blangeoy the number of fiftene thousand horsemen of armes to ayde Turwyn on y<sup>e</sup> syde of the water. And to the entent that the army of the Lord Stuarde, and the Lord Chamberleyne should not ayde the king, there were appoynted five thousand of the .xv. thousande horsemen on the other syde of the water.

As these tidnynges was tolde, came one from Sir Rice, and sayde that a prisoner that he had that day taken cofessed that the City should be rescued the same daye, & that he had ascrped a number of hozsmen to his iudge-ment vpon the poynt of sixe thousand. Then sodainlye came the Northren men which affirmed that they had seene the frenche armie in order of bat-taille commyng forwarde, but they iudged them not pass. xij. thousand men.
Then the kinges fielde was pitched, and the ordinaunce set, but some coun-sayled

sayled the king to take doone his Tentes, but the king sayd I will this day that my fielde be made and set in as rovall wyse as may be, and all my ruche Tentes set vp, which was done. Then the king called the Lorde Darby, and commaunded him to keepe his fielde, treasure, ordinaunce, and other stuff, which was loth to go from his maister but by strait commaundement. Then euery man prepared himselfe to battail resorting to the Standard, the horsemen marched befoze the footemen by the space of a myle, still came curcours beryng tidyns that the frenche army approched. The king had set forward and to aduaunce his Banner in the name of God and Saint George. The Almaynes seyng this (to what purpose it was not knowen) sodainly emitt sayled themselues on the left hand of the king, & left the breast or front of the kinges battaile bare. As the king was thus marchyng forward toward the battaile, to him came the Emperour Maximilian with .xxx. men of armes, he and all his companie armed in one sute with red Crosses: Then by the counsaile of the Emperour the king caused certain peeces of small ordinaunce to be layde on the top of a long hill or banke for the out scowzers: Thus the kinges horsemen and a fewe Archers on horsebacke marched forward. The King woulde faine haue bene afoze with the horsemen, but his Counsaile perswaded him the contrary, and so he tarped with the footemen accompanied with the Emperour.

The Frenchmen came on in thze ranges .xxxvj. mens thirknesse and well they perceued the kynges battaile of footemen marching forwarde: the Erle of Essex Capitayne of the horsemen, and Syr John Peche with the kinges horsemen and the Burgonions to the number of a .xj. hundred stode with banner displayed in a valley. The Lorde Wallon and the Lorde Ligny wyth bastard Emery and their bende to the number of foure hundred horsemen senered themselues and stode asyde from the Englishmen: so then the English men were but seuen hundred, yet they with banner displayed removed vp to the toppe of the hill, and there they met with syr John Sylford a hundred talle Archers on horsebacke, which had asayed the Frenchmen. Aowe on the toppe of the hill was a faire plaine of good ground, on the left hand a lowe wood, and on the right hand a falowe field. The Lorde Wallon and the Burgonions kept them a loofe, then appered in sight the Frenchmen with banners and standards displayed. Then came to the Capitaynes of the Englishmen of armes, an English officer of armes called Clarenseur and sayd in Gods name set forwarde, for the victorie is poures for I see by them they wyll not abyde, and I will goe wyth you in my coate of Armes. Then the horsemen set forwarde, and the Archers alighted and were set in order by an hedge all along a willage side called Boimpe: the Frenchmen came on with .xxxij. standars displayed, and the Archers shotte a pace and galled their horses, and the English speres set on freshly, cryng Saint George, and fought baliantly with the Frenchmen and thze doone their standarde, the dust was great and the cry moze, but sodainly the Frenchmen shocked to their standarde and fled, and thze away their speres, swordes, and mases and cut of the bardes of their horses to run the lighter, when the hinder part saw the former part flye, they fled also, but the soner for one cause which was this. As the English horsemen mounted by the hyll, the Stradiates were coming downwarde on the one side of the hill befoze the french hoste, which sodainly dainly saw the banners of the English horsemen, and the kinges battaile following bywarde, thynkyng to them that all had bene horsemen, then they cast themselues about and fled, the Frenchmen were so fast in array that the Stradiates could haue none entrie, & so they ran stil by the endes of the ranges of the french army: and when they behynd saw the fall of the standars and their Stradiates in whome they had great confidence retorne, they tual were farthest of fled first, then by prauiced the Burgonions and solowed the chace: this battaile was of horsemen to horsemen, but not in equal number, for the Frenchmen were ten to one, which had not bene leene before tyme, that the English horsemen gate the victorie of the men of armes of fraunce. The french men call this battaile the iourney of Spurres, because they raine alway so fast on horsebacke. This battaile was the .xxj. day of August, in the which battaile was taken the Duke of Longuile, Loys brother to the Erle of Dunoys, which had maryed the Marquesse of Rutlens heyze, the Lorde Cleremounde, and many other noble men, to the number of .xij. score, and all brought to the kinges presence, and likewise all the standers and banners, were brought to the king. The Burgonions kept their prisoners and brought them not to fight. The same went that Meunfire de la Palayce was by them taken and let go. The Englishmen solowed the chace three mile long from the fielde to a water in a valley, and there a frenchman sayde to sir Gyles Capell, that one day they would haue a day, which answered him againe in french that it was a bragge of fraunce: and so the Englishmen returned to the king, which was coming forwarde, who gaue them thanks with great prayings for their baliawntnesse, and there he made sir John Peche Bannaret, and made John Car knight, which was sore hurt, and sir John Peche had his gyrdhome taken, and diuers of his men hurt, they solowed so farre. Then the king retreated to Singate, to whome came sir Rice, and shewed him howe hote the frenchmen had swarmed wyth hym all daye on the other syde of the ryuer, and howe the Erle of Shrewesbury with banner displayed was all daye prest in order of battaile to haue fought with the Duke of Alanson, and the Erle of Mount Pell, and the Lord Flozenges, which with five thousand men as you haue heard were appoynted to rescue the towne on that syde where the Lord of Shrewesbury lay, and to let him to come to ayde the king, but howe soeuer that it laye geued they stode still and came not downe, but onely skirmished with sir Rice: the Citie of Cerewyn was this day in hope of ayde, and when they sawe their helpers coming nere, they the same daye providely issued out on the Lord Harbart, and skirmished with his people very baliawntly, and they towhin also shot out ordinaunce of all partes. The Lorde Harbart and his Capitaynes couragiously defended them, and so soze they set on the french men, that they draue them by force to their gates for all their succours, and many of them were slaine: this night the king sent for the Duke of Longuile, and the Lord Cleremounde, and diuers other noble men, and the Duke supped at the kinges boorde that night.

Then the frenchmen after this discomfiture assembled together and returned to Blangoy .xii. mile from the coste and there talked of their losses, and because they knew not who were taken, and who were slaine, therefore they sent an Herault to the king to knowe the number of the prisoners.

the kings counsaile according to their desire sent to them the names. The king being ascertayned that the french kinges purpose was yet agayne to geue him battayle, commaunded the best of the prisoners should be conueyed to the towne of Ayrze in Flaunders: but when the English men had brought them thither, the Capitayne denied that the English men should enter the towne with prisoners of Fraunce, with whom he & his Countrie had peace: but if the frenchmen would desire lodging for their ease, they should be permitted to enter. But the English men in a furie answered, that if you will not suffer vs to keepe our prisoners, we will slay them: then the frenchmen meekely prayed the Capitayne to suffer the English men to enter, and sware to their keepers to be true prisoners, and so they entered, and after were conueyed into England. The Lorde Bobotremy of the house of Bresquy Capitayne generall of Tyrwyn perceyued the discomfiture of the frenche partie, and perceyued how the Erle of Shrewsburie and the Lord Harbert had brought thither great ordinaunce so nere the towne, that neerer it could not be brought, and that in the walles was such batterie that it was not like to continue, yet he manfully defended the Citie and shot Gonnes euery day as he was accustomed and neuer was in dispaire, till the. xliij. daye of the sayde moneth, he saw the king remoue his Campe from Gyngate and layde his Campe on the South side of the towne betweene their rescue and the towne: then when he sawe this, and considered that his succours were put back, and that the towne was sore feebled, and that the kings greatest ordinaunce was bent agaynst the towne, he therefore by the aduise of other Capitaynes sent to the Erle of Shrewsburie and the Lord Harbert a Trumpet, desiring abstinence of warre for a day, they incontinent sent to the king to knowe his pleasure, the king answered that he would not graunt till he knewe the consideration: then the Capitayne sent worde that with safecouduyte he would come and speake with the kings counsaile, which to him was graunted, then he sent certaine Commissioners which offered to deliuer the towne with all the ordinaunce and munitions without anye fraude, so that the townes men that would there dwell might haue life and goodes safe, and that the men of warre might depart with horse and harnesse, for goodes they sayde they had none, and there horse and harnesse was of little valure to so great a prince. After that the king and his counsaile had debated this matter, it was answered the commissioners, that although the king knewe their penurie of bittayle and the daylie mortalitie among them, and that the towne by reason of great batteries was not able long to resist, yet because they asked mercie he would not extend rigor, and graunted their request: so that they deliuered the towne with all the ordinaunce, as they had promised, to the which all they were sworne, and so returned. And the same night the Erle of Shrewsburie entred the towne and had the walles and towres and the Banner of saint George was set in the highest place in signe of victorie, and the Lord Bobotremy with all the garrison departed with horse and harnesse according to the appointment. Then the Lorde George Calbot Erle of Shrewsburie, with three hundred men serched the towne for feare of treason or that any inconuenience might be vnto the king and his people: and after that he sawe all thing sure, he called all the townes men together, and sware them to be true to the king of England. When all this was done, the king

king on the. xliij. day of August entered into the Citie of Tyrwyn at. ix. of the clock before noone with great triumph and honour, his person was appareled in armure guylt and grauen, his garment and barde purple velvet full of borders, & in all places trauesed with braunches in runnyng worke of fyne Golde, the braunches were of hawthorne wrought by Goldsmithes craft, wound with a braunche of Roses, and euey flower, leafe, and Burie, were embossed: after whom folowed his Henrmen with the pierces of armure accustomed. Thus with great glorie this goodly Prince entered and tooke possession of the towne of Tyrwyn, and was receaued at the Cathedrall Church with procession, and there dyned in the Bysshops palace, and at after noone returned to his Campe, leaving in the towne the Erle of Shrewsburie with his retinue. The. xliij. day of August the king remoued agayne to Gyngate, and there it was agreed that the walles, gates, bulwarke and towres of Tyrwyn should be defaced, rased and cast downe: of which conclusion the Emperour sent worde to Saint Omers, and to Ayrze, which being ioyous of that tydings (for Tyrwyn was to them a scourge) sent thither Pyoners with all maner of instruments, and so they and the English Pyoners brake downe the walles, gates, and towres of the foundation, and filled the ditches, and fired the towne, except the Cathedral Church and the Palace, and all the ordinaunce was by the king sent to Ayrze, to be kept to his vse. After this, it was concluded that the king in person should lay his siege to the Citie or towne of Turney: wherfore he set forward three goodly battayles, the first was conduyted by the Erle of Shrewsburie, the seconde battayle the king led himselfe with whome was the Emperour. The rewarde was conduyted by the Lorde Harbert: and so the first night they lay in Campe beside Ayrze, which night bitayle was scant, diuers English men taried in Tyrwyn when the king was past for pillage, and fired certaine houses, on whom came sodainly the french Stradiates, and some they slue, and some they cast into the fire, they that fled, scaped narrowly.

Wednesday the. viii. day of September the king and his army came to Beathwyn, and there had plentie of all things, and on the morow he with his army passed forward and came to a strait, where was a foorde and all the cariages must needs come downe a stepe hill to the foord and so to the streyt, where as one Wagon scarce alone might passe, and the weather was hot, and the beastes had not dronke all daye: wherfore at the foord the horses would drinke mager their leaders, and so the cariages went not all whole together which was a doubtfull case, but yet by wise order they passed the strait, and so did the armie, and came to a place betweene Caou and Cambline, and there lodged that night in a plaine barrein grounde, and the next day he remoued his Campe, and the forewarde passed a bridge called point Auandien into Flaunders syde, and there lay, the king lay at the other ende of the bridge on Arthoys side, and the rewarde lay in a sayre ground behinde the king.

Saterday the. xvij. day of September, tidynge came to the king how the frenchemen had assembled a great puyssaimce, and would fight with the king, wherfore the king caused his forewarde to remoue farther, and sent the Almaynes to kepe the passage. Then the great ordinaunce passed the bridge of point Auandien, and the king was remoued from thence, and as his tents were were taking by a noise was made that the enemyes were in sight, which noise was sodainly raised, & Sir William Sandes with seven hundred Englishmen and Strangers, was appointed to keepe the Bridge, and certaine ordinaunce was to him appointed.

When the king and all the carriages were passed, then the Lord Harbert remoued ouer the Bridge, and encamped him behinde the king by a taylor's Hill, when the king was encamped and all thinges in order, there came to him a noble man of flanders called the Lorde Rauesten, which after his humble reverence done, shewed the king that the yong Prince of Castell Charles, and the Ladie Margaret governess of the sayde Prince, most hartly desired him for his pastyme after his long trauaile, to come and repose in his towne of Lille, and to see his brother the Prince, and the Ladies of the Court of Burgoyne, saying that it became not Ladies to visit him in his martiall campe, which to them was terrible. The king gently graunted his request, and then he sent his officers thether to make provision, and appointed the Duke of Buckingham, the Marques Dorset, the Erle of Essex, and the Lorde Lisle, and dyuers other to geue their attendaunce on him, and committed his campe to his counsaile. Then he mounted on a Courser, his apparell and barde were cloth of siluer of small quadrant cuttes, trauesed and edged with cut cloth of golde, and the border set full of red Roses, his armure fettle and set full of Jewelles, the Hayster of his horse Sir Henry Guilforde, and the Hemen folowed as you haue heard before, and the Coursers richely apparayled, and so were many Capitaynes that waited on the king: by the way met the king, the Lorde Rauesten with many noble men, and a myle without the towne, there met with him the Burgesses of Lille, and presented to him the keyes of the towne, saying, that the Emperour their soueraigne Lorde had so commaunded them to do. The king praised their obedience to their soueraigne, and thanked the Emperour and them for so high a present as the keyes of such a towne. Neuerthelesse he had such confidence in them, that he trusted them no lesse then his owne subiectes, and so deliuered the keyes to the Prouost of the towne which was well accompanied: then met the king a great number of Nobles of flanders, Brabant, Holland, and Henawde, which nobly receyued him. After them came the Countie Palatine, or Paulsgrau, one of the electours of the Emperour, with xxx. horses, all his men gorgeously apparayled after the fashion of his Countie, and humbly saluted the king. At the gate of Lille the Capitaine of the towne stood with a garrison in armure well appointed, all the firectes were set on both sides with burning Torches and diuers goodly Pagians pleasant to beholde: thus he passed thoro we the towne with his sworde and marches borne before him, and alighted at the hall dooze with his sworde borne, where met with him the Emperour, the Prince of Castell, and the Ladie Margaret, and humbly saluted him: Then for reuerence of the Emperour, the king caused his sworde to be put by and his Hares to be layde vpon, then was the king and all other Nobles lodged and feasted accordyng to their degrees.

In the towne of Lille was a noise that three Conners with Handgonnes should haue slaine the king: For which rumoz many were attached, but nothing proued, but when this tidynge came to the campe, they were neuer more till they sawe the king againe, great was the cheere with Bankettes, Playes, Commodies, Maskes, and other pastymes, that was shewed to the king in the Court of Burgoyne, and so in solace he sojourned there Sunday, and Monday, the .xix. day of September: the .xx. day he sent woerde that his armie should remouue toward Tournay, and so they remoued to a place convenient betweene Tournay and Lille, and certaine Capitaynes were appointed to keepe the passage at the Bridge of Auandien.

After that the king had tarped at Lille three dayes, and had well reposed himselfe, he toke his leaue and thanked the Emperour, & the yong Prince and the Ladie Margaret, & all the Ladies, of all his high chere and solace, & about five of the Clock at night, he departed out of Lille, and the noble men brought the king forth and so returned, and then the Capitaine shut the Gates.

When the king was a myle and more out of the towne, he asked where his campe lay: and no man there could tell the way, and guide had they none, the night was darke and mistie: thus the king tarped a long while and wist not whether to go, at last they met with a bittayler comming from the campe, which was their guyde and brought them thether. The maister of the ordinaunce shot diuers pieces of ordinaunce but they were not heard, but in safetie the king with all his company returned.

The .xxj. day of September the king remoued his campe toward Tournay, and lodged within thre myles of the Citie, on a cozne ground by the ryuer. The which night came to the king the Emperour, and the Paulsgrau, which were lodged in riche Tentes, and nobly serued of all byrlandes and thinges necessary. The people about Tournay were with their goodes fled to the Citie, and yet the Citie had no men of warre to defende it, but wyth multitude of Inhabitauntes the Citie was well replenished, the king commaunded Sir Rice and his horsemen to be we one quarter, and the Erle of Essex and his companie another quarter, and the Lorde Maloune and the Lorde Ligny the other quarters: so the .xxij. daye of September these foure Capitaynes at one time were scene openly with banners displayed before the towne, and there made a long stale and returned. The king sent Sartier king of armes, and a Pursuant of armes wyth a Trumpet to summon the City, which declared that the king of England and of Fraunce commaunded them to yeeld to him his Citie and to receaue him as their naturall Lorde, or he would put them and their Citie to sworde, fyre and bloud. To whome they proudey answered, that they tooke no Citie of him to keepe, nor none would they render, with which aunswere he departed. Then they fortified their walles, and made provision for vitaille, corne, wyne, and artillerie, and for all fortifications that might be gotten. And the Citie of it selfe was strong, well walled, and turreted with good Bulwarkes and defences: But when they sawe the king with such a purssauce draw neere their City, they were sore abashed, and called for a generall counsaile: then the Prouost sayde, brethren you knowe how that the king of Englande sent an Heralde to summon vs to render to him this Citie, or else he would put it and vs to the sworde, fyre, and bloud, we answered we would be at defence: nowe he is come in our sight to fulfill the message sent by his Heralde, and nowe is come the time of our defence, and in this matter standeth thre mischiefes, one is our bounden ductie and allegeaunce that we owe to our soueraigne ueraigne Lozde king Loys of Fraunce, the seconde the lyues of vs, our wyues, children and neighbours, the thirde how to defend the finall destruction of this auncient Citie, which is lykely to fall, which Citie was neuer conquered, and now our Citie is whole (your lyues in safetie, your goodes your awne) determine whether you will haue warre or peace. Then the common people cryed all warre, warre, warre, then sayde the Prouost take compassion of wyues and children and of the olde folke, consider if you haue no quick rescue, you can not continue against yonder pupsaunce, although your courages were as good as Hector or Achilles, this the wisest of the citie & I haue considered. Then sodainely was there in the counsaile a vaunter, a botcher which hearing this, called a great number of his affinity & went out of the counsaile, and so out of the gates and set fire of the suburbs on all sides. When the counsaile sawe the mindes of the commons and that their wayes might not be folowed, then they comforted the people and maintained them for their defence. The king rayled his campe and came in array of battayle before Tournay, the Erle of Shrewesburie with the forewarde was a little space on the right hande best with the kings battayle, and the Lozde Harbert with the rereward on the left hande in lyke maner, the daye was sayre and the harnesse glistered and banners waied, that they of the Citie was soze affrayde: thus stode the kinges battailles in arraye before Tournay. Then the king commaunded his great ordinaunce to be caryed in the waye passyng towarde the citie, and so euery thing according to his commaundement was accomplished. Then the king himselfe with a fewe persons rode betweene his ordinaunce and the towne, and rode in great aduerture so neere the walles, that he might beue the walles and the towers berie well: they shot out of there towres peeces of ordinaunce and hurt suche as came wythin their leauell. Then they rong the alarme Bell, which was heard well in the fielde. Then the Cityzens issued oute at the gate by the ryuer and manfully proffered to skirmishe, but they with archers were sone driven back to their gates. The Englishe carriers that came with the hackbushers to take ground, ranne to the gates of Tournay, and toke certayne Wagons with beere and vitayle, and yet the Turnoyes durst not resist, although they were in greater number then the men of cariage. In this skirmishe the horse of the Lozde John Gray brother to the Marques Dorset, which went to defende the Carriours was slayne with a Sonne, and he not hurt. After that the king in person had thus in ieopardie auentured himselfe and beue the towne, he caused immediatly. xxi. peeces of great artillerie to be brought in a plaine fielde before the towne, and when they were charged, they were immediatly shot, and the most part of the stones fell within the Citie, and so they shot dyuers shots one after another.

Then the king with all hys battayle planted his siege on the North part of the Citie: The Erle of Shrewesburie with his battayle warded towarde the southside of the ryuer and there lay that night. The Lozde Harbert with the rereward planted his battayle on the West side of the City, and with great ordinaunce daylie bet the walles and towres of the City. On the morowe beyng the. xxiiij. day: the Lozde Talbot Erle of Shrewesburie accompanied with the noble men of his battayle whose names you haue heard at his first passyng the sea, passed ouer the ryuer of Tournay, and planted his his siege on the Southside stretching to the East ende of the Citie, and bent his artillerie against the walles of the Citie. Thus was the Citie of Tournay besieged on all partes, and euer in hope of rescue valyauntly defended her selfe.

Howe must I leaue the Kyng at the siege of Tournay, and diuert to thinges done in England in his absence, and declare how the king of Scots invaded the realme of England, and how he was defended and fought withall, and in conclusion slayne the seventh day of this month of September.

When the kyng of Englande was determined in his high court of Parliament to passe the sea, in proper person for the recouerie of his realme of Fraunce, he and his counsaile forgate not the olde pranks of the Scottes which is euer to invade the realme when the king is out of the realme: and also he had knowlege that at Camphere in Zelande the Scottes dayly shipped long speres called Colleyne Clowpites, armour and artillerie, which dealing made his grace and his counsaile to doubt: notwithstanding that the king of Scottes was sworne on the Sacrament to kepe the peace, yet for boyding all doubt, the king appoynted the Lozde Thomas Hawarde Erle of Surrey some to the Lord John Hawarde Duke of Norfolkke and high Tresorer and Marshall of England, to be his Lieutenant in the North partes against the sayd king of Scottes, if he fortun'd to invade (as he did in dede) according to the olde Traytorous custome of his Progenitors, and that the sayde Erle should rayle the powers of the countrie of Cheshire, Lancashire, Northumberland, Westmerland, & Comberland, besides other ayd, to be appointed by the Queene. And when the king should take shipping at Douer he tooke the Erle by the hande, and saide, my Lozde I trust not the Scots, therfore I pray you be not negligent, then sayd the Erle I shal so do my duety, that your grace shall finde me diligent, and to fulfill your will shall be my gladnesse. After the departure of the Kyng, the Queene returned to London, and the Erle of Surrey attended vpon her, and shortly sent for his Gentelmen and Tenantes, which were five hundred able men, which mustered before Sir Thomas Louell knight, the. xxi. day of July, and the. xxij. day he rode through London northward, and came to Dancaster, and there commaunded Syr William Bulmer knight to make haste to the Marches of Scotlande, and to lye in the Castels and Fortresses on the frontiers with two hundred Archers on horsebacke: For the Erle by open tokens dayly perceyued that the Scots entended warre. Then the sayd Syr William with all speede departed and came to the Borders, and the Erle came to Pomfret, the first day of August, & there taried. After that Syr William Bulmer was come to the Borders, one day in August, the Lord Chamberlayne and Wardens of Scotlande with seven or eyght thousand men with banner displayed entered into England, and brent and haried a great praye in Northumberland: that hering, Sir William Bulmer called to hym the Gentelmen of the borders wyth his Archers, and all they were not a thousand men. And when they were nere assembled, they brought themselves into a Broome field, called Whylfield, where y Scots should passe. And as the Scots proudly returned with their pray, the Englishmen brake out, and the Scottes on fote like men defended, but the Archers shotte so wholly together, that they made the Scottes geue place, and five or syr hundred of them were slaine, and foure hundred and more taken Prisoners, & the praye rescued beside a great number of Souldiers that were taken in the countrey, and the Lord Hume, Lord Chamberlayne fled, and his banner taken. This was the first open token of warre, shewed by the Scottes, which called thys iourney the ill Reade.

The Erle of Surrey beyng at Bomfretre, called to him the most part of the Gentlemen of the Countie to him appoynted as is before rehearsed, declaring to them the kinges high commaundement, shewing them, that he beyng there the kinges Lieutenaut must nedes haue ayde and counsaile: Wherefore he swate the most wisest and expert Gentlemen in such causes of the kinges counsaile and his for that time, for the better accomplishing of his charge and purpose, and for to bring euery thing in due order: Fyrst they tooke a determination wyth syr Philip Tilney knyght, Treasurer of the warres, how the charges should be payed, and secondarily wyth syr Nicholas Appharde, Maister of the ordinaunce, for the conueyaunce of the kynges royall ordinaunce, powder, and artillerie to Newcastell, and so forwarde as the case should require, which syr Nicholas by William Blacknall Clerke of the kinges lycerie, sent the sayd ordinaunce and artillerie to Durham before, so that all thinges, concerning that office were in a redinesse. The Erle forgoat not to send to all Lordes Spirituall and Temporal, knightes, Gentlemen, or other which had Tenantes, or were Rulers of Townes or liberties (able to make men) to certefie what number of hable men horsed and harnessed, they were able to make with in an howers warning, and to geue their attendance on hym, and also he layed Postes euery way, which Postes stretched to the Marches of Wales to the counsaile there, by reson whereof, he had knowlege what was done in euery coast.

The Erle was informed by the Lorde Dacres, of the numbring and preparing of men in Scotland, and proclamations sounding to the breach of peace, and yet though he considered that the Road made by the Lord Chamberlayne of Scotland into England, being distrussed by syr William Bulmer as is afore rehearsed, was an open breach of the perpetuall peace: yet the sayd Lorde Dacres auised the Erle for many and wayghtie causes, not to raise or thure the powers of the country, to him appointed, till he might perceiue and openly knowe the subtyll purpose and entent of the Scottes aforesayd, lest if the Scottes had perceyued the Englishmen redie to fight, they would haue desisted of their purpose for that time, tyll the Englishmen were returned to their countries, and then sodaynely to rise agayne.

Then the Erle knowing that the towne of Barwick was strong ynough, sent to the Capitaine of Norham, certefying him that if he thought the Castell in any danger or debilitie, he would put hymselfe in a redinesse to rescue it. If it were besieged, the Capitaine wrote to the Erle, thanking him and prayed God that the king of Scottes would come with his puyssaunce, for he would hope hym praye tyll the time that the King of Englande came out of France to rescue it, which answer reioyced the Erle much.

After the King of Scottes had sent hys defiance to the King of Englande, lying before Tybryn, as you haue heard, he daylye made hys musters, and assembled hys people ouer all his realme, whereof the brute was that they were two hundred. But for a suerty they were an hundred thousand good fighting men at the left, & wyth all his host and power entered into Englande (and threw downe Dyles) the two and twentie daye of August, and planted his siege before the Castell of Norham, & soze abated the walles. The Erle hard tidinges thereof the fine and twentie daye of August.

Then he wrote to all the Gentlemen of the shiers aforesayd, to be with him at Newcastell, the first daye of September next with all their retinewe according to the certificat. On the morrow, he with his fine hundred men came to Porke, and the .xxvj. daye he went towarde Newcastell, and notwithstanding that he had the fowlest daye and night that coulde be, and the wayes so deepe, in so much that his guide was almost drowned before him, yet he neuer ceased, but kept on his iourney to geue example to them that should folow. He being at Durham was aduertised how the king of Scots with his great ordinaunce had rased the walles of the Castell of Norham, and had made thre great assaultes thre dayes together, and the Capitayne valiantly defended him, but he spent vaine so much of his ordinaunce, bowes and arrowes, and other munitions that at the last he lacked, and so was at the sixt day compelled to yeld him simply to y kings mercy. This Castell was thought impregnable, if it had bene well furnished, but the Scots was moze sorrowfull to the Erle then to the Bishop, owner of the same. All that night the winde blew couragiously, wherefore the Erle doubted least, the Lorde Hawarde his sonne great Admirall of England should perish that night on the sea, who promised to land at Newcastell with a thousand men, to accompanie his father, which promise he accomplished.

The Erle the .xxx. day of August came to Newcastell: thither came the Lorde Dacres, Sir William Sumner, sir Harinaduke Constable, and many other substanciall gentlemen, whome he retayned with him as Counsaillers, and there determined that on Sunday next ensuyng, he would take the fielde at Bolton in Glendale, and because manye Souldiours were repayring to him, he left Newcastell to y entent that they that folowed should haue there moze robome, and came to Alnewicke the thirde day of September, and because hys Souldiours were not come, by reason of the foule way he was faine to tarpe there all the fourth day beyng Sunday, which day came to him the Lorde Admirall his sonne, with a companie of balaunt Captaynes and able Souldiours and Marinars, which all came from the Sea, the comynng of him much reioyced his father, for he was very wyse, hardy, and of great credence and experience. Then the Erle and his Counsaile with great deliberation appoynted his battayles in order with winges and wyth Ryders necessary.

First, of the forewarde was Capitaine the Lorde Haward, Admirall of England, with such as came from the sea, and with him Sir Nicholas Appharde, sir Stephen Bull, sir Henry Shereburne, sir William Sidney, sir Edward Schyngham, the Lorde Clifford, the Lorde Conyers, the Lorde Latimer, the Lorde Scrope of Upsaile, the Lorde Egle, the Lord Comley, sir William Bulmer with the power of the Bishopricke of Durham, sir William Gascoyne, sir Christopher Warde, sir John Eueryngham, sir Thomas Metham, sir Water Griffith, and many other.

Of the wing on the right hande of the forewarde, was Capitaine Sir Edmond Haward knight Marshall of the hoste, and with him Bryan Tunstall, Raufe Brearton, John Laurence, Richard Bolde Esquieres, and syz John Bothe, sir Thomas Butler knightes, Richard Donne, John Bygod, Thomas Fitzwilliam, John Claruys, Bryan Stapleton, Robert Warcop, Richard Cholmeley, with the men of Hull, and the kings tenauntes of Hat-fielde, and other.

Of the wing of the left hande, was Capitaine, sir Harmaduke Constable with his sonnes, and kinnemen, sir William Percy, and of Lancashire a thousand men.

Of the rereward was Capitain the Erle of Surrey himselfe, and with him the Lorde Scrope of Bolton, sir Philip Cylney, sir George Darcy, syz Thomas Barkebey, sir John Koclyffe, sir Christopher Pikerpyng, Richarde Tempest, sir John Stanley with the Bishop of Elyes seruauntes, sir Brian Stapulton, Lionell Percy, with the Abbot of Whitbyes tenauntes, Christopher Clapham, sir William Gascoine the yonger, sir Guy Daboney, maister Magnus, maister Dalbyes seruauntes, sir John Normauile, the Citizens of Pozke, sir Ninian Markanville, sir John Willoughby with other.

Of the wing on the right hande in the rerewarde was Capitaine, the Lorde Dacres with his power.

On the left hande wing in the rerewarde, was sir Edward Stanley knight, with the residue of the power of y County Palantine & of Lancaster.

And when all men were appoynted, and knewe what to do: The Erle and his Counsaile concluded and determined among other thinges, to sende Rouge Crosse, Pur suaunt of armes with a Trompet to the King of Scots, with certaine instructions, and willed him to shewe the sayd king, that where he contrary to his othe and league, and bnnaturally agaynst all reason and conscience hath entered and inuaded this his brothers Realme of England, and done great hurt to the same, in castyng downe Castelles, Towers, and houses, brennyng, spolyng and destroyng the same, and cruelly murthe-ryng the king of Englande his brothers subiectes. Wherefore he the sayde Erle will be redie to trie the rightfulnessse of the matter with the king in bat-taile by fryday next comyng at the farthest, if he of his noble courage will geue him taryng, and abode: And the same the sayd Erle promisseth as he is true knight to God, and the king of England his maister. And before Rouge Crosse should depart with the sayde instructions, the sayde Lorde Admirall gaue him in credence to shewe the sayde king of his comyng, and part of his companie on the sea with him: and that he had sought the Scottishe nauye then beyng on the sea, but he coulde not meete with them, because they were fled into Fraunce, by the coast of Irelande. And in asmuch as the sayde King had dyuers and manye times caused the sayde Lorde, to bee called at dayes of truce, to make redresse for Andrewe Barton, a Pyrate of the Sea, long before that banquished by the same Lorde Admirall, hee was nowe come in his awne proper person to be in the Vauntgarde of the field, to iustifie the death of the sayde Andrewe, agaynst him and all his people, and woulde see what coulde be sayde to his charge the sayde day, and that he nor none of his company should take no Scottishe noble man prisoner, nor any other, but they should die if they came in his daunger, onlesse it were the kinges awne person, for hee sayde he trusted to none other curtesy at the handes of the Scottes.

And

And in this maner he should finde him in the vauntgard of the fielde, by the grace of God, and Saint George, as he was a true knight. Yet before the departyng of Rouge Crosse with the saide instructions and credence, it was thought by the Erle and his Counsaile, that the sayd king would faine and imagine some other message, to send an Herault of his with the same, on-ly to view, and ouersee the maner and order of the kinges royall army, ordi-nance and artillarie, then beyng with the Erle, whereby might haue ensued great daunger to the same, and for the eschuyng thereof, he had in comman-dement, that if any such message were sent, not to bring any person, comyng therewith, within thre or two mile of the fielde at the nyghest, where the said Erle would come, and here what he would say: And thus departed Rouge Crosse with his Trompet apparayled in his Cote of armes.

On Monday the fift day of September, the Erle tooke his field at Bol-ton in Glendale, as he had appoynted, where all the noble men and Gentle-men met hym with their retinues, to the number of. xxvj. M. men, and about midnight next ensuyng, came the Trompet, which went to Rouge Crosse, and declared howe the king of Scottes, after the message done to him by Rouge Crosse accordyng to his instructions, the sayd king detayned him, and sent one Jlay a Herault of his with him vnto the Erle, to declare to hym the sayde kinges pleasure, to whome the Erle sent Pozke Herault at armes, to accompany the sayde Jlay, at a Willage called Wylo, two myles from the fielde, vntill the comyng thether of the sayd Erle the next morow.

The sirt day of September, early in the moornyng, the Erle accompa-nied with the most part of the Lordes, knightes and Gentlemen of the field, euery man haupyng with him but one man to holde his horse, and so the sayde Herault met with the Erle, and with blunt reuerence declared to him that he was come from his mayster the king of Scottes which would knowe whe-ther the Erle sent any such message by Rouge Crosse, the Erle iustified the same, sayng farther, that Rouge Crosse had the same message of him in writyng signed with his awne hande, wherevnto the sayd Jlay sayde. As to the abidyng for battaile betwene that and fryday, then next folcwoyng, the king his maister bade him shewe to the Erle, that he was as welcome as any noble man of England vnto the same king, and that if he had bene at home in his towne of Edenbourgh, there receiuyng such a message from the sayde Erle, he would gladly haue come and fulfilled the sayde Erles desire: And the Herault assured the Erle on the king his maisters behalfe, that the same king would abide him battail at the day prefixed, whereof the sayd Erle was right ioyous, and much praysed the honourable agreement of the sayd royall king, & esteemed the same to procede of an high and nob'e courage, promisyng the Herault that he and good suretie with him, should be bound in ten thou-sand pound sterlyng to kepe the sayde day appoynted, so that the king would find an Erle of his, and thereto a good surety with him to be bound in lyke summe for the perfozance of the same: And furthermore, the Erle bad the Herault to saye to his Mayster, that if he for his part kept not his appoynt-ment, then he was content, that the Scottes should Bassull him, which is a great reproche among the Scottes, and is bled when a man is openly per-jured, & then they make of him an Image painted reuerfed, with his heeles vppwarde, with his name, wonderpyng, cryng, and blowyng out of him wyth horne, in the most despitefull maner they can, in token that he is woorthie to be exiled the companie of all good creatures.

Then Flay deliuered to the Erle a little Cedule, written with the kings secretaries hande bnsigned, the tenor whereof foloweth.

As to the causes alleged of our comming into Englande, agayne our bande and promise (as is alleged) thereto we aunswere, our brother was bounde also farre to vs as we to him. And when we sware laste before his Ambassade, in presence of our counsaile, we expressed specially in our othe, that we would keepe to our brother, if our brother kept to vs, and not else, we swaie our brother brake first to vs, & sithe his breke, we haue requyred dyuers times him to amend, and lately we warned our brother as he did not vs, or he brake, & this we take for our quarell, and with Gods grace shall defende the same at your affixed time, which with Gods grace we shall abide.

And for as much as the king kept still Rouge Crosse with him, who was not yet returned, the same Erle caused the sayde Flay to be in the keeping of Sir Hunfrey Lytle and Pozke Heralde, in the same Wyllage, vntill the time that a seruaunt of the sayde Flay might ryde in all haste to the King of Scottes, for the deliuering of the sayde Rouge Crosse. Then the Erle ioyous of the kings aunswere, returned to his Campe, and set forwarde five mile, to a place called Woller Hawgh, in such order of battayle, as euen then he should haue fought, and there lodged for that night, three little miles from the king of Scottes, and betwene the king and him was a goodly and large corne field, called Wylfelde, which was a conuenient and fayre ground for two hostes to fight on, there euery hoste might perceyue other.

The morowe beyng Wednesday, the vij. day of that Month, the king of Scots caused his great ordinance to be shot at the English army, but it hurt neither man nor beast. When the king of Scots saw y<sup>e</sup> Flay was detayned, he sent away Rouge Crosse to the Erle, by whom, and other of the borderers he was aduertised y<sup>e</sup> the king lay vpon the side of a high mountaine, called Floddon on the edge of Cheuyot, where was but one narrow field for any man to assend by the sayd hill to him, & at the fote of the hill lay all his ordinance. On the one side of his armie was a great Harrih, and compassed with the hills of Cheuyot, so that he lay so strong to be approached of any side: except the English men would haue desperatly runne on his ordinance, which matter well considered by the Erle and his sonne, and other of the counsaile there they called to them Rouge Crosse, and sent him the next daye to the king of Scottes, wylling him to shewe the king, that the sayde Erle, with dyuers of the kings nobles and subiectes had auanced themselves to gene battaile to his grace, trusting that according to his promise, he would auance himselfe and his armie to ioyne the battayle, which as yet he hath not done. Wherefore he desired the king that he might haue knowlege by noone that dare, whether he of his noble courage would descend the hill where he laye, and to gene battayle or not: and if he say that I shall not knowe his intent, or will, say that he will keepe the ground: then shew him that he perceyueith well that that place is no indifferent grounde for two armies to fight, and therefore I will looke for no more of his delayes. The same day beyng our Ladie daye the Natinitie, Rouge Crosse departed to the king of Scottes, which would not heare him speake, but sent one of his seruitours to heare his message.

message. Which seruitour after he had disclosed the same to the king, made aunswere, that it becomed not an Erle, after that maner to handle a king, and that he would vse no sorcerie, nor had no trust of any ground.

You haue heard before how Flay the Scottish Heralde was returned for Rouge Crosse, and as sone as Rouge Crosse was returned, he was discharged, but he tarped with Pozke an English Heralde making good chere, and was not returned that morning that Rouge Crosse came on his message, wherefore Rouge Crosse and his Trompet were detayned by the seruaunt of Flay, which the day before went for Rouge Crosse, assuryng them that if Flay came not home before noone, that he was not lyuing, and then they should haue their heades striken off, then Rouge Crosse offered that his seruaunt should go for Flay, but it would not be accepted, but as hap was Flay came home before noone, and shewed of his gentle entertainment, and then Rouge Crosse was deliuered, and came to the English armie, and made report as you haue heard.

Then the English men remooued their field on the water of Tyll, and so forth ouer many hilles and streytes, marching towarde the Scottes on another side, and in their sight the Scottes burned certayne pooze Villages on the other side of the Harithe.

The English men alwayes leaning the Scottish armie on the left hande, tooke their field vnder a wood side, called Barmer wood, two myle from the Scottes, and betwene the two armies was the ryuer of Tyll, and there was a little hill that saued the English men from the Sonnehot, on which hill the Lorde Admirall perfetely sawe and discovered them all.

In the euening of the same day it was concluded betwene the Erle and his counsaile, and most parte of the armie thereto agreed, that the Wantgard with the ordynance should passe ouer agayne to the water of Tyll, at a bridge called Twysell bridge the .ix. day of September, and the rereward to passe ouer at Wyllford, putting themselves as nigh as they could betwene the Scottes and Scotlande, and so to gene battayle to the Scottes on the hyl, called Floddon hyl. Friday the sayde ninth day, the Lorde Admirall, lyke a valyaunt knight passed ouer Twysell bridge wyth the Wantgarde, marchyng towarde his enimies, lyke diligence was made by the Erle for passyng ouer at Wyllford with the rereward, sayng to his Capitaines, now good felowes, doe lyke English men this daye, take my part lyke men, which part is the kings part, and I wiste you would not, I will in my axne person fight with the king of Scottes, rather to die honorably by his crueltie, then to lyue in shame, or that any reproch should be layd to me hereafter. To whome they aunswered, that they would serue the king and him truely that day. The English armie that day had no bitayle and were fasting, and two dayes afore they had onely dronke water, and could scarce get any other sustenance for money, and yet they kept array on horseback from fiue of the clock in the morning, till foure of the clock at after noone, and were alwayes in the sight of the Scottes.

The king of Scottes perceyuing the Englishmen, marching toward Scotland, thought that they would haue entered into Scotland, and burne and forray the plentiful countrey called the Marche, for so was he made beleue by an Englishman named Gyles Musgraue which was familiar with the king of Scottes, and did it for a pollicie to cause him to come downe from the hill: wherfore the sayd king caused his Tentcs to be removed to an other hill in great hast lest the Englishmen should haue taken the same hill: And at their departing they set fyre on their litter & other fylthy ordure according to their custome, and of the fyre and smolther did rise such a smoke so thicke and so darke, that y one host could not perceiue the other, for the wind did driue the smoke betwene the two armyes, the Scottes euer keeping the heighth of the hill on the edge of the Cheuiot, and the Englishmen passed forward styll in the lowe ground, and euer in the couert of the smoke, inso-much that both the hostes were very nere together, wythin the space of a quarter of a myle, before one of them could perceiue another for the smoke. Then, when the Englishmen had passed a litle brooke, called Sandpfforde, which is but a mans step ouer, and that the smoke was passed, and the ayre sayre and clere, eche armie might playnely see one another at hand. Then the Lord Admirall perceyued foure great battayles of the Scottes all on foote with long speres lyke moozish pikes: which Scots furnished them warlike, and bent them to the foreward, which was conducted by the Lord Admirall, which perceyuing that, sent to his father the Erle of Surrey hys Agnus dei that honged at his brest that in all hast he would ioyne battaile, euen with the brunt or brest of the vantgarde: for the forewarde alone was not able to encounter the whole battaile of the Scottes, the Erle perceyuing well the sayyng of his sonne, and seing the Scottes readye to disceude the hill aduansed himselfe and hys people forward, and brought them egall in grounde with the forewarde on the left hande, euen at the brunt or brest of the same at the foote of the hill called Bramston, the Englishe armie stretched East and West, and their backes North, and the Scottes in the South before them on the foresayd hill called Bramstone. Then out brast the ordinaunce on both sides with fire, flame, and hideous noyse, and the maister Gonner of the Englishe part slew the maister Gonner of Scotlande, and beate all his men from their ordinaunce, so that the Scotishe ordinaunce did no harme to the Englishmen, but the Englishmens artillery shot into the mydst of the kings battaile and slew many persones, which seing, the king of Scottes and hys noble men, made the moze hast to come to ioyning, & so all the foure battayles in manner disceuded the hill at once. And after that the shot was done, which they defended with Daushes, they came to handstrokes, and were encountred senerally as you shall here.

First on the English side next the West, was sir Edmond Haward knight Marshal of the host chiefe Capitain of a wing of the right hand of our vantgarde, and was encountred with the Chamberlayne of Scotlande wyth his battaile of speres on foote, to the number of .x. M. at the least, which fought valyantly, so that they by force caused the litle wing to flye, and the same Syr Edmond thre times felled to the ground, and left alone, saving his standard bearer, & two of his seruants, to whom came John Heron bastard sore hurt, sayng there was neuer noble mans son so like to be lost as you be this day, for all my hurtes I shall here liue and dye with you, and there the saide Sir Edmond Haward was in a great daunger and ioperdy of his life, & hardely escaped, and yet as he was going to the body of the Wantgard he met with Dauid Hume, and slew him his owne hande, and so came to the Wantgard.

Secondly,

Secondly, Eastward from the sayde battaile was the Lozde Admirall with the Vantgarde, with whome encountred the Erles of Crafforde and Mountroos, accompanied with many Lordes and knightes and Gentelmen all with speres on foote, but the Lozde Admirall and his company acoupted themselves so well, and that with pure fighting, that they brought to ground a great number, and both the Erles slaine.

Thirdly, Eastward from the Lozde Admirall was the Erle of Surrey, Capitayne generall, to whose standard the kyng of Scottes in his owne person marched, being accompanied with many Bischoppes, Erles, Barons, knightes and Gentelmen of the realme, with a great number of Commons, all chosen men with speres on foote, which were the most assuredly harnessed that hath bene sene, and that the tallest and goodliest personages withal, and he aboard the most daungerous shot of arrowes, which sore them noyed, and yet except it hit them in some bare place it did them no hurt. After the shotte ended, the battaile was cruell, none spared other, & the king himselfe fought valiantly. What a noble and triumphant courage was this for a king to fight in a battail as a meane souldier: but what auayled his strong harnesse, the puyssaunce of his mightie Champions with whome he disceuded the hill, in whome he so much trusted that with his strong people and great number of men, he was able as he thought to haue banquished that daye the greatest Prince of the world, if he had bene there as the Erle of Surrey was, or else he thought to do such an high enterprize himselfe in his person, that he should surmount the enterprizes of all other Princes: but howsoever it happened God gaue the stroke, and he was no more regarded then a poore Sculdour, for all went one way. So that of his awne battaile none escaped, but Sir Wylliam Scot knight his Chauncelour, and Syr John Forman knight, his Sergeaunt Porter, which were taken prisoners, and with great difficultie saued. This may be a great mirrour to all Princes, how that they aduenture themselves to such a battaile.

Fourthly, Eastward was Syr Edward Stanley knight, Capitayne of the left wyng with the sayde Erle, which clame by to the top of the hill called Bramston, or the Scottes wiste, and with him encountered the Erles of Huntley, Lennour and Arguile, with a great number of Scottes, which were sore fought withal, which perceyuing the Erle of Huntly toke a horse and saued himselfe, if he had taried he had bene lykely to haue gene with his companie: such as fled, the sayde Sir Edward and his people folowed them ouer the same ground, where the Erles battaile first ioyned, & found there the Scottes, which were by the Erles battaile slayne before, and sodainely left the chase and fell a spoyling, and spoyled the king of Scottes, and many that were slayne in his battaile, but they knewe him not, and found a crosse and certayne things of his, by reason whereof some sayde that he was slayne by that wyng, which could not be true, for the prisoners of Scotland testified that the Kinges battaile fought onely with the Erles battayles, but for a truthe this wyng did verely valyantly: wherfore it was thought that the sayde Syr Edward might that day not haue bene missed.

All these foure battayles in maner fought at one time, and were determined in effect, little in distance of the beginning and ending of anye of them one before the other, sayng that Syr Edward Stanley, which was the last that that fought, for he came by to the top of the hill, and there fought with the Scottes valiantly, and chased them dobone the hill ouer that place, where the kings battayle ioynd. Besyde these foure battayles of the Scottes were two other battayls, which neuer came to hand strokes.

The victorie at Flodden field against the Scottes.

Thus through the power of God on Fridaye, beyng the ix. daye of September, in the yere of our Lorde. 1513. was James the fourth king of Scottes slayne at Bramstone (chiefely by the power of the Erle of Surrey, Lieutenaunt for king Henry the eyght, King of England, which then lay at the siege before Tournay) and with the sayde king were slayne.

Mack, Clene, and many other Gentlemen, which be vnknotone, because no officer of armes of Scotlande would come to make serch for them: and if the day had bene longer by three houres, (for it was foure of the clock at after noone or the battayles ioynd) or that the English men had had bitayles so that they might haue bidden still together, they had not alonely made the greatest distresse of Scots by death and taking, that the lyke hath not bene sene in one daye: but also within a little while might haue put the realme of Scotlande in such a miserie & trouble, that for ever they shoulde haue bene ware howe to enter the realme of Englande, and specially the king being absent: for the English men wanted no good will, for of the Scottes they slue twelue thousand at the least of the best gentlemen and flower of Scotlande, and of the English syde were slayne and taken not fiftene hundred men, as it appered by the booke of warres when the souldiours were payde. Thus the Erle of Surrey accomplished his promise at his daye prefixed with the king of Scottes, to hys great fame and honoz.

After that the field was fought and the Scottes fled, many English men folowed them into Scotland, & were so farre that they wist not which way to returne, and so were taken prisoners of the Scottes that were in the two battailles that fled first and neuer fought. Also diuers were taken by the Lorde Chamberlayne of Scotlande, which fought with the wyng of sir Edmond Haward, and were caried with him to the number of thre scoze. Of the Scottes that fled, some passed ouer the water of Tweede at Caude- streme foorde, and other by the drie marches, during the time of the fight, and the night after, many men lost their hozses, and such stufte as they left in their tents and pavilions by the robbers of Tyndale and Tyndale.

The Lorde Dacre with his companie stode still all daye unfough- ten withall. When the field was done and the scout watch brought worde that there was no more appearaunce of the Scottes, but all were returned. The Erle thanked God with humble hart, and called to him certayne Lords and other Gentlemen and them made knights, as syr Edmond Haward his sonne, and the Lorde Scrope, syr Wylliam Percy and many other. Then the Erle and the Lorde Admirall departed to Barmer wood, and apporn- ted syr Phylip Tylney knight with the companie of the Lorde Admirall and the companie of the Lorde Scrope of Bolton, the Lorde Latimer, olde syr Harmaduke Constable, syr Wylliam Percy, Sir Nicholas Applyard, and their companies, and a fewe other to keepe the place where the field was, for sauyng of the English ordynance, and the ordynance that was taken from the Scottes, which was five great Curtalles, two great Culuerings, foure Sacres, and sixe Serpentyne, as saye ordynance as hath bene sene, beside other small peeces. Well knowne it was by them that fought, and also reported by the prisoners of Scotlande, that their king was taken or slayne, but his body was not founde till the next daye, because all the meane people as well Scottes as English were stripped out of their apparell as they laye on the field, yet at the last he was found by the Lorde Dacres, who knew him well by his priue tokens, in that same place where the battaille of the Erle of Surrey and his first ioynd together.

This king had diuers deadly woundes, and in especiall one with an arrowe, and another with a Bill as appered when he was naked. After that the bodie of the king of Scottes was founde and brought to Barwicke, the Erle shewed it to syr Wylliam Scot hys Chaunceller, and syr John For- man his Sergeant Porter, which knewe him at the first sight, and made great lamentation. Then was the body bowelled, embawmed and sered, and secretly amongst other stufte conueyed to Newcastell. But the same daye the Lorde Admirall came to the field, and there some Scottes appeered on an hill: but Wylliam Blackenall which was the chiefe doer and ruler of all the ordynance shot such a peale, that the Scottes fled, or else the Lorde Admy- rall had bene in great leopardie: and then all the ordynance was brought in safetie to the Castell of Cytell, and there remayned for a time. After thys noble victorie the Erle wrote first to the Queene (which had raysed a great powder to resist the sayde king of Scottes) of the wyngnyng of the battayle, for then the body of the king of Scottes was not founde, and she yet beyng at

at the towne of Buckyngham, had worde the next daye after that the king of Scottes was slayne, and a part of his coate armure to her sent, for which victorie he thanked God, and so the Erle after that the North part was set in a quietnesse, returned to the Queene with the dead body of the Scottische king, and brought it to Richemond.

Now let vs retourne to the King of Englande lying before Tournay which the .xxv. daye of September receyued the Gauntelet and letters of the Erle of Surrey, and knew all the dealing of both parties. Then he thanked God and highly prayesed the Erle and the Lozde Admirall and his sonne, and all the Gentlemen and commons that were at that valiaunt enterprize: Howbeit, the king had a secret letter that the Cheshire men fled from sir Edmond Howard, which letter caused great hart burning and many woords, but the king thankfully accepted al thing, and would no man to be dysprayed. So on the Wundaye at night the six and twentie daye of September, the Lozde Harbert and the Erle of Shrewesburie made great fiers in their armies in token of victorie & triumph: and on Tuesday the .xxvij. day, the Tent of cloth of Golde was set vp, and the kings Chapel sang masse, & after that Te Deum, and then the Bishop of Rochester made a Sermond and shewed the death of the king of Scots and much lamented the yll death and periuiric of him.

The king of England lying thus before Tournay, caused his great ordinaunce to be planted rounde about the Citie, and diuers trenches were caste and rampyers made, and the Lozde Lyffe, and the Lozde Wyloughby were appoynted to maintaine the ordinaunce, with their bendes, and the Erle of Kent was lodged before the Gate called port Valencien, so that the Citizens could not issue out, nor no ayde could come in. The ordinaunce dayly bet the gates, towers, and Walles, which made a great batterie: and a fewe Englishmen assaulted the port coquerell, but they were to fewe in number, and if they had bene mo in number, they had taken the towne as the Tournasyns confessed after. The Citizens of Tournay considering their estate, came together to counsaile, and there the Prouost sayd, friendes and brethren of this noble Citie, I can not to much prayse your truth and fidelitie to your soueraigne Lozde the King of Fraunce, considering howe manfully you haue defended this Citie sith the beginnyng of this siege, but alas, although it be written on the Gates grauen in stone, Jammes ton ne a perdu ton pucelage, that is to say, thou hast neuer lost thy maydenhed: yet if this Citie had not bene well furnished, and euer at the day appoynted sure of rescue, it could not haue continued: now you see that rescue faileth, our Gates be rased, our Towers beaten downe, our chiefe Tower lyke to fall, so that if this perillous siege continue, or else if our enemies assault vs, we be not able to defend vs: wherefore now, all these thinges considered, I would knowe whether ydu wyll treat with the king of England or abyde the chaunce. Then they which at the last counsaile cryed warre, warre, now cryed peace peace, yet all were not agreed: Then one wise man sayde, sirs if the towne be assaulted once againe with a great number, surely it will be taken: you sawe the experience at the last assault, and then consider if it be taken by force who is there that can say he is sure of his lyfe: but by entreatie, the king of England is so mercifull, that he may fortune to saue both life and goodes. Then finally all agreed to treat. Then the Prouost sent to the king a Trompet, desiring safe

conduyte for him, and certaine other to come & to speake with him, which request was to him graunted. Then the Prouost of the City accompanied with a .xj. with him of the best of the City, came to the army and spake with the lords of the counsaile, and after they were brought to the kings presence, the Prouost kneeled downe and all his companie, and sayde: Right high and mighty Prince, although the Citie of Tournay is strong, well walled, well replenished with people, sittynges, artillery, yea and the people in feare and dreade of nothing, yet we knowe that against your great puyssaunce it can not continue long, although it were ten tymes as strong as it is, wherefore we knowyng by report your honour, your wisdom, your iustice, and noble heart, are content to become your subiectes and bassals, so that we may haue and enioy our olde lawes, customes, liberties, and franchises, vnder you as we haue before this done vnder other Princes. Then the king answered, we haue well heard your petition, we will common with our Counsaile, and make you answer: and when he had communed with his counsaile, he answered sayng: Sirs, he that aseth mercie of vs shall not be denyed, seynge you come to treat, we remit you to our Counsaile. Then they went into the Tent of counsaile, and there the Tournasyns fell at a poynt, and in conclusion, they yelded the Citie, and ten thousand pound sterlyng for the redemption of their libertyes, and so departed to the Citie, making relation of the king and his noble courage. On Thursday the .xxix. day of September, the king was in his riche Tent of cloth of Golde vnder his cloth of estate, to whome came the Citizens of the Citie, & were sworne to him & became his subiects. Then the king appoynted the Lord Lisle, the Lord Burgayny, the Lord Willoughby to take possession, which with six thousande men entered the Citie, and tooke the Market place and the walles, and serched the houses for feare of treason: and then maister Thomas Wosey the kinges Almoner called before him all the Citizens yong and old, & sware them to the king of England, the number wherof was foure scoze M. Thus the king of England by conquest came to the possession of the Citie of Tournay: On Sunday the second day of October, the king entered the Citie of Tournay at Porte Fontaine, and foure of the chiefe of the Citie ouer him bare a Canapie with al the armes of England, euery person was in his best apparell, the Ladyes and Gentlewomen lay in the windowes beholding the king and his nobilitie, euery Citizen had in his hand a staffe Torche, the king himselfe was richly apparayled in riche armure on a barded courser: thus the king with his nobilitie all richly apparayled with his sworde borne before him, his Herauldes and sergeaunts of armes with Trumpettes and Minstrallsie entered the Citie, and came to our Lady Church, and there Te Deum was song. Then the king called to his presence, Edward Guildford, William Fitzwilliam, John Dauncy, William Ciler, John Sharpe, William Huse, John Saunge, Christopher Garnish, and diuers other valiant Esquiers, & gaue to them the order of Knighthood, and then went to his lodging, & at after noone he came to the Market place, where was prepared for him a place: then he caused a Proclamation to be made in his name, king of England & of Fraunce, that no man should grieue the Citizens, during which Proclamation the Tournasyns scarce looked by, nor shewed once to him any amiable countenance which was much marked: the Citie finished, the king departed to his campe leauing the citie in safe keeping.

This

The Citie of Tournay yelded to the king.

This wedde the king rode to see the Castell of Morton, and there his grate took great pleasure. The king remembryng the great cheere that the pynce of Castell, and the Ladie Margaret had made him at Lille, which was but vii. mile English from Tournay, desyred the sayd pynce and Ladie with diuers other to come to him to his Citie of Tournay, and made preparation for the same, and appoynted a iustes whereof he himselfe would be one, and caused a Tilt to be made in the Market place. While these thinges were preparyng, the king and his Counsaile ordered for the sure keepyng of the Citie of Tournay, and there ordeyned sir Edward Bowynys knight of the order of the Garter, to be his Lieutenant with foure hundred archers, with Capitaines, horsemen, and artillary conuenient, and to haue ayde of Henawde and other the kinges friendes adioyning, and of his garde he left there foure hundred Archers, and ordinance was appoynted for the defence of the same. Monday the .xj. day of October, the king without the towne receyued the Prince of Castell, the Ladie Margaret and diuers other Nobles of theyr Countries, and them brought into Tournay with great triumph. The noise went that the Lozde Lille made request of mariage to the Ladie Margaret Duchesse of Sauoy, & daughter to the Emperour Maximilian, which befoze that tyme was departed from the king with many riche giftes & money bestowed, but whether they proffered mariage or not, he fauored him highly: ther the pynce and Duchesse soiozned with great solace by the space of ten dayes. Duryng which tyme, the .xxviii. day of October, began the iustes, the king and the Lozde Lille answered all conuners.

The Ladie Margaret receyued and welcomed by king Henry the cyght into Tournay.

A Jutes.

The twenty day of October, the Prince of Castell and the Lady Margaret with manye great gyftes to them giuen returned to Lyle with all their trayne, After that the king was enformed that all directions were taken and put in order for the sure keping of the Citie of Tournay, he tooke the same to sir Edward Bowynys knight which baliountly kept it in good order and iustice.

The king returned into England.

The king and his counsaile befoze this had considered that the Frenchmen would geue them no battail, and that winter approched, which was no tyme to lie at siege at other townes, concluded to kepe Tournay safely, and to breake by his campe for that Winter, and to begin againe warre in the spring of the yere: this was a full conclusion taken by the king and his counsaile, and so the king and all his people (except such as were appoynted to be with sir Edward Bowynys) departed out of Tournay the .xx. day of September: and the king and the noble men made such speede, that shortly they came to Calice, and thether came the Lord Admirall, whom the king hartly thanked of his paynes, and there every man was payed of his wages and conduyte money, and ships prepared for the passage, and so the .xxiii. day of September the king with a priuy company tooke ship, and the same day landed at Douer, and shortly after all his people folowed, then he with a small companie rode to Richemonde in post to the Queene, where was such a louyng meetyng that every creature reioysed. This season began a great mortalitie in London and other places, where much people dyed: All this winter the kinges nauie kept the seas, and robbed and spoyled the Frenchmen on their coastes.

A great death or mortalitye in England.

When the king was thus returned he forgat not the good seruiice that many many a Gentleman did at the battaile of Bramston, wherefoze he wrote to them his louyng letters, with such thankes and fauourable words, that euery man thought himselfe well rewarded. And on the day of the Purification of our Ladie at Lambeth, the king created the Erle of Surrey Duke of Norffolke, with an augmentation of the armes of Scotland, and sir Charles Brandon Vicont Lille, he created Duke of Suffolke, and the Lozde Haward high Admiral he created Erle of Surrey, & sir Charles Sommerset Lozde Harbert, his chiefe Chamberleyn, he created Erle of Worcester: and after that at another day he made sir Edward Stanley for his good seruice, Lozde Montaygle, and in Marche folowyng was mayster Thomas Wolsey the kinges Almoner consecrate Bishop of Lyncolne, which thereto was named on Newyeres day befoze: this man was bozne at Ipswich, and was a good Philosopher, very eloquent and full of wit, but in pryde, couetousnesse, and ambition, he excelled all other as you shall heere hereafter.

The description of Thomas Wolsey, which afterwarde was made Cardinall.

In the tyme of king Henry the seventh, father to king Henry the eight, It was concluded betwene the sayd king, and king Philip of Castell, sonne to Maximilian the Emperour, and king of Castell and his wife, that Charles his eldest sonne shoulde marry the Ladie Mary daughter to the king of England with a dowry to her appointed, at which time they were both yong: Howe at the kinges returne from Tournay, he made preparation to sende the sayd Ladie his sister to the Prince of Castell. But the Counsaile of flanders answered, that concernyng her selfe they would gladly receyue to be espoused to their Prince, for she was then one of the sayrest Ladyes of the world: but as concernyng the articles of her dower, they could not fulfyll without the assent of the king of Arragon and the realme of Castell (which as was sayde, minded to haue him maryed in Spaine.) The king like a louyng brother would not send his sister wildely without a dower assured, toke the first agreement betwene the king her father, and king Philip his father to be of none effect, sith the Spanyardes would not confirme the same, and the cause was, by reason that king Philip was not naturally bozne to be their king, but was king in the right of his wife, and so they were not bounde to his agreements made without their consent. So thus the king of England reteyned still his syster and all the preparation that he had done for her conueyaunce, which was very costly.

This season the Lady Margaret Queene of Scottes late wife to kyng James the fourth slayne at Bramstone, and sister to the kyng, wrote to the king to haue compassion of her and his two Nephewes her sonnes, for she was in feare lest he would haue invaded her realme. The king moued with brotherly compassion, sent her word that if the Scottes kept peace he would kepe peace, if they would haue war he would likewise haue war, & so with that answer the messenger departed. In the spring time of the yere the king wrote hys letters to all the noble men and Gentilmen sayng that he would shortly passe again into fraunce in his awne person, wherefoze euery man prepared him selfe meete for that iournay: the Flemmynges hearyng therof, made purueyaunce for wagons, bittaille, and other thinges which tourned them to great losse for that viage brake of as you shall heere.

All this season Sir Richard Whethill and syr John Tremayle kept for the English Dale that the Frenchmen durst not medle, and yet they spoyled to base Bollen.

Closures made of the common felles about London.

The Closures sodainly were taken downe

Before this time the towne about London as Islington, Hoxton, Shoredyche and other, had so enclosed the common fieldes with hedges and ditches, that neyther the young men of the Citie might shoote, nor the auncient persons might walke for their pleasure in the fieldes, except epyther their bowes and arrowes were broken or taken a way, or the honest and substantiall persons arrested or indited, sayng that no Londoner should goe oute of the Citie but in the high wayes. This sayng soze grieved the Londoners and sodainly this yere a great number of the Citie assembled themselves in a morning, and a Turnat in a foolles coate came cryng through the Citie, shovels and spades, and so many people folowed that it was wonder, and within thort space all the hedges about the towne were cast downe, and the ditches filled, and euery thing made playne, the workemen were so diligent. The kinges counsaile hering of this assemblye came to the Gray Fryars, and sent for the Mayor and the counsaile of the City to know the cause, which declared to them the noysaunce done to the Citezens, and their commodities and liberties taken from them, & though they would not, yet the commonalty and yong persons which were dammified by the noysaunce would plucke bp and remedy the same. And when the kinges counsaile had heard the answer, they dissimuled the matter, and commaunded the Mayor to see that no other thing were attempted, and to call home the Citezens, which when they had done their enterpryce, came home befoze the kings counsaile & the Mayor departed without anye moze harme doing, and so after the fieldes were neuer hedged.

The king at this season sent againe into Flaunders for the performace of the marriage of the yong Prince of Castell and the fayze Ladye Marie his sister, and shewed how he had prepared all thinges necessarie and comenient for such an high estate. The counsaile of Flaunders answered that they would not receyue her that yere, with many subtill argumentes, by reason whercof the perfite loue betwene Englande and the lowe countries was much slaked.

The Cap of maintenance.

The nintene daye of May was receyued into London a Cappe of maintenance and a sword sent from Pope Iuly, with a great company of nobles and Gentelmen, which was presented to the king on the Sunday then next ensuing with great solemnity in the Cathedrall Church of saint Paul. About this tyme, the warres yet continuing betweene Englande and Fraunce, Duke John (of whome you haue heard befoze in the fourth yere) great Capitaine of the French navy, with his Galies and Foystes charged with great Saltyshes and other great Artyllerye came on the borders of Suffer and came a lande in the night at a pooze village in Suffer called Bright Helmsfont, and or the watch could him ascry he set fier on the towne and toke such pooze goodes as he found: then the watch fiered the beakons and people began to gather, which sayng, Duke John sounde his Trompet to cal his men aboard, and by that time it was daye: then six Archers which kept the watch folowed Duke John to the sea, and shot so fast, that they beate the Galimen from the shore, and Duke John himselfe waded to his Foyst, and the Englishmen went into the water after, but they were put backe with pikes or else they had entred y Foyst, but they shot so fast, that they wounded many in the the Foyst and Duke John was shot in the face wyth an Arrowe, and was likelpe to haue dyed, and therefore he offered his image of wax befoze our Lady at Solleyn with the English arrowe in the face for a myracle.

When the Lord Admirall of England had heard these newes he was not content and sent syr John Wallop to the sea incontinent with diuers English ships, which sayled to the coast of Normandy and there landed and bzent xxi. villages and towne with great slaughter of people, and bzent shippes and boates in the Hauens of Craport, Stapils & in euerie place. This sir John Wallop quyt himselfe so, that men maruelled of his enterpyses, considering he had at the most but eyght hundred men and toke land there so often.

Sir John Wallop a valiant Captaine.

In the moneth of June the Lorde Dountremy that was Capitaine of Cypwyn with banner displaid and great ordinaunce, with a great armye came into Pycardy nere to Arde. Sir Nicholas Daux capitaine of Guyynes considering that the Frenchemen had such ordinaunce thought that they would haue besieged Guyynes, and wrote thereof to the king which incontinent prouided a great army for the rescue. And when euerie thing was redye and the armie forward, the Lorde Dountremy rayced his campe and departed wythout any moze doing, but for all that the king sent ouer Sir Thomas Louel knight with six hundred men to Calice for the moze strength of that Towne and other towne and Castelles beyng within the Englishhe Pale and the Marches there.

The French king this yere appoynted to Richard de la Pole traytor of England & banished the realme. xij. M. Lancelights to kepe Normandy, and also to enter into England & to conquer the same, where they made such a ryotte that many of them were slayne and he was fayne to carye them to Saynt Maloz in Britaine to take shippe: for the French men would fayne haue ben rydde of them they cared not how, their condicions were so vile and shamefull, but by the reason that the French kyng sayde for the peace this iourney toke none effect.

Richard de la Pole, Traytor of England.

The French King by an Herald wrote to the king of England, that he marueled greatly why he made hym so soze warre, and bzent and toke hys towne, slew and robbed his people without any cause geuen on his part, wherfore he required the king to graunt safecondite to his Ambassadors, which should entreate the cause: wherupon in June the French king sent a commission with the President of Roan and certayne other Nobles of Fraunce to entreat peace and allyaunce betwene both the Princes: and farther because they knew that the marriage was broken betweene the Prince of Castell and the Ladye Mary (as you haue heard) they desired the sayde Lady to be espoused to the French king, affirming a great dower of suerties for the same, with great treasures: so much was offered that the king moued by his counsaile, and especially by the Bishop of Lincolne Wolsey, consented upon condicion that if the sayde French king Loys dyed, then she shoulde if it pleased her, retorne into England againe with all her dower and riches: after such entreatie, the Indentures were sealed and the peace proclaymed the seventh day of August, and the king in presence of the French Ambassadors sworne to kepe the same, and likewise there was sent an Ambassade out of Englande to se the French king swere the same.

The Duchmen hering these newes were soze, and repented them that they

they receyued not the Ladye, and spake shamefully of this mariage, that a feeble old and pocky man should marry so fayre a Lady, but the voyce of people let not Princes pourposes.

By the conclusion of this peace was the Duke of Longuyle and other prisoners deliuered, payng their Raunson, and the said Duke affied the Lady Mary in the name of king Lewys his Maister. This Duke was highlye intertayned in England of many noble men and had great there, but when they came into fraunce with the Queene he woulde scarce knowe them. Then when all thinges were ready for the conueyaunce of this noble Lady, the king her brother in the moneth of September with the Queene his wife and hys sayd sister and all the court came to Douer and there taried, for the winde was troublous, and the weather fowle, in so much that a ship of the kings called the Libeck of .ix. hundred Tonne was driuen a shoze before Sandgate and there brast, and of sixe hundred men scantly escaped thre hundred, and yet the most part of them were hurt with the wycke. When the weather was fayre then all her wardrobe, stable, and ryches was shyped, and such as were appoynted to geue their attendaunce on her, as the Duke of Norffolke, the Marques Dorset, the Bpshope of Durham, the Erle of Surrey, the Lorde Delawar, the Lorde Barnes, the Lorde Montaigne, the Marques foure brethren, s<sup>r</sup> Horice Barkeley, s<sup>r</sup> John Peche, s<sup>r</sup> William Sandes, s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Bulleyn, s<sup>r</sup> John Carre & many other knights, Squires gentlemen and Ladies, all these went to ship, and the sayde Ladie tooke her leaue of the Queene in the Castel of Douer, and the king brought her to the sea side and kissed her and betooke her to God, and the fortune of the sea, and to the gouernaunce of the french king her husband. Thus the second day of October at the houre of foure of the clock in the morning thys fayre Ladie tooke her ship with all her noble companie: and when they had sayled a quarter of the sea, the winde rose and seuered some of the shippes to Calice, and some into Flaunders, and her ship with great difficultie was brought to Bulleyn, and with great iopardie at the entring of the haucn for the maister ranne the ship hard on shoze, but the boates were ready and receyued this noble Ladie, and at the landing Sir Christopher Garnishe stood in the water, and tooke her in his armes, and so caried her to lande, where the Duke of Gandosme and a Cardinall wyth manye estates receyued her, and her Ladies, and welcommed all the noble men into that Countie, and so the Queene and all her trayne came to Bulleyn, and there rested, and from thence thee remoued by dyuers lodgings till she came almost within thre Myle of Abuyte beside the Forrest of Arders, and there king Loyes bypon a great courser met with her, and thee would haue alighted but he would not suffer her, and welcommed her into his Countie, and when he had sene her bewtie (which he so long desired) and talked with her a little space, then he returned to Abuyte by a secret waye, and thee was with great triumph, procession, and Bagiantes receyued into the towne of Abuyte the eyght day of October by the Dolphyn, which receyued her with great honor, she was appareled in cloth of siluer, her horse was trapped in Goldsmithes worke berie richely. After her folowed, xxxij. Ladies, all their Balfrers trapped with crimson Vcluet, embzawdered: after them folowed one Charoyt of cloth of Tissue, the second cloth of gold, and the third crymoson Vcluet embzawdered with the kings armes and hers full of Roses. After them folowed a great number of Archers, and then Wagons laden with their stuffe. Great was the ryches in plate, iewels, money, apparell, and hangyngs that this Lady brought into fraunce. The Monday next folowing, the same king Lewys married the Lady Mary in the great Church of Abuyte, both appareled in Goldsmithes worke. After the masse was done, there was a great banquet and feast, and the Ladies of Englande highlye enterreyued.

The Tuesday being the tenth daye of October all the Englishe men except a fewe that were officers with the sayde Queene were discharged, which was a great sorrowe for them, for some had serued her long in hope of preferment, and some that had honest rones, left them to serue her, and nowe they were without seruire, which caused them to take thought, in so muche some dyed by the waye returning, and some fell mad, but there was no remedie. After the Englishe Lordes had done their commission the freache king wyllid them to take no longer payne, and so gaue to them good rewardes, and they tooke their leaue of the Queene and returned. Then the Dolphyn of fraunce called Lorde frauncys Duke of Valoys, and by hys wyfe Duke of Britayne, for the more honour of the mariage, before the Englishe men departed from Abuyte, caused a solempne Justes to be proclaimed which shoulde be kept at Paris, in the Moneth of November next ensuyng, and that he wyth hys .ix. aydes shoulde answer all commers, being Gentlemen of name and of armes, first to runne five courses at the Tylt with peeces of auantage, and also five courses at Randou wyth sharpe speares, and twelue strokes with sharpe swordes, and that done, he and his aydes to fight at the barriers with all gentlemen of name and of armes. First sixe fynes with hande speares, and after that eyght strokes to the most auantage if the speare so long held, and after that twelue strokes with the swordes, & if any man be unhorsed or be felled with fighting on foote, then his horse & armure to be rendred to the officers of armes, and every man of this chalenge must set by his armes and name vpon an arche triumphant, which sha l be made at the place where the iustes shall be, and farther shall write to what poynt he will answer to one or to all. When this proclamation was reported in England by the noble men that returned from the mariage: the Duke of Suffolke, the Marques Dorset and hys foure brethren, the Lorde Clynton, s<sup>r</sup> Edward Denell, s<sup>r</sup> Gyles Capell, Thomas Cheney and other sued to the king to be at the chalenge, which request, he graciously graunted. Then the Lordes and knightes prepared all thing necessarie for their enterpryse, and shipped their horses and harnesse, and did so muche by tourney, that they came to Parys, at the ende of the Moneth of October, which were hartly welcomed of the king and the Dolphyn: but most of all, of the french Queene, which then lay at saint Denys, and was not yet crowned nor entred into Paris.

The Dolphyn desired the Duke of Suffolke and the Lorde Marques Dorset, whose actiuitie he knew well by report, to be two of his immediat aydes, which theye consented. Therefore was erected an Arche of wydenesse at the Turnels beside the streete on saint Anthony, directly before the Bastell, on the which were set foure Targets or scutchions, the one siluer

The Dolphyn of France caused a solempne iustes to be proclaimed.

The Ladie Marie sister to king Henry the eight affied to the french king and he that set his name vnder that shield, to runne at the Cylt according to the articles: he that put his name vnder the golden Target, should runne with the sharpe speares and fight with sharpe swordes: they that put their names to the black shield, should fight a foote with speares and swordes for the one hande. And he that touched the tabony shield should cast a speare on foote with a Target on his arme, and after to fight with a two hand sword: on this arche about stood the armes of the king and the Queene, and beneath them stood the armes of the Dolphyn and his aydes, and vnderneath stood the foure scochions that you haue heard of, and vnder them all the armes and names of such as set their names to any of the sayde foure scochions. While all these things were preparing, the Lady Mary of England the fift day of Nouember then being Sunday, was with great solemnity crowned Queene of Fraunce in the monasterie of saint Denice, and the Dolphyn all the season held the crowne ouer her head, because it was of great waight to her grea- uance, at which coronation were the Lordes of England, and according to their degrees well entertayned.

Monday the sixt day of Nouember, the sayd Queene was receyued in- to the Citie of Parys after the order that foloweth. First the Garde of the Citie met with her without saint Denice, al in coates of Goldsmithes worke with shippes guilt, and after them met her all the priestes and religioys, which were esteemed to be thre thousand. The Queene was in a Chayre covered about (but not ouer her person) in whyte cloth of Golde, the horses that drewe it covered with cloth of Golde, on her head a coronall all of great Pearles, her neck and brest full of Jewels, before her went a Garde of Al- maynes after their fassion, and after them all noble men, as the Dolphyn, the Duke of Alanson, the Duke of Burbon, the Duke of Wandosme, the Duke of Longeuple, and the Duke of Suffolke, the Marques Dorset, fise Cardinals and a great number of estates, & about her person rode the kings garde which were Scottes. Thus was this Queene receyued into Paris and so conueyed into the Cathedrall Church and there offered, & from thence to the Palace, and from thence shee went to her lodging for that night, for whome was prouided a great supper, and the Heraulds cryed a larges, and had to them geuen a ship of siluer and guilt, and other Plate to the value of two hundred marke, and after supper began daunsing and pastime. On the morow began the iustes, and the Dolphyn with his aydes entered the field, their apparell and bardes were cloth of golde, cloth of siluer and crymsyn Ueluet kanteled together al in one sute, they shewed themselves before the king and Queene who were in a goodly stage, and the Queene stood so that all men might see her and wondered at her bewtie, and the king was feeble and lay on a couche for weaknesse. Then entred the counter part by a rayle for combing the place. These iustes continued thre dayes, in the which were answered thre hundred and fise men of armes, and euery man ranne fise courses, and with sharpe speares, dyuers were slayne, and not spoken off: the Englishe Lordes and knightes did as well as the best of any the ether. At the Randon and Tournay the Duke of Suffolke hurt a Gentleman that he was like to die, the Marques stroke Mounfire Grew an Albanoy with his weate and pierced his head peere and put him in ieopardie: the Duke of Suffolke in the toznay ouerthrewe a man of armes horse and man, and so did the Lorde Marques another, and yet the Frenchmen would in no wise prayse them. At this toznay the Dolphyn was hurt in the hande, so that he could not performe his chalenge at the barriers, and put one of his ayde in his rone, the next day after began the fight at the barriers, and because the Dolphyn was not present, the Duke of Suffolke and the Lorde Marques byding all cominers. The Dolphyn brought a man secretly, which in al the Court of Fraunce was the tallest and the strongest man, and he was an Almayne, & put him in the place of an other person, to haue had the Duke of Suffolke rebuked. The same great Almayne came to the barres fiercely with face hid, because he would not be knowne, and bare his speare to the Duke of Suffolke with all his strength, and the Duke him receyued, and for all his strength put him by strong strokes from the barriers, and with the but ende of the speare strake the Almaine that he staggared, but for all that the Almayne strake strongly and hardly at the Duke, and the iudges suffered many mo strokes to be foughten then were appointed, but when they sawe the Almayne reele and staggar, then they let fall the rayle betweene them. The Lord Marques Dorset at the same time, euen at the same barre fought with a gentleman of Fraunce that he lost his speare, & in maner withdrew: When the rayle was let fall, these two noble men put by their byfers and tooke ayre, and then they tooke swordes with point and edges abated, and came to the barriers, and the Almayne fought soze with the Duke, which imagened that he was a person set on for the nonce, but the Duke by pure strength tooke him about the neck, & pomeled him so about the head that the blood yssued out of his nose, and then they were parted, and the Almayne was conueyed by the Dolphyn lest he should be knowne. These two noble men likewise nobly them defended, but it happened the Lorde Marques one time to put for his ayde his yongest brother called the Lorde Edward Gray of the age of .xix. yere, and to him was put a gentleman of Fraunce of great stature and strength to the intent to plucke him ouer the barres, but yet the yong Lorde was of such strength, power and pollecie, that he so strake bys aduersarie that he disarmed him, all the face bare. Thus was these enter- prises finished to the laude of all parties, and the Englishe men receyued much honor and no spot of rebuke, yet they were priuily set at and in manye ieopardies: for the declaration of this triumph, he that sawe it can tell howe goodly the courfers trotted, bounded and quickly turned: Howe valyauntly the men of armes behaued themselves and howe the Duke of Bourbones bende was appareled and balled in tabony Ueluet, and cloth of siluer clow- dye, the bende of the Erle of Saint Polle appareled and barded in purple Ueluet all to cut on purple Satten, the infant of Arragon, sonne to Frede- ricke last king of Naples, and his bend all in cloth of Golde and siluer paled. This Lord was but yong but was very toward. The Duke of Wandosme & his bend in cloth of Golde, and plunket Ueluet. The Dolphyn and his aydes were euery day newe appareled at his cosse, one day in siluer and Golde, a- nother in Crimesyn Ueluet and yelow Ueluet, and another daye in white Ueluet and grene, some daye myxed with Satten, some daye embzadored, some daye pounced with Gold, and so euery day in chaunge as the workers fantasie could deuise, but the Englishmen had euer on their apparell red crosses to be knowne for loue of their countrey : at thys triumph the Countie Saleas came into the place on a Fenet trapped in blew Saiten and he hym selfe lykewise appareled and ranne a course with a speare, which was at the hed fve inches on euery side square, that is twenty inches about, and at the but nine inches square, that is fixe and thirtie inches, this speere was made of tumber and yet for all that he ranne cleane along course and slightly auoyded it to his great honour.

Also there was another Gentleman called Anthony Bolwarne which came into the fiede all armed, and on his bodie brought in sight ten speares, that is to wit, thre speeres set in euery stirroppe forwarde, and vnder euery thigh two speeres byward, and vnder his left arme was one speere backward, and the tenth in his hande, and when he came before the Queene he let his horse ronne, and neuer stopped till he had taken euery speere after other and broken it on the ground, and he neuer stopped his horse till all were broken, this Gentleman was highly praysed, and so he was worthe: when all this great triumph was done, the Lordes of England tooke their leaue and were highly thanked of the king, Queene, Dolphyn, and all the Lordes, and so departed & came into England before Chyristmasse. In Nouember the Queene was deliuered of a Prince which liued not long after.

This yere in December there was one Richard Hun, a marchant Taylor of London in Lollers Tower, by the commaundement of the Bishop of London, called Richard Fitziamas, and Doctor Hozley his Chaunceloz. And shortly after, the sayd Hun was found dead hangyng by the necke in a girdle of silke, within the sayde Tower: Of this stozzy ye may reade at large in the booke of the Monumentes of the Church.

This yere and the fourth day of October, the king began his high court of Parliament, and sir Thomas Newell was then speaker, in this Parliament was diuers actes made, but in especiall two, which were much spoken of, the one was the act of apparell, and the other the act of labourers, of these two actes was much commonyng and much businesse arose, for the labourers would in no wise labour by the day, but all by taske and in great, and therefore much trouble fell in the Court, and in especiall in harvest tyme, for then husband men could scarce get workemen to helpe in their harvest. This Parliament continued till Easter, in the which diuers subsidies were graunted to the king toward his great costes and charges, that he had bene at in his boyage royall in fraunce. This yere dyed at Rome by poison, as was reported the Archebishop of Yorke and Cardmall, called Doctor Benbucke, which was the kinges Ambassadoz there: this was a wise man, and of a toly courage. The king then gaue the sayd Archebishopsrike to Thomas Wolsey, then Bishop of Lincolne, which at that tyme bare all the rule about the king, and what he sayd was obeyed in all places. And when he was once Archebishop, he studied day and night how to be a Cardmall, and caused the king and the french king to wyte to Rome for him, and at their requestes he obtayned his purpose as you shall here afterward.

At this tyme was much commonyng, and verily as it appered it was entended, that the king in person would passe the sea to Calice, and there on the marches of the same, the french king & Queene to come and see the king there their brother, and for the same iourney many costly workes were wrought, and much riche apparell provided for, and much preparation made agaynst the next spring: but death, which is the last ende of all thinges let this iourney, for before the next spring, the french king dyed at the Citie of Paris, the first day of January, when he had bene maryed. lxxxij. dayes. And when the king was aduertised of the death of the french king, he caused a solemne obsequie to be song for him in the cathedrall Church of Saint Paule with a costly Herse, and many noble men beyng present.

The death of Lewis the french king.

And after he sent a letter to comfort the Queene his sister, requiryng to knowe her pleasure whether she would continue still in fraunce or returne into England againe. And when he was aduertised of her purpose, which was to returne into England. He sent the Duke of Suffolke, sir Rycharde Wingfield, and Doctor West, with a goodly band of yomen, all in blacke to Paris, which were well receyued of the newe french king fraunces the first of that name, and declared to him, that accordyng to the couenautes made at the tyme of the mariage betwene king Loyes and the Lady Mary, sister to the king of England, they demaunded to haue the sayde Queene deliuered to them with her dower, and shewed their commission for the receypte of her: the Counsaile of fraunce accordyng to the appoyntment assigned to her a dower, and the Duke of Suffolke put in officers, and then shee was by endenture deliuered to the Duke, which behaued himselfe so to her, that he obteyned her good will to be her husband, and thereupon he wrote to the king her brother, meekely besechyng him of pardon of his request, and humbly requiryng him of his wil and consent, at which thing the king a while stayed, and at the last by the meane of the french Queene her selfe, and other great friendes on the Dukes part: After long suite it was agreed that the Duke of Suffolke should bring her into England by maryed, and at his returne to marry her in England: but for doubt of change he maryed her secretly in Paris as it was sayde.

The Duke of Suffolke marieth the Ladie Marie the french Queene and sister vnto King Henry the eyght.

After that the Duke of Suffolke had receyued the french Queene with her dower appoynted, and all her apparell, iewels, and household stuffe deliuered, he with the Queene tooke their leaue of the french king, leauyng Doctor West, nominate Bishop of Ely, for the conclusion of the newe league to be made betwene the king of England, and the newe french king called fraunces the first, and so passed through fraunce to Calice, where she was honourably enterteyned. And after with great honour maryed to Lorde Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolke openly: howbeit, some sayd he was maryed priuily before at Paris, in the house of Cluigny. Agaynst this mariage many men grudged, and sayde it was a great losse to the realme that she was not married to the Prince of Castell: but the wisest sort was content, consideryng that if she had bene maryed againe out of the realme she shoulde haue caried much rychesse with her, and now she brought euery yere into the realme, ix. or x. thousand markes: but whatsoeuer the rude people sayd, the Duke behaued himselfe so, that he had both the fauour of the king and of the people, his wit and demeanour was such.

This Sommer the king tooke his progresse Westward, and visited his townes and Castellies there, and heard the complaintes of his poore commo-naltie, and euer as he roade he hunted and liberally departed with benyson:

The king goeth on his progresse.

and in the myddest of September he came to his Manor of Wyng, and thether came to him the Archebishop of Yorke, whome he hartly welcommed, and shewed him great pleasures: And while he sojourned there, a letter was brought to the Archebishop from Rome, certifying him howe he was elected to be a Cardinall, which incontinent shewed the same to the king, disabling himselfe in wordes, though his entent was otherwyse, and so the kyng did encourage him, and willed him to take the order on him, and so called him my Lord Cardinall, but his Hat, Bull, nor other ceremonies were not yet come.

Statute of labourers.

Statute of army.

In the Moneth of November, the king assembled bys highe Court of Parliament at Westminster, and diuers actes made in the Parliament the first yere amended and altered, and especialllye the act of apparell, and the act of labourers, as by the booke of statutes more plainlye appereth. And at the ende of this Parliament, the Archebishoppe of Cauntorburpe perceiuyng that the Archebishoppe of Yorke medled more in his office of Chauncelozship then it became him to suffer, except he would aduenture the kinges displeasure, and seying also that the sayde Bishop of Yorke coueted to beare all the rule, and to haue all the whole aucthoritie, consideryng also his awne great age, gaue by into the kinges handes his robe of Chaunceloz, and deliuered to the king the great Seale, which deliuered the same to the Archebishop of Yorke, and made him Chaunceloz. And assoone as he was Chaunceloz, he directed commissions into all Shires, for to put the statute of apparell and the statute of labozers in execution. And he himselfe one day called a Gentleman named Simon Fitzrichard, and tooke from him an olde Jacket of Crymofyn Ueluet, and diuers brooches, which extreme doyng caused him greatly to be hated, and by his example many cruell officers for malice, euil intreated diuers of the kinges subiectes, insomuche that one Shymyng Maior of Rochester, set a yong man on the Pillory for wearyng of a ruen shirt.

The Cardinalles Hatte receyued.

In the ende of this moneth was sent into England the Cardinals Hat, and receyued by Gentlemen of Kent, and brought to London with such tryumph, as though the greatest Prince of Christendome had bene come into the realme. And on a Sunday at Saint Peters Church at Westminster, he receyued the Habite, Hat, and Miller, and other vaine glorious tryfles, appertaynyng to the order of a Cardinall. And when he was once a perfite Cardinall, hee looked then aboue all estates, so that all men almost hated him, and disdayned hym.

Then after the Parliament sir Edward Bowynge laboured to bee discharged of the keepyng of the Citie of Tournay, for there he was euer sickly, and so he was discharged, and sir William Blunt Lorde Mountioy was sent thether. And for Marshall there was appoynted sir Sampson Norton. And when the Lorde Mountioy was come thether, and sir Sampson Norton, there happened such a ryot that the Citie was in great ieopardie, the very cause was vnknown, but all the Souldiours, except such as were of the kinges garde rebelled, and put the Lorde Mountioy in ieopardie of his life. And in conclusion to appease the people, sir Sampson Norton was banished the towne for euer. And after the Citie was appeased, and euery thing thought to be forgotten, diuers were executed, & diuers banished the towne and some fled and were banished both England and the towne.

This yere was the newe league betwene the king and the french king openly proclaymed thorough the Citie of London with a Trompet. This yere also, Margaret Queene of Scottes, wife to James the fourth, slaine at Bramston the fift yere of the king, and elder sister to the king, after the death of her late husband married Archibald Douglas Erle of Angus, without the king her brothers assent, or the Counsaile of Scotland, for the which he was not well pleased. But after that, there fell such a strife betwene the Lordes of Scotlande, that she and her husband like banished persons came into England, and wrote to the king for mercie and comfort. The king euer enclyned to mercy, sent them apparell, bessel, & all things necessarie, willyng them to lye still in Northumberland, till they knew farther of his pleasure: And so they lay still at Harbottell, and the Queene was deliuered of a fayre Lady called Margaret, and all the Countrey were commaunded by the king to do them pleasure.

This yere dyed the king of Arragon father to the Queene, for whome was kept a solempne obsequie in the Cathedrall Church of Paules.

Ye haue heard the last yere howe the Queene of Scottes with her husband was come for succor into England, and lay at Harbottell in Northumberland, till the kinges pleasure was to sende for them. So he like a naturall brother sent for her & her husband to come to his Court for their solace, for the which kindnesse the Erle humbly thanked the king, and promysed to geue his attendaunce on the Queene his wife to the Court: whereupon the king sent William Blackwall Esquier, Clerke of his Spicery, with siluer bessel, plate and other things necessary for the comeynaunce of her, and sent to her all maner of officers for her estate conuenient. And when she was redy to depart, she asked for her husband, but he was departed into Scotland and left her alone, nothing remembryng his promise, which sodain departing much made her to muse: howbeit the Lords of England greatly encouraged her to kepe her promise with the king her brother: and so after she was somewhat appeased, she set forward, & in euery towne she was well receiued, & so on the thirde day of May she made her entry into London, ridyng on a whyte palfrey (which the Queene of England had sent to her) belynd sir Thomas Dar richely besene, and with great companie of Lordes and Ladies, shee rode through the Citie to Baynardes Castell, and from thence she was conueyed to Grenewich, and there receyued ioyously of the King, the Queene, the french Queene her sister, and highly was she feasted. And when the king heard that the Erle of Angus her husband was departed, he sayd, it was done like a Scot. This Queene sometyne was at the Court, and sometyne at Baynardes Castell, and so she continued in England all this yere.

This moneth of May were sent out of England .xij. hundred Masons, and Carpenters, and thre hundred labourers to the Citie of Tournay: for the king and his Counsaile considering that the garrison that was kept there, was chargeable, and therefore it was determined that there should be buylde a Castell to chastice the City if they rebelled, and to minishe the garrison. And therefore these workemen were sent thether, which this yere began a strong Castell, and wrought still on it.

Justice mis-nistred by
wolsey.

This yere by the Cardinall were all men called to accompt that had the occupieng of the kinges money in the warres or else where, not to euerye mans contentation, for some were found in arrerages, and some saued themselves by pollecy and brybozpe, and waxed riche, and some innocentes were punished. And for a truth he so punished periurpe with open punishment and open papers wering, that in his time it was lesse bsd. He punished also Lordes, knightes, and men of all sortes for ryots, beryng and maynteyng in their countries, that the pooze men liued quyetly, so that no man durst beare for feare of imprisonment: The pooze people perceyued that he punished the riche, then they complayned without number, and brought many an honest man to trouble and vexation. And when the Cardinall at the last had perceyued their vntrew surmises and fayned complaintes for the most part, he then wored wery of hering their causes, and ordayned by the kings commission, diuers vnder Courtes to here complaintes by byll of pooze people. The one was kept in white Hall, the other before the kinges Almoner Doctor Stokesley, a man that had more learning, then descretion to be a Judge. The thirde was kept in the Lorde Treasurers chamber besyde the Starre Chamber, and the fourth at the Rolles at the after noone. These Courtes were greatly haunted for a time but at the last the people perceyued that much delay was bsd in these Courtes, and fewe matters ended, and when they were ended, they bound no man by the lawe, then euery man was wery of them and resorted to the common law.

In the moneth of October came into England Mathew Bishop of Sedonon and Cardinall, called commonly the Cardinall of Stuythes, from the Emperour Maximilian. This Cardinall was a wise man and of great boldnes, and was well entertained in the Court of the king. And at his contentation and for olde loue, the king lent to the Emperour Maximilian a great somme of money: wherof the company of Friscobald, and Anthony Cauerler Geneuoy vnderooke the exchaung, but they payed not the Emperour at his day, notwithstanding they had receyued the money of the king. This Friscobald and Anthony Cauerler by meanes of rewardes, geuen to great Lordes of the Counsaile borrowed of the kyng. xxx. thousande pounde and had long dayes for the payment: but friscobalde was shortly consumed, and Anthony Cauerler could not be sene, and so the king was not payed at his dayes, and many English Marchants were by these men vndone, for they spent liberally of euery mans goods.

In this season the Genowayes, frenchmen and other straungers sayd and boasted themselves to be in suche fauour with the king and his counsaile, that they set naught by the rulers of the Citie: and the multitude of straungers was so great about London, that the pooze English artificers could scarce get any lyuing: And most of al the straungers were so proude, that they disdaind, mocked and oppressed the Englishmen, which was the beginning of the grudge. For among all other thinges there was a Carpenter in London called Wyllyamson, which bought two stocke Doves in Chepe, and as he was about to pay for them, a frenchman tooke them out of his hande, and sayde they were not meat for a Carpenter: well sayde the English man I haue bought them, and now payde for them, and therefore I will haue them, nay sayde the frenchman I will haue them for my Lorde

Lorde the Ambassadoz, and so for better or worse, the frenchman called the English man knaue, and went away with the stock Doves. The straungers came to the frenche Ambassadour, and furnished a complaynt against the pooze Carpenter, and the Ambassadour came to my Lorde Maior, and sayde so much, that the Carpenter was sent to prison: and yet not contented with this, so complayned to the kings counsaile, that the kings commaundement was layde on him. And when Syr John Baker knight and other worshipfull persons sued to the Ambassadour for him, he answered by the body of God that the English knaue should loose his lyfe, for he sayde no English man should denie that the frenche men requyzed, and other answers had they none.

The prioz of french men.

Also a frenchman that had slayne a man, should abjure the realme and had a crosse in his hande, and then sodainely came a great sort of frenchmen about him, and one of them sayde to the Constable that led him, syr is thys crosse the price to kill an English man. The Constable was somewhat astonied and answered not. Then sayde another frenchman, on that price we would be banished ali by the masse, thys sayng was noted to be spoken spitefully. Howbeit, the frenchmen were not alonly oppressors of the English men, for a Lombarde called fraunces de bard, entised a mans wyfe in Lombarde Arcete to come to his Chamber with her husbundes plate, which thing he did. After when her husband knew it, he demaunded his wyfe, but answer was made he should not haue her, then he demaunded his plate, and in like maner answer was made that he should neyther haue plate nor wyfe. And when he had sued an action agaynst the straunger in the Gynldchall, the straunger so faced the English man, that he faynted in his sute. And then the Lombard arrested y pooze man for his wyfes boord, while he kept her from her husband in his chamber. This moeke was much noted, for these and many other oppressions done by them, there encreased such a malice in the English mens hartes: that at the last it brast out. For amongst other that foregrudged at these matters, there was a broker in London called John Lyncolne, which wrote a bill before Calter, desiring Doctor Standiche at his sermon at saint Marie Spittel the Monday in Easter weeke, to moue the Maior and Aldermen, to take part with the commonalte agaynst the straungers. The Doctor answered that it became not him to mene any such thing in a sermon. From him he departed, and came to a Chanon in saint Mary Spittel, a Doctor in deuinitie, called Doctor Bele, and lamentably declared to him, how miserably the comon artificers lyued, and scarce could get any worke to find them, their wyfes and children, for there were such a number of artificers straungers, that toke away all their liuing in maner. And also how the English Marchants could haue no vtterance for their marchandise, for the Marchaunt straungers, bring in all silkes, cloth of Golde, wine, Oyle, Iron, and such other marchandise, that no man almost byeth of an English man, And also outwarde they carie so much English wolle, Cloth, Tynne, and Leade, that English men that auenture outwarde, can haue no lyuing: Which things sayde Lyncolne hath bene shewed to the counsaile, and cannot be heard. And farther sayde he, the straungers compass the Citie rounde about, in Southwarke, in Westmynster, Temple barre, Holborne, Saint Martins, Saint Johns streete, Algate, Cowze hill, and saint Katherynes.

and fozeft all the market, so that no good thing foze them commeth to the market : which is the cause that Englishe men want and sterue, and they lyue habundantly in great pleasure. Wherfoze sayde Lyncolne maister Doctoz, sith you were bozne in London, and see the oppzeffion of the straungers, and the great miserie of your awne natie Countrie, exhort all the Cuezens to ioyne in one against these straungers, raueners and destroyers of your Countrie. Maister Doctoz hearing this, sayde he much lamented the case, if it were as Lyncolne had declared, yes sayde Lyncolne that it is and much moze, foze the Dutchmen bring ouer Iron, Tymber, Leather and Weyns- hot readie wrought, as Harles, Lockes, Baskets, Cubbozdes, Stooles, Cables, Chestes, Girdels, with Poyntes, Sadels and painted clothes, so that if it were wrought here, the Englishe men might haue some worke and lyuing by it. And beside this they grow into such a multitude that it is to be looked vpon, foze I sawe on a Sunday this Lent sixe hundred straungers shooting at the Poppngay with Crosbowes, and they kepe suche assemblies and fraternities together, and make such a gathering to their common bore, that euery Botcher will holde plee with the Citie of London: well sayde the Doctoz, I will doe foze a refozation of this matter as much as a priest may doe, and so receaued Lyncolnes byll and studied foze his purpose. Then Lyncolne very ioyous of his enterprize went from man to man, sayng that shortly they should heare newes, and daylie excited yong people and artificers to beare malice to the straungers. When Easter came and Doctoz Bele should preach, the Tuesday in Easter weeke, he came into the Pulpit, and there declared that to him was brought a pittifull byll, and red it in this wise. To all you the worshopfull Lordes and maysters of this Citie, that will take compassion ouer the pooze people your neyghbours, and also of the great impoztable hurtes, losses, and hynderaunces, whereof proceedeth the extreme pouertie to all the kinges subiectes that inhabite within thys Citie and suburbs of the same, foze so it is that the alyens and straungers eate the breade from the poze fatherlesse children, and take the lyuing from all the artificers, and the entercourse from all marchauntes, whereby pouertie is so much increased that euerye man bewayleth the miserie of other, foze craftes men be brought to beggerie, and marchauntes to needinesse: wherfoze the premises considered, the redresse must be of the commons, knyght and knyghte to one part, as the hurt and dammage greueth all men, so must all men set to their wylling power foze remedie, and not to suffer the sayde alyens so highly in their wealth, and the naturall bozne men of this region to come to confu- sion. Of thys letter was moze, but the Doctoz red no farther, and then began Cælum coeli domino, terram autem dedit filiis hominum, and vpon this text he in- treated, that this lande was geuen to Englishe men, and as byzdes would defend their nest, so ought Englishe men to cherishe and defende themselves, and to hurt and greue alyens foze the common weale. And vpon this text pugna pro patria, he brought in, holwe by Gods lawe it was lawfull to fight foze their Countrie, and euer he subtilly moued the people to rebell agaynst the straungers, and breake the kings peace, nothing regarding the league betwene Princes and the kings honoz. Of this sermon many a light person tooke courage, and openly spake agaynst straungers. And as the Deuill would, the Sunday after at Grenwicke in the kings Gallery was Frances de bard, which as you harde kept an English mans wyfe and his goods, and yet he could haue no remedie, and with him were Demynge, Anthony Caueler, and manye mo straungers, and there they talkyng with syz Tho- mas Palmer knight, iested and laughed howe that Frances kept the Eng- lish mans wyfe, sayng that if they had the Maiors wyfe of London, they would keepe her: Syz Thomas sayde, syz you haue to muche fauour in England. There were dyuers Englishe Marchauntes by, and hard them laugh, and were not content, in so much as one William Bolt a Mercer sayde, well you whozefon Lombardes, you reioyse and laugh, by the masse we will one day haue a day at you, come when it will, and that sayng the o- ther Marchauntes affirmed. Chystale was reported about London, and the yong and euill dispos'd people sayde, they would be reuenged on the Mar- chaunt straungers, as well as on the artificers straungers.

Upon this rumour the .xxviii. daye of Aprill, diuerse young men of the City assauted the Aliens as they passed by the strets, and some were stricken and some buffeted, and some throwen in the canal. Wherfoze the Maior sent diuerse persons to ward, as Stephyn Studley Skynner, and Bettes and Stephenson and diuerse other, some to one Counter, and some to another, and some to Newgate. Then sodainly was a common rumour, and no man could tell how it began, that on May daye next, the Citie would rebell and slaye all Aliens, insomuch as diuers straungers fled out of the Citie. This brute ranne so farre that it came to the kinges counsaile, insomuch as the Cardinal being Lorde Chaunceloz, sent foze John Kest Maior of the Citie, and other of the counsaile of the Citie, and demaunded of the Maior in what case the Citie stood, to whome he answered that it was well and in good quiet: May sayd the Cardinal, it is informed vs that your yong and ryotous people will rise and distresse the Straungers, heare ye of no such thing: so sulerly sayd the Maior, and I trust so to gouerne them that the kinges peace shal be obserued, and that I dare vnder take, if I and my brethren the Alder- men may be suffered. Well sayd the Cardinal, go home and wisely foze see this matter, foze if any such thing be you may shortly preuent it. The Maior came from the Cardinal at foure of the clocke in the after none on May euen, and demaunded of the officers what they heard, diuers of them answered that the voyce of the people was so, and had bene so two or thre dayes before. This heering the Maior sent foze all his brethren to the Gyilde hall in great hast, and almost seuen of the clocke or the assemb'e was sette. Then was de- clared to them by Maister Brooke the Recorder how that the kinges coun- saile had reported to them that the Comminaltie that night would rise, and distresse all the Aliens and straungers that inhabited in the Citie of London: the Aldermen answered they hard say so, but they mistrusted not the matter, but yet they sayde it was well done to foze see it. Then sayd the Recorder, it were best that a sub stanciall watch were set of honest persones, householders, which might withstand the euill doers. An Alderman sayd, that it was euill to raise men to harneis, foze if such a thing were entended, they could not tell who would take their part. Another Alderman sayd, that it were best to kepe the yong men a sunder and euery man to shut his dozes, and to kepe his ser- uantes uauntes within. Then with these opinions was the Recorder sent to the Cardinall befoze eyght of the clocke, and then he with such as were of the kinges counsaile at his place, commaunded that in no wise watch shoulde be kept, but that euery man should repaire to his awne house, and there to keepe him and his seruauntes tyll seauen of the clocke of the morning: with which commaundement, the sayd Richard Brooke Sergeaunt at the lawe and Recorder, and sir Thomas Moore, late vnder shriue of London, and then of the kinges counsaile, came to the Guilde hall halfe hower and befoze nune of the clocke, and there shewed the commaundement of the kinges counsaile. Then in all hast, euery Alderman sent to his warde that no man should stirre after nine of the clocke out of his house, but to kepe his doozes shutte, and his seruauntes within tyll seauen of the clocke in the morning. After this commaundement, sir John Mordye Alderman came from his warde, and found two yong men in Chepe playng at Bucklers, and a great company of yong men ioking on them for the commaundement was then scarce knoene, for then it was but nine of the clocke. Maister Mordye seing that, bade them leaue, and the one yong man asked hym why? and then he sayde thou shalt knowe, and toke him by the arme to haue had him to the Counter. Then all the yong men resisted the Alderman, and toke him from maister Mordye, & cryed with scyres and clubs. Then out of euerie doze came clubs and weapens and the Alderman fled, and was in great daunger. Then more peopie aroose out of euery quarter, and out came Seruingmen, and Watermen, and Courtiers, and by a .xj. of the clocke there were in Chepe six or seauen hundred. And out of Paules Churchyarde came thre. C. which wist not of the other, and so out of all places they gathered, and brake by the Counters, and toke out the prisoners, that the Maior had thether committed for hurting of the straungers, and came to Newgate and toke out Studley and Petyt, committed thether for that cause. The Maior and Shyifes were there present, and made Proclamation in the kinges name, but nothing was obeyed. Thus they ran a plumpe through Saint Nicholas Shambles, and at saint Martins gate there met with them sir Thomas Moore and other, desiring them to go to their lodgings: And as they were intreating, and had almost brought them to a stay. The people of Saint Martins threwe out stones and battes, and hurte diuers honest persones, that were perswading the ryetous people to ceasse, and they bade them hold their handes, but still they threwe out brikes and hoate water. Then a Sergeaunt of Armes called Nicholas Downes, which was there with Maister Moore, entreating them, being sore hurt, in a fury cryed downe with them. Then all the misruled persones ranne to the doozes and windowes of saint Martins, and spoyled all that they found, and cast it into the strete, and left fewe houses vnspoyled. And after that they ranne hedlyng into Cornehill by Leaden Halle, to the house of one Mutuas a Frenchman or Picarde borne, which was a great bearer of Frenchmen, were they Pyckpurffes, or how euill disposition soeuer they were of, and within hrs gate, called Grenegate, dwelled diuers Frenchmen that kalendred Worsted, contrary to the kings laboes: and al they were so borne out by the same Mutuas, that no man durst meddle with them, wherefoze he was sore hated, and if the people had founde him in their fury, they would haue striken of his head: but when they found him not, the Watermen, and certain

yong persones that were there fell to ryfing: some ranne to Banchchapelton, and brake the straungers houses, and threwe shooes and bootes into the strete: Thus from ten or a leauen of the clock, continued these royotous people, durynge which tyme a knight called sir Thomas Darre, in great haste went to the Cardinall and tolde him of this ryot which incontinent strengthened his house with men and ordinaunce. And after, this knight roade to the king to Richmond, and made the report moze then it was: wherefoze the king hastely sent to London, and was truly aduertised of the matter, and how that the ryot was ceassed, and many of the doers apprehended. But while this ruffling continued, Sir Richard Cholmeley knight Liuetenant of the Towre, no great friende to the Citie in a frantike fury losed certayne peeces of ordinaunce, and shot into the Citie, which did litle harime howbeit his good will appered. About thze of the clocke, these ryotous persons scuered themselves and went to their places of resort, and by the waye they were taken by the Maior and the Heds of the Citie, and some sent to the Towre, and some to Newgate, and some to the Counters, to the number of thze hundred, some fled and especially the Watermen, and Seruingmen, but the poore prentises were taken. About fine of the clocke, the Erles of Shrewsbury and Surrey, which had heard of this ryot, came to London with such strength as they had, so did the Iunes of Courte, and diuers noble men: but or they came, all the ryot was ceassed, and many taken as you haue heard.

Then were the prisoners examined, and the sermon of Doctor Beale called to remembraunce, and he taken and sent to the Towre, and so was John Lincolne: but with this ryot the Cardinall was sore displeased. Then the fourth day of May was an Dyer and determiner at London befoze the Maior, the Duke of Norfolk, the Erle of Surrey and other. The Citie thought that the Duke bare them grudge for a lewde priest of his, which the yere befoze was slaine in Chepe, insomuch the Duke then in his fury sayde, I pray God I may once haue the Citizens in my daunger: and the Duke also thought that they bare him no good will, wherefoze he came into the Citie with .xiiij. hundred men in harnesse to kepe the Dyer and determiner. And vpon examination, it could neuer be proued of any meetyng, gatheryng, talking or conuenticle at any day or tyme befoze that day, but that the chaunce so happened without any matter prepenfed of any creature sayng Lincoln, and neuer an honest person in maner was taken but onely he. Then Proclamations were made that no women should come together to babble and talke, but all men should kepe their wyues in theyr houses. All the stretes that were notable stood full of harnessed men, which spake many opprobrious wordes to the Citizens, which grieved them sore: and if they would haue bene reuenged, the other had had the worse, for the Citizens were two hundred to one: but lyke true subiects they suffered patiently.

When the Lordes were set, the prisoners were brought in through the stretes tyed in ropes, some men, some laddes, some children of .xiiij. yere. There was a great mourning of fathers and friendes for their children and kinfolke. Among the prisoners manye were not of the Citie, some were priestes and some husbandmen and labourers, and they were all arreigned of Treason. The cause of the Treason was, because the king had amitie with all christen Princes, that they had broken the truce and league contrary to the statute of king Henry the fift. Of this treason diuers were endited, and so for that tyme the Lordes departed. And the next day the Duke came againe, and the Erle of Surrey with two thousand armed men, which kept the stretes. When the Maior, the Duke, and the Erle of Shrewsbury and Surrey were set, the prisoners were arreigned, and. xiiij. founde guiltie of high treason, and adiudged to be hanged, drawen and quartered, & for the execution hereof, were set by a. xi. payre of Gallowes in diuers places where the offences were done, as at Algate, at Blanchechapelon, Gracious strete, Leaden hall, and before euery Counter one, and at Newgate, at Saint Martyns, at Aldersgate, at Bishopsgate. This sight soze grieved the people to see Galowes set by in the kings Chamber. Then were the prisoners that were iudged, brought to the places of execution, and executed in most rigorous maner, for the Lorde Edmond Harward, sonne to the Duke of Norfolke, and knight Herthall shewed no mercie, but extreme crueltie, to the poore yonglynges in their execution, and likewise the Dukes seruantes spake many opprobrious wordes, some had hang, some had draw, some had set the Citie on fyre, but all was suffered.

John Lincoln came with other out to scry.

On Thursday the. vij. day of May was Lyncolne, Shyppyn, and two brethren called Bets, and dyuers other adiudged to dye. Then Lincoln sayde, my Lordes, I meant well, for, and you knewe the mischief that is ensued in this realme by straungers, you would remedie it, and many times I haue complayned, and then I was called a busye felowe: now our Lorde haue mercy on me. Then all the sayde persons were layde on the Hardelles, and drawen to the standard in Chepe, and first was John Lincoln executed, and as the other had the rope about their neckes, there came a commaundement from the king to respite execution. Then the people cryed, God saue the king. Then was the Dyer and determiner deferred tyll another day and the prisoners sent againe to warde, and the harnessed men departed out of London, and all thinges quiet.

The. xj. day of May the king came to his Manor of Greenwich, where the recorder of London, & dyuers Aldermen came to speake with his grace, and all wore Gownes of blacke coulor. And when they perceyued the king coming out of his priuie Chamber into his Chamber of presence, they knelled downe and the Recorder said: Our most natural, benigne, and soveraigne Lorde, we know well that your grace is displeas'd with vs of your Citie of London for the great ryot late done: we assertaine your grace, that none of vs, nor no honest person were condiscendyng to that enozmitie, and yet we, our wyues, and children, every houre lament that your fauour should be taken from vs, and forasmuch as light and ydle persons were the doers of the same, we most humbly besech your grace to haue mercy of vs for our negligence, and compassion of the offenders for their offence and trespassse.

Truly sayd the king, you haue highly displeas'd and offended vs, and ye ought to waile and be sozry for the same, and where ye saye that you the substantiall persons were not consentyng to the same, it appereth to the contrary, for you neuer moued to let them, nor stirred once to fight with them, which you say were so sma'll a number of light persons, wherfore we must thinke, & you can not denie, but you did winke at the matter, but at this tyme, we will graunt to you neyther our fauour nor good will, nor to the offenders mercy, mercy, but resort to the Cardinall oure Chauncelour, and he shall make you an aunswere, and declare our pleasure, and with this aunswere the Londoners departed and made relation to the Maior.

The. xviii. day of this Moneth the Queene of Scottes, which had bene at the Court, and at Baynards Castell, a whole yere at the kinges charge, and was richly appoynted of all thinges mete to her estate, both of Jewels, Plate, Tapistry, Arras, Coyne, Hoyses, and all other thinges of the kinges gift and liberalitie, departed out of London towarde Scot: ande wyth great riches, albeit she came into England with much pouertie, and she entred into Scotland the. xiiij. day of June, whom her husband receyued at Barwick: but the English men finally him regarded. All her charges within the realme, comyng to the Court and returnyng, were of the kinges purse.

The Queene of Scottes retu. nech. me. to Scot. and to her husband.

Thursday the. xxiij. day of May, the king came into Westminster hall, for whome at the vpper ende was set a cloth of estate, and the place hanged with Arras, with him was the Cardinall, the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke the Erles of Shrewsbury, of Essex, Wilshire and of Surrey, with manye Lordes and other of the kinges Counsaile. The Maior and Aldermen, and all the chief of the City were there in their best liuery (according as the Cardinall had them appoynted) by. ix. of the clocke. Then the king commaunded that all the prisoners should be brought forth. Then came in the poore yonglyngs and olde false knaues bound in ropes all along, one after another in their shirtes, and euery one a Halter about his necke, to the number of foure hundred men, and. xi. women. And when all were come before the kings presence, the Cardinall soze layd to the Maior and commonaltie their negligence, and to the prisoners he declared that they had deserued death for their offence: Then all the prisoners together cryed mercy gracious Lorde, mercy. Then the Lordes altogether besought his grace of mercy, at whose request the king pardoned them all. And then the Cardinall gaue vnto them a good exhortation to the great gladnesse of the heerers. And when the generall pardon was pronounc'd, all the prisoners showed at once, and altogether cast by their Halters into the Hall rooffe, so that the king might perceyue they were none of the discrettest sort. Here is to be noted that dyuers offenders which were not taken, heeryng that the king was inclined to mercye, came well apparayled to Westminster, and sodainly stryped them into their shirtes with halters, and came in among the prisoners willyngly, to be partakers of the kinges pardon, by the which doyng, it was well knowen that one John Gelson yoman of the Crowne, was the first that beganne to spoyle, and exhorted other to do the same, and because he fled and was not taken, he came in the rope with the other prisoners, & so had his pardon. This companie was after called the blacke Wagon. Then were all the Galowes within the Citie taken downe, and many a good prayer sayde for the king, and the Citizens tooke moze heede to their seruants.

King Henry the eighte came to westminster hall, and there sat himselfe in iudgement.

The king pardoneth all the rebels.

After this, sodainly there came a plague of sicknesse, called the sweetyng sicknesse. This malady was so cruell that it killed some within three hures, some within two houres, some mery at dinner, and dead at supper. Many dyed in the kinges Court, the Lord Clinton, the Lorde Grey of Wilton, and many knightes, Gentlemen, and officers. For this plague Michelmas terme was adiourned, and because that this maladie continued from July to to the middes of December, the king kept himselfe euer with a small compa-nie, and kept no solempne Chyristmasse, willyng to haue no resort for feare of infection: but much lamented the number of his people, for in some one town halfe the people dyed, and in some other towne the thirde part, the Streake was so feruent, and the infections so great.

In the beginning of this yere, Trinitie terme was begon at Oren-ford, where it continued but one daye, and was againe adiourned to Westminster. This yere came to Calice from Pope Leo, a Legate de latere, called Laurence Campeius, commonly called the Cardinall Campeius, for to erhozt the king to make warre on the Turke. And likewise the sayde Leo sent three other Legates foorth at that time for the sayde purpose, one into Fraunce, another into Spaine, and the thirde into Germany.

When the Cardinall of Pozke knew that there was coming a Legate into England, which should haue a greater preheminence then a Cardinall, he whose ambition was neuer satisfied, caused a Byshop and certayne Doctors to passe the Sea to Calice to welcome him, and to shewe to him that if he would haue the Popes purpose, to take any effect in Englande, he should in any wise sende in poste to Rome, to haue the sayde Cardinall of Pozke to be Legate also, and to be ioyned in commission with him, which thing was done (not without good rewardes) so that in thirtie and five dayes, the Bull was brought to Calice. During which time the Cardinall of Pozke sent to the Legate to Calice, red cloth to clothe his seruauntes, which at their com-ming to Calice, were but meanelly appareled. And when all things were readie, he passed the Sea and landed at Douer, and so kept forth his iorney toward London. At euery towne as they passed, he was receyued with procession, and accompanied with all the Lords and Gentlemen of Kent. And when he came to Blacketh, there met him the Duke of Norfolke, with a great number of Brelates, knightes and Gentemen, all richely appareled.
And in the waye he was brought into a riche Tent of cloth of Go'de, where he shifed hymselfe into a robe of a Cardynall, edged wyth Ermynes, and so tooke his Hoyle ryding toward London.

The night before he came to London, the Cardinall of Pozke, to furnische the cariages of the Cardinall Campeius, sent to him twelue Mulets with emptie Cofers covered with red, which twelue Mulets were led thro-rough London, amongst the Mulets of Campeius, which were but eyght and so these twentie Mulets passed through the streetes, as though they had bene full of treasures, apparell, and other necessaries. And when they came into Chepe, one of the Mulets brake from her keeper, and ouerthrewe the Chestes, and ouerturned two or three other Mulets cariages, which fell with such a violence, that dyuers of them vnlocked, and out of some fell olde hosen, broken Shoen, and roasted fleshe, peeces of bread, Egges, and much bile baggage: at which sight the boyes cryed, see, see, my Lorde Legates treasure, and so the Muleters were ashamed, and tooke bp all their stufte, and passed forth. And about thre of the clock at after none, on the .xxix. daye of July the sayde Legate entred the Citie, and in Southwarke met him all the Clergie of London, with Crosses, Senfers, and Copes, and senfed him with great reuerence. The Maior and Aldermen, and all the occupations of the Citie in their best lyueries stode in the streetes, and him highly honored: to whome Syr Thomas Moore made a brieue oration in the name of the Citie: And when he came to Paules, there he was receyued by Byshops Mitred, and vnder a Canapie entred the Church: which Canapie his seruaunts tooke for their fees. And when he had offered he gaue his benediction to all the people, and tooke agayne hys Mule, and so was wyth all hys traîne aforesayde, conueyed to Bathe place, and there rested: where he was welcomed of the Cardinall of Pozke. And on Sunday next ensuyng, these two Cardinales as Legates, tooke their Barges and came to Grenswiche, eche of them had beside their Crosses two pillers of Siluer, two little Axes guylt, and two cloke bagges embroudered, and the Cardinals Hats bozne before them. And when they came to the kings hall, the Cardinall of Pozke went on the right hande: and there the king royally appareled and accompanied, met them euen as though both had come from Rome, and so brought them both bp into his Chamber of presence, and there was a solempne oration made by an Italian, declaring the cause of the Legacie to be in two articles, one for ayde agaynst Gods enemies, and the second for reformation of the Clergie. And when masse was done, they were had to a Chamber, and serued with Lords and knightes, with much solempnitie: and after dinner they tooke their leaue of the king and came to London, and rode through the Citie together in great pompe and glozie to their lodgings.

When the Cardinall of Pozke was thus a Legate, he set bp a Court, and called it the Court of the Legate, and proued Testamentes, and heard causes to the great hinderance of all the Byshops of the realme. He visited Byshops and all the Clergie, exempt and not exempt, and vnder couler of reformation he gat much treasure, and nothing was reformed, but came to more mischiefe: for by example of his pride, priestes and all spirituall persons wared so prowde, that they woze Weluet, and silke, both in Cobures, Jackets, Doblots, and Shoes, kept open lecherie, and so highly bare themselues by reason of his aucthorities and faculties, that no man durst once re-proue any thing in them, for feare to be called heretike, and then they would make him smoke or beare a faggot. And the Cardinall himselfe was so prowde, that he thought himselfe egall with the king: and when he had sayd Masse, he made Dukes and Erles to serue him of Wyne with a saie taken, and to holde the Bason at the Lauatozies. Thus the pride and ambition of the Cardinall and Clergie was so high, that in maner all good persons abhorred and disdeyned it.

Thys yere the frenche king wrote to the King of Englande, that if it were his pleasure, he would send an Ambassade into Englande, to remon-with the king and his counsaile for the redeeming of the Citie of Terray, and other things: which answered the messenger, that the Ambassade of the frenche king should be right hartily welcome to him. And so the frenche king sent into Englande the Lorde Boneuet, high Admirall of Fraunce, and the Byshop of Barys as chiefe Ambassadors accompanied with many noble men, and yong freshe Galauents of the court of Fraunce, to the number of lxxx. and more, and then came a great number of rascall Pedlers, and Juel-lers, and brought ouer Hattes and Cappes, and dyuers Marchaundise un-customed, all vnder the colour of the trussery of the Ambassadors.

After that these noble men were landed at Douer, they were receyued

by the Nobles and Gentlemen of the Countrey, and so conueyed from lodging to lodging till they came to Blackheth, and before them went their carriages and people in great number, to the summe of twelue hundred one another, which was thought to be to many for an Ambassade. These Gentlemen of Fraunce were very freshe.

The Erie of Surrey receyued the Ambassadors

Monday the. xxvii. daye of September, the Erie of Surrey high Admirall of Englande, in a coate of rich Tissue cut on cloth of siluer, on a great courser richely trapped, and a great Whistell of Golde, set with stones and pearle, hangyng at a great and manly Chayne baudzick wise, accompanied with an hundred and. lx. Gentlemen, richly appareled, on goodly hozes came to Blackheth, and there amiably receaued the Ambassadors of Fraunce. The yong galants of Fraunce had coates garded with one colour, cut in ten or twelue partes verie richely to beholde: and so all the Englishe men accoupled themselves with the French men louingly together, and so reade to London. After the two Admiralls folowed. xxiii. of the Frenches kinges Garde, whome accompanied. xxiii. of the kinges Garde. And after them a great number of archers, to the number of toure hundred. And in thys order they passed thozough the Citie to Taylers hall, and there the chiefe Ambassadors were lodged, and the remnaunt in Marchants houses about. When these Lords were in their lodgings, then the French harder men open their wares, and made Taylers hall lyke to the paunche of a marre. At thys doying many an Englishe man grudged, but it awayed not. The last daye of September, the French Ambassadors tooke their Barge, & came to Grenewiche. The Admirall was in a Gowne of cloth of siluer rayfed, furred with ryche Sables, and all his company almost were in a newe fassion garment, called a Shemew, which was in effect a Gowne, cut in the middle. The Gentlemen of Fraunce were brought to the kinges presence, where the Bishop of Parys made a solempne oration: which beyng ended, and answered made thereto, the king highly enterteined the Admirall and his company, and so did all the Englishe Lords and Gentlemen. The Ambassadors beyng daylie in counsaile at Grenewiche, the other Gentlemen daunced and passed the time in the Quenes chamber with Ladies and Gentlewomen. After long counsaile and much desiring of the French king and his counsaile, it was agreed that the Citie of Tournay should be deliuered to the French king, he payng sixe hundred thousand Crownes for the Citie, and foure hundred thousand Crownes for the Castell, the which the king had buyded, but it was not fully performed: and also he should pay. xxiii. thousand pound Tourneys, the which summe the Citizens of the Citie of Tournay ought to the king of Englande for their liberties and franchises.

In agrement that the City of Tournay should again be deliuered to the French king.

Upon these agrementes to be performed it was concluded that the City of Tournay should be deliuered to the French king. The Frenchmen the soner to come to their purpose, made a pretence of marriage to be had, betwene the Dolphin, sonne and heyre to the French king and the Ladye Mary the kinges daughter, which was agreed vpon this condicion, that if they both consented at lawfull age, then to be firme and stable, or else not: for then they were both very yong. And so all matters were concluded, and the Erie of Worcester and the Bishop of Ely appoynted to go into Fraunce for the deliuey of the Citie of Tournay, and performing of the other agrementes. And for the sure payment of the summes of money to be paide to the king of England, vpon the sayd agrements, there were foure Gentlemen of the realme of Fraunce, left in England for hostages: whose names were Mounsieur Memozancy, Mounsier Monpessart, Mounsier Moy, Mounsier Mozret. Of the which foure the two first named were of noble bloud, but the two last were but of meane houses. And because they were yong, there was auncient Gentlemen appoynted gouernoys to them.

When all thinges were concluded and sealed, the King and all the Ambassadors richely appareled, and the two Legates roade solempnly to the Church of Saint Paul from the Bishop of Durhams place: and there was made from the West dooze to the Quere dooze of the Church, egall with the highest step, a haute pace of timber twelue foote broad, that the king and the Ambassadors might be sene. And there the Cardinall of Yorkes sang high Masse, and had his cloth of estate of Tysue: his Cupbord set with Basons all guilt couered: his place was fiue stepes high. At the first lauatory, thre Erles serued him, and at the second two Dukes and a Marques, and with the assay taken, they gaue hym wine, and after woter. And when the Masse was done, the Cardinall Campeius and he gaue to the people (as they sayd) cleane remission. And after that done, Doctor Pace the kinges Secretary a man verie eloquent, made a goodly Oration in praise of peace: and that done, the king and all his Nobles and Ambassadors went to the Bishops palace to dynner, where they were highly feasted. And after dynner, the king roade againe to the Bishop of Durhams place.

After diuerse Justes and feastes made, the sayd Ambassadors by the king and the Lordes: Sir Thomas Ernew Maioz of London, made to them a costly dynner at the Goldsmithes hall, which dinner they highly prayzed, it was so well ordered.

And when time came, they tooke their leaue of the king, the Queene, and the kinges Counsaile, and deliuered into the kinges possession their foure hostages as you haue heard before: at which departing the king gaue to the Admirall of Fraunce a garnish of guilt bessel, a payze of couered Basons guilt, twelue great guilt Bowles, foure payze of great guilt Pottes, a standing Cup of Gold, garnished with great Perle: and to some other also, he gaue plate, to some Cheines of Gold, to some rich apparell, and to some great hozes with rich bardes, so that euery gentleman was wel rewarded: which liberalitie the straungers much prayzed: and after that all their trusses were ready they departed towarde the sea, and tooke ship and landed at Boleyn.

Sone after their departing, the Erie of Worcester being the kinges Chamberlayn: The Bishop of Ely, the Lorde of Saint Johns, sir Nicholas Laure, sir John Dechy, Sir Thomas Bulleyn as Ambassadors from the king of England, accompanied with. lxx. knights and gentelinen and yomen, to the number of foure hundred and aboue, passed the sea with some stormes, and came to Calice, and passed thzough Picardie with great and kinde entertaynment in all places tyll they came to Paris, where they were nobly receyued, euery man matched with a like pere: and after they were brought to the French kinges presence, where the Bishop of Ely made a solempne Oration, as concerning the marriage and the peace: he did it with such a bold spirite that the Frenchmen much prayzed his audacitie.

Ambassadors sent from the king of England vnto the French king.

The

The manner of the deli-uerye of Courmay.

The conclusyon of this peace was this, that Henrye king of England, Fraunces king of Frenchmen, and Charles king of Castell had sworne a perpetuall peace, during their liues. And if it should happen any of the thre to violatē the league in any poynt and to moue warre: then the other two shoulde ioyne together and make warre against the violater or breaker of the peare.

After all thinges concluded, the Erle of Worcester, and with him Sir Nicholas Taur, sir John Dechy, sir Edward Belknap, with many other knightes tooke their leaue of the French king, and roade to Courmay, where they were well receyued. Then began the Capitaynes and the Souldiours to mourne, knowing that the towne should be yelded to the French king, and many a yong Gentleman, and many a tall yoman, wished that they had not spent their tyme there. And the next day after, the sayde Erle discharged sir Richard Fernyngham of his office of Capitaine, and commaunded euery man to be obedient to the Kinges pleasure, and to prepare to returne into England. The. viij. day of February, the Lord Chastileon came nere to the Citie of Courmay with. xij. hundreth men in harnesse. The Erle of Worcester sent sir Edward Belknap to knowe his commission, and there he shewed him his Commission, which was to receiue the Citie of Courmay. Then sir Edward Belknap desired him to send his commission to the Erle of Worcester, which he refused to do, sayng it was sufficient to shewe it: well sayde sir Edward Belknap you must vnderstand that we haue a commission from the king our Maister to deliuer you the Citie at a day appoynted: wherfore we must shew the king of England both your commissio that you had authority to receiue it fro the french king, & also that you by your indenture sealed with your seale of armes, shal cofesse y you receyued the Citie as a gift, & not rendered as a right to the king your Maister, or else be you sure that the Citie shall not be deliuered. Then the Lord Chastileon was wondrous wroth that he was no better belued: And so dayly were great messages sent to the Citie from him to the Erle of Worcester, and aunsweres were sent of the English part. But when the day approached, he had full aunswere that he must deliuer his commission, and also seale the indenture, or else the English men would not put him in possession of the towne, for their commission was otherwise. The French Capitaynes perceiuyng that if they disagreed at the day, that doubtēs might follow: wherfore they sent their commission, and sealed their indenture, and sent it likewise in the moynng, and came forward with their Banners displayed: wherof heeryng the Erle, he sent word that the Citie was neither yelded, nor gotten, but deliuered for confederation of maryage, and therefore they should not enter with Banners displayed. Then were the frenchmen angry, but there was no remedie but to rolle by theyr Standardes and Banners. And when they came to the Gates, there their commission and Indenture were solemnly read openly: and then the french men entered with Drumslades, and mynstrellie without any Banner: And then to Mounfire Chastileon was deliuered the Castell, and there he ordeyned watch and warde in euery part. Thus was the Citie of Courmay deliuered the. viij. day of February in the tenth yere of the reigne of the king, and many a tall yoman that lacked liuyng fell to robberyng, which would not labour after their returne.

Duryng

Duryng this tyme remayned in the French Court, Nicholas Carlew, fraunces Bryan, and dyuers other of the yong Gentlemen of England, and they with the french king roade dayly disguised throught Harps, throbwyng egges, stones, and other foolishe tryfles at the people, which light demeanour of a king was much discommended and gested at. And when these yong gentlemen came againe into England, they were all french, in eatyng, drinking, and apparell, yea and in french bices and bragges, so that all the estates of England were by them laughed at: the Ladies and gentlewomen were displeasid, so that nothing by them was praysed, but if it were after the french turne, which after turned them to displeasure as you shal all heere.

After the kinges Ambassadors were returned, and Courmay deliuered to the french men, vpon the condicions aforesayde, the hostages that were here left for the payment of the great sommes and perfoymance of the condicions comprised in the league (of the which one was, that if the mariage tooke none effect, then the Citie of Courmay should be redeliuered vpon repayment of the same somme) the sayd hostages knewe not in what case they stood, but when they knewe it, they were very heauy and sorowfull: howbeit they dissimuled the matter in the best wise they could.

In the end of March the king sent for all the yomen of the gard that were come from Courmay, and after many good wordes geuen to them, he graunted to them foure pence by the day without attendaunce, except they were specially commaunded: and yet for all this the commonaltie sayde that the king was euill counsayled to geue away the Citie of Courmay, because the maintainyng of a garrison there should haue nourished and brought by men and yonger bryethen in feates of warre to the great strength and defence of the Realme.

This yere the. xij. day of February died the Emperour Maximilian, for whom the king caused a solempne Obsequie to be done at Paules Church, all the Nobles of the realme, and knightes of the Carter beyng present, of which order the sayd Emperour was one.

The death of Maximilian
Emperour.

In the beginnyng of thys yere, the king with all the knightes of hys order beyng in Englande, roade on double hozles, with the Henryemen following the king, from Colbroke to Wyndsoze in gorgeous apparell, and there he kept with great solempnity the feast of Saint George, and dynd in the hall. And the Bishop of Winchester Prelate of the order sat at the hozdes ende alone. The king was solempnly serued, and the surnap cast lyke the feast of a coronation. All thinges were plenteous to straungers that resorted thether. At the Masse of Requiem was offered, the banner and other hachementes of honour belongyng to Maximilian the Emperour late deceased. After this feast ended, the king came to Richemond, and so to Grenewich, and there lay all May.

In which moneth the kinges Counsaile secretly comuned together of the kinges gentlenesse and liberalitie to all persons: by the which they perceyued that certaine yong men in his priuie Chamber, not regardyng hys estate nor degree, were so familiar and homely with him, and played suche light touches with him, that they forgat themselves: Which thinges although the king of his gent'e nature suffered, and not reprovoued it: yet the kinges Counsaile thought it not meete to be suffered for the kings honour, and ther-foze they altogether came to the king, besechyng him all these enormities and lightnesse to redresse. To whome the king answered, that he had chosen them of his Counsaile, both for the maintenaunce of his honour, and for the defence of all thing that might blemish the same: wherfoze if they sawe any about him misse themselves, he committed it to their reformation. Then the kinges Counsaile caused the Lord Chamberleyn to call befoze them Carew (and another who yet liueth, & therfoze shall not at this tyme be named) with diuers other also of the priuie Chamber, which had bene in the frenche Court, and banished them the Court for diuers considerations, layng nothing perticularly to their charges. And they that had offices were commaunded to go to their offices: which discharge out of the Court grieved soze the heartes of these pong men, which were called the kinges Minions. Then was there foure sad and auncient knightes, put into the kings priuie Chamber, whose names were sir Richard Wingfield, sir Richard Jernyngham, sir Richard Weston, and sir William Kingston: and diuers officers were chaunged in all places.

Then sir John Dechy was made deputie of Calice, and sir Richard Wingfield thereof discharged, and Nicholas Carew made Capitain of Riebanke, and commaunded to go thether, which was soze to him displeasaut. These pong minions which was thus seuered from the king, had bene in fraunce, and so highly praysed the french king and his Court, that in a maner they thought little of the king and his Court, in comparison of the other, they were so high in loue with the french Court, wherfoze their fall was little moned among wyse men.

This yere in the moneth of June was elected to be Emperour Charles King of Castell, and nephew to the Queene, by the whole assent of the electors of the Empryre: Although the french king sent his great Mayster to cause him to be elected to the high maiesty of the Empryre: yet his Ambassador and great mayster of hys household called Gonffier Lord of Bois, and brother to William Gonffier Lord Boneuet Admiral of fraunce, which was Ambassador in England the last yere as you haue heard, did not so his message that it tooke any effect. The king which had sent Doctor Pace his Secretary for the aduancement of his nephew the King of Castell to the dignitie Emperiall, because he had the Duchy of Strik, and many other seignories in Almaine, was very ioyous of this election, and caused a solempne Masse to be song at Paules the vij. day of July: at which Masse was present the Cardinall Campeius, the Cardinall of Porke, the Duke of Buckingham, of Porffolke, and Suffolke, with the Ambassadors of Spaine, fraunce, Venice, and Scotland. And after Masse was done, the Quere sang Te deum, and then all the Lordes departed to Baynards Castell to dinner, and that night were solempne fieres made through London, and great plentie of Wine geuen by Italians, Duchemen, and Spanyardes, for these newes.

This Sommer the Queene desired the king to bring to her Spanoz of Haucryng in the Bower of Essex, the Gentlemen of fraunce beyng hostages. And for their welcomynng she purueyed all thinges in the most libelallest maner: and especially she made to the kyng such a sumptuous banquet, that the king thanked her hartily, and the straungers gaue it great prayse.

The

The King liyng there did shote, hunte, and runne dayly with the hostages, to their great ioy.

In the Month of Nouember, the king came from Lambeth to Westminster hall, & so to the starre chamber, & there were befoze him the Lord Dgle, the Lord Haward, sir Mathew Browne, sir William Bulmer, & John Scot of Camerwell, for dyuers riottes, misdeameanozs and offences, and especially the king rebuked Sir Wylliam Bulmer knight, because he beyng the kyngs seruaunt swozne, refused the kings seruice, and became seruaunt to the Duke of Buckingham, sayng: that hee would none of hys seruauntes should hang on an other mans sleeue, and that he was as well able to maintaine him as the Duke of Buckingham, and that what might be thought by his departing, and what might be supposed by the Dukes retayning, he would not then declare. The knyght kneeled still on hys knees, cryng the king mercie, and neuer a noble man there durst entreate for him, the king was so highly displeasid with him. Yet at the last when other matters were heard, the king moued with pittie forgaue the saide syr Wylliam his offence, sayng, that we wil that none of our seruauntes shall belong to any other person, but to vs, nor we will not that our subiectes repine or grudge at such as we fauour, for our pleasure we wil haue in that case as vs lyketh, for one we will fauour now, and another at such time as vs shall like: and therfoze Sir Wylliam, if you serue vs hartily, you shall not be forgotten, and for this time we pardon you. Likewise he pardoned the lord Edmond Haward, and Syr Mathewe Browne their offences, which were indicted of ryottes, and maintenaunce of bearinges of diuers misdoers within the Countie of Surrey: but the Lord Dgle humbly beseched the king of hys mercie, to whome he answered. Sir your matter concerneth murther of our subiect, which great offence is not onely to vs but to God, and therfoze we remit you to the common lawe. And then he rose and went to his Barge, and by the way he made James Parfford Maior of the Citie of London knight, and so he with all his counsaile came to Lambeth.

The foure Gentlemen hostages of fraunce, dayly resorted to the court and had great cheere, and were well entertayned, and euery time they moued, stirred and required the king to passe the Sea, and to meete with the french king their maister, whome they praysed highly, affirming that if the king and he might once familiarly common together, that there should such a constaunt loue rise and encrease betweene them, which after ward should neuer faile. This request was oftentimes heard and little regarded, but yet by the meanes of the Cardinall at the last, in the ende of februarie it was agreed that the king in person should passe the sea to hys Castell and Lordship of Guisnes, and there in Maye next comming betweene Guisnes and Arde, the king and the french king should meete. When thys was fully concluded, the king wrote letters to all suche Lordes, Ladies, Gentlemen, and Gentlewomen as should geue their attendaunce on him and the Queene: which incontinent put themselves in a readynesse, after the most costliest fashion, for the furniture of the same meeting.

Then were sent to Guisnes vnder the rule of syr Edward Belknap thre thousand artificers, which buyded out of the carth on the playne befoze the Castell of Guisnes, the most goodlyest Palace of tymbre that euer was wrought in the same place, and so curiously garnished without and within. Beside thys, prouisions were made within the realme of Englande and in Flaunders for bittayle, wyne and all other thinges necessarie for the same. And yet beside all this Orleans king at armes in Fraunce came into the Court of Englande and made Proclamation, that the king of England and the French king, in a campe betwene Arde and Guyfnes, with .xxiiij. aydes in June next ensuyng, should abide all comers beyng gentlemen, at the Tyll, at Courney, and at barriers, and lyke proclamation was made by Clarenceur king at armes in England, and in the Court of Fraunce, and in the Court of Burgoyne, and in diuers other Courtes and places in Almaine, and Italye. For furnishing of the Justes, there was deuyd a Tyll, and all thinges necessarie for that enterpryse, in a goodly playne betweene Guyfnes and Arde.

Duryng the time of these preparations, newes were brought to the king that Charles his Nephewe elected Emperour of Almayne would depart out of Spaine by sea, and come by Englande to go into Germany to receyue hys first Crowne at Acon. Wherefore the king caused great prouisions to be made at euery Hauen, for the receyuing of hys welbeloued Nephewe and friend, and daylie prouisions were made on all sides for these noble meetings of so high princes: and especially the Queene of Englande, and the Lady Dowagar of Fraunce, made great cost on the apparell of their Ladies and Gentlewomen.

In this yere the king being informed that his realme of Ireland was out of order, discharged the Erle of Kildare of his office of Deputy and therunto (by the meanes of the Cardinall as men thought) was appointed the Erle of Surrey Lorde Admirall, to whom the Cardinall did not owe the best fauour. Wherefore the sayde Erle of Surrey in the beginning of Aprill tooke leaue of the king, and the Duke of Norfolk his father, and passed into Irelande, and had with him diuers Gentlemen, that had bene in the garrison of Courney, and one hundred yomen of the Kinges gard, and other to the number of a thousand men. Where he by his manhood and wisdom, brought the Erle of Desmond and diuers other rebelles to good conformitie and order: and there he continued in great hardnesse two yere and more, in which space he had many battailes and skirmishes with the wilde Irish.

When it was concluded that the Kinges of England and Fraunce should mete, as you haue heard, then both the Kinges committed the order and maner of their meting, and how many dayes they should mete, and what preheminnence eche should geue to other, to the Cardinall of Yorke.

The king intending and persevering in purpose to mete with Fraunces the French king, great and rich prouisions were made, wherefore the noble King and the Queene wyth all the noble Courte, remoued the .xxi. daye of May being on Mondaye, from their Manor of Grenethich, toward the Sea side, and so on Fridaye being the .xxv. daye of May, arrived at the Citie of Cauntorbury intending there to kepe his Whitsontyde.

Some after his comming to Cauntorburie, tidings were brought that Charles Emperour elect, was on the Sea, in sight of the coast of Englande, wherefore officers of the king were sent with great diligence to the Castell and Towne of Douer, to be there in a readinesse against the arrivall of the Empe-

Emperour.

The Lorde Cardinall, came to the towne of Douer in haste with a noble repaire, abiding the comming of the Emperour, which Emperour, the Saterday being the .xxvi. daye of May arrived with all his navy of ships royall on the coaste of Kent, direct to the towne or port of Hyeth the sayde daye by noone, where he was hailed by the noble knight sir William Fitzwilliam, vice Admirall of Englande, with six of the Kinges shippes well furnished, which laye for the safegarde of passage betwene Douer and Calice, at the coste and charges of the king of England: Calmesse of the wether and lacke of winde caused that the Emperour might not so sone take land at the port of Douer, as he would haue done. Notwithstanding towardes the euen he departed from his shippes, and entered into his boate comming towardes the lande, where in his comming to land: on the sea the Lorde Wolsey Cardinall and Legate met and receaved him with suche reuerence as to so noble a Prince appertayned. Thus landed the Emperour Charles, vnder the cloth of hys estate of the blacke Eagle all splayed on riche cloth of Golde. In his retinue with him, were manye noble men, and manye fayre Ladies of his blood, as princes and Princesses, and one Lady as chiefe to be noted, was the princes of Auinion with many other Nobles which landed with him in high & sumptuous maner and great riches in their apparell: great ioye made the people of Englande to see the Emperour, and more to see the bening maner and mekenesse of so high a Prince.

When the Emperour had thus taken lande, the Lorde Cardinall was as conduyt to the same noble Emperour from the Shore of Douer vnto the Castell there: then were all persones chered with the best that there in the towne might be.

After the departing of the Emperour to the lande from his Hauie, the apparell of euery ship then shewed, as flagges, Banners, Streamers, and Targetes, then the mightie ordynance of euery of them brake out by force of fier as though the sea had bent, marueilous was the noise of the gones.

The Emperour being thus in the Castell of Douer, with hastie tidings came to the king where as he was at Cauntorbury, who hasted him towardes the noble Emperour. And so came ridyng early in the morning to the Castell of Douer, within which Castell the king alighted: the Emperour heying the king to be come, came out of his chamber to meete with the king, and so met with him on the staires or he could come by: where eche embraced other right lovingly: then the king brought the Emperour to his chamber, where as there comming was of gladnesse.

Some after these two noble Princes on the Whitsondaye early in the morning tooke their horse and roade to the Citie of Cauntorburie, the more to solempne the feast of Pentecost, but specially to se the Queene of England his Aunt was the intent of the Emperour.

The noble personages of the realme of England and the Queene with her beautifull trayne of Ladies receyued and welcommed the same Charles elect Emperour, whose person was by the king conueighed to a faire and pleasaunt chamber where the sayde Emperour appareled him right richly. Then the noble retinue of the sayd Emperour as well of Lordes as of Ladies were lodged, aswell as there might be, with ioy and much gladnesse, & there in Cauntorburie sojourned the Emperoz and all his trayne with the king, vntill the Thursday in the same weeke.

The last daye of May being Thursday, the Emperoz tooke leaue of the king and all the Ladies, and gaue great thankes, and so roade to Sandwich, and there tooke his shippes, the winde to him was liking, & hereby he sailed into Flaunders.

Then the same day, the king of England made saile from the port of Douer and with a goodly nauie landed at Calice at the houre of a. xi. of the clock and with him the Queene and Ladies and many Nobles of the realme. And so was the king receyued into the Checker and there rested: great repaize of noble men came to the towne of Calice from the French Court, to see the king and to salute him, which were of his grace, princely entertayned.

Mondaye the fourth daye of June the kinges grace with all the nobles and the Queene with her traine of Ladies as other, remoued from Calice to his Lordship royall of Guisnes, which was so Noble and royall a lodging as befoze had not bene seene, for it was a Palace: the Palace was quadrant, and euerye quadrant of the same Palace was three hundred xxiiij. foote long of a syde, which was in compasse. xiiij. hundred, and xij. foote about. This Palace was set on stages by great cunnynge and sumptuous worke. At the entryng into the Palace befoze the Gate, on the plaine greene was buylded a fountaine of enbowed worke, gylte with fyne golde, and vice, engrayled wyth anticke workes, the olde God of Wyne called Baccus birlyng the wyne, which by the conduytes in the earth ranne to all people plentifully with red, white, and claret wyne, ouer whose head was wrytten in letters of Romaine in golde, Faicte bonne chere quy vouldra.

On the other hande or syde of the gate, was set a piller, which was of auncient Romaine worke, borne with foure Lyons of Golde, the pillers wrapped in wreath of Golde curiously wrought and intrayled, and on the sommet of the sayd Piller stood an Image of the blind God Cupide, with his Bowe and arrowes of loue readie by his seemyng, to stryke the yong people to loue.

The foregate of the same palace or place with great and mighty masonrye by sight was arched, with a Tower on euery syde of the same portered by great craft, and inbattelled was the gate and Tower, and in the fenestres, and windowes were Images resembling men of warre redie to cast great stones: Also the same gate or Tower was set with compassed Images of auncient Princes, as Hercules, Alexander and other by entrayled worke, richly limned with golde and Albyn colours, and well and warely was made ouer the gate loupes, and enforced with battailmentes, and in the same gate a lodge for the Porter: which there appered and other, sumptuously apparayled lyke vnto kinges officers.

By the same gate all people passed into a large Court sayze and beautifull, for in this Court appered much of the outward beautie of this palace, for from the first water table to the rayfynge or resun pierces, was bay wyndowes on euery syde mixed with cleere Stozpes, curiously glased, the postes or monyelles of euery wyndow was gilt. Thus the outward part of the place delighted the eyes of the beholders, by reason of the sumptuous worke. Also the Tower of the Gate as seemed, was builded by great masonrye, and by great engyne of mans wit, for the sundrie countenances of euery Image that their appered, some shootyng, some castyng, some readie to strike, and firing of Sunnes, which shewed very honourably. Also all the sayd quadrants bayes, and edifices, were royally entrayled, as farre as vnto the same Court appertayned. And direct agaynst the Gate was deuised a halpas, and at the entry of the sayze was Images of soze and terrible countenances, all armed in curious worke of Argentine. The bay of the same halpas pendant by craft of trimmer, & vnder the trimmer, anticke Images of gold enuyroned with berdour of Dylfes cast in compasse, moustring their countenances towards the entryng of the palace. The sayze of the sayd halpas was cast of passage by six. wentes of broade steppes, so that from the first foote or lowest step, a person myght without payne go vnto the highest place of the same halpas.

On euery hande was there Chamber doozes and enterynge into the Chambers of the same Palace, which were long and large and well proportioned, to receyue light and ayze at pleasure: the roofes of them from place to place, and Chamber to Chamber were filed and couered with cloth of Silke, of the most sayze and quick inuention that befoze that tyme was seene, for the ground was white engrayled, inbowed and batoned with riche clothes of Silkes knitte, and fret with cuttes and braides and sundrie newe castes, that the same clothes of silke shewed like bullions of fyne burned Golde, and the Roses in lofferages: that the same rooffe, was in kindly course, furnished so to mannes sight, that no liuyng creature might but ioy, in the beholdyng thereof, for from the iawe pierce of the sayde silyng: which pierce was gylte with fyne golde, were workes in paan paled, all the walles to the creast encounteryng the clere stozpes, the same creast which was of large depenelle, the worke was antique knottes with bosses cast & wrought with moze cunnynge then I can wyte, all which workes and ouerages were gylte: and to set it the moze to the glozy, the flourishyng Wise was comparable to the rich Amell.

Also to the same Palace was reered a Chapell with two closettes, the Quiere of the sayd Chapell filed with cloth of Golde, and thereon frette engrayled bent clothes of Silke, all was then Silke and golde. The aulters of this Chapell were hanged with rich reuesture of cloth of golde of Tissue, embzoudered with pearles.ouer the high aultar was hanged a riche Canaby of maruaylous greatnesse, the aultar was apparayled with fyne payze of Candlestickes of golde, and on the aultar an halpas, and thereon stood the Sacrament all of fyne golde, and on the same halpas stood. xiiij. Images of the bignesse of a childe of foure yeres of age all golde: And all the Copes and Vestmentes so riche as might be prepared or bought in the Citie of Flozens, for all the Copes and Vestmentes were but of one peere, so wouen for the purpose, cloth of Tissue and poudered with red Roses purled with fine gold: the Orfrys set with pearles and pzeious stones. And all the walles and deskes of this Chapell were hanged with right cloth of golde, and three rich great Crosses were there readie to be borne at festiuall tymes, and Basyns, and Senses, Gospellers, Pares, Crewets, holy water vessels, and other ornamentes all of golde.

Also in the first Closet was a trauese for the kinges person of cloth of Golde: And within that the kinges place and Chaire, with Cushins of cloth of Golde: befoze the trauesse was an altare of presence, which altare was adourned with cloth of bzouderie and riche Pearles and precious stones, set in Goldsmithes worke of fine Golde. On the aultar was a deske or halspace, whereon stood a Crucifix of fine Golde, with an Image of the Trinitie, an Image of our Lady, and twelue other Images all of fine Gold and precious stones, two payze of Candelstickes of fine Gold, with Balsens, Crewettes, Dares, and other Ornamentes: the sayde Closet was hanged wyth Tappets embzandered with riche worke, fret with pearles & stones, the rooffe of the same Closet was steled with worke of Inmouled, guilt with fine Golde and Senapar and Vice.

The second Closet was for the Quenes person, the which was as well trimmed and beuotified as the other Closet was.

And from this palace or place into the mightie and strong fortreffe and Castell royall of Guisnes, was a Galerie for the secret passage of the kings person into a secret lodging within the same castell, the moze for the kings ease. And finally to this palace was ioyned all houses of offices, that to such an honorable court should appertaine. In this palace as ye haue heard, was the kings grace lodged and all the nobles after their degrees. And for that the towne of Guisnes was little, and that all the noble men might not there be lodged, they set bp tentes in the field, to the number of twentie and eyght hundred sundrie lodgings, which was a goodly sight. Thus was the king in his Palace royall at Guisnes.

Fraunces the French king was with all his Nobles of the realme of Fraunce, come to the towne of Arde, where was prepared for his coming, many tentes, haies and pavilions, & the same were set and pight in the field. On the French partie also, there was at the same towne of Arde buyded the French kings lodging full well, but not finished, much was the prouisions in Picardie on euerye part through all. The French king commaunded his lodging to be made, a little out of the towne of Arde in the territorie of an olde castle, which by the warre of olde time had bene beaten. On the same place was reedified a house of solace and sport, of large & mightie compasse, which was chiefly sustayned by a great mightie masse, whereby the great ropes and takell strayned, the same mast was stayd. All the rooffe of the same house hong on the same masse, and with takell was strayned and borne, by the supporters of the same masse or tree, the colours of the same was all blew, set with starres of Golde foyle, and the Orbes of the heauens by the craft of colours in the rooffe, were curiously wrought in maner like the skie, or firmament, and a cressant strayned sumdeale towards the towne of Arde, this cressant was couered with frets and knottes made of Iuie Bushes, and bore braunches and other things that longest would be greene for pleasur.

In thys time Lorde Thomas Wolsey Cardinall and Legate a Latere as the kings high Ambassadour rode with noble repaire of Lordes, Gentlemen and Prelates to the towne of Arde, to the French court where of the French king, the same Lorde Cardinal was highly entertayned. Of the noblenesse of this Cardinal, the Frenchmen made bokes, shewing the tryumphant doings of the Cardinals royalty. The number (as they write) of the Gentlemen, knightes and Lordes, all in crimson Vcluet, with the marueylous number of chaines of Golde, the great horse, Mules, coursers, and carriages, ges, that there were, which went befoze the Cardinals coming into Arde with sumpters & Cofers. Of his great crosse and pillers borne, the Willow here or case bzoudered, the two Mantels, with other the Ceremoniall offices, with a great and honorable number of bishops geuing their attendance, the mightie and great number of seruauntes, as yomen, gromes, all clothed in Scarlet, who so readeth of the French booke, shall finde the same wonderfully set foorth.

The king of England beyng at the Castell of Guisnes in the newe palace, many noble men of the French court resorted to his grace, to see hym and the Queene, and to salute them: who of the king were wel enterteyned

When the Lorde Cardinall had sojourned at Arde in the French court by the space of two dayes, and the high and bzigent princely causes in counsaile declared, the Lorde Cardinall tooke his leaue of the French king, and of all the French court, and repaired vnto the Castell of Guisnes, where he founde the king of Englande his souereigne Lorde. And the same king by his letters patents, had geuen full power and aucthoritie to the same Lorde Cardinall, concerning all matters to be debated, touchyng the king and the realme, and also gaue vnto the same Cardinall, full strength, power, and aucthoritie, to affirme and confirme, binde and vnbinde, whatsoeuer should be in question, betweene hym and the French king, as though the king in proper person had bene there presently.

When the Lordes of the French counsaile, sawe the high and great aucthoritie that the Cardinall had, they shewed it vnto the French king, who incontinent commaunded his commission to be made, of lyke power and aucthoritie, that the king of Englande had geuen vnto the sayde Lorde Cardinall: the same power and aucthoritie had the sayd Cardinall, geuen to him by Fraunces the French king, and affirmed by the counsaile royall of Fraunce. Then hastily was sent to the king of Englande the French kings patent, for the Lorde Cardinall sayd humbly to the French king, that he would no such power receyue, without the consent of the king of Englande his souereigne Lord: but when the king of England and his counsaile had sene and beved the French kings patent, and it well considered, then he sent the same patent of power to the Lorde Cardinall with full assent: then the Lorde Cardinall the power receyued with much gladnesse. It was highly esteemed and taken for great loue that the French king had geuen so great power to the king of Englandes subiect.

Thursday the seuenth day of June, in the Vale of Andren, within the Lordship royall of Guisnes, befoze daye, was set and pight a royall riche Tent, all of cloth of Golde, and riche embzouderie of the king of Englands, and dyuers other haies and pavilions: the same riche Tent of Golde, was within hanged of the richest Arras, newly contriued and made, that euer befoze was seene, and a presence of the kings estate, with two Chayzes and riche Cushyns therein: the ground was spred with Carpets of new Turkey making all full of beuotie.

At the houre of meeting appoynted, the Lordes of Englande set their people and seruauntes in good array of battayle, in a playne field directly befoze the Castell of Guisnes. The king of Englande commaunded that hys Garde should be set in the best of the battayle, or bend of footemen and so it was was done. This battaile of footemen conducted themselues so in order, that from the first to the last, neuer a person of the footemen brake his place or aray, but kept themselues so well, that neuer seruingmen themselues better demeaned. The seruingmen thus set in order in the field, on the left hand of the king of England, somewhat toward y<sup>e</sup> Marres, long while thus abiding, in which time the castel of Guisnes shot a warning peece to y<sup>e</sup> towne of Arde, and in lyke wise the towne of Arde gaue warning to the castell of Gypsnes.

The meeting
and encounter of the king of England and the French king.

And forthwith the king of Englande with all the court of the nobles of the realme mounted on horseback, and marched towardes the Waley of Andern in honorable order, all gentle men, Squiers, knightes, and Barons, roade before the king and Bishops also, the Dukes, Marques and Erles, gaue attendaunce next the king.

The french king on his partie marched towarde the encounter wyth all the rufflers and gallantes of the french Court. In which time came to the french king some report, that caused him to tarry, and a light from his horse, then the french men were very doubtfull, and in a staye so still rested, untill a Lorde of fraunce called Mounfire Mozret, the sayde Mozret came to the french king, and shewed him the verie fidelitie of the king of Englande, wherby the french king mounted on horseback, and the better encouraged, marched towards the place appoynted of encounter.

Thus in marchyng the one king to the other, to the king of England came Lorde George Newell Lorde Aburgheny, and openly sayde, sir ye be my king and souereigne, wherfore aboue all I am bounden to shewe you truth, and not to let for none, I haue bene in the french partie, and they be mo in number, double so many, as ye be: with that was y<sup>e</sup> Erle of Shrewsburie Lorde Steward readie and sayde, sy<sup>r</sup> whatsoeuer my Lorde of Burgheny sayth, I my selfe haue bene there, and the frenchmen be moze in feare of you and your subiects, then your subiects be of them: wherfore sayde the Erle, if I were worthis to geue counsaile, your grace should marche forward, so we intende my Lorde sayde the king: then the officers of armes cryed on afore, then in thort whyle was the king on the banke of Anderne: then euery gentleman as they roade tooke his place, and stode still side by side, they<sup>r</sup> regarde or face towardes the Wale of Andern.

Then the king of England shewed himself somedeale forward in bewty & personage, the most goodliest prince y<sup>e</sup> ever reigned ouer the realme of England: his grace was appareled in a garment of cloth of siluer of Damaske, ribbed with cloth of Golde, so thicke as might be, the garment was large, and plited verie thick, and canteled of berye good intaile, of suche shape and making, y<sup>e</sup> it was marueilous to behold. The courser which his grace roade vpon, was trapped in a marueilous besture of a new deuised fassion, the trapper was of fine Golde in Bullion, curiously wrought, pounced and set with antique worke of Romaine figures. Attending on the kings grace of Englande, was the maister of his horse, by name sy<sup>r</sup> Henry Gylford, leading the kings spare horse, the which horse was trapped in a Mantellet byont and back piace, all of fine Golde in Scifers, of deuise with tasselles on cordels pendaunt, the Saddell was of the same sute and worke, so was the Hedstall and raynes. After folowed .ix. hennemen, ryding on Coursers of Naples the same yong Gentlemen were appareled in riche cloth of Tissue, the coursers

in harnesse of maruaylous fassion, scaled in fine Golde in Bullion, and all the same horse harnesse were set full of trembling spangles that were large and faire. The Lorde Marques Dorset bare the kings sworde of estate before the kings grace, the Lorde Cardinall did his attendaunce.

Thus in little time, abidyng the comyng of the french king and his, the which in thort time came with a great number of horsemen, freshly appareled, the french king and his retaine, put themselues in place appoynted, direct against the Englishe partie, beholding euery other of both nations, the french men mised muche of the battaile of the footemen, and euerye of the french men to other spake of the multitude of the Englishe men which seemed great, yet were not they so many as the french partie.

When the french king had a little beholden the Englishe men, he put himselfe somewhat before his people, that were there on him attendaunt, the Duke of Burbon bearing a naked sworde byright, the Lorde Admirall of fraunce, & the Countie Cosmen Galias, Maister of the french kings horse, and no mo persons gaue their attendaunce in passing with the french king: when it was percepued that the french kings sworde was bozne naked, then the king of England commaunded the Lorde Marques Dorset to draw out the sword of estate, and beare it by naked in the presence, which was so done.

Then by blew the Trumpets, Sagbuttes, Clarions, and all other Minstrels on both sides, and the kinges disceded downe towarde the botome of the baley of Andern, in sight of both the nations and on horseback, met and embraced the two kings eche other: then the two kinges alighted, and after embraced with benyng and curteous maner eche to other, with sweete and goodly wordes of greeting: and after fewe wordes, these two noble kinges went together into a riche Tent of cloth of Golde, that there was set on the grounde for such purpose: thus arme in arme went the french king fraunces the first of fraunce, and Henry the eyght king of England and of fraunce, together passyng with communication.

When these two princes were in the Tent before rehearsed, the french king sayde, my deare brother and Cosyn, thus farre to my paine haue I trauallyed to see you personally, I thinke verily that you esteeme me as I am. And that I maye to you be your ayde, the realmes and seignories shewe the might of my person: Sir said the king of England, neither your realmes nor other the places of your power, is the matter of my regard, but the steadfastnesse and loyall keeping of promise, comprised in Charters betwene you and me: that obserued and kept, I neuer sawe Prince with my eye, that might of my hart be moze loued. And for your loue I haue passed the seas, into the fardest frontier of my realme to see you presently, the which doing now gladdeth mee. And then were the two kings serued with a banquet, and after mirth, had communication in the banquet time, and there shewed the one the other their pleasure.

After the two kings had ended the banquet, they came forth in open sight and there departed with their companie, the king of Englande to Gypsnes, the french king to Arde. And sundrie dayes were kept sundrie and royall Justes and other pastimes: the perticulers wherof I omit because mention is before made of sundrie of them.

Mondaye the .xi. daye of June, the two Queenes of England and of fraunce

The meeting
of both the Queenes of England
and Fraunce.

Fraunce came to the Campe, where eyther saluted other right honorably, and went into a stage for them prepared, right curiously hanged, and specially there was for the Queene of England, a Capet ail of pearle called Hugues Dike, which was much looked at for the costynesse of the same.

Giftes given by the french king and the king of Eng-
lande.

And after sundry meetings of the sayde two kinges many daies, and sundry great feastes and banquets, that the one king had made to the other. They in the ende gaue vnto eche other sundry rich and costly giftes and Jewels, as first. The king of England gaue to the french king a Colloz of Jewels of precious stones, called Balastes, the Sanker, furnished with great Diamantes and Perles. The french king gaue to the king of England a Bracelet of precious stones, riche Jewels and fayre, and so departed the sayde two noble kinges, the sayde .xxiiiij. daye of June, which was Sunday and Midsummerday.

During thys triumph so muche people of Picardie and West Flaunders drew to Guyynes to se the king of Englande and his honor, to whome vittailles of the court were in plentie, the Condette by the gate ranne wyne alwayes, there were Wagaboundes, Blowmen, Laborers and of the Bragarie, Wagoners and Beggars that for drunkennesse lay in routes & heays, so great resort thither came, that both knights and Ladies that were come to see the noblenesse, were fayne to lye in haye and strawe, and helde them thereof highly pleased. From the court of the Emperour, nor of the Lady Margaretes court, nor of Flaunders, Brabant, nor Burgoyne, came neuer a person to answer to the chalenge: By that it seemed that there was small loue betwene the Emperour and the french king: Moreover Mounseir Fayot Capitaine of Bullein with Mounseir Chateillon did their deuoir to haue taken the towne of saint Omer, of which doing was thought no goodnesse to the Emperour.

The meeting
concluded to be had in England be-twene the Emperour
and King Henry.

Monday the .xxv. daye of June, the king of Englande and the Queene and all the courte removed from Guyynes to the towne of Calice and there made the king his abode, where was concluded the meetyng of the Emperour with the king, wherefore was made newe and great prouisions.

In the tyme of the triumph there was a muttering that the towne of Calice should be rendered into the french kings hands, & for truth the frenchmen so spake and sayde, wherewith many Englishmen were grieved.

King Henry
discharged a great part of his traine.

While the king laye thus in Calice he considered the charge of his nobles, and thought that lesse number of seruautes would now serue them for the tyme of his abode, and so caused the Cardinall to call al the Gentlemen before him which in the kinges name gaue to them thankes with much commendations, and for eschewyng of cost, because the king taried but the Emperours comming, he licensed them to sende home the halfe number of their seruautes and bade them after their long charges to liue waresly, this terme waresly was amongst the most parte taken for barely, at which sayng the Gentlemen sore disdayned.

The King
retheth to Graueling
to visite the Emperour.

Thus in Calice rested the king and the Queene vntill the tenth daye of July. Then the kinges grace with goodly repaire roade to the towne of Graueling in Flaunders there that night to rest and see the Emperour, on the king were waighting the Lozde Cardinall, Dukes, Marquises, Erles, Bishops, Barons, knights, and Gentlemen. The noble Emperour passed the

the water of Graueling, and at a place called Waell, there he met and receyued the king of England, the Emperour made such semblant of loue to all the court of Englande that he wan the loue of the Englishmen, and so passed the Emperour and the king of England to Graueling, where the king lodged the best that might be, all Lozdes, Gentlemen, yemen and all sortes of Englishmen from the highest to the lowest were so chered and feasted, with so louing manner that much they praysed the Emperours court. In Graueling was the Emperours Aunt Margaret, she welcomed the king and other noble men of the realme.

When the french king and his Lozdes had knowledge of the meetings of the Emperour and the king of Englande in the towne of Graueling, they were therewith greatly grieved, as by many thinges appered, for after the Englishmen were in fraunce disdayned, and in their suites there greatly deferred and had litle right and much lesse fauor, so from day to day still more and more began hart brenning, and in conclusion open warre did arise betwene the two realmes.

Wednesday the .xi. day of July, the Emperour and the Lady Margaret came with the king of England to the towne of Calice, the Emperour and the Lady Margaret were lodged in Staple hall, and all Gentlemen and other lodged in other places right wel prepared of all necessaries for their coming: and for solas was builded a banquetting house .lxxx. foote round, after a goodly deuise, builded vpon Mastes of shippes in such maner as I thinke was neuer seene, for in it was the whole sere portrayed, which by reason of the great wind that blew, could not be achieved, the same day at night were sundry riche Maskes and goodly shewes both of noble men and of Ladies.

The Empe-
rour cometh
to Calice.

Thursday the .xij. day of July, because the banquet house could not be finished, the Emperour and the Lady Margaret supped with the king and the Queene at the Checker, where the same night after Supper reuelled lxxxviij. Maskes: after the reuels was a banquet: After which banquet the king brought the Emperour and the Lady Margaret to the Staple, and after withdrew him.

Friday the .xiii. day of July, the Emperour did intende to haue departed from Calice, but the counsaile was such that he departed not that night. The charters before time concluded, there were redde, and to the Emperour decia- red all the whole articles of high peace and league tripartite, to which the french king had assented and fully contented, and for the more exemplificati- on of the same, he sent the Lozde de Roche with letters of credence to signifie to the Emperours Maiesty that to the same articles he the french kyng promised in the worde of a king as Prince faythfull, to obserue and kepe for him and his realme and Subiectes. Thus by the Lozde de Roche in the Emperours presence and before the king of England in the name of his maister, they shewed the french kinges will in the towne of Calice with many high and vrgent causes concerning the Princes, whereby the Emperour went not out of Calice that night, by which aboad the Emperours Seruautes were much in doubt of the Emperours person.

Saterday the .xiiii. day of July, about noone the Emperour toke leaue of the Queene of England his Aunte and of her traine of Ladyes, the king with all his nobles conducted the Emperour on his way to a billage towards flaunders called Waell, where the Emperour embraced the king, and him betooke to almightie God, and the king gaue to him a Courser of Naples richely apparayled.

The returne of the King into Eng- lande.

The king tooke leaue of the Duchesse of Sauoy great aunt to the Emperour, and of all Nobles of the Emperours Court, and so departed, smal tyme in Calice the king abode, but in goodly hast shipped, & with the Queene and all other Nobles in safetie tooke lande. And after passed the tyme of Sommer with huntynge and other spoyses honourably, and made no great leastes this yere.

This yere the king kept his Christmasse at his Manor of Grenewich with much noblenesse and open Court. And the .x. day of February in hys awne person Justed to all commers, and the .xij. day his grace and the Erle of Deuonshire with foure aydes answered at the Tournay all commers which were .xvi. persons, noble and riche was their apparell, but in feates of armes the king excelled the rest.

The Duke of Buckyngham accused.

In this tyme was Edward Duke of Buckyngham accused to the king of high treason, wherefore the kinges grace by the aduyce of his counsaile, sent and directed his letters to the said Duke, being at his Manor of Chornbury in the Countie of Gloucester, that incontinent he shoulde come to hys presence all excuses layde asyde. Also the king gaue commaundement to sir William Compton, sir Richard Weston, and sir William Kingston knyghts for the kinges bodie, to take with them secret power and also Sergeaunts at armes, and that they should wisely take hede that while the Duke receiued the kinges letters, he should not conuey himself, which they wisely accomplisshed.

The sayde Duke vpon the sight of the kinges letters remoued, and so iourneyed till he came to Windsoze, and there offered at Saint George, and alwayes not farre from him abowtyng his demeanour, were the same knyghts liyng. The Duke lodged in Windsoze for that night, and as it was well proued, he mercuaylously feared, insomuch that he called vnto him a seruaunt of the kinges named Thomas Warde, the same Thomas Warde was gentleman Harbenger for the king, and demaunded of him what he made there, who answered sayng, that there lay his office, there the Duke perceyued that he could not escape. And so much was he in spirite troubled, that as he was at breakfast, his meate would not do bene, yet he made good countenance, and shortly tooke his horse, and so road til he came to Tothill besides Westminster where he tooke his Barge: befoze this time was the Dukes Chaunceloz taken and as a prisoner kept in the Tower, which had confessed matter of high treason concernyng the kinges person.

When the Duke was in his Barge, he commaunded to land at my Lord Cardinales bridge, where he landed with foure or fiue of his seruaunts, desirynge to see the same Lord Cardinall, but he was answered howe the same Lord was diseased, well sayd the Duke, yet will I drinke of my Lordes wine or I passe, then a Gentleman of my Lords brought the Duke with much reuerence into the Seller, where the Duke dranke.

When he saw & perceyued no there to him was made, he chaunged colour and so departed to his Barge, sayng to his seruaunts, I maruaile where my Chaunceloz is, that he cometh not to me, not knowyng that he was in prison.

The Duke thus in his Barge commyng towarde London, sir Henry Marney

Marney

Marney Capitaine of the Kinges Garde, on him attendyng an hundred yomen of the kinges garde in a Barge on the ryuer of Thames met the same Duke, and without abode boarded the Dukes Barge, and him in the kings name attached. And then from him were put his seruautes, and the Duke was brought to the Hay wharfe, and there landed, the Dukes seruautes were commaunded to go to the Manor of the Rose in Saint Laurence Pountnay, and there to abide till the Kinges pleasure were further knowen.

The Duke of Buckyngham attached or rai- son, and brought to the Tower.

Sir Henry Marney brought the Duke through Thames streete to the Tower of London, the people much mused what the cause might be, and toz troth till it was knowen, among them was much speakyng. There was also attached a Monk of a Charterhouse besydes Bristow called Penton, also Mayster John Delaker the Dukes Contessor, and the Dukes Chaunceloz befoze mentioned, all were in the Tower prisoners. The .xvi. day of April was the same Duke brought to the Tower. Alas the while that euer ambition should be the losse of so noble a man, and so much in the kings fauour, by him all the Lordes and other may beware how they geue credence to false propheties or false hypocrites. For a Monk of the Charterhouse shewed the duke that he should be king of England, which to y kings perion could be no higher treason. Alas that euer he gaue credence to such a false Traymour.

In this tyme inquieres were made in dyners shires of Edward Duke of Buckyngham beyng prisoner in the Tower of London, where by the knyghtes and Gentlemen, there he was endited of high treason for certaine wordes spoken by the same Duke in Blechyngly to the Lorde Aburgany, and the same Lorde was attached for consailment, and so was the Lorde Mountague the Kinges Cosyn, and both ledde to the Tower. And sir Edward Peuell knight, brother to the sayde Lorde Aburganey forbydden the Kinges presence.

The Duke of Norffolke was made by the kinges letters patentes high Steward of England, to accomplish the high cause of appele of the Pieres of the realme, and to decerne and iudge the causes of the Pieres. &c.

Wherefore shortly after was made in Westminster hall a Scaffolde for the Lordes, and a presence for a Judge, rayled, and counter rayled about, and barred with degrees. The Duke of Norffolke was chiefe Judge, and many Pieres of the realme, as the Duke of Suffolke, the Marques Dorcet, the Erles of Worcester, Deuonshire, Essex, Shrewsbury, Kent, Orforde, and Darby, the Lorde of Saint Johns, Lord Delaware, Lord Fitzwarren, Lord Willoughby, Lord Broke, Lord Cobham, Lord Harbert, and the Lord Morley, sat as Pieres and Judges vpon the same Duke of Buckyngham.

The arraignment of the Duke of Buckyngham.

When the Lordes had taken their places, sir Thomas Louell, and sir Richard Chomley knyghtes, brought the Duke to the barre with the Aye of the Tower befoze him, who humbly bare heddred reuerenced the Duke of Norffolke, and after all the Lordes and the kinges learned Counsaile. Then the Clerke of the counsaile sayde, sir Edward Duke of Buckyngham, holde by thy hande, thou art indited of high treason, for that thou trayterously hast conspired and imagined as farre as in thee lay to shorten the life of our soueraigne Lorde the king: of this treason how wilt thou acquite thee, the Duke answered by my Pieres.

And when the enditement was openly reade, the Duke sayd it is false

and untrue, and conspired and forged, to bring me to my death, and that will I prove, alleagynge many reasons to falsitie the inditement, and agaynst hye reasons the Kinges Atturney alleged the examinations, confessions, and proofes of witness.

The Duke desired the witnesses to be brought forth, then was brought before him sir Gilbert Perke priest his Chaunceloz, first accuser of the same Duke, Maister John Delacourt priest, the Dukes confessor, and his awne hande writyng layde before him to the accusement of the Duke. Charles Knivet Esquier, Colyn to the Duke, and a Monke, Prior of the Charterhouse besydes Bath, which like a false ypocrite had enduced the Duke to the treason, and had dyuers tymes sayde to the Duke, that he should be king of England, but the Duke sayd, that in himselfe he never consented to it. Divers presumptions and accusements were layde to him by Charles Knivet, which he would faine have couered. The depositions were read, and the deponents were deliuered as prisoners to the officers of the Tower.

Then spake the Duke of Norffolke, and sayde my Lord, the King our soveraigne Lorde hath commaunded that you shall have his lawes ministered with favour and right to you: wherefore if you have any other thing to say for your selfe, you shall be heard. Then he was commaunded to withdrawe him, and so was led into Paradise a house so named. The Lordes went to counsaile a great while and after tooke theyr places. Then sayde the Duke of Norffolke to the Duke of Suffolke, what say you of Sir Edward Duke of Buckyngham touchyng the high treasons that he hath bene arraigned of? the Duke of Suffolke answered, he is gyltye, and so sayde the Marques, and all the other Erles and Lordes: Thus was this Prince Duke of Buckyngham found giltye of highe treason by a Duke, a Marques, seven Erles, and. xij. Barons.

The Duke was brought to the barre soze chafyng and sweet mercyfoully, after he had made his reverence, he paused a while. The Duke of Norffolke as a Judge sayde, sir Edward, you have heard howe you be indicted of high treason, you pleaded thereto not giltye, puttyng your selfe to the Pieres of the realme, the which have found you giltye: then the Duke of Norffolke wept and sayde, you shall be led to the Kinges prison and there layd on a Hardell, and so drawen to the place of execution, and there to be hanged, cut downe alive, your members to be cut off & cast into the fyre, your bewels brent before you, your head smitten off, and your body quartered and divided at the Kinges will, and God have mercy on your soule. Amen.

The Duke of Buckyngham sayde, my Lorde of Norffolke, you have sayd as a traytor should be sayd unto, but I was never none, but my Lordes I nothing maligne for that you have done to me, but the eternall God forgene you my death and I do: I will never sue to the king for lyfe, howbeit he is a gracious Prince, and more grace may come from him then I desire. I desire you my Lordes and all my felowes to pray for me.

Then was the edge of the Axe turned towardes him, and so led into a Barge, sir Thomas Louell desired him to sit on the Cushyns and Carpet ordayned for him, he sayde nay, for when I went to Westminster, I was Duke of Buckyngham, now I am but Edward Bowden the most cautiffe of the world. Thus they landed at the Temple, where receyved him sir Nicholas cholas Cause, and sir William Sandes Baronets, and led him through the Citie, who desired ever the people to pray for him, of whome some wept and lamented, and sayd this is the ende of euill lyfe. God forgene him, he was a proude Prince, it is pitie that he behaued him so agaynst his king and liege Lord, whom God preserue. Thus about foure of the clocke he was brought as a cast man to the Tower.

Fryday the. xvij. day of May, about .xj. of the Clocke. This Duke with a great power was deliuered to John Byeme, and John Skeuington shirifes, who led him to the Skaffolde on Tower hill, where he sayde he had offended the Kinges grace through negligence and lacke of grace, and desired all noble men to beware by him, and all men to pray for him, and that he trusted to die the Kinges true man. Thus meekely with an Axe he tooke his death. Then the Augustyne Frriers tooke the bodie and head, and buried them.

About this tyme fraunces the french king made open warre agaynst the Emperour Charles both by land and sea. The Prouinces of Arragon, Castell, and all Spaine, Germany, Brabant, Flaunders, and the scades mayntayned the partie of the Emperour. The Kinges highnesse consideryng the murder and effusion of Christen blood, and the trouble that might ensue to all partes of Christendome, by inuasion of the great Turke, sent the Cardinal of Porke his Chaunceloz by name Thomas Wolsey to his towne of Calice to intreate an amitie & peace betwene those two mighty princes. For this boyaige great preparation was made, not onely for the Cardinal, but also for the Erle of Worcester then Lord Chamberleyn, the Lord of Saint Johns, the Lord Ferrers, the Lorde Harbert, the Bishop of Duresme, the Bishop of Ely, the Primate of Armitane, sir Thomas Bulleyn, Sir John Beche, sir John Hussey, sir Richard Wingfelde, sir Henry Gylforde, and many other knightes, Esquiers, Gentlemen, Doctors, and learned men that accompanied him. And thus honourably accompanied he rode through London the. xxv. day of July, and at Thomas Becketts Church the Maior and Aldermen tooke leaue of him, prayng God to sende him good speede. Thus passed he to Cauntozbury where the Archbishoppe, of Cauntozbury, and other Prelates receyued him in pontificalibus and brought him to his lodgyng vnder a Canapie to the Bishops palace. The. viij. day of July he came to Douer: the. xx. daye, he and the other Lordes with their retinues tooke passage, and arriued at Calice in safety, where the Lorde Deputie and the Counsaile receyued them with much honoz, and lodged the Cardinal in the Staple hall.

Shortly after whose arriual, came thether the Chauncelour of fraunce and the Countie de Palays with foure hundred horse, as Ambassadors from the french king, and lykewise from the Emperour came great Ambassadors and when they sate in counsaile, the Emperours Ambassade shewed their commission and power. And euen so did the french kings Ambassade, which was more larger then the Emperours commission.

Thus when the grudges were declared on both sides, when the Emperours Ambassadors consented to peace, the french kings would not. And when the french Ambassadors consented to peace, the Emperours would not. The Cardinal then would haue knitted the Emperour, the king our soueraigne raigne Lorde, the french king, and the Byshop of Rome in a league and amitie together: the other Ambassadors had no such commission, especially the Byshop of Rome, whereupon letters were sent to Rome in all haste, and the Frenchmen tarped in Calice, till he returned and beheld the towne, with which the counsaile of Calice were not contented. Whereupon the Cardinall rode to the Emperour accompanied with his Ambassadors (and left the French Ambassadors in Calice to abide his returne) and passed by Graueling, Dunkirke, Newport, Dudenborow, and sundry times in the waye he was encountered and receyued with noble men. And without Byuges he was receyued with many noble men, and manye Lordes and other of the Emperours court, and a myle without Byuges the Emperour his awne person met him, and shewed to him and to the other Lordes and Gentlemen of England gracious countenance, and so accompanied the Cardinall into the towne, where great multitude of people beheld them, and so rode to the Emperours palace where he lyghted, and first embrased the Cardinall, and after all the Lords, knights and Gentlemen of England. It is to suppose the Emperour knewe of the commission geuen to the sayde Cardinall, which had the kings power as if his grace had bene present, and also had the great seale with him, which had not bene sene before, or else the Emperour would not haue done him so high honoz and reuerence.

The Englishe Lordes, knightes, Esquiers, yomen of the kings Garde and other beyng to the number of foure hundred and thre score horse, were well lodged euery man after his degree, and euery lodging furnished with fewell, Bread, Bere, Wyne, Beeces, Muttons, Veales, Lambes, Venison, and all maner of daintie viand, as well in fishe as fleshe, with no lacke of spices and banketting dishes.

The next day after the great cheere made to the Lord Cardinall and to all his Lordes, knightes, gentlemen, and all other Lordes and knightes of England (in whose presence) the Cardinall made his proposition concerning peace to be had betwene the sayd Emperour and the French king declaring the calamities, miserie, and wretchednesse that came by warre: and the commodities, benefite, and welth that came by peace, cencorde and tranquillite, which proposition continued a great whyle: and when the Cardinall had made an ende, the Emperour himselfe answered and sayde: The lawe of God byndeth euery man to clayme and aske his right, and that the same lawe byndeth no man to holde, keepe, and withstande another mans right. Our Cousyn of Fraunce doth withhold our rightes and patrimonies, which we haue princely desired, and estsones will, and if he will render to vs our sayde rightes and patrimonies, we are contented to haue peace with him and his subiectes, if not, we trust in God & our right that the troubles by your fatherhed reherfed, shal come vpon him and his adherents. And for the titles of our regalitie, to put that to the Byshop of Rome, we doe consider that king Edward of England the thirde of that name of noble memorie, trarred by iust tittle to recouer the realme of Fraunce from Phillip de Valois, which title by intercession was put to the Byshop of Rome and his Court to discusse, and expended there by the space of twentie and thre yeres vnderdetermined, notwithstanding great pursute and labor was made to haue it ended: Such lyke time should be to vs tedious, wherfoze we entend by the ayde of God to

folow our tittle.

The Cardinall replied and declared the league that was betwene the thre mightiest princes of the worlde, that is to say, the Emperour, the king oure souereigne Lorde Henry the eyght, and the French king, and howe that to the Prince that first moued warre, the other two should be eneymes vnto hym, and sayde, beholde the mightie power and puyssaunt realme, riches, shippes, bytayles, and ordynaunce, Lordes, chiuallrie, horsemen, archers, and communalitie, this is in the high and mightie king of Englande my souereigne Lorde, and he that first warre beginneth, by the sayde league my sayde souereigne Lorde to his honour maye lawfully spred his Banner, and make warre in defence of his friende. For thys and other thinges my souereigne Lorde desires of your highnesse and Maiestie the consent of peace.

My Lorde Cardinall, sayde the Emperour, I esteeme most the honoz of my dere Uncle the king of Englande and trust in hys assurance, that neither his royall person, his realme, his power, Hauie, nor ordynaunce shall be but to our ayde in assisting in our tryed tittle, nor will consent to any thing in dishonouring vs or our Empire: God defende but we should humble our selfe to his request, our high honoz reserued. Lorde God who may esteeme more higher iniuries and wrongs then we in our person, our predecessours, and our louing subiectes haue endured by the house of Fraunce. My Lord Cardinall sayde the Emperour, their pride with our honoz we may and must reprehende and overthrowe by the helpe of God: with these wordes the counsaile brake vp.

All the Lordes and men of honour of Englande that day dynd in the Emperours Court.

When they were set and serued, it came to passe that an honorable man of the Emperours as he sat at dinner sayd thus. It is thought that the kinges Maiestie of Englande entendeth to make a peace. Was that ever he should imagine a thing so much to the dishonoz of the Emperour. The king is his Uncle, is it not come to his heering that all the world heareth? It was so that by the assent of the Bishop of Rome and other Princes to make peace with vs, the French partie after the battaile of Gyngate obtayned by Maximilian then Archduke of Osteriche, where euerie noble man of vs fought with the Frenchmen quarter naked, and slew of them a maruelous number. They desyred the daughter of Maximilian named Margaret to wife, which Lady is Duches of Sauoy and yet liuing, and she being like an Emperours childe was deliuered into their hands as Queene of the realme, with diuers townes in Picardie rendred with her and part of highe Burgonie, and treasure maruelous. Now sithen the same Maximilian had spoused Jane daughter and heire of Fraunces Duke of Britaine, which lande the Frenchmen ouer ranne and spoyled, and she constrained to lye vnto Charles king of Fraunce for a safeconduict to passe through his realme to Maximilian her spouse, and vpon the same safeconduict graunted, the sayd Ladye Jane passing through Fraunce with a small company, was by the same Charles taken at Amboys, and there married her agaynst her will, wherupon he forsoke the Lady Margaret and sent her againe to her father the Emperour without redplinery or rendring againe the townes that were deliuered wyth her. And where as the Duke of Gelder is subiect to the Emperoz, is he not yet at this day by the procurement of the French king, rebell? And where also by iust title the realme of Naples ought to be vnitid to the crowne of Castell, did not the French king sayne a iournay into the holy lande pretending title by Jeniamp brother to the great Turke being then Captiue in Rome, and by a craftie treatie obtayned the said Jeniamp, and so passed into Naples without perill, and seized all the lande into his handes, and then prisoned he the same Jeniamp? Thus to the great dammage of Castell, he made clayme to Naples by Margaret Queene of Englande late wife to Henrie the sixt.

The king of Nauerne is euermoze vassall to the house of Aragon and Castell, yet the French kyng caused him to rebell, hoping thereby to subdue the sayde Countries.

Of late dayes the French king by false treason caused sir Robert de la March to submit himselfe to the Emperozs maiesty, who receyued him vpon his oth & fidelity, pardoning al offences past, is not this false traitor returned, and is of the French partie? how may that Court, that counsaile, that king, that realme that consenteth to treason and periury by mayntenaunce of traytors be called honorable? hath not the French kyng swozne, and is bounden neuer to retaine the Switchers in wages to make warre against the Emperoz? and yet doth at this day: And albeit that his maiestie speaketh not of these thinges, yet he well considereth them. I trust verely sayd this noble man that God sayth, viue Burgoigne, every man y heard this reherfall, knew that it was true, howbeit he was not answered, but some English knights sayd, Sir you haue sayd well, and as God will all must be. Thus was this narration ended.

In thys season the Emperoz gat the towne of Metz: Also of the Emperours partie a great armie arryued in the Duchy of Mylan, and also the Emperozs power besieged the Noble Citie of Messiers, but the Capitaine called Franciscus was suspected of treason, for he remooued with the hoste from the siege without knowlege of the Emperoz.

The Emperour made a siege volant about the Citie of Tournay, for the rescue whereof and also of Messiers, the French king made a great army and himselfe in person.

Duryng this siege the Frenchmen tooke a Spaniardes ship laden with English mens goodes at Margate within the kings streames, not without great slaughter on both parties, yet the Frenchmen were a hundred and thye score men, and of Spaniards and English men onely. xxb.

The King of Denmarke Christianus came to see the Emperour hys brother in lawe (beyng a stately prince) and meanes was made by the Lord Cardinall that they spake together without any great signe of amitie.

The Lorde Cardinall after he had sojourned in Bruges by the space of iiii. dayes and concluded diuers matters with the Emperoz and accomplished hys commission: he tooke leaue of his maicstie, and lyke wise did all the noble men of Englande, and after conuenient iorneys arryued with all hys company at Calice, where the Ambassadors of Fraunce tarped him, and immediately after his arryuing he treated with them of peace, yet not so earnestly as he did befoze, and that perceyued well the said Ambassadors, and wrote thereof to the French king, yet the welth and prosperitie of both the realmes

and their subiects were highly reasoned betwene the Cardinall and the sayd Ambassadors, especially for fishing, whereupon was concluded that the subiectes of both the princes might freely fishe on the sea, and repaire to anye port of the one or the other prince without robbing, spoiling, or taking by to the second day of February next.

The French king with a mightie armie and himselfe in person repaired to the Countrey of Cambzay, minding to passe the streytes, but they were withstanded by the Emperozs power, yet he continued there from October vnto Nouember wythout any thing doying, to the great displeasure of the French king. The Duke Dalefon heering that, made preparations with the Almaynes to passe the marrys by the poynt Bassans & there the Almaynes had made bridges of Pipes & bessels, and brought thether their great ordinaunce. The Emperour beyng in the towne of Valencian and thercof aduertised, caused strong watch to be made, and as they would haue passed, the Bastarde Emery, and the Capitayne of Gaunt with twelue hundred men met with them, where was a great conflict and many men slayne, and at the last the Almaynes were put to flight and their bridges and other prouisions broken: Of the French partie were slayne in thys conflict. xiiii. hundred men, and of the Burgonians were slayne the Bastard Emery, the Capitaine of Gaunt and foure hundred men.

The Lord Cardinall after he had long treated with the Ambassadors of Fraunce, and coude bring them to no conformitie of peace, he sent to the Emperour the Lord of saint Johns, and sye Thomas Soley knight to aduertise his maicstie thereof.

Lyke wise the sayde Lorde Cardinall sent to the French king the Erle of Worcester, and the Bishop of Ely to exhort his grace to peace, he heard them, but he gaue them but few words to answer, and after they had bene xix. or. xx. dayes in his hoste, they tooke leaue and returned to Calice.

Duryng the continuance of the Cardinall in Calice all wyters and Patentes were there by hym sealed and no Shyrcles chosen for lacke of hys presence.

The king of Hungarie sent an Ambassador to the kinges highnesse for ayde agaynst the Turke, whome the Cardinall honorably entertayned duryng his abode in Calice. His comming was for ayde as men sayde agaynst the French king.

The Lorde Cardinall after the returne of the English Ambassadors from the Emperour and from the French king tooke shipping and landed at the port of Douer, the xxvij. day of Nouember, and there tooke his iorney to Blechyngly, where the kings grace welcommed him, geuing him also thanks for his great paynes and travayle.

The last daye of December the Cardinall accompanied the Emperozs Ambassadors to the court where they were honorably receyued and highlye feasted during their abode there, and many sumptuous and gorgeous disguisings, enterludes and banquetes made in the same season.

This yere was a great pestilence and death in London and other places of the realme, and many noble Capitaynes dyed, as the Lorde Broke, Sir Weston Brodme, Sye John Heron, Sir John Peche and manye other people.

The French king letterd forth with a great power agaynst the Emperour.

A great pestilence.

The

The Bishop of London, Doctor Fitz James, likewise deceased this yere, and Doctor Tunstall was preferred to the same benefice

The Lorde Thomas Hawarde Erle of Surrey, came out of Irelande to the court the .xxv. day of Januarie, when he had bene there the space of .xx. monethes in great trauaile and paine, and often tyme soze troubled by the wild Irish, howbeit by his noblenesse and manhod he brought the Lorde of Irelande to the kinges due obeyssaunce, and had of them many victories to his perpetuall laude and praise.

The Frenchmen this yere spoiled and shamefully robbed the kinges subiectes on euery coast of the Sea, so that whersoeuer the kyng reade his pooore subiectes came with lamentacions and cryes shewing his grace of the crueltie of the frenchmen and of their inhumane dealing with them, but euer the French Ambassadors promised restitution of euery thing, but none was restored.

In this moneth of Januarie the king commaunded all his shippes of warre to be made in a readinesse, which was done with all diligence.

About this time the Duke of Albany arrived in Scotlande, notwithstanding that the french king swore vnto the Cardinall that he should neuer come into Scotland wythout the king our soueraigne Lordes consent, but for all that he had comission from the french king although the french king wrote to the king that he was entred Scotland wythout his assent.

About this time the king wrote in Latine a beheiment booke against Martin Luther and confuted his iudgement, touching Indulgences, and defendeth the Bishop of Romes auctorite, and in the ende repeueth all his disputacions concerning the Sacraments of the Church. The which booke the Pope liked so well that the seconde day of february, the king being at Grenobrich, came thither the Cardinall with a Legation from Leo Bishop of Rome, and also his Ambassadoz, on whome waighted many a noble man, the king met wyth them at his chamber dooze welcming them as though they had both come from Rome. Then sayd the Cardinall, high and victorizous king it hath pleased our Lorde God to indue your grace with a great multitude of manifolde graces as a king elect in fauour of the high Heauen, and so appereth presently by your noble person, so formed & figured in stature and stature with force and pulcritude, which signifieth the present pleasure of our Lorde God wrought in your noble grace. And further he praised his wisdom, prudence, and learning, with many other goodly wordes in the praise of his most noble grace. And finally the Cardinall declared how the sayd Bishoppe of Rome had sent his highnesse an Acte in Bull vnder leade, declaring therein his grace to be the defendoz of the Christian fayth and his successors for euermore.

And when his grace had receyued the said Bull and caused it to be read and published, he went to his Chappell to heere Masse accompanied with many nobles of his realme and also with Ambassadors of sondry Princes, the Cardinall being requested to sing Masse, the Erle of Essex brought the Basin with water, the Duke of Suffolke gaue the assaye, the Duke of Northfolke held the towel, and so proceeded to Masse. And that done he gaue vnto all them cleane remission and blessed the king and the Queene and all the people: then was the Bull estones declared, and trumpettes blew,

The French men robbed and spoiled the kinges subiectes and Merchants vpon euery coast of the Sea.

King Henry the eight wrote a booke against Luther.

This title Defendoz of the fayth, was receyued from Iulij Bishop of Rome.

the thalmes and saggebuttes plaid in honoz of the kynges new style. Thus his highnesse went to dynner. In the middes whereof the king of Herauld and his company began the larges, cryng. Henricus dei gratia rex Anglie, & Francie defensor fidei, & dominus Hibernie. Thus ended the dinner, with much habundance of bitaile and wine, to all maner of people.

The .x. day of february, the Lorde Hodie chiefe Baron of the kinges Eschequer gaue ouer his office, and for him was admitted by the Cardinall, maister John Fitziamas, a right honourable man and well learned.

In this tyme was much businesse betwene the Emperoz and the french king, wherefore the king sent to the sea sixe good shippes, well manned and bittapled for the warre: the Admirall was called Christopher Coe, a man expert on the Sea, for safegarde of the Marchauntes, and other the kinges subiects, that were grieuously spoiled and robbed on the sea, by frenchmen, Scottes, and other rouers.

This tyme the .viij. day of february, the Lorde Dacres warden of the Marches of Scotland, entered into Scotland with fife hundred men, by the kinges commaundement, and there proclaymed that the Scottes should come into the kinges peace, by the first day of Marche folowng, or else to stand at their perilles, the Duke of Albanie beyng then within fife myles, with a mightie power of Scottes.

The .xi. day of february, Sir George Neuell, Lorde a Burgayny, beyng then prisoner in the Tower was brought to Westminster, and there in the kinges Bench confessed his enditement of misprision, in the cause of Edward late Duke of Buckyngham to be true, and after the open confession thereof, led againe to the Tower.

The Lorde Montacute the kinges cosyn, was about this tyme reconciled to his graces fauour, which had bene prisoner in the Tower, wyth sir Edward Neuell knight, this sir Edward Neuell was forbidden the kinges presence, for bearyng fauour to the Duke of Buckyngham.

This yere the second of Marche, certaine noble men of the Empire arrived in England to passe into Spaine, who were honourably receyued, and in honoz of them great iustes and triumphes were made, and that finished, and done, they tooke their leaue and departed on their iourney.

Also this tyme comission was geuen throughout the realme, for general musters to be had, to know what power might be made within the same and also men swozne of what substaunce and landes they were of, and the Cardinall aduertised of the same: not without grudging of the people, and maruailyng why they should be swozne for their atone good.

The Citie of London was this moneth aduertised of the comynng of the Emperoz, wherefore was made great preparation: and the Citizens sent the kinges grace one hundred tall men well harnessed, to furnishe his nauie, appointed to kepe the narrow seas.

The french king certefyed the kinges highnesse, by his letters dated in Marche, howe the Graund capitaine of Fraunce, the Countie de Palais, Mounseur de Lescue, and other noble men of Fraunce, had wonne the towne of Milaine, which was not true, for within fife or sixe dayes after, it was evidently knowen that the frenchmen were beaten backe, and had wonne nothing, to their great shame and reproche.

General musters taken throughout all the realme, and men swozne what substance they were of.

The french king certefyed the kinges highnesse that he had wonne the towne of Milaine.

Howeouer

Moreover the same season the frenche king wrote his letters to the Seignory and commonaltie of Gen, to sende him three Carrectes, and sixe Galyes furnished for the warres, unto his port of West, to maintaine hys warres agaynst the foresayd Emperoz, who made him by the y letters suche a reasonable excuse, that he was contented to spare them for that tyme.

A gracious and a mercifull act of King Henry the eyght.

The kinges highnesse kept this yere his Easter at his Manor of Richmond, and caused his Amner to make inquirie, eight myles round about the sayd Manor, what poore people was in every parishe. And for the eschewing of murder, that most commonly fortuneth euery good Friday, by reason of the great resort of poore people, his grace caused them to be refreshed with hys almose at home at their houses.

About this tyme a rover or theefe of Scotland, called Duncan Camell, was after long fight taken on the sea, by a Squier of Cornwall called master John Arondell, and presented to the kinges highnesse, who committed him to the tower of London, where he remained prisoner a long season after.

Preparation made for warre.

The king like a Prince which foreseth all thinges, sawe what warre was like to ensue, caused the Erle of Surrey his highe Admirall, to put in readinesse his nauie, both for the conductyng of the Emperoz into England, and also for the defence of his subiectes, which were dayly robbed and spoyled on the sea, which Lord Admirall tooke such diligence with the helpe of Sir William Fitzwilliam his vice Admirall, that all the shippes by the beginning of Aprill, were rigged and trimmed, and in especiall the Henry grace of Due, the kings great shipp, was brought out of the riuer of Thames into the Downes, readie to sayle whether God and the king would.

The Justices of this life poisoned by an infectious ayre.

In this yere at the Assise kept at the Castell of Cambridge in Lent, the Justices, and all the Gentlemen, Bayliffes, and other, resortyng thether, tooke such an infection, whether it were of the saour of the prisoners, or of the filth of the house, that many Gentlemen, as sir John Cut, sir Giles Arington knightes, and many other honest yomen thereof dyed, and almose all which were their present, were soze sick and narrowly escaped with their lyues. And this yere also dyed Sir Edward Bowynge, knight of the Garter, Sir John Pechy, and Sir Edward Belknap, valyant Capitaines which were suspected to be poisoned, at a banquet made at Arde, when the two kinges met last.

A pestilence and dearth.

This yere also, was r of without pestilence nor dearth of Cozne, for Wheate was sold this yere in the Citie of London, for. xx. shillings a quarter, and in other places for. xxvi. shillings. viij. pence. And in the same yere in December, dyed Leo Bishop of Rome, for whome was chosen, one Adrian bozne at Utrike the Emperours schoole maister. And in the same moneth Gawan Douglas Bishop of Dunkell in Scotland, fled out of Scotland into England because the Duke of Albanie was arriued in Scotlande, and had taken byon him to be gouernoz of the king, and the realme, to whome the king assigned an honest pencion to liue on. But when the king was aduertised, that the Duke of Albanie was arriued in Scotland, and had taken the rule of the yong king his realme, and he much doubted the sequelle of the matter, considering the Duke to bee heyre apparaint to the Crowne of Scotlande: Wherefore he sent Clarenseaux king at Armes into Scotland, with commaundement, that he should declare to the Duke of Albanie, that that his pleasure was, that he should depart the realme of Scotland for two causes, the one, because it was promised by the french king, at the last meeting, that he should not come into Scotland, the second was, that the king of England was uncle to the king of Scottes, and by the very bonde of nature, ought to defend his nephewe. Wherefore his nephewe beyng yong, and in the custodie of him, to whome if he should die, the realme of Scotlande should descend, he doubted least he might be brought out of the way, as other Dukes of Albany before had serued the heyres of Scotland: and if he would not auoyde Scotland, then Clarenseaux was commaunded to desyre him, which accordingly did desyre him at holye Rode house in Edenborough to the which he answered, that neither the french king, nor the king of England, should let him to come into his naturall Countrie, by their agreement: also as touchyng the yong king, he sayd, that he loued him as his souereigne Lord, and him would keepe and protect agaynst all other.

When Clarenseaux had reported hys answer to the king, then he knew well that all thys was the french kings doying, wherefore he prouided in all things accordingly. The Erle of Anguiche of Scotlande that had married Ladie Margaret, the king our souereigne Lordes sister, late wyfe unto king James of Scotlande, that was slayne at Floddon field, was by the Duke of Albany, sent by a coloured Ambassade into Fraunce, where shortly after his arriuyng, he was by the french king committed to prison, and hys brother likewise, which escaped after as you shall heare.

Also the sixt day of Marche, the french king commaunded all Englishe mens goodes beyng in Burdeaux, to be attached and put vnder a rest: and likewise deteyned the kings tribute, which he should haue out of Fraunce, and also the french Queenes Dowry, and when the king sent to him for it he euer gaue fayre words, and made delayes, but none was payde, and euer the Ambassadors promised fayre.

The french king attacheth the Englishe mens goods.

The king thys yere kept the day of saint George with great solemnity, at his manour of Richmond, where were elected to the order of the Garter, Done Ferdinando brother to the Emperour, and Archduke of Austrike, and sir Rycharde Wyngfield knight by the Emperours meanes, to the which the Emperour had giuen two hundred pounde pention, out of the house of Burgoyne, which sir Edward Bowynge before had of the Emperours gift. During thys warre betwene the Emperour and the french king, and the king of England liyng still an entreatoz betwene them, the English men were robbed on both sydes, and when their wyues were laden at Burdeaux, and readie to depart, they were attached, and the Marchants put in prison: the poore fisher men on the coast of England, sometime met with the french men and them spoyled, but to no recompence of that they had taken. The Marchants of Englande, that had factozs at Burdeaux, complayned to the king of England, and shewed him how the french king, contrarie to his league and hys safeconduyt vnder hys seale, by his people, had taken their goods & emprisoned their factozs and friends, & can haue no remedie. Likewise complayned all the Marchants, how their shippes were restrayned, in euery port of Fraunce, and their goodes tyfled, and could haue no redresse. The king and his counsaile were sozie to here the complaynts of the Marchants, and so concluded to sende for the french Ambassadors, to whom the Cardinall sayde: for how is this chaunce happened? you haue promised euery in the name of the king your mayster that all leagues, promises, and couenants should be kept, and that full restitution should be made of euery hurt and damage, and that firme peace and amity should be kept: but contrary to your saying, our Marchaunts be robbed and spoiled, yea, although he had graunted hys safeconduyt, yet they be robbed, and stayed at Burdeaur, is this the peace that you and your mayster hath promised to be kept? is this the amitie that he was sworne to keepe? Is this the worde of a king? Is this the strength of a Prince to breake his safeconduyte? And where you aduysed our Marchauntes to sue in Fraunce for restitution, and did warraunt them to be restored, you haue put them to coste and losse, for they haue sued there long, and spent their goodes, without any redresse, and now you haue imprisoned them, and kept both them and their goodes, is this iustice? is this restitution? And all this was your procurement, and now we see what is come of your promise, surely this may not be suffered, and beside this the king is informed, that the king your maister hath spoken by him, foule and opprobrious words, yea, in the heering of the Englishe men which were fore greued to heare such wordes, and were not able to be reuenged.

The Ambassadour of Fraunce sayde, that it was not so as it was reported: well sayde the Cardinall, if you note the Counsaile of England so light, as to tell fables, you be misaduised, but I praye you how often times hath the king written to your maister, for restitution of suche robberies as hath bene done, and yet can haue no redresse? wherefore he graunted letters of marke, which may stande with the league, but Mounsigne Chastillon hath taken Marchaunts of England prisoners, and hath sent certayne hether for their raunsome, this is open warre and no peace. Maister President Polliot or Dulteyne the french Ambassadour, answered, that surely the matters which were alleged agaynst his maister the french king, were but forged matters and not true: but he sayde that for a truth, daylie in the Court of Fraunce, were complaintes made agaynst the Englishe men for great robberies done by them, as well on lande as sea, affirming it to be done in the Emperours quarell, and yet the french king for the loue he beareth to England, letteth his subiectes to be unheard, although he daylie lament the great iniurie, done to him and his subiectes by Englishe men: and therefore my Lorde I pray you beleue no such tales, till I haue tolde you the truth.

Then the Cardinall called the foure hostages, that laye here for the payment of money for Courmay, and they foure were deliuered, to my Lord of saint Iohnes, to sir Thomas Louell, to sir Andrew Wyndsoze, and to sir Thomas Deuell, euery knight one to keepe safe, and none of their countrey to speake with them prinely, and the Ambassadour was commaunded to keepe his house in silence, and not to come in presence, till he was sent for, which order sore abashed the french hostages, and the Ambassadour, but there was no remedy, and commaundement was geuen to the Maior of London, to attache all the frenchmen, bodie and goodes, and them to keepe in prison, till he heard farther of the kinges pleasure: then were all the frenchmen in London and about, arrested and brought to prison, so that all the prisons in and about London, were full of them, some of them escaped by speaking dutche, and sayd they were Flemings bozne, which was not tried.

All the french men in London were attached and committed to prison.

The

The king for safegarde of his Marchaunts sent .xxiiij. goodly shippes to the Sea, well manned and trimmed for the warres, and seuen other shippes he sent towarde Scotlande, which entered the Frith, and proffered to enter into the Scottish shippes that lay in the hauen, but the Scottes ranne their shippes on lande, and the Englishe men folowed with boates and landed, and set the ships on fire, and at Lithe tooke certayne prisoners, which they brought into Englande, and still the kinges great Maie kept the narrow Seas, for then was neyther peace betwene England and Fraunce, nor open warre as you haue heard.

The king had perfite knowlege, that Charles the Emperour would be at the kings towne of Calice, the .xxiiij. daye of Maye, to passe thoroowe Englande into Spaine, wherefore the king sent the Marques Dorset, accompanied with diuers knightes and gentlemen, to receyue him at Calice, which in all hast sped him thether. Likewise the Cardinall took his iourney towarde Douer the twentieth day of Maye, and rode through London, accompanied with two Ceres .xxxviij. knightes, and a hundred gentlemen, eyght Bishops, ten Abbottes, thirtie Chapleines, all in Veluet and Satin, and yomen seuen hundred, and so by iorneyng he came to Douer the .xxviij. daye beyng Monday. In the meane season tydings were brought to the king, that the french king had sent a great armie toward Calice, and the men of warre lay at Abuille, Muntrell, Bullein and about, nere the English pale. Wherefore the king like a prince that foresawe all, and intending not to be deceyued, wrote to his Nobles, and Cities and townes, to prepare certayne men of warre in a readinesse, which was shortly done, and so they were sent to the Maie, so that they might shortly be at Calice if neede requyred.

On Sunday the .xxv. daye of Maye, the Lorde Marques Dorset, the Bishop of Chichester, and the Lorde de LaWare, with other noble men, at the water of Grauelynge, receyued the Emperour in the name of the king of England, and so the Emperour embraced them, and he hauyng in hys company many noble men, came toward Calice, where at the Turnepike in the Lordship of Marke, he was receyued of sir Edward Gylford Marshall of Calice, with fiftie men of armes richely besene, and also a hundred archers on horsebacke, then in passing forward toward Calice, the ordinaunce shot terribly, and into Calice he was receyued with procession, and then by the Lord Barne deputie there, and the counsaile of the towne: And after he was receyued by the Maior and Aldermen of the towne, and lastly of the Maior and Marchauntes of the staple, and so conueyed to the Checker, and there lodged.

On the Monday, he and all the Nobles of Spaine, Flaunders, and Germany, tooke ship at Calice and landed at Douer, at foure of the clock at after noone, and wyth hym the Duke Balway, the prince of Orange, the Countie of Nassaw, the Countie Walcozd, the Lorde Egmonde, and the Marques of Brandenbrough, all in one ship bote. The Cardinall receyued hym on the Sandes, accompanied with three hundred Lordes, knightes, and gentlemen of Englande: the Emperour embraced the Cardinall, and took hym by the arme, and so passed forward and tooke horses, and rode together gether to Dover Castell, where they were lodged. The English Parbiners diligently lodged the Emperours traine, euery man according to his degree. The king of England was come to Cantorburie, the .xxvij. daie of May, and receaued by the Archbysshop: and hearing of the Emperours arriual, with a small companie on the Wednesday, beyng the Assension euen, he rode to Dover, and with much ioye and gladnesse the Emperour and he met, and there taried the Assension day, and on Friday, the king brought the Emperour aborde on his newe ship, called the Henry grace de dieu, a ship of .xv. hundred and rowed about to all his great ships, which then lay in Dover rode, the Emperour and his Lozdes, much prayesed the making of the ships, and especially the artillerie, they sayde, they neuer saw ships so armed.

The same daie at after none, the two noble princes marched forwarde to Cantorbury, where the Maior and Aldermen receiued them, without the towne, with a solempne oration, to whome the Emperours Secretarie answered ornatly. Then the Princes with their swordes bozne naked before them, and the Emperour on the right hand, entered the Citie of Cantorburie, and so with procession were brought to Christs church, where the Archbishop and twelue Prelates mitred, receyued them vnder a Canapie, and so they offered to the sacrament, and the Emperour was brought to the Bishops palace, where he lay for that night, and the king lodged at saint Augustines. The morrowe after, these Princes remoued to Sutyngborne, and the next daie to Rochester, where the Bishop receyued them with the whole Couent, and on Monday they came to Grauesend by one of the clocke, where they tooke their Barges, and there were thirtie Barges appoynted, for the strangers, and so by six of the clocke they landed at Grene which, the same Mondaye the seconde daie of June, where the Emperour was of the king newlye welcomed, and all his nobilitie, and at the hall doore the Queene and the Princes, and all the Ladies, receyued and welcomed hym: and he asked the Queene blessing (for that is the fashion of Spayne, betweene the Aunt and Nephewe) the Emperour had great loye to see the Queene his Aunt, and in especiall his young Colyn germaine the Lady Mary. The Emperour was lodged in the kinges lodging, which was so richely hanged, that the Spaniards wondered at it, and specially at the riche cloth of estate: nothing lacked that might be gotten, to cheere the Emperour and his Lozdes and all that came in his company, were higly feasted.

The Wednesday, the more to do the Emperour pleasure, was prepared a Justes royall: and as the king was arming him, there came one George Luffkin and shewed him that there was one come from his Ambassadoz in Fraunce, the king called for the messenger, and he deliuered the letters, which the king red, and said to sir William Compton, tell the Emperour that I haue newes, if it pleaseth hym to come hether: Sir William Compton went and tolde this to the Emperour, which without delay came to the king, which shewed him the letters from Sir Thomas Cheyney his Ambassadoz, wherein was conteyned the definitiue answer, made aswell to Sir Thomas Cheyney, as to Clarenseaux king at armes of Englande, by the French king, to the kinges requestes: for you shall vnderstand, that the king of England by his Ambassadoz, had often tymes demaunded, both his tribute and his lawfull dette, and also restitution to be made to his subiects grieued, and farther also the league was broken, by making warre on the Emperour, so that now by the league the king of Englande should be enemye, to him that first brake, and did take part with the other, yet he had so much compassion, on shedding of Chrysten blood, that he would not enter warre but shew himselfe a mediator, and an entreator betwene them. And vpon this sir Thomas Cheyney had often moued the French king, and also moued him to take peace with the Emperour for two yeres, so that some mediation of peace might be entreated in the meane season: to all this the French king answered, we haue well considered your Masters desire, to the which we nothing agree, nor holde vs content with his request. Sir sayde the Ambassadour, the king my Master shall be aduertised of your answer by me, wherefore I beseech your grace of safeconduite, to retourne into England: then sayd the king, there is an officer of Armes come out of England, let him come and he shall be heard and haue an answer, to which thing sir Thomas Cheyney answered not, but with reuerence departed, and so on the .xxi. daie of Maie, the sayd officer called Clarenseaux king at Armes, came to the French kinges chamber at Lions, which was accompanied with many noble men and Gentlemen, and then Clarenseaux put on his coate of Armes, and desyred license to speake, and libertie according to the law of Armes, which was to hym graunted: then he declared that where the French king was bound by league tripartite to keepe peace with the Emperour, and with the king of England, & whoe soeuer first brake, the other two to be enemies to him, to the which league the French king was sworne, which league he apparauntly had broken, by making warre on the Emperour, by Sir Robert de la Marche, and by himselfe in person. Wherefore the king by that league must be his enemye, and take part against him.

Also he declared, the French king kept away the kinges rentes, and debtes, due to him. Also that he deteyned the Dower of the French Queene. Also that contrary to his promise, he had sent the duke of Albany into Scotland: Also that contrary to Justice he had imprisoned Marchants, hauing his safeconduit, where they should haue gone in safetie, saying there was no warre proclaymed, betwene hym and the kyng his Master: all these articles with many mo, the king my maister is readye to proue. Nay sayd the French king I began not the warre, nor sent Robert de la March to make warre, but commaunded hym to the contrary, and oz I made warre in proper person, his warre was open, and he had our towne of Courtnay strongly besieged, and as touching the Duke of Albany, it hath cost me .xl. thousand frankes to kepe hym out of Scotland, but I could not let him to go into his owne countrey. Thus the French king excused his vntreuth. Then sayd Clarenseaux, sir I am farther charged to tell you, that the king my soueraigne Lord, holdeth you for his mortall enemye, from this daie forth and all your adherents: well sayde the French king, I looked for this a great while ago, for sith the Cardinall was at Bridges, I looked for no nother, but you haue done your message: then the French king rose and departed, and Clarenseaux was conueighed to his lodging, and shortly after, Sir Thomas Cheyney and he by a safeconduit departed and came to Bulleine, and there Mounsie Fayett Capitaine there, stayed them both till the Ambassadour of Fraunce, which had lien in England, were clerely deliuered out of Calice. circumstaunce of the demaundes and defiaunce, and the French kynges answer, was conteyned in the letter, which was brought to the king, which showed it to the Emperour (as you haue heard) but while the King and the Emperour looked on the letter a sodaine noise rose amongst both their subiects, that it was a letter of defiaunce sent to them both by the French king, which was nothing so. Thus now was the warre open of all parties, betwene England and Fraunce, and Spayne.

The coming of the Emperour into London.

On Friday the sixt day of June, the king and the Emperour, with all their companies marched toward London, where in the way, a myle from Saint Georges barre was set a riche Tent of cloth of Golde, in which Tent were two lodgings, one for the Emperour, and another for the king, where these two Princes dwelt. And when the Heraldes had appoynted euery man their rowmes, then euery man set forward in order, richly apparayled in cloth of Golde, Tissue, Siluer, Tynsell, and Veluets of all coloures. There lacked no massy Cheynes, nor curious Collers: an Englishman and a straunger roade euer together, matched accordyng to their degrees. Before the Emperour and the king, were borne two swordes naked, then the two Princes folowed in Coates of cloth of Golde, embraudered with Siluer, both of one suite: after them folowed the kinges Henrcemen, in coates of purple Veluet, pieled and paned with riche cloth of Siluer, and with them were matched the Emperours Henrcemen, in equall number, in coates of crimson Veluet, with two gardes, the one golde, and the other siluer: then folowed the Capitaynes of the gardes, then the Emperours garde on the right hand, and the English garde on the left hand, and so in this order they went forward, and in the way the Maior John Milborne, and his brethren, in fine Skarlet and well horsed, met with the Emperour and the king where one sir Thomas Moore knight, and well learned, made to them an eloquent Oration, in the prayse of the two Princes, and of the peace and loue betwene them, and what comfort it was to their subiectes, to see them in such amitie, and howe that the Maior and Citizens, offered any pleasure or seruice that in them lay, next their souereigne Lord.

An oration made by sir Thomas Moore to the Emperour.

When this was done, they came into Southwarke, where the Clergie receyued them in Copes, with Crosses, and Senses, and so kept the one syde of the strete, all the Citie throughe. When they came by the Marstallie, and the kinges Benche, the Emperour desired pardon of the King, for the prisoners, and he at the Emperours request, pardoned a great number of them. When they were almost at the bridge foote, there was a stay, the king demaunded the cause, and it was tolde him, that the Heraldes had appoynted two gentlemen to ryde together, one was y Ambassadoz from the Marques of Mantua, to the Emperour, and the other from the Citie of Seynes, to the Emperour also, and the Citie, and the Marques were not friendes, the Emperour incontinent, sent his Lorde Chamberleyn to them, sayng: that if they would that day do him honor, he would thank them, and if they would not ride as they were appoynted, he prayed them to depart. When y lord Chamberleyn had tolde this message, they rode forth and made no more curtelie.

When they were come to the draw bridge, there were set Targets, of the armes of the Emperour and his dominions, richly painted, and on the other syde, stode one great Giaunt, representyng Hercules, with a mighty Club

Club in his hande, and on the other syde stode another Giaunt, representyng Sampson, with the Jawe bone of an Ass in his hande. These two Giautes helde a great Table, in the which was written in golden letters, all the Emperours stile. From the draw bridge these two Princes passed, to the middes of the bridge, where was raysed a fayre edifice, with Towers embattayled and Gates, all lyke Masonry, of white and blacke, like Touch and white Marble: about this buildyng was a fayre Pagiant, in the which stode Jason all in harnesse, hauyng betoze him a golden fleece, and on the one syde of hym stode a fiery Dragon, and on the other syde stode two bulles which beastes cast out fire continuallye, and in a tower on the one syde stode a fayre Mayde representyng the Ladie Medea, which was verie straungely and richely apparayled.

And when they had beheld this Pagiant, they came to the Conduite at Gracious streete, and from thence to Leaden hall, and to the Conduite in Cornehill, and so to the great Conduite in Cheape, and to the Standard and little Conduite in Chepe, where at euery of them were verie riche, sumptuous, and costly Pagiantes. And all the way as they went the Citizens well apparayled stode within rayles set on the left syde of the streetes, and the Clergie on the right syde in riche Copes, which sented the Princes as they passed, and all the streetes were richely hanged with clothes of golde, siluer, Veluet and Arras, and in euery house almost Minstrelsy, and in euery strete were these two verses written in letters of Golde.

Carolus, Henricus, viuant defensor vterque

Henricus fidei, Carolus Ecclesie.

Which verses were also written in other Tables in Golden letters, as ensueth.

Long prosperitie

Princes most puyssaunt:

The one of fayth
The other of the Church Chosen defendant.

When they were past the little Conduite they came to the west ende of Pauls Church and there they alighted, and there was a Canopy ready vnder which they two stode and were receyued by the Archebishop of Cauntozbury, and .xxi. Prelates in pontificalles and so they offered at the high autter and returned to horsebacke, and came to the blacke friers where the Emperour was lodged in great roialtie: All his nobles were lodged in his newe palace of Bridewell, out of the which was made a Gallery to the Emperours lodgyng, which Gallery was verie long, and that Gallery and all other Galleries there were hanged with Arras. The kinges Palace was so richely adornoed of all thinges, that my wit is to dull to discriue them, or the riches of the hangyngs, or the sumptuous buyldyng and giltynge of Chambers.

On Whitsonday the .viij. day of June the Emperour and the king with great honour roade to the Church of Saint Paule, and there heard highe Masse. When Masse was done they returned to Bridewell, where the Emperour was highly feasted. The same Sonday at after noone the two princes went by water to Westminster, and roade to the Church, and in ridyng all the sanctuary men cryed mercy and pardon, they were so hastie and pleased so neere that the Sergeautes at Armes coulde scarce keepe them from touchyng the Emperour and the king: The Cardinall gaue them a gentle answer swere which contented them for a tyme. They were receyued with Proceſſion into the Abbey and heard Euenſong & beheld king Henry the ſeuenthes Chapell and then went into Weſtmiſter hall, at the largerelle whereof the Emperour made manayled, then they turned to Wydeuwell and there ſhipped.

On Monday they dynd in Southwarke with the Duke of Suffolke and hunted there in the Parke, and road to the Manor of Richemond to their lodgyng and the next day to Hampton Court, where they had great chere, and from thence on Thursday to Windſore, where he hunted Fryday & Saterday. And on Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday the Princes and their counſayle ſat moſt part in counſayle, & on Corpus Chriſti day, they with great tryumph rode to the College of Wyndſore where the Emperour wore his mantle of the Garter and ſat in his awne ſtall, and gaue to the Perards two hundred crownes: that day both the princes receyued the ſacrament, and after Maſſe both ſware to keepe the promiſes and league ethe to other, for the which amitie great ioy was made on both parties, and after the Maſſe was ended they went to dynner, where was great feaſting.

On Fryday they departed out of Windſore, and by eaſy iourneys came to Wyncheſter, the .xxij. day of June, and in the way thether, the Emperour hunted the Hart. Before the Emperour was come to Wyncheſter, the Erle of Surrey Admyrall of Englande with all the kinges Nauie was come to Hampton, and with him the Lorde Fitz Water, the Baron Curſon, Sir Gyles Capell, Syr Nicholas Carew, Syr Rycharde Wyngfield, Sir Rycharde Fernyngham, Frances Bryan, Anthony Brovone, John Ruſſell, of which many were of the kings priuie chamber: theſe with many more departed from Hampton with thirtie ſhips well manned and ordinaunced in the ende of June, noyſing that they ſhould onely ſcoure the ſeas for ſafegarde of the Emperour and his Nauie: But they had priuie inſtructions to go to another place as you ſhall heare after.

All thys whyle was the warre on the parties of Picardie hot, and the Capitayne of Bullayn called Fayet wrote euer mockyng letters to the garrifon of Calice, and ſayde: if the garrifon of Calice would iſſue out, he would meete with them halfe way with foure thouſand men. Whereupon Syr Edward Gylldford Marſhall of Calice, whome the Capitayne of Bullaine called the Fryebzand, becauſe it was his badge, ſet forth out of Calice the eleuen daye of June with twelue hundred men, and went out of Calice, and ſent a Purſuauant to the Capitayne of Bullayne certefiying him that he was comyng with his fryebzand, and bad him keepe promiſe. This officer declared the meſſage to him, but he came not. Forth marched Sir Edward till he came to Marguiſon and tarped to ſee whether the Capitayne of Bullayne would come or no, and when he ſawe he came not, he ſet fyre in the towne, and the light horſemen forerayed the beaſtes and pillage, and bzent Villages all about, which was well perceyued in the Countrie a farre off, and towarde night all the crewe came home with good pillage, and on the morrow Syr Edward Gylldford deliuered a priſoner franke and free, on condition he ſhould tell the Capitayne of Bullaine that he had bene at Marguiſon with his Fryebzand, which truely did his meſſage, for the which the Capitayne brake his head: all the Caſtels and fortreſſes in the Engliſhe pale were were well manned and bytailed and lacked no artillerie, ſo that the Frenche men could doe them no harne.

When the Emperour and the king laye at Byſhops Waltham they ioyntly ſent letters of deſiaunce to the Duke of Lorraine, as Alpe and confederate with the French king. The firſt day of July the Emperours Nauy ſayled before Hampton, which were .C.lxxx. goodly ſhippes. When the Emperours ſhippes were come, he tooke leaue of the king, and had great giſtes giuen him and much money lent to him, and ſo the ſixt day of July he tooke his ſhip, ſo with all his nauie he made ſaile towarde Spaine where he arrived in ſafetic the tenth day after.

The Emperour ſaith his leaue and departeth out of England.

The king about this very time ſent to the Citie of London to borowe twentie thouſande poundes, which ſoze chafed the Citizens, but the ſumme was promiſed, and for the payment the Mayor ſent for none, but for men of ſubſtaunce. Howbeit the companies ſolde much of their plate. Ths ſumme was payde, and the king ſent his letter promyſing payment of the ſame, and ſo did the Cardinall. The pooze men were content with thys payment and ſayde, let the riche Charles paye, for they may well. Lyke loane was practiſed through all the realme, and priuie ſeales deliuered for the repayment of the ſame.

This ſeaſon the .xxi. day of Maye was the Citie of Geane gotten by the Emperours Capitaine called Octauiano de Columna, which had with him foure thouſande and foure hundred Spanyardes, fiue thouſande Italyans, and foure thouſand Lancknightes: and in the Citie was taken Porter de Nauarro the French kings familier Capitayne, and all the Lordes of Geane which fauoured the French king were taken priſoners or ſlayne, and eſpecially one Octauiano Farragoſo, which ruled there for the French king, was euill puniſhed: the ſpoyle of the Citie that the ſouldiours had, was foure thouſande Dukates beſide the pillage, which was a great thing

The Citie of Geane gotten by the Emperour.

Now let vs retourne to the Lord Admyrall of England which departed from Hampton as you haue heard, and ſo with his nauy ſayled and ſkolozed the Seas, and at the laſt came on the coaſt of Britaine, and commaunded the wyfeſt Maſters and Mariners to boy the hauen of Mozles, which was done, and ſo the next night all the flete came to the hauen of Mozles in ſafety and moored their ſhippes together. Then all men were commaunded to harnelle and to aduaunce their ſtandardes, and all ſouldiers to giue their attendaunce on their Capitaynes, and then the Lord Admyrall appoynted and cauſed .xiiij. peeces of ordynaunce called ſfaucous to be brought to lande and drawne forth with ſtrength of men. Then when all men that ſhould go forward were landed, the Lord Admyrall with banner diſplayed tooke lande on the Eaſt ſide of the hauen the firſt day of July, and with hym a ſayze band of ſouldiers, to the number of ſeauen thouſand, whome the ſayd Lord Admirall and ſir Richard Wyngfield brought in good order of battayle, and cauſed Chriſtopher Mozres the Maſter Gunner to ſee all thinges redy prepared, and then about eyght of the clock the firſt day they marched toward Mozles in good order of battayle with banners diſplayed. The alarme roſe in the Countrie and came to the towne of Mozles whereby the gentlemen of the countrie ſhewed themſelues pricking, but when they heard the Gunnes they fled as though they neuer vſed warre. They of Mozles armed themſelues and

and went to the walles and shut the gates and layed ordinaunce to here was most reoperdy. The Englishmen had gone. v. long mile and were now come to the subburbes of the towne: then the English Archers shot, and the Britons them defended: then the Admirall commaunded the towne to be assaulted, then the Lord Fitzwater and the Baron Curson quartered the towne on all sides, the Englishmen shot with long bowes, & the Britons with Crosbowes, which defended themselves manfully. Before the port Hoquet where is a Meason de Dieu*. At this gate gaue the assault Sir Richard Wingfield, Nicholas Carew, Fraunces Bryan, Sir John Wallop and all their bendes, hauing with them thre peces of ordinaunce called Faucons, which the Maister Gunner of times shot, but the Britons had set the gate full of Arcubushes, then the Gunner sayd, haue at the wicket, and in the smoke of the gunnes let vs enter the gate, the Gentelmen assented, then the sayde Sir Christopher Gunner strake the locke of the wicket, so that it flew open, then in the smoke came to the gate the said Christopher and the other forenamed Gentelmen, and when Christopher came to the gate he found the wicket open and entered, and the gentelmen folowed, the Britons defended themselves, but they were put backe and slayne, then was the grate gate opened and then entered the souldiers that were on the other side of the towne. When the Britons on the walles saw the towne gotten, some fled at the Posterne, & some by another way, the best way that they could.

The Erle of Surrey with Banner displayed tooke the market place. Then the souldiers fell to pillage and rifled the chestes and ware houses of Marchauntes, for the towne of Hoyses was very riche, and specially of linnen cloth, the Gentelmen suffered the souldiers to doe what they would. When the souldiers had taken their pleasure of the town as much for a truth or more then they could beare away.

The Lord Admirall commaunded the Trumpettes to blow, and commaunded all men to sette fyre in all places of the towne, the sayde Market place was set on fyre, and eth subburbs bzent ardantly. Wherefore all men were commaunded to their standerdes, and about fyr of the cloke the armie retreated, and as they passed they bzent diuers villages and places. And when night approched they drew together and all night laye on lande abiding their enemies. And the next day with honoz they tooke their shippes, and when all men were shipped and felwe or none missed: The Lorde Admirall commaunded .xviij. or .xviij. shippes small and great lying in the haven to be bzent. Then they sayled forth and came to anker before saint Belle de Lion, then he commaunded that the Foyst and other small shippes and great botes should be manned to enter into an harborow for shippes called Dympoll or Dimpole, which was sone done, the botes entered the place and some landed, but then the Britons were to strong, and so they toke their botes and bet the Britons on the shore, and the Britons shot great ordinaunce at the Englishmen, but it did them no harme, and yet the Englishmen bzent a shyppe of two hundred and many small vessels. When time came the whole flete sayled into the haven of Brest and with barkes and robbe barges entered the haven and tooke lande, and some Englishmen did so much that they set fyre in houses nere the Castell. And euen as the Englishmen sayled by the coast, the Britons them askried and fortified the landing places, yet day

ly the Englishmen skymyshed with the Britons and came safelye to their shippes againe: with thys warre was all the Duchy of Britain soze troubled.

When the Lord Admirall had wonne the towne of Hoyses as you haue heard: He called to him certayne Squyres whome for their hardynesse and noble courage he made knights, first Sir Fraunces Bryan, Sir Anthoyne Browne, Sir Richard Cornwall, Sir Thomas Hoze, Sir Gyles Huse, Sir John Russell, Sir John Rapnford, Sir George Cobham, Sir John Cornwalles, Sir Edwarde Wigley and diuers other, and after he wrote letters to the king of his good speede: in the which he much praised al the gentelmen and souldiers for their hardynesse. When he had sayled a while on the seas, he had letters sent from the king that he shoulde retrepte, and so he came withall his flete vnder the Ile of Weyght to a place called the Row, and then he departed from his shippe and came to Estamstede the one and twentie day of July to the king, of whome he was well welcomed you may be sure. And so on Monday the thre and twentie daye of July the king and he came to London to the Cardynals place and there sate in counsaile to determyne what shoulde be done. After this the king dyned wpyth the Cardinall the .xxiiij. daye of July, where he reherfed that he had knowledg that the Admirall of Britaine was in Hoyses with a hundred horsemen & a hundred crossbowes, and yet he fled, & the king much commended the Lord Admirall for his paine and hardynesse, and prayed them of his gard, and specially .i. which left pilfering and neuer went from the Lorde Capitaine.

On the thirde day of July while this enterpryse was done at Hoyses, certayne Frenchmen to the number of thre hundred horsemen came neere to the Castell of Guisnes, and kept themselves in a close couert, and so appeared. viij. or .x. horsemen, and came neere Guisnes: out of the Castell came .viij. English Archers, and issued out of the Gate, and fell with the frenche horsemen in skirmish: to the Frenchmens reskue came foure men of Armes and skirmished with the Archers which were afoote. Then out of Guisnes issued .xii. Similances all Welshemen, and ranne boldelye to the Frenchmen in rescue of the footmen. Then the whole bend of frenche men issued out and set on the Welshemen, the footemen shot while arrowes lasted and were faine to fight with swordes, the Welshemen kept themselves together, and entered into the bend of Frenchmen, and brake their speares, and then fought so with swordes, that they made away, so that they escaped from the bende of thre hundred horsemen, and of the Frenchmen were slaine thre men, and five horse, the footemen were ouerpressed, and solde their liues dere, for the Frenchmen slue them all, and would take none prisoner, they were so angrie with the killyng of their horse.

Also the .xxv. day of July, Sir William Sandes Treasorer of Calice, and Sir Edwarde Guilfozde Marshall, with Banners spread, issued out of Calice with .xiiij. C. men, and went into the french pale lokyng for Hoyses: first Foyat, which was a great mocker and a coward: But when he appeared not, they went to Whitlandbay, and set it on fyre, and the people fled to the Church which was fortified and stood at defence, the body of the Church was wonne, and then they tooke the Steple, and some yelded themselves, but the remnant by counsaile of a priest mainteyned so long, that the Steple was fiered, and then the priest cryed for succour, but it was to late, and so the French

French people was faine to leape the Steple, and diuers perished, and they that were saued were led to Calice as prisoners. Farther the .xxiiij. day of the same Moneth, Thwaites a Capitaine of an Englishe Shippe tooke land beyde Bulleyn, and went by thre myle into the Countrey to a towne called Newe Castell and forayed all the Countrey, and in his returne set fyre on the towne and brent a great part thereof mager the Bullenoyr, and with his bowes and men which onely was bi. scoze, he put backe .lxxx. Bagbushes and thre hundred men of warre of the Countrey and so came to their Shippe with all the bootie and lost no man, notwithstanding they were soze folowed to their ship.

On the .viij. day of July the Cardinall sat in the starre Chamber at Westminster, where he sayde, my Lordes it is reason that you should knowe the honourable enterpryse done by the Lorde Admirall and his company in Briteyne which hath dispoled and destroyed the great towne of Hozles in Briteyne with all the vilages and Countrey adioynng to the same, which is in the Franche Dominion, which mischiese had never risen if Frannces the French king had kept his othe and promise. For he is bound that he should neuer retayne the Swythes from the Emperour, nor that he shall not invade any of the Emperours landes or dominions, which he hath done, for he hath invaded the Countrey of Henaude and Cambrices, and taken Hedynge and Fountreby with many other iniuries. For when the king sent me and other to his great costes the last yere to Calice to treat a vnitie and peace betwene them, all our sayngs were by the French king turned into a mockery. Also contrary to his promise he hath suffered Duke John of Albany to enter the realme of Scotland to the great perill of the yong king, Nephew to our soueraigne Lorde, and also entendeth to mary the Queene of Scottes contrary to the kinges honour. The sayde Franche king also withholdeth the kinges ducities, and his sisters Dowry: wherefore of necessitie the king is entered into warre, for no Prince will suffer the wrong that the French king offereth him, as an untrue and forsworne Prince, wherefore for your abne welth you must now ayde your Prince, trustyng to punishe and chastise him to your great honour and fame.

All Frenchmen and Scottes imprisoned.

Then by commaundement were all Frenchmen and Scottes imprisoned, and the goods seized, and all such as were denizens were commaunded to shew their letters patents, and such as were allowed had all their goodes and the other not, and all Frenchmen and Scottes that had maryed Englishe women, the wyfes & children had halfe the goodes deliuered vnto them, and every denizen to finde suretie for his good abearyng, and all the other if they would be bayled to finde sureties for their truth and allegiaunce, or else to be kept in prison, for the portes were so kept that they could not flye.

The king nowe beyng entered into the warres, thought not to sleepe and let the French king alone, wherefore by his letters he commaunded certayne persons with their potwers to come to London in August. They that were appoynted came accordyngly, every man with such a number as to him was appoynted, and when they had mustered at London before the kinges Commissioners, they were nere .xiiij. thousand men with the Byoners, and they were sent to the Lorde Admirall which lay at Dover with foure thousand men, but because Harvest was not done, the bitaile at Calice was to little little for so great an armie, wherefore they lay in Kent at townes there a good space, which made bitaile dere there.

In this Sommer the Lorde Rosse, and the Lorde Dacres of the north which were appoynted to keepe the borders agaynst Scotland, did so valyantly, that they burned the good towne of Kelsey, and .lxxx. vilages and ouerthrew .xxiiij. towers of stone with all their Barnkyns or Bulwarkes.

The king also in this Moneth was credibly informed that the Duke of Albany prepared an army roiall of Scottes and Frenchmen to invade England. Wherefore the king appoynted the Erle of Shrewsbury his Lorde Steward to be his Lieutenaunt generall agaynst the sayde Duke and hys inuasions, which directed his letters to the Shyres of Yorke, Darby, Stafford, Shropshire, and all other beyonde Trent, that all men shoulde be in a readinesse.

The .xx. day of August, the Cardinall sent for the Maior, Aldermen, and the most substanciall Commoners of the Citie of London, where he declared to them that the king had appoynted Commissioners through the whole realme of England for to sweare every man of what value he is in moueables, the more to be in redinesse for the defence of this realme. And the king for the loue he beareth you, would haue sit with you himselfe, but for certayne other affayres in his warres to be done is letted, and so hath appoynted me your Commissioner. Wherefore in conuenient tyme certefie me the number of all such as be worth one hundred poundes and upward, to the intent I may sweare them of their values: for first the king asketh of you your louyng heartes and due obeysaunce, the which shall appere by your conformitie to his requestes, and when the value is taken, he desireth onely the tenth part of goodes and landes, which is the least reasonable thing that you can ayde your prince with. I think every one of you wil offer no lesse. As for the spiritualtie, every man is in the shires sworne, & shall and will gladly pay the fourth part to the king, and liue on the thre partes. Nowe to your part I am sure you will not grudge, therefore name me the men of substaunce, and for the meaner sort, meaner Commissioners shall be appoynted. Sir (said a Marchant) if it may please you, howe shall this tenth part to the king be deliuered, in money, plate, or Jewelles? the Cardinall sayde at a value. My Lord sayd the Aldermen, it is not yet two monethes sith the king had of the Citie .xx. M. pound in readie money in loane, whereby the Citie is very bare of money, for Gods sake remember this, that riche Marchantes in ware be bare of money: Well sayde the Cardinall, this must be done, and therefore go about it. So the Aldermen resorted to their Wardes, and named such as they iudged to be of that value, which came before the Cardinall, and moste hūbly besought him that they might not be sworne for the true value of their substaunce for the true valuation to them was vnknoone, and many honest mennes credence was better then his substaunce, and therefore they doubted the perill of periurpe. Well sayde the Cardinall, sith you dread the crime of periurpe, it is a signe of grace, and therefore I will for you borrow of the king a little. Make you your billes of your abone value, likely to report your fame, and then more businesse nedeth not: for you see what two costly armies the king hath ready agaynst both Franunce and Scotland, therefore nowe shewe your selues lyke louyng subiectes, for you be able ynough. And I date swere the substance of London is no lesse worth then two Millions of golde. Then sayde the Citizens, we would to God that it were so, and the Citie is sore appaired by the great occupieng of Straungers. Well sayde the Cardinall it shall be redressed if I live: But on Saterdag next I shall appoynt one to receyue your Billes, and he that is of credence moze then of substance, let him resoꝛt to me, and I will be secrete and good to him. Thus the Citizens departed in a great agony sayng, that at the last loane summe lent the fift part, and now to haue the tent part was to much. And here note well that the .xx. thousand poundes that was lent, was not taken as the .xx. of e- uery mans substance, but it should be allowed as part of the tenth part, and this baluatio should perfoꝛme by the whole tenth part. Great was y<sup>e</sup> mour- ning and mutinyng of the common people, as it is euer insuche cases of paymentes. But in the ende one Doctoꝛ Tommys, a Secretary to the Car- dinall, came to the Chapter house of Paules, & to him the Citizens brought in their Billes, and on their honestie they were receiued, which values after- ward turned them to displeasure.

The Spiritualltie made sute to the Lord Cardinall, that no Tempozal men should syt to examine them, to bee made priuie to their possessions and goddes: Wherefoꝛe Bishops and Abbots were appoynted Commissioners to take the value of their substance.

In this season was great plentie of bittaille sent to Calice, and to the Lorde Admirall were sent Centes, and Paullions, some of .lxx. lodgyngs foꝛ him and other noble men.

The Friday beyng the .xxij. day of August, certayne Welshmen were lodged at a poze village named Cause, because in Calice was verie narrow lodging, and the same night foure hundred frenchmen passed by Calice ha- uen foꝛ lack of good watche, and came into the same Willage, and set fyze in the house where the Welshemen lay, which ranne away naked into the ma- rishe and saued themselves, but their hozses were taken. Thys chaunce happened foꝛ lack of good watch.

The Lorde
Admirall
with a goodly company of souldiours entred into France.

When the Lorde Admirall had brought all his men out of the shippes, and that all the souldiours were come out of Englande, and the ordinaunce set on lande, then came into Calice haue. xiiij. shippes out of Spaine from the Emperour, which set on lande thye hundred Spanyardes, which were sent to serue the Lorde Admirall, and vnder him they were put. When all things were readie, the Lorde Admirall set in order his battayles, and foꝛ the foꝛwarde he appointed syꝛ Robert Ratclyffe Lorde Fitzwater, foꝛ Ca- pitayne, and with him dyuers knightes and gentlemen, which Capitayne kept his men in verie good order.

After that battayle followed the ordinaunce, artillerie and other trusses with bittayle and all necessaries, and foꝛ the Capitayne of the hozsemen was appointed syꝛ Edward Gylford, by whome the curreys and belwers of the Countrey were appointed. The middle warde led the Lorde Admirall him- selfe, and in his companie the Lord Edmond Harward his brother, with ma- ny worshipfull knightes, squires and tall yomen: The last battayle was led by two balvaunt knightes of the Garter, syꝛ Wylliam Sandes, and syꝛ Ri- chard Wyngfield, and with them was syꝛ Wycharde Jernyngham with many other. In good order of battayle they passed ouer Debonam brydge the .xxx.

day of August to a place called Calketwell, and there lodged betweene the wyndmill and the marrihe.

The same day came to the Lord Admirall a certayne number of wilde persons, as men out of seruiue and prentises that ran from their maysters and other ydle persons, and him desired that they might be retayued in the kings wages, to whom he answered that the king had appointed the num- ber of suche as should haue wages, which was fully complete, and aduised them to returne into England and not to loyter there. Then sayde a tall yo- man, my Lorde here be many good felowes, that with your fauour woulde ieopard to get oꝛ loose, foꝛ their minde is to be reuenged on the frenchmen, enemies to the king & his realme. Good felow sayd the Lord Admirall, theie mindes be good, but if foꝛ lack of conduyte they should be cast away, it were a losse to the king, and a great courage to the french men. Then all the com- pany cryed, let vs go in the name of God and saint George: then after coun- saile taken, he gaue them a Penon of saint George and bad them aduenture (of which they were called aduenturers) and farther bad them that if they got any bootie they should euer bzing it to the armie, and they should be payde to the vttermost, and then he gaue them money and commaunded them weapons and so the sayde .xxxj. daye, the sayde aduenturers foure hundred in number and mo, set foꝛward befoꝛe the hoste, but howe they did, you shall heare afterwarde.

Aduenturers.

Monday the first day of September the armie remoued toward Guis- nes, which day was verie hote and drinke lacked, and water was not nere, so that some dyed foꝛ faintnesse, and thys night they lay at Gysnes.

Tuesday the second day of September the armie passed toward Arde: And in the golden Waley where the king of Englande and the french king met two yeres befoꝛe, there met with the armie of England two Capitaines of the Burgonions, the one called the Erle of Egmond the Seneschal of Flenade, and the Lorde of Bauers Admirall of Flaunders with five hun- dred hozsemen, like men of warre. The Lorde Admirall in gentle maner receyued these two Capitaynes and their company, and so they loyued them- selues to the Englishe armie, and the same daye they tooke lodging at Arde south from the towne, where they were well bytayed, and there laye Wed- nesday all day, and the Burgonions lay vnder the Castell of Mountozrey. The next daye they remoued to the Wale of Lykes, and there encamped themselves. Sir George Cobham the same day with two thousand men, by the Admiralles commaundement came to the towne of Selloys, and set fyze in the towne, and when the towne was on fyze he assaulted the Castell. They within made resistance, but it auayled not, foꝛ the walles were entered and the souldiours taken, and the castell set on fyze, and with Gunnepowder o- uerthrew the walles: then with haste he remoued to a towne called Bzune brydge and set it on fyze, and also bzent a towne called Senckerke, and also the townes of Botpngham and Mansker, and so returned to the Lorde Ad- mirall which gaue him great thanks. The french men appered in plumpes, but yet they durst not rescue their townes.

On Saterdag the Lorde Admirall remoued with the whole armie to a ground beside saint Nerbyns, and there lay all Sunday, beyng the seventh day of September, where he sent diuers companies out, which foꝛaged the Countreys and brent manye Villages as farre as they might trauaile: the Lorde Admirall caused the towne of Harbyn to be brent, and tooke the Castell and rased it and btterly destroyed it.

On Monday the. viij. day, he remooued to Dauerne and brent all the townes as he passed, and lying there he brent the towne of Dauerne, and cast downe the Castell of Columberge, and the castell Rew, but the Churches of Dauerne and a house of Nonnes were saued by his commaundemēt.

The same daye was brent Saint Marie de Boys and all the countrey twelue Mile about was of light fire, the people fled and left townes and Castels full of wine, corne, and all other necessaries, so that in Dauerne the Englishemen founde great plentie, which oz they went away they set a fire.

The. ix. day of September the whole armie came before the towne of Boyardes in the which was a Church moze lyk a castell then a Church, for it was deepe dyched with drawe bridges and with Bulwarkes fortified and loyes very warlike. The Admirall beholding it sayde, this is like no house of prayer. Then he commaunded his people to enter the dyches, and pluck downe the drawe bridges, and set fyre in the Church, and with Gunpouder ouerthrew it, and brent the towne and all the vilages adiacent to the same, the people cryed and fled, well was he that might saue himselfe.

The. x. day they came to the towne of Waus, which was nighe the towne called Foucamberge, and there a company of Frenchmen were ascried, for out of a wood they shewed themselves, but they taried not long, but without profer of encounter they departed. Wherefore the whole armie tooke their campe, and there lay til the. xiiij. day which was Saterday, every day sending plumpes out to set fyre in the Country, and on that day they tooke the waye to Frynge oz Frynges, and there brent the towne and destroyed the Castell which was very strong.

The Sunday beyng the. xiiij. daye, the Lorde Admirall with his company in great rayne and yll weather passed by hilles and valeys verie painefully, and with great labor came to a towne called Blaniow, and there taried Monday all day, and there all daye counsayled the Capitaynes both of England and Flaunders oz Burgoyne, what was best to be done.

On Tuesday in the morning came a Trumpet from the Castell of Hedyng and desired to speake with the Capitayne, which incontinent sent for him: my Lorde Capitayne sayde the Trumpet, the Capitayne of Hedyng desireth you to come thether and see the place, and on the walles he will bring you good luck, and he prayeth you not to hurt the Dere in his Parke, and for any other hurt you can doe him he careth not: well sayde the Lorde Admirall, I will send him aunswere by my Trumpet. Incontinent he called a Trumpet, and bad him go to Hedyng to Mounfire de Bees, and to say to him that he will come to the Castell of Hedyng, and if he slaye any of my men with his artillerie, let him trust me, that if I get the Castell, I will saue neyther man, woman, nor childe. So with that message the Trumpet departed and declared it to Mounfire de Bees, which sayde that it was spoken of noble courage, and so the Trumpet returned, and the same daye the campe was remooued and the whole armie came about the Castell of Hedyng, at which time the towne of Hedyng was soze infect with pestilence, wherefore a generall commaundement was geuen, that no man should once come into into the towne, howbeit some of the Burgonions did set fire in the houses. When the siege was planted, the ordinaunce was verie light for the wayes were so deepe and the ground so wet, that the great ordinaunce could not be caried. This thing was well debated by the Lorde Admirall and the Capitaynes. After they had bene there a. xi. dayes, first they considered that the Castell could not be obtayned without great ordinaunce, which in no wise could then be caried, and also if they with the light ordinaunce shooting should spend all their powder and not get the Castell, then in them might be reckened great folly, and also they should be in great leopardie to passe without ordinaunce, and further the plague began soze in the armie, wherefore they determined to leaue the siege and returne. But whye they laye at the towne, they beate downe roffes, galleries, chimneis, and such other things as the light ordinaunce would beate downe, which soze defaced the beautie of the Castell. They also destroyed all the Dere in the Parke, which were salowe Dere, and left none for the Capitaine. The English men were clerely determined to haue assaulted the Castell, if the Burgonions would haue done the same: but they refused, which seyng the Englishemen left the assault alone: for though the English men had gotten it, it should haue bene deliuered to the Emperors by the treaty, for he claymed it as his inheritance, which caused the Englishemen to leaue the assault.

The cause whye the Castell was not assaulted.

And so the. xxij. daye of September they rered the siege and set themselves in good order of battayle and passed still onwarde, till they came to Dozlans, and brent the towne, and rased the castell, and from thence came to the good towne of Barrier and brent and spoyled the same. Thus he brent all the waye as he passed: and euer the weather was worse, and men fell sicke, wherefore the Burgonions and the Spaniardes returned into Flaunders about Betwyn.

The siege rayled.

Then the Lorde Admirall sawe that it was no time to keepe the fiede, turned backward in good order of battayle, and came to Calice the sixtene day of October. And while he lay at Calice he sent for William Sandes, Sir Horice Barkeley, for William Fitzwilliam with thre thousand men, which brent Marguison which was newly edified and fortified, they brent also the towne of saint Johnes Rhode and Temple towne, and many Villages. At thys boyage were taken many prisoners. xiiij. M. chepe. xiiij. C. great cartell, as Dren and Kyen, and. xiiij. hundred Hogges, and seuen. C. Mares and hozses, with thys great bootie thys crewe returned to Calice in safetie.

A great prey taken.

Then the Lorde Admirall sent for John Walop with. ii. hundred men to saint Omers to lye there and at Gupsnes, Hammes, and at Marke, and at Dy he left another number, and left Capitaynes to ouer see them, and all the Souldiours had a Monethes wages payde them, and so returned into Englande.

The aduenturers taried still and gat many good prayes, and brought to the garrisons, and lacked nothing: they were much drad of all the commo people, for of them they had great prayes, and daylie learned feates of warre which made them the bolder.

When the Lorde Admirall had set all things in an order on that side the sea, he toke ship and with the Nauy came into the ryuer of Thames, and so to the king, of whome he was well welcommed and not vnworthy.

Scottes banished the realme.

In thys season were banished out of Southwarke twelue Scottes, which had dwelt there a long season, and were conueyed from parithe to parithe by the Constable lyke men that had abured the realme, and on their vntermost garment a whyte Crosse befoze and another behinde them. Thus were they conueyed thzough London North warde, tyll they came to Scotlande.

Whyle the Lorde Admirall was thus in Fraunce destroyng the countrey, the noble Erle of Shrewsburie Lorde George Talbot, and Steward of the kings houtholde prepared by the kings commaundement a great armie towarde Scotland: for the king was enformed that Duke John of Albany (which in the parliament of Scotland was made Lorde gouernour of the realme, and of the yong king during his noneage) had rayled a mightie and puyssaunt hoste of Scottes, to the number of foure scoze thousand men, as after was well knowne, which were warlike appointed, and that he with fise hundred frenchmen with hand Gunnes and other great artillerie was coming forward to inuade the west marches of England adioynng toward Scotlande. Wherefoze the king sent worde to the Erle of Shrewsburie, which with all diligence like a noble Capitaine set forward towarde Porke, and wrote to the Erles of Northumberland, Westmerland and Darby, to the Lorde Dacres, Lumley, Clyfforde, Scrope, Latemer, Ogle, Darcy, Conyers, and to all other gentlemen, to be readie within eyght houres warnyng with all their powes, and so in tozning, he with his power which was great, came to the Citie of Porke abyding the ordinaunce and the Lordes, and all other things necessarie in such a case.

In the meane season, the Scottes were come nigh to the Citie of Carlisle & lodged them nigh the water of Esk, not farre from Sulway sandes, and there made their abode. The Erle of Westmerland, the lord Dacres, the Lorde Roos, the Lorde Mountaigle, with the knightes of Lancashire, Westmerland, and Cumberland, were readie with, xxviij. thousande men to haue geuen them battaile.

When the Scottes sawe that they could not enter into England without battaile, the Lordes of Scotland drew to counsaile, and amongst all one wise man sayde, my Lordes, hether we be come by the commaundement of my Lorde Gouernour the Duke of Albany, but for what cause the warre is we should knowe: you all remember that the last warre was to the realme of Scotlande much preiudiciall: for king James the fourth brought the realme of Scotlande to the best that euer it was: and by his warre it was brought to the worst almost that may be, for by that warre was he and his nobilitie slaine, which Scotland soze lamenteth: Wherefoze by mine aduice let vs go to the Duke, and knowe of him the cause. Then they all came to the Dukes Court, and the Erle of Arayn an auncient man spake for them all and sayde, my Lorde Gouernour, by your will and commaundement here is assembled almost all the Nobilitie of Scotland with their power upon a pretence to enter into England, my Lordes here would know the cause and quarell why this warre is begon, if it might please your goodnesse, it should well satisfie their mindes.

The Duke studyed a good while, and sayde: this question would haue bene

bene demaunded or nowe: for well you knowe that I for the very loue that I bere to the realme of Scotland, of the which I haue my name, honoz and linage. I haue passed the seas out of the noble realme of Fraunce into thys realme of Scotland. One great cause to bring you to a vniy when you were in deuision: By reason of which deuision your realme was likely to be conquered and destroyed. Also the french king by my suites and intercession will ioyne with you in ayde against the Englishe Nation: And when thys warre was determined in the Parliament, you made me Capitaine, authorisying me to inuade England with banner displayed: then was no question demaunded of the right or quarell, & that that I haue done is by your assent & agreement, and that I will iustifie: but to answer your demaund, me thinke that you haue iust cause to inuade England with fyze, sword, and blood, if you be not to forgetfull, and without you will beare dishonour and reproche for euer: For you knowe that this realme of Scotland is our inheritaunce as a porcion of the woorld allotted to our nacion and auncetors whome we succede: Then where may be better warre then to maintaine this our naturall inheritaunce: is not dayly sene the great inuasions that the Englishe men on vs make, the great manslaughter, and murders, with robberies, and spoyles that they doe dayly? Is not this a cause of warre? To defende the Countrey is the office of a king, the honour of noble men, and the very seruice of chualtrie, and the duetie naturall of the commonaltie. For I thinke it a iust quarell if we might conquer the realme of England and annex it to our realme and make a Monarchie: for sith the begynnyng of our habitation in this Isle of Briteyne, that nation and we haue bene enemyes, and vs they haue euer hated, and yet we haue withstood them till at the last battaile of Branston, where we bechaunce lost our souereigne Lorde, and many noble men, but that was by treason of his Lord Chamberleyn, and yet I thinke we wanne the field: which murther I thinke al we noble men ought to reuenge. Therefore I would that ye should couragiously aduance your seife in thys quarell to get honour and to be reuenged.

Then a sad man called the President of the counsaile sayde, my Lorde, fortune of warre is led by hym that all leadeth, and he striketh the stroke, we can worke no miracles, and here are the Lordes of Englande readye to encounter vs, and sulerly they will fight, for their power shal encrease daily and ours is at the hyst. And if God geue vs y victory as I trust he wil, yet haue we not wonne the field: for ready coming is the Lorde Talbot Erle of Shrewsbury so much dzed in Fraunce as you know well, with a great puyssaunt army, and there is no doubt but the king of Englande will send or bring an other army, yf we should chaunce to get the first battaile: if we get the second fielde that will not be without the losse of many nobles, by reason wherof the realm shalbe weaker. And if we be overcome how many shal be slaine God knoweth: They that fliee ar worthy to be reputed as traytors to the king and so by wilfulnesse and foolish hardinesse the realme shal be in ioperdy to be vndone, and I say while the king is within age, we ought to moue no warre, sith by warre we may bring him to destruction. Alas sayde the Duke here is all the puyssaunce of Scotlande: if we retourne we shall encourage our enemies, and the realme of Scotlande shal euer be rebuked and defamed. All this communication in counsaile was wrytten by one for

The answer of the Duke of Albany.

Another Priest and Scot and Secretary to the Queene of Scotz, which was a Secretary there in the host at that time, to a Scottishe Priest that dwelt in London: and farther he wrote that the Scottishe king did much for the French kings pleasure to draw the Lords of England with their powers toward the parte and to put the king of Englande to charges, so that he should not invade France.

After this communication, the Queene of Scottes which doubted the sequelle of this matter, sent worde to the Duke, and him required to common of a peace with the warden of the English Marches, which sent an Herald to the Lorde Daker then warden of the west Marches, the Lorde Daker agreed, and upon hostages went to the Duke of Albany into his campe, where the Queene of Scottes by that tyme was come, and so there was an abstinence of warre taken for a season: and in the meane tyme the Duke and the Queene promised to send Ambassadors to the king of England to conclude a peace: And thus the Scottes returned into their houses. This truce was taken the .xi. day of September betwene Englande and Scotland, this .xiii. yere of the king. The Erle of Shrewsbury hearing of the truce by the Lorde Dacres letters, returned with all his companie, so that he had not gone forward on the Scottes. In this season the Commissioners fate for the loane of the tenth part of euery mans substance in euery shire, the people were sworne and some aduanced themselves more then they were worth of pride, not remembryng what was comyng, and the Commissioners did what they coude to set the people to the bittermost, which after ward turned the people to much heauinesse, and by reason of this great summes of money were leuyed, but the most part were not content, because the loane was so sodainly payed. But vnder the value of .v. pound no man lent a peny.

The warre thus continuynge betwene the French king and the king of England, there was a valiaunt Capitaine Constable of the Castell of Hammes vnder the Lord Mountioy called sir Richard Whethill, the Frenchmen him so much hated, that they deuised a pollicye to take him, and so on Christmasse day at night there issued out of Bulleyn two hundred horsemen, and three hundred footemen, and so much they traueled that altogether were come to a place where Hoppes grew, nere Hammes Castell called Catwal. When they were come thether, they kept themselves couert, and in the meynyng they brake by the Turne pyke by Saint Gertrudes: Then sent they into Hammes Marche .ii. or .x. footemen to take Cattell. In the Castell the alarme rang, but the embullement kept them still close: The Constable perceyued what the alarme ment, and armed him, and so did his archers and tooke his horse, and three Gentlemen went on foote by him. The Frenchmen of purpose driued the Cattell here and there, as though it would not be driuen, sir Richard Whithill pursued them. When the driuers sawe him, they drewe the Cattell into a great fielde: then were the bullement of horsemen and footemen betwene them and Saint Gertrudes, and they sodainly brake out on them, and the three Gentlemen on foote fought valiantly, but they were slaine, the knight alighted and fought on foote manfully, but he was borne downe with Pykes, and sore wounded, and so was compelled to yelde himselfe prisoner: by that tyme were .xxx. archers come out of the Castell, and when they sawe the great number of the Frenchmen, then they knewe that that their Capitaine was betrayed, and so returned.

About this time the Duke of Albany sailed out of Scotlande into France, and the French king so much fauored hym, that as it was shewed to the king of England for truth, that when the French king road through Paris he roade on the one hand and Richard de la Polle a Traytor to England and by parliament attaynted on the other hande, and that the Duke had asked of the French king five thousand horsemen and ten thousand Almaynes, and that he had promised the French king that if he had those .xv. thousand men, he woulde doe one of these thre things, eyther slay the king of England in battayle, or else take him prisoner, or else driue him out of his realme. These were shamefull bragges of a noble man and very foolish.

We haue heard befoze how truce was taken by the Duke of Albany and the Lorde Dacres for a season betwene Englande and Scotland, and that Ambassadors should be sent to the king of England, so it was that in October according to their accustomed doublenesse they sent thre personages of small behauior as it seemed, as Ambassadors from Scotlande: they were smally regarded and shortly departed. There commission was to know whether the same tyme or abstinence of warre was by the king assented to or not, and other Commission had they none. Thus they ment craftily as you may perceyue, for in such troublous tyme they may steale unpunished, which they may not do in tyme of peace. Wherefoze the king to be sure of them sent for Henry the sixt Erle of Northumberland, and him made warden of the whole Marches, which thankfully accepted the same, and so departed Lorde warden. But howsoeuer it happened he made suite to the king and his Counsaill and neuer left, till he was discharged of the same, & then the Erle of Surrey Lorde Admirall of England was made general warden, and the Lord Marques Dorset was made warden of the East Marches and middle, and the Lorde Dacres of the West Marches: which three Lordes spedde them thether the sixt day of Marche for the defence of the Borders. For refusyng of this office the Erle of Northumberland was not regarded of his abone Tennantes, which disdeyned him and his blood, and much lamented his folye, all men esteemed him without heart, or loue of honour and chualrie.

The king out of hand sent Commissioners to gather the loane, this was called the practisyng of the loane, which sore emptied mens purses. In the same moneth were musters taken throught the realme, and euery man commaunded to be readie within a dayes warnyng to do the king seruice in harnesse, which caused euery man of honestie to by harnesse and weapon.

The Lorde Marques Dorset warden of the East Marches betwene England and Scotland, accompanied with sir William Bulmer, and sir Arthur Barcie, and many other noble men, the second day of Aprill, then beyng there Thursday, entred into Cuedale, and so ten myle into Galoway, and bent on euery syde townes and billages, and the Scottes in great number shewed themselves on the hilles, and did not approch, and so he all that night layed in the Scottishe ground, and on good Fryday returned with their boty which was foure thousand head of nere into England, when they had bent Crymslay, Howhouse, Dufford mylles Akeforth, Crowlyng, Howes maner, Widdor Crowlyng, Harbottell, Low Bog, Sefforth Maner, Widdor rigge, Wimsed, Broket, Shalwes Haruel, wide open Haught, and other townes

The .xx. day of Aprill began a Parliament at the blacke Friers in London, and that day the masse of the holy ghost was song, all the Lordes beyng present in their Parliament robes. And when Masse was finished the king came into the Parliament Chamber and there sate downe in the seate royal or thron, and at his secte on the right syde sat the Cardinall of Porke, and the Archbishop of Cauntorbury, and at the raile behinde stood Doctor Tunstall Bishop of London, which made to the whole parliament an eloquent oratio, declaring to the people the office of a king. First he must be a man of iudgement, according to the sayng of prophet David Deus iudicium tuum regi da. &c. Also he must be a man of great learning, according to the sayng of the prophete. Erudimini qui iudicatis terram. According to which saynges, he sayde that God had sent vs a prince of great iudgement, of great learning, & great experience, which according to his princely dutie forgat not to studie to sette forward all thinges which might be profitable to his people and Realme, least there might be layde to his charge the sayng of Seneca. Es rex & non habes tempus esse rex? Art thou a king and hast no tyme to be a king? which is asmuch to say, as art thou a king, and doest nothing profitable to thy people? Art thou a king and seest the people haue an insufficient lawe? Art thou a king and wilt not prouide remedie for the mischief of thy people? These things haue moued the kinges highnesse to call this his high Court of Parliament both for the remedie of mischies which be in the common lawe, as recoueryes, foraine vouchers, and corrupt tryals. And for making and ordering of newe estatutes which may be to the highe aduancement of the common wealth, wherefore he willeth the Commons to repayre to the common house, and there to elect them a speaker, or their common mouth, and to certifie the Lorde Chaunceloz of the same, which should thereof make report to the kinges most noble grace, which should declare his pleasure when he would haue him presented befoze his person. This was the cause of the parliament he sayd, but surely of these things no word was spoken in the whole Parliament, and in effect no good act made, except the graunt of a great subsidie were one, but according to this instruction the Commons departed to the common house, and chose for their speaker Sir Thomas Mooze knight and presented him the Saterday after in the Parliament Chamber, where he according to the old vsage disabled himselfe both in witte, learning, and discretion, to speake befoze the king, and brought in for his purpose how one Phormio desyred Hanniball to come to his readyng, which thereto assented, and when Hanniball was come, he began to reade, dere militari, that is of Chivalrie: when Hannibal perceyued him, he called him arrogant foole, because he woulde presume to teache him which was maister of Chivalrie, in the feates of warre. So the speaker sayde, if he should speake befoze the king of learning, and ordering of a common welth and suche other lyke, the king beyng so well learned, and of such prudence and experience, might say to him as Hanniball sayd to Phormio. Wherefore, he desired his grace that the commons might choose them another speaker: the Cardinall answered, that the king knewe his wit, learning and discretion, by long experience in his seruice: wherefore he thought that the commons had chosen him as the most meetest of all, and so he did admit him. the king his most humble thankes, and despyed of him two petitions: the one if he should be sent from the Commons to the king on message, and mistake their entent, that he might with the kinges pleasure resort agayne to the Commons, for the knowledge of theyr true meanyng: the other was, if in communication and reasonyng any man in the common house should speake moze largely then of dutie he ought to do, that all such offences should be pardoned, and that to be entered of record, which two petitions were graunted, and so thus began the Parliament and continued as you shall here.

Because an euill chaunce happened to the great rebuke of all Christen Princes, I entend briefly to declare the same miserable chaunce. In the beginning of this yere Sultan Solymann called the great Turke, which was but the .viij. of the ligne of Ottoman, the first that tooke vpon him to be a great Capitaine or ruler. And to whome Sultan Solymann his father had lost the Emperres of Constantinople, Trapesonde, Alexandry, and Babilon, with many diuers kingdomes and realmes: which Sultan Solymann the yere befoze had gotten the towne of Belgrado beyng the key of Hungary. Because he sawe all the great Princes in Christendome nowe at discord, thought it most for his honoz and profite to make warre on the Isle of the Rhodes, and to take the same, which Isle had bene kept by the space of two hundred .xiiij. yeres by the brethren or knightes of the order of Saint Iohnes of Jerusalem. Diuers thinges moued him to take this enterprize. One was because this Isle stode so that the religious of the same oftentimes tooke and destroyed his shippes as they came with golde and other riches from Egypt, Sirie and other y Cast parties to Constantinople, so that by them of that Isle he sustayned moze hurt then by all Christendome, because the sayd Isle stood in the entry toward Constantinople. Another motion was, because his father when he dyed charged him to assay to take the Rhodes for to be reuenged of the shame that they had done to his graundfather Mahomet the great Turke which was with dishonour beaten from the siege of the Rhodes. But the greatest occasion of all was, the exhortation of a great Counsaylor of the religion called Andrew Admirall borne in Portugale, which knewe the whole estate and in what case the towne stode in: The cause why this Andrew Admirall bare malice to his religion, was because after the death of Frier Fabrica de Laretto Lorde, maister of their religion, he was not elected to that honour, but one Philip de Wyllyars de Lille Adain of Fraunce was named to be Lord Mayster, wherefore the sayd Andrew prouoked the Turke to come to the Rhodes.

The great Turke seyng so great an occasion offered and desiring honoz and also knowing the fortreffe of the Rhodes to lacke munitions (for surely the brethren of the sayd order were both of such welth and pride, and also luyed after such an vngodly and vngodly fashion, that they neyther tooke heede of their vow and solempne Professon, nor also did foresee the thing to come, so that the great wealth of them, and their euill liuing blinded them that they thought the Turke durst not once attempt to set on their gariso, and so they being eleuate in this poynnt of pride, left their towne vnfurnished and were sodaynly surprysed (as you shall heere) wherefore the sayde Turke couertly prouided for thre hundred sayle, in the which he caryed all his artillery and all other thinges necessary: in the which army were .lx. thousande

Myner and Byoners prepared for the only intent to digge and mine: al the rest of the armye of the Turke came by lande to a place called Fisco, which standeth so dyrectly agaynst the Rhodes, that a syer may be seene from the one side to the other, from which place the Turke sent letters to the aboue named Phillipe de Vylliers Lord Maister of the sayde religion, signifying to hym that he woulde haue the sayde Isle for the great damage that they had done to him and to his people, and if they woulde yelde to him the sayd Isle, he promised on his sayth and by Mahomet his first Phrophet, they should haue no dammage nor hurt by him, and that they that would depart should goe in safetie, and they that would tary and serue him should haue good wages, and if they refused this to doe, he sware that he wou'd subuert the walles of their fortreffe and destroye them all and make them slaues, which letter was dated at Constantinople the fyrst day of June. The sayde Lorde Maister and his company were greatly abashed of this letter, but yet like hardy Gentlemen they intended to defende them, and made all the preparations that they could do in so short a space, and wrote to al Princes chris- ten of their neede and distresse. But the Turke like a wily serpent knowing the great deuision amongst the Christen Princes, so that he knew that they could send no succors to the Rhodes, sent two hundred. M. Turkes which arriued in the Isle of the Rhodes on Midsummer day which was the feastfull day of the Rhodians in honoz of saint John Baptist, which sodaine comming soze abashed the Rhodyans being but sixe hundred knights and .v. M. other meete to beare armes: yet of noble courage and trusting in God, they deter- mined to defend the enemies of God, and the .xxviii. daye of July the Turke arriued there in his owne person, which much encouraged his people.

When the Turke was arriued, he bent his ordinance toward the towne and did no great harme, when he saw that the walles were of that defence that ordinance did litle harme, he caused ail his Byoners to cast yearth one banke ouer another styl, tyll they came within a bowshot of the wall. And although that many of the pyoners were slayne with ordinance of the towne they neuer ceased till they had made a banke of yerth higher by ten foote then the wall of the towne, and they there laide their ordinance, so that no person durst stirre on the walles or Bulworckes, & thus with mountaynes of earth was the towne environed, and behinde the mountaynes laye the Bassaus and chiefe Capitaines of the Turke which were ever ready to take their ad- uantage, and dayly did shote into the towne and bet downe houses, and slew the people in the streates, for they vpon this mount might easily see into the towne. Beside this, the Turke caused so many mynes to be made in diuers places, that they within, were not able to make countermynes for lacke of people, in so muche as women were set at worke to digge and carpe, by reason whereof a great part of the walles were ouerthrowne. And if they within had not made countermynes, the towne had bene gotten within a short space. Also the Turkes in September gaue to the Rhodyans foure great assaultes like valiaunt warriors, but the Christen men within, so vali- antly defended them, that at every assault they lost at the least two thousand men, and at the fourth assault they lost ten thousand Turkes and more.

The great Turke seyng the losse of his men at the assaultes, sent for Mustaphaph Basshaw, through whose counsaile he toke on him this enter- pryce and much blamed him that he made him beleue that he might haue the towne towne within .xii. dayes or in a moneth at the most, wherfore in that furye he woulde haue put him to death, if the other Basshawes had not intreated for hym: but in conclusion the Turke determined clerely to raise his siege and to depart, and so had done if that same night syr Andrewe Admyrall that you haue heard of befoze and a Jew being within the Rhodes had not writ- ten letters and shot them out on quarrels into the Turkes army. By which letters the Turkes knew the necessitie of the towne and feblenesse of the people, which caused him to chaunge his purpose. But this treason was es- spied, and the Traytors taken and put to terrible execution, and the Turke caused so many mynes to be made, that although some tooke none effect, yet by some he ouerthrew both bulwarckes, walles and towers, so that he might enter into the towne: and so on saint Andrewes euen he caused a great as- sault to be geuen, which was very fierce, but yet the Christen men so baly- auntly defended them that they slew thre thousand Turkes and mo, and kept them from entring that day, but the Citizens of the Rhodes after this assault came to the Lorde Maister, and prayed him to haue compassion of them, their wyfes and children, and shewed him that if the towne were taken by assault (as it was like to be) that they all should be cruelly murdered, the Lorde Maister much regarded his honoz, and comforted the people with sayre words, but by chaunce about the same time the great Turke sent a letter into the Rhodes, willing them to deliuer the towne, and they al should haue their liues and goodes, and they that would tary should tary in quiet, and they that woulde depart, should safely depart.

When this letter was knobone, then the people cryed out on the Lorde Maister, to take the offer, wherfore he calling all hys counsaile together, seyng that it was not possible to keepe the towne longer, both for lack of ar- tillarie and bittayle, and also because his number was so minished, that scarce he had Souldiours to keepe the walles: wherfore he by great aduise de- termined to take the Turkes offer, and so sent to hym two of hys religion, for the farther conclusion and assurance of the same, which wel entertayned them, and had wrytings sealed of all thinges that they desired, to which two knightes. And so on Christmas daye, the great Turke him selfe entered into the Rhodes, and tooke possession thereof, and the Lorde Maister and all his religion, the first day of January tooke ship and sayled to Candy, and so in conclusion came to Rome, and there declared hys chaunce and aduventure. Thus was the towne and the Isle of the Rhodes taken by the great Turke, which was a great succour to all chyztian men, resorting into the East parts of the worlde, which chaunce was much lamented thozow all chyztendome, and muche blame put in all Princes, because they sent no succour nor ayde to the Isle.

And thys yere the Bishop of Duresme died, and the king gaue the sayd Bishoprike to the Cardinall, and he resigned the Bishoprike of Bathe, to Doctor John Clerke maister of the Rolles, and he made syr Henry Har- ney his Vicechamberleyn Lorde priuie seale, and after created him Lorde Harney. Cardinall

The Court
Legation.

Cardinall of Poike beyng Legate, proued Testaments, and did call befoze him all the executozs & administrators of euery Dioces within the realme, so that the Bishops and ordinaries, did prouue no great willes in their Dioces, except he were compounded with, not to their little disauantage. Also by his power Legantine he gaue awaye all the yerely profites of benefices beloning to spirituall persons, by the which doing, he not onely had the hatred of the spiritualty, but also he ranne into the daunger of the Heremite, which he soze after repented, as it shall appere in the .xxj. yere of this king.

The Cardinalls oration.

The Parliament beyng begon, as you haue heard befoze reherfed, the Cardinall accompanied with dyuers Lordes, as well of the spiritualtie, as of the tempozaltie, came the .xxix. day of Aprill into the common house, where he eloquently declared to the commons, how the French king Fraunces, the first, called the most christened king, had so often times broken promise with the king of Englande, and his welbeloued Nephew Charles the Emperoz, that the king of his honor could no longer suffer. For first he declared, that the meeting of the sayde two princes at Gupnes, the sayd French king was sworne, to kepe all the articles conteyned in the tripartie league, made betwene him, the Emperour, and the king of Englande sithe the which time, he hath made warre on the Emperours dominions, by Robert de la Marth his Capitaine. He also hath withholden the tributes and other paymentes, whiche he should pay to the king of Englande, for redemption of Courmay and Terwin, and not with this content, hath not alonely robbed and spoyled the kings subiectes, but also hath sent John Duke of Albany into Scotland to make warre and to invade thys realme, wherefoze the king of necessitie, was driuen to warre and defence, which in no wise could be maynteyned, without great summes of money, and he thought no lesse then eyght hundred thousand pounde, to be raysed of the fift part of euery mans goodes and landes, that is to say foure shillings of euery pounde, for he sayde that the yere following, the king and the Emperour should make such warre in France, as hath not bene sene.

The De-
maunde.

A great sub-
stanc.

After that he had declared his matter at length, exhorting the commons to ayde their prince, in time of necessitie, he departed out of the common house. The morrowe after, sye Thomas More beyng speaker, declared all the Cardinalls oration agayne to the commons, and enforced his demaund strongly, sayng: that of duetie men ought not to denie to pay foure shillings of the pound. But for all that, it was denied and proued manifestly, that if the fift part of substance of the realme, were but eyght hundred thousand pound, and if men should pay to the king the fift part of their goodes, in money or plate it was proued, that there was not so much money out of the kings handes, in all the realme, for the fift part of euery mans goodes, is not in money nor plate: For although five men were well monied, five thousand were not so, the Gentlemen of landes, hath not the fift part of the value in coyne: the Marchaunt that is riche of Silke, Wolle, Tynne, Cloth, and such Marchaundise, hath not the fift part in money, the husbände man is riche in corne and cattle, yet he lacketh of that somme. Like wise viaylers and al other artificers, be rich in household stufte, and not in money: and then consequently, if all the money were brought to the kings handes, then men must barter cloth for vittayle, and bread for cheese, and so one thing for another:

A Graunge

ther: then consider that after this valuation, the king hath had by the waye of loane two shillings of the pound, which is foure hundred thousand pound, and now to haue foure shillings of the pound, which amounteth in the whole twelue hundred thousand pound, which first and last is sixe shillings of the pounde, which is almost the thirde part of euery mans goods, which in coyne cannot be had within this realme, for the prooffe whereof was alleged, that if there were in Englande, but fiftene thousand parishes, and euery parish should geue a hundred Marke, that were but fiftene hundred thousande Marke, which is but ten hundred thousand pound, and how many parishes be in England one with another, able to spare a hundred Markes, out of Cities and townes: and where it is wrytten, that in Englande there be .xl. thousand parish Churches, it was proued that there were not .xiiij. M. parish Churches at this day. Then accompt the whole somme cannot amount aboue ten hundred thousand pound, and the king demaundeth eyght hundred thousand, and he according to this valuation, hath had foure hundred thousand pound, therfoze it was thought, the somme was impossible to be leuied, and if all the coyne were in the kings handes, how should men lyue: Also the king had of the spirituall men the last yere, foure shillings of the pound.

After long reasoning there were certaine appointed, to declare the impossibite of this demaunde to the Cardinall, which according to their commission, declared to him substantially the pouerty & scarcenesse of the realme: all which reasons and demonstrations, he little regarded, and then the sayde persons most meekely beseeched his grace, to moue the kings highnesse, to be content with a moze easier somme, to the which he curiously answered, that he would rather haue his tongue plucked out of his head with a payze of pinsons, then to moue the king to take anye lesse somme: with which answer, they almost dismayed, came and made report to the common house, where euery day was reasoning, but nothing concluded.

Wherefoze the Cardinall came againe to the common house and desired to be reasoned withall, to whom it was answered, that the fashien of the newer house was, to heare and not to reason, but among themselues. Then he shewed the realme to be of great ryches, first because the kinges customes were greater nowe, then they were befoze time: also he alleged sumptuous buydings, plate, riche apparell, of men, women, children, and seruantes, fat feastes, and delicate dishes, which things were all tokens of great abundance: with which repeting of mens substance, as though he had repined or disdayned, that any man should fare well, or be well clothed but hymselfe, the commons greatly grudged. And when he was departed out of the house, it was proued, that honest apparell of the commodities of this realme, abundance of plate, and honest viandes, were profitable to the realme, and not prodigall. After long debating, the commons concluded to graunt two shillings of the pounde, of euery mans landes or goods, that was worth twentie pound, or might dispend twentie pound to be taken for the king and so backwarde of euery twentie shillings, two shillings, and from .xl. shillings to twentie pound, of euery twentie shillings, twelue pence, and vnder .xl. shillings of euery head. .xvi. yeres and backward foure pence, to be payde in two yeres. This graunt was reported to the Cardinall, which therewith was soze discontent, and sayde, that the Lordes had graunted foure shillings of the pound, which was prooued bntreue, for in deede they had graunted nothing, but harkened all vpon the commons.

I framke ofter of a Gentlem.

Then a knight called sye John Hullye of Lincolneshire, sayde, to please the Cardinall somewhat, let vs gentlemen of fiftie pounce lande and bp-wardes, geue to the king of our landes twelue pence of the pounce, to be payde in threere yere: with which motion diuers gentlemen were sore discontent. And when the question was asked, ten or twelue of the Gentlemen said yea, and when the nay should be asked, the commons sayd nothyng, for they would not condempne, nor let the Gentlemen to charge themselves, and so by ten or twelue persons, the gentlemen were burdened, with twelue pence more then other, for the which graunt, sye John Hullye had much euill will.

After thys graunt made, the .xxi. day of May, because of Whitsontyde, the Parliament was prorooged to the tenth daye of June: Durynge which proroogation, the common people sayde to the Burgesses, Sirs, we heare say you will graunt foure shillings of the pound, we aduise you to doe so that you may go home, with many euill wordes and threathings.

And in this season, the Cardinall by his pover Legantine, dissolved the Conuocation at Paules, called by the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and called him and all the clergy, to his Conuocation to Westminster, which was nener sene befoze in England, wherof maister Skeltona mery Poet wrote.

Skelton.

Gentle Paule lay doovne thy Svveard:

For Peter of V Westminster hath shauen thy Beard.

When the parliament was begunne againe, the landed men of fiftie pounce and bpwarde, seying that they were charged, with twelue pence of euery pounce of their landes, moued that all such as were worth fiftie pounce in goods and bpwarde, should pay also twelue pence of the pounce, in the fourth yere. At the which motion was much reasoning, and at the last the .xxiiij. daye of June, the question was asked, and doubtfull it was, whether the yea or nay were most, then was the house deuided, and all the commons seuered themselves, from the knightes of the Shires, so that one yea part remayned onely in the knightes of the Shire, and the commons stiffely affirmed that the motioners of thys demaunde, were enemies to the realme. At the last the Speaker called them altogether, and after long persuading, and priuie labouring of friendes, it was agreed that twelue pence of the pounce should be payde the fourth yere, of fiftie pounce in goodes.

I hard triall

After this the Parliament the .xxxi. day of July, was adioyned to Westminster, and there continued till the .xiiij. day of August, and that day at .iiij.
of the clock in the night dissolved. Durynge the time of this Parliament the .xxiiij. daye of Aprill, was sye Arthur Plantagenet, Bastarde sonne to king Edward the fourth, at Bridewell created Viscount Lisle, in the right of his wyfe, which was wyfe to Edmond Dudley beheaded.

Christian king of Denmarke.

This yere Chyrtierne king of Denmarke with hys wyfe, which was sister to the Emperour Charles, and his threere children, with .xxiiij. shippes arrived in Flaunders, cleane banished out of his realmes and dominions, by hys Uncle Frederick Duke of Holst, and hys awne subiectes, for his cruel-tie as is wozitten. Which Chyrtierne with his wyfe, was well entertained of the Duches of Sauoy, and a pencion assigned to him to live on, in Brabant and Holland, During the time of his there soioynyng, he made much sute to come come into England, to see and speake with the king, which request was to him graunted, and so he and hys Queene, with foure Gentlewomen, and a trayne of fourtie persons, poze and euill appareled, landed at Douer the .xv.

day of June, where he was nobly receyued, by the Erle of Deuonshire, and the Byschops of Excester, and Rochester, and dyuers knightes and Esqui-ers, and so brought to Grenewiche: where the king and Queene, standing bnder their clothes of estate, receyued them into the great hall of Grenewiche. And he dyed with the king, and she with the Queene, both set bnder the cloth of estate, and were sumptuously serued of all delicate viands.

*The king of Denmarke
comming into England.*

And when he had soioyned there a season, euery daye feasted at the Court, he was conueyghed to London, and lodged at Bathe place, where he hearyng of the watch in London, on saint Peters euen, desired to see it, and so was accompanied with the Duke of Suffolke, the Erles of Orford, Essex and Kent, and dyuers other Lordes and Ladies, and brought into the kings head in Chepe, where the Citie of London made to him and hys wyfe a costly banquet. And when he had sene the watch, he sayd, I would to God
I had so many archers, Pikes, and Halberders, as I sawe this night, then I trust I would punishe suche, as haue wrongfully dispossessed me, of my realme and Country. And after he had solaced himselfe in London, he resoz-ted to the king, of whome he had many great giftes, and likewise had hys wyfe of the Queene her Aunt, and so tooke their leaue, and were conueyed to Douer. And when he had bene in England. .xxij. dayes, he toke shipping, and sayled agayne into Flaunders, prayeing much the king of Englande and hys Court.

*The king of Denmarke
commendeth
the watch of London.*

Durynge all thys season, and session of the Parliament, the warre was fierce, both betweene England and Fraunce, and England and Scotland, in so much that eche part, did as much as in them lay, to hurt the other. For on the borders of Scotland lay the valyaunt Erle of Surrey, great Admi-rall of Englande, and the Marques Dorset, and hys threere brethren, Sye Wylliam Compton, and sir William Kyngston, with dyuers other knightes and Esquiers, sent to them by the king, which daylie invaded the realme of Scotlande, and threere downe the Castell of Wedorberne, the Castell of West Hefgate, the Castell of Blakkater, the Tower of Mackewalles, the tower of East Hefgate, and many other, and brent to the number of .xxiiij.
villages, and haried the Countrey from the East Marches to the West, and nener had skirmishe: but they oftentimes shewed themselves in plumges, wayting their auantage, howbeit in all thys ioynyng were fewe Englishe men lost. Wherefore the Lordes perceyuing that the Scottes entended not to make any armie into England, fortified the frontiers on euery part, with men and all things necessarie for defence, for stealing or other small rodes.
After all which things set in a perfitenesse, they returned toward the king, and came to the ende of the Parliament.

*Scotland
and spoiled.*

In this season, the Frenchmen hauing a great desire, to haue the kings towne of Calice, deuised first to destroy the haven, by the which they supposed, that Calice might haue bene lightly gotten, for fault of rescue. Wherebpon they laded an olde Ship of foure hundred Tonne, with great Canes stone, in the port of Deepe, which Ship had no Mast, but came with a fore-sayle, as though the mast had bene cut, and cast ouer the boord in the sea in a tempest.

*I this tonke
with: one in a tempest. And when shee came befoze Calice, euerye man that sawe her, thought she had bene weather driuen, and lost her mast by tempest, and so about ten of the clock at night the .xxiii. day of May, the sayde Ship came befoze Calice haven, as though she would enter for harborow, and so was enterpnyng and missed the Chanell, and turned to the sandes, towarde Rife banke, and the Frenchmen supposyng that they had bene in the very chanell, launched out their Boate, and sodainly set the ship on fire, and lept into their Boate and so scaped by the thoze. When they of Calice sawe the fire, they were soze troubled, and at the last when the water was gone, they perceyued the Shippe consumed, and the goodly Cane stone lyng whole.

Wherefoze the Lorde Barnes Deputie of Calice, the Lorde Barkley Lieutenaunt of the Castell, the Lorde Sandes Treasorer of Calice, and other commaunded all the laborers that might be gotten, to breake the remnant of the Ship, and to carie awaye the stone, and so the sayde stone was brought to Calice: whereupon the sayde Capitaynes sent a letter, to the Capitaine of Bullepyne, by Calice pursuaunt at armes, desiring him to geue thanks, to Mounsie Lodowyke Capitayne of Deepe, for the sendyng of so fayre a Ship, and goodly stone to Calice, which stone the sayde Lordes sent word, they had receyued into the towne of Calice, and that it did them much profite, for the fortification of the sayde towne, desiring him to send moze, and they would receyue it on the same price. To the which letter, the Capitayne of Bullepyne answered, I haue nothing lost, nor they haue nothing gotten of me, tell him that hath lost, with which answer the Pursuaunt departed. Whereupon the Englishmen beyng greued, there issued out of Calice an hundred light men of warre, called auenturers, and came neere Bullepyne, and obteyned a great bootie, whereof the garrison of Bullepyne beyng aduertised, issued out and folowed the Englishmen, and sharply them encountered. The Englishmen shot so, that the French men which were five hundred, lighted and fought soze, so that as it appered evidently, that there were dead on the ground .xlvi. Frenchmen, and .xxij. Englishe men, and the Frenchmen tooke twentie Englishe men prisoners, the residue of the Englishe men kept them together, and so came to Calice, the Capitayne of thys enterpryse was one Latheberie.

The Lorde Sandes Treasorer of Calice, entending to be reuenged on the Frenchmen, called the Counsaile of Calice to hym, and declared to them how the Frenchmen, and in especiall Mounsie de Bees Capitaine of Bullepyne, dayly imagined to destroy the English pale, and that they on the English part, had nothing done yet against them, wherefoze he aduiscd them all to do some acte, and he himselfe would be present, and foremost man. Whereupon it was concluded and commaunded, that euery man shoulde be in a readynesse, at the sounding of a Trumpet, upon which warning, the sayde Lorde Sandes the ninth day of July early in the morning, sent forth two hundred light horses, through the English pale, to stoppe the people from goyng, the one toward the other, least his enterpryse shoulde be ascried, and so the people were kept in all that daye, and in the evening about seauen of the clocke, he himselfe with a Capitayne called Guyot, Thomas Palmer, Ripton, Rafe Broke and other, set forward with light ordinaunce and bitayle, and embattayled themselves in good aray, and marched toward Sandifield

by a .vi. of the clock, and there refreshed them selues, and in good order, they came to the water of Slaukes, not far from Bullepyne, which was the tenth day of July.

When they were ascryped a larme was rung all the country, and the Capitaine of Bullepyne sent forth .lxx. men of Armes, and foure hundred footemen with morrice pykes, Crosbowes, and hand gunnes, wherfoze capitaine Guyot was sent with his bande of horsemen, to ayde the English footemen, which were farre behinde, and Capitaine Ripton, was appoynted to fight with the Frenchmen, and sir Thomas Palmer, and Rafe Broke, with the remnaunt of the horsemen, stode for a stalle. Then Capitaine Ripton profered forward with the speres of Calice, and the Frenchmen came on valiantly, then began a soze skirmishe, the Frenchmen both horsemen and footemen, defended the passage at the water of Slaukes, which is but a gut made by force of land water, but after long fight the Englishmen gat ouer the water by pure force, and tooke the Frenchmens Standard, and a Gentleman which was a man of armes of Bullepyne, called Charles de Maruiele, and euer Sir Thomas Palmer and Rafe Broke, stode and ayded where necessitie was most. Thus this skirmishe continued from foure of the clocke in the morning, till nine of the clocke, befoze noone, and euer the Frenchmen increased, but at the last they retreated themselves toward Bullepyne, in which retourne diuers of them were slaine. Or the skirmishe was ended, came the Lorde Sandes with the footemen, with his speare on his thigh, and his helme on his head, and greatly encouraged his company: during which conflict, diuers of Marcardye had gathered them together, and had taken the church of Odirsaell, which was well fortified, and a strong place: whereof the Lord Sandes beyng aduertised, he marched thetherward, and in the way burned all that might be brent, and sent an officer at armes, to them that kept the church of Odirsaell, to yelde the church to hym, which to hym answered that they would stand at defence: then he commaunded an assault, which quickly was done, and the Frenchmen defended themselves, with hande gunnes, Crosbowes, and pykes, so that the Englishmen could not enter. Then the Lorde Sandes commaunded a curtall, which he had with hym, to be shotte to the church, and pierced it through: then they within saw that their defence could not holde, yeldd themselves body and goodes. Out of the Church came .lxxij. Frenchmen, which were taken as prisoners, and all the goodes which they had caried into the church were taken for a bootie. Thus by one of the clocke, the sayde tenth daye of July, was the church of Odirsaell taken.

In this while also, had the Frenchmen manned the steeple of Odingham, which was a very strong Tower, much like a Castell, so whome the Lord Sandes sent an officer at armes, to commaunde them to yelde the fortresse, to whom they answered, that they were Frenchmen, and to him they would not yelde, and if he came thether, they would withstande him: whereupon he and his army marched thetherwarde, and about foure of the clocke after noone, he assaulted the steeple, and the Frenchmen themselves valiantly defended, but sodainly by a chaunce vnknowne, the steeple was a fier, and the Frenchmen fled downe to the quyer, then the Englishmen lightly entered the body of the church, and assaulted the Frenchmen, which cryed mercy and yeldd themselves, and at twelue of the clocke at midnight the assault ended,

and there were yelided out of the church fortie prisoners.

After which time the Lord Sandes encamped himselfe, and made good watch for feare of enimies, and in the morning called to him all the Priests, which were in both churches, and stode at defence, and sayd to them, that they ought not to be men of warre, & not withstanding he had them as prisoners, yet for Gods sake he released them, admonishing them, that if euer after they were taken at defence, they should be hanged on the next Galowes: after which monition done, he deliuered them freely.

Hardingham Castell brent
and spoiled.

About eyght of the clocke in the morning, he marched forwarde in good order of battayle, and came to the Castell of Hardingham, the which he brent and spoiled, and so the .xj. day of July he and his company which passed not .xij. hundred men, of which he had lost but only .xij. returned to Calice with great store of bestyall and pyllage.

This same season, the Frenche kyng sent an armie of .xxiij. thousande men, towardes the parties of Flaunders, which secretly enterprised to take a place called Newdike, which is a strong passage, betweene Fraunce and Flaunders, kept by the Fleminges, whereof they beyng aduertised, arrayed a great power of .xiiij. thousande and came to the passage, and slewe of the Frenchmen six hundred: then the Frenchmen reculed, and seuered themselves: some went to Mount Dory, and some to Saint Omers, and some brent the Suburges, they within Mount Dory defended themselves, and hurt the Capitaine of Bulleine, called Moun sire de Bees and slew his horse: wherefore the Frenchmen went thence and brent a village called Arkus: thus was all the frontiers full of Frenchemen, in so much that in the moneth of August, they bette into the towne of Guyfnes, the scourers and the scout-watch, whereof began Alarme, and the Frenchmen which were many in number, alighted as though they would geue assault mayntenaunt, and fierly profered towardes the Ditches, but when the ordinaunce beganne once to shote, it was no nede to bid them go. Then the Englishmen coragiously folowed the chace, but sodaynly out came an embusment of Frenchmen and tooke two Englishmen, and thus all the army of Fraunce, remoued to Syngate beside Trywyn.

The French king seeyng the king of England, dayly more and more encouraged to make warre on him and his dominions, and that the Scots did nothing to his pleasure, for lacke of the Duke John of Albany, whom the Scottes called their Gouvernor. He therefore caused great preparation to be made on all parties for men, Shippes, Harnesse, and Artillery, for the sending of the Duke John of Albany into Scotland, which Duke of a great presumption promised to the French king to driue the king of England out of his realme, as before ye haue heard, which promise was not kept.

The king of England, heeryng that the Duke of Albany, would passe into England, to make warre on his realme, thought to haue him met on the seas, and therefore he prepared a fleete of tall and strong shippes mete to encounter with the sayd Duke and his power, and made Admirall of that iourney, sir William Fitzwilliam, and with him sir Fraunces Brian, sir Anthony Boynez, Seriant Rot, John Hopton, William Gunstone, Anthony Aniuet, Thomas West, and other, which with great diligence laye in wayte to meete with the sayd Duke of Albany, and as they sayled on the French coast, they determined to lande, to do some harime to Traypozte, and as they howered there, they were espyed: then the Capitaine of the towne fired the Beakens, sent for ayd of all the fortresses about, and strengthed and manned the towne very warlyke. This notwithstanding, sir William Fitzwilliam and other Capitaynes, left not their enterprize, and so the .xxiij. day of August beyng Sunday, at seuen of the clocke in the morning, they tooke lande in the Haue of Traypozt, at whome the Frenchmen shot out ordinaunce, quatelles, and stones, the Englishmen in the Boates shot likewise, and encouraged by their Capitaynes, assaulted the Frenchmen in their Bulwarkes, the Frenchmen them valiauntly defended, and the English Capitaynes as men wythout feare, them assayed, and yet the number was nothing egall, for the Englishmen were but seuen hundred men, and the Frenchmen sixe thousand. For the well fighting of the Frenchmen, their Bulwarkes were taken, and theyz ordinaunce seased, and all that were about, fled to the towne of Traypozt, and euer the Englishmen folowed shotyng arrowes at them, and sleayng them, in which skirmishe Seriant Rot had his Bowe in his hande striken with a Sonne. Then the Capitaynes cryed Saint George, to the Gates of Traypozt, then euery man aduanced forwarde, and as they were goyng, Christopher Mozres mayster Gonner, espyed a piece of a Masse, which he caused to be taken bp, and then Anthony Kneuet, and Fraunces Neudigate, with their men, ranne with the sayde Masse to the Gate, but the Gate was so strong, that it could not be broken: and also at euery loupe lay a piece of ordinaunce, which continually shot at the Englishmen, which caused them to leaue the gate, and then they set fyre in the suburges, which was a fayze strete and all was brent, and while the Suburges brent, the Englishmen went to the haue, and would haue had out the shippes, but water lacked, wherefore they set fire on them, & brent there .viij. faire ships, besyde other. All this while was there skirmishyng at the Gates, and much murder on both sydes, for the Frenchmen in flyng from their Bulwarkes to the towne, lost .lxxx. persons, and many were hurt with arrowes. The men of the Countrie came thether still, insomuch as the number became very great, which sir William Fitzwilliam perceiuyng, caused his trumpet to blowe a retreat, and with suche prisoners, pillage, and ordinaunce as they had gotten, they returned to theyz Boates, and the Capitaynes sent their Souldiours before, the Frenchmen perceiuyng the Englishmen returned, issued out and found on land, Fraunces Neudigate, Thomas Vagham, Seriant Rotte, and other Capitaynes to the number of .xij. and ranne hastily toward them in great number, which perceiuyng that, bended themselves to sell their lynes dere. Sir William Fitzwilliam perceiuyng the great ieopardie that they were in, turned hys boate toward the lande, and discharged his ordinaunce, and with much paine saued these gentlemen, and them toke into Boates, notwithstanding a great number of Frenche men, which were in the water to let him: and thus the whole army returned to their shippes, after they had bene five houres on lande, and brought with them .xxviij. pieces of fayze ordinaunce, which were in the Bulwarkes, and lost of theyz men not fully .xx. persons, and then euery Capitaine tooke his awone ship, and coasted the seas, euer lookyng for the Duke of Albany, but they heard no tidynges of him.

In the Parliament (as you haue heard) it was concluded, that the king of

Charles
Duke of Suffolk created with an army into France.

of necessitie, must nedes make strong warre on the realme of Fraunce, wherfore the noble Charles Duke of Suffolke, was appoynted as Capitaine general, to passe with an army royal into Fraunce, in the ende of August, which with all diligence, prepared all thinges necessary for such a royall enterprize:
and for the forniture of this armie, there were appoynted to geue their at-tendaunce on him, the Lorde Mountacute, and sir Arthur Pole his brother, the Lorde Harbert sonne to the Erle of Worcester, the Lorde Ferrers, the Lorde Harnay, the Lorde Sands, the Lorde Barkeley, the Lorde Hobbes, and Baron Curson, and of knightes, Sir Richard Wingfield, Chaunceloz of the Duchy of Lancaster, sir John Weere, sir Edward Heuel, sir William Kingston, sir Richard Weston, sir Andzew Winsore, sir Anthony Wingfelde, sir Edward Guildford, sir Edward Griuel, sir Edward Chamberleyn, sir Thomas Luce, sir Guerard Dighby, sir Adrian Foscew, sir William Skeuynton Maister of the ordinaunce, sir Thomas Cheyney, sir Richard Cornwal, sir William Courtney, sir William Sidney, sir Henry Owen, all these lordes and knightes, with many other knightes and couragious Esquiers, and ac-tue Gentlemen, came accordyng to the kings commaundement at last, with all theyr people and retinue to Douer, where they mustered at seuerall tymes, as they passed to the sea, and so the number taken, that is to say of Wimilaunces, sixe hundred, of Archers on horsebacke, two hundred, of Archers on foote three thousand, of Bilmen five thousand, of Pioners and labourers two thousand sixe hundred: and when the view was taken on the other syde of the sea, there were adioyned to this number. xxij. hundred, which might be spared out of the Fortresses, and crewes of Hams, Gypsnes, and Calice, so that all the army were. xiiij. thousand, and an hundredth well harnessed, and apparayled for the warre, the Pioners onely except: But the Duke himselfe arrived at Calice, the. xxiiij. day of August, with his retinue and Counsaile abiding the armye, and caused all thinges, as vitaille and other, to be prepared for the same.

Such commonyng was in England, whether this army should go, because that no man except a fewe, knewe the secretnesse: some sayde to Bulleyn, some to Marys, and so euery man iudged accordyng to his awne opinion, as the common vse is.

In this season, because the mortalitie was great in Calice, the Duke of Suffolke caused his army to be lodged in Tentes and Hauilions, vpon the faire grene beside Saint Peters Church for their more helth, and he accom-panyed with dyuers noble men, the. viij. day of September roade to Grauelyng, and thether came to him Christiern king of Denmarke, and the Lorde Hilsten, Capitaine generall of Flaunders, which amiably enterterned the sayd Duke, and after they had secretly commoned of dyuers matters, concernyng diuers armyes to invade Fraunce, in sundrie places, the Duke tooke leau of the king and other, and came to Calice.

While the armie laye without Calice, they dayly came into the towne, and so it happened that a simple felow cut a pursse, as he made to buy apples, which incontinent was taken, and brought to the Maiors house to warde, which thing diuers Welshmen perceiuyng, and not knowyng what ap-percyued to iustice, ranue in great companies to the Maiors house, & would haue broken the house, the Officers of the towne entreated, and the Welsh-men

men more and more approached, the number of the Welshmen were so great, that the watche of Calice strake alarme. Then the Lorde Deputie and the Lorde Sandes, did all that in them lay, to bring them to conformitie, but they were so rude that they nothing them regarded, the priestes brought forth the Sacrament, which also was not regarded. Wherefore the Lorde Ferrers was straightly commaunded to appease their rage, for with him they came thether, which with great paine and entreatie them appeased: and then all the Welshmen were commaunded to the field, and to depart the towne and so were all other Capitaines, and afterward diuers of the hed rioters were apprehended and soze punished for example. And when all thinges necessary were prepared, the Duke issued out of Calice and toke the field, & ordeyned his marshall, and Capitaine of the bauntgard, the Lorde Sandes, Capitaine of his right wing sir William Kingston, and Capitaine of his left wing, sir Guerard Dighby, sir Edward Guildford Marshall of Calice, was Capy-taine of all the horsemen, sir Richard Wingfelde Capitaine of the rereward:
then the Duke with all his armye, as Capitaine of the middle warde, wyth Standardes, Banners, and Penons displayed, marched forward in good order of battaile, and came to a place called Kalkewell, and there lodged the xix. day of September. In which place diuers Souldiours, as Carriers, and by land men, which were binnete for the war, (for euery thing to them was paine) fell sicke and diseased, wherefore the Duke gaue them leau by pasport to retarne.

And on the. xxij. day of September, he tooke by his campe and came to Hanswell, and ther pitched his field, he thus lying in abode for the army of Flaunders, which promised to ioyne with him, which as then were not come to Saint Omers. He entendyng not to lye still ydely, sent Clarenseur king at Armes, to sommon the Castell called Bell Castell, to yelde to him, or else he would destroy it with fyre and sworde, the officer of Armes did his message accordyngly, to whome the Capitaine answered, that he would deliuer no Castell to the Duke, and if the Duke came thether, he should nothing get, for he sayd he was sure of such rescues, that should not be to the Dukes aduantage: which with this aunswere returned toward the Duke, and in the way he met the Lorde Sandes, and the Lorde Ferrers, in array of battaile, with five hundred horsemen, and a thousand footemen, to whome he reher-sed the aunswere, then sayde the Lordes, we must compell him, if other wise he will not. Then the Maister of the ordinaunce was commaunded to prepare for a battery, which was done, and thether came five hundred horsemen of Burgonions, and five hundred footemen, then the ordinaunce with great difficultie was brought nere the Castell, and although it were night, the Gurmes seased not, and bet the place soze, they within defended the best that they might, and when the day began to spring, the Lordes caused to blowe to the assault, which heeryng, the Capitaine of the Castell sayd to his Companions, that they were not able to abyde the assault, and that their suc-coz sayled them, wherefore of necessitie they must deliuer the Castell, wher-to they agreed, and so he yelded the Castell, his life onely saued, and all other at the mercy of the Duke, which pardoned them, and toke them as prisoners and deliuered the Castell to sir William Skeuington, which was shortly ra-sed downe to the ground, the. xxvij. day of September.

Monday

Fraunces
Duke of Burbon did sodaynely become English against the French
king.

Monday beyng the. xxiiij. day of September there was a Proclamation made in the armie, how that Fraunces Duke of Burbon, and Constable of Fraunce, was become friend to the king of Englande, and enemye to the French king, and was sworne to the king of Englande, and had in hys wages for the king of England ten thousand Almaynes to invade Fraunce, or to let the French kings purposes, and for this intent to him was sent money in no little somme, but the common people sayde, that neuer was French man true to England, howbeit he was true as long as he lived.

To make thys proclamation more apparaunt, you must vnderstande that in thys season the French king was ruled by his mother the Countesse of Angulesme, and the Admyrall of Fraunce called Lozde Bonnyet, which as was reported and sayde, loued the sayde Lady as his Paramour, of which all the Court of Fraunce spake much. These two persons so ruled the king, that what they sayde was done, and no iudgement nor sentence passed in the Parliament at Marys without their assent, so that nothing was done without them, at which thing the nobles of Fraunce soze disdayned, and especially the Lozde Fraunces Duke of Burbon and Constable of Fraunce, which hauing a sute for the Erledome of Montpelyer, could not be heard speake nor hys counsaile neyther. At the last he beyng soze displeased with this vnkinde and vniust handlyng, came to the French king beseechyng him of iustice and fauor, which flattering him sayde, that all that was in hys pover to doe he would gladly accomplishe, and other aunswere had he none, and to encrease hys grudge the moze, the French kings mother made a tytyle to the whole Duchy of Burbon and Auerne, and the Admyrall and thee so entised the king, that he sayde openly that the Duke of Burbon shortly should be as poze as the meanest gentleman in Fraunce, which woordes reported to hym, caused him to hate mortally the French king and hys mother, and so in displeasure departed into hys awne Countrie. The king of England beyng hereof aduertised, sent to the Duke of Burbon a knight of hys chamber called sir John Russell, a man well languaged, which wisely and couertly so behaved himselfe, that he came to the Duke to Holyns, and knewe all his intent how he would forsake his king, and serue the king of England and the Emperour agaynst the French king, and therevpon toke his othe. The French king not mistrusting the aliegeaunce of the Duke of Burbon, sent to the Duke to prepare him to go into Italy, for he had prepared a great army to passe the Mountaynes a-gaynst the Duke of Myllaine, in which armie he had sixe thousande men of armes, and. xxb. thousand footemen. The Duke hearing hereof sayned himselfe sick, and the French king passyng by Holyns, visited and comforted him:
to whome the Duke promised to come shortly after to Lyons with all his power, and caused an horselitter to be caried emptie thzee dayes amongst a certaine of his Souldiours, as though he were there, but he himselfe fled secretly into the Countie of Burgoyne pertayning to the Emperour, where he retayned ten thousand Almaynes to invade Fraunce, as sone as the French king was passed the Mountaynes.

When the French king heard of thys, he sent the Admyrall into Italy with his armie, and sent his great mayster to seaze all the Dukes landes. Of all these doyngs Sir John Russell brought true worde, for he was present with the Duke, and also sawe the French armie, and returned vnespred, wherefoze

John Russell

seale, and after Erie of

wherefoze he deserued and had of the king and his countaile great thankes.
wherevpon the king caused the proclamation to be made in the armie, that they might knowe that all the power of Fraunce should not trouble them, for what with the warres of Italy and for the Duke of Burbons power they might doe what they lust, and be vnfought withall, which so proued after. Which tydings much encouraged the Englishe Souldiours.

After this proclamation, there were tydings brought to the armie for a truth, that one Iherom Vicount, a great famillier friend with the Duke of Myllaine entised by the French king, had almost slayne Fraunces Duke of Myllaine with a dagger behinde at hys backe, with the which doyng the French king aboute all persons sayned himselfe to be most displeased. The morowe beyng the. xxix. day of September the Duke with his whole army remoued to Arde and there lodged, and the last day of September he remoued to a Village called Arlike, and from thence the first day of October he came to a village betwene Tywyn and saint Omers, called Esquerdes or Cordes, where the Duke lay and encamped himselfe abyding his enemies.

Now must I returne to tell you what was done betweene Englande and Scotland this same season, whyle the Duke of Suffolke was thus inuading the realme of Fraunce. The Scottes thinking the warre turned into Fraunce, and that nothing should be attempted agaynst them, began to robbe and spoyle on the Marches of Englande, whereof the king heeryng sent agayne thether the balyaunt Erie of Surrey, Treasorer and Admyrall of Englande, which in all hast sped him to the West Marches, and sent for an armie of sixe thousand men, and with banner displayed entered by the drie Marches, beating downe Castels and fortreffes on euery side. And although the Scots be men of high courage, yet they seyng the wise conduite of the noble Erie of Surray and his chosen companye, durst not once encounter with him, and so he passed quietly throughe the dales, till he came to the strong towne of Jedworth, in which lay a great garrison of Scottishe men, which did all the hurt they could to the Englishe men, and hardely in great number slain with the Englishe men, so that on both parties dy-uers were slain, but in the ende the Abbay, Castell, and towne of Jedworth were brent, and all rased a sunder in the open sight of the Scottes. And after this he would not returne but encamped himselfe in the Scottishe ground abidyng battayle, and lay there from the. xxij. day of September, to the. xxv.
day. Durynge which time he sent the Lord Daker of Gylderland to a strong holde of Doncar called Fernhurst, the which Castell stood very euill to come to, for the wayes were hilly, stony, and full of Marishes, and the Scottes had bent their ordinaunce that way: yet for all that the English men so fiercely set on that they gat the Castell, notwithstanding that the Scottes fought balyauntly, and many of them were taken, as Dan Car the Lord, the Lord of Gradon and dyuers other which was there taken, and so the Lord Da-ker returned with his prisoners, and then he was ordayned to keepe the watch that night, which set his watches and hys wardes surely. In the night sodaynely thzee hundred good Geldyngs brake out of a pasture, which were in custodie of the sayde Lozde Dacres campe, and as beastes wood and sauage raine enraged, and notwithstanding that men did as muche as they might to stop them, yet they ranne as though they were in array of battaye,

taile, whereof the noyse in the night was so great, that the armie sounded alarme, the horse still in array ranne to the campe where the Erle laye, and bare downe many persons in their way, and so sodainly ranne away, whether it was unknowne: the Lozde Dacres men sayde that the Deuill was sene amongst them: and after the third day the Erle returned into England.

The craftie policie of the Duke of Albany.

When the Erle of Surrey departed from the borders in August as you haue heard heretofore: The Scottes wrote to the Duke of Albany of all their affaires, which was comming into Scotland. But when he heard that the Hauie of England laye in a wayte to fight with him, he durst not adventure, but sate still: And when he heard there was no Capitaynes of name on the borders of England toward Scotlande, he deuised by policie that all his ships should be remoued to the hauen of Brest, and sayde himselfe and caused it to be noysed that he would not sayle into Scotlande that yere. So ranne the voyce all the coastes of Normandie and Britayne, and so passed till the ende of September.

Richard de la poole.

The king of England was informed by such as knew none other, that the Duke of Albany had broken his iorney, and would not passe that yere into Scotland. Wherefore the king of England in the middest of September caused his ships to be layd by in Hauens till the next spring: The Duke of Albany beyng thereof aduertised, boldly then tooke his shippes and shipped his people, and with lxxij. sayle in sight passed by the West partes of England, and coasted Wales, and with great labor landed at Kyrcobrye in the West part of Scotland with all hys people, the xxj. day of September, which were in number thre thousand or there about, and with him was the Traytor Richard de la poole.

The Duke of Albany landeth in Scotland.

When it was knowne in Scotlande that the Lozde Governour was landed, muche gladnesse there was amongst the people. Then the Duke was highly receyued and his people well cherished, and then began a parliament. The king of England heering that the Duke of Albany was landed in Scotland and was vsought withall, was not a little displeasid, and suspected that suche as enforced him that the Duke would not passe that yere, had deceyued him, but there was no remedie: Wherefore he made provisions and put all things in a readynesse, if he would attempt any thing agaynst him and his realme.

The Duke of Albany gouernour of Scotland being in the parliament of the realme with great eloquence declared to them the loue and fauor that Fraunces the french king bare to the realme of Scotlande, in somuch that he being aduertised of the great murders, slaughters, and burninges done by the Englishmen, thought that he suffered no lesse hurt and dammage then they did, accompting himselfe one of their members, and them likewise the members of him and his realme, and for the reuenging of the same, he to be partener as their member, and for the more credite he shewed the french kinges letter, affirming his declaration. When the letters were red, there start by a Baron of Scotlande called the Lozde Forbos, which sayde: the realme of Scotlande for the loue of fraunce suffereth great paine as dayly doth appere, for our Nobles be dayly slayne or taken, our Commonaltie murdered, our landes ouerrunne our houses and fortelles brent and rased, the profites of our landes we lese: which mischiefe we nede not to haue had

but for the loue of fraunce, & what helpeth fraunce? A far friend is not sone fet: A mightie neighbour may be a cruell enemye. I affirme this, if we would kepe amitie with the realme of England we were out of all these daungers. God forbid said the Duke of Albany that Scotland euer should seeke a new friende or profer their amitie, to the destroyers of their countrie and nation, but you my Lozds of Scotland ar sufficient of your selues to maintaine your landes, liberty and fredome against your common enemyes the Englishmen. And therefore now let vs together reuenge the hurtcs done to vs and oure countrie: and I on mine honoz shall go with you, and therefore I haue brought with me both treasure, men, and artillery into this realme. I thinke not but we shall so doe that all christendome shall speake of oure noble conquest. To the Dukes request all the court of parliament agreed, and then were commissions sent thzough Scotlande and cryes made that all men should assemble at Doglas dale with bittayle for. xxviij. dayes. The Scottes in all hast prepared, so that the Lozdes were come to the place appointed the xvij. day of October, with bittaille, gunnes, and all other artillery, and so came by easy iourneyes to the riuer of Tweede on a grounde beside Hume castell, and from thence came to Cabdestrene and there lodged.

The Duke of Albany raise: h a great power of Scotland against king Henry and the realme of Englande.

All this doing the king of England knewe well, wherefore with all diligence he caused to be assembled the people of the North part beyond Trent whereof there were thre thousand bering coates of armes with their power and strength, which all were commaunded to resort to the Erle of Surrey with speede. The noble Marquis Dorset Thomas was appoynted to kepe Barwicke with six thousand men, least the Scottes would therto laye siege.

The Duke of Albany which lay on the frontiers heering of the Erle of Surreyes preparing, sent to him an Heralde promising him of his honour to geue him battaile, and if he tooke him in battaile he would put him to courteous ransome and his hodye to be safe: To whome the Erle answered, that much he thanked the Duke of his offer, and that he would abide battaile, promising him that he would geue him battaile if he durst abyde: and if that the sayd Duke were taken prisoner by him or his men he would strike of his head and send it to the king of England his Maister, and bade that he should trust to none other, at which answer the Duke of Albany and the Scots toke great despyte.

A bitter and yet a valiant answer made by the Erle of Surrey vnto the Duke of Albany.

The Erle of Surrey being at Alnwiike, to him came the Erles of Northumberland and Westmerland, the lord Clyfford, the lord Dacres, the lord Lumley, the Lord Dgle, the lord Darcy, and many noble knightes, squiers, and yomen, to the number of. xl. M. And from the kings court was sent to be at the battail sir Nicholas Carew maister of the horse, sir fraunces Bryan, sir Edward Baynton and diuers other. All this army lay on the borders abiding the Scots comming into England which lay still in Scotland, and did nothing till the last day of October beyng Saterday. The night before the Scottes had sent ouer the water into England thre or foure thousand men, to laye siege to a little Castell called the Castell of Warke, which standeth nere the border: the great ordinaunce of Scotlande soze bet the Castell, and Dan Car and the frenchmen which came out of fraunce with the Duke of Albany gaue to the Castell a strong assault: within the Castell was sir William Lyle with a hundred persons, but the Scottes were so many in number

that they gotte the vttermost ward called the Barnhyns where the Beastes and barnes were, which seynge, the Capitaine sent in all haste to the Erle of Surrep aduertising him of their distresse, which in all hast assembled his Capytaines to reskue the Castell, therby hopping that Duke John of Albany would enter into England. The Frenchmen and Scottes lay still about the Castell continually shooting ordinaunce, Sunday and Monday the first and second day of Nouember, and then the Scots thinking the place assaultable, coragiouly set on the Castell and by strength entered the second ward. Sir William Lile perceyuing that the Scottes had gotten the false brayes and that nothing remained but only the inner ward or Doungeon, sayde to his company, Sirs for our honoz and manhood let vs issue and fight with the proude Scots & stately frenchmen, for moze thal our honoz be to dye in fight then to be murthered with gunnes, to the which his company that were left agreed: for of his hundred men he had lost almost fortie at the other assaults. Then they issued out boldely and shot coragiouly as men that shot for a vantage, and with shooting and fighting they draue their enemies cleane out of the place and slew of them, and chiefly of the Frenchmen three hundred which lay there dead in sight when the Erle came thether, beside such as died of woundes and were drowned. Then the Scottes remoued their ordinaunce, in great hast ouer the water, and by that time was the Erle of Surrep come with fiue thousand men on horsebacke and all his great army folowed and was very sozy that his enemies were gone, and much praysed Sir William Lile for his baliuantnesse.

When the Duke of Albany and the Lordes of Scotland kneto that the Erle of Surrep approached with his puissant army, they thought it not conuenient to ioperd all the nobilitie of Scotland in one field, considering their chaunce ten yeares before, and therefore they concluded to returne, and so on the second day of Nouember in the night the Duke with all his army retreated moze for his suertie then honoz.

The horsemen of Scotlande kept the fordes that no man should passe to greue the footemen as they returned, and when all the baggages were gone they cast themselues in a plumpe and returned.

When the daye appered, then the Englishmen might plainely see the Scottes how they fled fiftie mens thickenesse, many a lustie Englishman woulde saye haue folowed them on horsebacke, and so woulde the Erle of Surrep with all his hart, but his commission was only to defend the realme and not to invade Scotlande, which thing him soze displeased. Thus brake by the great army of Scotlande to the great rebuke of the Duke of Albany and the nobles of Scotlande which two yeres together had made bragges and assembles and durst not abyde battaile. The Scottes made much braggs that they had beaten doone the walles of Marke Castel, but they spake nothing of their men that they left there, nor how cowardly they returned and would not abyde. After this returne Queene Margaret of Scotland and mother to the pong king, sent to her brother the king of England for an abstinence of warre to be taken betweene the realme of Englaunde and Scotland, to the entent that some way might be taken, that an amytie might be had betwene them: which request was to her graunted, and so the great army of Englaunde was dissolued & the Erle of Surrep returned to the coast.

In

In this season, the Emperoz Charles sent to the king of England two Mules trapped in crimosyn Ueluet curiously embzoudered, all the Buckles, stirropes and all such other garnishyngs were siluer and gilt of marueylous connyng worke. He sent also .xj. Genets full goodly to beholde, trapped with russet veluet richely wrought, and foure Speares, and two Fauelynges of straunge timber and worke richly garnished, and fiue brace of Greyhounds: and to the Queene he sent two Mules, with riche trappers & high Chayers after the Spanishe fashon, all these presentes were thankfully receyued both of the King and Queene.

Now let vs returne to the Duke of Suffolke which lay at Cordes or Esquerdes the .xx. day of September, and thether came to him the armie of Flaunders, whereof was Capitaine the Lord of Fildsteyne, which had with him of Spaniardes, Almaynes, Cleues and other, three thousand footemen, and fiue hundred horsemen well apparayled for the warres in all poyntes.

The Duke of Suffolke beyng thus furnished passed forwarde in wet weather making bridges and wayes, euer looking for battaile, and on the .xviij. day of October he sent the Lorde Sandes Marshall of his armye, and with him three thousand men to a good towne called Anker, which accompanied with diuers knightes and gentlemen in good order of battaile marched toward the towne. The french men perceyuing the Englishmen connyng toward their towne, fled out as fast as they might, and left the towne desolate: then entered the Englishmen, and had there a great bootie, and tooke the Castell called Bonegard, & therein put a garrison of Englishmen, wherof was Capitaine the Lorde Leonard Gray brother to the Marques Dorset to conduct bittaylers to the armie, which now was farre from any succozs of the Englishe part. In this towne was an Abbay of Monkes which receyued humbly the Lordes and Nobles of England, which to them did no hurt nor damage, and then they returned to the Duke.

After this, the .xix. day, the Duke with his army, passed to a billage called Ouede: and there after long counsailing it was determined that the whole armie should passe to a strong towne and well fortifyed called Bray, which towne was well ordinaunced, and had in it .xviij. C. men of warre, the Capitaine thereof was called Adrian, and for succozs to the towne were come Mounfire Pontdomy, the Vicount Lernerdam, the Vicount Turraing, Mounfire Applyngcozt, and Mounfire Dampney, with fiue hundred horsemen, so that in the towne besyde the Inhabitautes were two thousande good men. This towne standeth on the ryuer of Some. .xxiiij. Englishe mile from Arras, and .xiiij. myles aboue Amias: This towne was well ditched and strengthned on euery side.

The .xx. day of this moneth, the Duke commaunded all his great ordinaunce to be brought by foure of the clocke in the moorning before the towne of Bray, they that had the charge thereof so manfully acquitted them, that notwithstanding all the damage that their enemyes could do, brought the ordinaunce before the towne at the houre appoynted. Then eche part shot dreadfully at other, but the Englishe Gunners shot so well, that the walles of the towne were beaten doone and rased with the ordinaunce, insomuche that by .ix. of the clocke the towne was made assaultable. Then the Duke caused to blowe to the assault. Then the Englishmen and Fleminges, and Burgonions lept forth quickly, and notwithstanding that the ditches were deepe, yet they so couragiously entered by the good comfort of the Lorde Sandes, and other noble men that they gat the ditches. The Frenchmen perceiuyng that the towne should be gotten, hastily made traynes of Gunpowder from streete to streete, and house to house, sayng that the Englishmen after their entry into the towne would fall to pillage, and then sodainly sodaine fyre should destroy them. This was the prouision of the Frenchmen: by this tyme the Englishmen were entryng on the walles, and the Frenchmen stode yet at defence with Pykes, Crosbowes, Handgunnes, and Halberdes, but they were to weake, for on all parties entered the Englishmen, and sodainely the Frenchmen fled, and the Englishmen folowed and killed and slue in euery part.

Nowe you must vnderstand that this towne of Bray standeth on the riuer of Some which is there deuided in diuers braunches, and betwene euery braunch is a marishe ground, where on the farsyde of the towne was fortified a Bulwarke full of ordinaunce to kepe the passage ouer the water, and the Frenchmen had losed the planks of the bridge nere a myle aboue Bray, and the horsemen of Fraunce passed by a mille which was to the French foemen a great ayde, for they stood and kept the passage till the footemen were come ouer the bridge, and then they plucked away the planks of the bridge, so that no man shoulde folowe, but euer the Englishmen folowed, and cast planks on the bridge, and passed ouer the bridge, in which passyng diuers were drowned, but with great trauaile all men passed, horsemen and footemen, and fiercely assaulted the Bulwarke, and tooke it with all the ordinaunce, and in it was taken, Capitaine Adrian, and Capitaine Walterlew. The English horsemen folowed the Frenchmen, and diuers of them were slaine and taken, sir Robert Jernyngham brake a speare of the Lorde Mountdozmy. The Lord Leonard Gray did valiantly that day. You must remember that when the Frenchmen issued out of the towne, they forgot not to lay a match to the traine of Gunpowder which they had made, which in short space set the towne all on fyre, so that when the Englishmen returned againe, all was on fyre, so that there they had little profite but Wyne, which to them did great pleasure. Thus was the towne of Bray taken, and destroyed the .xx. day of October.

The Duke consideryng that little succors were for him and his Souldiours in the towne of Bray, because the sayd towne was consumed with fire, he therefore commaunded the bridges to be well repayred for to passe ouer the great riuer of Some into the realme of Fraunce: and when the passage was sure, the Lorde Sandes the .xxj. day of October in the moynyng was prest to passe ouer with the Warwarde. Then some Gentlemen sayde that they would passe no farther forward, and diuers Souldiours were of the same opinion. It was asked why they should feare, and they answered that if they were past ouer the riuer, they were past all succours and bittaille, none coulde be brought to them. By reason of this noyse, the Souldiours stayed, which the Lorde Sandes perceiuyng, saide to the Welchmen which were euill willyng to passe the riuer: Sirs sayde he, beholde what I do, and with that he tooke a Banner of Saint George, and sayde, as many as loue the king of England, and be true to him and to the Crowne, folow me, & then he

he and sir William Kingston set forward and passed the water, which there runneth in three streames, then al other persons couragiously folowed, with the ordinaunce and bittayles.

After the forward folowed the Duke and all his battaile: At this time the armie was sore minished by reason many were diseased, and from the host departed, so the host was not of that strength that it was at the setting out of Calice. When the Englishmen were passed, then folowed the Burgonions in good order, and so that night this armie came to a towne called Kappe, and there encamped themselves, all the Inhabitauntes were fled both out of the towne and Castell: there the Englishmen found a hundred tonne of Wyne, and other good pillage. The garrison that lay at Anker, knowyng that the Duke was passed the riuer of Some, rased the towne and Castell, and came and ioyned with the Dukes armie at Kappe.

There the Duke caused Proclamations to be made in the armie that all the people of Fraunce that would bittaille the armie of England should be well entreated, and haue their bittayles well payed for, and safe goyng and comyng, by the which Proclamation the host was well bittayled, for the people of the country resorted with all thinges necessary.

The Duke thus lyng at Kappe sent to the towne of Roy to yeeld them to the king of England. The towne perceiuyng that their power was not able to withstand the great armie of the Duke, assented to deliuer the towne to the Duke. This was a strong towne well walled, ditched and ordinaunced, but not manned: the Duke sent thether sir Richard Cornwall, and other with foure hundred men to receyue the towne, which went thether in good array, and had the towne to them deliuered, and then they set the Banner of Saint George in the highest part of the towne, and full well this garrison kept the towne of Roy till the Duke came thether with his whole armie.

The Duke and his army the .xxv. day of the sayde moneth remoued to a billage called Lphome, & had there great pillage: for this towne was much haunted of Marchantes, & there kept great markets. The next day he remoued to Dauenker, and the .xxviij. day he remoued and came before the strong towne of Mountdedier, where for defence of warre lacked neyther ditches, walles, nor bulwarke: The horsemen of the English army roade about the towne to view it, at whome the Capitaynes caused diuers peeces to be losed, which shewed well their strength. The Duke sent an officer of armes to sommon the Capitaine to deliuer the towne: the officer departed, and wyth him a trumpet which blew before the Gate, but no person would answer, because they would haue no summons made to them: the officer of armes returned and made report. Then the Dukes skyzers made profer afore the towne, out of the which issued a great company of horsemen and skirmished with the Dukes horsemen, and fought valiantly, but at the last .xl. of the horsemen were taken, with which the Lorde Roche Baron Capitaine of the towne was sore displeased, yet he thought him able to maintain the towne agaynst the whole army. Then the Duke of Suffolke pitched his field and layd his siege round about the towne of Mountdedier, and kept good watch and warde on euery syde: which thing the Lorde Roche Baron perceiuyng, comforted his men of warre, and bad them not be afrayed, but to be of good courage, and sayd that the Duke there should get nothing. When the Duke had had thus planted his siege, he considered that he was farre from rescue and that lying still and nothing doying was not profitable, he knewe also by report of the prisoners that in the towne of Mountdedier were two thousand footemen, and one thousand horsemen: wherefoze he sent for all the Lordes and Capitaines of his army, and much praysed their hardinesse, and sayd that the noble courage that he sawe in them did much auance him to set forward in all things, the prayse where of should be to them, and not to him, and therfoze now he encouraged them againe to continue still in their valiaunt doying, for with Gods grace he entended to bend his ordinaunce the next morning before the towne, to the which all the Lordes agreed, and praysed much the Dukes courage and forwardnesse.

Sir William Skeuyngton

Sir John Walop.

Adventurers.

Kreekers.

Then was sir William Skeuyngton knight, Maister of the ordinance, commaunded to prepare for the battery, which with all diligence made trenches, and prepared all things meete for the purpose. In this season sir John Walop knight, had with him almost a thousande proper men and hardy, having little wages or none which lived alonely on their aventure, wherefoze of some they were called adventurers, of some they were called Kreekers. These men were light, hardie, and pollitike, and by their manhood and hardinesse had robbed many townes, taken many prisoners, with great booties, and dayly brought to the army horses, mares, vitaille, cloth, cozue, and other necessaryes which might not be missed. Of this company the Frenchmen, and especially they of billages, and passengers were sore afrayed, for they were neuer yde, but doying somthing in one part or other. The Lord Mountdozmy, or Pountremy, heering Mountdedier was besieged, called to him divers great Lordes and Capitaynes to the number of five hundred men of Armes and diny Launces, and a great number of footemen, entending to bring Gunpowder and other necessaryes to the towne of Mountdedier: and as they were thether commyng by night, Thomas Palmer, Capitaine of the skout watch of the Englishe armye them askyed and skirmished with them although they were more in number: manfully fought the French men, but for all that, they were compelled to flie backe, and then the Englishmen them folowed, and slue divers, and two Speares were broken on the brother of the Lorde Pountdozmy, but by the swiftnesse of his horse he saved himselfe, and in this chase were an hundred prisoners taken, which much reioysed the Englishe men.

When the maister of the ordinaunce had all thinges readie, at the houre of foure of the clocke in the morning, he discharged the ordinaunce continually in such fashion, that by viij. of the clocke the .xxviii. day of October the walles were made low, and the towne assaultable. All which while, the great ordinaunce shot still out of the towne till the walles and towne were beaten downe. The Capitaine of the towne perceiuyng this, called to him all the Capitaynes, declaring to them that theyr towne was in foure houres made assaultable, and that surely the Englishmen would assault the towne which should be to their confusion, wherefoze he asked their aduise what was best to be done, all they answered, do as you will: Then he went into a Tower, and caused a Trumpet to blow, and set forth a Banner of truce. Then the Duke commaunded the ordinaunce to cease. Then sir William Skeuyngton came to the walles and demaunded what they would, and the lord Roche

Baron

Baron sayd, that if it pleased the Duke for the loue of the king of England, and his honor, to graunt to him and the other Gentlemen that were there, licence to depart with life, bagge and baggage, they would deliuer the towne of Mountdedier. Then sir William Skeuyngton made report to the Duke which thereto consented, sayng: they be men of warre, their rythes is not great. Then the Lord Sandes and diuers other were appoynted to receiue the towne, and so they entered and set Standardes on the top of the Gates, and tooke the keyes of all the strong houses, Towers, and Bulwarkes. The French men were redie to depart with frullages, and cariages, wyth Crosbowes, Pykes, and Handgunnes, with which doying the Lord Sandes and the Englishmen which were within the towne were not content, & sayd that the Frenchmen should passe without weapon: on this poynt was much alteration, and the Frenchmen were stayed, but the Lord Roche Baron gaue many sayre wordes, and passed forward with a red standard, with a whyte Crosse before him, that seyng sir Thomas Palmer, raine to the standarde and plucked it in pieces. Then sayde the Lord Roche Baron, that it was violently done: to whome he answered that he should beare no standard there lyke a conquerour. Then after long disputation, the Frenchmen sayd, that it was promised them that they should haue their weapons and baggage, and so vpon that they were suffered to depart. The footemen likewise had a standard before them, which was rent by sir Robert Jernyngham. The number which departed truly accompted, were two thousand footemen, five hundred horsemen and odde, well and warlyke appoynted, and they left much baggage behinde them, because they sawe the Englishmen so fast come into the towne, they were in feare of losse of all.

The towne of Mountdedier: and fabric.

When the Frenchmen were departed, the Duke with his whole army entered the towne and there the Englishe men founde fine featherbeds, nappery, coverings, and much houtholde stuffe, and especially of Wyne great plentie, and there the armie rested till the last day of October, and then were all the gates of the towne rased and throbne downe, and all the Bulwarkes lykewise, then the Duke caused all the ordinaunce to be taken, and so removed to the towne of Roze, where he and all his armie rested for a whyle: whereof they were glad, for they had trauelyed sore, and the weather was wet and colde. On the feast of all saints called Alhalon day, the Duke in the chiefe Church of Roze made knightes, the Lorde Harbert, the Lorde Powes, Olyuer Hanners, Arthur Poie, Richard Sandes, Robert Jernyngham, Robert Salisbury, Edmond Benyngfield, Richard Corbet, Thomas Wentworthe, William Storton, Water Mantell, George Warran, Edward Seymour after Erle of Hartford, and Duke of Sommer set, and most worthy gouernour of the kinges maiesties person, and Protector of all hys realmes, dominions and subiects.

The morrow after, the armie removed to a place called Meele, there the Burgonions began to ware wearie, and so did the Englishmen, for euery day was foule weather, and raine both day and night. Wherefoze dyuers companies fell to grudging sayng, now you may see that by our removing we shall be led from place to place all this Wynter, which is to the vtter losse of our lynes: for daylie we see that of our companye dyeth no small number (and truly it was that some dyed but not many) they sayde farther, the Burgonions gonions haue the great gaine, and doe least for it, for they haue wagons and carie their booties to their Countrie, which is nere hande, and we go before and fight, and we haue no meanes to conuey anye thing into our Countrie for lack of cariage, and so we beate the bushe and they take the byrdes. This grudge was sealed by gentle wordes for a time.

In these iorneyes was commonly spoken that the Duke of Burbon with his ten thousand Almaynes would haue inuaded Fraunce and so ioyned with this armie, but the truth was contrarie, for he turned his host another way and went into prouince and layde siege to Marcellles, wherof the Duke beyng aduertised, not a little mused, and also seyng his men daylie fall sick, was soxie, and yet he so comforted them that euery man was glad to folow his will and entent.

On the sixe day of Nouember the Lorde Sandes beyng Capitayne of the foreward, and the Duke of the middle warde, and sye Richard Wyngfield Capitaine of the rereward came in order of battayle prest to fight, to a village called Ueane, and there rested for that night, and the morrow after the whole armie returned agayne ouer the water of Some, and came to a place called Beaufford: At thys passage the Duke made knightes, John Dudley, and Robert Utrepght Esquires.

The eyght day the Duke remoued to a place called Mount saint Martyne, a very meete place for an armie, and then was the Dukes instructions looked vpon by the Capytaynes, and they perceyuing that they hard nothing of the Duke of Burbons comming, ayde nor counsaile, all they thought and determined to send the Lorde Sandes in post to the king, to declare all the case as it stood and their necessitie, according as he himselve knewe and sawe in all poyntes: which Lorde Sandes tooke great paine, and made good diligence toward the king, and while he was riding, the Duke remoued his armie to a place called Permount and there lodged for a time to rest, and the armie was well bytaylor, but euer the Welshemen muttered and grudged more and more.

After the great raynes and windes that had fallen, came a seruent frost, so sore that many a soldiour dyed for colde, some lost syngers and some toes, but many lost their nayles of their hands, which was to them a great griefe. The Duke all thys notwithstanding remembryng that he came not thither to ye still, the. xiiij. daye remoued to a place two Myle from the Castell of Bobhen and still it frised, in so much that the Maister of the Ordinaunce was compelled of necessitie to set the wheeles of his ordinaunce on hardels for sinking. In the morning the Welshemen set out a shout and cryed home, home, the Brekers hering that, cryed hang hang. For which matter deuision was like to haue fallen, but by pollicy it was ceased. Sir Edward Gyldford Capitaine of the horsemen beved the Castell of Bobhen or Boghan, which euer was thought to be impregnable, but he iudged it might be wonne, for the Castell was enuironed with marises, so that to no mans iudgement it was possible to winne it: But nowe he perceyued that the frost was so great and strong that it might be besieged, and al that night it frised againe: wherefore he desired the Duke to geue him leaue to assault it, which thereto agreed. Then he caused the ordinaunce to be set foorth ouer the marische. When they within the Castell perceyued that the marische fayled them, they were were sore dismayed. Then sye Edward Guildford shot thre great pieces at the Castell, and the Castilian shot thre pieces agayne. Then as the English Somers were preparing to the batterie, the Capitayne seyng hys Castell could not hold by reason that the marische fayled, and that he coulde defende none assault, deliuered the Castell to him to the behoofe of the Emperour, and the king of Englande, and after a small communication had betwene the sayde sye Edward Guildford and the Capitayne, the Capitayne with all his retinue departed, leauing behinde the ordinaunce of Bombards, Curtawes, and demy Curtawes, Slingses, Canons, Volgers, and other ordinaunce, there were. lxxij. pieces, plentie of pelletes and powder. The Duke of Suffolke perceyuing that this Castell stood on the border of Henaude: wherefore the more to please the Henaunders he made Capitaine of the same Castell of Boghan the Senechal of Henaude, to the behoofe of the Emperour and the king of Englande. In thys place the armie was euill bytaylor, because the Frenchmen had stopped the waier of Some, that no bytaylor should passe ouer the ryuer: wherefore the Duke sent to them of Henaude, and especially to them of Valencien to haue ayde of bytaylor, which of their little sent to the armie a little, but yet it did them some seruice, and all thys whyle the seruent frost with bitter windes contynued, which caused many people to die: yet still lay the armie abidyng the answer of the Lord Sandes, which as you haue heard read in poste, and so much trauayled that he came to the king of Englande to his Castell of Wyndsoze, and there declared to the king his message, which was that his people which were in the frenche ground abode much miserie, for the weather was wet, the wayes deepe, long nightes and short dayes, great iorneyes and little bytaylor, which caused the souldiours daylie to die. Also they trusted when they passed the seas according to their instructions to haue ayde of the Duke of Burbon (of whome lithe their departing they neuer heard worde) wherefore the Duke of Suffolke and other nobles of your armye hath sent me to your highnesse to declare their state and condition, their good will to tarie, and the euill chaunces which daylie happeneth to them by God and not by their enemies. Well sayde the king, all thys we knewe before your comming: wherefore we haue appointed the Lorde Mountioy with sixe thousande men, to passe the seas for the reliefe of our armie, which Lorde Mountioy is almost in a readynesse: For we will in no wise that the armie shall breake.

Then the king came to Westminster to the Cardinals place, and there receyued letters from the Duke of Suffolke by sye Robert Jernyngham, of the getting of the Castell of Boghan or Boben: wherefore incontinent it was by the king and his counsaile determined that the Lorde Mountioy should make speede, which did suche diligence that manye of hys Souldiours were come to London well harnessed and weaponed readie to passe the seas. Wherefore the king sent in all haste sye Robert Jernyngham agayne to declare to the Duke the kings pleasure and what ayde was comming toward him. But or sye Robert Jernyngham could come to the Duke, the armie was remoued from Boben and bent the towne, and so came to the Citie of Valencine in Henaude, and there layde by their ordinaunce, and from thence came to the Citie of Courmay (which then was vnder the Emperour and out of the french kings hands) and so tooke their iorney home-warde thozow Flaunders and the armie there broken and dispatched. But when the Duke met with syz Robert Jernyngham at Bridges in Flaunders and knewe the kinges minde and entent, he did what he might to recreate the souldiours, which could not be, for many Englishe men shipped at Andwarpc, and many at Sluce, and at Mepozt and other Hauens, and they that were at Calice were stayed for a time, but when the Duke sawe that he could not bring al his armie together scarcely the fourth part, he then licensed the remnaunt to depart. Of thys breaking bp of the armie were letters sent to the king, which incontinent stopped the Lozde Mountioy and sent his men into the Countrey agayne. The Duke and other Capitaynes hearing of the kings displeasure, were soze abashed, and did write to their friendes that they had perfite knowledge that the Duke of Burbon had broken by his campe for the extremity of the Winter, and also shewed that their souldiours dyed, and vitayle fayled, which caused them to breake the army, for of truth the souldiours would not abide: with which reasons the king was somewhat appeased, and so on good hope the Duke came to Calice the twelwe day of December, and there abode long, till their friends had sued to the king for their returne. And when it was graunted, and that they were returned, the Duke and the Capitaines came not to the kings pzeence in a long season, to their great heauinesse and displeasure: But at the last all things were taken in good part, and they well receyued, and in great loue, fauour, and familiaritie with the king.

While the Duke of Suffolk was in fraunce and the Erle of Surrey on the Marches of Scotland, the Cardinall sent out commissions in the moneth of October through the realme, that euery man that was worth .xl. pound should pay the whole subsidy befoze graunted out of hande, and befoze the dayes of payment. This payment was called an Anticipation, which is to say, a thing taken, or a thing comming befoze his time or season: This terme was new to y<sup>e</sup> Comunaltie, but they payd well for their learning, for their money was payed out of hand without delay.

The king this yeare kept his Christmas solempnely at his Castell of Wyndsoze and thether came to him the thyrde daye of Januarie the Erle Mountiuer of the royall bloud of Bytayne and pretending to be Duke of the same, which was nere Cosin to the Duke of Burbon and banysed Fraunce. Thys Erle came hastily from the Duke of Burbon and was well entertayned and feasted of the king, and after aunswere made to him by the king, he went to the Cardinal to Hampton court, and so with great spede returned to the sayd Duke into the countrie of Prouince.

In the same season was brought to the court a Gentleman of Scotland called Andrew Steward taken on the sea with diuers letters by one Water Jago a yoman of the kinges, with diuers letters from the Duke of Albany to the French king, by reason whereof the king knew much of their counsaile. This Gentleman payed ransome and was very soone redeemed.

The .xii. day of Januarie six sayze shippes of fraunce well appoynted met with a ship of the kinges of England called the Caterine Galley a ship of forty tonne, the Capitayne whereof was one John Harmer, with a small company, for many of his company were a lande: But he so encoraged his men that all feare was set asyde, and euer as the frenchmen approached, they bette them of with arrowes, pikes, and fighting, and still they continued from foure of the clocke in the morning till nine of the clocke, and euer on the coast of England, and the Englishmen dyd the best they could to saue themselves: for by that time shee had spent her powder, arrowes with shooting, and her byls with hewing, and her pikes with keeping them of from comming aboard, and al the company almost soze hurt, and the Capitaine wounded to the death so that they had no other remedy but to sayle. This chace was perceyued by one called Capytayne Markam, Capitayne of the Barke of Sandwyche shippes perceiuing that, lett their chace and made with the Barke of Sandwyche. The Capitaine couragiously comforted his men and made the quarters of his shippe defensable. The Frenchmen set on fierly, and their toppes were higher then the toppe of the English shippe. Out went the ordinaunce, quarels and dartes of the french shippes: the Englishmen shot fierly again, and when the frenchmen profered to enter, the Englishmen bette them of with bylles. The frenchmen at the last with a great gunne bette downe the toppe of the Barke and slue the men in the same, and lastly they strake downe his Mast. This conflict continued from ten of the clocke tyll two at after noone. Then he could make no shifte, but to sayle: and euer the Englishmen shot arrowes, and while the Englishmen had any arrowes the frenchmen durst not enter: But when their arrowes were spent, the frenchmen came aboard all at once and entered the Barke. In this fight were slayne of french men out of hand .xxvij. and .i. soze hurt, and of the Englishmen were slayne .xxiiij. What should I saye, the Englishmen fought valiantly but they were to weake for six talle shippes. Wherefoze they were taken and brought to Depe for a price, but the frenchmen saide they neuer bought price so dere. After this John Harmer Capytayne of the Kateryn Galley dyed and many frenchmen that were hurt died at Depe, so that neyther part wan greatly.

In the last month called December were taken certaine Traytors in the Citie of Couentrie, one called Fraunces Phillip Scholemaister to the kings Henrmen, and one Christopher Pykering clerke of the Larder, and one Anthony Maynille Gentleman, which by the perswasion of the sayd Fraunces Phillip, entended to haue taken the kinges treasure of his subsidye as the Collectors of the same came towarde London, and then to haue raysed men and taken the Castell of Kyllingworth, and then to haue made battayle against the king: wherefoze the sayd Fraunces, Christopher and Anthoyne were hanged, drawne, and quartered at Tyborne the .xi. day of february, the residue that were taken, were sent to the Citie of Couentrie and there were executed. One of the kinges Henrmen called Dygby which was one of the conspirators fled the realme, and after had his pardon.

The .xviij. day of Januarie there was a sayze or marquet at the towne of Marguyson in the french kings dominions beside Calice, and for defence of the people and their marchandise, there were appointed two hundred men in harnesse well weaponed: the Souldiers of Gynnes heering of this, departed in the night and came nere to the towne of Marguyson, and closely kept themselves tyll the Market was faire and at the best, then the Englishmen which were .i. Archers and bylles, set sodainly on the Market, that seyng the frenchmen stood manfully at their defence with handgunnes and pykes, but the Engliche men thotte so wholly together that they draue the Frenchmen out of the towne, and would for succors haue taken the churche but the Englishmen were betweene them and the Churche, so that they had none other remedy but to flee and many French men were slayne. Capitaine John de Bounde, and Capitaine John de Babage and diuers other were taken prisoners, and diuers Marchantes that were there to sell their goodes were also taken, and all their goodes brought in Frenchmens wagones to Gysnes and no Englishman slaine but diuers were soze hurt.

The first day of February the baliannt knight sir Robert Teringham and with him fiftie Demilaunces of the garison of Calice skoured the country to Dirsaell and there tooke a hundred hedde of Beastes, by that doing an askry rose through the country, wherby the Frenchmen gathered together to the number of twelue score, and oz Sir Robert and his companye came to Houndingbridge they were beset rounde about, so that of necessitie they must fight, the Frenchmen set on with handgunnes, Crosbowes and pykes, and for a while there was a strong encounter, but the Englishmen as men desperate (because of the number) fought so fierlye that they caused the Frenchmen to gene backe and slew many of them and tooke. xiii. prisoners, and in the chase they toke seauen moze which made by one and twentie. Then the saide sir Robert returned with his bootie and prisoners and lost no man, but almost all were hurt.

The. v. day of March the king hauing a new harnesse made of his obne deuise and fashon, such as no Armozer befoze that time had seene, thought to assay the same at the tilte, and appointed a Justes to serue him. On foote were appointed the Lorde Marques Dorset and the Erle of Surrey, the king came to the one ende of the tilte, and the Duke of Suffolk to the other: then a Gentleman sayd to the Duke, sir the king is come to the tiltes ende. I see him not sayd the Duke on my faith, for my Headpeere taketh from me my sight: with these wordes God knoweth by what chaunce, the king had his speare deliuered him by the Lorde Marques, the visor of his Headpeere being by a not downe nor fastened, so that his face was cleane naked. Then the Gentleman sayde to the Duke, sir the king commeth, then the Duke set forwarde and charged his speare, and the king likewise braduisedly set toward to the Duke: the people perceiuing the kinges face bare, cryd hold, holde, the Duke neyther saw nor heard, and whether the king remembered that his visor was by or no, se we could tell: Alas what sorrow was it to the people when they saw the splinters of the Dukes speare strike on the kinges Headpeere: for on a suertie the Duke strake the king on the browe right vnder the defence of the Headpeere on the very coyfe, scull, oz bassenet: eue wher vnto the barbet for power oz defence is charnelled, to which coyfe oz bassenet neuer Armozer taketh heede, for it is evermore couered with the visor, barbet and bolant peere, and so that peere is so defended that it forreth of no charge: But when the speare on that place lighted, it was great ieopardie of death in so much that the face was bare, for the Dukes speare brake all to thryuers, and bare the kinges visor oz barbet so farre backe by the counter buffe that all the kinges Headpeere was full of splinters. The Armozers for this matter were much blamed, and so was the Lord Marques for the deliuering of the speare when his face was open, but the king saide that none was to blame but himselfe, for he intended to haue sayed himselfe and his sight. The Duke incontinently v. armed him, and came to the king, shewing him the closeness of his sight, and sware that he would neuer runne against the king moze: But if the king had beene a litle hurt, the kinges seruantes would haue put the Duke in ieopardy.

Then the king called his Armozers and put all his peeres together and then tooke a speare and ranne sixe courses very well, by the which all men might perceiue that he had no hurt, which was great ioye and comfort to all his subiectes there present.

In this yere the king sent the Lorde Moxley, sir William Hopy knight, and Doctoz Lee his Almoner to Done Ferdinando Archeduke of Austrich, and brother to the Emperoz Charles, with the order of the Garter, which in the towne of Moxrynberge receyued the same, where then were all the princes of Germanie assembled at a counsaill oz dyet, against the bishop of Rome, agaynst whom the Germaines put a hundred grieues.

The. xiiij. day of Aprill one Capitaine Bearton one of the Capitaines of the aduenturers at Gysnes with. xviij. tall men, came to a billage called Wasse, and there tooke a bootie of beastes, by which takyng an askrie arose, and by chaunce certaine of the garrison of Bulleyn were then abroad, and by the cry of the people came where the Engliche men were, the Frenchmen were two hundred horsemen, and with great cryes emironed the Engliche men about, so that the Englishmen could make no defence. Then Capitain Bearton called to the Capitaine of the Frenchmen, and sayde, sir I am a Gentleman, and this enterprize was mine, I haue brought these good felowes to this ieopardie, wherfore we yeelde vs all prisoners to you, and so they deliuered their weapons, the Capitaine was a Gentleman and gently them receyued, then to the men of warre drewe all the prisoners oz chozles of the Countrey nye hande to the number of. viij. oz. viij. score, which desyred to bye the Englishmen that were taken, the Frenchmen were content, and tooke money, then the Englishmen were deliuered to the bylandishe people, and the men of warre roade away.

When the men of warre were departed the rybaudes with Pykes, Fauces, and knyues, fell on the Englishmen which had no weapon, & them slue all. xviij. and cut them in pieces the most shamefully that euer was seene.

Capitaine Bearton murdered.

When knowlege hereof was brought to the Capitaine of Gysnes sir John Gage, he sent for the aduenturers, willyng them to reuenge their Capitaynes death. So all the aduenturers the. xiiij. day gathered together to the number of. xl. archers and pykes, and by good guyde the next day in the moynyng they came to the same billage of Wasse, and there toke. xxxviij. prisoners, and most part were at the murder of Bearton and his company, and of the. xxxviij. they slue. xxxviij. and so they left one, and caryed him with them, but oz they departed they set the towne on fyre, and spared nothing, their yre was so great: the men of warre of fraunce costed the English men, but they would not meddle with them in that rage.

The murders reuenged.

When they came to Gysnes they sware the Frenchman that was left on liue, to declare their message to the Capitaine of Bulleyn, which was that after that day they would saue neyther man, woman, nor childe, that came to their handes for the great crueltie that the bysantz had done to Captaine Breerton and his companye, wyth which message the frenchemen were discontent, and sayde that the villaynes deserued to haue vengeaunce for their crueltie.

In this yere through bookes and pronostications made and calculate by Astronomers, the people were sore afrayd for the sayd wyrters declared, that this yere should be such Eclipses in watry signes, and such coniunctions, that by waters and floods many people should perish. In somuch that many persons vittayled themselves and went to high groundes for feare of drowning, and specially one Bolton, which was Prior of Saint Bartholomewes in west Smithfield in London, builded him an house vpon Harowe of the hill, onely for feare of this flood, and thether he went and made prouision for all thinges necessary within him, for the space of two Monethes: But the faithful people put their trust & confidence only in God. And this raine was by the wyrters pronosticate to be in february, wherefore when it began to raine in february, the people were much afrayde, and some sayde now it beginneth, but many wise men which thought that the worlde coulde not be drowned againe, contrary to Goddes promise, put their trust in him onely, but because they thought that some great raynes might fall by inclinations of the stars, and that water mylles might stande still and not grynde, they prouided for meale, and yet God be thanked there was not a fairer season in many yeres, and at the last the Astronomers for their excuse sayde, that in their computation, they had mistaken and miscounted in their number an hundred yeres.

The Emperour Charles which also was enemy to the french king, seeing the great armpe that the king of Englande his confederate had in Fraunce, thought it was to him honozable to make warre also on that part of Fraunce that ioyneth to Spaine, and in especially he imagined how to recover the towne of Fountraby, which the frenchmen befoze that tyme had gotten: wherefore he assembled a great puissaunce, and made Capitaine the Lorde Barnardine de Belasco Constable of Castile, which with great diligence came befoze the towne of Fountraby which was strongly fortifyed, and the Capitaine thereof was a flaueroy: but when the Capitaine and his company saw the towne besieged with such a puissance, and also that the sea was so narrowly kept that they could not haue vittaille nor succor, they determined to geue vp the towne: but yet the Capitaine of a high stomack shot out his ordinaunce, and sent his trompet to the Capitain of the Spaniardes to know what prisoners he had of his, and for the communication thereof he desired abstinence of warre till he had communed with the Counsaile of the Spanishe hoste, which to him was graunted. Then was communication for fiue dayes, and nothing ended, for the Spaniardes were haute on the one syde, and the frenchmen proude on the other syde, but on the sixt day it was concluded that the towne should be deliuered wyth ordinaunce and Artillarie, and all the men of warre to depart wyth bagge and baggage, and so the .xxij. day of february was the towne of Fountraby brought againe to the handes of the Emperour, and he that was Capitaine of Fountraby was afterwarde restored to his landes in flauerre by the Emperour, and became his man.

The Bishop of Rome called Pope Clement seeing the great warres that were this yere on all parties, and in especiall betwene the Emperour and

and the king of Englande on the one partie, agaynst fraunces the french king and his alpes, sent an Archebishop of the realme of Naples first to the french king, and after to the Emperour, which declared to the french king the manifold mischiefes that tyme by warre, the great stroke of vengeaunce that God will strike for vniust warre and specially for the death of innocents and effusion of Christen blood, and shewed farther, that the sayd french king made dayly warre on the Emperour, and the king of England without cause, but only because he himselfe would do no right to them, nor to their subiects.

The french king after counsaile taken answered, my Lorde Legate, we assure you that we make no warre, but warre is made on vs, & we stand at the defence, notwithstanding our right is kept from vs, both the Duchy of Millain, and realme of Naples, by the Emperour, and the vsurped Duke, to the which we haue good tittle, and the king of England warreth on vs without cause, notwithstanding that we haue geuen him and many Lordes of his Counsaile diuers sayre pencions, not because we be afrayde of hym, but because we woulde haue his loue and amitie, & when we perceyued that he toke part with the Emperour our mortal enemy, we withdrew our pencions as with right we might, and now with all his power he would conquere our good will, which is against reason, and we claime nothing of him. Well sayd the Ambassadoz, I will first speake with the Emperour, & after with the king of England, and then I will declare to you theyr rightes and demaundes, wyth which the french king seemed to be content.

Then the sayde Ambassadour tooke his leaue and in post came to the Emperour in Spaine, and there exhorted him to peace with many goodly reasons, affirmyng that the warre was vniust and without reasonable cause made on the french king, as the sayd king affirmed. Then the Emperour like a noble prince answered, that the warres were neuer of his beginning: for the french king or he wist had taken the towne of Fountraby, and also had sent an army to conquere the realme of flauerre, and not with this contented, retayned the Swyches which be the Emperours subiectes, and caused them to be enemies to the Emperour, and he also withhelde the Duchie of haute Burgoyne, and the Countie of Arthors wyth diuers other Countreies, and seignories belongyng to him: wherefore his quarell was alway iust, and because the College of Rome should perceiue y<sup>e</sup> whole cause of his warres, he deliuered to y<sup>e</sup> said Ambassadour a scedule, wyth which he departed, refusing all gistes which the Emperour offered him, & came againe to the french king, and rehersted to him the Emperours sayng, but the french king himselfe highly excused and sayd, that he might not lese that that his predecessors left him, & so the Bishop of Romes Ambassadour tooke his leaue and came into England.

In the beginning of this .xvi. yere, the king lay at his Maner of Newhall in Essex, and there kept the feast of saint George, and hearing that the Bishop of Romes Ambassadour was coming into Englande, removed to his Maner of Grenewiche where the sayde Archebishop and Legate came to him, and was highly entertayned, which declared wisely and eloquently the message and entent of his maister, which was to make a peace and concord betwene the princes of christendome, and especially betwene the Emperour, the king of England and the french king, & for that cause he had bene wyth the Emperour, & also wyth the french king, which as he sayde affirmed, that without cause the king of Englande made on him warre, considering that he to the intent to haue the more amitie and fauor of you and your nobles hath liberally geuen to you and them honorable pencions, which by no duetie as he affirmeth you can nor may clayme, but of his beneuolence and bountie. Also he sayeth that you claime his crowne, realme, and possessions, which toucheth him highly, and of yours he claymeth nothing, and therefore he thinketh of right you ought not to make him warre. Wherefore maye it please your highnesse to tell me your mind, and I shal it declare to the whole Court of Rome God wylling and forget nothing.

Then the Kyng called to him his counsaile and after diuers consultations had, the Ambassadoz was sent for, and there was shewed to him many recordes, prouing the king of Englande to be inheritour to the realme of Fraunce by bloud, and also confirmed by dyuers Charters in the time of king Charles the scuenth. And as concernyng the pencion, to him was shewed dyuers Charters, that it was no pencion of friendship, but due rent for the Duches of Normandie and Guyan, and the Countreies of Aniou and Maine, which are the king of Englandes berie enheritaunce. Farthermore there were shewed to him diuers bondes of the sayde French kinges for the payment for the Citie of Tournay, and other duties which he ought to the king of Englande, all which articles to fulfill, the French king hath oftentimes bene required by Ambassadors, and yet he euer dissembled, and would not conforme himselfe to reason: of all these things were notes wozitten and deliuered to the Byshop of Romes Ambassadour, which tooke his leaue of the king and returned in post accompanied but with three persons. By reason of the comming of this Ambassadoz men hoped that peace should ensue, but it succeeded not this yere: for the thirde daye of Maye the garrison of Bulleyn with dyuers other in the most secret wise that coude be, came to a place within the Englishe pale called Senticas, and sodainely strake by a Droume or Droumslade: the people hearing this in the night were soze abashed, some fled naked and some clothed, the most part fled to the Churche, and the Frenchmen them folowed, and tooke .xxj. prisoners, and then set fyre on the Churche: By this time was all the pale rayled, which thing the Frenchmen perceuyng, left their bootie and returned in all haste with their prisoners to Bulleyn.

In this season the Lordes of Flaunders laye at the siege before Tyzwoyn, and were lykely to haue taken it by famine, whereof the French king beyng aduertised assemb'ed an armie of .xxij. thousand horsemen and footemen vnder the conduit of the Duke of Vandosme, and the Lord Bountozmy, and the French king himselfe came downe to Amvas, and there caused it to be nosped that he would besiege the towne of Valencyen in Henaude, where the Duke of Suffolke the last yere had left the king of Englandes ordinaunce. The king of England hearing of this, sayde, that if the French king besieged Valencyen, he in person would go thether for to rescue hys ordinaunce. The Lorde fynes and other Lordes of Flaunders which laye before Tyzwoyn with .ix. thousand men were aduertised of the French army, but because of the fame that the hoste should go to Valencyen, they sent for no more succours.

lencyen and toke the way directly to Tyzwoyn. When the Lordes of Flaunders perceued that, they were soze abashed, and then they knewe that they were decepued, and that they were not able to abide the purssuance of the French armie. Wherefore they rayled their siege, and put themselves in order of battayle on the Southeast side of Tyzwoyn: the French armie passed forward the sixt daye of Maye toward Tyzwoyn and made no semblance to fight: Howbeit some of them skirmished with the horsemen of Flaunders, but they at the last entered the towne, whereunto they were welcome, and the Lordes of Flaunders departed soze displeased, but there was no remedie. Then ranne a brute that the French army would laye siege to Guynes: wherefore the king caused men and all other things to be put in a readinesse for the speedie rescue thereof if it had so chaunced. But the Frenchmen tooke a better aduise.

In thys Month of Maye s<sup>r</sup> Robert Jernyngham Capitaine of Newnam bridge commoned with Christopher Coo, a Capitayne of dyuers Englishe ships that kept the Sea, which then was in Calice hauen for vitayle, and sayde, Capitaine Coo you know how the Bulleyners haue visited nere to Calice the Englishe pale, and haue burned Sentrycas. If you will promise to set many of your men a lande at the hauen of Bulleyn the .xix. daye of Maye, I with as manye as I can furnishe will meete with you there in Base Bulleyn at the time and houre betweene by appointed, to the which the sayde Christopher agreed and saythfully promised, and so prepared accordingly euery thing necessarie and so sayled toward Bulleyn, s<sup>r</sup> Robert Jernyngham sent worde of this enterprize to s<sup>r</sup> William Fitzwilliam Capitaine of Guynes to know if he would aide any part toward this iourney, which sent worde that he would be at the same auenture himselfe: then all the gentlemen desired him to be Capitaine of that enterprize, which he thankfully and with hart receyued: then all the men of warre and the aduenturers and the Baylie of Marke assembled together, so that when all were come together, they were three hundred horsemen, and of the Countrey and Marke three hundred and of the auenturers. C. lx. and so one an other they were seven hundred men. All these persons met at an houre appointed at Sandyngheld: the night was short so that it was daye or they came nere Bulleyn all set in good order of battayle, but they were ascried before they came nere Bulleyn, and so it chaunced that Christopher Coo with his ships which had winde at will, was come with his foure shippes before Bulleyn somewhat before day, the Bulleyners that kept the watch him espied, & then he manned his Boates and with men and ordinaunce stretched toward the lande, by that time was all Base Bulleyn in harnesse readie to defende the Englishe men from landing, but Capitayne Coo did what he might, and almost all the people of Base Bulleyn were on the shore, that seyng the garrison, made them readie and bent their ordinaunce. Sir William Fitzwilliam hearing the soundes toward the hauen side, knewe well that Christopher Coo was in his businesse, and so encouraged euery man to do well and marched forward with as much speede as might be, in so much that all the Englishe men were on the hilles before Bulleyn in sundry plumpes, then issued out the horsemen of Bulleyn betweene the Castell and Cardons Tower, the light horsemen of the English part them encountered, there was a good fight fight, the French men shot with Crosbowes, and the Engliche men wyth long bowes, and the great ordinaunce shot terribly, the English men approached the towne walles, this skirnishe was fierce and euer the archers ayded the horsemen. While the horsemen were thus skirnisshyng, the eyght scoze aduenturers which were hardie and balpant men cast themselues about and came to base Bulleyne, and there they were hardily receyued of the French men, yet notwithstanding they lost their barriers and the English men entered, there was shooting on all sides, and a strong fight. The Frenchmen cryed Bulleyne, and the Engliche men saint George Calice: but at the last the frenche men were driuen back and many slayne, and .xliij. taken prisoners, and so they returned to their Capitaine s<sup>r</sup> William Fitzwilliam. All this while was Christopher Coo on land on the sea coast, and bet the French men by to the towne, and when the tide turned, he with all hys came agayne in safetie to their shippes. The Engliche horsemen after long fightyng tooke three of the Frenchmen of armes, and the other reculed to the towne. By thys time by reason of the alarme was all the Countrie of Picardie rayled and much people resozted to Bulleyne on all sides, which doyng s<sup>r</sup> William Fitzwilliam wisely perceyuing, by the sounde of a Trumpet brought all his men together in a plumpe, and then sent them hither and thether to fet hys driftes of beastes that were nere in the Countrie on euery side, which was quickly done, for the aduenturers brought Oren, Kyne, Hozles, and many other pillages, and brent the granges and villages, and so met together, and with their bootie returned in safetie.

The Tuesday folowynge, beyng the last day of May, s<sup>r</sup> William Fitzwilliam, with a hundred and fiftie horsemen, and the aduenturers, and a hundred other persons mo, came to a place called Samer de Boys, the sayde Capitaine wisely considered, that in that place the Frenchmen had dyuers times lurked, and taken at auantage the Engliche men, wherefore he layte his horsemen, & his archers on horseback in a wood, in a waite if the french men folowed the stalle: then he sent forth the aduenturers, which passed farther then the Capitaine would that they should haue done, and sodainly they were ascryed: then on came the frenchmen, the aduenturers sware that they would not flie, but bent themselues to defend their enemies, which were thre hundred horsemen. The frenche men knewe well their hardinesse, but yet they called them Crakers, which by misoundyng was commonly called Brekers, for a suretie these men were hardie, and full of pollicie, and verie farre would ieparde, the frenchmen sent about a Waley, a hundred of the best horsemen, and two hundred footemen, then were the Brekers betwene two bendes of the french men: s<sup>r</sup> William Fitzwilliam, beyng assured of the conduit of the french men, much doubted the chaunce of the aduenturers, wherefore in great haste sent for his stalle of horsemen that he had left couered: and the frenchmen that were befoze the Brekers, came and set on very fast, in hope of their horsemen that were gone about an hill in the Waley. The Englichemen them valiantly defended, then as the horsemen had compassed the hill, the aduenturers were come on a playne: then the horsemen that were come to s<sup>r</sup> William Fitzwilliam, set on the french horsemen, there was a hard and a fierce encounter, for the french men fought soze, but at length they fled, and in the chase were taken. lvi. horsemen, and .xliij. slaine one one and other, and many Engliche men soze hurt and dyuers slayne, thus the Brekers scaped a narrow hazard.

In June, s<sup>r</sup> William Fitzwilliam, Capitaine of Gupnes, s<sup>r</sup> John Wallop, and Sir John Gage, secretly called to them. ix. C. men of warre such as they trusted, and on Whidsomer day, passed the lowe Countrie of Picardie into the Castell of Hardyngham, or Bigsam and they caried with them but one piece of ordinaunce called a Curtall, thys Sonne they bent against the castel, which was well furnished with harnesse, ordinaunce, and al other artillierie, and things needefull, and the Capitaine also was a balpant and hardie gentleman. The Englichmen euer shot that peere and remoued it from place to place with great paine, & in conclusion made a batterry of the walles, so that they might assault it, then the Trumpet blew to the assault, and the Capitaine with his compaigne stode at defence: then s<sup>r</sup> John Wallop, & s<sup>r</sup> John Gage with the aduenturers or Brekers entred the ditch, and the archers shot at euery loupe arrowes, and the frenchmen likewise shotte quarelles: the Englichemen set by Ladders to the walles, but the frenchmen threwe them downe, at this assault was slaine a Gentleman called Butler, and .xb. other Engliche men, but for all that the assault was not left, for some climed by pikes, and some amended the Ladders, and cryed againe to the assault: but s<sup>r</sup> William Fitzwilliam chiefe Capitaine of this enterpryse, perceyued that they lacked engynes and other thinges for the spedie assault of the Castell, and not willyng to lose his men without cause, caused them to stay, while he and other Capitaynes counsayled together, and as they were concluded once againe to attempt the assault, they heard newes that two thousand horsemen, and two thousand footemen, were at hande to fight with them, they then perceyuing that nine hundred men beyng wery, were no power to encounter wyth foure thousand frenchmen, they in good order returned to the English Fortresses.

Mounfire de Bees Capitaine of Bulleime, well considered all the enterprises, that the Englichmen had done in Picardy and Fraunce, now of late: he determined to requite them, to his honoz and fame, and for that purpose, sent for the Erle of Dampmartine, the Lorde Bountremie, and the Lorde Chastillon, which concluded to enter the English pale, and to shew themselues befoze Calice. Wherefore they assembled all the men of armes and Souldiers, of the garrisons about and so they were. viij. hundred good horsmen, and with Pikes, Gunnes, and Crossebowes. viij. hundred footemen: and when all this company was assembled Mounfire de Bees as Capitaine of this iourney, with the other Lordes, the fourth daye of August wyth banner displayed, came towarde Calice in the euening: and the next daye in the morning by six of the clocke, they came to a village within the English pale, called Bonynge. Then the Alarme rose through al the English pale, and so came to Calice. These lordes of Fraunce sent out their foreriders to serch and ouer see the country, & then they laide an embushment of thre hundred horsemen, at the said towne of Bonynge, and with that bend abode Mounfire Bountremie and Mounfire de Bees rode to Kalkewel with thre hundred fresh horsemen, and all the footemen with banner displayed, and foraged all the Country, of which thre hundred speres, they let one hundred go at large and kept the residue with them.

When the Alarme came to Calice, every man made to horse and harnesse. Then sir Robert Feringham with .lxxx. horsemen with all speede, rode out of Calice to beholde the companie of the Frenchmen. And he sent forth his light horsemen, which met with the skourers of the French men, and because the French men seemed a fewe in number, the English foreriders pressed toward them, which fledde toward Sandifield, and the Englishmen chased after, not being of knowlege of the embushments, that lay at Woynnes, and Kalkewell.

When sir Robert Feringham sawe his light horsemen chase, he followed after soft, to kepe his horse in brette. Then sodainly the French men that were in chase returned, for some of their ayde was nere them. When the Englishmen which passed not .xvi. horse, sawe the Frenchmen returne, they encountered with them manfully, but to the Frenchmen came still mo and mo, so that the Englishmen were constrained to flie another way, to the hie land in great ieopardie, for the Frenchmen them pursued, but by the helpe of the light Geldynges, the Englishmen gat the Sea syde, or sea sandes beyonde Skales: Then were the Englishmen glad and returned, and fought with the Frenchmen hande to hande, for the Frenchmen behinde followed not the chase, but onely twentie horsemen, and with pure fighting the Englishmen tooke one of the French horsemen, and came with hym to Calice, and so were saved.

When sir Robert Feringham sawe his men in chase (as you have heard) and sawe that they were in great ieopardie, he aduanced for their rescue all that he might, which was the saving of the light horsemen, for the French men left them, to encounter with sir Robert Feringham, and so it was that he went so farre forward, that the Frenchmen were betweene hym and Calice. And when he sawe all the bendes and embushments breake out, he sayd to his companie: sirs Saint George to bozow, let these French galantes know what we English men be: Sir sayd his companie, they shall buy us dere. Then he marched toward the high lande: Then approached a great number of horsemen of Fraunce, the Englishmen them valiantly received, and manfully defended, but ever the Frenchmen came fresh and fresh, so that the Englishmen being wery and oppressed with multitude, were faine to flie: and in this chase was taken Thomas Cheyne an Archer, whose horse was tyed, and two other Archers on horsebacke, one called George Karre, and the other Rowlande Atkinson, and thre other of the English pale: sir Robert and the remnant saved themselves the best that they coude.

When sir Robert was returned, the Frenchmen sounded their trompet, and recued to Bulleyn, and sent worde to Calice, that they would visit them oftener. Sir Robert Feringham remembryng this chaunce, thought to be revenged of the same, and so advyng himselfe to what place hee should repare, he remembred that when soever the Englishmen made any iourney to Margyson, the Frenchmen would flie over the water or creke, to a highe ground by boates, and there as it were in an Island save themselves, because on that syde they might ever have succors, for the creke or water, is beyonde the towne of Calice. Therefore the sayd sir Robert caused five great boates to be carryed in Wagons, and so he with other Capitaynes, of Calice, and Guines, Guines, to the number of thre hundred footemen, with the Arcekers, and .lx. horsemen the .xij. day of August, with Banners displayed, tooke their way to the towne of Margyson, and in the night the light horsemen gaue alarme to the towne of Bulleyn, and tooke two Souldiours prisoners, and brought with them certaine Cattails to their companie. Then the Englishmen marched forward, toward Margyson, that seeing the Frenchmen, tooke their Boates in trust of the water, and passed over, the Englishmen perceived that, and launced their Boates, and so like adventurers entered, and by force passed, and so mo and mo, till a hundred .lx. were passed over: the Countrey began to gather, so that the Frenchmen were thre hundred, which fought with the Englishmen, and would have letted the Boates to land, but the Archers on the other syde draue them backe, and the Englishmen slue at the first encounter .lx. men, and tooke .xl. prisoners, yet the Frenchmen that fled met with new succors, and then began a new battail, and the Frenchmen fought hardily, but at the ende they fled, the most poorest of the people, on the other syde of the water, fled to the Church, and abode at their defence, then was there fyre set in the Church, then the French men lept out of the Church, to their destruction, for of thre hundred there was saved but sixtie on live.

The whole power of Bulleyn was come downe, nere to the place: but when they perceyued that it was to late, and that the Englishmen were returned, they came no further. Thus was sir Robert Feringham even with the Frenchmen, and brought a good bootie, and many prisoners to Calice, which sore grieved the Capitaine of Bulleyn.

The Frenchmen perceyving, that they gat little at the Englishmens handes, thought to take their advauntage of the Fleminges, wherfore they assembled of the garrisons, of Bulleyn and Cirwyn, five hundred footemen, and thre hundred horsemen, and so in good order marched toward saint Omers & they sent to go a foraging one hundred footemen, and as many horsemen, and the rest kept themselves in a stalle. These Frenchmen came by Arlus, nigh to saint Omers, and foraged all the Countrey, the alarme sprang al the Countrey to Turnahan, the Capitaine of Turnahan sent worde to Sir William Fitzwilliam, Capitaine of Guines, that the Frenchmen were a-broade, which made answer, that if the Frenchmen came nere to hym, surely he would speake with them, with which answer the Capitaine of Turnahan being encouraged, sent forth two hundred Fleminges on foote, still the Frenchmen marched toward Turnahan, the Fleminges that were sent from Turnahan, marched toward the waye, tohere the Frenchmen shoulde come, thinking that when the Capitaine of Guines had set on them, that then they would have lven in the chase at the receipt.

The sayd Capitaine of Guines valiantly marched forward, with a hundred horsemen and foure hundred footemen, intending to meete with the Frenchmen, and sodainly as he was passing forward, worde was brought him that the Erle of Damarten, with the garrisons of Mustrel and Abulle, to the nuber of .vi. C. horsemen, were coming forward toward Guines. This heering sir William Fitzwilliam, sware that the Erle should not take paine to come to Guines, for he would meete him on the way: by this meane he left his first enterprise, & marched toward the Erle of Damartin.

The Frenchmen of Cirwin being thereof advertised by a Spye, called all all the people together, and with their bootie came on forwarde t owarde Turnahan, and sodainely they askryed the pooze Fleminges, which were sent out of the Castell of Turnahan, and when they perceyued the Frenchmen, coming toward them, they turned their backs, and fled like Racco: the Frenchmen folowed a pace, & slue the most part of them, for few escaped.

The Capitaine of Guyfnes came to a fayze Greene, five myle from Guyfnes, and there in good order of battayle, taried for the Erles coming, which heering that the Capitaine of Guyfnes, was readie to receiue hym, made his retorne backward, without any thing doing: when the Capitaine knew the truth of the Erles retorne, he then in all hast, sped hym to meete with the Frenchmen, that were coming to Turnahan, and in the meane waye, he heard tidinges of the chaunce of the Fleminges, and how the Frenchmen were reculed toward Tirwin, which aduenture soze him displeased, but there was no remedy, wherfoze he returned to Guyfnes again, very sozy that the Frenchmen went awaye vnfought withall: The Frenchmen litle medled after this time, wherfoze let vs now retorne, and shewe what warres were kept on the frontires, betwene England and Scotland, in this season.

The one and twentie day of Maye being Trinitie Sunday five hundred Scottes in the morning by severall fordes, entered into Englande, and laye couertly by the high waye, to distresse Marchauntes and Market men, that should passe to Berwike, that day to the faire: for every Trinitie Sunday, there is kept a great fayze, which the Scottes knew well, and as they lay thus lurking, they robbed many Marchauntes, and tooke rich prisoners but at the last they were perceyued, then the Alarme rose, and people began to gather, the Scottes drew together toward Branstone, and the Englishmen them assayled, which so manfully them defended, that if the yong Lorde of Fulbery, had not come with one hundred lyght horsemen, the Scottes had gon away with their bootie, but then began a soze fight, many were hurt on both sides, and some slayne, and at the last the Scottes fled, and in the chace there were two hundred Scottes taken prisoners, and the residue fled and saued themselves.

After this the fift daye of July, sir John a Fenwicke, Leonard Musgraue, and bastard Heron, and diuers other, gathered together. ix. hundred men and entred into Scotland, in the countrey called the Marche, and robbed and spoyled all the countrey, and by chaunce the same season, the Scots had assembled two thousand men, to inuade Englande, and none of these knewe of other, tyll they by aduenture met together. Then began a strong med'ye, for the Scottes fought valiantly a great while, and the Englishmen them hardely assayled, and at the last by fine force, caused them to leaue the grounde and flie, and in the fight were taken two hundred Scottes, and many slaine, of the which prisoners diuers were Gentlemen Sir Raufe of Fanwicke, Leonard Musgraue, and Bastard Heron, with .xxx. other Englishmen well horsed, folowed so far the chace, that they were past rescues of their company, which perceyuing the Scottes sodainly returned, and set on the Englishmen, which oppressed with multitude, were sone overcome, and there was taken sir Raufe a Fanwicke, Leonard Musgraue, and syr other, and Bastard Heron, and seauen other slayne, the remnaunt by chaunce escaped:

ped: the other Englishmen with their two hundred prisoners, returned safely into Englande: the slaying of the Bastard Heron, was moze pleasure to the Scottes, then the taking of the two hundred was displeasure, they hated hym so.

The seauenth day of July the Lorde Maxwell of Scotlande, and Sir Alexander Jordan, with banner displayed, and Scottes to the number of foure thousand, entered into England at the west Marches by Carleile, and began to burne on euery syde: then the Englishmen assembled on euery side and so they were in number two thousand men, and fierly set on the Scots, there was a great fight, for the space of an houre, at the last the Englishmen brake the array of the Scottes, and them discomfited, and tooke three hundred Scottes prisoners, the Englishmen that had taken prisoners, went away with their prisoners: For sir Alexander Jordan and his sonne & diuers were taken prisoners, & by their departing, the company of the Englishmen was much minished, the Lorde Maxwell being a politique man, perceyuing that, and sodainly called his people together, and them encouraged, and began a new skirmishe, and recouered all the prisoners almost, and tooke diuers English men prisoners, this was the chaunce of warre.

After this iourney, in the courte of parliament of Scotland, was much commoning of the warres, which were betwene Englande and Scotlande: some of the Nobles sayd, that Fraunce neuer did so much good to Scotland in twentie yeres, as Scotlande had lost by Englande, in one yere, for the loue and cause of Fraunce: wherfoze they thought it conuenient to make a perpetuall league of amitie, with the King of Englande, and to leaue the frenche kinges parte. Other Nobles which had pencions in Fraunce, declared the olde amitie betwene Fraunce and Scotlande, and how the french king, brought bp many Gentlemen of Scotlande in his Courte, geuing them great liuinges, which the king of Englande would not doe: they also alleged the franchises, and priuileges that the Scottes haue in Fraunce, and speciallye they shewed, that if the kynge of Scottes shoulde breake with Fraunce, and then if it happened the king of England, to inuade Scotlande, which beyng without ayde of any friend, might well by the power of England be conquered. After many long reasons it was thought expedient, to sue to the king of England for a truce, which was done, and a truce graunted tyll saint Andrewes daye.

A parliament holden by the Scots wher in they shewe many causes for the which they ought to beare with Fraunce before Englad.

This yere the first day of September, was Doctor Thomas Hamibal Myster of the Rolles, receyued into London, with Erles and Bishops, and dyuers other nobles and gentlemen, as Ambassador from Clement Bishop of Rome, which brought with him a Rose of Golde (the which sayeth Sledane was consecrated as is accustomed three weekes before Easter) for a token to the king, of the great loue that he bare vnto him, the people as he passed thought to haue sene the Rose, but it was not shewed, till he came to the king to Wyndsoze, on the day of the Natyuitie of our Ladye, on which day after a solempne Masse song by the Cardinall of Porke, the said present was deliuered to the king, which was a tree forged of fine gold, & wrought with branches, leaues and flowers, resembling Roses: this tree was set in a pot of Golde, which pot had three feete of antike fashon: the pot was of measure halfe a pinte, in the byppermost Rose, was a fayze Saphier loupe

perced, the bignesse of an Acozne, the tree was of heigth halfe an Englishe yarde, and in bredth it was a foot. The sayd Ambassadoz in delyuering the same rose, made an oration, declaryng the good minde, loue and fauor, that the Bysshop of Rome bare to the king, in token whereof he sent him that present, which the king thankfully receyued, and deliuered it to him agayne, and so he bare it open before the king, from the Colledge to the great chamber, and there deliuered it to the mayster of the Jewell house, and so there ended hys Legation.

Before this time in the Month of July, Lorde Archebalde Douglas Erle of Anguise, which had married the Queene of Scottes, sister to the king of Englande, and was sent into Fraunce by the Duke of Albany, and there kept, contrarie to hys will and pleasure, and from thence hardely escaped, and came to the king of Englande, to his manor of Grenewiche, and there besought him of his aide and comfort, to whom the king made a gentle aunswere. Thys Erle was not in the fauour of his wyfe the Queene of Scottes, wherefore she caused him to be sent into Fraunce: some sayd that she loued the Duke of Albany better then him, but whatsoeuer the matter was, she wrote to the french king, that if the Erle euer came againe into Scotlande, that the french king should haue no pleasure in Scotlande, that she might let, so that the Erle being in Fraunce, was in ieoperdie of his life. Wherefore secretly he fled and came into England as you haue heard, and one daye at the Castell of Wyndsoze he declared, that in the counsaile of Fraunce when he was there, they happened in communication, to talke of the warres that were then, betweene the Emperour and the french king, and betweene the king of Englande and the french king: there was a Lorde of the counsaile that stood by and sayde, it were better that one person suffered, rather then all the realme should be daylie in this mischiefe. Then was it asked, what he meant by that one person, he aunswere, that if the french Quene, which was lame and bgly were dead, that then wayes might be found, that the french king should marry the Emperours sister, and to haue with her the Duchy of Millain, and then with the money of her marriage, the king of England should be payde, and so a peace might be concluded: to this no aunswere was made, but whether this were true or false, for a truth the french Queene was dead the .xxvi. day of July, & was buried at S. Denise.

The Duke of Burbon this Sommer made sharpe warre on the french kings dominions, and did high enterprizes: wherefore the king of Englande sent his letters to diuers Lordes and gentlemen in this season, the tenor wherof ensueth. Trusty. &c. For as much as (our Lord God be thanked) our armie, vnder the leading of our Cosyn the Duke of Burbon, hath not onely entered the rea'me of Fraunce, gainyng and attayning many towones, Cities, Castels, and places, with the whole countrie of Prouince, without anye resistance of our auncient enemye the french king, but also goeth daylie marchyng, and continually doth chase, and driue before them suche men of warre, as our sayd enemye hath prepared for his defence, in resistance of our Cosyn the Duke of Burbon, and our sayde armie. In such wise that it is thought vndoubtedly, now to be most convenient time and season, eyther in our person (although the yere be somewhat past) or by a Lieutenaut with a payssaunt armie to inuade Fraunce on the other side, both for the recoueryng ryng of the Crowne, and to compell our sayde enemy, to knowledg his obstinate, wilfull, and erroneous demeanure, wherfore we will and commaund you to be readie with such power as you shall be able to make, vpon the next proclamation to be made, dated the tenth day of September.

After which letters sent forth, euery man made preparation accordinglye, and the people murmured and sayde, that it were much better, that the king should maintayne his warres with his awne subiectes, and spende his treasure on them, then to trust the Duke of Burbon, beyng a Traunger to spende his money.

The king beyng at Wyndsoze, to him came Syr Anthony Fitz Herbert one of the Iustices of the common place, a man of excellent learning in the lawe, as appereth by his workes, Syr Raufe Egerton knight, Doctor Denton Deane of Lichfield, which in the beginning of thys yere, were sent as Commissioners into Irelande, which so wisely endeuored themselves, that they reformed manye iniuries done in the Countie, and brought dyuers of the wilde Irishe by sayre meanes to a submission, and made by the kings auctoritie, the Erle of Kildare deputie of the lande, before whom the great Oonele bare the sworde, and the Lorde Piers Butler, called Erle of Ormound, which was Deputie of Ireland, was by the sayde commissioners, made high Treasorer of Ireland. And when they had set all things in good order, in the Moneth of September they tooke shippyng, and in the same Moneth came to the king, which gaue them hys hartie thankes for their good doyngs.

In this Month the king sent maister John Magnus priest, and Roger Watcliffe Esquier into Scotland, for the suretie of his nephew the king of Scottes, for diuers Lordes of Scotland, wrote to the king, that they doubted the suretie of their king, because the Duke of Albanie, which was heyre apparaunt to the realme of Scotland, had the king in gouernaunce, and also they thought, he beyng a Frenchman borne, should not rule their realme: wherefore they amongst themselves, murmured sore in this matter. The Duke heering that the Lordes of Scotland, had written to the king of England, and also that they repyned and grudged at his doynges, sodainly with all the treasure that he could make, departed from Scotland, and sayled into Fraunce, with which departyng the Commons were nothing sozr, and sone after his departyng, the Ambassadors of England were ioyously receyued into Scotland, and there the sayd Ambassadors tarped, till Marche twelue moneth, in which tyme, there were many conclusions driuen, betweene the two realmes: now let vs returne to Fraunce.

The .xxiii. day of September, three horsemen of the garrison of Bulleyn, which well knew the Hauen of Calice, came at a deepe tyde, and passed ouer Calice haue, by Rise banke in the night, and went behinde the East Wyndmill, and then toke land, and went to a little village called Middleway, and passed the Turne Dikes, and entred into a whelers house, and tooke the man and the wyfe, and .xx. pound in money sterlyng, and went away clere without ascrie or perceiuyng of the watche of Calice, and no man wist where they were become, till the Trompet of Bulleyn brought worde, and demaunded the ransome.

The last day of September, fiftie light horsemen of Calice, apperteynyng nyng to sir Robert Ferynyngham, rode toward Bulleyn, and passed the water of Marguison, and came to the water of Sclakes nere Bulleyn, where sodainly they encountered. lx. Frenchmen, of the garrison of Bulleyn, there was shotyng with long Bowes and Crosbowes on euery syde, strong was the fight, but at the last the Frenchmen fled, the Englishmen folowed, and tooke thre light horsemen, and when they perceiued the alarme on euery side, they put themselves in array, and with their bootie came to Calice.

The same day sir Thomas Palmer, with. lx. horsemen of Guisnes, encountered with the Capitaine Bertram, leader of the horsemen of the Erle Dammartyn, with. lx. horsemen, there was a strong fight two houres together, but in the ende the Frenchmen fled, and the Englishmen folowed, and tooke. xliij. prisoners, and. xvi. good horse, and with this bootie they returned to Guisnes.

In this busye season, the aduenturers heeryng what the horsemen on their parties had done, and especially perceiuyng that the English horsemen had taken good prisoners, commoned amongst themselves, what was to be done: then one of their Capitaines sayd openly: sirs you see howe long we haue bene here, and wages we haue none, our liuyng ryseth on the gaine of our enemyes, and sith our beginnyng, we haue had good chaunce in all our enterpryses, God be thanked: nowe the winter draweth neere, let vs now aduenture to get some good bootie, to make vs merve with, in the colde weather, and if you will, we shall enterpryse a thing, that I trust to vs shall be profitable. Then all the companie cryed forth, forth. Then with a Banner of saint George, they marched toward a billage, lying toward Houstrell, hauyng only. xxb. light horsemen, to be their scourers, and they were not fully two hundred men. This companie folowyng their scourers, went farre on and had gotten a fayre bootie, of Dren, Kyne and other beastiall, and were nere at their returne, and by chaunce the same day, was the Erle of Dammartyn, & the Capitaine of Houstrell, with the power of the Duke of Wandosme, goyng toward Saint Omers, to burne and destroy that Countrey, and for that purpose they had gathered together. xv. hundred horsemen, and eight hundred footemen, howbeit, the footemen were a large myle behinde the horsemen.

The Frenchmen on horsebacke espyed the English horsemen, which perceiuyng the great number fled, and as the sayd Frenchmen marched forward, they espyed the aduenturers on foote, and made toward them: the Englishmen seeyng the great number of the horsemen, studied to get some hedge, or strong place to fortifie them, but there was no such place in sight, and also they had no such tyme so to do, wherefore the Capitaine sayd: Good felowes and brethren, we haue of long time bene called aduenturers, now is the time come of our aduenture, the Frenchmen will not raunsome vs for nothing, we be amongst them so feared: if any thing saue our lyues, it must be God and our hardynesse, and therefore sayd he, if you see me begin to flie, slay me out of hand. Then euery man cryed God mercy, and made themselves prest to the defence.

The Frenchmen came on, on euery syde, the Englishmen shot their arrowes, and defended them aswell as they coude: the Frenchmen perceiuyng that the Englishmen kept themselves so close, caused diuers of the horsemen

horsemen to light a foote, and so they did, and fought with their speares against the pykes, and shot with Crosbowes, on euery syde. Alas the while, for while the Englishmen had arrowes to shote, they were not broke, but close without perill, but when their arrowes were spent, the Englishmen fought valiantly, and slue many Frenchmen that lighted on foote, but in the conclusion the horsemen entered, and killed them all in maner, because there were so many of their company slaine, and tooke few of them prisoners. This was the end of these Companions, called the Brekers or aduenturers, which were as hardie men, as euer serued Prince or Capitaine.

The end of aduenturers.

The Duke of Bourbon, with the Marques of Picardie, in the moneth of October, with a great puyssaunce, layd siege to the strong towne of Harcell in Bourgne, and lay there a great space. The French king raised a great armie, and sware that he would rayse the siege, whereof heeryng the Duke of Bourbon, sent for the Marques of Biscare, and his other Capitaynes, and declared to them that his entent was to giue the French king battaille: the Marques of Biscare sayde that the French kinges puyssaunce was great, and theirs small, and sayde: although the Duke of Bourbon, which was a banished man from his Countrey, had no other remedie to reuenge him, but by battaille, yet he said he would not put all the Emperours men, of the which he had the guide, in such a hazard, till the remnaunt of the Emperours power were come. Well sayde the Duke of Bourbon, then you do not as you haue written, both to the Emperour, and to the king of England, which shall be a reproche to your honour: Nay sayd the Marques, I will kepe me from reproche. Then sayd Doctor Richard Pace, Ambassador for the king of England: my Lorde you haue had the king my Maysters wages, I would be glad to heare what way you would take: I will tell you sayd the Marques, the French king hath a great armie gone into Italy, and he himselfe foloweth with another, not to come to fight with vs, I dare assure you: but only to take the Duchie of Millaine vnprouided, which shall do him more pleasure then he had slaine all vs. Also the Emperour shall lesse more then ten Marceles be worth, and the French kinges power shall be more elated, that he will not set by the Emperour, nor the king of England. Therefore my aduice is, to breake by this siege, and with all speede to prevent him in Italy, and if we be entered the townes, and put munitions in the same, he shall lye a colde in the fieldes, and then you shall see what shall become of him, when his beastes dye, and his bittayle spent. To this counsaile the Duke and all the Capitaines agreed, and so brake by the siege, and with all hast departed into Italy, and fortified all the townes in the Duchie of Millain, with men and other necessaries.

The French king heeryng of this, with all his army passed the Mountaynes and camped nere to Millain. It chanced in this Moneth of Nouember the. xliij. day, about the towne of Calice, there fell a great mist, in which mist the Frenchmen came to a billage called Kaufe besyde Newnam bridge, and tooke. xl. beastes, then the Alarme was brought to Calice, which heeryng, the Marshall of Calice, called to him sir Robert Ferynyngham, and they had with them a. C. xx. horsemen, and sent sir Anthonic Brobone to tell the Capitaine of Guisnes, what they entended to doe, but they tarped not for the companie of Guisnes, but marched so farre forward, that they came to the water of Sclakes, which is nere Bulleyn, and there they set their stale. And in the morning betime, they sent forth a Gentleman called Richard Lamberd with .xx. light horsemen on swift Geldinges, and they came by moone lyght nere Bulleyn, and then they sawe the men of Bulleyn and other thereabout put out their beastes into the field. Then the Englishmen with great diligence brought all the beastes together, and so began to driue them together toward their embushment. Then the alarme began at Bulleyn, and the men of warre issued out of the towne, and fought with the Englishmen, their horses were freche: wherefore they had a great aduantage, but in conclusion three frenchmen were slaine, and their horses taken, and so the light horsemen came with their cattail, nere to the embushment, and the frenchmen folowed, that seying, the Englishmen that kept the stale, came in all haste and rescued their light horsemen, and draue the frenchmen backe, and then made retorne with their beastes, and as they were returning, they had worde brought to them, howe that sir William Fitzwilliam Capitaine of Guisnes with his retinue, were besieging a pile called the Castell of Capell, wherefore they sped them thether in all hast, and when they were come thether, the Capitaine of Guisnes them hartily welcomed, and then they concluded to giue an assault to the Castell, and so both good courage set on, the frenchmen defended it very valiantly a great while, but at the last the Englishmen gat ouer the ditches, and scaled the walles, but the frenchmen still them defended, till the Englishmen had gotten to the highest of the Dungen, and then was there slaying a pace. For there were .liii. persons slaine out of hand, in reuenging the great obstinacie of the frenchmen, and the Castell was rased and bzent. Then sir William Fitzwilliam with his bootie, and sir John Wallop Marshall of Calice, and sir John Jernyngham returned, he to Guisnes, and they to Calice. The same day. xiiij. Burgonions, and. xiiij. Spaniardes, all horsemen of Guisnes, came to the Church of Falske, not far from Durnam at high Masse tyme, and there drew their swordes, and so much did, that all the men in the Church, to the number of fiftie, yelded themselves prisoners, of the which number they tooke eight persons with them, which shoulde be gages for the remnant, and with these eight they came to Guisnes.

Ambassadors sent from James the first King of Scottes.

The .xix. day of December were receiued into London, Lorde Gilbert Keuet Erle of Castelles, sir Robert Cockeburne Bishop of Dunkell, and the Abbot of Campskennell, Ambassadors from James the first King of Scottes, by the Bishop of Lyncolne, the Lord of Saint Thones, and diuers other noble men, and were conueyed to their lodgings at Taylers Hall.

The .xxiiij. daye of December, the sayde Ambassadors were conueyed to Grenewiche, accompanied with the sayde Lordes by water, and when they came to the bitter gate, they were receyued of the officers of the house, and so passed through the haule, which was well furnished with people, and so through the bittermost chamber, into the great chamber of presence, where they were receyued and welcomed of all the Princes and Nobles of the realme, and within a short space the king came forth, and set himselfe in a throne of three steps high, vnder his cloth of estate, which was very riche, but his apparell was exceeding rich, both of Goldsmithes worke and perle, and stone, which the Scottes well auised, and then they wisely and humbly made made their obeyfaunce, and the Byshop in good playne Latine made a solempne oration, in the which he declared, that although the realme of Scotlande and he had often times heard the renoume and fame of hym and his Court, both for the gistes of grace and nature, which were in his person, yet he sayde that his princely countenance, his louely fauor, which he himselfe did see, did much surmount the fame and name, which he hath heard of report. He declared further, that although fortune had him fauored in conquering of regions, and vanquishing of battayles, yet that thing was not so honorable to hym, nor profitable to his realme, as was a good peace, which pleaseth both God and man, and for that cause he shewed, that king James the fift his Nephewe and felow to the king of Englande, had sent them his Ambassadors, to entreate a peace, so that a conuenient marriage might be made, betwene him and the Ladie Marie daughter to the king, which shoulde be a linck necessarie, to knit together the realme of Scotlande and Englande, in perpetuall loue and amitie.

To which oration, the Byshop of London Doctor Tunstall answered and sayde: that the king was at their desire, content to haue peace vpon reasonable conditions, and as touching marriage of his daughter, he woulde so answere them, that they shoulde be contented. Then the king rose from his place and welcomed them, and all the honest persons of the traine, and after communication had, they toke their leaue for that time, and so toke their Barge and came to London.

Friday the .xxx. day of December the Erle of Castelles one of the Scottische Ambassadors tooke his leaue and departed toward Scotlande: for to comen with the counsaile of Scotland, for things which were not in their commission, and left behinde him the Byshop of Dunkell, and the Abbot of Campskennell: some sayde the article was, that the Scottes shoulde forsake the french king, and that the king of Scottes shoulde come into Englande, but whatsoeuer it was euery man knewe it not.

In thys Moneth the Cardinall as Legate, by his power Legantyne, would haue visited the Friers Obseruautes, but they in no wise woulde therein condiscende, wherefore .xix. of the same religion, were accursed at Daules Crosse, by one of the same religion, called frere Forest. Of thys frere Forest ye shall here moze hereafter, in the thirtie yere of thys king.

In thys season the french king was in Italy with all his Nobilitie, and to him was Millaine yeilded, but because of pestilence he would not enter, but departed and layde siege to the strong towne of Dauia, whereof was Capitayne a valyaunt Spanyard called Anthony de Leua. The french kings mother being Regent of fraunce, perceyuing that the king her sonne with all his good Capytaynes were in Italy, doubted that the king of Englande, in the next spring time would inuade fraunce. Wherefore shee by the aduise of the counsaile of fraunce, did so much with the king of Englande, that her Stuard of household called John Tokin, had a safeconduit to come into Englande, which was kept close in the house of Docter Larke, a Prebendarie of saint Steuens, and euery day priuily spake with the Cardinall and so secretly he remayned till the .xxiiij. daye of Januarie, at which daye came into London, the President of Roan called Mounfire Wynion, as an Ambassador from fraunces the french king, and was lodged with John Tokin:

The Obseruant Friers would not obey the Cardinall.

Millaine yeilded to the french king

John Tokin a priuie messenger.

Mounfire Wynion an Ambassador from fraunce.

The Cardinall did now grow in suspicion.

John : this John Jokyn was kept priuie, because that no man shoulde knowe that there was any man of Fraunce, here to sollicite any cause for the French king, which after grewe to great trouble. For he shewed hymselfe to straungers, which fauored the french partie, and so at last it was openly knowne to the kings counsaile, and almost to all men: but when the Emperours Ambassadoz knewe thys darke dealyng, he mused not a little & sayde, that the Cardinall did driue priuie driftes, and that by his meanes onely, John Jokyn was come into Englande, to entreat a peace in secret maner, or the kings friendes might know it, and all people sayde that John Jokyn was but a cast away of Heane, and had no liuyng to liue on, but of the Lady Regent, and marueyled why he should be kept close, and so much cherished of the Cardinall. For this keeping close of thys Jokyn, Englishemen were rebuked at the Courte in Flaunders and Brabant. The Emperours Ambassadoz, and the Bishop of Romes Ambassadoz also sore murmured, why thys John Jokyn should be kept as a spirite in close, considering that there was open warre betwene the two kings, & feared that the kings counsaile should be corrupt. This John Jokyn was much with the Cardinall, but neuer was sene with the king nor his counsaile, but for al the secretnesse, Mounseir Pratt the Emperours Ambassadour knewe all the offers that he made for peace (which in deede were very great) and howe he had offered pencions to diuers yong men about the king, of the which some were very glad, and so the noyse by reason of such offers ranne, that a peace was likely to ensue in short space.

Mounseir Pratt the Emperours Ambassadoz.

Mounseir Pratt wrote of this matter in all haste to the Emperour, in the which letters he highly commended the king of Englande for his steadfastnesse: but he saide some of the kinges counsaile loued neyther the Emperour nor the king of England, and wrote to him farther all the maner of the secret keeping of John Jokyn. These letters at last were brought to the Cardinall, by what chaunce it was not openly knowne, and so he sent for Mounseir Pratt, and declared to him the matter, which answered him that he was counsaillour and Ambassadour to the Emperour, and that it was his part, to asserteyne the Emperour of euery thing, that was or might sounde prejudiciall to his maiestie, but howsoeuer that his aunswere was taken, he was not fauored with the Cardinall, but he sayde openly that it was not well ment to the Emperour to stop his packet with letters and to open them, and the Spanyardes sayde, that the Emperour sent them not into Englande to sleepe, but to doe him seruice. The Bishop of Romes Ambassadoz wrote to his maister, that peace was lykely to be concluded betwene Englande and Fraunce, and wylled him to be the first friend to the French king, rather then the second. Of which writing came harme after, as you shall heare.

In this Month tydings came to the king, how the Marques of Biscaire in Italye, had gotten from the french king a Castell, called the Castell saint Angeil, which was a great fortification of his siege at Pauie.

There was in this Moneth a flemyng in Heddyng Castell, which came oftentimes to saint Omers, and promised them if they would come to Heddyng, he would deliuer the Castell: upon thys worde they of saint Omers gathered together seuen hundred footemen, and fife hundred horsemen, and poynted wyth the spie, that the fourth daye of februarye, they would would come thether, and when the false knaue knewe the day, he told Mounseir Pontdozmie Capitaine of Heddyng, which incontinent filled the castell with men of warre, and layde bushes on euery side, and had layde the ordinaunce, all on the one syde of the Castell, that waye that the Flemings should come. The men of warre of saint Omers were conueyed by their spie, mistrusting nothing, to a posterne which was little used, and when there were as many in, as the french men thought sufficient, they let fall the portcolis: Then Mounseir Pontdozmie cried, slay, slay, then the Flemings wist that they were betrayed, and put themselves to fight for their lyues, that seying Mounseir Pontdozmie, commaunded to fire the ordinaunce in suche haste and furie, that the flame was so great and fierce, that it brent the sayde Lorde Pontdozmie, and .xxvij. of hys companions all Gentlemen, the trayne was so hastily fired, that they had no leasure to auoyde. In the fight ten of the Flemings were slayne, and thirtie kept themselves so hardily together, that their liues were graunted them, and so was taken as prisoners, the remnant that entred, lept ouer the Castell wall, and so saued themselves, and tolde newes to their horsemen, which were without, which heering the mischaunce, returned toward saint Omers.

Sunday the fift day of Marche, were receyued into London, Mounseir de Beuer Lord of Camphere, Admirall of Flaunders, and the President of Malines, called Maister John de la Coos, and Maister John de la Gache, as Ambassadours from the Lady Margaret, in the name of the Emperour, for causes of the low countreyes, of Brabant, Flaunders, and Zeland: and on Tuesday they were brought to the king to Bridewell, which nobly them enterteyned, and then they shewed how the Emperours maiesty had commaunded them to obaye the king of England, as Protector and Gouvernor, wherfore they and all theirs, were at hys commaundement, and if they had done otherwise, and not obayed him as their gouernour, they asked him mercy, then the king and they talked together secretly, and then they departed. These Ambassadours demaunded three thinges.

Ambassadours of Flaunders.

1 First, they demaunded the Lady Mary the kinges onely daughter, to be deliuered to them out of hande, and she to be named Emprisse, and to take possession of al the low countreyes, and to be gouernour of the same, this article was not agreed to, for causes.

Articles demaunded of King Henry in the behalfe of the Emperour.

2 Also that all such sommes of money, as the king should geue with her in maryage for a dowry to be made to her, should be payed incontinent this article was also denied.

3 Thirde, that the king of England himselfe, should passe the Sea and make warre in Fraunce, the next Sommer, to this the king sayed he would take aduise.

Thursday the .ix. day of March, at seauen of the clocke in the morning there came a Gentleman in poste, from the Lady Margaret Gouvernesse of Flaunders, and brought letters, shewing how that the foure and twentieth day of februarye, the siege of Pauia, where the french king had lien long, was raysed by force of battayle, and the french king him selfe taken prisoner, and how by the Duke of Burbon, the Viceroy of Naples called Mynouale, and the Marques of Biscaire, and other the Emperours Capitaines the whole power of Fraunce was discoufited, and how the Duke of Albany with seauen thousande men, was going to Naples, and howe the Byshop of Rome was become french against the Emperour, and had sent his Cousin in ayde of the french king, wyth a great power. The same day the President of Roan and John Fokin, were going to the courte (for they had not yet spoken with the king) and in Holborne in their way was tidings brought them, of the taking of the king their Maister, & of the losse of the field, which hering this misadventure, returned to their lodging sorowfull, and within short space returned to the Regent of Fraunce. It was thought surely y<sup>e</sup> the king of England, would haue had peace with the french king, if this chaunce had not happened, for al the people of England, grudged against flanders, for their euill entreating, in the time of warre, & also the king was displeasid with them, for enhausing his coine there, which was a cause that money was dayly conueied out of the realme, & many other causes there were of grudge.

A triumph for the taking of the French king.

Saterday the .xi. day of Marche, in the Citie of London for these tydings, were made great fiers and triumph, and the Maioz and Aldermen road about the Citie with trumpettes, and much wyne was layed in diuers places of the Citie, that eueryman myght drinke, and on Tower hill the Ambassadors of Rome, of flanders, and Venice, had a great banquet made in a goodly tent, which pleased them well, and as they returned homeward, all the streates were full of harnised men and Crestets, attending on the Constables, which they prayesd much.

Sonday the .xij. of Marche, the king accompanied with the Ambassadors, of Rome, of the Emperour, of Scotland, & Venice, of Millaine & Florence, roade in his estate to Pauls Church, and there the Cardinall sang Masse, & a .xj. Prelats waigheted on him in pontificalles, & after Masse was done, the quere sang Te deum, & the Minstrels playd on euery side, & when all was done, the king returned to Bridewel, and there kept a solempne dinner. The Bishop of Scotlande was much marked this day, for whensoever he came to the court before this time, his apparel was sumptuous, his whered was euer velvet or crimosin satin: but after the taking of the french king, he ware onely blacke chamlet, by which token men iudged his french hart.

The true reporte of the taking of the French king.

From the .ix. day of Marche to the .xvi. day, the king had no mo letters, of the maner of battaile of Hauie, and that day he receyued a letter from the Duke of Burbon, by a Gentleman called Gropayne: when the king had redde the letter, he came into the Queenes chamber, and there the sayd Gropayne declared the maner of the siege, and how well it was planted, and how the Emperours men entered the french campe by force, and threwe downe their bastiles, and fought with the frenchmen, within their campe, and tooke their king prisoner in the same, and many other which was maruell. For when the french king entred Italy, he had in his gard. .xj. hundred men, and of speres furnished two thousand three hundred & fifty, and of light horsemen eyght hundred and .xx. and of foote men .lviij. thousand and of these the Duke of Albany had but eyght thousande so that there remayned with the french king nine and forty thousand, nine hundred and fifty men, wherof was taken. .xiiij. thousande and mo, beside the great riches, and the goodly ordinance, which were twelue great Bombardes of brasse, and foure and twentie great Canon peeces. .xxiiij. double Curtalles, foure double Canon peeces, two middle Canon peeces, and eight other peeces. After the fielde was done, the french king was put in the custodie of the Viceroy of Naples, which which much comforted hym, and prayesd his valiauntnesse, and prayed him to be content, for he should haue a gentle ende, then he desired to wright to his mother, which was to him graunted, the very wordes were these.

The french kings letter written to his mother when he was prisoner.

To aduertise you of my infortunate chaunce nothing is left but the honoz, and the life that is saued, and because some other newes shall recomfort you, I haue desired to wright to you this letter, the whych liberally hath bene graunted to me: beseching you to regarde the extremitie of your selfe, in ensiuing your accustomed wisdom. For I hope that at the length God will not forget me, to you recommending your little infants and mine, supplieng you to geue saufeconduite, to passe and returne from Spaine, to this beeter that goeth toward the Emperour, to know in what wise I shall be intreated, and thus right humbly to your good grace, I haue me recommended: This subscribed by your humble and obedient sonne fraunces.

This season the Cardinall obteyned licence of the Bishop of Rome, to suppress diuers Abbayes, to the entent to erect two Colleges, one at Oxford and another at Ipswich, and to endue them with the landes: which Colleges he began so sumptuously, and the scholers were so proude, that euery person iudged, that the ende woulde not be good, as you shall heere, siue yeres hereafter.

The Cardinall first began to suppress Abbayes.

The Erle of Castelles which was sent into Scotlande, returned into England, the .xix. day of Marche, but because the french king was taken, his commission for the most part was determined, and so he and all his companie tooke their leaue of the king and without any rewarde returned into Scotland, the fourth day of Aprill.

The Scots returned into Scotlande.

In this moneth of Marche, the king sent Cutbert Tunstall Bishop of London, and sir Richard Wingfield, Chaunceloz of the Duchy of Lancaster, and knight of the Garter, into Spaine to the Emperour, for great causes concernyng the taking of the french king, and in especial for warres to be made on fraunce, on euery side. For so the king of England and his Counsaile were agreed and determined: and the same moneth the Ambassadors, departed againe into flanders.

Ambassadors sent to the Emperour.

The Counsaile remembryng that it was determined, that the king in proper person should passe the sea, they considered that aboue all thinges, great treasure & plentie of money, must needes be had in a redinesse: wherefore by the Cardinall were deuised straunge Commissions, and sent in the end of Marche to euery shire, and Commissioners appoynted, which were the greatest men of euery shire: & there were priuie instructions sent to them, to say & order the people, & the tenoz was, that the sixt part of euery mans substance, should without delay be payed in money or plate, to the king, for the furniture of his warre: wherefore the Cardinall, as chiefe Commissioner for London, sent for sir William Bayly knight, then Maioz of the Citie, and the Aldermen, and diuers head Commoners, and sayd to them in maner following. You the kinges welbeloued friendes and subiectes, of the Citie of London. I must declare to you, how the king contrary to his abone minde and will, but compelled of very force, is determined to enter into a new war, and for the moze explanation of the truth, you shall vnderstande, that after that fraunces the french king that now is, had obteyned the Crowne and scepter of the realme of fraunce, he most humbly sued to the king our mayster ster for peace, loue and amitie, promisyng vpon the Euangelistes to keepe the league then concluded, and also to pay to Lady Mary Queene dowager of Fraunce, her due pencion and dowar, to her graunted by king Lewys her husband. After this he by his Ambassadors, humbly desired the Citie of Tournay which king Lewys befoze tyme had losse: the king which woulde that the Citie of Tournay, should be no cause of grudge, betweene him and the French king, consented that for certayne summes of money, it should be deliuered. And farther the moze to bind amitie betweene them, the king was content, that a communication of mariage shoulde bee had, betweene the Dolphyn of Fraunce, and the Ladie Marie, Princes of Englande, yet for to entreate moze loue, familiaritie, and acquaintaunce, the king to his great cost and charge passed the sea, and met in person with the French king, thinkyng that by reason of personall sight and actuall communication, the moze stable and firme loue, should growe betweene them, then by wrytyng at which tyme it was vndoubtedly thought, that there could no moze loue be knit betweene two persons. There were couenauntes made and swozne, and the king our maister sayde to the French king: Brother, now that you and I be thus knit, I require you to keepe firme peace, & amitie, with my nephew the Emperour: and also suffer not Duke John of Albany, to go into Scotland, for puttyng the yong king my nephew in ieopardie of his person, wherefoze if you loue me, in especiall keepe these two articles: if you obserue these articles, and all other couenauntes betweene vs agreed, I assure you there had neuer Prince a surer friend, then you shall haue of me. Then the French king layde his hand in mine (sayd the Cardinall) and swore by the othe of a king, he would obserue and keepe firmly, these poyntes with many mo, and after the kings were departed, and that the Emperour was come to the king to Calice: the French king sent Mounfire de la Roche Baron with letters, declaring that he was in perfect league and amitie with the Emperour, and this notwithstanding, he within lesse space then half a yere, sent Robert de la Marche to invade the Emperours lande, and made warre in Fauerre, and other places. The king our maister heeryng this, of his meere charitie sent me, and other Nobles with a great traine to Calice, to knowe by whom the warre began, for he promised to be enemye to him that brake first. To which place came from the French king, his Chaunceloz, and Mounfire de la Palice, and many other noble men. And from the Emperour came his Chaunceloz, and the Lord Cheuers, and there in open counsaile, the Emperours Ambassadors did shewe the French kinges letters, signed and sealed, by the which he enforced & began the warre: to which point the French Ambassadors could not aunswere. What should I say, the warre was open on both parties, I sent to the French king Ambassadors, to entreate peace, but in no wise he would consent: wherefoze I with my company returned. In the meane season (although I doubted nothing, the French kinges sayth towarde our Mayster) yet for a moze suretie I obtayned a safeconduit for the Englishe Marchauntes, that they should go to Burdeaur, and vpon suretie of that, our Marchauntes passed, yet he contrary to his safeconduit, tooke the Marchauntes goodes, and put their bodies in prison, which the Turke would not haue done. The king sent gently to him his Heralde Clarenseur, desiryng him to redresse all these enozmities, and to pay him his summes of money, due to him, and to the Queene his sister, for her dowar, which to do he refused and denied, which thinges you knowe, the king of his honour might not suffer. Wherefoze mightly he hath these three yeres, kept warre continually both on land and sea, and invaded Fraunce with two armies royall, and bet their townes, Castelles and fortresses, destroyed the people, and passed the water of Some, and profered battaile to the Frenchmen, in their awne Countre, and hath brought the Countre in such penury and wretchednesse, that in many yeres it will not be recovered.

And the moze to hurt and damage the French king, the king hath in wages the Duke of Burbon, which was the greatest strength on the French part: by whose power and ayde of other, which had great summes of money of the king our maister, the French king in person is now taken, and all his nobles in effect, befoze Pavia, and kept as prisoner to the Emperour and the king our maister, and that for great reason: for our maister sent sir Gregory de Cassado his Ambassadour, to the Viceroy of Naples, and to the Duke of Burbon, and the Marques Discaire, with a hundred thousand Crownes, so that they would fight with the French king: for the which money they assented, and so gaue battaile, in the which they slue .xij. thousand men, & drew had geuen vs victorie, the king remembryng the sayng of the Doct that sayeth: It is more maystry to vse victorie gotten, then to get it, thinketh it necessary now in all hast, to make an army royall, and he in person to passe the seas, and to recouer his right inheritance, both of the Crowne of Fraunce as of Normandie, Guyen, Gascoyne, Anjou, and Maine, the wrytynges whereof comprehendyng the very title, you may see heere present if ye list, but I doubt not but you know them well ynough. And now I aske you this question, whether that you thinke it conuenient, that the king should passe with an armie or not, for the king will do by the aduise of his subiectes: to the which many sayde yea, yea.

Well sayd the Cardinall, then must he be made able to go like a Prince, which cannot be without your aydes, and for to shewe you what the Archbysshop of Cantorbury and I, which be primate of the realme haue done, we haue geuen of our landes, and all landes appertaynyng to the Church, the thirde part, and the temporall Lordes, haue geuen of landes and goodes, the first part, and to ieopard their bodies in paine and trauaile, and now sith they which shall aduenture theyr liues, doth profer the first part, what should they geue which abide at home? Forsooth I thinke that halfe your substaunce were to little, not meanyng that the king so asketh. For he demaunde th only no moze of fiftie pound, the first part, and so vpon euery fiftie, aboute fiftie pound, to what summe soeuer it amount to, the first part, that is thre shillings foure pence of the pound, and from .xx. pound, to fiftie pound, and so byward two shillings and .viij. pence of the pound, & from .xx. pound to .xx. shillings .xii. pence of the pound, and thus to be leued accordyng to the first valuation, as appereth by your aboue valuation, which is but a small matter to the thing that is meant. Then they beyng astounded, at last the one sayd, my Lord, sith the last valuation, diuers Marchauntes be decayed, by the seas, and suretieship, and other wayes, so that valuation can not be had. Then answered the Cardinall, sirs, speake not to breake that thing that is concluded, for some shall not pay the tenth part, and some moze, it were better that some shoulde suffer indigence, then the king at this tyme should lacke, and therfore beware and resist not, nor ruffle not in this case, for it may fortune to cost some their heddes: But I will speake to the king to be good to you, so that if he go not over the sea in person, then you shall have your money redelivered, but first let the money be gathered, and lay it where you will, and if the king neede it not, you may take it againe.

The Cardinall's threatenings.

When the Cardinall had thus perswaded the Maior and his brethren and other head Cominers, they tooke their leaue, and euery day after by the space of a fortnight, he sent for a certayne number of Comyners, and tolde them lyke tale, but some spake suche woordes to him, and some goyng from him, that they were sent to warde.

The summe of the Clergy

Howe were Commissioners sent to the clergie, for the fourth part of their landes and moueables, and in euerye assembly the priests answered, that they would pay nothing, except it were graunted by conuocation, otherwise not: for they said that neuer king of England did aske any mans goods but by an order of the lawe, and this commission is not by the order of the lawe: wherefore they sayde, that the Cardinall and all the doers thereof, were enemies to the king, and to the common wealth. Thys infamie was spoken in preachings, and euery where.

The grudge of the common people.

When thys matter was opened throughe Englande, howe the great men toke it, it was maruayle, the poze cursed, the riche repugned, the light wits rayled, but in conclusion, all people curst the Cardinall, and his coadherentes as subuersor of the lawes and libertie of England. For they sayde, if men should geue their goodes by a commission, then were it worse then the taxes of Fraunce, and so England should be bound and not free.

It happened in this time at Redyng in Barke shire, that the commissioners sat for this money to be graunted, and the people in no wise would consent to the sixt part: but of their awne mere minde, for the loue they bare to the king, they graunted the twelth part, that is twentic pence of the pound, the commissioners hearing this, sayde they would send to the Cardinall, desiring him to be content with this offer, and so the Lorde Lisle wrote the letter, so that s<sup>r</sup> Richard Weston would beare it, the which letter at the request of the gentlemen of the Countrey, the sayde s<sup>r</sup> Richard tooke vpon him to carie, and roade to the Cardinall: which therewith was soze grieved, and sayde, but because that the Lorde Lisse wrote, that the matter was but communed of, and not concluded, it should cost the Lorde Lisse his head, and his landes should be solde to pay the king the halues, that by him and you scolissh commissioners he had lost, and all your lyues at the kings will: thesc woordes soze astonied s<sup>r</sup> Richard Weston, but he sayde little.

Howe woordes of the Cardinall

Then the Cardinall wrote letters to all commissioners of the realme that they should keepe their first instruction, and in no wise to swaue one iote, vpon paine of their lyues, and euery man to be valued, according to the valuation taken in the .xiiij. yere. This last poynt soze touched the Citie of London, for the Cardinall in the .xiiij. yere sent one Doctoz Cunes his secret Chapeleine, to the Chapter house of Paules, promising to the Londoners, that whatsoener they valued themselves at, that no man should knowe it but the king, the Cardinall, and he, vpon which promise, many persons for their more credite, and to be higher esteemed valued themselves at a greater substance then they were worth: thinking neuer to lend or pay by that confession, for the loane and the subsidie were payde, accordyng as men were selled, and not by maister Cunes booke, when men valued themselves, not knowing what should succede.

Now in this time was that subtile valuation layd to their charge, which when they perceyued, they murmured muche and sayde, they would paye nothyng, except the kings lawes, vnder which they were bound, so determined it: But this notwithstanding, commissioners went out to euery shire, for the leuie of the sayde money, but for all that could be perswaded, sayde, lyed, and flattered, the demaunde could not be assented to, saying, that they that sent forth such commissioners were subuerters of the lawe, and worthy to be punished as Traytors. So that in all the realme were Billes set vp in all places: Some Billes sayde that the king had not payde that he borrowed: Some sayde that the subsidie amounted treble, moze then he had bestowed: other sayde whatsoener was graunted, no good came of it: and other sayde that the Cardinall sent all thz money to Rome, thus was the muttering throughe all the realme, with curses and wepings, that pittie it was to behold.

The muttering of the people.

Durynge thys season that the commissioners sat, and that the Bishoy of London, and other the kings Ambassadors were abiding winde to sayle into Spaine to the Emperour (as you haue heard reherced) Mounfire Pratt the Emperours Ambassadour, which was soze angrie for John Jokyns comyng into Englande, as you haue hard befoze, departed priuely out of the realme of Englande, the .ix. day of Aprill, wythout speaking with the king or the Cardinall, and so much did by safeconduit, that he passed throughe Fraunce in poste, and came to the Emperour befoze the Ambassadors of England came thether, and whether it was by his report or otherwise, the accustomed fauor that the Emperour and his counsaile shewed to the Englishe men, began then to decay, and to shew themselves unkinde to the Englishe nation without cause, as you shall hereafter perceyue.

In thys yere the kyng solowynge of his Hauke, lepte ouer a ditch beside Hythyn, with a polle and the polle brake, so that if one Edmond Moody, a footeman had not lepte into the water and lift by his head, which was fast in the clay, he had bene drowned: but God of his goodnesse preserued him.

The copar-die the king was in.

This yere at Whitsonyde died Thomas Duke of Norffolke, and was honorably buried at Thetford in Suffolke.

The death of Thomas Duke of Norffolke.

In the beginning of thys .xviij. yere, the commissioners in all shires sat, for the leuie of the sixt part of euery mannes goods, but the burden was soze grievous, that it was denied, and the commons in euerye place were so moued, that it was like to haue growen to a rebellion. When thys mischiefe was shewed to the king, he sayde that he neuer knew of that demaund, and therefore with great diligence, he sent his letters to the Citie of London, and to all other places, in the which the king gently wrote, that he would demaunde no somme certayne, but such as his louyng subiectes would graunt to him of their good mindes, towarde the maintenaunce of hys warres: wherefore the Cardinall, the twentieth and sixt day of Aprill, sent for the Maior of London, the Aldermen and counsaile of the same, with the most substantiall persons of the common counsaile, and when they were come to his place place at Westminster, he sayde: the king our souereigne Lorde, most graciously considereth the great loue, zeale, and obedience, which you beare vnto hym, and where lyke louing subiectes, without any grudge or againe say, of your louing mindes you haue graunted the sixt part, of all your goodes and substance, freely to be payde, according to the first valuation, the which louing graunt and good minde, he so kindly accepted, that it was maruaile to see. But I my selfe doe consider the great losses, and other charges that daylie hath, and doth to you growe, and that notwithstanding anye losse or charge that happeneth to you, yet you neuer withstood nor againe sayde, any of the kings demaunds or commissions, as it appereth now of late, of which doyngs, I haue highly the king enformed, for the which he gaue you hartie thanks. Then I kneeled downe to his grace, shewing him both your good myndes toward him, and also the charges that you continually sustaine, the which at my desire and petition, was content to call in, and abrogate the same commission, and where he by reason of your awne grauntes, might haue demaunded the sayde somme as a verie debt, yet he is content to release and pardon the same, and will nothing take of you, but of your beneuolence: wherefore take here wyth you the kinges letter, and let it be read to the commons, and I doubt not but you wyll gladly doe, as louyng subiectes should doe.

Here note, that if the Cardinall had not sayde, that the king had released and pardoned the first demaunde, the Citezens would haue answered the Cardinall, that they neuer made no such graunt, and for a suretie no more they did not: and so they held their peace, and departed toward London, sore grudgyng at the lying of the Cardinall, and openly sayng that he was the verie cause, and occasion of this demaunde, and would pluck the peoples hartes from the king.

The xxviii. day of Aprill, in the common counsaile of the Citie, was read the kings letter, according to the effect aboue rehearsed, wherefore the Citezens sent foure Aldermen, and twelue Cominers to Hampton court to geue thanks to the Lord Cardinall, which for businesse as was sayde could not speake with him, wherefore they returned not content. Then euery Alderman assembled hys warde, in their places accustomed, and gently moued them of a beneuolence to be graunted to the king, the which they openly denied, sayng: that they had payde ynough before, with many euill wordes.

The eyght day of May, the Cardinall agayne sent for the Maior and his brethren, which shewed them what they had done: then sayde the Cardinall, you haue no such commission to examine any man, I am your commissioner, I will examine you one by one my selfe, and then I shall knowe the good will that you beare to your prince, for I will aske of you a beneuolence in his name. Then was it answered to the Cardinall, by a counsailler of the Citie, that by the lawe there might no such beneuolence be asked, nor men so examined, for it was contrarie to the statute made the first yere of Richard the thirde, also some persons commyng before your grace, maye for feare graunt that, that all dayes of their lyfe they shall repent, and some to wyne your fauour, will graunt more then they be able to paye of their awne, and so runne in other mens debtes, so that by dreadfull gladnesse, and fearefull boldnesse, men shall not be maisters of themselves, but as men dis-

maicd, shall graunt that, that their wyfes and children shall sore rewe. The Cardinall heard this sayng verie patiently, and answered: Sir I maruaile that you speake of Richard the thirde, which was an vsurper and a murderer of his awne nephewes: then of so euill a man, howe can the actes be good, make no such allegations, his actes be not honozable. And it please your grace sayde the counsailler, although he did euill, yet in his tyme were many good actes made, not by him onely, but by the consent of the bodye of the who'e realme, which is the Parliament. Then Syr Wylliam Bayly Lorde Maior kneeled downe and besought his grace, that sihe it was enacted by the common counsaile of London, that euery Alderman should sit in his awne warde, for a beneuolence to be graunted, which he perceiued to be against the law, that the same act by the same comon counsaile, might be reuoked and no otherwise: well sayde the Cardinall I am content. But now will I enter into the kings commission: you Maior, and you maister Aldermen, what will you geue: my Lorde sayde the Maior, I praye you pardon me, for if I should enter into any graunt, it might fortune to cost me my life: your lyfe sayde the Cardinall, that is a maruaylous word, for your good will toward the king, will the Citezens put you in ieopardie of your lyfe, that were straunge: for if they would that waye, then must the king come with strong power them to oppresse, wherefore speake no more suche wordes, and with that he studied a little and sayde: My Lorde Maior, let you and your Citezens, if you be grieued with any thing in this demaunde, humbly and after a good fashion come to me, and I shall so entreat you that you shall be content, and no displeasure arise, and so I praye you shewe your neighbors, and so the Maior for that day departed.

The Maior did wisely not to assent to graunte to anye thing, for although he and the Aldermen had assented, the common counsaile would neuer haue assented. So on the next morowe, it was declared to the common counsaile, that their act y was made that euery Alderman should sit for a beneuolence to be graunted, was against a statute lawe: whereupon the saide act was annulled: and then was it declared, that euery man shoulde come to the Cardinall, and to graunt priuily what he would, with this sayng the Citezens were sore grieued, then the Maior gently shewed them, how he durst warrant, that they should be entreated gently, and exhorted them to go thither when they were sent for, which sayng nothinge pleased them: and then in a fury they would haue had Richard Gresham, and John Helwester Officers, and Richard Gibson Sergeant at armes and merchant Taylor, banished out of the common counsaile, and so without answer made, what they would do, they departed home.

In the same season through all the realme, this demaunde was vtterly denied, so that the Commissioners could bring nothing to passe, and yet they assayed both by fayre wayes and foule: some spake faire and flattered, other spake cruell and threatened, and yet coulde not bring their purpose about. For in Kent the Lorde Cobham was Commissioner, and handeled men roughly, and by reason one John Skudder, answered him clubbishly, he sent him to the Tower of London: for which doyng the people muttered, and grudged against the Lorde Cobham, and saide expressly, that they would pay no money, and then they began to accompt the loanes and subsidies graunted, so that they rekened the kings treasure innumerable, for they accounted that the king had taken of this realme, twenty fiftenes, sith the .xiiij. yeare of his reigne, and in this grudge, they euill entreated sir Thomas Bulleyn at Maidestone.

In Ester the people would not assemble befoze the Commissioners in no houses, but in open places: and in Huntingdon shire, diuers resisted the Commissioners to sit, which were apprehended, and sent to the flete.

Instruction in Suffolke.

The Duke of Suffolke sat in Suffolke this season in like commission, and by gentle handeling he caused the riche Clothiers to assent, and graunt to geue the sixt part, and when they came home to their houses they called to them their Spinners, Carders, Fullers, Weuers, and other Artyficers, which were wont to be set a worke, and haue their liuings by cloth making, and sayd, Sirs we be not able to set you a worke, our goodes be taken from vs, wherefoze trust to your selues, and not to vs, for otherwise it will not be. Then began women to weepe, and yong folkes to crye, and men that had no worke, began to rage, and assemble themselves in companyes. The Duke of Suffolke heeryng of this, commaunded the Constables, that euery mans harnesse should be taken from them, but when that was knowen, then the rumour waxed moze greater, and the people rayled openly on the Duke of Suffolke, and sir Robert Dzurie, and threated them with death, and the Cardinall also, and so of Lanam, Sudbery, Hadley, and other townez about, there rebelled foure thousand men, and put themselves in harnesse, and rang the belles alarme, and began to gather still moze: then the Duke of Suffolke perceiuyng this, began to rayse men, but he coulde get but a small number, and they that came to him sayd, that they would defend him from all perilles, if he hurt not their neighbors, but agaynst their neighbours they would not fight: Yet the Gentlemen that were with the Duke did so much, that all the bridges were broken, so that their assemble was somewhat letted.

The Duke of Suffolke pacified the Commons.

The Duke of Norfolke, high Treasurer and Admirall of Englande, heeryng of this, gathered a great power in Norfolke, and came toward the Commons, and of his noblenesse he sent to the Commons, to knowe their intent, which answered that they would liue and die in the kinges cause, and to the king to be obedient: When the Duke wist that, he came to them, and then all spake at once, so that he wist not what they ment. Then he asked who was their Capitaine, and bade that he should speake: then a well aged man of fiftie yeres and aboue, asked licence of the Duke to speake, which graunted with good will. My Lord sayd this man, whose name was John Grene, sithe you aske who is our Capitaine, forsooth his name is Douertie, for hee and his Cosyn Necessitie, hath brought vs to this doying, for all these persons and many mo, which I would were not here, liue not of our selues, but all wee liue by the substantiall occupiers of this Countrie, and yet they geue vs so little wages for our workmanship, that scarcely wee be able to liue, and thus in penurie we passe the tyme, we, our wyues, and children, and if they by whome we liue, be brought in that case, that they of their little, can not helpe vs to earne our liuyng, then must we perish, and die miserably. I speake this my Lorde for that the clothmakers haue put all these people, and a farre greater number from worke, the husbandmen haue put away their seruantes, and geuen by houtholde, they say, the king asketh so much, that they bee not not able to doe as they haue done befoze this tyme, and then of necessitie must we die wretchedly: wherefoze my Lorde, now accorpyng to your wisdom consider our necessitie. The Duke was sozy to here their complaint, and well he knewe that it was true: then he sayde, neighbors seuer your selues a sonder, let euery man depart to his home, and choose foorth foure that shall aunswere for the remnant, and on my honour, I will send to the king, and make humble intercession for your pardon, which I trust to obteyne, so that you will depart, then all they aunswered they woulde, and so they departed home.

At the two Dukes requestes, Commissioners of great aucthoritie were sent to them, then the Duke of Norfolke, and the Duke of Suffolke, came to Bery, and thether came many people of the Countrey, in their shirtes, and halters about their neckes, meekely desyng pardon for their offences: the Dukes so wisely handeled themselves, that the Commons were appeased, and in especiall one Mayster Jermyn, tooke much paynes in ridyng and goyng, betweene the Lordes and Commons: then the demaund of money sealed in all the Realme, for well it was perceyued, that the Commons would none pay.

After this, the two Dukes came to London, and brought with them the chiefe Capitaynes of the rebellion, which were put in the flete, and then the king came to Westminster, to the Cardinals place: whereupon this matter, he assembled a great Counsaile, and openly he sayde, that his minde was neuer, to aske any thing of his Commons, which might sound to his dishonor, or to the breche of his lawes, wherefoze he would knowe of whom it was long, that the Commissions were so straight, to demaunde the sixt part of euery mans substance: the Cardinall excused himselfe and sayde, that when it was moued in counsell, how to make the king rich, the kinges Counsaile, and especialy the Judges saied, he might lawfully demaunde any somme by Commission, and that by the assent of the whole counsaile it was done, and tooke God to witnesse, that he neuer maligned nor desired the hinderance of the Commons, but like a true Counsaylour, deuised to enrich the king: And the spirituall men say, that it standeth with Goddes lawe, for Joseph caused the king of Egypt, to take the fift part of euery mannes goodes, but because euery man layeth the burden from him, I am content to take it on me, & to endure the same and noise of the people, for my good will toward the king, and to the comfort of you my Lords, and other the kings Counsaylors, but the eternall God knoweth all. Well sayd the king, some haue enformed me that my realme was neuer so riche, and that there should neuer trouble haue rylen of that demaund, and that men would pay at the first request, but now I finde all contrary, then euery man helde his peace.

The excuse of the Cardinall.

The king was soze moued, that his subiectes were thus stirred, and also he was enformed of the deniall, that the spirituall men had made, and of their sayngs, wherefoze he thought it touched his honour, that his counsaile should attempt, such a doubtfull matter in his name, and to be denyed both of the spiritualtie and tempoaltie, for although some graunted for feare, befoze the Commissioners, yet when they were departed, they denyed it againe. Then the king sayde, I will no moze of this trouble: Let letters be sent to all thires, that this matter may no moze be spoken of, I will pardon all them that that haue denied the demaund, openly or secretly: Then all the Lordes kneled downe, and hartily thanked the king. Then letters were sent to all commissioners to ceasse, with instructions howe to declare the kinges pardon. In which declaration was shewed, that the Cardinall neuer assented to the first demaunde, and in the instructions was comprehended, that the Lordes and the Judges, and other of the kinges Counsaile, deuised the same demaund, and that the Cardinall folowed the minde of the whole Counsaile, these two poyntes were contrary one to another, which were well marked. And farther the instructions were, that at the humble petition, and supplication of the Cardinall, the sayde great summes, which were demaunded, by the kinges aucthoritie royall, were clerely pardoned and remitted, wherfore the Commissioners willed the people to pray for the Cardinall: but the people tooke all this for a mocke, and sayde God saue the king, for the Cardinall is knownen well ynough, the Commons woulde heere no prayse spoken of the Cardinall, they hated him so much.

The sayng to the Mayor of London.

The .xix. day of May the Cardinall sent for the Mayor and his brethren and certayne commoners, and made the Mayor to sit downe by him, and then declared, that where the king was determined, in proper person to passe the sea into Fraunce, for which cause he asked of the Citizens of London, and his other subiectes, an ayde towarde his charges, to which request (he said) that the Londoners were at all times conforable, like louing subiectes, but sith the king considereth, the great fall of the French King, which is yet prisoner, and that dayly he hath sute made to him for peace, greatly to his honor and profite, for I trust that all his right and title, shalbe to him deliuered which thinge once agreed, I trust you shall haue peace, and therefore at my humble request, the king hath pardoned you, of all these sommes of money, that of you were demaunded: & if his grace had not passed the seas, although the money had bene gathered, suerly it should haue bene restozed againe, and consequently the king thanketh you as hartely, as any Prince may thanke his subiectes: and forasmuch as peace, is not yet concluded, I counsaile you to shewe your selues, enemies to the Frenchmen, and to saie that you be the kynges, bodie and goodes at his will and pleasure, so that your louing mindes towardes him, may to the Frenchmen appere, you wot well what I meane said the Cardinall.

The pzeatificate of the Cardinall.

Then the Mayor and his companie kneled downe and most hartely thanked the king and him, and so departed. The next daye all this was reherfed to the common counsaile, which humbly thanked the king for the pardon: but two thinges them soze displeased, one was that the Cardinall bad them saye, they were the kinges body and goodes, they sayd that they vsed no dissimulation, for they would not saye they were the kinges, but they thought and were the kings in dede, and not in sayng: the second was, that the Cardinall excused himselfe, that he was ignorant of the first commission: For all they knewe and were present, when he himselfe made to them the first motion, and what soeuer was saide by the Recorder, in his excuse, was taken as a cloke for the raine, and a dissimulation or a mocke, for wise men perceyued all the handelyng of the matter: after the king had pardoned euery offendor.

The

The .xxix. day of May the Lordes sat in the Starre chamber, and there were brought one Deucraux a Gentleman of Huntingdon shire (which woulde not suffer the Commissioners to sit, as you haue heard) and John Scudder of Kent, these two were brought from the Tower, bare footed in their shertes through London, to the Starre chamber, and there the Cardinall shewed them theyr offences, with terrible wordes: and after that, he shewed the kinges mercy extended to them, and declared their pardon, and so they were deliuered.

The morow after beyng the .xxx. day, were the chiefe of the rebelles of Suffolke, brought to the Starre chamber barre, and there the kings counsaile learned, layde soze to them their offence, but the Cardinall declared for them the kinges pardon: then the kinges Attorney, asked suerties for their good aberyng, they answered that they could finde none, then saied the Cardinall I will be one, because you be my countrey men, and my Lord of Suffolke will be another, and so they were discharged, and had money to bring them home: Now here is an ende of this commission, but not an end of inward grudge and hatred, that the commons bare to the Cardinall, and to all those Gentlemen, that behemently set forth that Commission & demaund.

In this troubleous season, the vplandthe men of Germany, called the Bowres, rose in a great number, almost an hundreth thousand, and rebelled agaynst the Princes of Germany, of which a great number were slaine and destroyed.

An insurrection in Ger-manie.

In Aprill last past, the Tyndall men, with the ayde of the Scottes, to the number of .liij. hundred, did dayly great robberyes in Englande. For to repressse this nest of theeuers were sent, sir Richard Bulmer, and sir Christopher Dacres, with a great company of Englishe men, and to them dyuers men came, and submitted themselves, but the great theeuers kept them in the Mountaynes of Cheuiot, and dayly skirmished wyth the Englishe men, and could not soone be taken: but after long liyng abroade, they scuered, and many of them were taken.

You haue heard befoze how the Cardinall suppressed many monasteries, of the which one was called Beggam in Suffex, the which was verie commodious to the countrey: but so befell the cause, that a riotous company, disguised and birknowne, with painted faces and visers, came to the same Monasterie, and brought with them the Chanons, and put them in their place againe, and promised them that whensoever they rang the Bell, that they would come with a great power and defend them. Thys doynge came to the eare of the kings counsaile, which caused the Chanons to be taken, and they confessed the Capitaynes, which were imprisoned, and soze punished.

Beggam.

The Cardinall about this season, by his power Legantine, sent a Chapeleyne of his, called Doctor John Aley, a man of more learning then bertue, or good conscience, to visite all places religious: this priest roade in his Gowne of Meluet, with a great trayne, & was receyued into euery house of religion with procession, as though the Legate had bene there, & tooke surh great sommes for his visitation, that the religious soze were grieved, and murmured much against it, and in especial, for they were charged with great sommes of money to the king, and now this sodaine visitation or predation on, cleane shaued them. The common people spake much against this, and also they sayde, that the Cardinall by visitations, making of Abbottes, probates of testaments, grauntyng of faculties, licenses, and other pollynages in his Courtes Legantines, had made his treasure egall with the kinges, and yet euery yere he sent great sommes to Rome: this was their communication euer against the Cardinall and his high aucthoritie, and the spirituall men most disdayned it.

Elizabeth Blunt the mother of the Duke of Richemond.

You shall vnderstande, the king in his fresche youth was in the cheynes of loue, with a faire damosell called Elizabeth Blunt, daughter to Syr John Blunt knight, which damosell in synging, daunsing, and in all goodly pastimes, exceeded all other, by the which goodly pastimes, the kings hart: and she againe shewed him such fauour, that by him she bare a goodly man childe, of beautie like to the father and mother. This child was well brought by lyke a Princes childe, and when he was six yere of age, the King made him knight, and called him Lorde Henry Fitz Roy, and on Sunday beyng the .xviij. day of June, at the Manor of place of Bridewell, the sayde Lorde led by two Erles, was created Erle of Notyngham, and then he was brought back againe by the sayde two Erles: then the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke led him into the great chamber againe, and the king created him Duke of Richemond and Sommerfet: and the same daye was the Lorde Henry Courteney Erle of Deuonshire, and Colyn Germaine to the king, created Marques of Excester, and the Lorde Henry Brandon, sonne to the Duke of Suffolke and the French Quene the kings sister, a childe of two yere olde, was created Erle of Lincolne, and Syr Thomas Manners Lorde Roos, was created Erle of Rutlande, and Syr Henry Clifford, was created Erle of Cumberland, and the Lorde Fitz Water Syr Robert Radcliffe was created Viscount Fitz Water, and Syr Thomas Bulleyn Treasorer of the Kings household, was created Viscount Rocheford, and at those creations were kept great feastes and disguisings.

The creation of the Duke of Richemond

After this the Cardinall tooke vpon him as the kings chiefe counsailler, to see a reformation in the order of the kings household, wherein he made certaine ordynaunces. He also made all newe officers in the house of the Duke of Richemond, which was then newly begonne: Also at that tyme he ordeyned a counsaile, and stablished another household for the Ladie Marie, then beyng Princesse of the realme, so that all thing that was done, was done by him, and without his assent nothing was done: he toke so much vpon him, and made the king beleue that all thinges should be to his honor, and that he needed not to take any payne, so that to him was the charge of all things committed, at the which wise men beked, and light men laughed, thinking great foly in his highe presumption. And at this time, the sayde Cardinall gaue to the king the lease of the manor of Hampton Court, which he had of the lease of the Lorde of saint Iohnes, and on which he had done great coste. Therefore the king of his gentle nature, licensed him to lie in his Manor of Richemond at his pleasure, and so he laye there at certaine times: but when the common people, and in especiall suche, as had bene king Henry the seuenthes seruauntes, sawe the Cardinall kepe house in the Manor royall of Richemond, which king Henry the seuenth so highly esteemed, it was a maruayle to heare how they grudged and said, see a Boochers Dogge he in the Manor of Richemond: these with manye opprobrious wordes

They called him Boochers Dogge because he was a Boochers sonne.

wordes were spoken agaynst the Cardinall, whose pryde was so high that he nothing regarded, and yet was he hated of most men.

In this season the French kings mother Regent of Fraunce, and the three estates of the realme, assembled together, concerning the estate of their realme: first, they sent a solempne Ambassadoz to the Emperour, with articles (as they thought reasonable) for the deliuerance of the French king, and also for a peace, they sent also a messenger to the king of Englande, for a safeconduit for an Ambassadour to be sent into England, for a treatie of peace, which to the messenger was graunted and deliuered.

Then came ouer as Ambassadour from Fraunce, John Jokyn now called Mounier de Vaux, which as you haue hard in the last yere, was kept secret in Maister Larkes house, and when he came into Englande, he was welcommed of the Cardinall, and there betwene them were such communications, that at the sute of the sayde John Jokyn, a truce was concluded, from the .xiiij. day of July for fortie dayes, betwene England and Fraunce, both on the sea and on the lande. Full well wist John Jokyn what he ment, when he desired peace for fortie dayes, for in that season the Picards might haue a quiet harvest to carie in their corne, which they should not haue, if the garrisons of Calice and Guysses: and other within the Englishe pale, had nat bene restrayned from warre, and also the fishermen of Deepe, Bulleyn and Traiport, had quyet fishyng, by this truce, for the fraunce of England, was come home to harborough, thys truce grieved the men of warre on both parties, it was so sodaine that they wist not well what to doe.

A truce take in Fraunce. for fortie dayes.

When the Fleminges hard tell of truce, and that they were not comprehended in the same, they began to rayle and sayde, that the king of Englande had not done truely with them, to take a truce without their knowlege: the Englishe men answered, that they had no Ambassadour in Englande, and if that they had had any, they should haue bene made pryue, but the king would send them no worde of his affayres, if they would not sende to knowe, for he ought their maister, nor yet them no such seruise.

The French men in this season, enterprised to enter into Flaunders, by Aetodike, but they were manfully defended by the Flemynge, and because the French men passed by the Englishe pale, and had nothing done to them, the Flemynge were sore displeased with the English men of Calice.

In the latter ende of July came into Englande Mounier de Vaux, chiefe President of Roan, and was brought to the Cardinalls presence at the Manor of Richemond, and when hys commission was shewed, it was doubted whether the aucthoritie were sufficient, because the king his mayster was prisoner in Spaine: but then he shewed aucthoritie, geuen to the Ladie Regent, and certaine nobles of the realme of Fraunce, by the French king in open Parliament, before his goyng into Italy for all things that did or might conuerse the realme during his absence. When the commission was thought reasonable, then was reherfed to the Frenchmen their doubleneste, their vntedfastnesse, and how they had behaued themselves toward the king of Englande: then they answered, if we haue offended you, you haue vs punished, for you haue brent our townes, slayne our people, destroyed our Countrey, so that you haue brought the lowe parties to a long miserie without recouery, and therefore sithe we be the leesters for our offence, yet wee due for peace, least we be more punished. After long consultation, they offered many offers: first to paye all such sommes of money as were due, both for the yereely tribute, and also for the Citie of Tournay, and the frenche Queenes dower, and farther to recompence the king of Englands his expences done in the warres.

A truce concluded with France by the Ladie Margaret for thre monethes.

Duryng thys treatie, worde was brought to the king of England, that there was a truce sodainely concluded, betwene the realme of Fraunce and the Ladie Margaret Duchesse of Sauoy, and governour of Flaunders and the low Countries, for the space of thre Monthes, so that no entercourse should be betwene them for Marchaunts, but by safeconduit, and that thys Proclamation was proclaymed at saint Omers, the first daye of August, wherupon the king was contented, that a peace should be taken from the xiii. day of August, to the first day of December, which was proclaymed in London: and by this truce euery Englishe man without safeconduyt might passe into Fraunce, and they likewise into England. When thys truce was proclaymed, the people murmured and sayde, nowe hath the Frenchmen gotten their fishyng quietly, and if they had bene kept from that, they had bene vndone, and so with faire wordes they helpe themselves, which if we haue warre againe, shall hurt vs, for this Herryng shall bittayle their townes the next yere. This the common people talked, but it was to no purpose.

Ambassadors into Denmarke

This yere the king sent Doctor Henry Standishe, Bishop of saint Asse and sir John Baker knight into the realme of Denmarke, to common and entreat with the nobles of the Country for the reduction of kyng Christiern, to his realme, crowne, and dignitie, but all that coulde be sayd or perswaded could not bying the Danes to any reason, they hated him so for his great crueltie, and in especiall for the great tyranny that he committed at Stekholme in Swethen, where he despyed a great number of his nobles to a banquet, and after the banquet, strake of their heades. When the Ambassadors of Englands saw that they coulde not bring him in againe: they then began to require, that his sonne might haue the crowne and dominion, which neuer them offended, and was of progeny borne of Lady Isabell, sister to the Emperour Charles the fift which also made great labor and instance for the same: but the Danes answered they would none of his procreation, for they sayde, the sonne would folow the father, or else at the least he would reuenge his fathers wrong, and so with this answer they departed.

Peace concluded and proclaymed betwene the king of Englands and Fraunce.

So much did the Ambassadors of Fraunce, both by offers and entreaties, that the king of England and his counsaile, did condescende to appeale, and the more soner because they saw if warre should continue, money must be demaunded of the commons, which had leuer rebell then pay any more were proclamations of the same, sent to euery Citie and good towne, and the viij. day of September this peace was proclaymed solemnely with a trumpet through the Citie of London, the effect wherof was, that vpon humble suite and large proffers, made by the Lady Regent of Fraunce, and the thre estates of the same, a peace, league, and amitie, was concluded betwene both the kings of England and Fraunce, and their countries and subiectes, so that the subiectes of eyther realme may lawfully passe and repasse, into the others realme and dominions, to by and sell frankly and freely, without let or interruption, and that this league in no wise, was a breche of the league taken with the Emperour and the Lady Margaret, Gouvernesse of Flaunders in no poynt, but that the sayd Emperour and Lady Margaret, and al other the kings old & auncient confederates and allies, were comprehended in the same, and for due restitution to be made to the frenchmen, there was appointed the reuerend father Cutberd Bishop of London, & for restitution to be made to the Englishmen, was appoynted the chiefe President of Roan.

A truce proclaimed in Spaine betwene the Emperour and the French king.

And on the xi. day of September, was a truce concluded in Spaine, in a towne of Vale Dolito, betwene the Emperour and the French king, from that daye to the ende of December next ensuing, at which time the Emperour had not seene the French kyng, which was conueighed by sea out of Italy into Spaine, to a Castell called Madzill, and there remayned: and shortly after fell soze sicke, and was in great ieoperdy, for the which the Frenchmen cared little, for they sayd that if he died, they should pay no raunsome, and then their realme should be quiet.

This peace betwene England and Fraunce, nothing pleased the Flemyngs, wherfore when they had dronke well, they spake largely, and boasted how they had bittayled the English armies, and found them cartes and cariages, and thought it not kindly done, to refuse them as olde frenches and make peace with olde enemies, but they did not consider what money the Englishmen left in their countrey, nor how the Frenchmen for dread of the Englishmen, would not invade Flaunders, so that they liued quietly, all thys they considered not.

The conclusion of the peace.

In the same moneth this peace was proclaymed, in Paris, Lyons, Roan and Amias: by this peace the king of England, should receyue at certaine daies, xx. hundred thousand Crownes, which then was foure hundred thousand ponde sterling, of the which one payment of fiftie thousand ponde was payed in hande. After this peace taken, all the men of warre, that were about the retinue of Calice, Hammes & Guynes, were called home, and the shippes brought into the hauens, and many a Creker wist not how to liue.

Ambassadors sent out of England into Fraunce.

In the moneth of October were sent into Fraunce, Sir William Fitzwilliam Treasorer of the kings house, and Doctor Taylor, as Ambassadors from the king of England, and were receyued through Fraunce very honorably, and by long iourneys at the last, came to the Citie of Lyons the. xxiiij. day of November, where to them were presented, wine, fishe, flethe, and ware, and they were visited with diuers noble men. And on the. xxvi. daye they were conueyed to the court by two Erles, and at the gate receyued with two Cardinals, and so brought to the Lady Regent, which with much honor them receyued, and then they deliuered the kinges letters, which she tooke in great reuerence, and so with her counsaile, departed into her priuie chamber, and there taried almost two houres, and then came out againe, to whome Doctor Taylor made an eloquent oration in Latiu, of the commodities of peace, and declared that the king his Maister for very loue, and not for no dread nor nede did not condescend to peace. To whom the Bishop of Befanson, Chauncelloz to the Lady Regent made answer: And that done, the Ambassadors were feasted, and serued with men of great estate, and after that they were conueyed to their lodgings.

And on Sunday next ensuing, the Ambassadors were conueyed to the Court,

The league
Kwozne.

Court, and from thence the Lady regent and all the Court, roade solempnly to the cathedraill Church of Lions, and there a Cardinall sang a solempne Masse, and after that Masse was done, the Lady Regent tooke the two Ambassadors, the one on the right hand, and the other on the left hand, and so went by to the high Altar, and there she layde her hand on the Canon and Crucifix of the Masse booke, and there sware to obserue, fulfil, and kepe all the articles and agreementes, concluded in the league and treaty of peace by her Commissioners. And when this was done, the Bishop of Bisanson made an eloquent sermon, taking for his antheme. Quis est homo qui vult vitā: diligit dies videre bonos, inquirere pacem, &c. In this sermon he much prayesd the king of England, which assented to peace, & lauded the Cardinall whome he called the Legat of God, for counsailling him to peace: for now was fraunce free, and all hostilitie ceased, and when this sermon was done, Te deum was song, and then the trumptes blew, and all other instruments musaicall, and then the Lady Regent, with all her traine returned to the palace, and there were the Ambassadors highlye feasted, and then Sir William Fitzwilliam tooke his leane, and came shortly into Englande, leauing behinde hym Doctor Taylor, which taried there till the French king was deliuered.

When the articles of peace, were knowne to the Emperoz and his counsaile, full well wist they that the king of England now would be friend to the french king, wherefore he and hys subiectes, shewed themselues moze straunge and unkinde to the Englishmen, then they had bene accustomed. Insomuch that the English Marchauntes, put by a supplication to the Emperoz, shewing him how their goodes were taken, by letters of Marke, their shippes restrayned, new impositions taken of them, and most of all they complayned, that by an act made in Spaine called Premetica which ordaineth that euery cloth, should be of a certaine number of threds, the clothes of Englande here could not be solde, to the great hinderaunce of the English Marchauntes: For the Clothiers of Englande know not the number appointed by the statute, and when they make cloth, they know not to what countrie that cloth shalbe solde, of these thinges the English Marchauntes desired a redresse.

At a day appointed the Englishmen had an aunswere deliuered them in writing, conteyning certaine articles. The first if any wronges be done unto you, our iustice is open in euery place. The seconde, as touchyng letters of Marke, we will be aduised by our Counsaile. The third, as touchyng your shippes we freely graunt that you shall haue our friendship liberally, so that with your awne shippes and goodes, you may go at your pleasure, passyng or makyng abode. And as touchyng customes, or impositions of new: The accident may cause vs so to do, but that shall be in suspence. And finally as touchyng our Premetica, made by the Lordes of our counsaile, and by vs affirmed, we will not breake, but we will suffer to the entent that you English Marchauntes, may bring true and well made cloth, for the which you shall be the better welcome: this was the very aunswere that the English Marchauntes had, of the Emperour and his Counsaile.

In this winter was great death in London, wherefore the Terme was adiozned, and the king for to eschue the plague, kept his Christmase at Eltham house.

Eltham with a small number, for no man might come thether, but such as were appoynted by name: this Christmas in the kings house, was called the still Christmase. But the Cardinall in this season, lay at the Manor of Richmond, and there kept open houholde, to Lordes, Ladies, and all other that would come, with playes and disguisynge in most royall maner: which soze greiued the people, and in especiall the kinges seruantes, to see him kepe an open Court, and the king a secret Court.

The Cardinall came to Eltham the .viij. day of January, and taried there till the .xxij. day. In which season the Cardinall, and other of the kings counsaile, sat for a direction to be taken in the kings house, and first it was considered, that the great number of the yomen of the garde were very chargeable, and that there were many officers farre striken in age: which had seruantes in the Court, and so the king was serued with their seruantes, and not with his awne seruantes, which was thought not conuenient. Wherefore first the officers seruantes, were put out of the Court, and many olde officers were put to liue in their Countries, but the king of his bountie enhaunsed their liuinges, for he that had three pound wages, had sixe pounde a moith, without attendaunce, and he that had .xl. shillings, had foure pound, and so euery man after that rate, and yong men were put in their robes. Then was there .lxxij. of the garde, which had .xij. pence the day checked, put out of that wages, and they had sixe pence a day vnchecked, and should dwel in their Countries, and come not at the Court, till they were sent for, except it were for suites: in the which the Cardinall promised them, to be their helper: Alas what sorowe, and what lamentation was made, when all these persons should depart the Court. Some sayde that poore seruantes were bndone and must steale: Some saide that they were found of the reuercions of the officers seruire, so that for them was nothing more set out at the Deser, and it was great charitie to finde them. Other sayd that the yomen of the garde, which were put out, were nowe not able to finde themselues and theyr horse, to do the king seruire. Other sayde, that nowe they would poll, and pill in their Countries, and oppresse the poore people, thus euery man had his sayng.

At this season the Cardinall made many ordinauntes, concernyng the kinges house, which be at this day called the statutes of Eltham, the which some sayde were moze profitable then honourable.

This Moneth of January was peace concluded, betwene the realmes of England and Scotland, for three yeres, and sixe Monethes, of the which the Scottes were very glad, and especially the borderers, for they were soze hurt by this warre.

Scotland.

All this yere was continuall suite made to the Emperoz, and his Counsaile, by the Ladie Regent of Fraunce, and all the realme there, for the deliuerance of Fraunces the frenche king, and after many communications which tooke none effect, was sent into Spaine of Ambassade, the noble Ladie Margaret, late Duches of Blanson, sister to the french king, with a great companie of Nobles and honourable personages. The Emperour Charles met the sayd Ladie in the Market place of the Citie of Toledo, and her right hartily welcomed, and after that the Duches and her companie had refused to agree to certaine articles, which the french king had offered himselfe, the sayde Duches had licence of the Emperoz, to go to Madzill, where the french king was kept as prisoner, & there to know his minde. When she was there, she and other deuised such a way, that the french king should haue scaped, and post hozses were layd euery where: this was not so secrete, but the Emperour was thereof enformed, and tooke certaine french men, which confessed how all thinges shoulde haue bene brought to passe. The Duchesse of Allanson heeryng that her priuie deuise was opened, on post hozses with all speede returned into fraunce, leauyng the whole matter at large.

But for all this the Lordes of Fraunce ceased not dayly to sue for the deliuerance of theyr souereigne Lord, and at last to the Emperour was deliuered a booke for the french kings deliuerance. For the Emperour sayce he woulde nothing demaunde of him, for hauyng him he had more then he could geue him. Then the french king and his Counsaile, offered a booke conteyning many articles to the Emperour: and when the Emperour had well vnderstand the contentes of the same, he sayde to the french Ambassadors, is this the full will and agreement of your Mayster, they answered yea: well sayde the Emperour, if this be his awne offer, I trust that he will kepe it. Then the Emperoz thought best to bring the french king to more libertie and to visite him himselfe, which he had not done but in the tyme of his sicknesse. Where the .xiiij. day of februarye, the Emperour accompanied with the great Constable of fraunce, the Duke of Enphantaso, the Duke of Ciuill, the Duke of Passo, the Duke of Aluoy, the Duke of Arberkirke, the Duke of Medena, the Duke of Massedonia, the Marques of Aguler, the Marques Willafranca, the Marques of Sturgus, the Erle of Barcelona, the Erle of Boniuent, the Erle of Jeneuer, the Erle of Salenas, the Erle of Arrowffe, the Erle of Saluator, and .xij. Bishoppes, and a great number of Nobles, came to the Castle of Madzill, to whome was the french king brought with a noble repayre, to whome the Emperoz made low reuence, and declared to him how all victozies consist in the hande of God, and where great debate, warre, and strife, had long continued betweene them, he sayd it was the very handy worke of God, to deliuer him to captiuitie, so that by his restraint of liberty, a generall peace shoulde be concluded through all christendome and now sith you haue offered vs reasonable condicions, we entending not your punishment, noz restraint of your liberty, haue gently receiued your offers, signed with your awne hande.

And soone after a peace was concluded betweene the Emperour and the french king, and the same openly proclayned through all Spain, fraunce, flanders, and the Emperours Dominions, whereof their subiectes were glad, and made fiers and triumphes through al. their Countries. The king of England also shewed himselfe to be very glad of the said peace. Wherefore he heeryng that the french king was at a poynt to be deliuered, sent a knight of his Chamber, called sir Thomas Cheyney to the french king, certefiying him of the great gladnesse that he had of his deliuey, and also the comfort that he had for the conclusion of peace: of which kinde remembraunce, the french king much reioysed. The french king tooke his leaue of the Emperour, and tooke his iourney into fraunce ward, and came to Victoria, in which season the same went, that the Dolphyn which shoulde haue bene deliuered, as one of the hostages, for the french king his father was deafead, and

and so the french king was stayed for .xx. dayes, till the truth was knowne: other sayd that the cause was that there were betwene fountraby and Bayon. xxx. thousande men, and doubted least if he had bene brought downe to fountraby, he might haue bene rescued: but whatsoeuer the cause was, he was restrayned as you haue heard: but shortly after he was deliuered and returned into fraunce the .xxj. day of March which was taken the .xxiiij. day of february in the yere last past.

After that the Emperour had concluded, and taken his leaue of the french king, he rode to the sayre Citie of Ciuill, and there he with great triumph maryed Ladie Isabell daughter to king Emanuell of Portyngale, with whom he had great treasures and summes of money, and great friendship of the Portyngales, for he had .xj. hundred thousand Ducates with her maryage. When this mariage was knowne in England, the Englishmen soze murmured, that the Emperour beyng at Windsor, in the .xiiij. yere of the king, had saythfully promised to mary the Ladie Mary, daughter to the king of England. But for a very truth the Emperours Counsaile was not content with the aunswere made to Mounfire de Beuers the last yere, and so counsayled the Emperoz, not to tary for the Ladie Mary which was yong: and also they sayd that she was begotten of the king of England by his brothers wife. And also an act was made in Spaine, that he should not depart the Countrie, till he had issue. All these thinges were layd to him, which caused him to encline to mariage, and seyng the great offer that the king of Portyngall made to him, he was thereto agreeyng, and so married the Ladie Isabell sister to king John of Portyngall.

The .xxviiij. day of Aprill, in the beginning of this .xxiiij. yere, came to the Court to Grenewiche, Mounfire Brenion chiefe President of Roan, and John Tokyn now called Mounfire de Vaux, which President of Roan, before the king set in a Throne, and accompanied with all his Nobles, and the Ambassadors of Rome, of the Emperour, of Venice and florence beyng there present, made in the Latine tongue a solempne oration, the effect whereof was that he shewed, how dreadfull the warres had bene betweene the realines of Englande and fraunce, what great losse the realine of fraunce had susteyned by the sayde warres: He declared farther of what power the king of England was, and what conquest he might haue made in fraunce, the king beyng prisoner, and knowledged the king of Englands right in the warres, & their wrongs, where he humbly thanked him of his pittie & copassion that he had on them in their necessitie & affliction, that he would consent to peace. To this oration the Chauncelour of the Duchie of Lancaster, by name syr Thomas More made aunswere saying: that it much reioysed the king, that they first considered how by his power he might haue oppzessed, and how by his pittie he had releued them: wherefore he would hereafter that for kindnesse, they shoulde shewe him none unkindnesse, but inuolately to kepe that league which was concluded.

The next daye after beyng Sundaye, the Cardinal song a solempne Masse in the kinges Chapell of Grenewiche, and after Masse the king swore before the french Ambassadors, the foure Ambassadors aboue reherfed beyng present, that he should keepe the peace and league concluded, betweene him and his brother and perpetuall alie the french king, during his lyfe lyfe and a yere after, and after Masse to all Ambassadors was made a great feast.

Because all this Sommer the king tooke his pastime in hunting, and nothing happened worthy to be written of: I will returne to the French king, now come agayne into his realme.

When he was at Paris he sayde and wrote to the Emperour, that he would obserue and keepe his promises in euery point, but what he thought I will not iudge: For shortly after he set forth a booke, called the Apologie or defence agaynst the conuention or agreement made betwene the Emperour and him at Madzill, alleaging that he was compelled to make that agreement, or else he should neuer haue bene deliuered: He alleaged farther that the Lawyers of hys realme cleerely determined, all promises and covenantes made by any persons to his atone hurt, with him that is more of power then he, to be made by compulsion, & so of none effect and not to be performed. He also sayde that the Gouvernoirs of the lawe, determined that no othe or promise is of any effect, where a man is in iopardie of lyfe, or of perpetuall imprisonment or bondage, and most in especiall when it is done by compulsion or threating. Moreouer he sayde that he might geue awaye nothing apperteyning to his crowne, without the assent of his peeres, and the three estates of his realme (to the which he was swozne at the time of his coronation, which would thereto in no wise assent, and therefore he saide that his othe and promise was boyde, and so he declared it to the Viceroy of Naples, beyng then with him as Ambassadour for the Emperour, and offered for his ransome to paye as much money as euer French king payde, with diuers other articles of newe deuised.

When these articles came to the Emperour, he them refused and sayde, that he had desyred nothing impossible of the French king, and if he might not, or would not keepe the appoyntment betwene them made, yet he bad him keepe that poynt of couenaunt, which onely depended in his will, that was that he should yelde himselfe prisoner agayne, and so he should haue his children deliuered: and then he would reasonably common with him of newe articles of agreement, and as to the Apologie set forth by the French king that his othe and promise was boyde, and made by compulsion and threating, it was answered by another booke called the Refutation or Quercommynng of the Apologie, of the conuention of Madzill. Which two workes were so eloquently set forth, with such and so many perswasions and allegations, both on the one part and the other, that it would comber a wyse man (except he were perfectly indifferent) to iudge to which part he should most encline, and giue credence, therefore I leaue it at large.

After that the French king was deliuered, and the peace concluded, the Emperour was fully determined to passe the seas into Italy, and so to Rome, and there to be crowned Emperour, wherefore heeryng the Bishop of Rome, called Pope Clement the seuenth, a man of great wit and vice, and of little vertue or learning: much doubted in himselfe what damage might come to him, if the Emperour had both Naples, Scicill, and the Duchie of Millaine, and also were crowned Emperour. Wherefore he sent to the Venicians, and to the Florentines, and to Fraunces Sforze Duke of Millaine, which had committed treason agaynst the Emperour, and was depriued by iudgement ment of his name and dignitie, and the same geuen to the Duke of Bourbon, but yet by power he kept much of the possession: and declared to them, by what puyssaunce the Emperour would come into Italy, and what great possessions he had there, at euery end of Italy, so that if he were once crowned Emperour, he would looke to haue the seignorie of all Italy: wherefore they consulted and debated for their awne suretie, howe to banishe him and his all Italy by power: and as they were debatyng of this matter, they hard word how the French king was returned into Fraunce, and sought all wayes and meanes howe to breake with the Emperour. When they sawe so open an action offered to them, with all diligence they sent theyr seuerall Ambassadors, that is to say, the Pope twaine, the Duke of Venice called Andrew Gritti, one (which was his secretozie) and the Florentines one, and the Duke of Millaine one, these fiue Ambassadors came to the French king, and declared what ioye & gladnesse their maisters had of his safe returne into his realme, and then they shewed to him howe they by the Bishop of Romes exhortation had deuised a league, which should set a perpetuall peace betwene all princes Christen, and for the more expedicion, they had set forth and agreed vpon articles, for the whole league. When the French king sawe the articles it was as he would haue it, for he thought by the whole power of the Confederates, his children should be deliuered, and he yet agayne once to haue a medlyng in Italy: Wherefore with great gladnesse and solemnitie, he entered into the league, and swore to keepe it, and gaue to the Ambassadors great rewardes.

When this League was thus concluded, it was sent to the king of Englande, which with great deliberation lyke a wise prince, consulted much with his counsaile of this waightie matter, and when all things were fully perceyued, he answered to the Ambassadors, that he thanked much the confederates of their good will, but he would not enter into the league, because he would be an indifferent entreator betwene both parties and a meane for a peace: and so he wrote to the Emperour, which hartily thanked him, and tooke it for great kindnesse: thys league was called the holy league of Clement. When the Bishop of Rome sawe that this league was concluded, because he would shewe that he and the confederates, had iust cause of warre agaynst the Emperour for things done in Italy, he sent to him a letter, dated at Rome the .xxiiij. day of June: But for as much as this is no part ment to the storie of Englande to entreat of the affayres of Italy, I will for a while leaue the Pope and the Emperour, and agayne returne to our matters of Englande.

Thys sommer was great grudge agaynst Marchaunt straungers in London, in so much that if the matter had not bene well pacified, much business might haue folowed, the cause of the grudge was this, there was an act made in the fourth yere of king Henry, that no straunger should bring in no Wyne nor Woade in any aliens ship: so that the Englishe men after that went to Cholose, and brought much Woade to London, and serued all the clothiers repaying to London: and now in thys yere by meanes of gentlemen about the king, the straungers had license to bring in woade in straungers bottomes, so that all London was full of their woade, and also they sent their woade into the countrey, so that the Englishe mens woade in London lay vnought: wherefore s<sup>r</sup> John Allyn knight beyng Maior, sent for a great great sort of straungers which were the chiefe Marchaunts of all, and shewwed unto them what gaynes they had gotten in the Citie, by reason wherof they should auance the City, and not hurt it, wherfore he willed them to sell their woode to the Marchaunts of London, and they should be payde incontinent and not to resort to other places in the Countrey with their woode, to the hinderance of the Londoners. The straungers proudly answered the Maior, that they would seeke every place for their auantage, and so in mock-king maner departed. The Maior perceyuing that, called a common coun-sayle in the Moneth of August, and there were many billes layde agaynst the straungers, and at last it was enacted, that no Citezen or free man, should buy or sell in no place, nor exchange nor meddle with certaine straun-gers, called Anthony Bonuice, Laurence Bonuice, Anthony Uuald, Anthony Caueler, Fraunces de Bard, Thomas Calnerant, and a great sort mo whose names I let passe, and if any person did meddle or occupie wyth them contrarie to this act, he should leese his freedome and libertie in the Citie of London: by which act the straungers were so brydeled, that they came to a reasonable poynt and conclusion.

The first inhauning of the Angell.

In thys season the angell Noble was iust the sixt part of an ounce Troy so that sixe Angels were iust an ounce, which was fortie Shyllings sterling, and the Angell was worth two ounces of Siluer, so that sixe Angels were twelue ounces, which was but fortie Shyllings in Siluer: but in Flaunders, Zaband, and Zeland, the Angell was worth seuen Shyllings foure pence, so that Marchaunts daylie caried ouer much money to the great hinderance of the marchaundise of this realme, for most men caried Golde, and when it was there, it was losse in every noble eyght pence to bring it hether againe:
 and when the Englishe men spake to the rulers there, to leaue the enhaunsing of the kings coyne, they laughed them to scozne. The king and his coun-sayle perceiued to what ende this enhaunement in Flaunders, if it were not met with shortly would bring the riches of thys realme: wherfore in the Moneth of September, he by proclamation, enhaunced the Angell to seuen Shyllings foure pence, and the Royall to a. xi. Shyllings, and the crowne to foure Shyllings & foure pence, and this proclamation was made throughe all Englande: and to bring out of Flaunders the great number of Englishe Golde which was there, the king by proclamation agayne the fift day of No-uember, enhaunced the Angell to seuen Shyllings sixe pence, and so euery ounce of Golde should be. xlv. Shyllings, and that an ounce of Siluer should be three Shyllings nine pence in value.

The second inhauning.

Thys yere on Michelmas euen, Thomas Hynde which was chosen Shirife before, was called to take his othe, but he made defaute, wherefore one Simon Rice was chosen which refused, then was one George Robinson Mercer chosen, which tooke his othe not to be able. The commons were in such a furie, that they sware that they would haue a Mercer. Maister Nicholas Lambert an Alderman and Grocer, which had a dispensation for the Chriualtie for that yere, seyng this disorde, sayde to the commons, maisters although my time be not come, yet to appease your strife, if you will chose me I will take it, and so he was chosen with great thankes.

In this season a sodayne rumour beganne in Spaine, that the Emperour would haue warre with the king of Englande, whereof hearing the Englishe

Englishe Marchaunts, which lay in Spaine at dyuers Portes, concluded to send to Doctoz Edward Lee, Ambassadoz for the king of England in the Emperours Court to knowe the certeintie, which gently answered them, that he trusted that there was no such cause, of the which they should be a-reard, for the king his maister and the Emperour were yet in perfite loue and amitie, and farther he sent them worde, that the king of Englande was not entered into the league of Italy with the confederates, as they would haue him, for he labozeth to make a vniuersall peace, which he could not coueniently doe, if he were protectoz or a contractoz in the league, this aunswere he sent to them from Granada, the fift day of September.

The. xiiij. day of January came to the Court, Don Hugo de Mendosa a great man borne in Spaine of a noble famely, this persen was sent as Ambassadoz from the Emperour to the king of Englande with large commission, for the Emperour put it to the king of Englandes determination, whether his demaundes which he required of the French king, were reasonable or not, and for the declaration thereof, and for to knowe the king of Englandes requit and entreatie concerning the peace, was this Noble man sent into Englande, which manye times consulted with the king and hys counsayle, and he taried here two yeres full.

In this yere the second day of Marche were receiued into London, with a greate company of noble men, the Bishop of Carbe, Fraunces Vicount of of Comaye, and Maister Anthony Wescy, second president of Paris, as Ambassadors from the French king, and so brought through London to the Tailors hall and there lodged, and afterward were conueied to Greenwich to the king, where they were right hartely entertayned, and after their letters red and their requestes heard, they departed for a season to London

Ambassadors
 from the French king.

The French Ambassadors hauing their recourse to the king and his counsaile, much labored to haue in mariage the Lady Mary daughter to the king, and after long counsailling, that matter was put in suspence because the president of Paris, doubted whether the mariage betwene the king and her mother, beyng his brothers wife were good or no: of this first motion grew much businelle or it were ended, as you shall heare afterward. The common people repugned sore against that demaund, for they sayde that the was heire apparant to her father, and if he shoulde dye, they would haue no Frenchman to be king of England, and thus the common people spake, as their mindes serued them.

Of this motion grew all the trouble
 betwene Queene Katheryn and king Henry
 her husband.

On the. xiiij. daye of March were conueyed from London to Greenewiche, by the Erle of Rutland and other, the Lorde Gabriell de Salamanka Erle of Ottonbrough, John Burgrau of Siluerberge, and John Faber a famous Clarke, after Bishop of Aien, as Ambassadors from Don Fernando, brother to the Emperour, newly elect king of Hungarye and Beame, after the death of his brother in law king Lebys, which was slaine by the Turke the last Sommer, as you haue heard before: this company was welcomed of the high Officers, and after brought into the kinges presence, all the nobilitie being present, and there after great reuerence made, the sayd Clarke Maister Faber made a notable oration, taking his grounde of the Gospell, Exiit seminare semen suum, and of that he declared how Christ and his disciples went forth to sowe, and howe that seede was good that fell into the good ground,

ground, and brought forth good fruite, which was the Christian faith: and then he declared how contrary to that sowing, Mahomet had sowne seede, which brought forth euell seede, and shewed from the beginning, how the Turkes haue increased in power, what realmes they had conquered, & what people they had subdued euen to that day: he declared farther what actes the great Turke then liuing had done, and in especiall he noted the getting of Belgrade, and of the Rhodes, and the slaying of the king of Hungarie, to the great rebuke (as he saide) of all the kinges christened: he set forth also what power the Turke had, what diuersities of companies, what armure, what Capitaynes he had, so that he thought, that without a maruelous great number of people, he coulde not be ouerthrowne wherefoze he moste humbly beseched the king, as saint Georges knight, & defendoz of the fayth, to assist the king his Maister, to that godlye warre and verteous purpose. To this oration the king by the mouth of Sir Thomas More answered, that much he lamented the losse that happened in Hungarie, and if it were not for the warres, which were betwene the two great Princes, he thought that the Turke would not haue enterprised that act, wherfoze he with all his studie would take paine, first to set an vnitie and peace throughtout all Christendom, and after that he both with money and men, would be ready to helpe toward that glorious warre, as much as any other Prince in Christendome. After this done the Ambassadors were well cherished, and diuers times resorted to the Courte, and had great chere and good rewardes, and so the thirde day of Maie next ensuing, they tooke their leaue and departed homeward.

After that the Ambassadors of Fraunce were departed, the king sent an other Ambassade into Fraunce (that is to say) Sir Thomas Woleyn knight, Viscount of Rocheforth, and sir Anthonie Browne knight, which came to Parys to the Bishop of Bathe, which lay in Fraunce as Ambassadoz for the king of England, and then these three went to the Court, and saw the french king in person sweare to kepe the league and amitie concluded betwene him and the king of England, and there they had great chere and Maskes shewed vnto them, but litle rewards were geuen, and so the Viscount Rochforth returned into England, and so did the Bishop of Bathe shortly after, leauing sir Anthonie Browne behinde for a ligier.

In this moneth of May the tenth day, the king sent sir Fraunces Poynes knight, as Ambassadoz from the king of England, to Charles the Emperour, and with him he sent Clarenseaux, king at armes, to demaunde the one halfe of the treasure and ordinaunce which was taken at Pavia, for so much as that warre, was made as well at the kinges charge, as the Emperours charge: he demaunded also the Duke of Diliaunce, to be deliuered to him, and also it was demaunded that the Emperour should deliuer the Bishop of Rome which was taken this Moneth as you shall heere, and also should bring his armie out of Italy, & if he refused to do any of these pointes, then Clarenseaux in the kinges name of Englande shoulde make to hym defiance.

When it was knowen that warre was like to be had betwene the Emperour and the king of England, the Commons of England sore lamented the chaunce, for all Marchaundise were restrayned to passe into any of the Empe-

The answer

Emperours Dominions, and the Marchants were desyzed by the Cardinal to kepe their martes at Calice, to the which in no wyse they would assent.

This same moneth the king sent two sayre shippes, well manned and bitayled, haung in them diuers cunning men, to seeke straunge Regions: and so forth they set out of the Chamys the .xx. day of May, if they sped well you shall heere at their returne.

Ships sent to seekc straung Regions.

The .xxij. day of May came in post to the king out of Fraunce, the Bishop of Tarbie, this Bishop brought to the king of Englande, the Articles which the French king now offered to the Emperour, which were contrary to the articles swozne at Hadzill in the .xxij. yere of the king, and farther he moued the king of England to be enemie to the Emperour, which request (as all men say) was much furthered by the Cardinall, bicause of the warres in Italy, betwene the Pope and the Emperour: this Bishop made hozt tarieng with the king, for in post againe he returned to Paris, to sir Fraunces Poynes, and Clarenseaux, which taried there for him, and so they ail tooke their iournay toward Spain.

And soone after, there were letters brought to the king of Englande from the French king, of his affayres in Italy: but Sundaye the second day of June, the king receyued letters at the Castell of Wynsore, by the which he perceyued all the order and maner of the sackyng of Rome, and takyng of the Pope: wherfoze the king was sozry, and so were many Prelates: but the Commonaltie little mourned for it, and sayde that the Pope was a Ruffian, and was not meete for the rowne: wherfoze they sayde that he began the mischiese, and so he was well serued. But the Cardinall which tooke this matter highly, called to him the Prelates, and the Clergie, and much mourned the fall of the Bishop of Rome, & saw how the people grudged agaynst the Spiritualtie, for their great pryde, pompe, and all liuyng: wherfoze he came to the king, and sayde: Sir by the onely callyng of God you be made defender of the Christian fayth, nowe consider in what state the Church of Christ now standeth: See, howe the heade of the Church of Rome is in captiuitie: See, howe the holy fathers be brought into thraldom, and be without comfort: nowe shewe your selfe an ayde, and a defender of the Church, and God shall rewarde you.

The king answered, my Lorde, I more lament this euill chaunce, then my tongue can tell, but where you say that I am defender of the fayth, I assure you, that this warre betwene the Emperour and the Pope is not for the fayth, but for temporall possessions and dominions, and now sith Bishop Clement is taken by men of warre, what shoud I doe: my person nor my people cannot him rescue, but if my treasure may helpe him, take that which to you seemeth most conuenient: for the which offer the Cardinall thanked the king on his knee, and thereupon the Cardinall caused to be gathered together of the kinges treasure .xij. scoze thousand pound, which he caried ouer the sea with him, as you shall heere after.

The Cardinall hath of the king to releue the Pope twelue scoze thousand pound.

Then the Cardinall sent Commissions, as Legate to all Bishops, commaundyng that they should cause in every parithe Church, solemne Prozessions to be made for the relieuyng of the Pope, and moued the people to fast thre dayes in the weeke, but few men fasted, for the Priestes sayd, that their commaundement was, to exhort the lay people to fast, and not to fast themselues:

Prayer and fasting.

themselves: and the laye people sayde, that the Priestes shoulde first fast, because the very cause of the fastyng, was for a Priest, but none of both almost fasted.

England bishop of Lincoln and other fault with the king's marriage.

This season began a fame in London, that the kinges confessor, beyng Bishop of Lincolne, called Doctor Longland, and diuers other great Clerkes had tolde the king that the mariage betwene him and the Ladie Katheryn, late wyfe to his brother, Prince Arthure, was not good, but damnable, and the king hereupon shoulde mary, the Duches of Alanson, sister to the French king, at the towne of Calice this Sommer, and the Viscount Rochforth had brought with him the picture of the sayde Ladie, and that at his returne out of Fraunce, the Cardinall should passe the Sea to go into Fraunce to fetch her.

This rumoz sprang so much, that the king sent for sir Thomas Seymer Maior of London, and straightly charged him to see that the people should seafe of this communication, vpon paine of the kinges high displeasure.

But whatsoeuer the Commons talked, it was concluded by the king & his Counsaile, that the Cardinall should passe into Fraunce, as his high Ambassadoz, but for what cause no person knewe but the king, till his returne.

Then was much preparation made at Calice, for the receiuyng of the Cardinall, but the common sayng was that the king would come to Calice, and meete with the French king, and for that cause such preparation was made, but he came not there at al, and alwayes the people commoned as they durst of the kinges marriage.

The Cardinall rieth towarde Fraunce.

The third day of July, the Cardinall of Yorke, passed through the Citie of London, accompanied with many Lordes, and Gentlemen, to the number of twelue hundred horse, towarde the Sea syde, and at Cauntozburie he rested, and there to the people declared the destruction of Rome, and howe the Pope was in captiuitie with many Cardinales: wherefore he caused a Letanie to be song by the Monkes of Christs Church, after this maner. S. Maria, ora pro Clemente Papa. S. Petri, ora pro Clemente Papa. and so forth all the Letanie: then he exhorted the people to fast and pray for his deliuerance, which fewe did.

A new found Letanie.

The .xj. day of May, the Cardinall with all his traine, tooke shipping at Douer, and the same day landed at Calice, where he was receyued with Procession, and with the whole garrison of the towne.

Barrelles of Gold.

When the Cardinall was landed, there were set on lande .xxj. Barrelles full of Gold of the kings money, which were deliuered to the Capitain of the Castell in charge: of this money the people much grudged, and said this money shall be spent out of the realme, and yet Englishe men shall haue no part nor profite of it, but onely it shall be spent for the Cardinales pleasure, and the French kinges, and the Popes profite.

The Cardinall was so sore displeased with the Emperour for keepyng the Pope in prison (although it were against his will and knowlege) that he imagined all the wayes and meanes possible, howe to hurt and damage the Emperour, and therefore he sent for the Englishe Marchauntes, willing them to kepe the Mart at Calice, but they answered that the towne of Calice, was a towne of warre, and all Marchauntes must haue libertie at all houres of the night, in the Mart season, which they could not haue at Calice:

also the haue is not able to receyue great Hulkes, and Carrikes that come to a Mart: but some Marchauntes to please the Cardinall, brought theyr clothes to Calice, and so caused their friendes of Andwarpe to come to Calice, and to say, that they had bought the Marchauntes clothes, and there at Calice payed the custome, and so caryed them to the towne of Andwarpe at the Englishe mennes charge, and there solde them to the great losse of the Englishe men.

The Mart to be kept at Calice.

While the Cardinall lay in Calice, the Frenchmen dayly resorted to Calice, to welcome the Cardinall, and sodainly there vpon a noyse sprang that Calice should be deliuered, to the French King, which vaine sayng, made many men muse.

But the .xxij. day of July, the Cardinall departed out of Calice, and with him was the Lorde Cutberd Tunstall bishop of London, the Lord Sandes, Chamberlain to the king, the Erie of Darbie, sir Henry Guildford, sir Thomas Moore, with many knightes and squires, to the number of .xij. hundred horse & in the cariages .lxxx. Wagons, and .lx. Hopes and sumpter hordie, and at Sandifield met with him the Countie Brian gouernoz of Picardie, and Hounfire de Bees, Capitaine of Bulleyn, with foure hundred men of armes, well apparayled, with Banners displayed, & all well horsed, which with trumpets and melodie receyued the Cardinall, and at Marguison there met him the Cardinall of Lozayn, and sixe Bishoppes, and .xl. Gentlemen, well furnished, and in their companie foure hundred horse, and so they roade forth to Bulleyn, where the Burges them receyued.

The receiuing of the Cardinall to Bulleyn.

And at the gate was made a Pageant, in the which was a Ronne called holy Church, and three Spanyards, and three Almanes had her violated, and a Cardinall her rescued, and set her vp of newe againe.

Another Pageant, was a Cardinall geuyng a Pace to the king of England & the French king, in token of peace, in another Pageant was the Pope, lying vnder, and the Emperour sitting in his Maestie, and a Cardinall pulled downe the Emperour, and set vp the Pope.

When wise men saw this Pageant, they smiled and sayd, well can the French king flatter, for hard it were for one Cardinall to subdue him that hath pulled downe the Master of all Cardinales.

Many words were spoken in reprove of thys Pageant, but still with great triumph roade these two Cardinales together, to the Abbey vnder a Canapie borne ouer them, and there lodged.

The morow being the thre and twentie day he with all his traine removed toward Nuttrell, and two mile without the towne there met with him the Baylifes, and there to him was made a salempne Oracion, and when he came to the towne he was receyued with the Clergy, and there the Englishe men had strait lodging the number was so great, and so the morow he remooued towarde Abbeuile where he was of the Bayliffe and aduocates of the towne, and then of the garison of men of warre of the towne, receyued with procession, and Pageants to his praise vnder a Canapie, and so brought to the Church, and after to his lodging, and all the Canapies were set with T C for Thomas Cardinall, and so were all his seruantes coates.

The thyrde day of August in the Citie of Amias, came the French king
I i i i j. in

in a coate of blacke Veluet upon white Satin, and tyed with laces aglaced with golde, and with him the king of Auer, and the Cardinall of Burbon, the great Maister, the Duke of Vandosme, Monsier de Guise, and Monsieur Waudemount his brother, and the French kinges mother, with manye Lordes and Ladies, which were there solemnly receyued.

And on Sunday the fourth day of August, the Cardinal came fro Bickqueny towarde Amias, in which towne he lay the night before, and in the way he was receyued with the prouost of the Citie, and many honorable personages of the Citie, and after them came the Iustices and Aduocates and with an eloquent Oration saluted him, and when he was within halfe a mile of the towne, the French king himselfe with all his nobles mette with him, and louingly embrased him, and welcommed him, and after tooke all the nobles of Englande by the hande, and so brought the sayde Cardinali to Amias: where for him were deuised many Pageauntes, to his prayse, and euer he was called Cardinalis Pacificus, the peateable Cardinal, and so was wrytten at the gate of his lodging.

The French king brought the Cardinal to his lodging, and he would haue brought the king to his Courte againe, but he woulde in no wise suffer him, but left him in his lodging, and the same night the Cardinal road to visite the French kinges mother, and there he had long communication and so departed to his lodging.

The fift day of August, the Cardinal with the great estates of Fraunce was conueyed to the French kinges Courte, where he was of the French king most honorably receyued, which Courte was then kept at Amias, and there remayned moze then three weekes dayly conferring with the French kinges counsaile, and at the last with great solemnitie a Charter of peace was sealed by the French king, and deliuered to the Cardinal.

Now will I returne to sir Fraunces Boynes, and Clarenceaur which were at this time arriued in Spaine, in the towne of Vale Polife, the third day of July, where they found Doctor Lee the kinges Almoner, there Ambassadoz for the king of England, and with him taried til the sixt day of July, and then sir Fraunces Boynes was brought to his presence, & deliuered the kynge his Maisters letter, and beside that prayed his Maistie to consider what the king of England had done for him since his tender age, how that he holpe him at all times with money & treasure, & how that at such time as the Lords of Spaine would not receyue him as their king during his mothers life, yet by the kings meane & his great labor and cost, he was to that realme receyued: And also how the king of Englaride had alwayes defended and protected the countries of Flaunders, Brabant and Zeland, against all persons, and in the quarell of the Emperour he had strongly invaded the realme of Fraunce, so that by his inuasion at home, the Emperour had obtained great victorie in forreine places, which he coulde not haue done, if all the who'e realme of Fraunce had bene without any enemies at home: wherefore the king desired him as reason would, the one halfe of the battayle of Hauie and also for his part he required the Duke of Orleans to be deliuered to him, and also to pay to the king fortie thousand pounce, which he ought to him as money lent, towarde his charges: and farther that he shoulde deliuer the Pope, and make him a reasonable amendes, and no farther to make warre on him or his dominions. The Emperour after this demaunde answered, sir we assure you that the loue of our Uncle of England, toward vs and the manifold benefits that we haue receyued of hym and by his meanes we shall neuer forget, and although our power be not able to recompence the same, yet our good wyll shall neuer fayle, to endeuour vs to doe hym pleasure: and as concernyng his letters we with our counsaile shall take aduice, and we trust you shall haue a reasonable answer, during which time, you may repose you, and all thinges necessarie shall be at your commaundement: with this answer sir Fraunces departed at this time. When it was knowne in Spayne, that the king of Englande, was alied with the French king, the Spaniards spake largely and sayde that they cared not for the king of Englande, and sayde farther that all this was the drift of the Cardinal by reason whereof the Englishe Marchauntes were euill entreated in Spayne, but the Emperour perceyuing this, gaue a generall commaundement, that all Englishmen shoulde be ordered and reputed as his louing friends.

In this very Moneth tydings was brought to the Emperour, how the inhabitants of Turnay conspired to destroy Monsieur Delanoies their Capitaine, and deuised to bid him to a banquet, and so to slay him and all that loued the Emperour, but as God would, he had knowlege of this treason, and tooke the chiefe Capitaynes, and did on them sharpe execution, for feare whereof many fled into Fraunce.

The Emperour within a day or twayne called to him Doctor Lee, and Sir Fraunces Boynes the king of Englands Ambassadors, and sayde, my Lords, we haue perceyued the king your maisters requests, which be great and of a waightie importaunce, wherefore we entend with all speede to wryte to the king our Uncle, and when we haue receyued answer from him, we shall deliuer you of such things as you demaunde, praying you in the meane season to take pacience, and so for the time they departed.

By thys time was it knowne that the Cardinal of England was with the French king, and full well knew the Emperour that the Cardinal would doe all for to ayde the French king, and to damage him, yet had he a great pencion of the Emperour.

The Englishe Marchauntes fearing the sequele of this matter, conueyed away their goodes daylie out of the Emperours dominions: but still the Englishe Ambassadors came to the Emperours Court, and one day the Emperour sayde to them, my Lordes, I maruaile how the king mine Uncle is moued against mee and my subiectes, I assure you I will not warre with him, I trust in his faithfull promise, and his accustomed goodnesse, and his people I take as my friendes. If he loue the French king I may not so doe, for he to me is but true and keepeth no iust promise, and we neuer compelled him to make any offer, but his offer was of his owne motion, and he also swozne to maintaine the same, which he now refuseth, and to our great prejudice hath perswaded against vs our dere vncle of England by peruers imaginations, which I trust will neuer be our enemy. Thys many times the Emperour would common with the Englishe Ambassadors, which lay in Spaine.

But now must I returne to the Cardinal of Englande which laye at Amias,

I i i i j.

Amias,

A great con- sail holden at Ambras in Fraunce, at the which the Cardinall was present.

Ambras, there was a great counsayling from day to daye: First howe the Pope should be deliuered, and the sea of Rome brought to a quietnesse: secondarily how to bring the Emperour to some reasonable agreement, so that the French kings children might be delivered. It was well considered that the Emperour had a great foredell by reason of the sayde two hostages, which fordele might perchaunce so stomack him, that he would agree to no newe conditions nor agreements. Then it was answered on the other side that if a great armie were sent into Italy which might driue the Emperours power out of Italy, then that armie should set the Pope at libertie, and also driue the Emperour to come to their purpose, or else he should leese both the realmes of Naples and Sicile, and the Duchie of Millayne and other dominions, wherefore the French king determined to send an armie royall into Italy vnder the conduyt of Mounsieur Doyt de Labotrick Erle of Foyg, which was appointed afore in June to go to the borders of Italy with a small number, but now to him was assigned eyght thousand Britons with notable Capitaines of the same countrie, and eight thousand Normans with like Capitaines, and eyght thousand Gascoynes, and sixe thousand Burgoyngs, thre thousand Sauoyngs, eyght thousand Swythers and Almaines, and sixe thousand Pyrcardes of which men were five thousand horsemen vnder the conduit of Mounsieur Galvos, and in this armie went Syr Robert Ferynyngham and John Carew of Bakam, and lxxx. other Englishe gentlemen, which were sent thether by the Cardinall from Ambras. When thys armie was assembled, the Cardinall deliuered the king of Englands money that he had brought out of Englande in barrells as you haue heard, with which money was this armie payde two Monethes before hande, and the remnant was deliuered to Sir Robert Ferynyngham, which was called Treasorer of the warres. In this armie were thre thousand cariage men, and aduenturers foure thousande, so that when they were ouer the Mountaynes, they were, lxx. thousand men, and some wyrters say a hundred thousand. This armie was called in Latin Excercitus Anglix & Gallorum Regum, pro Pontifico Romano liberando congregatus, that is to say, the army of the kings of Englande and Fraunce, gathered for the deliuerance of the Byshop of Rome, and so was thys armie reputed. Although fewe people knewe at the beginning in Englande of the conueying of the money ouer the sea, yet when the English coyne was the common payment of the army it was then openly knowen: then many men sayde alas, so much money spent out of the realme, and of thys charge the realme shall not be one peny the better, the king hath had of vs a loane and that is not payde, and the great subledie was graunted to make the king riche, and now is that money to help our olde enemies and the Pope, which neuer shall doe vs good, this the people spake and much worse. Whyle the Cardinall was with the French king, the Pope sent to him a Bull, and made hym Vicar generall vnder him thzough all the king of Englandes dominions, and there by a Bull he created Anthony de Prafo Bishop of Sens and Chaunceloz to the French king a Cardinall with great solempnitie. The Cardinall for hys solace roade wyth the French kyng to Compeigne and Mountdedier, and was euer highly feasted of the king and his mother, and of the Chauncelloz of Fraunce, and of all the nobilitie. Then was it concluded by the Cardinall and the French kings counsayle what articles English money deliuered.

articles of offer should be sent to the Emperour, which if he refused, then open defiance to be made to him in the name of both the kings. The Cardinall toke his leaue of the French king & his mother (which tolde him that a noble Ambassade should be shortly sent again into England from the realme of Fraunce for fortesifying of all the conclusions) and so the sayde Cardynall with great rewardes returned with all hys traine, and by iourneys the last day of September he came to Rychemond to the king of Englande, and there asserted the king of all hys doyngs, but so could no Lord that then was in commission with him, for they knewe nothing of all his doyngs, which sore grieved their stomackes. The Cardinall which much reioysed in this peace, came the first day of the Terme into the starre chamber, and there by his commaundement were present the Lordes spirituall and tempozall of the kings counsayle, and the Maior and Aldermen of the Citie of London, and the Iudges of the lawe, and all the Justices of peace of all Shyres then beyng at Westminster. And then he sayde, howe muche is the realme of Englande bounde to God for the high peace that now is concluded? A high peace, yea suche a peace as was neuer concluded betweene no realme, for by my labor and industrie I haue hnt the realmes of Englande and Fraunce in such a perfite knot that it shall neuer sayle, for the thre estates of Fraunce (which here we call a Parliamēt) haue affirmed the same, & therfore now my lordes be merry, for I king shall neuer charge you with warres in Fraunce, nor the Maior & other Marchaunts shall neuer be charged farther with expences, so that with exactions for warres of Fraunce you shall no more be charged, for the king shall haue no nede, because that he by this league shall be the richest prince of the world for I assure you he shall haue more treasure out of Fraunce perely, then all his reuenues and customes amount to, yea and counte his wards, forfeits and all such casualties. Now syth you haue such an honorable peace and such a profitable peace, howe much be you bounde to him which hath brought this peace about, for this peace is in secula seculorum. And because this peace is so noble, it is sealed with a seale of Gold, and so he caused all there present to looke on the seale, which was the very great seale of Fraunce printed in fine Golde: at thys tale many a man after laughed to thinke howe the Cardynall lped, for they knewe that that he sayde was for hys awne glozpe, and nothing should folow as he sayde. The French king according to his appointment sent the Lorde Annas of Homozancie great maister of his house, and after that high Constable of Fraunce, and the Bishop of Bayon, the chiefe President of Roan, and Mounsieur de Hunpers, as his Ambassadors to the king of England accompanied with lx. gentlemen well appointed, which the .xiiij. day of October landed at Dover, whose seruautes demeaned themselves so in passyng thzough Kent, that muche businesse was to lodge them in London, but the Cardinall commaunded corporations of the Citie to prouide lodgyng for them, which was neuer scene before, where at the people murmured sore, sayng that the Cardinall was all French. Soon the twentieth day of October the sayde Ambassadors were met on Black heth by the Marques of Exeter, the Byshop of London, the Wycount Rochforde, and Lorde Mountioy with many men of honoz and gentlemen, to the number of five hundred horses and more. The Maior and Aldermen of the Citie of London, and the chiefe commoners on horseback in their Gobones met the sayde Ambassadors at saint Georges barre, and there was made to them a solempne oration, and so from thence they were conueyed through London to the Byshop of Londons palace, and there and nere there about they were all lodged.

Present given by the Citie to the French Ambassadors.

The Citezens of London presented them with fure fat Oxen. xx. scape, twelue Swannes, twelue Cranes. xij. fefantz, foure dosyn of Partriches, twentie loaves of Suger, Comfettes, and other spice, and Ware, and eyght Hoggeheades of Wyne with many other things, which I cannot rehearse.

On Tuesday being the. xxij. daye of September, the sayde Ambassadors were conueyed by water to Grenewiche, where befoze the king sitting under his clothe of estate the foresayde Mounfire Bayon president of Roan made an eloquent proposition in the which he much thanked the king for sending so high an Ambassadoz as the Cardinall was, a man of such prudence and wpt as it appered by the knitting of the league, that like to him could none be found, for by his onely mediation the two princes were accorded so surely as neuer were princes befoze that time, so that by this confederation the Pope and his Cardinals which were in captinitie and thraldome should by the power of these two princes be deliuered, and all the Emperours power should be cleane banished and driven out of Italy, and the Pope should be restored to his olde estate and dignitie agayne.

When this oration was done and an answer made to the same, the king welcommed all the gentlemen of France, and then they had Wyne and spice brought to them, whereof they take part and dranke, and so departed to their Barge. Daily these Ambassadors repaired to the Cardina's place and there were highly enterterned, and the morow after saint Simons daye and Jude, the Byshop of Bayon and a great number of the Frenche gentlemen dined at the Maiors feast, & so they taried in London til Thylonday, on which day the king accompanied with the Ambassadors of France and all his nobility rode to the Cathedrall Church of saint Paule, where the Cardinall sang Masse, & after Masse done the people were desired to pray, that by their prayers Pope Clement might the sooner be deliuered out of captinitie: and when that was done the king of Englande befoze the aulter sware to kepe and perfozme the league. The common people sayde what neede all thys swearing, the French king was once sworne and all his nobilitie, yea and all his good townes, but yet they brake with vs, and so will they agayne when they see an auantage.

The Ambassadors departed.

The next day the great maister and all his company tooke their leaue of the king (except the Byshop of Bayon which abode as Ambassadour in Englande) and were highly rewarded, and so passed to Tower and tooke ship there and landed at Bulleyn.

After that the Frenchmen were departed the commons spake sore agaynst the Cardinall and sayde that the Frenchmen did neuer good to England, and for the Cardina's pleasure re should forsake our olde friends and receiue our olde enemies. When the Cardinall heard of these sayings he was not content, wherfoze he sent a commission to the Maior of London to commaunde all men not to talke of the kinges affayres and busynesse, or of the Quene, or of the kings counsaile. And if any person spake or talked of any of these matters, then he to be taken and brought to the Cardinall. When this commaundement was once knowne, euerye man mistrusted other and no man durst breake his minde to other.

The Army that was in Italy at the charges of the king of England.

Now let vs speake of the army that the Lord Lawtrick had into Italy at the charges of the king of Englande and the French king for the deliuerance of Pope Clement. The Lorde Lawtrick after that his whole army was come to him to Lions, and that all things necessarie were in readinesse then he set forward with great dillygence: but or he had passed the Mountayns, the Venicianis army was come into Lombardy abiding the coming of the Frenchmen, and in the meane season, they marched toward the Emperours army which lay at the Citie of Myllayne. Wherof hearing Anthonie de Leua with eyght hundred Almaynes and Spaniardes on foote, and as many Italians marched forward to meete wyth them, and by force caused them to take the towne of Meligna for refuge, where he hearing that John de Medices with a great number were coming toward the Venitians, he in the euening or his enemies were aware sodainly set on the sayde John de Medices, which beganne to set his men in an order, but he was so enclosed that he could do nothing, but tooke his horse and fled, and left his companie alone, which were slaine almost all, and lost foure great peeces of ordinaunce, which Anthonie de Leua carreyed with him to Millaine. In which season the Lord Lawtrick with his armie was passed the mountaines and was come to the Citie of Astor abiding the Swichers, where he heard tell how that Lewys Erl of Lodron with a great crew of Almaynes was come to the towne of Boske nie Alexandrie, with money and bittayle to ayde the Almaynes that kept Alexandrie: wherfoze he sent hys hoysmen to stop them that they should not passe to Alexandrie, and after them he followed with his whole armie, and besieged them in Boske, which a certaine dayes defended, but at the last they yelded the towne, and became Souldiours to the Lorde Lawtricke. In this same season Andzew Dozy Admyrall of the French nauye, lay befoze the hauen of Gene, and kept the Genowaies from all Marchandise and bittayles, which to the Citie might repayre, and in especiall he letted certaine shippes of cozne which lay at Mont de Ferry, betwene Gene and Sauona, to come to Gene. The Genowayes which lacked cozne, and were on the land side besieged by a Citizen of their owne whiche was on the French part called Cesar Fulgofus, imagined how to bring the shippes of cozne into the Citie, and when they sawe that Andzew Dozye had but. xliij. Galyes. They prepared sixe Galleys to fight with Andzew Dozye, during which fight the shippes with cozne should enter the hauen. When the Galleyes were abroad, a sodaine tempest rose with such a violence, that Andzew Dozye was faine to take the Port of Sauona for his succour, and so the shippes of cozne came safe into the hauen of Gene, and all the Galleyes in safetie: this good was fortune to Gene at this tyme.

When the Citizens of Gene were thus bitailed, they tooke to them good courage & in warlike maner issued out agaynst Cesar Fulgofus which knewe well that they had little more then thre. C. Spaniardes that could skil of the warre, and as for the remnaunt were neyther of stomacke, nor of experience in warre, wherfoze he boldly set on them, and while they were fighting without, the Citezens within which be cuer mutable, sodainly cried France,

Fraunce, Fraunce, which clamor came to the eares of Adurnus which was imperiall, wherefoze he retired backe into the Citie to appease the rumoz, but their enemies folowed them in such haste that both entered together, and so Geane was become French. Then thether came the Lord Lawtrick, and put there a Capitaine with a retinue for the safe keepyng of the Citie. Then Adurnus Duke of Geane which was in the Castell with diuers of the Emperours friendes, and lacked bittayle, and sawe no comfote of rescue, yelded the Castell vpon condicion to depart with bagge and baggage, and so they did. In the meane season certaine Frenchmen which were left at Boske defaced the towne, and then came befoze Alexandrie, and there kept a siege vnsant that no ayde nor succour should come to the towne, till the whole armie were assembled to bessege the towne. But for all that purpose, by the Downes of Alexandrie, Albericke Barbian with fivie hundred souldiozs came into the towne, which much comforted the garrison there, which was in maner dismayed because their ayde at Boske had fayled them. The Frenchmen besseged the towne and bet it with ordinaunce, and they within manfully defended it, and made newe countermures, so that their enemies could not enter without ieopardie. But at the last the Venicians brought thier great pieces of ordinaunce which so foze bet the walles, that Baptist Lodryn the Capitaine sawe that he was not able to defend it, and so he deliuered the towne vpon this composition, that he and his should depart with bagge and haggage, and he nor his to weare no harnesse agaynst the French king, nor his confederates by the space of sixe Monethes. Then the Lord Lawtrick deliuered the towne to Fraunces Sforzia accordyng to the league, whiche Fraunces put there a conuenient garrison. Thence that army remoued to Belgasse which to them was yelded and also deliuered to the Duke of Millain, and from thence he remoued towarde the Citie of Millain, whereof heeryng Anthonie de Leua fortified the Castell of Millain, and sent Letyx Barbian to defende the Citie of Paue. When the Lord Lawtrick was within. viij. myle of Millain, he sodainly returned towarde Paue, which men iudged to be done for the displeasure that was done there to the Frenchmen when they king was taken, and so the. xix. daye of September they besseged Paue, and dayly betwene them were great skirmishes, but at the last they bet the walles so with great ordinaunce, that they made the towne assaultable. Then the Frenchmen threw into the ditches sagottes, and etapty pypes, and shortly entered the towne. The Capitaine perceiuyng the towne entered, opened the gate, and yelded himselfe prisoner. Then the Frenchmen slue and killed on euery syde, robbed and spoyled houses, and Churches, and spared no person nor place, and of crueltie ransomed one man fivie or six tymes, and the Gascopnes which were most cruell, set fyze on the fayze houses, and had bzent the whole Citie, if the Lord Lawtrick after seven dayes spoylyng had not commaunded them to ceasse. When Paue was thus taken and spoyled, the Lord Lawtrick determined with the Cardinall Innocent Legate of Bonony, which was come for the deliuerance of the Pope incontinent to passe to Rome, and to driue away all the Emperours power from thence, and to restore the Pope to libertie.

Fraunces Sforzia Duke of Millain heeryng of this determination, came to the Lord Lawtrick to Paue and required him first to rid the Duchy of Millayne of the Emperours souldiers rather then to go forwarde and leaue his enemies behinde him. The Lord Lawtrick answered that he was of the same opinion, but the commission that he had of the French king and the king of Englande, was, that with all speede he should go forward to deliuer the Bishop of Rome, which done he saythfully promised that he would retoutne and expulse all the Emperours power out of Lombardy, and in the meane season he would that the Duke and the Venicians should bessege Anthonie de Leua in the Castell of Millayne. Duke Fraunces seemed to be content with this aunswere, but yet he perceyued that the French king cared not for his restoring least he should be imperiall. So for y time the Duke dissimuled the matter, and toke possession of the Citie of Paue. When the Lord Lawtrick had lien. xviij. dayes at Paue, he dismissed the Swychers which in no wise would go with him to Rome, wherefoze he marched forward with his owne army and came to Plesance where he concluded a league with Alphons Duke of Ferrer, and Frederick Marques of Mantua, so that then he knewe well he might passe in safety: and in good order of batrail he marched toward Rome for the finishyng of his enterprize. But or he was passed out of Lombardie, the Emperour had sent letters to the Bishop of Rome, and excused himselfe that he neyther willed nor commaunded such mischiefe to be done, and straightly commaunded his Capitaynes to deliuer him. The prince of Orenge and other Capitaynes of the Emperours heeryng his commaundement, tooke agreement with the Pope and his Cardinales, and so he and. xij. Cardinales were bound to performe certaine articles to the number of. xij. and then he was deliuered out of the Castell Saint Angell the tenth day of December, and was conueyed to Oruyet, where after he had payed certaine money for the souldiozs wages, he was put at full libertie, and the Emperours people departed from him, and thence he remoued to Ancona. When tidynges was brought into Englande of his deliuerance, the Cardinall in great hast caused Te Deum to be song on Newyeres day in the Kinges Chapell, and declared openly that he was escaped, and sayd not deliuered, which made many men to muse: and on Sunday the fift day of January, the Cardinall with great triumph came to the Church of Saint Paule in London, and on him attended diuers prelates of the Clergie, and there Te Deum was song again, and after that Doctor Cappon openly declared, how that Bishop Clement had bene long kept in distress by fault of Tyrautes and Infidels, and so kept as prisoner to the behoofe of Charles the Emperour, till now of late through the prayers of good christen people, he was escaped the handes of his enemyes, for which cause hee willed all men to geue thanks to God: That night were great fiers made in the kinges Court, and in all London. Shortly after this, truth was knowen, that the Pope was deliuered by composition, and not freely escaped as the Cardinall had blowen abroade, but men sayde that he could not leaue his liyng.

Whyle the Lord Lawtreck was thus passing towarde Naples, Syr Fraunces Poynes knight, which was sent with Clarenseaux king of armes into Spaine to the Emperour, returned into Englande befoze Christmas, in the ende of December, and left Clarenseaux behinde, to bring farther answer from the Emperour of things demaunded, wherof he sayd he would take take longer aduice or he would answere. Thys s<sup>r</sup> Fraunces reported that the Emperour so much fauoured and esteemed the king of Englande, that at his only request and contemplation, he had released and discharged twelue articles, which were most grienous and disprofitable to the French king, not for the French kings sake, but at the intercession of the king of Englande: yet this notwithstanding the Cardinall so inuegled the king, that he so highly fauoured the French king, that all hys causes he toke and reputed as his awne, and did all that he might, to bring the French kings purposes about.

The Emperour before this time had written to the French king, and also aduertised thereof the French Ambassadors that lay in Spaine, that he would that the French king should sende to him a diffinitive answere, if he would withdraw his people out of Italy or not, and let the Duchie of Millaine alone, and to cease of all inuasions or not, and this answere to be taken for a defiance. Then the French Ambassadors before day shewed to the Emperour, the proffer which the French king offered to him in articles, as you haue heard before, in the conclusion taken at Amias by the French king and the Cardinall in August last passed. Which proffers when the Emperour had heard and scene, he sayde to the Ambassador, we thought surely that our Cosyn the French king and we, had bene at a full conclusion, when the league and appointment was agreed at our towne of Madzill: for when he sued for his deliuerance to vs, he and his counsaile offered vs certaine proffers, which we neuer demaunded, but we of pittie hauing compassion of his affliction, accepted the sayde offers, and agreed to his deliuerance, which articles he promised in the othe of a king, and also on the holy Euangelistes, to performe to the vitermost, and them inuoliatly to obserue and keepe. Whereupon we clerely remitted, and deliuered him into his countrey, of all which promises he hath performed none, wherefore we take him as perjured, and not worthy to be trusted, and now he offereth new offers, which he can not performe, as for the money we beleue he is able to pay, but as for the money due for the kingdome of Naples, we knowe no such duetie, for it is our inheritaunce, although king Charles the seventh, by subtiltie once vsurped the same, which he long not enioyed: as to release hys title to Millayne, that release is boyde, for the Duchie is imperiall, and in our gift as many other seignories bee: and as touchyng Courmay, ours it is of right and now in our possession: So that in all these things he would release and render things that he had not: and as to the withdrawing of his armie out of Italy, he shall not nede, for we trust that our armie shall expell them all Italy, maugre their hartes. And as touchyng the king of Auer, the Duke of Gelder, and Robert de la Marche, we of pittie let them alone till we see our time, and then they shall knowe our puyssaunce: And as touchyng his offer to ayde vs with a nauie, we trust we haue suche a nauie provided, that we shall nede none of his: and where he sayth he will marry our sister Queene Alienor, daughter of Dorztyngall, if he had bene true, that he might haue done or this, but now we entend not to geue her to our enemy: and as touchyng her daughter to be married to the Dolphyn, that we leaue in suspence for thys time: But where he sayth that he will defend vs, that toucheth our honour, for well knoweth he that our awne might and puyssaunce, hath euer defended vs, & him and his power hath defaced and ban-quished, wherefore we neede not of his defence, which is not able to defend hymselfe: and as touchyng the king of Englandes debt, we shall reasonably answere his Ambassadors, for that toucheth not the French king: But nowe my Lordes Ambassadors sayde the Emperour, let the French king your Mayster fulfill the promise that he was swozne to, as a true Prince ought to doe, and then he shall haue his children delyuered, or else according to his othe, let him yelde himselfe prisoner agayne, and so shall his honoz and truth be saued or else not, so with this answere the Ambassadors departed. Neuerthelesse they dayly sued to the Emperour and his counsaile to take the offers which were profered by the French king, and amongs other things the warre was sore layde to the French Ambassadors charge, for that that the French king made warre on the Emperours possessions, without cause and without defiance, to which accusation they answered that that armie was procured by the Cardinall of Englande, when he was at Amias, for the deliuey of Clement Bishop of Rome, and that the king of Englande bare the most charge.

When the Emperour heard this answere, he sent for the Ambassador of Englande, and to him saide: My Lorde Ambassador, I much maruaile why the king your master hath so great loue to the French king, his newe reconciled friend, and withdrawn his loue from me, that am his Cosyn and alie: How fortuneth this that your olde auerant enemies be now in fauour and your olde friendes cast out of fauour. I see well there is indignation had at our estate, and waies sought to grieue vs, which we hope to withstand: But who would haue thought that our Uncle of England, would haue made warre on vs? How would he haue vs graunt his requestes and desires for the French king, seyng he be with himselfe our open enemy? Then the Ambassador discreetly answered, that he neyther heard nor knewe of such doyngs, on his fayth and honoz. Well sayde the Emperour, it is true that is reported, mine Uncle is not the Prince that I haue taken him for, and if he be mine enemy, I must withstande him, and in a great furie, the Emperour withdrew him from the Ambassador to his priuie chamber.

Daylie the Ambassadors both of Englande and of France, sollicitid the Emperour and his counsaile, to accept the French kings offers, which made euer answere, that they would not trust to the newe promise, seyng that the olde promise which was swozne, was not obserued and kept.

Some whosoever indifferently shall consider the articles which were offered in the treatie of Madzill, and the articles offered now at Amias, shall openly perceyue, that the greatest thing which the French king refused to doe, was the deliuey of the Duchie of Burgoyne and the Countie Charoloy, for declaration whereof, the French king sent for all the nobles of both the countreys, and declared to them thys promise and concord taken with the Emperour, which answered that no realme or dominion could be transferred to any forreyn prince or person without the sentence, agreement, and submission of the nobles, and commons of the same countrey, and therefore they would neuer assent to that alteration: This answere was deliuered to Lorde Charles de la Noe Viceroy of Naples, then Ambassador for the Emperour in France, which thereof certefied the Emperours counsaile. But the Emperour and his counsaile thought this to be but a decepte, in so much as the french king had onely called suche of Burgoyne as him pleased, and not the substantiall of the countrey. And farther the Emperour so much desired the Duchie of Burgoyne, because he was the very heire there of bloud descended from Duke Philip, sonne to king John of Fraunce, that by no meanes he would haue that article broken, but that he would haue that Duchie. The french king perceyued his minde and offred to him great sommes of money for the redeeming of that article, the king of England also offred to be suretie for the payment: but all this could not moue the Emperour but he would haue Burgoyne, and all the sayde treatie and agreement performed.

The king of England considering how much he had done for the Emperour, and calling to his remembraunce, both that the Lordes and commons of Spayne, would not haue taken him as king (his mother liuing (although she were Lunatique) because she was heire, without his great labour and intercession, & also that he holpe him to be elected Emperour, which the french king had obtayned, if he had not put therunto his ayde, and sent Doctor Richard Pace his Secretorie to the Electors of Franckeforde, and most of all that he at all times, had succored the sayde Emperour with mony and was not payed, wherefore he was not a litle displeasid with the Emperours wylfulness, but moze with his unkindnesse, and perceyued clerely, that sith by his meanes he was so exalted, that now he had forgotten all the kindnesse to him shewed, wherefore he thought to make him to knowe himselfe by warres, the soner to bring him to accomplish his request, and to make him to remember his olde kindnesse, and so by the aduice of the Cardinall of York (which loued not the Emperour, for the Bishop of Romes case) and other of his counsaile, he sent woord to Clarenseaux king at armes, to make defiaunce to the Emperour, and so Guyan Herault for the french king and the sayde Clarenseaux for the king of Englande, the .xiiiij. day of January, in the City of Burgues in Castile, came before the Emperour beyng nobly accompanied with Dukes, Marqueses, Erles, and Barons, in his great hall, and there made their defiaunces.

When the defiaunces were made by both the kings of Armes, as you haue heard, al the nobles which were present, as y Constable of Castile, y Duke of Maledonia the Duke of Inuancaso, the Duke of Alberkirke, y Duke of Ciuill, the Duke of Passaw, or Hazareth, the Duke of Aluoy, the Marques of Sturgus the Marques of Agular, the Marques of Uillafranca, y Erle Barcelon, the Erle of Salamatero, y Erle Boniuent, the Erle Browen, the Erle Agular, the Erle Salienas, the Erle Geneuer, with six great Lordes Comendatozies Crossed, & many other noble men & Gentlemen, for a truth to the number of seven hundred at the least: all these drew out their swords and sware that the defiaunces, then made should be reuenged, and sayd to the Emperour: Sir if the despyte of this defiaunce be unreuenged, the infamy and rebuke thereof shall remayne to vs and our heires for ever, wherefore our landes, liues and lordshippes, shall be at your commaundement, and while any lyne of your succession remayne, this igneminie shall be ever new and not die, till you haue obtained y double honoz, against all your enemies.

When the Emperour was thus defied, the warre was proclaymed in Ciuill, in Ualedolite, in Burgus, and other places through all Spaine: But when

when the common people heard of this defiaunce, they wzong themselves by the Berdes and sware, that all their landes and goodes, should be spent for the honoz of the Emperour, and to be reuenged on the french king, whom they called the periured Prince, and so the common people cryed in the stretes, now is come the time, that Spayne shall be renoumed, and reuenged on the frenchmen for their faisenesse, and wzong doynges. But alas sayde they, why should we make warre with the Engliche nation, which euer loued vs and neuer offended vs: but this defiaunce procedeth not of them, but onely of the french king, and of the Cardynall of Englande, which is wozyne french: thus the Spaniards talked, and euer excused the king of England and accused the Cardinall, and sayd that he had a great penzion out of Spaine and that notwithstanding, because he might not haue the Bishoprike of Toledo, he caused all this warre. This proclamation of warre was proclaymed with banners displayed, in the which were paynted a red sworde, & a Cresset burning, against the french king and his partakers, not mening the king of England, by expresse name, but it was reherfed in the proclaymation, that the king of England had manaced, and defied the Emperour, in the french kings quarrell. Then were the English Marchauntes in Spayne attacked and their goodes put in safe custody, and to them was sayd that they were stayed onely, till the Emperour was aduertised how his subiectes were ordered in England.

Cydings of this was first knowne in Fraunce, and from thence letters were sent to the french Ambassadors in London, how both the Ambassadors of Fraunce and of England, beyng in Spaine, and Guyen and Clarenseaux officer at Armes, were retayned by the Emperour as prisoners, which report was false, for they were at libertie, and well cherished, and in especiall all the English Ambassadors and Clarenseaux, were friendly entertayned in all places. When the Cardinall heard this report he was too light of credence (which he repented afterward) and was soze therewith moued, and in his fury the .xiiij. day of February, he caused Don Hugo de Mendosa, the Emperours Ambassador, to be taken out of his house, in Saint Swithines lane in London, and to be brought to sir John Daunces place in Marke lane, as a prisoner, and his house with his goodes were kept by the Cardinalls seruantes, till the kinges pleasure were farther knowne.

The morow after being the .xiiij. day of February, the Cardinall being in the Starre chamber, called before him all Iustices of y peace, and other honest personages to a great number, and to them sayde: My Lordes and all you the kynges louing subiectes, his graces pleasure is that I should declare to you, how that his highnesse, not of his owne seeking, but rather against hys will and intent, is entered into warre. For the elect Emperour Charles the fift, hath him so handled & moued, that he must of necessity with him make warre. First it is not unknovne to you all, how good the king hath bene to him, sith his infancy, how he hath defended his low countries during his noneage: Pea, what payne the king toke by his Ambassadors, to sollicite the Lordes of Spaine, which refused to take him as their king, while his mother liued, and by the kinges onely labor, he came to the kingdom of Spaine, what it cost the king to helpe him to be Emperour, we that be his counsayloz can tell, for if the king had not bene, surely the french king had bene Emperoz. Beside all these kindneses, he hath lent to the sayd Emperoz, diuers great sommes of money, to defend his countreyes, and what profite his countreyes haue by the resort of Englishemen thither, you that be Marchants can tell, for these things with many mo profites, comodities, & gratuities, the king of him is so litle regarded, that I am halfe ashamed to report it. True it is that Frannces the French king, was to him prisoner (which chaunce hath happened to many high Princes) the kyng our maister, highly regarding the peace of christen Princes, by which peace God might the more be glorified: desyred the Emperoz to take some reasonable ende for his deliuerance, and for that purpose hath sent to him sundry Ambassadors, which gaue them eares, but daled with them, and nothing would doe at all, and regarded no more his requestes, then I would the desire of my seruant (and peradventure not so much) so that for all gratuities and friendships to him, by the king our soueraigne Lord, at all times shewed, he sheweth himsele ingrate and vngentle, and for kindnesse rendzeth vnkindnesse, as for the french king I assure you, he hath humbled himsele as much as a prince may, his honoz saued. He hath offered him so great offers, that except he should geue hym hys realme and crowne, he can offer no more larger, which offers I assure you, soze ministe the betwix of his crowne, which I shall briefely declare vnto you. For he offereth to paye five hundred thousande poundes sterling, whereof three hundred thousande, to be payed in hande, for the remnaunt sufficient Bankers to be bounde, and farther to discharge the Emperoz, of all such sommes of money, as he oweth to the king of England, and to deliuer him a sufficient acquittance for the same. Also where the french king should haue out of the kingdome of Naples an hundred thousande Crownes yerly, the french king will release the same pencion, with all the arerages which are no small some. Also he will re'esse his whole title and right which he hath to the Duchie of Millayne, his very inheritance, and neuer he to challenge or clayme the same nor his posteritie. Also where the Countie of Flaunders maye lawfully appeale to the parliamentes of Fraunce, from iudgements geuen by the Emperoz or his Iustices, he is content to release the same superiority and resorte, which is a great minishment to the prerogatiue royall of the realme of Fraunce, for which of you (sayd the Cardinall) would consent that the king should release his superiority or superiority of Wales, Irelande or Cornewall, I dare saye you would rather spende your liues and goods.

Farther, where the french king bought of the king the Citie of Courmay, for sixe hundred thousand Crownes, and odde, yet he is content to relde and release the same Citie to the Emperour for euer, yea, and besyde this, he offereth to take to wife, Elianoz Queene Dowager of Portugale, without any dowet, yea, in her kirtell, and to indue her with ten thousand Markes sterlyng by the yere, and farther that the childe if it be a Male, which shall be gotten of them two, shall be Duke of Burgoyne, and be partaker of all the honours of Fraunce, which is a great thing: Also that the Dolphyn his sonne and heire, shall marry the daughter of the sayde Ladie Elianoz, without any treasure to be receyued for the same, which proffer is worth two hundred thousand Markes sterlyng.

him to Rome, and also defend him agaynst all men, yea, what will he do more, although the king of Nauarre haue maryed his abone sister, whose Kingdome the Emperour kepeth by force, yet he offereth neyther to ayde nor comfort him agaynst the Emperoz, but in his quarrell to be agaynst him: Also he offereth to forsake his olde and approued friendes, Sir Robert de la Marche, and the Duke of Gelders, which saythfully hath serued the realme of Fraunce, and all for the Emperozs sake. But the Emperour sayde he, is so indurate, so vnkynde, and wilfull, that he neyther regardes these reasonable requestes, nor yet the kinges prayers nor requestes, but answered and sayd: that if the french king can do all this, he shall haue his children. So that the Emperoz will trust no man, but euery man must trust him: Yet the french king offereth farther, to withdraw the puyssaunt army of the Lorde Labotrick in Italy, and yet the same passeth prosperously forward, and is like to do the Emperour more disaduantage, then I will notue reherse: but the Emperour is so proude, and his people so cruell, that he nothing regardeth these offers: for what a crueltie was this, to pull downe Goddes Altar of Rome, and persecute the holy fathers by extreme tyzanny, violated the holy Sacrament, and threwe the hostes downe on the Altare, and like robbers tooke the Dixe: and farther in the Church, they violated Virgins, and supped Matrones, and dispoyled the holy Reliques of the Citie of Rome. And like as the king in huntynge tyme hath slayne three hundred Deere, and the garbage and paunches be cast round about, in euery quarter of the Parke, so (sayd the Cardinall) euery streete lay full of the priuie members and genitures of the Cardinales and holy Prelates: the whole histoie were to abominable to tel. Yet notwithstanding all these offers mocioned, and nothing regardyng this detestable tyzanny, the which euery good Christen man abhorreth, he will encline to no reason, I am sure that I coude shewe you. xx. articles of promise, which he hath broken with the king: so that I assure you he kepeth no promise with our soueraine Lorde, also contra ius Gencium, which I am sure the great Turke would not doe, he kepeth prisoner the kinges Ambassadors Doctor Lee, the french Ambassador, & the Ambassador of Venice: and forasmuch as the Emperoz refuseth these offers, which amount to eyght kinges ransomes, I trust by this warre, we shall bridle him, and bring him to peace, and this occasion of warre, I would all you shoulde declare in your Countrey.

When the Cardinall had sayde, some knocked other on the elbowe, and sayd softly he lieth, other sayde, that euill will sayde neuer well, other sayde that the french Crownes made him speake euill of the Emperour, but they that knewe al that you haue heard before said, that it was shame for him to lie in such an audience. The comon people much lamented, & warre should arise betwene the king & the Emperoz, and especiall theyr consideration was, because the Emperozs dominions, had holpen them with corne, & relieved them with grayne, when they could haue no corne, or little out of Fraunce. And in this rumoz were diuers ships come out of Flaunders, and that parties, laden with Hering, Sturgion, & al other bitaile necessary: beside eight sayre ships, which were laden with corne, all the sayde ships, & all the ships of Spaine, were stayed and arrested, and theyr sayles taken from them, and put in safe custodie. This doying was much talked of by Marchauntes, which frequented the Emperours Dominions, for they knewe and openly sayd, that the let of the entercourse of Marchauntes, shoulde turne to the great losse of the Princes, but yet the Englishe men were content to obey theyr King and his Counsaile.

The declaration of warre in England against the Emperour, and the restraint of shippes of the Emperours subiects, were shortly knowne to the Lady Margaret Duchesse of Sauoy, and aunte to the Emperour, which was gouernoz of Flaunders, Brabant, and Zeland, and of all the lowe Countries: wherefore she by the aduice of the Emperours Counsaile to her associate, caused all the Englishe men, and their goodes and shippes to be restrayned, and they and theyr goodes were put in safe keepyng. Thus the poore Marchauntes suffered great losse, for the doynges of their Princes, as Horace sayth: Quicquid delirant Reges, plectuntur achiui. whatsoeuer kings do, the Commons be punished. Now after this sodaine storme, which the Cardinall had moued openly agaynst the Emperour for euill entreatyng of the kinges Ambassadour, he had perfect knowlege that the Emperour, both did the kinges Ambassadoz great honour, and also that he neuer restrayned him from his libertie, whereupon he caused the Emperours Ambassadoz, which befoze was restrayned of his libertie, to be sent to his abone lodgyng agayne, and sayd that by the report made by the French Ambassadoz, he him restrayned, and now sithe he knewe the truth, he mocioned the king for his deliuerance.

The Emperours Ambassadoz, called Don Hugo de Mendosa, dissimuled the matter by apparant signes: and the Cardinall the moze to auoyde suspicion on his behalfe, towarde all the worlde, sayde: the king was informed by the French Ambassadours, that the Ambassadours of both Princes were put in prison, and further he sayde, that Clarenseaux had made the defiance to the Emperour without the kinges commaundement, but onely did it by the mocion of the French Ambassadoz, to accompanie the French Herald, and for this presumptuous act, he should suffer death at Calice at hys returne: all these excuses the Cardinall shewed to the Emperours Ambassadoz, which certefied the Emperour of euery poynt, and sent the letter by poste into Spaine, which letters were opened & copied, by the Capitaine of Bayon, as the post passed that way. And when Clarenseaux returned homeward out of Spaine, the Capitaine gently shewed to him the copie of the letters, that the Emperours Ambassadoz had wrytten. Thinke you not but Clarenseaux was dismayde, to heere his dayes so short: yet he trustyng in his truth, and grace of his Prince, passed forward and came to Bullein, where he heard worde agayne of the daunger that he was in, wherefore like a wyse man he left Calice, and tooke a ship at Bulleyn, and landed at Rye, and came secretly to Hampton Court, where the king laye, and by friendship of sir Nicholas Carew, one of the kinges priuie Chamber, he was brought to the kinges presence, or the Cardinall wist of his returne, and to him shewed the three letters, which the Cardinall had sent to him, chargyng him to make the defiance, or he did intimate the warre. He declared further, that neyther the Ambassadoz of the king, nor the French king, nor he were neuer sequestred from libertie, but gently enterteined, and to the king he shewed a chaine to the value of seuen hundred Ducates, which the Emperour had geuen him, and shewed also the Copie of the Emperours Ambassadoz letters, which he had at Bayon. When the king had heard all the circumstance of his declaration, he mused a great while, and sayde, O Lorde Jesu, he that I trusted most, tolde me all these thinges contrary, well Clarenseaux, I will bee no more of so light credence hereafter, for nowe I see perfectly, that I am made to beleue the thing that was neuer done.

Then the king sent for the Cardinall and priuily talked with him, but whatsoeuer he sayde to him the Cardinall was not very mery, and euer after that time, the king mistrusted him. When the king and his counsaile had well digested the Emperours aunswere, and his gentle demeanoz toward the kinges Ambassadoz, and also had pondered that the lowe Countries of the Emperour, were glad to please the king of Englande and his subiects: wherefore the king commaunded syr John Style knight, to discharge all the Dutchmen and their shippes, and to deliuer their sayles, and gaue them license to returne: May sayde the Dutchmen, the Spaniards and we be the Emperours subiectes, why should not they be also discharged? Sir John Style aunswered them, that his commission was onely to discharge them. The Dutchmen fearing that the frenchmen would take the seas befoze them and so to stop them departed hastily, cursing the Cardynall as aucthoz of this warre.

When the Lady Margaret hard tell, how the Dutche nation with their Shippes and goodes were released, and not the Spaniards, she sent for the Englishe Merchants, and to them sayde: Sirs, sithe the king your maister hath deliuered onely the Dutchmen, and not the Spaniards, we release your bodie free to go at your libertie, but your goods shall remaine till we knowe what shall become of the Spaniards, and when they be deliuered come for your goodes, and you shall haue them deliuered, thus the Englishe men departed, and came to the king, and declared to hym and hys counsaile how they were entreated.

This warre with the Emperour was displeasaut, both to Marchants and clothiers, for the Marchauntes durst not auenture into Spaine, sithe April last past, and now was come the .xj. daye of Marche, wherefore all brode clothes, Kerseis, and Cottons, lay on their handes. In so muche as when the clothiers of Essex, Kent, Wilshire, Suffolke, and other shires which vse cloth making, brought clothes into Blackwell hall of London, to be solde as they were wont to doe: fewe Marchauntes or none bought anye cloth at all. When the Clothiers lacked sale, then they put from them their spinners, carders, tuckers, and suche other that lyue by clothmaking, which caused the people greatly to murmure, and especially in Suffolke, for if the Duke of Norfolk had not wisely appeased them, no doubt but they had fallen to some riotous act. When the kinges counsaile was aduertised of thys inconuenience, the Cardinall sent for a great number of the Marchauntes of London, and to them sayd: Sirs the king is informed, that you vse not your selues like Marchauntes, but like Grassiers and artificers, for where the clothiers doe daylie bring clothes, to your market for your ease, to their great cost, and there be ready to sell them, you of your wilfulnesse will not buy them as you haue bene accustomed to doe: what maner of men be you sayde the Cardinall? I tell you that the king straightly commaundeth you to buy their clothes, as befoze time you haue bene accustomed to doe, vpon paine of his high displeasure.

The Marchaunts answered, my Lord you knowe well that we haue had no trade outward thys twelue Monethes past, and we haue so manye clothes in our hands, that we knowe not how to bitter them, therfore it were great losse to vs to bye any moze: wherefore we trust you will not moue vs to bye the thing which we can not bitter, for in all places our bent is stopped and forbidden. Well sayde the Cardinall, if you will not bie the clothes at Blackwell hall, they shall be brought to the whyte hall at Westminster, and so you of London shall lose the libertie, and the king shall bie them all, and sell them to Marchaunt straungers. Then answered a wise Marchaunt, my Lorde, the king may bie them as well at Blackwell hall, if it please him, and the straungers will gladlier receyue them there, then at Westminster: You shall not order that matter sayde the Cardinall, and first I will sende into London, to know what clothes you haue in your handes, and that done the king and his counsaile shall appoint who shall bye the clothes I warrant you, with this aunswere the Londoners departed.

When the clothiers hard that the Cardinall toke their part, they waxed proude, and spake euill of the Marchauntes, and when the Marchauntes came to bye clothes, the Clothiers set them hire, then they were accustomed to be solde: but at length they were faine both to abate the price, and also to seeke of the Marchaunt men, for all the Cardinals sayng.

If this warre was displeasunt to manye in Englande (as you haue heard) surely it was as much or moze displeasunt, to the townes and people of Flaunders, Brabant, Holland, and Zeland, and in especial to the townes of Andwarpe and Barroo, where the Martes were kept, and where the resort of Englishe men was, for they sayde that their Martes were vndone, if the Englishe men came not there, and if there were no Martes, their Ships, Hyses, and Wagons might rest, and all artificers, Hostes, and Brokers might sleepe, and so the people should fall into miserie and pouertie: of these things daylie complaynts were made to the Ladie Margaret, and the Emperours counsaile, which wisely pondered the complaynts, and after long consultation had, they appoynted certaine Ambassadors to go to the king of Englande, and entreat for a truce, or abstinence of warre, which Ambassadors came into Englande, and associated themselues with Don Hugo de Mendosa, Ambassadoz there for the Emperoz: the one Ambassadour was Brouost of Cassell, and the other maister John Lay soueraine of Flaunders: these three Ambassadors came to the king the xxix. day of Marche to Richemond, and after reuerence done, the Lorde Hugo de Mendosa sayde to the king, for the Emperours Maiestie so much knowlegeth himsele bound to your grace, for manifolde kinde actes and beneuolences done and shewed to him sith his tender age, that he in no wise will take the desiauce, done by your Herault as a paretptory intimation of warre, tyll he had heard farther of your pleasure, and therfore his counsaile hath sent hether these two noble persons and me, to knowe your determinate aunswere, and finall resolution in that behalfe. The king after a good auisement had, answered and sayde: Of warre I am nothing ioyfull, and of warre I am lesse fearefull, I thanke God I haue no cause to care for warre, for I haue both men and money, and all thing ready prepared for the same, (which things I know that other princes lack, for all their high wordes) and therfore to that question of warre I could sone agree, but or I make you a determinate aunswere, some part of my minde I will declare to you, and I tell you although your maister be a great Emperour and a mightie prince, I cannot nor maye not suffer him to beare downe and destroy the realme of Fraunce, which is our true inheritaunce, and for the which our brother and alie the French king, payeth vs verely a great pention and tribute, wherefore we of iustice and equitie, muste maintaine that lande, out of which we haue so faire a rent, and such a profite.

Then sayde the Brouost of Cassell, yea syz and it please you to call to your remembraunce, the olde and auncient loue and familiaritie which hath bene betwene your realme, and the houses of Burgoyne and Flaunders, and the lobbe countreys, I assure you the people of all those Countreys will liue and die with you, aboue all men next their soueraine Lorde, wherefore most noble prince neuer consent, that olde loue that hath so long continued, be now broken and seperated: we say this for no feare, for we be well furnished for warre, both of men and strong Castels, all which before thys time hath bene at your commaundement, and therfore the loue that we haue euer borne you, we continue and offer you now to continue: and where we offer you choise of warre or peace, at your pleasure, surely the Emperoz meaneth that for your honour, as though you should commaund which you would: and if you chose warre, we haue commission to entreate for peace, and you chose peace, we haue like commission to thanke you, and to offer vs and oures at your commaundement. Then sayde the Lord Hugo de Mendosa to the king, syz of verie right the Emperour and his countries ought to haue your loue and fauor, before the French king and his Nation: for the Frenchmen in the time of their affliction, made humble suites and requestes to your grace, which they neuer would do in the time of their prosperity, but the Emperour hath euer continued one man at all times, wherefore he is better to be trusted, then they which neuer were long true to you. Well said the king, sith I haue well perceyued the intent of your coming, I will be auised, and then I will make you an aduised aunswere, and in the meane season I am content that there be an abstinence of warre for a time, so the Ambassadors departed for a season, and the Brouost of Cassell, departed to the Lady Margaret with this aunswere.

After this the king which was wyse, well learned, and a farre castyng Prince, consulted with his Counsaile of this matter, and there after long debating it was considered, that the king was riche, strong, and puyssant ynough to make warre with any Prince Christen, and that no Prince coulde hurt him by warre or inuasion, therfore some thought it best to haue warre, but the king and the wyser sort considered that if he had warre with the Emperoz, that his marchauntes should leese much, and if they lost, the Clothiers and the Clothworkers, of which were a great multitude should leese and be brought to extreme pouertie. For it was considered that the Emperoz was Lorde of all Spaine, Naples, Sardinia, and so southwarde to Epusbaia, and like wyse northwarde from Granelyn, to Rye and Reuell, so that Englishe Marchauntes passyng on those costes were euer in daunger. Also no flame could come into England, but through his dominions, by reason whereof whereof cloth makynge should decay. Wherefore the king considered, if the marchantes lost, the poozer sozt should leese, and at length he should leese in his customes. Wherefore leavyng the gloze of warre, he tooke mercye on his subiectes and concluded to take a peace for a tyme, till farther communication might be had betwene his counsaill and the Emperours. And upon this poynt letters were sent into Spaine, Fraunce, and Flaunders, and so this matter continued vnderdetermined till aunsweres were brought from outwarde partes.

The suite of the French Ambassadors

In this season the bishop of Bayon which afterwarde was Bishop and Cardinall of Darps beyng Ambassadoz from the French king, and sojourning in London, heard tell howe the Emperours Ambassadors made much suite to the king and his Counsaile, wherefore he came to the Court, and desired to speake with the king, and so was brought to the kinges presence, to whome he sayde: please your highnesse to consider the great and highe peace that is concluded betwene you and your louyng brother, and perpetually alpe the French king my mayster, which is ratified and confirmed by the thre estates of the realme of Fraunce, by the which you haue yerely twentie thousand pound sterlyng, which realme you haue promised to defend against all persons. Nowe in the wyng your loue that ye beare to the French king and his subiectes, if you would make sharpe warre on the Emperours subiectes, I assure you the whole realme of Fraunce would take it so thankfully, that it should neuer be forgotten. Well sayd the king, as touchyng the league and amitie betwene my brother of Fraunce and me, it shall be inuolately kept for me, but sit to enter into warre it needeth no counsaile, but howe to ende warre with honour and profite, men must needes studie. As touchyng the defence of the realme of Fraunce, I assure you it shall be defended to my power, though it be to my losse, and my study is no lesse to haue a peace which might be moze honourable to your mayster then to mine owne selfe. With which sayng the Ambassadoz held him well contented. So that you may perceine that the great pencion and profite that the king of England had out of Fraunce with the great league and amitie concluded and sworne, was the very cause why the king of England so much held with the French king and not for mere loue. For this matter was dayly great counsailes, and one day the Emperours Ambassadoz was present, another day the French kings Ambassadoz was present, but the Cardinall was ever on the French part. So thus continued this dayly counsailes with great studie.

The kings aunswere.

In the same season, a French Crayer of xxx. Tonne, manned wyth xxxiiij. Frenchmen, lay at Margate to wayte for a praye of some Flemynge that should come out of the riuer of Thames, and by chauce a Crayer of France which was apointed to waite the fisher botes betwene Graueling, & Mend, was come by North of Goodwyn landes, to Northland head, and so came to Graueling and tooke in bread. This Crayer was of xxxiiij. tonne and had in her xxxiiij. Flemynge: When she was vntayled she made to the sea ward, and sodainly she espyed the Frenchmen which hounded vnder a saile. The Flemynge mistrusted, and incontinent put themselves in a readinesse, and came so nye that he hayled the Frenchman then y Frenchman shot a piece of ordinaunce, and with that layd the Flemynge aboarde, there was soze fighting, for the Frenchmen had Crossebowes, and the Flemynge had Handgunnes, gunnes. The Frenchman fell of and would haue bene gone, that seeyng the Flemynge whistled, and after the Frenchman made saile. Nowe the winde was so straynable East, that the Frenchman could saile no whether, but into the Thames, and so he did and the Flemynge folowed, and betoze Graueling the Flemynge boozed the Frenchman, and there they fought againe, but away agayne went the Frenchman, and the Flemynge after with all his sailes and so tarre sayled the Frenchman, that he ranne along the Tower wharfe as though he would haue ryuen his shippe, the Fleming set on and entered the shippe for any thing the Frenchman could do, and cryed I haue taken the theefe. Sir Edmond Wallingham Licutenant of the Tower was on the wharfe, and sawe them fight, called his men and entered the shippes, and tooke both the Capitaynes and theyr men. The Flemynge boldly chalenged his prise, for he sayde that open warre was betwene Fraunce and Flaunders, and sayde farther, that the Frenchman was a Pirate: The kings counsaile tooke by the matter and made an ende betwene them. Thys chauce was much talked of that two shippes should saile in chace from Margate to the Tower wharfe, because that befoze tyme suche a lyke thing had neuer bene heard.

A ship chased to the tower wharfe.

Now let vs returne to the Lorde Lawtricke, which had gotten manye towne in Italy, and had with his great armie besieged the Citie of Naples and so it happened that the Prince of Orange and other Capitaynes the .xix. day of Aprill set on a great part of the French army, and notwithstanding their hardinesse, the Emperours army obteyned the victory, so that from that tyme forth the French men lost, what by pestilence which then was great in Italy, and what by sodaine skirmishes.

The king kept the day of saint George with the companions of the order of the Garter with great solemnitie at his Manor of Richmond, where to him came tidynges of the army of the Lorde Lawtricke in Italy, which letters shewed that the Lorde Lawtricke had sent the Lord Peter de Navarre the thirde day of March last past to a great towne called Melisse with ten thousand Frenchmen, and within the towne were eyght hundred Spanyarde good men of war: The Lord Peter de Navarre besieged the towne, and after gaue to the same a great assault, but the Spanyarde so defended them with ordinaunce and resistences, that they slue siue or sixe thousande Frenchmen, and caused them to retreat. The Lorde Lawtricke heeryng this, came in person wyth a great number to the towne of Melisse, and maruailously bet the towne with ordinaunce and then gaue to it a great and fierce assault, and therewith so soze that the Spanyarde were put backe, yet they defended them, so that it was maruayle to behold, for they slue and destroyed foure. M. Frenchmen. The French army entred the towne on all sydes, and yet the Spanyarde kept the market with their ordinaunce as long as they might, but at the last beyng oppressed with multitude, they all were slaine without mercy, so cruell were the Frenchmen: In this towne was taken the Prince of Melisse, a noble man pertaynyng to the Emperour. Thus was the towne of Melisse taken and spoyled, not greatly to the French mennes profite, for they lost almost tenne thousande men whiche soze diminished theyr power.

Although that this season was an abstinence of warre taken betwene the

the king of Englande and the Ladie Margaret, so that the dutch Nation might safely come and go into Englande, and the Englishmen might safely repaire thether, yet betwene the frenche men and the Fleminges was hot warre on the frontires, and manye a prisoner taken, and manye men slayne, and likewise the one part tooke the other on the seas, and sometime the frenchmen would spoyle Englishe ships, sayng that they had Flemings goodes or Spaniardes goodes, and likewise the Flemings would enter the Englishe ships, and say they had frenchmens goodes, so the English men lost, till the king sent shippes to keepe the sea: But for a truth the Spaniardes were strong on the sea, and to the french men did much harme. The King perceyuing that there was nothing concluded betwene the Emperoz and him, thought not to be behinde hande, wherfore he ordayned that the Lord Sandes should passe to Guines with a thousand souldiours that was five hundred archers, and five hundred horsemen, and that the Duke of Suffolke should passe ouer after with a great armie to inuade Flaunders. These Lords made much preparation, and mustered their men at the Mantels beside saint Johns and was ready to depart, but the Emperours Ambassadoz and the Ambassadour of Flaunders, so much did with the king and his counsaile (and the french king also assented) that truce was taken betwene England, Flaunders, and the countreys of Pycardy on this side the water of Some for eyght Monethes, the peace to beginne the first daye of May, and to endure to the last day of February. This peace was proclaimed in London, the xix. day of June, so that now all Englishe men might lawfully passe into the lowe Countreys but not into Spaine: which sore grieued Marchauntes that haunted that parties. In the same proclamation was farther conteyned, yf a finall peace were not fully agreed betwene the sayde thre princes within the sayde eyght Moneths, that then all Marchauntes should haue two Moneths after to passe into their awne countreys with their wares and marchaundises in safetie. The Emperour sone inclined to this peace, for he sawe that by the Marte many of his friends in high Dutchland and other places toke great profite, and especially his awne lowe Countreys, wherfore he thought not to hurt his friendes, for the displeasure he bare to his enemies of Fraunce, and also to shewe himselve louing to the king of Englande he was content to take this peace.

In this season the Duke Charles of Gelders perceyuing the Emperoz was at warre with Fraunce, raised a great power of horsemen and came to a great towne of Holland called the Hage, where the lawe and iustice is kept for that countrie, by reason wherof the towne was verie riche, and sodaynely he entred the towne without resistence, and spoyled and robbed the towne, and slue diuers persons and with much riches laded their Wagons and so departed and caryed with him diuers riche prisoners. The Ladie Margaret gouernesse of the lowe countreys heering of thys raised a great power vnder the conduyte of the Lorde Fylsteinge, which Lorde with a great payssaunce entered Gelderland and tooke the towne of Hatton, the Castell of Howting and forayed and destroyed the countrie lastly on Whitsunday, beyng the last day of Maye, the Gelders gaue battayle to the Lorde Fylsteinge and fought valyauntly as any men could doe, but yet by fortune of warre they were ouercome and fled, and were chased a great waye and many many slayne. This chaunce was while the treatie of peare was in England. In the berie ende of May began in the Citie of London the sicknesse called the sweating sicknes, & afterward went through all the realme almost, of the which many dyed within five or sixe houres. By reason of this sicknesse the terme was adiozned and the circuites of Assise also. The king was sore troubled with this plague, for diuers died in the court, of whome one was Sir Fraunces Boynes, which was Ambassadoz in Spaine, and other, so that the king for a space remoued almost euery day, till at the last he came to Tptynhangar a place of the Abbot of saint Albones, and there he with a fewe determined to bide the chaunce that God would send him, which place was so purged daylie with fyres, and other preseruatiues, that neyther he nor the Queene nor none of their company was infected of that disease, such was the pleasure of God. In thys great plague died syr William Compton knight, and William Cary Esquire, which were of the kings priuie chamber, and whome the king highly fauoured and many other worshipfull men and women in Englande.

By reason of this plague the watches which were wont to be kept yerely in London on saint Johns eue at Midsummer & saint Peters eue, wherby the king & his counsaile commaunded to be left for that yere, wherfore the Armours made great suit to the king and declared their great hinderance which was not so much considred as the mischief that might haue ensued if that so great a nuber should haue assembled together in y hote time, & the plague of sweating raigning. Now let vs leaue England at this somer season troubled & vexed with this sweating sicknesse, & let vs returne to the affaires of Italy.

In this season was through all Italy a vniuersall warre, famine and pestilence, or a mozeyn wherof the people died in euery place, and in especially in the Dukes armie which caused the most part of the Almaines to returne into their countrey, wherfore the Duke wisely considered y chaunce and saw that his armie was greatly minished by death, and saw farther that for lacke of vittayle and money he was not able to conuay the remnaunt of his armie to Naples, by the aduise of Anthony de Leua concluded to returne, and so shortly after in good order returned, and lost moze by the pestilence then by his enemies.

The french king was aduertised by the Lord Labotrick how his people decayed sore before Naples, and how the Duke of Brunswike was coming to raise the siege and rescue the Citie, wherfore the french king sent Lorde Fraunces Erle saint Boul brother to the Duke of Wandosme with eyght thousand men to folowe the Duke of Brunswyke to Naples, and if he went not to Naples, then he should ioyne himselve with Fraunces Sforza Duke of Millayne and the Venecians, and so expell Anthony de Leua and all the Emperours souldiours out of Lombardy.

The Spaniardes within Naples were aduertised that new succours were coming to the frenchmen, wherfore they determined to fight with them or their new ayde came, and so one day they issued out of the Citie and fought with the frenchmen and slew many of them, but by force they were compelled to returne. The Lord Labotrick knew well that the Citie could not hold long for lacke of vittayle (for a suertye if vittayle had not come by Sea, the towne had beene pelded) wherfore the Lorde Labotrick suffered his his army to lie still in the plaine field all the heat of the Sommer and brought them not to the shadow, by reason whereof there fell such a disease amongst his army, that they died dayly in great number and he him selfe fell sick & left the army and lay at Nerse, of the which mortallitie there died in the French campe aboute .xxiiiij. M. men, beside the most part of all their horses & bestes of which number as diuers writers doe agree there dyed aboute five thousand Gentlemen, amongst whom there dyed the Lorde Mademont brother to Anthony Duke of Lorraine, the Lorde of Grauntmoint, the Capitayne Malzac, the Lorde Lanall of the Dolphenye, the Capytaine Luper, the Lord Charles Uyuone, Lorde of Chateygnerey sonne to the Lorde Andrew of Uyuone Senechal of Poiteu, & many other noble men of name.

During which plague the towne of Cap (which most of all the townes in the realme of Naples helde on the French part) became imperiall and turned to the Emperors part: Whereof hearing the Lorde Labitick, made therefore great sorrow, and being somewhat amended of his disease, tooke his horse and came to visite the Campe, and when he saw his number so diminished and hys Campe so desolate of people that he perceyued that his enterprise could not be performed, he fell into such a malencholy that his sickness tooke him more feruently then before, so that within two dayes after, which was the one and twentieth day of August he dyed at and his body was fered and conueied after into France.

The Marques of Saluce which was Lieutenant vnder the Lorde Labitricke called to counsaile the Ctle Guy of Hancon and Peter de Hauer and other Capitaynes that were left, & after long consultation they considered their number to be too small eyther to kepe the siege or to abyde battayle, so they passed not five thousand in all. Wherefore they concluded to leaue the siege and to returne, and so the five and twentieth day of August they brake vp their Campe and returned toward France, in which returne the Spaniards euer coasted them, and when they tooke any Frenchmen at aduantage, they eyther slew or toke them. This was the end of this iorney by reason of the great mortallitie, which if it had not happened, the Citie and the whole realme of Naples had bene recovered: For the citie of Naples could not haue holden ten dayes, after the army remoued as they confessed after.

Howe was the king fully enormed that he had in ad-

Now let vs returne to the king of England which was in a great scruple of his conscience and not quiet in his minde, because that diuers Diuines well learned secretly enformed him that he liued in adultery with his brothers wife to the great peryll of his soule, and tolde him farther that the Courte of Rome could not dispence with Gods commaundement and precept. These things were talked among the common people sith the first day of his marriage as you haue heard before, insomuch that now the kinges counsaillors aduised hym to know the truth. Wherefore he like a wise Prince for quieting of his conscience called together the best learned of the realme which were of severall opinyons, wherefore he thought to know the truth by indifferent iudges least peradventure the Spaniards in fauor of the Queene would say that his owne Subiectes were not indifferent iudges: wherefore he wrote his cause to Rome because the best clerkes in Christendome were there, and also he sent to all the vniuersities of Italy and France and to the great Clerkes of all Christendome to know their opinyons, and desired the Court

Courte of Rome to sende into his realme a Legate to heare the cause debated which should be indifferent and of a great iudgement. At whose request the whole consistory of the College of Rome sent hether Laurence Campeius a Priest Cardinal, a man of great wit & experience, but more learned in the papall law then in diuinitie, which was sent as Legate into England the .x. yere of this king as you haue heard in the sayde yere, and with him was ioyned in commission the Cardinal of Porke and Legate of England, and so this Cardinal Campeius by long iourneys came into England, and much preparation was made to receyue him triumphantly into London, but he was so sore bered with the Gout that he refused all such solemnities, and desired hartely that he might without pompe be conueied to his lodgyng for his more quyet and rest, & so the ninth day of October he came from saint Mary Duereis by water to the Bishop of Bathes place without Temple barre where he lodged the last time he was in England: Where he was visited of the Cardinal of Porke and diuers other estates and prelates. And after he had rested him a season and was somewhat releued of his payne, he was brought to the kinges presence then lying at Bridewell by the Cardinal of Porke, and was caried in a Chayre of Crimofin Velvet borne betweene foure persons for he was not able to stande, and the Cardinal of Porke and he late both on the right hand of the kinges throne, and there one Frauncisco Secretary to Cardinal Campeius made an eloquent Oration in the Latine tongue, in the which he reherfed, first with what crueltie the Emperors souldiers had handled the Pope, what tyranny they had shewed to the Cardinales and Priests, what sacrilege and spoyle they had committed in saynt Peters Church, how they had violated Virgyns, rauished mens Wyues, and in conclusyon spoiled, robbed and tormented all the Romanes and inhabitants in the Citie of Rome: and farther he shewed what friendship the College of Rome found at the kings handes and the French kings in the time of that tribulation, that if they had not ioyned together, the Citie of Rome with all their gouernors had bene brought to utter ruyne and decay, for the which he sayd that Pope Clement and all his College of Cardinales and the Senators of the Citie with all the Citizens rendered to the kyng their hartie thanks, and promysed him their loue, fauor, and amytie perpetuall.

The Oration.

This oration (as concerning the trouble of Rome) was set forth with such lamentacions, & such abhominable actes and tyrannies, that the most part of the herers thought it more eloquent then true. To the which oration Doctor Forouost of Cambridge made a discrete answer: And as to the first poynt he declared that the king much lamented to heare his friends yea or any other christen men to be ordered or handled with such tyranny & oppression: And as touching the second poynt he sayd, that the king did but the dutie of a Christian Prince to releue his friends beyng in captiuitie, for the which he would that the whole Citie of Rome shoulde geue thanks to God and not to him. After which answer made, the two Legates commoned secretly wyth the king a long space, and after departed to their lodgyng.

The answer.

Of the coming of this Legate, the common people beyng ignorant of the truth, and especially women, and other that fauoured the Queene, talked largely, and sayde that the king would for his owne pleasure haue another wyfe, and had sent for this Legate to be deuozced from his Queene, with many foolish wordes, insomuch that whosocuer spake agaynst the marriage was of the common people abhorred and reproued, which common rumour and foolish communications were related to the king, wherefore he like a prudent Prince and circumspect doer in all his affayers, and willing all men to knowe his intent and purpose, caused all his nobilitie, Judges, and Counsaylors, with diuers other persons to come to his Palace of Bridewell on Sunday the. viij. day of Nouember at after noone in his great chamber, and there to them sayde as nere as my witte coulde beare awaye these wordes folowynge. Hall.

The kinges Deation concerning hys
first marriage.

Our trustie and welbeloued subiectes both you of the nobilitie, and you of the meener sort, it is not vnknowne to you howe that we, both by Gods prouision, and true and lawfull inheritaunce haue reigned ouer this realme of England almost the terme of. xx. yerres, Durynge which tyme we haue so ordered vs, thanked be God, that no outward enemy hath oppzessed you nor taken any thing from vs, nor we haue inuaded no realme, but we haue had victorie and honour, so that we thinke that you, nor none of your predecesors neuer liued more quietly, more wealthie, nor in more estimation vnder anye of our noble progenitors: But when we remember our mortalitie, and that we must dye, then we thinke that all our doynge in our lyfe tyme are clerely defaced, and worthe of no memorie, if we leaue you in trouble at the time of our death. For if our true heyre be not knowne at the tyme of our death, see what mischief and trouble shall succede to you and your children. The experience wherof some of you haue seene after the death of our noble Grandfather king Edward the fourth, and some haue heard what mischief and manslaughter continued in this realme betweene the houses of Yorke and Lancaster, by the which discention this realme was lyke to haue bene clerely destroyed. And although it hath pleased almighty God to sende vs a fayre daughter of a noble woman and me begotten to our great comfort and ioy, yet it hath bene tolde vs by diuers great Clerkes, that neyther she is oure lawfull daughter, nor her mother our lawfull wyfe, but that we liue together abhominably and detestably, in open adultery, insomuch that when our Ambassade was last in fraunce, and mocion was made that the Duke of Orleans should marry our sayde daughter, one of the chiefe Counsaylors to the French kinge sayd. It were well done to knowe whether she be the king of England his lawfull daughter or not, for well knowen it is, that he begat her on his brothers wyfe, which is directly agaynst Gods law and his precept. Thinke you not my Lordes that these wordes touch not my bodie and soule, thinke you that these doynge do not dayly and hourely trouble my conscience and bere my spirites, yes we doubt not but and if it were your alone cause euerie man would seeke remedie when the perill of your soule, and the losse of your inheritaunce is openly layde to you. For this onely cause I protest before God & in the word of a Prince, I haue asked counsaile of the greatest Clerkes in Christendome, and for this cause I haue sent for this Legate, as a man indifferent onely to knowe the truth, and to settle my conscience, and for none other cause as God can iudge. And as touchynge the Queene, if it be adiudged by the lawe of God that she is my lawfull wyfe, there was neuer thing more pleasaunt, nor more acceptable to me in my life, both for the discharge charge and cleeryng of my conscience, and also for the good qualities and condicions the which I knowe to be in her. For I assure you all, that beside her noble parentage, of the which she is descended (as all you knowe) she is a woman of most gentlenesse, of most humilitie and burynnesse, yea, and of all good qualities apperteyning to nobilitie, she is without comparison, as I this. xx. yerres almost haue had the true experient, so that if I were to marry againe, if the marriage might be good, I would surely choose her aboue all other women: But if it be determined by iudgement that our marriage was against Gods law & clerely voyd, then I shall not onely sorow the departynge from so good a Ladie and louynge companion, but much more lament and bewaile my infortunate chaunce, that I haue so long liued in adultery to Gods great displeasure, and haue no true heyre of my bodie to enherit this realme. These be the forces that bere my minde, these be the pangues that trouble my conscience, and for these grieues I seeke a remedie. Therefore I require of you all as our trust and confidence is in you, to declare to our subiectes our minde and entent, accordynge to our true meaning, and desyre them to pray with vs, that the very truth maye be knowne for the discharge of our conscience, and sauyng of our soule, and for the declaration hereof, I haue assembled you together, and now you may depart.

The praise of the Queene.

To see what countenance was made amongst the hearers of this Oracion it was a straunge sight, for some sighed and sayde nothing, other were sorry to here the king so troubled in his conscience. Other that fauoured the Queene much sorowed that this matter was now opened, and so every man spake as his heart serued him, but the king euer laboured to knowe the truth for discharge of his conscience.

Shortly after this, the two Legates came to the Queene at the same place of Bridewell, and declared to her howe they were deputed Judges indifferent betweene the king and her, to heere and determine whether the marriage betweene them stood with Gods law or not. When she heard the cause of their coming, no maruaile though she were astonied, for it touched her very nere. And when she had paued a while she answered.

The saying of the Legate

Was my Lordes is it now a question whether I be the kinges lawfull wife or no? When I haue bene married to him almost. xx. yerres, and in the meane season neuer question was made before? Diuers Prelates yet beyng aliue, and Lordes also, and priue Counsaylors with the king at that tyme, then adiudged our marriage lawfull and honest, and now to say it is detestable and abhominable, I thinke it great maruaile: and in especiall when I consider what a wise Prince the kinges father was, and also the loue and naturall affection, that king Ferdinando my father bare vnto me: I thinke in my selfe that neyther of our fathers, were so vncircumspect, so vnwyse, and of so small imagination, but they foresaw what might followe of our marriage, and in especiall the king my father, sent to the Court of Rome, and there after long suite, with great cost and charge, obteyned a licence and dispensation, that I being the one brothers wife, and peradventure carnally knowne might without scrupull of conscience, marry with the other brother lawfully, which licence vnder lead I haue yet to shewe, which thinges made me to say and surely beleue, that our marriage was both lawfull, good and Godly: But of this trouble I onely may thanke you my Lorde Cardinall of Yorke, for because I have wondered at your highe pride and vaine glozy, and abhorre your voluptuous life, and abhominable Lecherie, and little regard your presumptuous power and tyranny, therefore of malice you have kindled this fire and set this matter abzoche, and in especiall for the great malice that you beare to my nephew the Emperoz, to home I perfectly know you hate worse then a Scorpion, because he would not satisfie your ambition and make you Pope by force, and therefore you haue sayde more then once, that you would trouble him and his friendes, and you haue kept him true promise, for of all his warres and vexations, he onely may thanke you, and as for me his poore aunt and kinswoman, what trouble you put me to, by this new found doubt, God knoweth to whome I commit my cause accordyng to the truth. The Cardinall of Yorke excused himselfe, sayng, that he was not the beginner, nor the mouer of the doubt, and that it was soze agaynst his will, that euer the marriage should come in question, but he sayde that by his superior the bishop of Rome, he was deputed as a Judge to here the cause, which he swore on his profession to heere indifferently, but whatsoeuer was sayde, she beleued him not, and so the Legates toke their leaue of her and departed. These wordes were spoken in French, and wozitten by Cardinall Campeius Secretary, which was present, and by me (sayth Hall) translated as neere as I coude.

The king notwithstanding that his minde was vnquiet, yet he kept a good countenance toward the Queene, with as much loue, honor, and gentleness, as could be shewed to such a princeesse, but he absteyned from her bed till the truth was tryed, accordyng as his ghostly counsayle had caused him, which was to him no little paine, for surely he loued her as well, as anye Prince might loue his wife, and seee him againe, and therfore it was great pyttie, that their marriage was not good.

The moze to quicken his spirites, and for recreation, the king kept his Christmas at Grenewiche, with much solempnitie and great plentie of Viands, and thether came the two Legates, which were receiued by two Dukes and diuers Erles, Barons and gentlemen, to whom the king shewed great pleasures, both of Justes, Toynays, Bankets, Maskes, and disguisings, and on the Twelke day he made the lawfull sonne of Cardinall Campeius bozne in wedlock, knight, and gaue him a collar of .S.S. of Golde: but the Queene shewed to them no maner of countenance, and made no great ioy of nothing, her minde was so troubled.

Cardinall Campeius sonne in lawe knight.

This doing in Englands was spzed over all Chrystendome by letters, and in every region except Spaine, and the Emperors dominions, they aduoged the king a wise, a herceous, and a prudent Prince, for tryng out of the truth, considering that the question was not onely doubtfull to learned men in diuinitie, but vpon the vncertainetie of the same, depended the ruine of his realme, and the succession of the same, which was a waightie thing to consider, and no wisdom to let so great a doubt lye vndiscussed.

After Christmas and all Lent till Easter, was none other thing commoned of, but onely of the kings marriage, the Archbishop of Cauntorburie sent for the famous Doctors of both the Uniuersities to Lambeth, and there were euery day disputations, and commonings of thys matter, and because the king perceyued and knewe well, that the Queene was wedded to her

aboue opinion, and that he would that she should doe nothing without counsayle, he had her chose the best Clarke of his realme, to be of her counsaile, and licensed them to doe the best on her part that they could, accordyng to the truth: then she elected Wylliam Warham Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and Nicholas West Bishop of Elie, Doctors of the lawes, and John Fisher Bishop of Rochester, and Henry Standishe Bishop of saint Aste, Doctors of Diuinitie, and manye other Doctors and well learned men, which for a suretie like men well learned: defended her cause as farre as learning might defend it.

The Queene is licensed to retayne counsaile agaynst the king her husband.

In the beginning of thys yere, in a great Hall within the black Friers of London was ordeyned a solempne place, for the two Legates to sit in, with two Cheyres covered with cloth of Golde, and Cushions of the same, and a Dormant table tailed before, like a solempne Court, all covered with Carpets and Tapissery: on the right hand of the Court was hanged a cloth of estate, with a Chayer and Cushions of riche Tissue, for the king, and on the left hande of the Court, was set a riche Chayer for the Queene. When the place was readie, the king and the Queene were ascited by Docteur Samson, to appere before the Legates, at the forenamed place, the twentieth and eyght day of May, beyng then the morrowe after the feast of Corpus Christi, in proper person, or by their Proctors. At the day assigned, the Legates came to the forenamed place, with Crosses, Billers, Axes, and all the ceremonies belonging to their degrees, and after that they were set (the Cardinall of Yorke sitting on the right hande) their commission was red, and the cause of their coming thether openly declared, the effect whereof was, that the Court of Rome was instructed, that great Clarke and learned men had enforced the king, that his marriage with his brothers wyfe was vnlawfull, dampnable, and directly agaynst the lawe of God, wherefore they were directed and appointed by the sayde Court, to bee Judges in the cause, and to heare what on both parties could be alleged: after this was done, the king was called by name, for whome two Proctors appered, then the Queene was called, which within short space, beyng accompanied with the foure Bishops and other of her counsaile, and a great company of Ladies and gentlewomen folowynge her, came personally before the Legates, and after her obedience, sadly and with great grauitie done, shee appeled from them, as Judges not competent for that cause, to the Court of Rome, and after that done, shee departed agayne. Notwithstanding thys appeale, the Legates sat weekly, and euery day were arguments on both partes, and nothing else done.

The Courte at the Black Friers.

The Queene appealed.

The king which onely desired to haue an ende in this matter, for discharge of his conscience, came to the Court the of June, and the Queene also, where he standing vnder his cloth of estate, sayde these wordes in effect folowynge: My Lordes, Legates of the sea Apostolique which be deputed Judges, in this great and waightie matter, I most hartely beseech you, to ponder my minde and intent, which onely is to haue a finall ende, for the discharge of my conscience: for euery good christian man knoweth what paine and what vnquietnesse he suffereth, which hath his conscience grieued, for I assure you on mine honor, that thys matter hath so vexed my minde, and troubled my spirites, that I can scantly studie any thing, which should be profitable for my realme and people. And for to haue a quietnesse in body and soule is my desire and request, and not for anye grudge that I beare to her that I haue married, for I dare say that for her womanhood, wisdom, nobilitie, and gentlenesse, neuer prince had such another, and therefore if I would willingly chaunge, I were not wise: wherefore my suite is to you my Lordes at this time, to haue a speedie ende, according to right, for the quietnesse of my minde and conscience onely, and for no other cause as God knoweth.

When the king had sayde, the Queene departed without any thing sayyng, then she was called, to knowe whether she would bide by her appele, or aunswere there befoze the Legates, her Procter aunswered, that she would bide by her appele, that notwithstanding, the counsaylours on bothe sides euery day almost met, and debated this matter substantially, so that at the last the Diuines were all of opinion, that the mariage was against the lawe of God, if she were carnally knowne by the first brother, (which thing she clerely denied) but to that was aunswered, that Prince Arthur her husbande, confessed the act done, when he called for drinke earely in the morning, sayyng: that he had beene in Spaine that night, which was a hote countrie, meaning that he had carnally bled her, farther at the time of the death of Prince Arthur, she thought and iudged that she was with childe, and for that cause the king was deferred from the tytle and creation of the Prince of Wales, almost halfe a yere, which thing could not haue beene iudged, if she had not bene carnally knowne.

Also she her selfe caused a Bull to be purchased, in the which were these wordes, Vel forsan cognitam, which is as much to say, as peradventure carnally knowne, which wordes were not in the first Bull graunted by July, at her second mariage to the king, which second Bull with that clause was onely purchased, to dispence with the second matrimony, although there were carnall copulation befoze, which Bull neded not to haue bene purchased, if there had bene no carnal copulation, for then y first Bull had bene sufficient.

When the Diuines on her side, were beaten from that ground, then they fell to perswasions of naturall reason, how this shoulde not be vndone, for three causes: one was because if it should be broken, the onely childe of the king, shoulde bee a Bastard, which were a great mischief to the realme: Secondly the seperation shoulde be a cause of great vnkindnesse, betweene her kindred and this realme. And the third cause was, that the continuance of so long space, had made the mariage honest: These perswasions with many other, were set forth by the Queenes counsaile, and in especiall by the Bishop of Rochester, which stood stiffe in her cause, but yet Godes precept was not aunswered, wherefore they left that ground and fell to pleading, that the Court of Rome had dispensed with that mariage: To thys some Lawyers sayde, that no earthly person is able to dispence with the positive lawe of God.

When the Legates had heard the opinions of the Diuines, and sawe that their opinion for the most part was agaynst the Matrimony, and that nowe the question was brought to dispute, the auctoritie of the Court of Rome, they began a little to quicken: For they considered that if they should say and determine, that the Court of Rome might not dispence in that case, that fewe men would thinke, that they might dispence in any other case, which shoulde be to them a great losse and hurt. Wherefore they dissimuled the matter, and euer tolde the king, that he shoulde haue an ende shortly, and tracted forth the time with Orations and Sophisticall arguments, till August began to appoach: then Cardinall Campeius sayd, that they might not sit after July, till October, all which season was a vacation in the Court of Rome, and their Court beyng a member of the Court of Rome, they must needes doe the same: this sayyng was reported to the king, which by that sayyng knewe perfutely that he shoulde then haue no ende, and then he complayned to the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolke, and other nobles of his counsaile, how he was delayed, and wylled them at the next Session, to require them, to make an ende of the cause, and what iudgement soeuer they gaue, he would gladly accept it, for the quietnesse of his conscience.

These noble men came to the place, where the Legates sat, the thirtie day of August, beyng Fryday, whereas Cardinall Campeius, declared in eloquent Latin, and sware on his honoz and sayth that he bare to the church of Rome, that the course of the courtes there be, at the end of July, to suspend all causes, till the fourth day of October, and if any case be treated, and iudged in the meane season, that iudgment to be clerely boyde, and therefore he required the king to take pacience til that time, trusting that then they shoulde proceede toward sentence, so that he shoulde be contented: the Noble men desired them to make an ende, whatsoeuer it were, that day or the next day, which was the last day of July: but they aunswered that they coulde sit no moze till October, which aunswere soze displeased the noble men, which the king had sent thether, in somuch that Charles Duke of Suffolke, seyng the delay, gaue a great clap on the Table with hys hand and sayde: by the Masse, now I see that the olde sayde saw is true, that there was neuer Legate nor Cardinal, that did good in Englande, and with that sayyng all the Tempozall Lordes departed to the king, leauing the Legates sitting one loking on the other soze astonied, because they saw the Tempozall Lordes depart in anger.

You may be sure, that the king was not well content, when he heard of this delay, but yet like a wise Prince, he tooke it patiently, trusting to haue an ende in October ensuyng: But when he heard tell, that a letter was sent for the Cardinall Campeius, that he shoulde wth speede, returne into Italy, and that he provided for his iozney: Then he openly perceued, that the Legates dissimuled the time to haue the matter in the Courte of Rome, for the mainteinaunce of their auctoritie, knowyng perfutely, that there he shoulde be foded forth with argumentes so long that he shoulde be in maner wery, and also all that time, he shoulde be vnquiet in his conscience, which was the greatest care, that he had, but the second care that he tooke, was to see the Cardinall of Yorke (whome he so highly fauored and trusted, and whome he had so highly promoted, both to the Archbishopricke of Yorke, and the Bishopricke of Wynchester, Duresme, and the Abbey of saint Albons, with many other great dignities and promotions, beside the Chauncellozship of Englande) so vnfaithfully to dissimule with him, and not to open the very truth, which caused him clerely to cast him out of his fauor, in the which he had long bene.

When the Nobles and Prelates perceiued, that the kinges fauor was from the Cardinall soze minished, every man of the kinges Counsaile, began to lay to him such offences, as they knew by hym, and all their accusati- ons were wozitten in a Booke, and all their handes set to it, to the number of thirtie and foure, which Booke they presented to the kyng. When the king saw the Booke he marueiled not a little, for by the articles conteyned in the same, he euidently perceaued the high pride and coueteousnesse of the Car- dinall, and saw openly with what dissimulation and clokyng, he had handled the kinges causes: how he with fayze liyng woordes, had blinded and defrauded the king, most vntruly, which accusations soze moued the king agaynst hym, but yet he kept it close for a time, and so the king rode on his progresse with the Quene to Woodstock. And at the feast of the natiuitie of our Lady, he came to Grafton, beside Stony Stratforde, and thether came the two Legates, and were but meanly receyued, sauing that the king made to them good semblance, and in especiall to Cardinall Campeius, because he came into England at his request: and after dinner the saide Campeius toke his leaue of the king, and then the king him conueied to the Chamber doze, and there they departed, and the Cardinall of Pozke also went with his compa- nyon to Cocester, and on the moztow he came to Grafton to speake with the king, which was then ryding out on huntynge, and he sent him worde by Henry Nozreis, that he should accompany Campeius to London, and when the king came to London, he woulde moze common with him: thus almost disinayed the Cardinall of Pozke, returned to his companion to Cocester, and so they came together to London, where to the Cardinall Campeius, were deliuered great rewarde, and so he toke his tozney toward the Sea side, where the kinges counsaile, caused his chestes and cariages to be ope- ned to se what letters the Cardinall of Pozke had sent to the court of Rome, and there were but a fewe letters founde, for they were sent befoze in poste, but in many chestes were founde, olde hosen, olde coates, and such vile Ruffe, as no honest man would cary to haue it, which search much displeasid Cam- peius, and the moze because his coffers were likewise opened in Chepe, by the rashnesse of a Hoyle, as you haue heard in the tenth yere of the king.

The king
now began

Lady Anne
Bulleyne.

Thus departed out of England in high displeasure, the craftie Cardinall Campeius, leauing behinde him his subtill felow, which after their departing from the kyng at Grafton, neuer saw the king, nor came in hys presence. This great Session of the Legates, was communed of through Christendom, and in especiall in Spayne, and other the Emperors dominions, which soze grudged that the Quene should be diuorced from the king: and suerly the most part of the lay people of Englande, which knew not the law of God, soze murmured at the matter, and much the moze, because there was a Gentlewoman in the court, called Anne Bulleyne, daughter to Sir Thomas Bulleyne, Viscount Rocheford, whome the King much fauored in all honestie, and suerly none otherwise, as all the world well knew after.

The king which all the .xx. yere past, had becne ruled by other, and in especiall by the Cardinall of Pozke, began now to be a ruler and a king, yea, a king of such witte, wisdom, and pollicie, that the like hath not reigned ouer this realme, as you shall plainly perceyue hereafter: as well for the set- tyng forth of true doctrine, as also for the augmentation of his Crowne. For when

when he perceyued, how the Cardinales had handeled him, and saw plainly that the law of God was clere, that he might not marry his brothers wyfe, thought to sende his Ambassadors to all the Uniuersities in Fraunce, and Italy, to know their determinatiōs, and for that cause he sent Doctoz Sto- kelley, and Doctoz Jore, two great Clerkes into Fraunce, which sped as you shall heere hereafter declared, when the matter serueth.

The king continually studyng on this matter, called a counsaile of the chiefe of his Nobles, to begin at Westminster, the first day of October next ensuyng, and also sommoned a Parliament, to begin the thirde day of No- uember, then immediatly folowng, and declared that the same Counsaile, should deuise diuers actes, necessary and needefull to be passed at the sayde Parliament, for reformation of certain exactions, done by the Clergie to the lay people, to which Counsaile and Parliament, the Cardinall was warned and sommoned, which much comforted him, that he outwardly little abashed: and so he and all the Counsaile, came to the counsaile Chamber at Westmin- ster, and there dyuers dayes communed of diuers thinges, but nothing was fully concluded, and there the Cardinall shewed himselfe, much more hum- blyer then he was wont to be, & the Lordes shewed themselves moze higher and straunger, then they were wont to be, but for all that he abashed not hys countenance, but came into Westminster Hall with all his traine, the first day of the Terme: but none of the kinges seruantes would go befoze, as they were wont to do, and so he sate in the Chauncery, but not in the Starre Chamber, for all the Lordes and other the kinges Counsaile, were gone to Windsor to the king, where they enformed the king, that all thinges that he had done almost, by his power Legantine, were in the case of the Premunire and prouision: and that the Cardinall had forfeited all his landes, tenementes, goodes, and cattayles to the king: wherefore the king willing to order him, according to the order of his lawes, caused his attourney Christopher Hales to sue out a Writte of Premunire agaynst hym, in the which he licenced him to make an attourney.

Premunire.

And farther, the .xxij. day of Nouember, he sent the two Dukes of Noz- folk & Suffolke, to his place at Westminster, to fetch away the great Seale of England, which he was loth to deliuer, if there had bene any remedy, but in cōclusion he deliuered it to the two Dukes, which deliuered the same to Doctoz Cayloz maister of the Rolles, to cary it to the king, which so did the next day: and beside this the king sent sir William Fitzwilliam knight of the garter, and treasurer of his house, and doctoz Stephin Gardiner, newly made secre- tary, to see that no goodes should be embesiled out of his house: and further ordeined that the Cardinall should remoue to Albire beside Kingston, there to cary the kings pleasure, and to haue all thinges deliuered to him, which were necessary for him, but not after his old pompeous & superfluous fashion: for all his goodes were seized to the kinges vse. When the seale was thus taken from the Cardinall, the Dukes of Nozfolke & Suffolke, with many Crles, bishops, and Barons, came into the Starre Chamber, the .xix. day of Octo- ber, wher the Duke of Nozfolke declared that the kinges highnesse, for di- uers and sundrie offences, had taken from him the great Seale, and deposed him of all offices, & least that men might complaine for lacke of iustice, he had appoynted him and the Duke of Suffolke, with the assent of the other lords to sit in the Starre Chamber, to heere and determine causes indifferently, and that of all things the kings pleasure and commaundement was, that they should keepe their handes cloie, from any rewardes takyng, or maintenance, and so that weeke they sat in the Starre Chamber, and determined causes.

On the day of the same moneth, the Cardinall remoued out of his house called Pozke place, with one Crosse, sayng, that he would he had neuer borne more, meanyng that by his Crosse, that he bare as Legate, which degree takyng was his confusion, as you see openly, and so he tooke his barge and went to Putney by water, and there tooke his horse, and rode to Ather, where he remayned till Lent after.

Duryng which tyme, he beeyng called on for an aunswere in the kinges Bench, to the Premunire, for geuyng benefices by preuention, in disturbance of meynes enheritaunce, and diuers other open causes in the Premunire: he accordyng to the kinges licence, constituted John Scute, and Edmond Jenny, apprentices of the Lawe, his attournayes, which by hys awne warrant signed with his hand, confessed all things concernyng the said suite, for they were to open to be cloked or hidden, and so iudgement was geuen, that he should forseyt all his landes, tenementes, goodes, and Catches and should be out of the kinges protection, but for all that the king sent hym a sufficient protection: and of his gentlenesse left to him the Bishoprike of Pozke and Winchester, and gaue to him plate and stuffe conuenient for hys degree, and the Bishoprike of Duresme, he gaue to Doctoz Cusshall Bisshop of London, and the Abbey of Saint Albones, he gaue to the Prior of Perwich, and to London he promoted Doctoz John Stokesley, then Ambassadour to the Uniuersities, for the kinges marriage, as you haue heard before. For all these kindnesse shewed to the Cardinall, yet he still maligned agaynst the king, as you shall perceyue hereafter, by his butrue doynges, whiche brought him to confusion.

The .xxij. day of October, the king came to his manor of Grenewich, and there muche consulted with his Counsaile, for a meete man to be his Chaunceloz, so that in no wyse he were no man of the spiritualtie, and so after long debate, the king resolved himselfe vpon sir Thomas Hooze knight, Chaunceloz of the Duchie of Lancaster, a man well learned in the tongues, and also in the common Lawe, whose witte was fine, and full of imaginati- ons, by reason wherof, he was to much geuen to mocking, which was to his grauitie a great blemish. And then on the Sunday the .xxiiij. day of the same moneth, the king made him his Chauncelour, and deliuered him the great Seale, which Lorde Chauncelour the nexte morrowe after, was ledde into the Chauncerye, by the two Dukes of Norffolk and Suffolke, and there sworne, and then the Place was borne before him

This yere the king of Englande began his high Court of parliament, the thirde day of November. On which day he came by water to his place of Bidewell, and there he and his nobles put on their robes of parliament, and so came to the black friers Church, where a Masse of the holye ghost was solemnly song by the kinges Chapell, & after the Masse, the king, with all the Lords of the parliament, and comunons which were summoned to ap- peare at that day came into the parliament chamber, where the king sat in hys Throne or seat royall, and sye Thomas Hooze his Chauncelour stand-ding on the right hande of the king behinde the barre made an eloquent ora- tion, declaring that like as a good Shepheard, which not alonely keepeth and attendeth well his sheepe, but also forseyeth and prouideth for all thing, which eyther may be hurtfull or noysome to his flock, or maye preferue and defende the same agaynst all perilles that may chaunce to come, so the king which was the Shepheard, ruler, and gouernour of his realme, bigilantly forseying things to come, considered how diuers lawes before this time were made now by long continuance of time and mutation of thynges, verie in- sufficient, and vnersite, and also by the frayle condition of man, diuers new enormities were sprong amongs the people, for the which no lawe was yet made to refozme the same, which was the very cause why at that time the king had summoned his high Court of Parliament: and he resembled the king to a Shepheard, or Heardman for this cause, for if a prince be compar- ed to his riches, he is but a riche man, if a prince be compared to hys ho- nour, he is but an honorable man: but compare him to the multitude of hys people and the number of his flock, then he is a ruler, a gouernour of might and puyssaunce, so that his people maketh him a prince, as of the multitude of sheepe, cometh the name of a Shepheard: as you see that amongst a great flock of sheepe some be rotten and faultie, which the good Shepheard sendeth from the good sheepe, so the great weather which is of late fallen as you all know, so craftely, so scabbedly, ye & so butruly iuggeled with the king, that all men must needes gesse and thinke that he thought in himselfe, that he had no wit to perceiue his crafty doing, or else that he presumed that the king would not see nor know his fraudulent iuggeling and attemptes: but he was deceiued, for his graces sight was so quick and penetrable, that he sawe him, yea and sawe through him, both within and without, so that all thing to him was open, and accordyng to his desert he hath had a gentle cor- rection, which small punishment the king will not to be an example to other offendours, but cleuely declareth that whosoeuer hereafter shall make like at- tempt or comit like offence, shall not escape with like punishment. And because you of the common house be a great multitude, and cannot speake all at one time: Therefore the kings pleasure is, that you shall resort to the nether house, and there amongst your selues accordyng to the olde and ancient cus- tome to chole an able person to be your common mouth and speaker, and after your election so made to aduertise his grace thereof, which wyll de- clare to you his pleasure what daye he will haue him presented in this place.

After this done, the comunons resorted to the nether house, and they chose for their speaker Thomas Audeley Esquire and attorney of the Du- chie of Lancaster, and the same day was the Parliament adiourned to West- minster. On the .viij. day of the same month the king came into the parliament chamber and all the Lordes in there robes, and there the comunons of the nether house presented their speaker, which there made an eloquent ora- tion whiche consisted in two poyntes, the first was, that he muche praysed the king for his equitie and Justice, mixed with mercy and pity, so that none offence was forgotten and left unpunished, nor in the punishment the extre- mitie nor the rigor of the lawe not cruelly extended, which should be a cause to byidle all men from doying lyke offences, and also a comfort to offendours to confesse there crime and offence, and an occasion of amendment and re- conciliation.

The second poynt was, that he disabled himselfe, for lack of wpt, learning and discretion to so highe an office, beseeching the king to cause his commons to resort eftsones to their common house, and there to chose an other speaker for that parliament.

To this the king (by the mouth of the Lorde Chauncelour) answered that where he had disabled himselfe in wpt and learning, his awne orzation there made, testified the contrarie, and as touching his discretion and other qualities, the king himselfe had well knobone him and his doyngs, sith he was in his seruice, to be both wise and discrete, and so for an hable man he accepted him, and for the speaker he him admitted.

When the commons were assembled in the nether house, they began to common of their griefes, wherewith the spiritualtie had befoze time grievously oppressed them, both contrarie to the lawe of the realme, and contrarie to all right, and in especiall they were soze moued with sixe great causes.

The great charge of the probate of Sir William Comptons Testament.

1 The first for the excesse fynes, which the ordinaries tooke for probate of Testaments, insomuch that s<sup>r</sup> Henry Guilfozde knight of the Garter and Comptroller of the kings house, declared in the open Parliament on his fidelitie that he and other, being executors to Sir William Compton knight, payde for the probate of his will to the Cardinall and the Archebyschop of Cauntozburie a thousand Marke sterling: after this declaration were shewed so manye extortions done by ordinaries for probates of willes, that it were to much to rehearse.

2 The second cause was the great polling and extreme exactiō, which the spirituall men bled in taking of cozps, presentes, or mortuaries, for the children of the defunct should all die for hunger and go a beggyng, rather then they would of charitie geue to them the siely cow which the dead man ought if he had but onely one, such was the charitie then.

3 The thirde cause was, that priestes beyng surueiozrs, stuardes and officers to Byschoppes, Abbotes, and other spirituall heades, had and occupied fermes, Graunges, and grasing in every countrey, so that the pooze husbandmen could haue nothing but of them, and yet for that they shoulde paye derely.

4 The fourth cause was that Abbottes, Pziorz, and spirituall men kept Tanne houses, and bought and solde Woll, clothe, and all maner of Marchaundise, as other temporall Marchaunts did.

5 The fift cause was because that spirituall persons promoted to great benefices, and hauing their lyuing of their flock, were lyng in the Court in Lordes houses, and tooke all of the parishoners, and nothing spent on them at all, so that for lack of residence both the poze of the parische lacked refreshyng, and vniuersally all the parishoners lacked preaching, and true instruction of Gods worde, to the great perill of their soules.

6 The sixt cause was to see one priest beyng little learned to haue ten or twelue benefices and to be resident on none, and to knowe many well learned scholers in the Uniuerfitie, which were hable to preache and teache, to haue neyther benefice nor exhibition.

These things befoze this time might in no wise be touched nor yet talked of by no man except he would be made an heretike, or lese al that he had for

for the Byschoppes were Chauncelozs, and had all the rule about the king, so that no man durst once presume to attempt anye thing contrarie to their proffite or commoditie.

But now when God had illumined the eyes of the king, and that their subtil doings was once espied: then men began charitably to desire a refozation, and so at this parliament men began to shewe their grudges.

Whereupon the Burgesles of the parliament appointed suche as were learned in the law, beyng of the common house, to drawe one bill of the probates of Testaments, another for Mortuaries, and the thirde for none residence, pluralities, and taking of Fermes by spirituall men.

The learned men tooke much payne, and first set forth the bill of Mortuaries, which passed the common house, and was sent by to the Lordes.

To thys bill, the spirituall Lordes made a fayze face, sayng that surely Priestes and Curates tooke moze then they should, and theretore it were well done to take some reasonable order, thus they spake because it touched them little.

But within two dayes after was sent by the Bill concerning probates of Testaments, at the which the Archebyschop of Cauntozburie in especiall, and all other Byschops in generall both frowned and gruntyd, so that touched there profite, insomuch as Doctoz John Fisher Byschop of Rochester, sayde openly in the parliament chamber these wordes: my Lordes, you see daylie what billes come hether from the common house, and all is to the destruction of the Church, for Gods sake see what a realme the kingdome of Boheme was, and when the Church went downe, then fell the glozy of the kingdome, now with the commons is nothing but downe with the Church, and all this me seemeth is for lacke of fayth onely.

When these words were reported to the commons of the nether house, that the Byschop should say that all their doyngs were for lack of fayth, they tooke the matter grievoussly, for they unagyned that the Byschop esteemed them as heretikes, and so by hys flanderous wordes would haue perswaded the temporall Lordes to haue restrayned their consent from the sayde two billes, which they befoze had passed, as you haue heard befoze.

Wheretore the commons after long debate, determined to sende the speaker of the parliament to the kings highnesse, with a grievous complaint agaynst the Byschop of Rochester, and so on a day when the king was at lecture, Thomas Audeley the speaker for the commons and thirtie of the chiefe of the common house, came to the kings presence in his palace at Westminster, which befoze was called Pozke place and there berie eloquently declared what a dishonour to the king and the realme it was to saye that they which were elected for the wifest men of all the Shires, Cities, and Boroughes within the realme of Englande should be declared in so noble and open presence to lack fayth, which was equiualent to say, that they were infidels and no christians, as yll as Turkes or Sarasins, so that what payne or studie soener they toke for the common wealth, or what actes or lawes so euer they made or stablished, should be taken as lawes made by Panyngs and heathen people, and not worthy to be kept by christian men: wheretore he most humbly besought the kings highnesse, to call the sayde Byschop befoze hym and to cause him to speake moze discretly of such a number as was

In the common house.

The king was not well contented with the saying of the Bishop, yet he gently answered the speaker, that he would sende for the Bishop and send them worde what aunswere he made, and so they departed againe. After this the king sent for the Archbishop of Cantorbury, and six other Bishops and for the Bishop of Rochester also, and there declared to him the grudge of the commons, to the which the Bishop answered that he ment the doings of the Bohemians was for lacke of fayth, and not the doings of them that were in the common house, which saying was confirmed by the Bishops being present, which had him in great reputation, and so by that onely saying the king accepted his excuse, and therefore sent worde to the commons by Sir William Fitzwilliam knight Treasorer of his household, which blind excuse pleased the commons nothing at all.

The bishops excuse.

Probate of Testaments.

After this diuers assemblies were kept betwene certain of the Lords and certayne of the commons, for the billes of probates of Testaments, and the mortuaries: the temporallie layd to the spiritualty there sune lawes and constitutions, and the spiritualite soze defended them by prescriptyon and vsage, to whome an aunswere was made by a Gentleman of Greyes Inne: the vsage hath cuer bene of theues to rob on thooters hill, ergo is it lawfull? with this aunswere the spiritual men were soze offended, because there doynge were called robberies, but the Temporall men stood still by there saynges, in so much the sayde Gentleman sayd to the Archebishop of Cantorbury, that both the exaction of probates of Testaments, and the taking of Mortuaries, as they were vsed, were open robbery and theft: after long disputation, the Temporall Lords began to leane to the commons, but for all that, the bylles remayned vnconcluded a while.

The loane recalled.

In the meane season there was a byll assented by the Lordes, and sent downe to the commons, the effect whereof was, that the whole realme by the sayde acte, dyd realease to the king, all such sommes of money as he had borrowed of them at the loane, in the tittene yere of his reigne (as you haue heard before) this byll was soze argued in the common house, but the most parte of the Commons were the kinges seruauntes, and the other were so labored to by other, that the byll was assented to.

When this release of the loane was knowne to the Commons of the Realme, Lorde so they grudged, and spake yll of the whole Parliament, for almost euery man counted it hys dette, and recomed suerly of the payment of the same, and therefore some made there wylles of the same, and some other did set it ouer to other for debte, and so manye men had losse by it, which caused them soze to murmur, but there was no remedy. The king like a good and discrete Prince, seyng that his commons in the parliament house had released the loane, entending somewhat to requite the same, graunted to them a generall Pardon, of all offences, certayne great offences and debtes onely except: also he ayded them for the redress of their grieues against the spiritualty, and caused two new bylles to be made indifferently both for the probate of Testaments & Mortuaries, which billes were so reasonable that the spiritual Lords assented to them although they were soze against their minds, and in especiall the probate of Testaments soze displeasid the Bishops, & the Mortuaries soze displeasid the Persons & Vicars.

After

After these actes thus agreed, the Commons, made another acte for pluralities, of benefices none residence, byng and sellng, and taking of fermes by spiritual persons, which act so displeasid the spiritualty that the Priestes rayled on the Commons of the common house, and called them Heretikes and Scismatikes, for the which diuerse Bylles were punished.

This acte was soze debated aboue in the parliament chamber, and the Lordes spiritual would in no wise consent. Wherfore the king perceyuing the grudge of his Commons, caused eyght Lordes and eyght of his Commons to meete in the Starre Chamber at an after none, and there was soze debating of the cause, insomuche that the Temporall Lordes of the upper house, which were there, tooke part with the Commons, against the spiritual Lordes, and by force of reason caused them to assent to the byll with a litle qualifyng, which byll the next day was wholly agreed to in the Lords house, to the great reioysing of the lay people, and to the great displeasure of the spiritual persons.

Duryng this parliament was brought downe to the commons, the boke of articles which the Lordes had put to the king agaynst the Cardinal, the chiefe articles were these.

First that he without the kings assent had procured to be a Legate, by reason whereof he toke away the right of all Bishops and spiritual persons.

Articles proposed agaynst Cardinal Wolsey.

Item, in all wrytings which he wrote to Rome, or any other forreyn Prince, he wrote Ego & Rex meus, I and my king, as who would saye that the king were his seruaunt.

Item, that he hath slandered the Church of Englande in the Court of Rome, for his suggestion to be a Legat, was to reforme the Church of Englande, which as he wrote was Facta in reprobum censum.

Item, he without the kinges assent, caried the kinges great Seale with him into Flaunders, when he was sent Ambassade to the Emperour.

Item, he without the kinges assent, sent a Commission to Sir Gregoꝝ de Cassado, knight, to conclude a league betwene the king & the Duke of Ferrara, without the kinges knowlege.

Item that he hauyng the French Pockes, presumed to come and bryeth on the king.

Item, that he caused the Cardinals hat to be put on the kinges coyne.

Item, that he would not suffer the kinges Clarke of the Market, to sit at Saint Albones.

Item, that he had sent innumerable substance to Rome, for the obteynng of his dignities to the great enpouerishment of the realme.

These Articles with many moze, were read in the common house, & signed with the Cardinals hand, and was confessed by him: And also there was shewed a wrytyng sealed with his Seale, by the which he gaue to the king all his moueables and vnmoueables.

On the day of the conception of our Lady before Christmaste, the King at Porke place at Westminster, in the Parliament tyme, created the Vicount Rochforth Erle of Wilshire, and the Vicount Fitzwater, was created Erle of Sussex, and the Lord Hastinges, was created Erle of Huntynghton.

When all things were concluded in the Parliament house, the king came to the Parliament Chamber the .xviij. daye of December, and there gaue his royall assent, to all thinges done by the Lordes, and Commons, and so proroged his Court of Parliament, till the next yere.

After the Parliament was thus ended, the king remoued to Grenewich and there kept his Christmasse with the Queene in great triumph: wyth great plentie of Viandes, and diuers disguysyngs and Enterludes, to the great reioysing of his people.

The king of England beyng aduertised that the Emperoz and the Bishop of Rome were together at Bononie, determined to sende thether a solempne Ambassade, both to declare to them the lawe of God, and the determination of the vniuersities, and also to require the Bishop of Rome to doe iustice accordyng to the truth, and also to shewe to the Emperoz that the king did not moue thys matter for any displeasure that he bare to him or the Queene his Aunt, but onely for the discharge of his conscience, and for the quietnesse of his realme.

When this purpose was agreed by the kinges counsaile, the king appoynted sir Thomas Bulleyn late created Erie of Wilshire, and Doctoz Stokesley elected Bishop of London, and Doctoz Edward Lee, his Almoner, two great Clarke, for his Ambassadors, and with them he sent diuers Doctoz both of the law and diuinitie. These Ambassadors made great preparation, & about the beginnyng of February they set forward, and so much they traualled, that they came to Sauoy where the Duke in the sayre towne of Cambrey, caused them honourably to be receyued and feasted.

So they passed the Mountaynes, and so through the Duchye of Millain, and by long iourneyes they came to Bononie in Lent, where they were honourably receyued by the Maister of the Emperours house, and diuers Lordes and Gentlemen belongyng to the Pope, and within short space the sayd Ambassadors were first conueyed to the Pope, and there declared their message, and shewed the determination of the great Doctoz, and famous Vniuersities. Pope Clement which was a man of no learning, but of a great wit, made to them a gentle answer, and sayde that he would heere the matter disputed when he came to Rome, and accordyng to right he would doe iustice. But his intent was all contrary, for he knewe well that if he should geue sentence, that Pope Iulij could not dispencc with the breche of Goddes lawe, that then the aucthoritie of the Court of Rome would little be regarded, and also he feared the Emperors displeasure, if he should geue sentence agaynst his aunte, so that for feare of losyng aucthoritie, and of the Emperors displeasure, Bishop Clement durst not iudge accordyng to Gods lawe. After they had bene with the Pope, they came to the Emperoz, which them gently receyued, and after they had done their message, he answered them, that he in no wise would be agaynst the lawe of God, and if the court of Rome would adiudge that the matrimonie were not good, he would be content, but he thought all other wise, for he solicited the Pope and all the Cardinales which were his fricndes to stande by the dispensation, which he iudged to be as strong as Gods lawe. After this aunswere they tooke their leaue of the Emperoz, which the next weeke after departed out of Bononie towarde Almaine in good order of battaile, he himselfe in gilt harness, and his Nobles in white harness, with rich coates and trappers very curiously besene.

After that the Emperoz was gone out of Bononie, the Ambassadors of of England tooke their leaue of the Bishop of Rome, which went towarde Rome againe, and returned toward England, through the Duchie of Millain, which were receyued by the Erie Lodouicke, great Counsaylor to the Duke of Millayn, which Erie conducted them through the whole Duchie of Millain, and payed all their charges by the Dukes commaundement. And when these Ambassadors were passed the Mountaynes, they receyued letters from the king, which appoynted the Erie of Wilshire to go Ambassade to the French king, which then lay at Burdeaux making prouision for money for the redemyng of his children: and the Bishop of London was appoynted to go to Padua, and other Vniuersities in Italy to knowe their opinions in the kings case, and the kings Almoner was appoynted to returne into England, and so he did, thus was the ende of this Ambassade.

You haue heard before, howe the Cardinall was attainted in the Premunire, and howe he was put out of the office of the Chaunceloz, and lay at Asher: In this Lent season the king by the aduice of his Counsaile licenced him to go into his Diocesse of Porke, and gaue him commaundement to kepe him in his Diocesse, and not to returne Southward without the kings speciall licence in writyng.

So he made great prouision to go Northward, and apparailled his seruantes newly, and bought many costly thinges for his household, and so he might well ynough, for he had of the kinges gentlenesse the Bishopricks of Porke, and Winchester, which were no small thinges, but at this tyme diuers of his seruantes departed from him to the kinges service, and in especiall Thomas Crumwell one of hys chiefe Counsaile, and chiefe doer for hym in the suppression of Abbeyes. After that all thinges necessary for his iournay were prepared, he tooke hys iournay northwarde till he came to Southwell, which is in his Diocesse, and there he continued this yere, euer grudging at his fall as you shall heere after: but the landes which he had geuen to his Colleges in Oxford, and Ipswich, were nowe come to the kinges handes, by his attainder in the Premunire, and yet the king of his gentlenesse, and for fauour that he bare to good learning, erected againe the College in Oxford, and where it was named the Cardinales College, he called it the kinges College, and endewed it with sayre possessions, and put in new statutes and ordinaunces, and for because the College of Ipswich was thought to be nothing profitable, therfore he caused that to be dissolved.

The last Sommer while the peace was treated at Cambrey, as you haue heard before, Ferdinando brother to the Emperour, recovered certaine townes which the Turkes had taken from him in Hungry, and put to flight his enemy John de Uainoda, which falsly named himselfe king of Hungary. This Uainoda destitute of all succours fled to Sultan Soliman the great Turke, desirying him of succour, to recover Hungary agayne. The Turke beyng glad to haue an occasion to destroy Hungary, assembled a puissant army, and entered into Hungary, and made proclamation, that what towne or Citie would not obey king John as their king, should be put to fyre and sword. This proclamation feared the Hungarians, that all in maner yelded themselves subiects to the Uainoda, the Citie of Bude onely except: which at the last was yelded by composition, that they should depart with bag and baggage, but for all their safeconduite signed with the great Turkes hande,

they were first robbed of the Janizers, and after that shamefully slaine. When the Turke had thus Bude in possession, he left there the Uainoda and Lewys great Bastard sonne to the Duke of Venice, with fivie thousand footemen, and two thousand horsemen, and he with all hast entered into Au- strice, where his people committed such crueltie and tyranny, as neuer hath bene heard nor written, for of some they put out the eyes, of other they cut of the noses and eares, of other they cut off the priuie members, of women they cut off the Dappes, and rauished Virgins, and of women great woth childe, they cut their bellies and bzent the children: Beside this, as they pas- sed they bzent cozne, trees, houses, and all that woude be bzent, to make the Countrie desolate, and at the last the .xxij. day of September, the Turkes armie came nie to Wienne, a riche and a famous Citie in Austrice. The same was, that he had two hundred and fiftie thousand men in his army, and .xxv. thousand Tentes in the sight of the Citie.

And forasmuch as here is a good occasion geuen somewhat to speake of the vile tyranny of the Turkes, and namely for that I haue heard diuers say (but I trust they did not so inwardly think, as they outwardly spake) that it were no great matter if the great Turke were prince of all Christendome, for we should liue vnder him in a better and quyeter state of life then we do now, into the which erroz God forbid that any Christian person shoulde be caried: Therfore the better to expresse the mosterous tyranny of the Turke, I haue here thought meete to shew the wordes of Sebastian Munster as he expresseth the same in his learned booke of Cosmography.

When (sayth he) the Turke goeth to warre, he hath alwayes woth him a great troupe of people called Marquynions, which are byars and sellers of such prisoners as shall fortune to be taken, whome they call Sclaues and bondemen: And also there goeth with them a great number of Swozdplai- pers and Dapsters of fence. And in hope to haue some Sclaues, they do carry with them a great number of cheynes, Chables, boites and couples of Iron, and amonge their cheynes some are of such length that they may carry fiftie or three score persones in one cheyne, and one Willeyr shall haue the leading of so many.

These pyliererers, I meane the Marquynions and Swozdplayers so sone as any number of prisoners be taken, they sell and make marchandise of them, as they may lawfully do by their law, vpon this condicion that they shal pay vnto the Turke the tenth prisoner or Sclaue, and the rest they may retayne to their vse and commoditie. They haue no marchaundysle among them that is of greater trade, nor of greater gayne, then the byrnyng and sel- linyng of Sclaues and bondmen. And such prisoners as cometh into the Turkes handes, be they males or females he bseth them after this sorte, he selleth the aged and rude vnto housbandmen, and the yong boyes he com- mitteth vnto diuers schooles to be taught in some artes or craftes, and the yong wenches he sendeth also into certayne places to be taught to sow and knyt, and such other exercises, to the entent that afterward they may serue in the common weale more commodiously. And first he causeth them all to deny their fayth and then to be circumcised: and then are they trayned by in their ceremonies vnto the which by nature they are sone dratwone, & after he causeth them to bnderstand the lawes of y land. And if there be in them any strength of body and corage of minde, then he causeth them to be sent to the warres and calleth them Janizaries that is deniers of the faith. And if they haue no quicke spirite and yet mightie of bodre, then they are brought by and exercised in shootyng, and haue skolemaisters appoynted to make them excellent therein, and they are forced to render an accompt of their exercise with great extremitie, for those which hit not the white, haue so many tymes as they misse, so many lashes with a whip, and some they bring by in swozde playnyng, and in the exercise of other weapons.

The mayden children that are any thing betwifull are taken to be their Concubynes and Harlots, or at the least to wayte and attend vpon them, to whome they commit most lothsome and filthie busynesse, such as to heare the same named would abhorre any honest good eare.

When they haue newe slaues, they begin with terrible punishmentes, and afterwardes with grieuous threathings, and if that preyale not, then they vse gentle wordes and fayre promises to procure them to be circumci- sed. And as soone as they bring that to passe, then they vse them with much more gentleness. And if any attempt to escape, the payne of fyre is ordry- ned for him. They doe licence the slaues wyllingly to marry, but the children that they bring forth are solde at the discretion of the maister, wherefore the wife and sage be well aduised before they marry.

They doe cruelly intreat those that will not be circumcised. The estate of them which haue no handie craftes is very euill, for they shall learne no- thing there (except they be circumcised) wherefore the priestes and such as are students, and the Gentlemen which haue bene brought by without oc- cupations, are in the worst state of all other when they happen into their handes: For the Marquinion will lay out nothing for them, nor dispend anye thing vpon them, because when he should sell them, he knoweth not who wyll geue any thing for them. These are carryed bareheaded, barefoo- ted and almost all naked. They dratwe them through the frostes, snowes and other the rocks and Mountaynes, both in heate and colde, and they haue neuer rest vntill they die, or else that they chaunce vpon an unhappie maister. There is none so blessed nor fortunate of what estate, age, bebotie or arte soeuer he or they be of, that may be suffered to go into a lodging, if he chaunce to fall sick by the high wayes side. And if any be sick, they force him to go on foote, and if he can not, they set him vpon an euill fauoured Fade: And if he cannot ryde nor holde fast, then they binde him ouerthwart the horse lyke a Male behinde a Saddle. And if he die, then such clothes as he hath vpon him, they pull off and throwe him into the next dicke. But to go forward, they doe not onely lead them captiues and prisoners in cheynes (as is afozesayde) but also they manacle their handes with suche long Boltes as kepeth the one of them from the other a whole yard space, for feare that one of them should fight with another, and also for feare lest they should throwe stones at their keepers. And when night dratweth on, then also they fetter their legges and turne them byside downe, so that they lye openly in the fieldes gapyng into the ayze, and there must rest to abide what weather so- euer cometh.

The enterteynment of the women is somewhat more gentle: they that are strong, marche afoze on fote (but not bymanackled) and suche as are but

For when they are shut vp in close places, they are compelled to suffer the filthy company of the Marquions, most beauly to abuse them, for all the night long is heard among them most pittifull cryes and lamentations made by the yong persons as well Males as females, whome they most wickedly enforce and filthy order, yea they are so vylanous that they spare not their awne little children of sixe or seuen yere of age, so wicked, byle and prone is that nation unto that abhominable sinne agaynst nature.

The Marchaunts come together and agree vpon a price: But before the Marchaunt paye his money: the slaue shall be striped starke naked that hys maister may see him, and then he beholdeth all hys members, and gropeth and sceleth all hys ioynts, to see if there be any fault or maine in hym. If the Marchaunt doe not lyke hym, then is he returned agayne unto the charge of the Marchaunt. And thus shall he be alwaies bled until such time as a Marchaunt bieth him outright. And when the byer hath bought him, he maye at his pleasure put him to what slavery or grievous labour he himselte lust, be it neuer so byle, and also to vse suche punishment of him, as putting on fetters or collers of yron, and whipping naked with rodde made of wyers or any other cruell punishment that he can deuise, not forcing though he die thereof. If any chaunge to be taken with their wiues and family, those the great Lordes doe willingly vse to put them into their deuyres, & to haue the ouersight of their groundes, their wyues and their Pastures, but the children that are bozne of them are bond.

The Gospell
may not be preached in Turquy.

Sermons and preaching of the Gospell of Christ is vtterly forbidden through all Turky: neither shall it be lawfull for any christian man to beare any office in Turky: Neyther to carie any armes, nor to go appareled lyke a Turke. If any doe rayle or outrage at a christian man, or at Jesu Christ, he must be content and holde his peace. And if any chaunce to talke or comon any thing agaynst their religion, the same shall be circumcised in spight of his heart. And if any open their mouth to speake agaynst Mahomet, the same shall be brent quick. The christians doe paye the fourth part of all their frutes, not onely for the rent of their landes, but also for the gayne and profite that they receiue of their handie craftes and occupations. Besides thys, they pay another imposition, which is set vpon them by the polle, for so many heades as euery christian hath in his house, so many Ducates he shall pay yere y vnto the Turke. If the parents be not able to paye it, then will they take take away the children, and sell them to pay that money, and so bring them into seruitude and bondage. The other number that are fast in Chaynes they go from house to house begging their a mose, and if by that meanes they cannot get wherewithall to paye, then are they put in perpetuall prison, and neuer more suffered to come abroade. And thus much wyrteth Whylster of the tyranny of the Turkes.

The Turke
assaulteth
the Citie of Vienna.

At the beginning of the siege, the Turke sent certaine to the Lordes of the towne, and willed them to yelde the towne vnto him, and they should depart with bagge and baggage, and if they would kepe it by force, he would surely haue it and put them all to the sword. Now in the Citie was Capitaine Duke Philip of Bavier, Erle Palatine of the Rine, and nephew to the Palsegraue elector, a yong man of Noble courage, and wyth him were twentie thousand Almaynes, and two thousand horsemen, which nothing feared the Turkes threathynge. The Turke perceiuyng their boldnesse, bent his great ordinaunce, which were thre hundred peeces agaynst the walles, and commaunded the towne to be assaulted: the Turkes gaue a great assault, but the Christen men valiantly defended them, so that the Turkes were compelled to flie, and many of them were slaine.

The fourth day of October, the Turke bent all his ordinaunce agaynst the wall, which so shooke the wall, that all men within supposed that the walles would haue fallen downe, but they did little harme, which was soone amended. The sixt day of October, viij. thousand christen men issued out of the towne, and came where the Turkes Miners were working, and slue a great number and destroyed the mines. The same day the Turkes gaue a great assault to the Citie: the Christen men valiantly them defended, and threw downe great loggs, and barres of yron, and slue many Turkes. Thus the Turkes assaulted the Citie a leuen tymes, and so many tymes they were beaten away, but the great and terrible assault was the .xij. day of October, at the which assault the christen men so valiantly defended themselves, and slue and hurt so many of the Turkes, that after that day for no commaundement that the Turke could geue, they would no more geue assault.

The Turke perceiued well both the strength of the Citie, and the courage of the Capitaynes within, and also the winter there was muche more colder then in his countries, which sore troubled him & his people, wherefore he called his Counsaile, and concluded to breake by his siege and to depart, and so the .xiiij. day of October he shot great stones into the Citie all day till night: and about ten of the clocke in the night he caused his tentes to be taken vp, and set fyre on the straw, and such other stufte, and so remoued all his armie, towarde Bude, sayng fiftie thousand horsemen which taried all the next day behinde, carryng with him a great number of Christian prisoners, which he put to the wyues, and such other vile seruite. At this siege the Turke lost by murder, sicknesse, and colde, aboue .lxxx. thousand men, as one of his Bassades did afterwarde confesse.

The number of the turkes
that died.

Thus was the Citie of Vienna defended agaynst the great Turke, and at his power, which was to him a great displeasure, and in especially because he neuer besieged Citie before, but eyther it was yelded, or taken.

and Barbarie, there to employ themselves on Christs enemies, which lord

In this yere, the wilde Irishemen knowyng the Erle of Kildare to be in Englande, entered his lande, and spoiled and byent his Countrey, and di-uers other Countries, and the Erle of Offery being the kinges Deputie, made little resistance, for lacke of power, wherefore the king sent the Erle of Kildare into Ireland, and with him Sir William Skeuyngton knight, Mayer of the kinges ordinaunce, and diuers Gunners with him, which so politikely ordered themselves, that their enemies were glad to offer amends and to treat for truce, & so Sir William Skeuyngton the next yere returned into England leauyng there the Erle of Kildare for the kinges deputie.

The Emperour as you have heard the last yere, passed out of Italy into Germany and was receyued with great honor and triumph into the City of Ausborough or August, where in June were present all the electors and almost all the Princes of the Empire: there was kept a great counsaile, for the Princes of Germanie were of two seuerall opynions, and of seuerall names, the part that fauored the Pope and all thinges done by his authority were called Catholical, and the other part which folowed and preached onely the Gospell of Christ were called Euangelicall. Of these and other thinges concerning our sayth there were many counsailes: but Cardynall Campeius the Popes Legat would not suffer the Euangelicall persons (whom he called Lutherans) to argue against the Catholical men (whome the Euangelicall persons called Papistes) least by opening of the scripture the auctority of the Court of Rome should haue bene damned, and therfore the Emperour put off the matter till another time: But this matter was not so let slippe, for of this mocion men so serched the law of God that within a few yeres after, many people refused the Pope for the head of the Churche and forsooke him and his pardons.

Proclamation.

On the. xix. day of September in the Citie of London was made this proclamation. The kings highnesse straightly chargeth and commaundeth that no manner of person of what estate, degre or condicion soeuer he or they be of, do purchase or attempt to purchase from the court of Rome or else where, nor vse and put in execution, diuulge, or publish any thing heretofore within this yere passed, purchased, or to be purchased hereafter, containing matter preiudiciall to the high auctoritie, iurisdiction and prerogatiue royall, of this his sayd realme, or to the let, hynderaunce or impechment of his graces noble and vertuous entended purposes in the premisses, bypon paine of incurring his highnesse indignation and imprizonment and farther punif-ment of their bodies for their so doing at his graces pleasure, to the dreadfull example of all other.

This proclamation was much mused at, and euery worde of the same well noted. Some sayd that it was because that the Queene had purchased a new Bull for the ratification of her marriage, other saide that it was made because the Cardinall had purchased a Bull to curse the king, if he would not restore him to his olde dignities, and that the king should suffer him to correct the spiritualtie and he not to meddle with the same. This inuencion sounded most to the truth as you shall here afterward.

You haue heard in the last yere, howe the Cardinall of Porke was at-tainted in the Premunire, and that notwithstanding the king had geuen him the Bishoprikes of Porke and Winchester, with great plentie of substance, and had licenced him to lie in his Dioces of Porke. He being thus in his Dioceses grudgynge at his fall, and not remembryng the kinges kindnesse shewed to him, wrote to the Court of Rome, and diuers other Princes letters in re-proche of the king, and in asmuch as in him lay, he stirred them to reuenge his cause against the king and his realme, insomuch that diuers opprobrious wordes of the king, was spoken to Docto Edward Kerne the kinges Orator at Rome, and it was sayde to him that for the Cardinalles sake, the king should haue the worse speede in the suite of his matrimonie. The Cardinall also would speake sayre to the people to winne their heartes, and declared euer that he was vniustly, and vntreuly ordered, which sayre speakyng made many men beleue that he sayd true, and to Gentlemen he gaue great gistes to allure them vnto him. And to be had in the moze reputation among the people, he determined to be installed or inthronised at Porke, with all the pompe that might be, & caused a trone to be erected in the Cathedrall Church in suche an heighth and fashion as was neuer sene, and sent to all the Lordes, Abbottes, Priors, Knightes, Esquiers, and Gentlemen of his Dioces, to be at his manor of Cabod the sixt day of Nouember, and so to bring him to Porke with all maner of pompe and solemnitie.

The pride of the Cardinall

The king which knewe his doynge and priue conueyance, all this yere dissimuled the matter to see what he would do at length, till that he sawe his proude heart so high exalted, that he would be so triumphantly installed, without makyng the king priue, yea and in maner in disdaine of the king, thought it not meete nor conuenient to suffer him any lenger to continue in his malicious and proude purposes and attemptes: wherefore he directed his letters to Henry the sixt Erle of Northumberland, willyng him woth all diligence to arrest the Cardinall, and to deliuer him to the Erle of Shrewsbury great steward of the kinges household: When the Erle had seene the letter, he with a conuenient number came to the Manor of Cabod, the fourth day of Nouember, and when he was brought to the Cardinall in his Chamber, he sayd to him, my Lorde, I pray you take pacience, for here I arrest you. Arrest me sayde the Cardinall, yea sayd the Erle, I haue a commaundement so to do: you haue no such power sayde the Cardinall, for I am both a Cardinall and a Legate de Latere, and a Peere of the Colledge of Rome, and ought not to be arrested by any tempozall power, for I am not subiect to that power, wherefore if you arrest me, I will withstand it: well sayde the Erle, here is the kinges Commission (which he shewed him) and therefore I charge you to obey, the Cardinall somewhat remembred himselfe and sayde, well my Lorde, I am content to obey, but although that I by negligence fell into punishment of the premunire, and lost by the law all my landes and goodes, yet my person was in the kings protection, and I was pardoned that offence, wherefore I maruaile why I nowe should be arrested,

The Cardy-
nall arrested.

arrested, and specially considering I am a member of the sea Apostolike, on whom no tempoꝛall man ought to lay violent handes: well I see the king lacketh good Counsaile. Well sayde the Erle when I was sworn Warden of the Marches, you your selfe tolde me, that I might with my staffe arrest all men vnder the degree of a king, and nowe I am moze stronger, for I haue a Commission so to do which you haue seene. The Cardinall at length obeyed, and was kept in his priuie Chamber, and his goodes sealed, and his officers discharged, and his Whisition called Doctoꝛ Augustine, was likewise arrested, and brought to the Tower by sir Walter Welthe, one of the Kinges Chamber. The sixt day of Nouember he was conveyed from Ca- wood to Sheffielde Castell, and there deliuered to the Erle of Shrewsburie keepyng, till the Kinges pleasure were knowne: Of this attachement was much commonyng amongst the common people, wherefoze manye were glad, for surely he was not in the fauoz of the commonaltie.

When the Cardinall was thus arrested, the king sent Syr Wylliam Kyngston knight, Capitayne of the Garde, and Constable of the Tower of London with certaine of the yomen of the Garde to Sheffield, to fetch the Cardinall to the Tower. When the Cardinall sawe the Capitayne of the Garde, he was sore astonnyed and shortly became sick, for then he perceyued some great tronble toward him, and for that cause men sayde that he wyl- lingly tooke so much quantitie of strong purgation that his nature was not hable to beare it: But Syr Wylliam Kyngston comforted him, and by easie iorneyes he brought him to the Abbay of Leicester the .xxvij. day of Nouem- ber, where for very feeblenesse of nature caused by purgations and vomites he dyed the second night folowing, and in the same Abbay lyeth buried. This Cardinall as you may perceyue in thys storie was of a great stomach, for he compted himselfe egall with Princes, and by craftie suggestion gat into his handes innumerable treasure: He forced litle on Symony and was not pittifull and stood affectionate in his awne opinion: In open presence he would lye and say vntruth, and was double both in speech and meaning: He would promise much and performe litle: He was vicious of his body and gaue the clergie euill example: He hated sore the Citie of London and feared it: It was tolde him that he should die in the waye toward London, wherefoze he feared least the commons of the Citie would arise in riotous maner and so sleigh him, yet for all that he dyed in the waye toward London. The autho- rite of this Cardinall set the Clergie in such a pryde that they disdaind all men, wherefoze when he was fallen they folowed after as you shall heare.

After the Cardinall was deade, the king remooued from Hampton Court to Grenewiche, where he wyth Queene Katheryn kept a solempne Christmas, and on the twelue night he sat in the hall in his estate, where as were diuers Enterludes, riche Maskes and disportes, and after that a great Banket. And after Christmasse he came to his Manoz of Westmyn- ster, which was called Porke place, for after that the Cardinall was attayn- ted in the Pꝛemunire and was gone Northwarde, he made a feoffement of the same place to the king, and the Chapter of the Cathedrall Church of Porke by their wytyng confirmed the same feoffement, and then the king chaunged the name and called it the Kinges Manoz of Westminster and no moze Porke place.

The

The whole Clergie of Englande euer supported and mayntayned the power Legantyne of the Cardinall, wherefoze the Kinges counsaile learned sayde plainely that they were in the Pꝛemunire, the spirituall Lordes were called by procelle into the Kinges Benche to aunswere, but befoze their daye of apperaunce they in their Conuocation concluded an humble submission in wytyng, and offered the king a hundred thousande pounde to be their good Lorde, and also to geue them a pardon of all offences touchyng the Pꝛemunire by act of parliament, the which offer with much labour was accepted, and their pardon promised. In this submission the Clergie called the king supreme head of the Church of Englande, which thing they neuer confessed befoze, whereupon many things folowed after as you shall here.

The king
first named it pꝛemunire.

When the parliament was begun the sixt day of January, the pardon of the spirituall persons was signed with the Kinges hande and sent to the Lordes, which in tyme conuenient assented to the Bill and sent it to the commons in the lower house, and when it was red, dyuers frowarde persons would in no wise assent to it, except all men were pardoned, sayng that all men which had anye thing to doe with the Cardinall were in the same case: the wyser sort aunswored that they would not compell the king to geue them his pardon, and beside that it was vncharitably done of them to hurt the Clergie, and to doe themselves no good, wherfoze they aduised them to con- sent to the Bill and after to sue to the king for their pardon, which counsaile was not folowed, but they determined first to sende the speaker to the king or they would assent to the Bill, whereupon Thomas Audely speaker for the commons with a conuenient number of the common house came to the Kinges presence and there eloquently he declared to the king how the commons sore lamented and bewayled their chaunce to thinke or imagine themselves to be out of his gracious fauour, because that he had graciously geuen his pardon of the Pꝛemunire to his spirituall subjects and not to them, wherfoze they most humbly besought his grace of his accustomed goodnesse and clemency to include them in the same pardon.

The king wisely answered that he was their prince and soueraigne Lord, and that they ought not to restraine him of his libertie, nor to compell hym to shew his mercy, for it was at his pleasure to vse the extremity of his lawes or mitigate and pardon the same, wherfoze sithe they denyed to assent to the pardon of the spirituall persons, which pardon he sayde he might geue with- out their assent by his great seale, he would be well aduised or he pardoned them, because he would not be noted to be compelled to do it: with this aun- swere the speaker and the commons departed very sorowfnill & pensiue, and some light persons sayd that Thomas Crumwell which was newly come to the fauoz of the king had disclosed the secrets of the commons, which thing caused the king to be so extreme.

The kyng like a good prince considered how sorowfull his Commons were of the aunswere that he had made them, & thought that they were not quyet, wherfoze of his owne motion he caused a pardon of the Pꝛemunire to be drauone, and signed it with his hand and sent it to the common house by Christopher Hales his attornay, which Syll was sone assented to. Then the Commons louingly thanked the king and much prayfed his great wise- dome that he had denied it to them when they vnwoꝛthely demaunded it, and had bouifully grauted it when he perceyued that they sorowed & lamented.

While the Parliament sate, on the .xxx. day of Marche at after noone there came into the common house the Lord Chauncelloz and diuers Lords of the Spirituallie and Tempozallie to the number of twelue, and there the Lord Chauncelloz sayde, you of this worshipfull house I am sure be not so ignozant but you know well that the kyng our souereigne Lord hath married his brothers wife, for she was both wedded and bedded with his brother prince Arthure, and therefore you may fuerly say that he hath married his brothers wife, if this mariage be good or no many Clerkes do doubt. Wherefore the king like a berteous prince willing to be satisfied in his conscience and also for the fuerie of his realme hath with great deliberation consulted with great Clerkes, and hath sent my Lord of London here present to the chiefe Uniuersities of all Chyristendome to knowe their opinion and iudgment in that behalfe. And although the Uniuersities of Cambridge and Oxfozd had bene sufficient to discusse the cause, yet because they be in his realme and to auoide al suspition of partiality, he hath sent into the realme of Fraunce, Italy the Popes dominions, and Venisians to knowe their iudgment in that behalfe, which haue concluded, witten and sealed their determinations accordyng as you shall here red. Then Sir Bryan Tuke tooke out of a booke twelue wrytinges sealed, and read them worde by worde translated out of latin into the English tongue.

After these determinations were read, there were shewed aboue an hundred booke drawne by Doctozs of straunge Regions, which all agreed the kinges Maryage to be vnlawfull, which were not red, for the day was spent. Then the Chauncelloz sayd: Now you of thys common house, may reporte in your countries what you haue seene and heard and then all men shall openly perceyue that the king hath not attempted this matter of will or pleasure, as some straungers reporte, but onely for the discharge of hys conscience and fuerie of the succession of his realme: this is the cause of our repayze hether to you, and now we will depart.

When these determinations were published, al wise men in the realme much abhorred that mariage: but women and such as were more wilfull then wise or learned, spake against the determination, and sayde that the Uniuersities were corrupt and entysed so to do, which is not to be thought. The king himselfe sore lamented his chaunce and made no manner of mirth nor pastime as he was wont to do, and dined and resorted to the Queene as he was accustomed, and minished nothing of her estate, and much loued and cherished their daughter the Lady Mary: but in no wise he would not come to her bed. When Ester began to draw nere, the parliament for that time ended, and was proroged till the last day of Marche, in the next yere.

In the Parliament aforesayde was an act made, that whosoever did poyson any person should be boyled in hote water to the death: which act was made bycause one Richard Roose, in the parliament time had poysoned diuers persons at the Bishop of Rochesters place, which Richard, according to the same acte, was boyled in Smythfield the Teneber Wednesday following, to the terrible example of all other.

This wynter season, on the .xxvi. day of January, in the Citie of Lymborne in Dorsetshire, was a wonderous Earthquake, which destroyed many up houses and Towres, and slew manye people by the falling downe of the same, the kinges pallace shooke so, that he and the Queene and the Ladies fled out of their Pallace, without any seruauntes, and sought succoz where they might get it, and sodaynly the quaking ceased: Then the rockes opened, and out sprang the water, then the shippes in the haue were like to haue perished: Then the Earth quaked againe, and did more harme then before, and at night it ceased: By which Earthquake, many men were murdered and destroyed.

When the vniuersitie aforesayde, and a great number of clerkes and well learned men had determined the kinges mariage to be vnlawfull, detestable, and against Godes law, as you haue heard, the king wylling the Queene to haue knowledge of the same, sent to her diuers Lordes of the counsaile the last day of Maye being the Wednesday in whittson weeke: the which Lordes, in her chamber at Greenewiche, declared to her all the determination as you haue heard, and asked her whether she woulde for the quyetnesse of the kinges conscience, put the matter to foure Prelates, and foure Tempozall Lordes of this realme, or abyde by her appele. The Queene answered: the king my father which concluded my mariage, I am sure, was not so ignozant but he asked counsaile of clerkes and well learned men before he married me the second time: for he had had any doubt in my mariage, he would not haue disbursed so great a treasure as he did, and then all Doctozs in manner agreed my mariage to be good, insomuch that the Pope himselfe, which knew best what was to be done, did both dispruce and ratefie my seconde mariage againe whose doynges I meruaile that any man wyll speake or wryte: And as to the determination of the Uniuersitie, I am a woman and lack wyt and learning to aunswere to them, but to God I commit the iudgement of that, whether they haue done iustly or percially: for this I am sure, that neyther the kinges father, nor my father would haue condiscended to our mariage, if it had bene declared to be vnlawfull: and where you saye that I should put the cause to eyght persons of this realme for quyetnesse of the kings conscience, I praye God sende his grace a quyet conscience: and thys shall be your aunswere: That I say I am hys lawfull wyfe, and him lawfully maryed, and by the order of the holy Church I was to him espoused as his true wyfe, although I was not so worthy, and in that point I will abide till the Court of Rome which was priuie to the beginning haue made thereof a determination and finall ending. With thys aunswere the Lordes departed to the king, which was sozie to heare of her wilfull opinion, and in especiall that she more trusted to the Popes lawe, then in keeping the precepts of God.

The king like a polittique prince, perceiued that the Marchant straungers, and in especiall Italyans, Spanyards & Portyngales daylie brought Gade, Oyle, Silke, Clothes of Golde, Veluet, and other Marchaundise into this realme, and therefore receyued readie money, which money they euer deliuered to other Marchauntes by exchange, and neuer employed the same money on the comodities of this realme, so that thereby the king was hyndered in his custome outwarde, and also the comodities of his realme were not vttered, to the great hinderance of his subiectes: wherefore he caused a proclamation to be made in Midsummer Terme, accordyng to an olde Statute made in the time of king Rycharde the second : That no person should make any exchaunge contrarie to the true meaning of the same Act and Statute , upon payne to be taken the kings moztall enemye, and to for- feyt all that he might for feyt . After thys proclamation, many clothes and o- ther commodities of this realme were well solde, but shortly after War- chauntes fell to exchaunge agayne, and the Proclamation was shortlye for- gotten.

The king and the Queene after Whytfontide remoued to Windsor, and there continued tyll the .xiiij. day of July, on which day the king remoued to Woodstock and left her at Wyndsoze, where she laye a while, and after remoued to the Moore, and afterward to Estamsted: and after this day the king and she neuer sawe together. Wherefore the common people daylie murmured and spake their foolish fantasies. But the affayres of princes be not ordered by the common people, noz it were not conuenient that all things were opened to them.

The king
sendeth certaine Lords to the Queene to perswade
her to consent to the deuy-sment.

After this the king sent certayne Lords to the Queene to Estamsted, to aduise her to be confirmable to the laboure of God, and to letre vnto her, that all the Uniuersities had cleerely determined, that the Pope could in no wise dispence with her mariage, and therefore the dispensation to which she most trusted of all, was clerely voyde and of none effect. These, with many mo causes and aduiseiments were declared to her, which nothing moued her at all, but still she sayde: Truly I am the kings true wyfe, and to him mar- ryed: and if all Doctors were dead, or law, or learning so farre out of mans minde at that time of our mariage, yet I can not thinke that the Courte of Rome, and the whole Church of Englande would consent to a thing un- lawfull and detestable (as you call it) but still I say I am his wife, and for him will I pray. With this aunswere the Lordes departed, and came to the king and made report as you haue heard.

This mariage was not alonely talked of in Englande, but in Fraunce Spayne, Italy, yea, through all christendome in maner, and especially in the Emperours Court, in so much as a great Marques of Spaine sayde to Syr Nicholas Haruy knight being the kings Ambassadoz in the Emperours Court at Gaunt: My Lozde Ambassadoz of England, I maruaile not a little why the king your maister dalyeth so with the Emperours Aunte, shee is descended I assure you of a noble bloud, and high parentage, the Empe- rours Maiestic maye not noz wyll not suffer such inturie to be done to hys bloud and lynage, that she should whole .xxij. yeres and moze serue him as his wyfe and bedfelow, and now to reiect her, what prince y maner is that, therein is neyther loue noz loyaltie: For if a pooze betlet had so long serued a Prince, what heart could he haue then reiected him or put him from him: it can not be sayd that your king is well counsayled: the matter is much mar- uayled at amongst Christian Princes, and thinke her not to be honestly handeled nor honorably: And if it be so that she be not his wife (because shee was once his brothers wyfe) as your Doctors say and affirme, then no man can excuse your king nor say but that she hath beene euill handeled, and kept like a Concubine or Paramour for the bodily appetite, which is a great spot, shame and rebuke to her, and to her whole lynage, which spot no waies can be sponged out nor recompenced, for shame in a kyndred can by no treasure be be redeemed: If the king your maister remember well this matter, he shall fynde that it transcendeth farre aboute the losse of earthly possessions, I would he would be better aduised.

The Englyshe Ambassadour answered: My Lozde, my commission extendeth not to aunswere this matter, but to enforze you of the truth, I will somewhat say beside my commission: first I say to you, that the king my maister neuer ment in this matter but honorably, truly, and vertuously, both for the pleasure of God and the profite and suretie of his realme, noz neuer was noz will be any Prince that euer was better contented and pleas- sed with a woman then he hath bene with her, noz neuer prince moze loued, cherished, noz honoured a woman then the king my maister hath done her, and would with heart, minde, and will her still keepe as hys wyfe, if Gods lawe would suffer it: My Lozde if you remember well all thyng, you shall fynde that this doubt was first moued in the counsaile of Spayne, when the Emperour and the King of Englande were agreed, that the Emperour should marry the Ladie Marie the kings daughter: vpon that comunica- tion this doubt was put to the Emperours counsaile, whether shee were the kings lawfull daughter or not, because that it was well knowne that he had maryed his brothers wyfe.

In Answer

This matter was not so secret but it spred into the counsaile both of Fraunce and Flaunders to the great defamacion of the king of Englande, and to the great vncertainetie of the succession of his realme, whereof when he was aduertised, I thinke neuer prince tooke it moze sorowfully noz moze heauily, and for satisfiing of his conscience, he called his Clergie and felt their opinions, and not trustyng his awne subiectes onely (which I en- sure you be excellently learned) sent to all the Uniuersities of Fraunce, Ita- ly, and dyuers other realmes to knowe their iudgements in this case, and surely the king my maister sore lamenteth this chaunce, and bewyleth the tyme mispent if it so succede, for then is his realme destitute of a lawfull heyre begotten of his bodie, which is the greatest displeasure that maye come to a prince: the mariage was well ment both of the kings father and the Queenes father, and they maryed together by the aduise and coun- saile of their friendes, and louingly continued together as man and wyfe without any scruple or doubt, tyll you of Spayne moued first the question and put the mariage in ambiguitie, and therefore you cannot with honour thinke but that the king hath done lyke a wise prince to searche out the soluti- on of your doubt, which so neere toucheth his soule and the suretie of his realme: And all thing that he hath done, he hath done by great aduiseiment, and with a great deliberation, wherefore no reasonable man can saye but he hath done lyke a wise and verteous prince. The Marques hearing thys aunswere sayde, that the king did wisely to trie the truth, and was somewhat ashamed of that that hee had spoken, as I was enforced by them that were present.

You haue heard before how the Clergy in their conuocation had graun- ted to the king the somme of one hundred thousand pounde to be pardoned of the Premunire: for leuyng of the which somme, every Bishop in hys Dioces called before hym all the Priestes as well Chauntrie and parrythe Priestes, as Persones and Vicars, amongst whome Doctor John Stoke-

ney Bishop of London, a man of great witt and learning, but of little discretion and humanity (which caused hym to be out of the fauor of the common people) called before him all the Priestes within the Citie of London, whether they were Curates or Stipendiaries, the first day of Septēber beyng Fryday, in the Chapter house of saynt Paull, at which day the Priestes appeared, and the Bishoppes policie was to haue onely six or eyght priestes together, and by perswasion to haue caused them to graunt some portion toward the payment of the foresayde one hundreth thousand pounde, but the number of the priestes was so great, for they were six hundred at the leaste, and with them came many Tempozall men to heare the matter, that the Bishop was disapointed of his purpose: for when the Bishops Officers called in certaine priestes by name into the Chapter house: with that a great number entred, for they put the Bishops Officers that kept the doze a side. After this the Officers got the doze wut agayne: then the priestes without sayde: We wyll not be kept without, and our fellowes be within: we knowe not what the bishop will doe with them. The Tempozall men beyng present stomoked and comforted the priestes to enter, so that by force they opened the doze, and one strake the Bishoppes Officer ouer the face and entred the Chapter house, and many Tempozall men with them, and long it was or any s'p'ence coulde be made: & at last when they were appeased, the Bishop stood by and sayd: Brethren, I maruaile not a litle why you be so heddy and know not what shal be said to you, therfore I pray you to kepe silence and to heere me patiently: My friendes all, you know well that we be men frayle of condicion and no Angelles, and by traylty and lack of wisdom we haue misdeaned our selues toward the king our Soueraigne Lorde and his lawes, so that all we of the Clergy were in the P'remunire, by reason wherof, all our promotions, landes goodes, and Catelles, were to hym forfayte and our bodyes ready to be enprisoned, yet his grace moued with pitie and compassion, demaunded of vs what wee coulde say why he shoulde not extend his lawes vpon vs, then the fathers of the Clergye humbly besought his grace of mercye, to whome he answered that he was euer enclyned to mercy: then for all our great offences we had litle penaunce, for where he might by rigor of his law haue taken all our liuelod, goodes and Catelles, he was contented with one hundred. M. poundes to be payde in fiue yeres: and although that this somme be moze then we may easly beare, yet by the rygor of his lawes we shoulde haue borne the whole burden: wherfore my brethren, I charitably exhorte you to beare your partes of your liuelod and salary toward the payment of this somme graunted. Then it was shortly sayde to the Bishop: My Lorde twentie nobles a yere is but a bare liuing for a priest, for now bittaille and euery thing in maner is so dere, that puerie in maner inforceth vs to say nay: beside that, my Lorde we neuer offended in the P'remunire, for we neuer medled with the Cardinalles faculties, let the Bishops and Abbottes which haue offended pay. Then the Bishops officers gaue to the priestes high wordes, which caused them to be the moze obstinate. Also diuers tempozall men which were present comforted the priestes, and bade them agree to no payment. In this rumoz, diuers of the Bishops seruautes were buffeted and stricken so that the Bishop began to be afrayde, and with sayre wordes appeased the noyse, and for all thinges which were done or sayde, there he pardoned them and gaue to them hys blessing, and prayed them to depart in charitie. And then they departed thinking to heare no moze of the matter, but they were deceyued, for the Bishop went to sir Thomas Hooze then beyng Lorde Chaunceloz (which greatly fauoured the Bishop, and the Clergie) and to him made a grieuous complaint and declared the fact very grieuouly, wherupon commaundement was sent to sir Thomas Barginoz Maioz of the Citie, to attache certaine priestes and tempozall men, and so. xv. priestes, and fiue tempozall men were arrested, of the which, some were sent to the Tower, some to the flete, and other prisons, where they remayned long after.

In this season were diuers preachinges in the realme, one contrary to another concernyng the kings mariage, and in especiall one Thomas Abell Clerke, both preached and wrote a Booke, that the mariage was lawfull, which caused many simple men to beleue his opinion: This Abell was the Quenes Chaplaine, and wrote this booke to please her withall: Wherfore the king caused a determination of the Uniuersities, and all the iudgements of great Clerkes to be compyled into a Booke, and to be printed, whiche Booke did satisfie the myndes of all indifferent and discrete persons: But some men were partiall, that neyther learnyng, noz reason could satisfie their wilfull myndes.

This yere the king kept his Christmasse at Greenwich with great solemnitie, but all men sayde that there was no mirth in that Christmasse, because the Queene and the Ladies were absent.

After Christmasse, the. xv. day of January the Parliament began to sit and amongest dyuers griefes which the Commons were grieued with, they forecomplained of the crueltie of the Ordinaries, for calling men before them Ex officio: that is, by reason of their office: For the Ordinaries would send for men, and lay accusations to them of Herisie, and saye they were accused, and lay Articles to them, but no Accuser shoulde be brought forth, which to the Commons was very dreadfull and grieuous: for the party so assited must either abiure or be burned, for Purgation he might make none.

The Parliament.

When this matter and other Cractiōns done by the Clergie in theyr Courts were long debated in the common house, at the last it was concluded and agreed, that all the griefes which the tempozall men were grieued with, should be put in writyng, and deliuered to the king, which by great aduice was done: Wherfore the. xvij. day of March the Common speaker accompanied with diuers Knightes and Burgeses of the Common house, came to the kings presence, and there declared to him how the Tempozall men of his realme were sore agriened with the cruell demeanour of the prelates and Ordinaries, which touched both their bodies and goodes, at which griefes, the Speaker deliuered to the king in writyng, most humbly beseeching his grace to take such an order and direction in that case, as to his high wisdom might seeme most conuenient. Further he beseeched the king to consider what paine, charge and cost, his humble subiectes of the nether house had susteyned sith the beginning of this Parliament, and that it would please his grace of his Princely benignitte to dissolve his Court of Parliament, that his subiectes might repayre into their Countre.

sed a while, and then sayde : it is not the office of a king which is a Iudge to be to lyght of credence, noz I haue not, noz will not vse the same : for I will heare the partie that is accused speake or I giue any sentence : your Booke containeth diuers articles of great and weightie matters, and as I perceiue it is agaynst the Spirituall persons and prelates of our Realme, of which thing you desyre a redresse and a reformation, which desire and request is meere contrariaunt to your last petition : for you require to haue the parliament dissolved and to depart into your countries, and yet you would haue a reformation of your grieues with all diligence. Although that your paines haue bene great in taryng, I assure you mine hath bene no lesse then yours, and yet all the payne that I take for your wealthes, is to me a pleasure: therefore if you will haue profite of your complaint, you must tary the tyme, or else to be without remedie : I much commend you that you will not contend noz stand in strife with the Spirituall men, which be your Christen brethren but much moze me thinketh that you should not contend with mee, that am your soueraigne Lorde and king, considering that I seeke peace and quietnesse of you : for I haue sent to you a Bill concerning wardes and primer feason, in the which thinges I am greatly wronged : Wherefore I haue offered you reason as I thinke, yea, and so thinketh all the Lordes, for they haue set their handes to the Booke : Therefore I assure you, if you will not take some reasonable ende nowe when it is offered, I will search out the extremitie of the law, and then will I not offer you so much againe : With this aunswere, the Speaker and his companie departed. The cause why the king spake these wordes was this : Feoly men made feoffements of theyr landes to their bles, and declared their willes of there landes with such remainders, that not alonely the king, but all other Lordes lost their Wardes, Mariages, and relieves, and the king also lost his primer feason, & the profite of the lyuerey, which was to him very preiudiciall, & a great losse : Wherefore he, like an indifferent Prince, not willyng to take ail, noz to lose ail, caused a Bill to be drawn by his learned counsaile, in the which was deuised, that every man might make his will of the halfe of his land, so that he left the other halfe to the heyre by discent. When this Bill came first amongest the Commons, Lord howe the ignozant persons were grieued, and how shamefully they spake of the Bill, and of the kinges learned Counsaile : But the wise men which vnderstoode & saw the mischiefe to come, would gladly haue had the Bill to be assented to, or at the least to haue put the king in a suretie of the thirde or fourth part, which offer I was credibly informed the king would haue taken : But many frowarde and wilfull persons, not regarding what might ensue (as it did in deede) would neither consent to the Bill as the Lordes had agreed & set to their handes, noz yet agree to no reasonable qualification of the same, which afterward they soze repented: for after this, the king called the Iudges, and best learned men of his realme, & they disputed this matter in the Chauncery, and agreed that lande could not be willed by the order of the Common lawe : Whereupon an act was made, that no man might declare his will of no part of his lande : which Act soze grieued the Lordes and Gentlemen that had many children to set forth. Therefore you may iudge what mischiefe commeth of wilfull blindnesse, and lacke of foresight in so great causes.

This Parliament was prozoged till the tenth day of Aprill, in the which Parliament was an Act made, that Bischoppes should pay no moze Annates or money for their Bulles to the Pope : for it was openly proued, that there was payde for the Bulles of Bischops, since the fourth yere of king Henry the seventh, the kinges father, till this yere, one hundredeth. lx. thousande pounde sterlyng, besyde all other Dispensations, and pardons, whereof the summe was incredible.

When the Parliament was begonne againe after Easter, there came downe to the Common house the Lorde Chaunceloz, the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, the Erles of Arundell, Orford, Northumberland, Rutland, Wilshire, and Suffer, and after they were set, the Lorde Chaunceloz declared, how the king was aduertised by his Counsaile, and in especiall by the Duke of Norfolke, how on the Marches betwene England and Scotland was very litle habitation on the Englishe syde, but on the Scottishe side was great habitation, and the Scottes dwelled euen lust on the Border, by reason whereof they inuaded Englande dyuers tymes, and did to the kinges subiectes great hurt, and displeasure : Wherefore the king intended to make dwelling houses there, and also to make newe diuers pyles and stoppes to let the Scottishe men from their inuasions, to the great commodity of all his people there dwelling, which things could not be done without great cost : Wherefore considering the kinges good entent, he sayde that the Lordes thought it conuenient to graunt to the king some reasonable aide toward his charges, and prayed the Commons to consult on the same, and then he and all the Lordes departed.

After their departure, the Commons considering the kinges good entent, louyngly graunted to him a fiftene toward his charges, but this graunt was not enacted at this Session, because that sodainly became a Pestilence in Westminster, wherefore the Parliament was prozoged till the next yere.

In this yere was an olde Colle demaunded in Flaunders of Englishe men, called the Colle of the Hounde, which is a Riuer and a passage : The Colle is. xij. pence of a fardell. This Colle had bene often tymes demaunded but neuer payed : insomuch that king Henry the seventh, for the demaund of that Colle prohibited all his subiectes to kepe any Hart at Andwarpe or Barow, but caused the Hartes to be kept at Calice : at which tyme it was agreed that the sayde Colle should neuer be demaunded, so that the Englishe men would resort againe into the Dukes Countrie, and after that, it was not demaunded till nowe : Wherefore the king sent Doctor Knight, and other to Calice, and thether came the Emperours Commissioners, and the matter was put in suspence for a tyme.

We haue heard befoze how the king had purchased the Bishop of Porke place, which was a fayre Bischoppes house, but not meete for a king : Wherefore the king purchased all the Medowes about saint James, and all the whole house of saint James, and there made a fayre Hansson and a Marke, and buyde many costly and comodious houses for great pleasure, which now is called saint James house.

In the beginning of this yere, the Lady Anne Bulleyme was so much in the kinges fauour, that the common people which knewe not the kinges true entent, sayde and thought that the absence of the Quene was onely for her her sake, which was not true : for the king was openly rebuked of preachers for keping company with his brothers wife, which was the occasion that he eschued her companie, till the truth were tryed.

The king calleth the speaker and certain other of the comon house unto him and deliuereth them the answers that the clergy made to articles deliuered to the king the last yere.

The last day of Aprill the parliament sytting, the kyng sent for Thomas Wodeley speaker of the common house, and certaine other, and declared to them, how they had exhibited a booke of their greues, the last yere agaynst the spiritualtie, which at their requestes, he had deliuered to his spirituall subiectes, to make aunswere there to, but he could haue no aunswere, till within thre dayes last past, which aunswere he deliuered to the speaker sayng : we thinke their aunswere will finally please you, for it seemeth to vs very slender, you be a great sort of wisemen, I doubt not but you will looke circumspectly on the matter, and we will be indifferent betwene you. And for a truth their aunswere was verie Sophistical, and nothing auoyding the griefes of the laye people : and farther the king sayde, that he marryled not a little, why one of the parliament house spake openly of the absence of the Queene from him, which matter was not to be determined there, for he sayd it touched his soule, and wished the matrimony to be good, for then had he neuer bene bered in conscience, but the Doctozs of the Universities sayde he, haue determined the mariage to be voyde, and detestable before God, which grudge of conscience, caused mee to absteyne from her company, and no foolish or wanton appetite : for I am sayde he. xij. yere olde, at which age the lust of man is not so quick, as in lustie youth : and sayng in Spayne and Portyngall it hath not bene sene, that one man hath marryed two sisters, the one being carnally knowne before, but the brother to mary the brothers wyfe was so abhorred amongst all nations, that I neuer heard it, that any christen man did it, but by my selfe : wherefoze you see my conscience troubled and so I pray you report : so the speaker departed, and declared to the commons the kinges sayng, both of the spirituall mens answer, and also concerning the kinges mariage, which slight aunswere displeaseth the commons.

The occasion why the king spake of this mariage, was because one Temse in the common house, moued the commons to sue to the king to take the Quene againe into his company, and declared certaine great mischiefs, as in Bastarding the Ladie Marie the kings onely childe, and diuers other inconueniences, which wordes were reported to the king, which was the cause that he declared his conscience.

The king ayme sendeth for the speaker and other and deliuereth them an othe for the Clergy.

The. xi. day of May, the king sent for the speaker againe, and twelue of the common house, hauing with him eight Lordes, and sayde to them, welbeloued subiectes, we thought that the Clergie of our realme had bene our subiectes wholly, but now we haue well perceyued that they be but halfe our subiectes, yea, and scace our subiectes : for all the Prelates at their consecration made an othe to the Pope, cleane contrarie to the othe that they make to vs, so that they seme to be his subiectes, & not ours, the copy of both the othes I deliuer here to you, requiring you to inuent some order, that we be not thus deluded of our spirituall subiectes. The speaker departed, and caused the othes to be red in the common house, the berye tenour whereof ensueth.

As therto the Pope.

Othe to the king.

The opening of these othes, was one of the occasions, why the Pope within two yere following, lost all his iurisdiction in England, as you shall heare afterward. The. xiiij. day the parliament was proroged till the fourth day of Februarie next ensuyng. After which prorogation, Syr Thomas Moore Chauncelloz of Englande, after long sutes made to the king to be discharged of that office the sixtene day of May, he deliuered to the king at Westminster, the great seale of Englande, and was with the kings fauor discharged, discharged, which seale the king kept till whitson tyde following, and on the Monday in whitson weeke, he dubbed Thomas Wodeley speaker of the parliament knight, and made him Lord keeper of the great Seale, and so was he called.

A new league

The king beyng in progresse this Sommer was aduertised that the Pope and the French king had appoynted to meete at Harcelles in Pro-uince, in the beginning of the next spring, wherefore the king lyke a wyse and pollitike prince, thought it conuenient to speake with the French king in his awne person, before the Pope and he should come together, and to declare to him both the determinatiō of the Uniuersities and Doctozs, concerning his matrimonie, and also the generall counsayles, which ordeyned suche causes, to be tried in the prouinces and Countreys, where the doubt should ryse, trusting that the French king should cause the Pope to encline to Gods lawe, and to leaue his awne traditions, and boyde dispensations, wherebpon both the princes concluded to meete in October following, betwene Calice and Bulleyn: wherefore the king of Englande sent out bys letters to his nobilitie, prelates, and seruauntes, commaundyng them to be readie at Cauntzburie, the xxvj. daye of September, to passe the Seas with him, for the accomplishynge of the enteruew betwene him and his brother the French king. Many men were sozpy to heare, that the king should passe the Sea in winter, and especially in October, when the seas be rough, but their sayings letted not his purpose: for he marched forward from Ampthill to Wyndsoze, where on Sunday beyng the first day of September, he created the Ladie Anne Bulleyn, Marchionesse of Penbroke, and gaue to her one thousand pounde lande by the yere, and that solemnitie finished, he rode to the Colledge to Masse, and when the Masse was ended, a newe league was concluded and swozne, betwene the king and the French king, Messire Pomozay the French Ambassadoz then being present. After which othe taken, Doctoz Fox the kings Amner made an eloquent oration in Latin, in praise of peace, loue, and amitie: which done the Trumpets blew, and the king returned to the Castel, where was kept a solempne feast. From thence the king remoued to Grenewich, & so forward to Cauntzburie, where at the day appointed, he found redie furnished al such as were commaunded to passe the sea with him, wel & richely adourned, both they and their seruauntes.

The tenth day of October, the king came to Douer, and on the xi. day in the morning beyng Fryday, at three of the clocke, he tooke chyping in Douer rode, and before ten of the clocke the same daye, he with the Ladie Marchionesse of Penbroke landed at Calice, where he was honorably receyued with procession, and brought to Saint Nicholas Churche, where he heard Masse, and so to his place called the Exchequer, where he lodged, and on the Sundaye after came to Calice, the Lord Roche Baron, and Mounseur de Moutpesat, messengers from the French king, aduertising the king of Englande, that the French king would repayre to Abouille the same night marchynge toward Bulleyn, of which tydings the king was verie glad: but sodainly came a messenger and reported that the great Maister of Fraunce, and the Archebishop of Roan, with dyuers noble men of Fraunce were come to Sandifield, intending to come to Calice, to salute the king, from the king their maister. He beyng thereof aduertised, sent in in great haste the .xv. day of October, the Duke of Norfolke, the Marques of Excester, the Erles of Orford, Darby, and Rutlande, the Lord Sandes, and the Lord Fitzwater, with three hundred Gentlemen, which honorably receyued the French Lordes at the Englishe pale, and so brought them to the kings presence in Calice, which stood vnder a rich cloth of estate of such value that they muche mused of the ryches. The king (as he that knewe all honoz and nurture) receyued the French Lordes very louingly and amiably, and with them tooke a day and place of meeting: these Lordes were highly feasted, and after departed to Bulleyn.

While the king lay thus in Calice, he beved the walles, towers, and Bulwarkes, and deuised certaine newe fortifications, for the maintenance and defence of the towne. The towne of Calice had at this season .xxiiij. C. beddes, and stabling for two thousand horses, beside the villages adiacent.

The twentieth day of this moneth, the king beyng aduertised, that the French king was come to a Village called Marguison nigh to the Englishe pale, marched out of Calice the next day after, accompanied with the Dukes of Norfolke and Suffolke, and with the Marques of Dorset and Excester, the Erles of Arrondell, Orfode, Surrey, Essex, Derby, Rutlande, Huntingdon, and Suffex, and diuerse Viscountes, Barones, knights of the Garter, and Gentlemen, freshly appareled, and richly trymmed, and so passed toward the place, appoynted for the enteruew, leuing behind them the greatest part of the yomen of Calice, because that Bulleyn was to litle for both the traynes. For the Frenchmen sayde their trayne was twentie thousande horse, which caused the Englishmen to cast many perilles, and especially because it was bruted abroad, that the French king should saye the king of England was once his enemy, and mayntayned the Emperoz and the Duke of Burbon against him, & now was become his most friende. The rehering of these olde grudges, many Englishmen suspected, and very loth that the king should go to Bulleyn, but the king continued still in his iourney, and came to Sandingfield, and a litle from that place in a valey, was the French king nobely accompanied with three hundred horse, and not many more. The kinges trayne waied on the left hande, to geue the French king and his trayne the right hande: likewise did the French part, to geue the Englishmen the right hand: so the two kinges with all louing honoz, met with bare heddes, and embraced other in such fashion, that all that beheld them reioysed. And at their meeting the French king sayd openly, to the king of England: Syr you be the same persone, that I am moste bounde to in the worlde, and sith it hath pleased you, in persone to visite me, I am bound in person to seke you, and for the very friendship, that I haue found in you, I am yours and will be, and so I requyre you to take me: the king of England soberly answered, if euer I did thing to your liking I am glad, and as touching the payne to come hether to se you, I assure you it is my comfort, yea, and I had come farther to haue visited you. Then the kinges embraced the Lordes and estates, as the French king the Lordes of England, and the king of England the Lordes of Fraunce, and that done, they set forward toward Bulleyn, and in ryding they cast of Haukes called Sakers, to the kytes, which made to them great spozte. And in a valey beyond Sandingfielde, the king of Nauer met the Kinges, and there they alighted and dranke, and after that they mounted on horsebacke, and with hauking and other princely pastime, they came nere to Bulleyn, where on a hyl stode ranged in a fayre bande, the number of five hundred men on horsebacke, of whome the chiefe were, the french kinges three sonnes, the Dolphin, the Duke of Orleans, and the Duke of Angouleme, and on them gaue attendaunce, the Admirall of Fraunce, and thre Cardinales, with diuerse other nobles of Fraunce, these three Princes marched forward, and welcomed the king of Englande: which them well behelde and louingly them receyued, as he that coude as much nurture, as any Prince that eu er was. Then the french king sayd to his children openly: My children I am your father, but to this Prince here you are as much bounde, as to me your naturall father, for he redemed me and you from captiuitie: wherefore on my blessing I charge you, to be to him louing alwayes. The king of Englande ceased the french kinges tale, and embrased the yong Princes, eche after other. Then all the noble company came to Bulleyn, where was a great shot of Artillery, for on the one side they shotte great pelletes, which made a great noise: then these two Princes offered at our lady of Bulleyn and the french king brought the king of Englande to his lodging, in the Abbay directly against his owne lodging, where the king of England had diuerse chambers richly furnished. Euery man was appoynted to his lodging (which there was very strayght) according to his degree, and great chere was made to all the Englishmen: the Poultries, Larders, Spicers, and sellers of wine were all open, and likewise Hay and Litter, and all other thinges, aske and haue, and no man durst take any money, for the french king payd for all.

In the Church of Bulleyn was a trauers set vp by the french king, open on euery syde sauyng it was sieled with blew beluet, embraudered with flower Delices of gold, the pillers were hanged with the same worke: On the french kinges right hande, was another trauers sieled, and curtined all of white Hatten, embraudered with Cables cast, of cut cloth of Golde, embraudered and gilted after the fashion that Mariners call their ropes: this trauers was balenced of lyke worke, and fringed with fine golde. Dayly the kinges heard their Masses in these trauerses, and commonly they went together to Masse. Diuers tymes the kinges commoned together in counsaile, and sometye in the moornyng or the Princes were stirryng, their Counsailes met, and sat together a great whyle.

While the king of England lay thus at Bulleyn, the french king to the w himselfe lounyng to the noble men of England, the .xxv. day of October, called a Chapiter of the Companions of his order, called Saint Michell, of whom the king of Eng'and was one, and so there elected Thomas Duke of Norfolke, and Charles Duke of Suffolk, to be companions of the sayde Order, which were brought into the sayd Chapiter, and had their Collers deliuered to them, and were sworne to the Statutes of the Order, their obeyfaunce to their souereigne Lorde, alwayes reserued: which Dukes thanked the french king, and gaue to the officers of Armes two hundred Crownes a peece. And these two kinges rested at Bulleyn, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, and on Friday the .xxvi. day of October, they departed out of Bulleyn to Calice: the french kinges traine was twelue hundred persons, persons, and so many horse or more, and without Calice two myle, met with them the Duke of Richmond, the kinges bastard sonne of England, a goodly yong Prince, and full of fauour and beautie, with a great companie of noble men, which were not at Bulleyn, so the Duke with his companie, embraced the french king, and so did other noble men, then the Lordes of England set forward, as the dukes of Richmond, Norfolke, and Suffolke the Marques of Excester, the Erles of Arundell, Oxford, Surrey, Darby, Worcester, Rutlande, Suffex, and Huntingdon, the Viscountes of Lille, and Rochford, the Bishops of London, Winchester, Lincolne, and Bath, the Lorde William Haward, the Lorde Watreuerse, the Lorde Montacute, the Lorde Cobham, the Lorde Sandes, the Lorde Gray, the Lorde Montdant, the Lorde Leonard Gray, the Lorde Clinton, and sir William Fitzwilliam knight, treasurer of the kings house, & sir William Paulet, Comptroler of the same, with a great number of knightes, besyde the lustie Esquiers, and yong Gentlemen. These noble personages and Gentlemen of England accompanied the french Lordes to Newnam Bridge, where as Thomas Palmer Capitaine of the Fortresse, with a fayre companie of Souldiours saluted the kinges, and so they passed towarde Calice: where at their coming, that what out of the towne and Castell, and what out of Ricebanke, and the Shippes in the Hauen, the frenchmen sayde they neuer heard such a shot: and when they were entered the Mill gate, all the Souldiours of the towne stode on the one syde, appareled in red and blewe, and on the other syde of the stretes, stode all the seruyng men of England in cotes of french Tawney, with their Lordes and Maisters deuises embraudered, and euery man a Scarlet Cap and a white feather, which made a goodly shewe: there were lodged in Calice that night, besyde the towne dwellers, eight thousand persons at the least. The King of England brought the french king to his lodging, to the Staple Inne, where he was most honourably lodged, and all thinges furnished that belonges to the same. If the french king made good cheere to the king of England, and his traine at Bulleyn, I assure you he and his traine, were requited at Calice, for the plentie of wilde foule, Venison, fishe, and all other thinges which were there, it was maruaile to see, for the kinges Officers of England, had made preparation in euery place, so that the frenchmen were serued, with such multitude of diuers fishes, this Friday and Saterday, that the Maisters of the french kinges household, much wondered at the prouision. In likewise on the Sunday, they had all maner of flesh, foule, spice, Venison, both of falow Dere, and red Dere, and as for wine they lacked none, so that well was the Englishe man that might well entertaine the french man: the Lordes of Fraunce neuer fetched their biandes, but they were sent to them, and often tyme their propozcion of bitaile was so aboundant, that they refused a great part thereof.

While the kinges were thus in Calice, they roade euery day to saint Marie Church, where were set two trauerses, the one for the french king: the other for the king of England. The Sunday at night, the french king supped with the king of England. The french king was serued with thre courses, and his meate dressed after the french fashion, and the king of England had like courses after the English fashion, the first course of euery king was .xl. dishes, the second .lx. the third .lxx. which were costly and pleasant. After supper, per, was a sumptuous and royall maske.

The Tuesday next following, being the .xxx. day of October, the two kinges departed out of Calice, and came nere to Sandingfield, and there alighted in a fayre greene place, where was a Table set, and there the English men serued the French men of wine, Iporras, fruite, and spice abundantly. When the two kinges had comuned a little, they mounted on their horses, and at the very entring of the French ground, they tooke handes, and with Princely countenance, louyng behaviour, and hartie wordes, eche embraced other, and so there departed.

The kinges departure.

While the king of England was in the French kinges dominions, he had the upper hande, and likewise had the French king in his dominion, and as the French king payed all the English mens charges at Bulleyn, so did the king of England at Calice, so that euery thing was recompensed: sayyng that the king of England gaue to the French king, diuers precious iewels, and great horses, and to his Nobles great plentie of Plate, for the which I could neuer heere, that he gaue the king of England any other thing, but the white Cowne, as you haue heard, but to the Lordes of the kings counsaile, he gaue certaine Plate and Chaynes.

When the king was returned to Calice, many Gentlemen tooke shippe to sayle into England, but the winde was so contrariant, that diuers of them were drinen backe againe into Calice, and diuers into Flaunders, and in November rose such a winde, out of the North and Northwest, that all the shippes in Calice haue were in great leopordie, and in especiall the Hoxes, at which season was such a spring tyde, that it brake the walles of Holland, and Zelend, and drowned diuers townes in Flaunders, insomuch that the water rose three foote above the Wharfe, where the Key stood in Andwarp: This storme continued till the fourth day of November, but for all that the winde chaunged not. The .viij. day rose such a winde, tempest, and thunder, that no man could conveniently stirre in the stretes of Calice: much lamentation was made for them that had taken shippe into Englande, for no man knew what was become of them. On Sunday the weather was fayre, the king caused his bed and other thinges to be shipped, and intended to depart, but sodainly rose such a mist, that no Maister could guyde a shippe, and so he tarped that day. On Tuesday at midnight he tooke ship, and landed at Dover the morow after, being the .xiiij. day of November, at fife of the clocke in the morning, wherfore the Saturday after, was song Te Deum in the Cathedral Church of Saint Paule in Lonvon: The Lord keeper of the great seale, the Maior of London, (and diuers other noble and sad persons, which made their abode in London, for the gouernaunce of the realme in the kings absence) being present. The king after his returne, married princely the Lady Anne Bulleyn, on saint Erkenwaldes day being the last day of Aprill.

A great flood in Holland and Zelend.

The king married to Lady Anne Bulleyn.

When the king should passe over the sea, he considered that the Scottes had robbed his subiects, both by sea and land, and that no redresse was made for the same, imagined that in his absence they would attempt some outrageous enterprize against his people, wherfore like a prudent Prince, to be in a furetie, he sent sir Arthur Darcy knight, with three hundred tall men to Barwicke, to defend the inuasions of the Scottes. The Scottes heeryng of his coming, came into Northumberland, by the middle Marches, and came to a place a place called Fowbery, and in their iourney fired certaine villages and returned. Sir Arthur Darcy heeryng of this aduenture, was nothing content. Now at this season they lay at Barwicke, Archibalde Douglas Erle of Angus, which had married the Queene of Scottes the kings sister, and was banished Scotland, and she was from him diuorced, and married to another. The Scottes bragged of their enterprize, & sayd that sir Arthur had brought them good lucke, and sayd, that he and the Erle of Angus, slept well in Barwicke: they heeryng of this brag, made a roade with foure hundred men into Scotland, and set a village on fire: then shortly assembled together. viij. hundred Scottes. When the Englishmen perceyued the Scottes, they caused their trumpet to blow a retreat, and the Erle and .xx. with him, shewed him selfe on a hill, euen in the face of the Scottes, and the trumpet blew at their backes, so that the Scottes thought that there had beene two companies, which caused the Scottes to fle, and the Englishmen folowed, and slew a great number, and tooke many prisoners, and brought them to Barwicke the .xx. day of October.

Margaret Queene of Scots diuorced from the Erle of Angus, and married to another.

The king this yere kept his Christmasse at Greenewich, and after Christmasse sir Thomas Ardeley, Lord keeper of the great Scale, was made Chaunceloz of England, and when the Parliament began, because the office of the Speaker was boyde, Humfrey Wingfielde of Grayes Inne, was elected Speaker of the Parliament, which was presented accordyng as you haue heard of the other Speaker before. In the which Parliament was made an acte, that no person should appeale for any cause out of this realme, to the Court of Rome, but from Commissary to the Bishop, and from Bishop to Archbishop, and from Archbishop to the King, and all causes of the King, to be tryed in the upper house of the Conuocation. And in the same Parliament was enacted, that Queene Katheryn should from thenceforth, be no more called Queene, but princes Dowager of prince Arthur.

Sir Thomas Ardeley made chaunceloz.

All appeales to the Court of Rome to be bidden.

Queene Katheryn called Princes Dowager.

In this Sommer season last past, died William Warham Archbishop of Cauntorbury, and to that Bishopricke was named Doctor Thomas Cranmer, the kings Chaplajn, a man of good learning, and of a veruous life, which also not long before, was the kings Ambassadour to the Bishop of Rome, which was consecrate in Lent.

Thomas Cranmer elected Archebishop of Cauntorbury.

After the King perceyuyng his newe wife Queene Anne, to be great with childe, caused all officers necessary, to be appoynted to her, and so on Easter eue, she went to her Closet openly as Queene, with all solemnitie, and then the king appoynted the day of her coronation, to be kept on Whitsun Sunday next following, and writynges were sent to all Shriues, to certifie the names of men of fortie ponde, to receyue the order of knightthod, or else to make a fine: the asselment of which fines, were appoynted to Thomas Cromwell, maister of the kings Jewell house, and Counsayloz to the king, and newly in his high fauor, which so pollitikely handeled the matter, that he rayled of that selluyng of fines, a great somme of money to the kings vse: Also the king wrote letters to the Citie of London, to prepare Pageauntes agaynst the same coronation.

The Ladye Anne Bulleyn openly published to be Queene.

The king in the beginning of this .xxv. yere, kept the day of Saint George, at his Manor of Greenewich, with great solempnitie, and the Court was greatly replenished, with Lordes, knightes, and with Ladies and Gentlewomen, to a great number, with all solace and pleasure. You haue heard the last yere, how the Parliament had enacted, that no person shoulde after a day, appele to Rome for any cause, whatsoeuer it were, and that the Quene, now called the princes Dowager, had appealed to the court of Rome, befoze the acte made, so that it was doubted, whether that appeale were good or not. This question was well handled in the parliament house but much better in the Conuocation house, but in both houses it was alleged yea, and by bookes shewed, that in the Counsailes of Calcedon, Africke, Coletane, and diuers other famous Counsailes in the primatiue Church yea, in the time of Saint Augustine, it was affirmed, declared, and determined, that a cause rising in one prouince, should be determined in the same, and that neyther the patriarcke of Constantinople, shoulde medle in causes moued in the iurisdiction of the patryarcke of Antioche, nor no Bishop shoulde entermit, with in an others prouince or countrey: which thinges were so clerly opened and so conningly set forth to all intentes, that euery man that had witte, and was determined to follow the truth, and not affectionate nor wilfully wedded to his owne minde, might plainly se that all appeles made to Rome, were clerly boyde and of none effecte: which doctrines and counsailes, were shewed to the Lady Katerin Princes Dowager, but shee (as women loue to lose no dignitie) euer continued in her olde song, trusting more to the Popes parciality, then to the determination of Christes berytye. Wherebpon the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, accompanied with the Bishops of London, Wynchester, Bathe, Lincolne, and diuerse other great Clerkes, in a greate number roade to Dunstable, which is six myle from Amphyl, where the princes Dowager lay, and there by a Doctoz called Doctoz Lee, she was assited to appere befoze the said Archebishop, in cause of matrimony, in the sayde towne of Dunstable, & at the day of apparaunce she woulde not appere, but made defaute, and so she was called peremtozpe, euery day fiftene dayes together, and at the last for lack of apparaunce, and for contumacie, by the assent of all the learned men there beyng present, shee was dinorsed from the king, and there marage declared to be boyde and of none effecte, which sentence geuen, the Archebshoppe and all the other returned whether it pleased them.

In the moneth of Maye Pope Clement sent an Oratoz to the kyng at Grenewich certefying hym that he had appoynted a generall counsaile to be kept at Mantua the yere folowing, and therof had aduertised al princes Christen, requiring the king likewise as he did all other princes Christen for the vniuersall welth of all Christendome, and for the quieting of opinions newly growne, to appere there personally: to the which it was answered that it was bothe ieoperdous for the king, and for his whole realme to haue their Prince absent for feare of inuasions by outward enemies, but he sayde he would send thether a sufficient procuraty and conuenient Doctozs, and desired to see the Oratoz's commission.

When he with an euill wyll had shewed his commission, there appered neyther place nor time of the counsaile. For the king knewe well befoze hys comming that the Marques of Mantua had made a full deniall to the Pope that he would haue no such assemble to be kept in his Citie nor dominions, for dyuers great and bygent causes, and so the Popes Oratoz departed with

The King beyng aduertised by the Frenche king howe that he and the Pope shoulde meete at Aece in June folowng, thought it couenient to send a solemne Ambassade to the Frenche king both to accompany him to Aece, and also to common with the Byshop of Rome concerning his vnlawfull stay in the kinges deuorise: wherbyon he appointed the Duke of Norfolke, the Lorde Rocheford brother to the newe Queene, Sir William Pawlet Comptroller of the kings household, Syr Anthony Browne, and Syr Fraunces Bryan knightes to be his Ambassadors, which made great prouision for that purpose, and so with the number of .C.lx. horses came to Douer and so to Calice on Whitso euen (on which day the Quene made her entrie through the Citie of London towarde her coronation) where they made their abode a certayne space, and passed through all Fraunce till they came to Lyons, where they remayned a space as you shall heare after.

This berie season was daylie skirmishing betweene the borderers of the Marches of Englande and Scotlande, and yet no warre proclaymed, and many robberies, murders and manlaughters done on both partes, and although the Comissioners of the realmes of England and of Scotland at Newcastel vpon Tyne were entreating a truce & amittie, yet during the communication the Scottes ceased not to robbe both by sea and lande, and toke dyuers little botes laden with cozne and fishe, whereof hearing the king of Englande, he decked and bittayled diuers shippes of warre, and sent them to the North seas to defende his subiectes. The Scottes hearing that the Englishe Hauie was come on their coste, in all haste fledde home to their harbor, but yet the Englishe men folowed them, and fetched manye of their prayes out of their hauens mauger of their heades.

In the beginning of Maye the king caused open proclamations to be made that all men that claymed to doe any seruice or execute any office at the solemne feast of the coronation, by the way of tenoz, graunt or prescription should put their graunt three weekes after Easter in the Starre chamber befoze Charles Duke of Suffolke for that time high stewarde of England and the Lorde Chaunceloz and other commissioners.

The Duke of Norfolke claymed to be Erle Marshall and to exercise his office at that feast. The Erle of Arondell claymed to be high Butler and to exercise the same: the Erle of Orford claymed to be Chamberlayne: the Vicount Lille claymed to be Panter: the Lorde Burgaine to be chiefe Larderer, and the Lorde Bzaye claymed to be Almoner, and Syr Henry Wiat knight claymed to be Crower: Al these noble personages desired their offices with their fees. Beside these the Maior of London claymed to serue the Quene with a Cup of Golde and a Cup of assay of the same, and that twelue Citezens should attende on the Cupborde and the Maior to haue the Cup, and Cup of assay for his labor, which petition was allowed. The fiue Portes claymed to beare a Canapie ouer the Quenes head the day of the coronation with foure guilt Belles, and to haue the same for a rewarde, which also to them was allowed. Diuers other put in petie claymes which were not allowed, because they seemed onely to be done at the kings coronation. All this season great purueiaunce was made of all maner of Vitailles, and Lordes, knightes and Squiers were sent for out of all Countries, which came to London

After that the kings highnesse had addressed his gracious letters to the Maior and commonaltie of the Citie, signifying to them that his pleasure was to solempnise and celebrate the coronation of his most deare and welbeloued wyfe Quene Anne at Westminster the Whitsonday next ensuing, willing them to make preparation as well to fetch her grace from Grenewiche to the Tower by water as to see the Citie ordered and garnished with Pageiantes in places accustomed, for the honor of her grace. When she should be conueyed from the Tower to Westminster, there was a common counsaile called, and commaundement was geuen to the Haberdashers (of which craft the Maior s<sup>r</sup> Stephen Decock then was) that they should prepare a Barge for the Batchelers with a waster and a foyst garnished with Banners and streamers, likewise as they vse to doe when the Maior is presented at Westminster on the morowe after Symon and Jude. Also all other craftes were commaunded to prepare Barges and to garnishe them not onely with their Banners accustomed, but also to deck them with Targets by the sides of the Barges, and to set vp all suche seemely Banners and Bannozets as they had in their halles or could get meete to furnishe their sayde Barges, and euerye Barge to haue mynstrelle, according to which commaundements great preparation was made for all things necessarie for suche a noble triumph.

The xix. day of May the Maior and his brethren all in Scarlet, and such as were knights had collers of Esses and the remnaunt hauing good Chaynes, and the counsaile of the Citie with them assembled at saint Marthe byll, and at one of the clock dissended to the Newstayre to their Barge, which was garnished with many goodly Banners and streamers, & richely covered, in which Barge were Shalmes, Shagbushes and dyuers other instruments, which continually made goodly armony. After that the Maior and his brethren were in their Barge seing that al the companies to þ number of fiftie Barges were readie to wayte vpon them. They gaue commaundement to the companies that no Barge should rowe neerer to another then twice the length of the Barge vpon a great paine. And to see the order kept, there were thre light Wheryes prepared, and in euery one of them two officers to call on them to keepe their order, after which commaundement geuen they set forth in order as hereafter is described.

First before the Maiors Barge was a foyst or waster full of ordynance, in which foyst was a great Dragon continually mooung, and casting wilde fyre: and round about the sayde foyst stood terrible monsters and wilde men casting fire, and making hideous noyses: Next after the foyst a good distaunce came the Maiors Barge, on whose right hand was the Batchelers Barge, in the which were Trumpets and diuers other melodious Instruments. The deckes of the sayde Barge and the sailyardes and the top Castels were hanged with riche cloth of Golde and silke. At the foreship and the sterne were two great banners riche beaten with the armes of the king and the Quene, and on the top Castell also was a long streamer newly beaten with the sayde armes.

At thre of the clock the Quene appered in rich clothe of Gold & entered into her Barge accompanied with diuers Ladies and gentlewomē, and incontinent the Citizens set forwardes in their order, their Musicians continually playng, and the Batchelers Barge goyng on the Queenes right hand, which she toke great pleasure to behold. About the Queenes Barge were many Noble men, as the Duke of Suffolke, the Marques Dorset, the Erie of Wiltshire her father, the Erles of Arondell, Darby, Rutland, Worcester, Huintyngton, Suffex, Oxford, and many Bishoppes and noble men euery one in his Barge, which was a goodly sight to beholde. Shee thus being accompanied rowed toward the Tower, and in the meane waye the Shippes which were commaunded to lye on the thoze for lettynge of the Barges shot diuers peales of Gornes, and or shee landed there was a maruailous shot out of the Tower as euer was harde there. And at her landing there met with her the Lozde Chamberlaine with the officers of armes and brought her to the king, which receyued her with louyng countenance at the posterne by the water side, and kyssed her, and then she turned back agayne and thanked the Maior and the citezens with many goodly wordes, and so entered into the Tower. After which entry the Citezens all this while houed before the Tower, making great melodie and went not a land, for none were assigned to lande but the Maior, the Recorder and two Aldermen. But for to speake of the people that stood on euery thoze to behold the sight, he that sawe it not, will not beleue it.

On the next day being Whitson euen, the Quenes maiestie accompanied with a great number of Lozdes and Ladies richly appointed, came through the Citie of London which was richely bewtifified, and so passed to Westminster. And there in the middes of the hall she was taken out of her Chariote, and then she gaue her hartie thanks to the Lozdes and Ladyes, and to the Maior and other that had geuen their attendaunce on her and so withdrew her selfe with a few Ladyes to the Whitehall to the king by water.

The next day beyng Sondaye, she was crowned with all the solempnity and honor, that euer Quene of this realme was, and was as royally serued. And so soone as dinner was done, which was almost six of the clock at night, the Quene priuely returned by water to the king beyng at þ Whitehall. Then two daies after were holden before the kings gate royal Justes. And on Wednesday, the king sent for the Maior & his brethren to Westminster, & there he himself gaue to them hartly thanks, with many goodly wordes. On Midsummer day after, the Lady Mary the French Quene dyed in Suffolke, who was the late wyfe of Lewys the twelue, and after maryed to Charles Duke of Suffolke.

The seventh day of September beyng Sunday, betwene thre and foure of the clocke at after noone, the Quene was deliuered of a fayre Lady which day the Duke of Norffolke came home to the Christnyng, and for the Queenes good deliuerance, Te deum was song incontinently, and great preparation was made for the Christnyng: and the Maior and his brethren and xl. of the chiefe of the Citizens, were commaunded to be at the Christnyng, the Wednesday folowing, vpon which day the Maior s<sup>r</sup> Stephen Decocke, in a gowne of Crimessin Veluet, with his collar of SS, and all the Aldermen in Scarlette with Collers and Cheynes, and all the Counsaile of the Citie with them, tooke their Barge after Dinner, at one of the clocke, and the Citizens had another Barge, and so rowed to Grenewich, where were many Lozdes, knights, and Gentlemen assembled. The fount was of siluer, and stode in the middes of the Church, three steppes high, which was couered with a fine cloth, and diuers Gentlemen with Aperns, and Towels about their neckes, gaue attendance about it, that no filth should come in the fount, ouer it hung a square Canapie of Crimosyn Satten, fringed with golde, about it was a rayle couered with red Say: betwene the Quier and the bodie of the Church, was a close place with a panne of fire, to make the childe readie in: when all these things were ordered, the childe was brought to the hall, and then euery man set forward: first the citezens two and two, then gentlemen, Esquires, & Chapeleins, next after them the Aldermen, and the Maior, alone: next the Maior the kinges Counsaile, the kinges Chapell in Copes: then Barons, Bishops, Erles, then came the Erle of Essex, bearyng the couered Basong gilte, after him the Marques of Excester with the Taper of Virgin ware, next him the Marques Dorset, bearyng the salt, behind him the Ladie Mary of Nozfolke, bearyng the Cresom, which was verpe riche of pearle and stone, the olde Duches of Nozfolke bare the childe, in a Mantell of purple Velvet, with a long traine furred with Armine. The Duke of Nozfolke, with his Marshall, went on the right hand of the sayd Duches, and the Duke of Suffolke on the left hand, and before them went the officers of Armes: the Countesse of Kent bare the long traine of the childes Mantell, and betwene the Countesse of Kent, and the childe, went the Erle of Wilshire on the right hand, and the Erle of Darbie on the left hande, suppoztynge the sayd traine: in the middes cur the sayd childe was bozne a Canapie by the Lord Rochford, the Lord Hurst, the Lord William Harward, and by the Lord Thomas Harward the elder: After the childe folowed many Ladies, and gentlewomen. When the childe was come to the Church doze, the bishop of London met it with diuers Bishops, and Abbottes mitred, and began the obseruances of the Sacrament. The Godfather was the Lord Archbishop of Cantorbury: the Godmothers were the olde Duches of Nozfolke, and the olde Marchionesse of Dorset Widowes, and the childe was named Elizabeth. And after that all thing was done, at the Church doze the childe was brought to the Font, and christened, & this done, Garter chiefe king at armes cryed aloude, God of his infinite goodnesse, send prosperous life and long, to the high and mightie Princes of England Elizabeth: and then the Trumpets blew, then the childe was brought by to the Altare, and the Gospell sayd ouer it: and after that immediately the Archbishop of Cantorbury confirmed it, the Marchionesse of Excester beyng Godmother, the Archbishop of Cantorbury, gaue to the Princes a standyng Cup of golde, the Duches of Nozfolke gaue to her a standyng Cup of golde, fretted wyth pearle: the Marchionesse of Dorset gaue three gilt Boules, pounced with a couer: and the Marchionesse of Excester, gaue three standyng Boules grauen, all gilt with a couer. Then was brought in Wafers, Comfites, Pporras, in such plentie, that euery man had asmuch as he would desire. Then they set forwards, the trumpets goyng before in the same order, toward the kinges place, as they did when they came thetherwarde, sayyng that the giftes that the Godfather, and the Godmothers gaue, were bozne before the childe by foure persons, that is to say: first sir John Dudley, bare the gift of the Ladie of Excester: the Lord Thomas Harward the yonger, bare the gift of the Ladie of Dorset: the Lord Fitzwater, bare the gift of the Ladie of Nozfolke, and the Erle of Worcester, bare the gift of the Archebishop of Cantorbury, and all the one syde as they went, was full of staffe Torches, to the number of fife hundred, bozne by the Garde, and other of the kinges seruants, and about the childe were bozne, many other proper Torches bozne by Gentlemen: and in this order they brought the Princes to the Queenes Chamber, and tarped there a while, and at the last the Dukes of Nozfolke, and Suffolke, came out from the king, thankyng the Maior of London and his brethren, and commaunded them to geue all the other thanks in the kinges name: and from thence they were had to the Seller to drinke, and so went to there Barges.

About this season was espyed a newe found Saint, and holy Hipocrite, called the holy Mayde of Kent, which by the great labor, diligence, and paine takyng of the Archbishop of Cantorbury, and the Lord Cromwell, and one called mayster Hugh Latimer, a deuine (which shortly after was made Bishop of Worcester) the iugglyng and craftie deceit of this Mayde, was manifested and brought to light: whereupon after diuers examinations, shee with al her adherentes, were in Nouember brought to the starre Chamber: whose names were these, Elizabeth Barton, which was shee that called herselfe the holy Mayde of Kent, Richard Maister, priest, person of Aldington in the Countie of Kent, Edward Bockyng, Doctor in Diuinitie, Monke of Cantorbury, Richard Deryng, also Monke of Cantorbury, Edward Chwaites Gentleman, Thomas Laurence, Register to the Archdeacon of Cantorbury, Henry Golde, person of Aldermary, Bachelor of Diuinitie, Hugh Rich Frier Obseruaunt, Richard Risby, and Thomas Golde Gentleman. These all beeyng in the starre Chamber, before diuers of the kinges Counsaile, confessed their feyned hipocrisie, and dissimuled sanctitie, and trayterous purposes and intents, and they were there by the kings counsaile adiudged, to stand at Paules Crosse, where they with their owne hands, should deliuer eche of them to the preacher that should be appoynted, a bill declaryng their subtile, craftie, and superstitious doynges. Which then the next Sunday after, they all aboute reherfed, standyng on a stage at Paules Crosse, made for that purpose did accomplishe: but for their treasons committed, the matter thereof was respited to the Parliament next folowynge, where all they abovesayd, with other as after ye shall heere, were attainted by act of Parliament, and suffered death as traytors, by hangyng, drawyng, and quarteryng at Tyborne.

In September the king of Scottes, sent hys Commissioners to the towne of Newe Castell, where were for the kyng of Englande Commissioners, sir Thomas Clifford, and Doctor Magnus, and sir Raufe Elderkare. And first the Scottes without any long communication, demanded great amendes, sayyng, that the Englishmen had robbed and spoyled them to their losse, and that greatly, and sayde that the kyng of England of his honoz, must nedes make satisfaction, if he would be called honorable. Then it was answered, that notwithstanding the leagues, wrytten, sealed and sworn, the Scottish nation woulde neuer kepe peace, insomuch, whyle we be here intrating, treating, your people are robbing : whereioze the king demaundeth of you, the goodes and prisoners taken contrary to the peace, wherfoze we here deliuer you a writing, which the Scottes receyued, and at their next meeting they sayde, that the shippes to them were lawfull prizes, by reason that the Erie of Anguiche, was mayntayned in England, which is rebell to our king, and the Erie and you haue done to vs much skathe, and we haue taken a few shippes, in recompence of somme part of our great losses, which we maye not deliuer, and therfoze we pray you demaunde them not : but here we deliuer you our booke, which amounteth to a greater somme by ten thousande marke. The English Commissioners receyued the booke, and in the same the Scottes demaunded, recompence for burning their towncs, and destroyng many of their strong Pyles, aboue .xxiiij. which were destroyed from the .xxiiij. day of Apill, in the last .xxiiij. yere of the king, to the .xxx. daye of Apill. The Englishe Commissioners answered, that if the Scottes would sende to the king of Englande, they doubted not, but they should haue a good answer for the king of Englande bade them chose peace or warre : so they agreed to sende to both their kinges letters of their doyngs, which in hast was done. And after much suite of the Scots part, when they had much demaunded, & litle or nothing was graunted, they then beyng wery of warre desired peace, which was concluded during both the kinges liues, and the .xx. day of Maie, in the next yere of the king folowing, it was openly proclaymed, to the great comfort & reioysing of all louers of peace.

The peace concluded with the Scottes.

The .xxviii. day of December, the Duke of Suffolke was sent by the kyng and his Counsaile, to Bugden beside Huntingdon, where the Lady Katherin Princes Dowager laye. For the king was aduertised, and had good proues of the same, that she of froward mind would consent neyther to the determination of the Uniuersities, nor yet to the whole conuocation of the realme, but beyng counsailed by a fewe Spanyardes, which had litle learning, did all that she coulde to infringe the determination of the sayde Uniuersities and Clergy. In somuch that she wrote to the Pope, and to other Potentates, to grieue the king and his realme, because he would not folow her minde, and breake the commaundement of God. Wherefoze the kinges Counsaile mocioned the king, that such as were about her, and moued her therfo, should be put from her, for they thought it no reason, that she should haue such libertie to worke that thing, by the which the king and his realme, might haue detriment or damage. Wherefoze the sayde Duke was sent to her, which shewed to her openly, Articles of her sypes to the Pope, and how she sought meanes to grieue the king and his realme, which hereafter she should not be suffered to do. For the same time was a Curse sent from the Pope, which accursed both the king and the whole realme, which Curse the bearer thereof, beyng not belike the hardyest man that euer shewed himselfe in fronte of battayle, thought it a great deale more better for hym to bestow it without the kings dominons, and therfoze set it by in the towne of Dunkercke in Flaunders, where it was taken doone by William Locke Mercer of London. The Queene answered the Duke very highly and obstinately, with many high wordes, and sodainly in a fury she departed from him, into her priuie chamber and shut the dooze. He seeing that, brake all the order of the Queenes Court, and discharged a great sort of her household holde Seruautes, and yet left there a conuenient number, to serue her like a Princes. There was great lamentation among them that departed, but there was no remedy. Then they that remayned to serue her, were sworne to serue her as a Princes Dowager, and not as Queene, some sayd that they were sworne to her as Queene, and otherwise they would not serue, and so they departed. Other that were sworne to her as Princes, and remayned there, she them vtterly refused for her Seruautes, wherfoze she remayned with the lesse number of Seruautes.

The princes Dowager was very heady and wilfull.

The king kept his Christmas at Greenewiche, with great solemnitie, and after Christmas began the parliament. In which parliament Elizabeth Barton called the holy Mayde of Kent, with all her ayders and abettors, of whome ye haue heard before, was attaynted, and her great and greuous offences appereth in the statute made in this present parliament and the one and twenty day of Apill next following she with her adherents were drawne to Tiborne and there executed.

The parliament

And at the place of execution, and the present time that she suffered she sayde these wordes, hether am I come to die, and I haue not bene the enely cause of myne awne death, which most iustly I haue deserued, but also I am the cause of the death of all these persons which at thys time here suffer : and yet to saye the truth I am not so much to be blaied, considering it was well knowne vnto these learned men, that I was a pooze wenche without learning, and therfoze they might haue easily perceyued that the thinges that were done by me could not proceede in no such sort, but their capacities and learning coulde right well iudge from whence they proceeded, and that they were altogether fayned : but because the things which I fayned was profitable vnto them, and therfoze they much praised mee and bare me in hande that it was the holy ghost, and not I that did them, and then I being puffed up with their prayes, fell into a certaine pride and foolish phantasie with my selfe, and thought I might saye what I would, which thing hath brought me to this case, and for the which now I crye God and the kinges highnesse most hartely mercie, and desire all you good people to pray to God to haue mercie on me, and all them that here suffer with me.

In this parliament also was made the act of succession for the suretie of the crowne, to the which euerye person beyng of lawfull age should be sworne vpon the payne expressed in that act, as in the same ye may most euidently see.

Monday the .xxiiij. day of Marche in the parliament time were solemnly receyued into London as Ambassadors from James the fift king of Scottes, the Byschop of Aberdune, the Abbot of Lynlos, and Adam Otterborne the kinges Atturney, with diuers Gentlemen on them attendaunt, which were brought to the Taylers hall and there lodged. And on the day of the Annunciation of our Lady they were brought to the kinges place at Westminster, where they shewed their Commission and Message, for the which the king appointed them dayes to counsaile. And shortly after commissioners were appointed as you shall here.

The .xxx. daye of Marche the parliament was proroged, and there euerye Lorde and Burgesse as before, were sworne to the act of succession and subscribed their handes to a Parchement fixed to the same othe. Thys Parliament was proroged till the thirde day of November next. After this, commissions were sent ouer all Englande to take the othe of all men and women to the act of succession, at which fewe repyned, except Doctor John Fisher, s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Moore knight late Lorde Chaunceloz, and Doctor Nicholas Wylion Parson of saint Thomas Apostles in London: wherfoze these thre persons after long exhortation to them made by the Bysshop of Cauntorbury at Lambeth, and expresse deniall of them to be sworne, they were sent to the Tower where they remayned and were oftentimes morioned to be sworne: but the Bysshop and s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Moore sayde that they had in their writings written the princesse Dowager Quene, and therfoze they might not go against that, and the Doctor sayde that he in preaching called her Queene, which he would not with say, howbeit at length he was very well contented, and dissembled the matter and so escaped: But the other twaine stood against all the realme in their opinion.

In this yere it chaunced that two Marchaunt straungers fell in loue with a Harlot which was called Wolfes wyfe, and this Harlot had often haunted the straungers chambers. And so on a tyme the sayde Harlot appointed these straungers to come to Westminster, and shee had prepared for them a boate, in the which boate was but one man to rowe, which was a strong theefe, and in the ende of the boate lay Wolfe her husbände covered with a leather that boate men vse to couer their Cushins wyth, and so these straungers sat them downe mistrusting nothing, and when thys boteman had brought them as farre as a place that is called the Turning tree, sodainely stepped by the sayde Wolfe and with his dagger thrust the one of them thorow, the other cryed out to saue his lyfe, and offered a great somme of money to the boate man and him to saue his life, but no pzofer would be heard, noz mercie would they extende, but as cruell murderers without pittie slue the other also and bounde them face to face, and so threw them into the Thames in the aforesayde place, where they were long after before they were found. But immediatly the Harlot Wolfes wyfe went to the straungers chambers, and tooke from thence so much as she could come by. And at the last she and her husbände as they deserued, were apprehended, arraigned and hanged at the foresayde turning tree, where she hanged still was not cut downe, but till such tyme as it was knowne that beastly and filthy wretches had most shamefully abused her being dead.

The ninth day of July was the Lorde Dacres of the North arreigned at Westminster of high treason, where the Duke of Norfolke sat as iudge and high Steward of England. The sayde Lorde Dacres beyng brought to the barre with the Bre of the Tower before him, after his inditement read, not onely imzoooued the sayd inditement as false and maliciously deuised agaynst him and answered every parte and matter therein containned, but also so manly, wittily, and directly confuted his accusozs which there were readie to auouche their accusacions, that to their great shames, and to his great honour, he was founde that day by his pecces not guiltie, for the which vndoubtedly the commons exceedingly ioyed and reioysed at, insomuche as there was in the Hall at those wordes not guiltie, the greatest shoute and crye of ioye that the lyke noman lyuing can remember that euer he heard,

The

The .xiiij. day of August was a great fyre at Temple barre and diuers houses bzent. And the .xvi. day of the same moneth was burned the kinges stable at Charing crosse otherwise called the Newse, wherem was bzent many great Hozses and great stoze of hay.

In this yere the thirde day of November the kynges highnesse helde his high courte of parliament, in the which was concluded and made many and sondrie good, wholsome, and godly statutes: but among all, one spect- all estatute, which aucthorised the kynges highnesse to be supreme heade of the church of England, by the which the Pope with all his College of Cardinales with all their Pardons and Indulgences was vtterly abolished out of this realme. In this parliament also was geuen to the kynges highnesse the first frutes and tenthes of all dignities and spirituall promotions. And in the ende of the same parliament the kynges maiestie most graciously graunted (and willed it by the same parliament to be established) his most gracious and generall free pardon.

This yere also came in the great Admyrall of Fraunce: which Admyrall was honorably receyued, and at his departing was liberally rewarded.

In this tyme died the Erie of Kildare prisoner in the Tower: And euen at the same tyme Thomas Fitzgarard hys sonne began to rebell agaynst the kyng and tooke all the kynges Ordinaunce, and sent Ambassadors to the Emperour to haue intreated him to take parte with him. Also he slew the Bishop of Downe and bzent and robbed all such as would not obey him: But at the last he was apprehended and had as he deserued as after shall appeare.

In the beginning of thys yere the Duke of Norfolke and the Bysshop of Ely went to Calice, and thether came the Admirall of Fraunce.

And the .xix. day of June was thre Honkes of the Charterhouse hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyborne, and their quarters set by aboute Londō for denyng the kyng to be supreme head of the Church. Their names were Cromwell, Whiddlemoze and Audigate. These men when they were arreigned at Westminster, behanded themselues very stiffely and stubbornly, for hearing their inditement red how trayterously they had spoken agaynst the kyngs maiestie his crowne and dignitie, they neuer blushed nor abaished at it, but very foolishly and hypocritically knowleged their treason which maliciously they auouched, hauing no learning for their defence, but rather beyng asked dyuers questions, they vsed a malicious silence, thinking as by their examinations afterwarde in the Tower of London it did appeare, for so they sayde, that they thought those men which was the Lorde Cromwell and other that there sat vpon them in iudgement to be heretiques and not of the Church of God, and therfoze not worthy to be eyther answered or spoken vnto. And therfoze as they deserued, they receyued as you haue heard before.

Also the .xxij. day of the same month John Fisher Bysshop of Rochester was beheded, and his head set vpon London bridge. This Bysshop was of very many men lamented, for he was reported to be a man of great learning and a maior of very good lyfe, but yet wonderfully deceiued, for he maintained the Pope to be supreme head of the Church, and denyed the kyngs tytles therein, who albeit he was learned, yea, and that very notably learned, yet

Sir Thomas More beheaded.

Also the sixt day of July was Sir Thomas More beheaded for the like treason before rehearsed, which as you haue heard was for the denyng of the kings Maiestie supremitie. This man being learned as you haue heard before, was Lozde Chauncelour of Englande, and beside his learning he had a great wit, and in talking verie pleasant and merie conceited, and that euen to his last houer: Insomuch as at hys comming to the Tower, one of the officers demaunded his vpper garment for his fee (meaning hys Bowne) and he answered, he should haue it, and toke him his Cap, saying it was the vppermost garnēt that he had. Likewise, euen going to his death at the Tower gate, a poze woman called to him and besought him to declare that he had certayn euidences of hers in the time that he was in office (which after he was apprehended she could not come by) and that he would intreat she might haue them agayne, or else she was vndone. He answered good woman haue pacience a little while, for the king is so good vnto me that euē within this halfe houre he will discharge me of all busineses, and help thee himselfe. Also when he went by the staires on the Scaffold, he desired one of the Shriefes officers to geue him his hande to helpe him bp, and sayde, when I come downe agayne, let me shift for my selfe as well as I can. Also the hangman kneeled downe to him asking him forgeuenesse of his death (as the maner is) to whome he sayde I forgeue thee, but I promise thee that thou shalt neuer haue honestie of the stryking of my head, my neck is so short. Also euen when he should lay downe his head on the block, he hauing a great gray beard, striked out his heard and sayde to the hangman, I pray you let me laye my beard over the block least ye should cut it.

This yere in the time that the king went his progresse, which was to Gloucester, and so Westwarde, the king of Scotis was installed at Wyndsoze by the Lozde Crispyn his procurator. And in October folowynge Stephyn Gardiner Bishop of Winchester was sent Ambassadoz into France, where he remayned thre yeres after.

The king of Scots made knight of the Garter.

In Nouember was a solempne Procession through the Citie of London of all the priestes and religious in and about the Citie, for the recouering of the French king to his helth. And the .viij. day of January folowynge, died the princes dowagar at Kimbalton, and was buryed at Peterborough.

And in february folowynge, was Queene Anne brought a bedde of a childe before her tyme, which was borne dead.

Queene Anne brought a bed before her tyme.

The fourth day of february the king helde his highe Court of Parliament at Westminster, in the which was many good and wholesome Statutes and lawes made and concluded. And in this tyme was geuen vnto the king by the consent of the great and fatte Abbottes, all religious houses that were of the value of three hundred Marke and vnder, in hope that their great Monasteries should haue continued still: But euen at that tyme one sayde in the Parliament house, that these were as thornes, but the great Abbottes were putrified olde Okes, and they must needes folowe: and so will other do in Christendome quod Doctor Stokesley Bishop of London or manye yeres be passed.

About

About this tyme sayth Sleydan, the king of England sent certaine Ambassadors into Germany to the Protestants to conclude a league with them, among the which Ambassadors was chiefe Edward Foxe Bishop of Hereford. And after great conference and long communication had, at the last it was agreed that the king and they were content to enter into league vpon these condicions: 1 First that the king should set forth the pure Doctrine of the Gospell which they professed at Aspurge, and maintaine the same with them in a lawfull Counsaile if any such shall be.

2 That neyther of them admyt the calling or place of a Counsaile, but by common assent: neuertheless if it may appere by certaine and manifest reasons that any such counsaile is like to be, as hath bene declared to Peter Paule, Uerger, the Bishops Legate, that it be not refused: But in case the Bishop continue his purpose, that then his enterpryse be letted, and by open protestation to be refused.

3 And like as the king hath ioyned himselfe to their religion, so likewise to ioyne with them in league also, and to be called the Patrone and defender of the same.

4 That common opinion of the supremacie of the Bishop of Rome, to bee bitterly reiected for euer.

5 If any warre be attempted agaynst eyther part, for religion or other cause, that no ayde be geuen vnto him that inuoceth the same.

6 That for the defence of the league, the king shall pay one hundred thousand Crownes, whereof the one halfe the Confederatours shall and maye employ when neede shall require, and the rest of their charges to be borne of their owne money which they shall contribute among them: But if the warre shall long endure, and the force of the enemy driue them to it: then the king to disburse two hundred thousand Crownes, forasmuch as they if the like chaunce should fortune, stand also bound, not onely to spend their goodes but their bloud and life also. And of this somme also, the lyke consideration to be had as before, and that it be not employed to any other vse, then to defend the league, and the remainder to be restored when the warre is finished.

7 That the Ambassadors shall write to the king hereof, and when they knowe his minde, to aduertise the Duke of Saxon, and Landgraue Wambesse thereof, that after a common Ambassade may be sent vnto him.

Now when the Ambassadors had sent these requests vnto the king they departed to Wyttenbergh. And shortly after came letters from the king of England to the Protestantes, purportynge the kinges minde therein, and the Ambassadors do aduertise the Prince elector hereof. And the .xij. day of March at Wittenbergh, whether the Duke was at that tyme come, speaking first many thinges of the kinges great good will, the Ambassadors declare howe that the most part of the requestes do content him, if a fewe might be amended. And albeit that in England all thing is quiet, neyther is there any cause wherefore the king should feare any man, and if haply any cause hath bene, the same is now taken away by the death of his wyfe forsaken, neuertheless to recouer and mainteyn the true Doctrine, he doth not refuse to destrye the somme of money which they requyre, so that the league go forward, and hereof he will treate moze at large with their Ambassadors. And where they offer vnto him this honour, that he should be defender and patrone of the league, he geueth them great thankes, and acknowlegeth their good will. And although he vnderstand with how much enuy and displeasure, the same is annexed, yet for the common we:ties sake, he could be content it they can agree vpon the first and second demaunde. For onlesse there be an vni- formity in doctrine, he supposeth that this charge cannot be greatly to his ho- nour: But he would chiefly wishe that the learned of his realme and theirs might be wholly of one opinion. And where he seeth well that the same will not be, onlesse certaine places of the confession and Apologie of their doctrine may be fore by private talke be something qualified: Therefore he despyeth them instantly to send their Ambassadors, and amongst them some one that is excellently learned, which may conferre with his Deuies of the whole doctrine and ceremonies, and determine the matter. And where he seeth himselfe so liberall vnto them, he requireth againe, that in case any man at- tempt warre against him: first they will ayde him eyther with five hundred horsemen, or else with .x. ships well manned and furnished for foure months. Furthermore, that vpon his awne charges they shall prouide for him two thousand horsemen, and five thousand footemen.

Nowe when the Duke had heard the Ambassadors, he answered them that in as much as these thinges concerne not him alone, but his comfortes also, he will make them priue vnto it, and vse their counsaile in the same.

But shortly after as will appere in the yere folowynge, the king hauynge condemned his wife Queene Anne of Adultery & incest. But (sayth Sley- dan) vniustly as it is supposed and proued since, caused her head to be stricken off, after she had borne him a daughter that be wotifull Ladie Elizabeth, nowe Queene of England. And with her were executed certain Gentlemen of the kings priue Chamber, Nozys, Weston, Brewton, and one Markes, which Markes contrary to his conscience, for hope of preferment, subscribed to a bill, whereby he condemned both himselfe, and all the rest. And he was prouoked ther vnto by the lord Admirall Fitzwilliams, that was after Erie of South- hampton, who sayd vnto him, subscribe Markes, & see what will come of it, & he subscribed, and receyued therefore a reward vnlooked for. And also the lord Rocheford the Queenes brother, through the false accusation of the Crumpe- et his wyfe, which afterwards suffered therfore accordyng to her desertes, was in lyke maner put to death. Which dolefull tragidie tooke cleane away the former purposed Ambassade that should haue bene sent into England.

On May day were a solempne Justes kept at Grenewich, and sodain- ly from the Justes the king departed hauynge not aboue .vi. persons with him, and came in the Evening from Grenewich to his place at Westminster. Of this sodain departyng many men mused, but most chiefly the Queene, who the next day was apprehended and brought from Grenewich to the Tower of London, where after she was arreigned of high treason, and con- demned. Also at the same tyme was likewise apprehended, the Lord Roche- ford brother to the said Queene, & Henry Nozys, Mark Smeton, William a Swinton, & Sir Fraunces Weston, all of the kings priue Chamber. All these were likewise committed to the Tower, and after arreigned & condemned of high treason. And all the Gentlemen were beheaded on the scaffold at the Tower hill: But the Queene was with a Sworde beheaded within the Tower. And these folowynge were the wordes that she spake the day of her death death which was the .xix. day of May. 1536.

Good Christenpeople, I am come hether to dye, for according to the lawe and by the lawe I am iudged to dye, and therefore I will speake no- thing against it. I am come hither to accuse no man, nor to speake any thing of that wherof I am accused and condemned to die, but I pray God saue the king and send him long to reigne ouer you, for a gentler nor a more merciful prince was there neuer: and to me was euer a good, a gentle, and soueraigne Lorde. And if any person will meddle of my cause, I require them to iudge the best. And thus I take my leaue of the world & of you all, and I hartelye desire you all to pray for me. O Lord haue mercy on me, to God I comend my soule. And then she kneled downe sayng: to christ I comend my soule, Jesu receiue my soule diuers times, till y her head was stricken of with the sword.

The weke before Whitsontyde the kyng maryed Lady Jane daughter to the right worshipfull Syr John Seymer knight, which at Whitsontyde was openly shewed as Queene.

In the parliament season Lorde Thomas harward without the kinges assent affied the Lady Margaret Douglas daughter to the Quene of Scot- tes and Aere to the king: for which presumptuous acte he was attainted of treason, and an act made for the like offenders, and so he dyed in the Tower, and she was long there as prisoner.

In the time of this parliament, the Bishops and all the Clergy of the realme held a solempne conuocation at Paules Church in London, where after much disputacion & debating of matters they published a booke of reli- gio intituled. Articles deuised by the kings highnesse &c. In this booke is spe- cially mencioned but thre Sacraments, with the which the Lincolnsyremē (I meane their ignorant priestes) were offended, & of that occasion deprauid the kings doings. And this was their first beginning, as ye shal plainly here.

After this booke which passed by the kynges auctoritie with the con- sent of the Clergy, was published, certaine Injunctions were that tyme ge- uen whereby a number of their holy dayes, was abrogated and specially such as fell in the Harvest time, the keeping of which was much to the hinde- raunce of the gathering in of cozne, hay, fruite, and other such like necessarie and profitable commodities.

These articles thus ordained and to the people delivered. The inhabi- tauntes of the North partes beyng at that time very ignorant and rude, knowing not what true religion ment, but altogether nosled in supersticion and popery, and also by the meanes of certayne Abbotes and ignorant Priestes not a litle stirred and prouoked for the suppressiō of certain Ho- nasteries, and for the extirpation and abolishing of the Bishoppe of Rome now taking an occasion at this booke, sayng see fricndes now is taken from vs foure of the seuen Sacramentes, and shortly you shall lose the other thre also, and thus the fayth of holy Church shall bitterly be suppressed and aboli- shed and therefore sodainly they spred abroade and raysed great and shame- full slaunders onely to moue the people to sedicion and rebellion, and to kin- dle in the people hatefull and malicious mindes against the kinges maiestie and the maiestates of the realme, sayng, let vs fully bende our selues to the mayntenance of religion, and rather then to suffer it thus to decaye, euen to dye in the field. And amongst them also were to many, euen of the nobilitie that that did not a litle prouoke and stirre by the ignozant & rude people the more stidly to rebell and stande therein, faythfully promising them both ayde and succoz against the king and their owne native countrye (like foolish and wicked men) thinking by their so doyng to haue done God high pleasure and seruice. There were also certayne other malicious and bulye persons who added Oyle (as the adage sayth) to the Fornace: These made open clamors in euery place where oportunitie serued, that Christen religion should be vtterly violatē, dyspyed and set a side, and that rather then so, it be heued and was the partes of euery true Christen man to defende it euen to the death, and not to admyt and suffer by any meanes the fayth (in the which their forefathers so long and so many thousand yeres haue liued and cōtinued) now to be subuerted and destroyed. Amongest these were many priestes which deceyued also the people with many false fables & benemous lyes and imagnations (which could neuer enter nor take place in the hart of any good man, nor faithfull subiect) sayng that al maner of prayer and fasting and all Gods seruice should vtterly be destroyed & taken away, that no man should marry a wife or be partaker of the Sacraments, or at the length should eate a piece of rost meate, but he shoulde for the same first pay vnto the king a certayne somme of money, and that they should be brought in more bondage and in a more wicked maner of life, then the Sarazins be vnder the great Turke. With these and such other like errors and slaundersous tales, the people thus instructed (or as I may trulier speake) deceyued and mocked, beyng to light of credyt, incontinent to the helpe and mayntenaunce of religion once established and confirmed, they stidly and stoutely did conspire and agree: And in a part of Lincolneshyre, first they assembled and shortly after, ioyned into an army, beyng (as it was supposed) of men apt and fitte for the warre, in number aboue twentie thousand.

Agaynst these trayterous rebelles, wyth all the haste and speede that might be (after he heard thereof) the kinges royall maiestie, in his awne proper person, furnished with a goodly and warlike armie, lacking nothing that to such a companie should appertaine, marched toward them. But these rebels hearing that his maiestie was present with his power and army royall, feared what would follow of this matter, and suche as were noble men and Gentlemen, that before fauoured them began to withdrayw themselves, so that they were destitute of Capitaines, & at the last they in writing made certayne petitions to the kinges maiestie, professing that they neuer intended hurt toward his royall person. The kinges maiestie receiued their petitions and made aunswere vnto them as followeth.

First we begin and make aunswere to the foure and sixe articles, because vpon them dependeth much of the rest, concerning choosing of counsaylors, I neuer haue red, heard, nor knowne, that princes counsaylors, and prelates should be appointed by rude and ignozant common people, nor that they were persons meete nor of habilitie to discernē and choose mete and sufficient counsaylors for a prince: how presumptuous then are ye the rude commons of one shire, and that one of the most brute and beastly of the whole realme, and of the least experience to finde fault with your prince for the electing of his counsaylors and prelates, and to take vpon you contrarie to Gods lawe and mans lawe to rule your prince, whome ye are bounde by all lawes lawes to obey and serue with both your lynes, landes and goodes: and for no worldly cause to withstand: the contrarie wherof you like Traytors and rebelles haue attempted and not like true subiects as ye name your selues.

As to the suppression of religious houses and Monasteries, we wyll that ye and all our subiectes should well knowe that this is graunted vs by all the nobles spirituall and tempozall, of this our realme, and by all the commons in the same by act of Parliament, and not set forth by any counsaylor or counsaylors vppon there meere will and phantastie, as ye full fa. selfe would perswade our realme to beleue.

And where ye allege that the seruice of God is muche diminished, the truth therof is contrarie, for there be no houses suppressed where God was well serued, but where most vice, mischief and abhominacion of lyming was bled, and that doth wel appere by there awne confessions subscribed with their awne handes in the time of their visitacions, and yet we suffered a great many of them (more then we needed by the act) to stand wherē in if they amende not their liuing, we feare, we haue more to aunswere for then for the suppression of all the rest. And as for the hospitalitie for the reliefe of the poore, we wonder ye be not ashamed to affirme that they haue bene a great reliefe of the poore people, when a great many of the most part hath not past foure or five religious persons in them, and dyuers, but one which spent the substance of the goods of their houses in noysshing of vice, and abhominable lyming. Nowe what unkindnesse and unnaturalitie may we impute to you and all our subiectes that be of that minde, that had leuer suche an vnchristie sort of vicious persons, should enioye suche possessions, profites and Emolumentes, as growe of the sayde houses, to the maintenance of their vnchristie life, then we your naturall prince, souereigne Lord and king, which doth and hath spent more in your defences of our awne, then sixe times they be worth? As touchyng the act of vles, we maruayle what madnesse is in your brayne, or vpon what ground ye would take auctorizty vpon you to cause vs to breake these lawes and statutes, which by all the nobles, knightes, and Gentlemen of this realme (whome the same chiefly toucheth) hath bene graunted and assented to: seyng in no maner of thinges it toucheth you the base commons of our realme.

Also the groundes of all those vles were false, and neuer admitted by any lawe: but vsurped vpon the prince, contrarie to all equitie and iustice, as it hath bene openly both disputed and declared by all the wel learned men in the realme of England in Westminster hall: wherby ye maye well perceyue howe mad and vreasonable your demaundes be, both in that and in the rest, and howe vnmeete it is for vs and dishonorable, to graunt or assent vnto, and lesse meete and decent for you in such a rebellious sort to demand the same of your prince.

As touchyng the fiftene which ye demand of vs to be released, thinke ye that we be so faint harted, that perforce ye of one shire (were ye a great many mo) could compell vs with your insurrections and such rebellious demeanoz to remit the same: or thinke ye that any man will or may take you to be true subiectes, that first make and thewe a louing graunt, and then perforce would compell your souereigne Lord and king to release the same: the time of payment wherof is not yet come, ye, and scing the same will not counteruaile the tenth penie of the charges, which we doe and daily susteyne for your tuition and safegard: make you sure by your occasions of these your ingratitude, unnaturalnesse and unkindnes to vs now administered, ye geue vs cause which hath alwayes bene as much dedicate to your welth as ever was king, not so much to set or studie for the setting forwarde of the same, seying how unkindly and untruely ye deale now with vs, without any cause or occasion: and doubt ye not, though you haue no grace nor naturalnesse in you to consider your ductie of alleageance to your king and souereigne Lorde, the rest of our realme we doubt not hath: and we and they shall so looke on this cause, that we trust it shall be to your confusion, if according to your former letters you submit not your selues.

As touching the first frutes, we let you wit, it is a thing graunted vs by act of parliament also, for the supportation of parte of the great and excessive charges, which we support and beare for the maintenaunce of your welthes and other our subiects: and we haue knowne also that ye our commons haue much complayned in times past, that the most part of our goods, landes and possessions of the realme, were in the spirituall mens handes: and yet bearing vs in hande that ye be as louing subiectes to vs as maye be, ye cannot finde in your hartes that your prince and souereigne Lord should haue any parte thereof (and yet it is nothing prejudiciall vnto you our commons) but to rebell and unlawfully rise against your prince, contrarie to the ductie of alleageance and Gods commaundement, Sirs remember your folies and trayterous demeanors, and shame not your native Countrie of England, nor offende no more so grievously your vndoubted king and naturall prince, which alwayes hath shewed himselfe most louing vnto you, and remember your ductie of alleageance, and that ye are bound to obey vs your king, both by Gods commaundement and law of nature.

Wherefore we charge you estones vpon the foresayde bonds and paynes, that ye withdraw your selues to your owne houses, euery man, and no more to assemble contrary to our lawes and your alleageances, and to cause the prouokers of you to this mischief, to be deliuered to our Lieutenants hands, or oures, and you your selues to submit you to such condigne punishment as we and our nobles shall thinke you worthy: for doubt you not else that we and our nobles cannot will suffer this iniurie at your handes vnto us, if ye geue not place to vs of souereignie, and shewe your selues, as bounden and obedient subiects, and no more to entremedde your selues from henceforth with the waighty affaires of the realme, the directio wherof onely appertaineth to vs your king, and such noble men and counsaillors as we list to elect and choose to haue the ordering of the same, and thus we pray vnto almighty God, to geue you grace to doe your duties, to be your selues toward vs like true and faithfull subiectes, so as we may haue cause, to order you thereafter; and rather obediently to consent amongst you to deliuer into the handes of our Lieutenants a hundred persons, to be ordered according to their demerites, at our will and pleasure, then by your obstinacie and wilfulnesse, to put your selues, your wiues, children, landes, goodes, and castles, besides the indignation of God, in the vtter aduenture of totall destruction, and vtter ruine, by force and violence of the sword.

After the Lincolnshire men had receyued this the kinges aunswere as foresayde, foresayde, made to their petitions, eche mistrustynge other who should be needed to be the greatest medler, euen very sodainly they began to thinke, and out of hand they were all deuided, and euery man at home in his owne house in peace: But the Capitaynes of these rebelles escaped not all clere, but were after ward apprehended, and had as they deserued: he that tooke vpon him as Capitaine of this rowte named himselfe Capitaine Cobler, but it was a Monke called Doctor Wakerel, with diuers other, which after ward were taken and executed.

All these thinges thus ended, the Countrey appeased, and all thinges in quiet, the kinges maiestie retired, and brake vp his army.

But see, euen within fixe dayes folowynge, was the king truly certified, that there was a newe insurrection made by the Northren men, which had assembled themselves into a house and great armie of warlike men, & well appoynted both with Capitaynes, horse, harness, and artillery, to the number of fortie thousand men, which had encamped themselves in Northshire: And these men had eche of them to other bounde themselves by their othe, to be faythfull and obedient to his Capitaine: they also declared by their proclamations solemply made, that this their insurrection, should extend no farther but onely to the maintenaunce and defence of the fayth of Christ, and deliuerance of holy Church sore decayed and oppressed, and also for the furtheraunce aswell of priuate as publike matters in the realme touchynge the welth of all the kings poore subiectes. They named this their sedicious and trayterous voyage, an holy and blessed Pilgrimage: they had also certaine Banners in the field, wherupon was painted Christ hangynge on the crosse on the one syde, and a Chalice with a painted Cake in it on the other syde, with diuers other Banners of like hypocrisie, and feyned sanctitie: the soldiers also had a certaine cognisaunce or badge, embzodered or set vpon the sleeves of there coates which was the similitude of the fiue woundes of Christ, and in the middest thereof was written the name of our Lord, and thus the rebellious garrison of Sathan, with his false and counterfeited signes of holinesse, set forth and decked themselves, onely to delude and deceyue the simple and ignozant people.

After that the kinges highnesse was credibly certified of this newe insurged resurrection, he making no delay in so waightie a matter, caused with all speede the Dukes of Northfolke and Suffolke, the Marques of Excester, the Erle of Shrewsbury with other, accompanied with his mightie and royal armie, which was of great power and strength, forthwith to set vpon the rebelles: But when these noble Capitaynes and Counsaillors approached the rebelles, and perceyued their number, and sawe how they were bent to battail, they practised with great pollicie to haue pacified al without bloodsheddyng, but the Northren men were so stiffe necked, that they would in no wise stoupe, but stoutely stode & maintained their wicked enterprize, wherefore the Nobles abouesayde perceyving and seeyng none other way to pacifie these wretched rebelles, agreed vpon a battaile, the battaile was appoynted, and the day was assigned: but see, the same night which was the night before the daye of the battaile appoynted, fell a small rayne nothing to speake of: but yet as it were by a great miracle of God, the water which was but a very small foorde, and that men in maner the day before, might haue gone by thod ouer, sodainly rose of such a heighth, deepenesse, and bredth, that the like no man that there did inhabite, could tel that euer they saw it so afore, so that the day euen when the houre of battaile should come, it was impossible for the one army to come at the other.

After this appointment made betwene both the armies (disappointed as it is to be thought onely by God, who extended his great mercy, and had compassion on the great number of innocent persons, that in that deadly slaughter had like to haue bene murdered) could take no place: Then by the great wisdom and pollicie of the sayd Capitaynes, a communication was had, and a pardon of the kinges Maiestie obtayned, for all the Capitaynes and chiefe doers of this insurrection, and they promised that such thinges as they found themselves agriued withall they should gently be heard, and their reasonable petitions graunted, and that their articles should be presented to the kinges Maiestie, that by his highnesse aucthoritie, and wisdom of his Counsaile, all thinges should be brought to good order and conclusion: and with this order euery man quietly departed, and those which betoze were bent as hote as fire to fight, beyng letted thereof by God, went now peaceably to their houses, and were as colde as water. A domino factum est illud.

In this tyme of insurrection, and in the rage of hurly burly, euen when the kings army and the rebels were readie to toyne, the kinges Banner beyng displayed, and the kinges Maiestie then lying at Windsor, there was a Boocher dwelling within fiue myle of Windsor, which caused a priest to preach, that all such as tooke part with the Porkebiremen, whom he named Gods people, did fight and defend Gods quarell, and farther the sayd Boocher in selling of his meate, one did bid him a lesse price of a sheepe then he made of it, he answered nay by Gods soule, I had rather y good felowes of the North had it among them, & a score more of the best I haue: This priest and Boocher were accused to the kings maiestie Counsaile of the treasons abouesaid on the Monday in the morning, & the same day they were both sent for, which confessed their treasons, and so according to the law marshall, they were adiudged to die: and so the sayde Monday, they were both examined, condemned, and hanged, the Boocher was hanged on a new payze of Gallowes set on the Bridge ende before the Castell gate: and the priest was hanged on a tree at the foote of Windsor bridge.

This yere in December was the Chamys of London all frozen ouer, wherefore the kinges Maiestie with his beautifull spouse Queene Jane, roade throughout the Citie of London to Greenwich: And this Christmasse the king by his Messengers and Heraulds, sent downe to the North his generall pardons to all capitall offenders: and shortly after came Aske to London, and so to the Court to the king: this Aske was the chiefe Capitaine of the last rebellion in the North, and now both pardoned of the king, and bys grace receined him into his fauor, and gaue unto him apparell and great rewardes, but as after ye shall perceyue, Aske enjoyed not the king his newe friendes kindnesse a yere and a day, and pitie it was that he had any fauour at all, for there liued not a beryer wretch aswell in person, as in condicions and dedes, specially agaynst his annoynted gouernor and sauereigne Lord.

The thirde day of february, was Thomas Fitz Carrad late Erle of Kildare, and fiue of his Uncles, drawen, hanged, and quartered at Tiborne,

Also in the sayde Moneth, Nichol Husgraue, Thomas Tilbie, with other began a new rebellion at Kirbie Staphan in Westmerland, with. viij. thousand persons, and besieged the Citie of Carlile, from whence they were beaten, with the onely power of the Citie, and in their returnyng the Duke of Nozfolke who then was made Lieutenaunt of the North, encountered with them, and tooke the Capitaynes, and according to the law martiall, arrayned thre score and fourtene of them, and hanged them on Carlile walles, but Husgraue escaped. And in the same moneth of february began yet another insurrection, by the entisement of sir fraunces Bygod, a man no doubt that loued God, and feared his Prince, with a right obedient & louyng feare: but nowe beyng deceyued, and prouoked therunto by false rebellious persons, it was his fortune to taste of the ende which appertayneth to rebelles: such are men when God leaueth them to their selues, and when they will enterpryse the doying of that thing which Gods most holy worde bitterly forbiddeth: This Bygod was apprehended and brought to the Tower of London, & this last rebellion began in Settrington, and in Pikeryn Leigh, and Scarborough.

Also in the latter end of this yere, the Lorde Darcy, Aske, Sir Robert Constable, Sir John Bulmer and his wife, sir Thomas Percy brother to the Erle of Northumberland, sir Stephen Hamelton, Nicholas Tempest, Esquier, William Lomley, sonne to the Lord Lomley, began againe to conspire, although they befoze had euery one of them their pardons: and nowe they were all taken and brought to the Tower of London.

In this yere one Robert Packyngton, Mercer of London, a man of good substaunce, and yet not so rich as honest and wise, this man dwelled in Chepeside at the signe of the Legge, and vsed dayly at foure of the clocke Winter and Summer to rise and go to Masse at a Church then called saynt Thomas of Acres (but now named the Mercers Chappell) and one morning among all other, beyng a great mistie morning such as hath seldome bene sene, euen as he was crossing the streete from his house to the Church, he was sodaynely murdered with a Sonne, which of the neighbors was playnely heard, and by a great number of Laborers at the same time standing at Soper lane ende, he was sene go forth of his house, and also the ciap of the Sonne was hard, but the dede doer was neuer espied nor knowne, but many were suspected, but none coulde be founde faultie: howbeit it is trew, that forasmuch as he was knowne to be a man of great corage and one that both could speake and also would be heard: and that the same time he was one of the Burgesses of the Citie of London & had talked somewhat against the couetousnesse and crueltie of the Clergy, he was had in contempt with them, and therefore most like by one of them thus shamefully murdered, as you perceyue that Mayster Honne was in the syxt yere of the reigne of this King.

In June the Lorde Darcy and the Lorde Holfey were arreigned at Westminster befoze the Marques of Ercester, then high Stuard of Englande, and they were both found gylty and had their iudgement as in cases of high treason.

Shortly after were also arreigned sir Robert Constable, Sir Thomas Darcy, and lord Holfey con- dempned of high treason.

The Lorde Darcy, & lord Holfey condemned of high treason.

Percey, Sir fraunces Wigod, Sir Stephen Hamelton, syz John Bulmer and his wife, which some reported was not his wife, but his paramour, also William Lomley, Nicholas Tempest, and the Abbates of Jerney and Rivers, and Robert Aske, and all founde gyltie of high treason, and all put to death at Ciborne, sauing sir Robert Costable, which was hanged in chaines on Beuerley Gate at Hull, and Aske was also hanged in chaines at Porke on a Tower, and sir John Bulmers Paramour was bzent in Smithfield in London: And in the latter ende of June, was the Lozde Darcy beheaded at Tower hill and shortly after was the Lord Hosley beheaded at Lincolne.

This yere at the feast of saint George, was the Lozde Cromwell made knight of the Garter.

In October on S. Edwards euen was bozne at Hampton Court the noble Impe prince Edward, whose godfathers at the chzistening were y Arch- bishop of Cantorburie, & the Duke of Norfolke & his Godmother the Lady Mary the kinges daughter, and at the bishopyng was Godfather the Duke of Suffolke: At the birth of this noble prince was great fiers made through the whole realme, and great ioye made with thankes geuing to almightie God which had sent so noble a prince to succede in y crowne of this realme. But Lozde what lamentation shortly after was made for the death of his noble and gracious mother Quene Jane, which departed out of this life the xiiij. day of October next followyng: and of none in the realme was it moze heavilier taken then of the kings maiesty himself, whose death caused y king in nediatly to remoue vnto Westminster where he mourned and kept himselfe close and secret a great while: and the eyght day of Nouember y corse of the Quene was caried to Wyndsoze with great solempnitie, and there was buried in the middes of the Quere in the Castell Church: And at the same tunc was made in Paules a solempne Herce for her, where was a masse and dirigie, and in like maner was song a Masse and dirigie in euey parishe church in London.

The kings maiesty kept his Christmaste at Grenewiche in his mourning apparell, and so was all the Court till the moztowe after Candemas day and then he and all other chaunged.

Also this yere the Viscount Beauchamp was created Erle of Hertford and sir William Fitzwilliam high Admirall created Erle of Southampton.

This yere James king of Scottes married the Lady Magdalene, the French kings eldest daughter.

In Maye there was a frier called frier forest, one of the obseruant friers, but he might haue bene moze truelet named as after shall appere, an obstinate frier, this obstinate frier had secretly in cofessions declared to many of the kings subiects that y king was not supreme head & being thereof accused & apzehended, he was examined how he could say y the king was not supreme head of y Church, when he himself had sworne to the cotrarie, he answered that he toke his oth with his outward man, but his inward man neuer costented ther vnto: at this answer the lozds who examined him looked very straungely at the dissimulation of the frier, but beng farther accused of diuers heretical and dampnable articles, that he helde contrarie to the scripture of God, he was after sundrie examinattions conuined and confuted, and gladly submitted himselfe to abide the punishment of the Church: But vpon this his submission, hauing moze libertie then befoze he had, as well to talke with whome he would, as also who that would to talke with him, certayne such outwarde men as he was so talked with him and so incensed him, that the outwarde frier was so farre from his open submission as euer he was, and when his abiuration was sent him to read and looke vpon, he vtterly refused it, and obstinately stood in all his heresies, and treasons befoze conspired. All gentle meanes that was possible to be sought for his reconciliation was had, but the moze gentler that the maiestates were to hym, the moze obstinate was the frier, and would neyther argue nor aunswere: wherefoze iustly he was condempned, and after for him was prepared in Smithfield in London a Gallowes on the which he was hanged in chaines by the middle and armeholes all quick, and vnder the Gallowes was made a fyre, and so he consumed and bzent to death. At his comming to the place of execution, there was prepared a great Skaffolde, on which sate the nobles of the realme, and the kings maiesties most honozable counsaile, onely to haue graunted pardon to that wretched creature, if any sparke of repentaunce would haue happened in him: there was also prepared a Pulpit where a right reuerend father in God and a renoumed and famous Clarke the Bpshoppe of Worcester called Hugh Latimer, declared to hym his errors and openly and manifestly by the scripture of God confuted them, and with many good and godly exhortations moued him to repentaunce, but such was his trowardnesse that he neyther would heare nor speake: And a little befoze the execution, a houg and a great Image was brought to the Gallowes, which Image was brought out of Wales, and of the Welchmen much sought and worshipped: This Image was called Daruell Gatheren, and the Welchmen had a prophesie that this Image should set a whole Forest a fyre, which prophesie now toke effect, for he set this Fryer Forest on fyre and consumed him to nothing. This frier when he sawe the fyre come and that present death was at hande, caught holde vpon the ladder, which he would not let go, but so vnpaciently tooke his death, that no man that euer put his trust in God neuer so vnquietly nor so vngodly ended his lyfe: if men might iudge him by his outward man, he appered to haue little knowledge of God and his sincere truth, and lesse trust in him at his ending. Vpon the Gallowes that he died on, was set by in great letters these verses folowing,

David Daruell Gatheren,

In July was Edmond Coningsbye attaynted of treason, for counterefeating of the kinges Signe Manuell: And in August was Edward Clifford for the same cause attaynted and both put to execution as Traytors at Ciborne. And the Sondag after Bartelmewday, was one Cratwell Hangman of London, and two persones moze hanged at the Westling place on the backside of Clerkenwell beside London, for robbing of a Booth in Bartelmew sayre, at which execution was aboute twentie thousande people as I my selfe iudged sayth Hall.

And in September by the speciall motion of the Lorde Cromwell all the notable Images vnto the which were made any speciall Pilgrimages and Offeringes, were bitterly taken away, as the Images of Wallingham, Epswicke, Worcester, the Lady of Wilsdon, with many other. And likewise the Shrynes of counterfeited Saintes, as the Shryne of Thomas Becket and diuerse other. And euen soorthwith by the meanes of the sayd Cromwell all the orders of superstitious and begging fryers, as White, Gray, Blacke, Augustine, Croched Fryers, and likewise all the puling Nonnes, with their Cloysters and Houses were suppressed and put downe.

In this season, suite was made by the Emperoz to the kinges maiestie that he would take to wyfe the Duches of Myllayne, but in this matter the Emperozs counsaile so dalled with the king that shortly he left of that suite: of the which breaking of with the Emperoz, the Duke of Cleue heard, and therefore forthwith he made suite to the kinges maiestie, for his sayre suster the Lady Anne: vndoubtedly the Emperozs counsaile thought by a cautell to haue brought the King to sue to the Bishoppe of Rome for a licence which thing the kinges maiestie soone smelied and perceyued, whereabout they went.

The thirde day of Nouember were Henry Marques of Excester and Erle of Denonshire, and sir Henry Poole knight and Lorde Mountagew and sir Edward Neuell brother to the Lorde Burgany sent to the Tower which three were accused by syr Gesserie Poole brother to the Lord Mountagew, of high treason, and the two Lordes were arreigned the last day of December, at Westminster before the Lorde Audeley of Waldon, Lorde Chauncelloz, and then high Seward of Englande, and there founde gilty, likewise on the thirde daye after was arreigned Sir Edward Neuell, Syr Gesserie Poole and two Priestes called Crostes and Collyns, and one Holand a Mariner and ail attainted, and the ninth day of January were the sayde two Lordes and Sir Edward Neuell beheaded at the Tower hyll, and the two Priestes and Holand were drawne to Tiborne and there hanged and quartered, and Syr Gesserie Poole was pardoned.

On Althwednesday were John Johnes, John Potter, and Wylliam Hawering, hanged in the Princes Liueries, because they were the princes Seruants, on the South side of Paules Churchyard for killing of Roger Cholmeley Esquyre in the same place of malice pretended.

Also on the thirde daye of Marche, was sir Nicholas Carew of Beddington, in the County of Surrey knight of the Garter, and Maister of the kinges horse, before attainted of treason, beheaded at the Tower hyll, wher he made a goodly confession, both of his follye and superstitious fayth, geuing God most hartly thanks that euer he came in the prison of the Tower, where he first sauored the life and sweetnesse of Gods most holye worde, meaning the Bible in Englishe, which there he reade by the meane of one Thomas Philips then keeper of that prison, but before he was a Citezen and Poyntmaker of London, which Philips two yeres before had bene there prisoner himselfe, and sore troubled as well by syr Thomas More as also by Doctor Stokelley Bishop of London, who often times examined the sayd Philips, and layde many articles to his charge, but he so wisely and coldely coldely bled him selfe, that he maugre their euill willes, escaped clerely their handes.

At this time the Pope summoned a generall counsaile to be holden at Mantua. And hereunto king Henry in the name of him selfe & his Nobles publieth a writing, sayng that where there is a Counsaile called by the Bishop of Rome, tye which he hath none aucthoritie to do, and called at such a time, when moztall warre is betweene the Emperoz and the French kyng, and the place appoynted at Mantua, whether it is neyther safe nor comodious for all men to come. He in dedde desyrezth a Christian counsaile with all his heart, but vnto the Bishoppes counsaile, he will neyther come himselfe nor yet send his Ambassadors: for this is alwayes their fashion, that for their owne lucre sake, they will in such maner of assemblies oppresse Chyrst and his beritie: And for his part he wyll haue nothing to do with the Bishop of Rome, nor regarde th no more his decree, then the writing of any other Bishop: adding that counsailes were wont to be called by the aucthoritie of the Emperoz and kinges, which maner ought to be restozed especially at this tyme when the Bishoppe hath so many graue persons to accuse him. Yet neuerthelesse can he neyther be reprechended without the daunger of a mannes life, nor accused presently: but in a lawfull counsaile: neyther is their any prouision made for him or his by safecouduite, although there were yet manifest daungers that should let him that he coulde not come: for it is no newes to the Bishoppes to falsifie their fayth, and to spynke and defile themselues with innocent bloud. And albeit it should be lawfull for others to repayze thether, yet were it no safety for him, whom the Bishop hath layde wayte for, whom he hateth deadly, whom he seketh to bring in hatred with other kings, for none other cause assuredly, then for that his Tyranny is exiled out of his realme, and his yerey reuenues taken away, which thing in very dedde he taketh in mozt euill part, & so much the worse for that he feareth lest other kings warned through his example, will hereafter do the like.

The ninth day of Marche, the king created at Westminster sir William Pawlet knight Treasozer of his household, Lorde Saint John, and sir John Russell Comptroller of his house, Lorde Russell.

The same time the king caused all the Hauens to be fortiefied, and rode to Douer, and caused Bulwarkes to be made on the Sea coastes, and sent commissioners throughout all the realme, to haue his people muster: and at the same season on Easter daye, was there three score vnknowne shippes lying in the downes, wherfore all Kent arose, and mustered in harnesse the same daye.

The eyght and twentie daye of Aprill, began a Parliament at Westminster, in the which Margaret Countesse of Salisburie, Gertrude wyfe to the Marques of Excester, Reignolde Poole Cardinall, brother to the Lorde Mountagew, syr Adrian Folkew, Thomas Dingley knight of saint Johnes, and diuers other were attainted of highe treason, which Folkew and Dingley were the tenth day of July beheaded.

The kinges highnesse which neuer ceased to studie and take payne both for the aduancement of the common welth of this his realme of Englande, of the which he was the oncly supreme gouernoz and head, and also for the defence of the same, was lately enforzmed by his trustie and faythfull friends, friendes, that the cankerd and cruell serpent the Bishop of Rome, by that Archetraylor Reignoide Poole, enemye to Gods worde, and his naturall Countre, had moued and stirred diuers great Princes and Potentates of Chyristendome to inuade the realme of Englande, and vtterly to destroye the whole nation of the same: wherfore his Maiestie in his awne person, without any delay tooke very laborious and painfull iourneys towardes the sea, coastes. Also he sent diuers of his nobles and Counsayloz to view & search all the Portes and daungers on the coastes, where any meete or conuenient landyng place might be supposed, aswell on the Borders of England, as also of Wales. And in all such doubtfull places, his highnesse caused diuers and many Bulwarkes, and fortifications to be made. And further his highnesse caused the Lorde Admirall Erle of Southhampton to pzeare in readinesse shippes for the sea, to his great cost and charges.

And besyde this, to haue all his people in a readinesse, he directed hys Commissions thozoughout the realme to haue his people mustered, and the harnesse and weapons seene and viewed, to the entent that all things should be in a readinesse, if his enemies would make any attempt into this realme: And amongst other, one Commission was directed to the right worshipfull sir Thomas Forman knight, Maior of London, and his brethren, for to certifye all the names of all men betwene the ages of. lx. and. xviij. and the number of harnesses, weapons, with their kinds and diuersities: wherby in the sayde Lorde Maior and his brethren, every one hauyng with them one of the Counsaile or learned men of the Citie repayzed to their wardes, and there by the othe of the common counsaile and Constables of the same wardes tooke the number of the men, harnesses, and weapons, accordyng to their Commission. And after that they had well viewed their Bookes, and the number of the persons, they thought it not expedient to admitt the whole number of such as were certified for hable and apt persons for to muster: Wherfore then they assembled themselves againe, and chose out of the most hable persons, and put by the other, and specially all such as had no harnesse, nor for whom no harnesse could be provided. But when they were credibly aduertised by the kinges Counsaylor Thomas Lord Cromwell knight of the noble order of the Garter Lorde priuie Seale (to whose prudence and goodnesse the Citie was touch bounden) that the king himselfe would see the people of the Citie Muster in a conuenient number, and not to set forth all their power, but to leaue some at home to keepe the Citie. Then euerie Alderman repayzed to his ward, and there put asyde all such as had Jackes, coates of Plate, coates of Mayle, and Briganders, and appoynted none but such as had white harnesse, except such as should beare Morische pykes, which had no harnesse but sculles: and they appoynted none but such as had white harnesse, neyther did they admit any that was a straunger, although they were Denizens. When it was knowen that the king would see the muster, Lord how glad the people were to pzeare, and what desyre they had to do their Prince seruice, it woulde haue made any faythfull subiectes heart to haue reioysed. Then every man beyng of any substance provided himselfe a coate of white Silke, and garnished their Bassenets with turnes lyke Cappes of Silke set with Duches, furnished with Cheynes of Golde and feathers: other gylted their Harnesse, their Halbardes, and Pollaxes.

Some, and especiall certaine Goldsmithes had their breast plates, yea and their whole harnesse of syluer bullion. The Constables were all in Jorsets of white Silke, with Cheynes, and Battell Axes. The meaner sort of people were all in coates of white cloth curiously trymmed with the Armes of the Citie before and behinde. The Lorde Maior himselfe was in a fayre Armoz the crestes thereof were gylt, and ouer that a coat of black Veluet with halfe sleues, and so was sir Roger Cholmley knight Recorder of London, and all the other Aldermen and Shirifes, and suche as had bene Shirifes, all well mounted on stirryng horses richely trapped and covered, with Battelaxes in their handes, and Hases and Chaynes about their neckes. The Lorde Maior had foure footemen all in whyte Sylke, cut, ruffed, and pounced: he had also two Pages well mounted on stirryng Coursers, richely trapped and appareled in coates of Crimosyn Veluet, and cloth of Golde paled, with Chaynes of Golde, the one bearyng his helme, and the other his Axe. He also had .xviij. tall men on foote with gylt Halbardes, whose Dublets were white sylke, and hosen, dublets, and shoes all white, cut after the Almaine fashion, puffed and pulled out with red sarrenet, every one hauyng a white leather Jerkin all to cut, and Chaynes about their neckes, with feathers and Brooches on their Cappes. The Recorder and euery Alderman had about him foure Halberdes trymmed warlyke.

The Chamberlayne of the Citie, and the Councelloz of the same and the Aldermens Deputies, which were appoynted to be Wyffellers on horsebacke, were all in white Daninaskie Coates on their harnesse, mounted on good horses well trapped, with great Chaynes about their neckes, and proper Jauelyns or Battelaxes in their handes, and Cappes of Veluet richely decked.

The Wyffellers on foote, foure hundred proper and light persons all appareled in white Silke or Jerkyngs of leather cutte, with white hose and shoes, every man hauyng a Jauelyn or Slaughter sword to keepe the people in array and Chaynes about their neckes, and white feathers in their Cappes.

The Minstres were all in white, with the armes of the Citie, and so was every other person at this Muster without any diuersitie, sayyng the Lorde Maior, the Recorder and his brethren, who had Crosses of Veluet or Satten pyled with golde.

The Standard bearers were the tallest men of every ward, for whom were made .xxx. new Standardes of the deuise of the Citie besyde banners.

When every thing was prepared, every Alderman mustered his awne ward in the fieldes, viewyng every man in his harnesse, and to cause such as could shote, to take Bowes in their handes, and the other Billes or Pykes.

The .viij. day of May, accordyng to the kinges pleasure, every Alderman in order of battaile with his ward came into the common field at White ende, and then all the Comnes leuered themselves into one place, the Pykes in another, and the Bowmen in another, and likewise the Bilmen, and there trynged and snayled, which was a goodly sight to beholde: for all the fieldes from white Chapell to White ende, and from Bednall Greene to Ratclyffe, and to Stepney were all covered with harnesse, men, and weapons, and in especiall the battaile of Pykes seemed to be a great Forrest. Then euery part was deuided into three partes, the Pykes in three partes, and so the other.

The order of the myght. r. in goyng.

About viij. of the clocke in the mozning marched forward the lyght pe- ces of ordinaunce, with stone and powder, after them folowed the Prynces, and fyfies, and immediately after them a Guydon of the armes of the Cite. Then folowed maister Sadler Capitaine of the Gunners, bypon a good horse in harnesse, and a coate of Ueluet with a Chaine of Golde, and toure Halbardes about him appareled as befoze is reherfed. Then folowed the Gunners foure in a ranke, euery one goyng five foote a sinder, euery mans shoulder euen with another, which shot altogether in diuers places berpe cherefully, and especially befoze the kinges Maieste, which at that time sate in his new gate house at his Palace at Westminster, where he viewed all the whole company: In like maner passed the second and third battailes, all wel and richly appoynted. They passed as is sayd, the foremost Capitaine at. ix. of the clocke in the mozning by the little Conduit entryng into Paules Church yarde, and so directly to Westminster, and so through the Sanctuary, and round about the Parke of Saint James, and so vp into the field, and came home through Holborne: and as the first Capitaine entered againe to the little Conduite, the last of the Myster entered Paules Churchyard, which then was foure of the clocke at after noone. The number was. xv. thou- sand, besyde Wyfflers and other wayfers.

In August the great Once and Odonele entered into the Engllthe pale in Irelande, and bzent almost twentie myle within the same: where- fore the Lorde Grey then Deputie there, assembled a great power and met with them the. xxx. day of August and put them to flight: And therefore the king sent ouer five hundred fresh souldiours to arde his deputie.

This Abbot was a sub- borne Donke and bitterly without learning. The same day was Rycharde Whityng Abbot of Glasenbury likewise attaynted and hanged on Tower hill beside his monasterie, for the sayde case and other great treasons, which also was quartered: and the first daye of December was John Beche Ab- bot of Colchester put to execution for the same confederacie and treason.

In December were appointed to wayte on the kinges highnesse person fiftie

Pencioners.

The. xi. daye of December at the Turnepike on this side Grauelynge was the Lady Anne of Cleue receyued by the Lorde Lisle, Deputie of the towne of Calice, & with the speares and horsemen belonging to the retinue there, all beyng freshe and warlike appareled, and so marchyng toward Ca- lice a mile and moze from the towne met her Grace the Erle of Southamp- ton great Admirall of Englande, and appareled in a Coate of purple Uel- uet cut on cloth of Golde, and tyed with great Aglets and Trefoiles of gold, to the number of foure hundred, and baudrick wise he ware a chayne, at the which did hang a Whyftell of Golde set with riche stones of a great value. And in his companie thirtie Gentlemen of the kings houtholde berie richely appareled with great and massy chaynes, and in especiall syz Fraunces Bri- an, and syz Thomas Seymers chaynes were of great valure and straunge fashion. Beside this the Lorde Admirall had a great number of Gentlemen in blew Ueluet and crymosyn Sattyn, and hys yomen in Danmask of the same colours, and the Maryners of his ship in Sattyn of Bridges, both coates and stoppes of the same colours, which Lorde Admirall with lowe obeysaunce welcommed her, and so brought her into Calice by the Lanterne gate, where the ships lay in the hauen garnished with their banners, pencels and flagges, pleasauntly to beholde. And at her entrie was shot such a peale of Gornes, that all the retinue much maruayled at it. And at her entrie into the towne, the Mayo: of the towne presented her with an hundred Marke in golde. And befoze the Staple hall stood the Marchaunts of the Staple well appareled, which likewise presented her with an hundred souereynes of Golde in a riche Purse, which hartely thanked them, and so she roade to the kings place called the Checker, and there she laye fiftene dayes for lack of prosperous winde. During which time goodly iustes and costly bankets were made to her for her solace and recreation. And on saint Johns daye in Christmas, she with fiftie sayle toke passage about none and landed at Deele in the dozones about five of the clock, where sir Thomas Cheiney lord Mar- den of the Portes receyued her, and there she tarped a space in a Castell newly built, and thether came the Duke and Dutchesse of Suffolke, and the Byshop of Chichester, with a great number of knightes and Esquires and Ladies of Kent and other which welcommed her grace, & so that night brought her to Douer Castell, where she rested till Monday: on which day for all the storme that then was she marched toward Cauntozburie, and on Baram downe met her the Archebishop of Cauntozbury accompanied with the Byshop of Ely, saint Alse, saint Daues and Douer, and a great compa- nie of Gentlemen well appareled, and so brought her to saint Austens with- out Caunterburie, where she lay that night: and on the next daye she came to Snytyngburne and there lodged that night. The receyuing of the Lady Anne
of Cleues at Blackheth.

On the morowe beyng the thirde day of January, and Saturday in a fayre playne on blackheth, more neerer the foote of Shooters hill, then the ascendent of the hill called blackheth hill, was pitched a riche tent of cloth of Golde and dyuers other tentes and pavilions, in the which were made syres and perfumes for her and suche Ladies as should receyue her grace: and from the tentes to the Parke gate of Grenewich were all bushes and firres cut downe, and a large and ample waye made for the thewe of all persons. And first next to the parke pale on the East side, stood the Marchaunts of the Stillyard: and the West side stood the Marchaunts of Fean, Florence and Venice, and the Spaniards in coates of Veluet. Then on both sides of the waye stood the Marchauntes of the Citie of London and Aldermen with the counsailors of the sayde Citie to the number of a. C. lx. which were mixed with the Esquires: Next byward toward the tentes stood knights: Veluet and chaines of Golde, truly accompted to the number of twelue. C. and aboue, besioe them that came with the king and her grace, which were first hundred in Veluet coates and chaines of Golde. Behind the Gentlemen stood the seruyng men in good order, well horsed and apparelled, that whosoever had well biewed them might saye that they for tall and comely personages and cleue of lymme and body, were able to geue the greatest prince in Christendome a mortall breakefast if he were the kings enemie: And of this sort the Gentlemen appertayning to the Lorde Chauncelloz, the Lorde priuie Seale and the Lorde Admirall and diuers other Lordes, beside the costly lpyeries and comely horses, wore chaynes of golde.

Pensioners.

Thus was the lane ordered in rankes, from the Parke gate toward the crosse on the heth, which was betwene the rankes and the tentes, and in this order they continued till the king and shee were returned.

About twelue of the clock her grace with all the company which were of her awne nation to the number of a hundred horse, accompanied with the Dukes of Norfolk and Suffolke, the Archebishop of Caunterburie and other Bishops, Lordes and knightes, which had receyued and conueyed her as you haue heard befoze, came downe Shooters hill toward the tentes, and a good space from the tentes met her the Erle of Rutlande her Lorde Chamberleyn, sye Thomas Denyre her Chauncelloz, and all her counsailors and officers, amongst whom Doctoz Day apoynted to be her Almoner made to her an eloquent oration in Latine, presenting to her on the kings behalfe all the officers and seruaunts: which oration was answered vnto by the Duke her brothers secretozie there beyng present: which done, the Lady Margaret Douglas, daughter to the Queene of Scots, the Ladie Marques Dorset, daughter to the Frenche Queene beyng Accres to the king, king, and the Duchesse of Richemond, and the Countesse of Rutlande and Hertford with diuers other Ladies and gentlewomen, to the number of. lxx. saluted and welcomed her grace, which alighted out of her Chariot, in the which she had ridden all her long iourney, and with most goodly demaioz and louing countenance gaue to them hartie thanks and kissed them all, and after all her counsailors and officers kissed her hande, which done, she with all the Ladies entered the tentes, and there warmed them a space.

When the king knew that shee was arrived in her tent, he with all diligence set out through the parke. And first issued the kings Trompets, then the kings officers beyng swozne of his counsaille, next after them followed the gentlemen of the kunges priue chamber, some apparelled in coates of Veluet embzodered: other had their coates garded with chaynes of Golde, betie riche to beholde, which were well horsed and trapped: after them ensued Barons, the yongest first, and so Sir Wylliam Hollis knight Lord Maior of London rode with the Lorde Par beyng yongest Baron. Then folowed Bishopps apparelled in black Sattin. Then immediatly folowed the Erles, and then Duke Philip of Bavier and Countie Palantine of the Rhyne, richely apparelled with the liuerey of the Coyfant or Golden fleece about his necke. Then folowed the Ambassadors of the Frenche king and the Emperour, next folowed the Lorde Priuie Seale, Lorde Cromwell, and the Lorde Chauncelloz: then Garter king of Armes, and the other Officers of Armes and the Sericauntes at Armes gaue their attendaunce on enery side of the Lordes: which Lordes for the most part were apparelled in purple veluet, the Lorde Marques Dorset in the same sulte bare the kings sword of estate. After him a good distance folowed the kings highnesse mounted on a goodly Courser, trapped in rich cloth of Gold trauced laticewise square, all ouer embzodered with Golde of Dammaske, pyzled on euery syde of the embzodery, the buckles and pendentes were all of fine Gold. His person was apparelled in a coate of purple Veluet, somewhat made like a frocke, all ouer embzodered with flatte Golde of Dammaske with small lace myxed betweene, of the same golde, and other laces of the same so goyng trauced wise, that the ground litle appered: about which garment was a riche garde very curiously embzodered, the sleeves and brest were cutte, lined with cloth of golde, and tyed together with great buttons of Diamondes, Rubies, and Orient Perle, his sword and sworde gyrdle adozned with stones and especiall Emerodes, his night cappe garnished with stone, but his bonnet was so rich of Juels that few men could balew them. Beside all this he wore in baudricke wise a collar of such balistes and Perle that few men euer saw the like: and about hys person ranne ten footemen all richely apparelled in Goldsmithes worke. And notwithstanding that this riche apparell and precious Juels were pleasaunt to the nobles and all other beyng present to beholde, yet his princely countenance, hys goodly personage and royall gesture so farre exceeded all other creatures beyng present, that in comparison of his person, all his ryche apparell was litle esteemed. After him folowed his Lorde Chamberleyn, then came Sye Anthony Brotonne Maister of his Horse, a goodly Gentleman and a comly personage, well horsed, trapped, and richly apparelled, leading the kings horse of estate by a long reigne of Golde, which horse was trapped in maner lyke a barde with with crimosyn beluet and satten, all ouer embzodered with golde after an anyke fashon, very curiously wzought. Then folowed the pages of honoz in coates of rich tinsell and crimosyn Beluet paled, ryding on great Coursers all trapped in crimosyn Beluet, embzodered with new deuises and knots of golde which were both pleasaunt and costly to behold. Then folowed Syr Anthony Wyngfield Capitayne of the Gard, and then the Gard well hozled and in riche cotes. In this order the king rode to the last ende of the ranke, where the speares oz Pencyoners stood: and there euery person that came with the king, placed himself on the one side oz the other, the king stading in the midg.

When her grace was aduertised of the kinges comming, she issued out of her tent beyng apparelled in a riche gobone of cloth of golde reysed, made round without any frayne after the Dutch fashon, and on her head a halke, and ouer that a round Bonnet oz rappe set full of Dryent Pearle of a very proper fashon, and befoze that shee had a cornet of blacke Beluet, and about her necke shee had a partelet set full of rich stone which glystered al the field. And at the doze of the Tent shee mounted on a fayze Horse richly trapped, with her footemen about her in Golde Smythes wozke embzodered with the blacke Lion, and on his shoulder a Carbuncle of golde, and so she marched toward the king: which perceyning her to appzoche came foze ward somewhat beyond the Crosse on black Heth, and there paused a litle in a fayze place tyll shee came nerer: then he put of his Bonnet, and came foze ward to her, and with most louely countenance and princely behauiour saluted, welcommed and embrased her to the great reioysing of the beholders: and she likewise not forgetting her dutie, with most amiable aspect and womanly behauiour receyued his grace with many swete words and great thanks and praيسings geuen to hym. And while they two were thus commoning, the fiftie Pencyoners and the Garde departed to furnish the Courte and Hall of Grenewiche. And when the king had talked with her a litle while, he put her on his right hande, and so wyth their footemen they rode as though they had bene compyled together. O what a sight was this to see so goodly a Prince and so noble a king to ryde with so fayze a Lady of so goodly a stature and so womanly a countenance, and in especiall of so good qualities, I thinke no creature could see them but his heart reioysed.

Now when the king and shee were met and both their companies ioyned together, they returned through the rankes of the knightes and Esquyers which stode still all this while and remoued not, in this order: first her Trompettes went foze ward, which were twelue in number besyde two Kettle Drummes on hozbacks, then folowed the kinges Trompettes, then the kinges Councelloz, then the Gentlemen of the priue chamber, then the Gentlemen of her Graces countrey in coates of Beluet, all on great hozles: after them the Maior of London in crimosyn beluet with a riche collar, coupled with the yongest Baron, then all the Barons, next following Bischoppes then Erles with whom rode the Erles of Quersteyne and Waldocke of her countrey, then Dukes and the Archbishop of Cauntozbury, and Duke Philippe of Sawire, next folowed the Ambassadors, then the Lorde Priuiescale and the Lorde Chauncelloz, then the Lorde Marques with the kings sword, next folowed the king himselfe equally with his fayze Ladye, and behinde him rode Syr Anthony Wozbone with the kinges hozle of estate as you heard befoze, befoze, and behinde her rode Sir John Dudley Mayster of her hozses, leading her spare palferay trapped in rich Tissue downe to the grounde: after them folowed the Henemen oz Pages of honoz, then folowed the Ladye Margaret Douglas, the Ladye Marques Dorette, the Dutchesse of Richmounde and Suffolke, the Countesses of Rutlande and Hertfozde, and other Countesses: Then folowed hir Graces Chariot in the which she rode all her iourney, well carued and gilte with Armes of her countrey curiously wzought and couered with cloth of golde, all the hozses were trapped with blacke beluet, and on them rode Pages of honoz in coates of beluet, in the which Chariot rode three auncient Ladies of her countrey: nexte after the Chariot folowed sixe Ladies and Gentlewomen of her Countrey all richly apparalcd with Cappes set with Perle, and great Chaynes of dyuers fashions, after the vsage of their Countrey, which were very fayze of face, and with them rode sixe Ladyes of England well besene. Then folowed another Chariot likewise gilt, and furnished as the other was: after that Chariot folowed ten Englishe Ladies well appareled, next them another Chariot all couered with black cloth, and in that foure Gentlewomen which were her Graces Chamberers: then folowed all the remnant of the Ladies Gentlewomen, and Maydens in a great number, which did weare that day French whodes: last of all came another Chariot all blacke, with thze Lauzers appertaynyng to her grace: next after folowed a Hozsitter of cloth of Golde and Crimosyn Beluet bpon Beluet paled, with hozses trapped accordyngly which the king sent her, then folowed the seruyng men of her traine, all clothed in blacke and on great hozses.

In this order they rode through the rankes, and so through the Parke, and at the late Friers wall all men alighted sauyng the king, the two Maysters of the hozses and the Henemen which rode to the hall doze, and the Ladyes rode to the Court gate. And as they passed they behelde on the wharfe how the Citizens of London were rowyng by and downe on the Thames euen befoze them, euery craft in his Barge garnished with Banners, Flagges, Streamers, Pencelles, and Targettes, some paynted and beaten wyth the kinges Armes, some with her Graces armes, and some with the Armes of their Craft oz Mistry: Besyde the Barges of euery Craft, there was a Barge made like a ship, called the Batchelers Barge, decked with clothe of Golde, penons, pencelles, and Targets, in great number, on whom wayted a foyst that shot great peeces of Artillary. And in euery Barge was dyuers soztes of Instrumentes, and children and men singyng, which sang and played altogether, as the king and the Lady passed on the wharfe, which sight and noyse they much praysed and allowed.

When the king and shee were within the vtter Court, they alighted from their hozses, and the king louingly embrased her, and kissed her, bidding her welcome to her awne, and led her by her left arine through the hall which was furnished beneath the harth with the kings Garde, and aboue the harth with the fiftie Pencioners with their Battelaxes, and so brought her by to her priue Chamber, where he left her for that tyme.

And asone as the king and shee was entered the Court, was shot out of the Tower of Grenewich and thereabout, a great peale of Gunnes.

When the kinges company and hers was entered the Parke, as you haue haue heard, then all the hozsemen on Blackheth brake their array, and had licence to depart to London, or to their lodgyng. To see howe long it was or the hozsemen could passe, and howe late it was in the night ere the footemen could get ouer London Bridge, I assure you it was wonderous to beholde, the number was so great.

Thus this noble Ladie remayned bmaried bntill the Tuesday folowpnyng beyng the daye of the Epiphantie: On which day about. viij. of the clocke in the moznyng, his Grace beyng appareled in a Gowne of clothe of golde, rayled with great flowers of siluer, furred with blacke Jennets, bys coate Crimosin Sattyn, all to cut and enbrodered, and tyed with great Diamondes, and a rich Coller about his necke, came solempnly with his nobilitie into the Gallary next the Closets, and there paused.

Then the Lordes went to fetch the Ladie Anne, which was appareled in a Gowne of riche clothe of golde, set full of large flowers of great and orient pearle, made after the Dutch fashion round, her heave hangyng do bene, which was fayre, yelow, and long: On her head a Coronall of golde replenished with great stone, & set about full of bzaunches of Rosemary. And about her necke and middle, Jewels of great value and estimation: In this apparell she goyng betwene the Erle of Quersteyn, and the Graunde Mayster Hostoden, which had the conduite and order of the perfozmaunce of her marriage, with most demure countenance and sad behauiour, passed through the kings Chamber, all the Lordes goyng befoze her, till they came to the Gallary where the king was, to whom she made thzee low obeysances and curtesies. Then the Archbishop of Cauntozbury receyued them, and maryed them together, and the Erle of Quersteyn did geue her: and about her maryng Ring was written: GOD SEND ME VVEL TO KEPE.

When the mariage was celebrate, they went hande in hande into the kings Closet, and there heard Masse, and offered their Tapers, and after Masse had wine and spices, and that done the king departed to his Chamber, and all the Ladies wayted on her to her Chamber, the Duke of Nozfolke goyng on the right hande, and the Duke of Suffolke on the left hande of her grace.

After. ix. of the clocke, the king with a gowne of riche Tissue lyned with Crimosyn Veluet enbrodered, came to his Closet, and she in her heare in the same apparell that she was maryed in, came to her Closet with her Sergeaunt of Armes, and all her Officers, like a Queene, befoze her. And so the king and she went openly on Prozession, and offered and dyed together. And after dinner she chaunged into a Gowne lyke a mannes Gowne, of Tissue with long sleeves gyzt to her, furred with rich Sables, her narrow sleeves were very costly, but on her head she had a Cap as she ware on the Saterday befoze with a Coznet of Laune, which Cap was so riche of Perle and stone, that it was iudged to be of great value. And after her fashion, her ladies and gentlewomen were appareled very rich and costly with Chaines of diuers fashions, and in this apparell she went that night to Euen song, and after supped with the king: and after supper were Bankettes, Maskes, and diuers disportes, till the tyme came that it pleased the king and her to take their rest.

The Sunday after were kept solempne Justes, which much pleased the the straungers. On which day she was appareled after the English fashion, with a French Whood, which so set foorth her beautie and good visage, that euery creature reioysed to behold her.

When the Erle of Querstein, and other Lordes and Ladyes which had geuen their attendaunce on her grace all that iournay, and had becne highly feasted of the King and other Nobles very sumptuously, they tooke their leaue and had great gistes geuen to them, both in money and plate, and so returned toward their countrey, leauyng behind them the Erle of Waldock, and diuers other gentlemen and Damosels, which were retayned with her grace, till she were better acquainted in the realme.

The fourth day of February next ensuyng, the king and she came to Westminster by water, accompanied with many Nobles and Prelates in Barges on whom the Maior and his brethren in scarlet, and. xij. of the chiefe companies of the Citie, all in Barges garnished with Banners, Pennons, & Targets, richly couered and replenished with musitians, gaue their attendaunce, and by the way all the shippes shot their ordinaunce, and out of the Tower was shot a great peale of Gunnes, in goodly order.

The. xxiij. day of February, were foure readers sent for to the Starre Chamber, of euery house of the foure principall Innes of Court one, where late the Lord Chaunceloz, the Lord Priuie seale, and. xiiij. of the chiefe of the kings Counsaile, and there the Lord Chaunceloz declared, howe Sir John Shelton knight, had by the aduise of sir Humfrey Browne knight the kings Serieaunt, sir Nicholas Hare knight, the kings Counsayloz, and Speaker of the Parliament, and William Coignesby Esquier, attourney of the Duchie of Lancaster, all beyng his seruantes and of his fee, declared a fraudulent will of his landes, contrary to the statute made, Anno. xxvij. to the great hinderaunce of the kings prerogatiue, and the true meanyng of the sayd statute, and also to the euill example of all other, that should defraude their Lords of their seigniozies. Wherefoze the sayd sir Humfray Browne, and sir Nicholas Hare, were that day by the who'e Counsaile of the king dismissed of their Offices and seruice to the king, and sent to the Tower: and within thzee dayes after was William Coignesby sent thether, where they remayned ten dayes, and after were deliuered: but they thzee lost all theyz Offices, that they had of the king.

The. xij. day of Aprill began a Parliament, and sir Nicholas Hare was restored to the office of Speaker, in the which was freely graunted without contradictions, foure fiftenes and a subledie, of two shillinges of landes, and xij. pence of goodes, toward the great charges of Bulwarkes.

The. xviii. day of Aprill, at Westminster was Thomas Lord Cromwell created Erle of Essex, and made great Chamberlein of England, which euer the Erles of Orenford had, which promotions he enioyed thort tyme, as in the next yere may appere.

In this Parliament also the religion of saint Johns in England, which of most men was named the knightes of the Rhodes, was dissolued, whereof heeryng sir William Weston knight, Prior of saint Johns, for thought dyed on the Ascention day, beyng the fift day of May.

In this moneth was sent to the Tower, Doctoz Wilson, and Doctoz Sampson Byshop of Chichester, for relieuing of certaine Traitcrous persons, sons, which denied the kings supremacie: and for the same offence was one Richard Farmer Grocer of London, a riche and welthy man, and of good estimation in the Citie, committed to the Marshall See, and after in Westmynster hall was arraigned and attaynted in the Premunire, and losse all hys goodes.

Thomas Lord Cromwell committed to the Tower.

The ninth day of July, Thomas Lorde Cromwell, late made Erle of Essex, as befoze you haue heard, beyng in the counsaile chamber, was so dainely apprehended and committed to the Tower of London, the which many lamented, but mo reioysed, and specially such, as eyther had beene religious men, or fauoured religious persons, for they banqueted, and triumphed together that night, many wyshing that that day, had bene seuen yere befoze, and some feating least he should escape, although he were imprisoned, could not be merie. Other who knew nothing but truth by hym, both lamented him, and hartely prayed for him: But this is true, that of certayne of the Clergie, he was detestably hated, and specially suche as had bozne foyng, and by hys meanes was put from it, for in dedde he was a man, that in all his doings seemed not to fauor any kinde of Popery, nor could not abide the snuffing pride of some prelates, which vndoubtedly whatsoeuer else was the cause of his death, did shorten his life, and procured the ende that he was brought vnto: which was that the .xix. day of the sayde Month, he was attaynted by Parliament, and never came to his aunswere, which fawne many reported, he was causer of the makynge thereof, but that is falsie and vntrue: The articles for the which he dyed, appereth in the Recorde, where his attaynder is witten, which are so long to be here reherfed, but to conclude he was there attaynted of heresie, and highe treason. And the .xxviii. day of July was brought to the Scaffolde on the Tower hill, where he sayde these wordes folowynge.

The wordes of the Lorde Cromwell spoken at his death.

I am come hether to die, and not to purge my selfe, as many haue, some thinke that I will, for if I should so doe, I were a verie wretche and miser: I am by the lawe condemned to die, and I thanke my Lorde God that hath appointed me this death, for mine offence: For sithence the time that I haue had yeres of discretion, I haue sinned a synner, and offended my Lorde God, for the which I aske him hartily forgeuenesse. And it is not vnknowne to many of you, that I haue bene a great trauayler in this worlde, and beyng but of a base degree, was called to highe estate, and sithence the time I came therevnto, I haue offended my prince, for the which I aske him hartily forgeuenesse, and beseech you all to pray to God with mee, that he wyll forgeue me. O father forgeue mee, O sonne forgeue mee, O holy ghost forgeue me: O thre persons in one God forgeue me. And now I pray you that be here, to beare mee recorde, I die in the Catholike fayth, not doubting in any article of my faith, no nor doubting in any Sacrament of the Church. Many haue slaudered me, and reported that I haue beene a bearer of such as hath maintayned euil opinions, which is vntrue, but I confesse that lyke as God by his holy spiritz, doth instruct vs in the truth, so the Deuill is readie to seduce vs, and I haue bene seduced: but beare me wytnesse that I die in the catholike faith of the ho'y Church. And I hartily desire you to pray for the kings grace, that he may long liue with you, in helth and prosperite. And after him that his sonne prince Edward that goodly ympe,

ympe, may long raigne ouer you. And once agayne I desire you to pray for mee, that so long as lyfe remaineth in this flethe, I wauer nothing in my faith. And then made he his prayer, which was long, but not so long, as both Godly and learned, and after committed his soule into the handes of God, and so patiently suffered the stroke of the Ire, by a ragged and bootherly miser, which very vngoodly perfozmed the office.

On saint Peters euen, was kept the Serieants feast at saint Iohnes with all plentie of vittayle. At which feast were made ten Serieauntes, thre out of Greys Inne, and thre out of Lyncolnes Inne, and of euery of the Temples two. At which feast were present, all the Lordes and commons of the parliament, beside the Maior and the Aldermen, and a great number of the commons of the Citie of London.

The morrowe after Midsummer dawe, the king caused the Quene to remoue to Richemond, purposing it to be moze for her helth, open ayre and pleasure: but the sixt dawe of July, certaine Lordes came downe into the nether house, which expressely declared causes, that the mariage betwene the king and her was not lawfull, and in conclusion, the matter was by the conuocation clerely determined, that the king might lawfully marry where he would, and so might she: and so were they cleerely deuorced and seprated, and by the parliament enacted and concluded, that shee should be taken no moze as Quene, but called the Lady Anne of Cleue.

In this yere the Lord Leonard Grey, brother to Thomas Lord Marques Dorset, beyng the kings Lieutenaunt in Irelande, practised sundre seates for his profite, as in deliuering Traitors beyng hostages, and especially his Nephew Fitzgarard, brother to Thomas Fitzgarard befoze executed, and also caused such of the Irishe men, as he had intelligence with all, to invade suche of the kings friendes, as he fauored not: wherefoze the king sent for him, and he mistrusting and seing no refuge, wrote to the kings enemies to invade the English pale after his departure. And also he kept the kings treasure to his awne vse, without retaining souldiours according to his commission, wherpon when he came to London, he was sent to the Tower.

In Iulye the Prince of Salerne, in the realme of Naples, and the Lorde Lois Deuola, came into Englande to see the king, which had highe chere and great rewards, and so departed. And after them came Done Frederick Marques of Padulla, brother to the Duke of Ferrare, and the Prince of Macedonia, and the Marques of Terra Noua, and Founfire de Flagy, and sirtene other Gentlemen, from the Emperors Court into England to see the king, which on the day of Mary Magdalene came to the Court to Westminster, and were highly feasted and well enterteyned, and with great rewardes departed.

The twentie and eight day of July as you haue heard befoze in this yere, was the Lorde Cromwell beheaded, and with him likewise was beheaded the Lorde Hungerford of Heytesburie, which Lorde Hungerford at the time of his death, seemed to be verie vnquyet in his minde, and rather in a frensie then otherwise.

The thirtie dawe of July, were drabone on herdels out of the Tower to Smithfielde, Robert Barnes Doctor in diuinitie, Thomas Caret and Wylliam Iherome Bachelers in Diuinitie: Powell, Fetherston, and Dowell, Fetherston, and Abell.

The last three which were Dowell, Fetherston, and Abell, were put to death for treason, and in their attaindor, is speciall mention made of their offences, which was for the denyng of the kings supremacie, and affirming that his mariage with the Ladie Katheryn was good: These with other were the treasons, that they were attaynted of, and suffered death for.

Thomas Epsam an obstinate Monk.

The fourth daye of August Thomas Epsam, sometime Monke of Westminster, which had bene prisoner for treason, thre yeres and moze in Newgate, came befoze the Justices of Gaole deliuery at Newgate, & would not aske the kinges pardon, nor be swozne to be true to him, wheretoze his Monkes garment was plucked from his back, and he repried till the king knewe hys malicious obstinacie: and this was the laste Monke that was sene in his clothing in Englande.

In this Moneth were certayne Commissioners sent by the king into Irelande, to enquire of the Lorde Leonard Gray, which certified dyuers articles agaynst him, as ye shall heare in the next yere following.

Katheryn Haward the wedded as Queene

The eyght day of August, was the Lady Katheryn Haward, here to the Duke of Norfolke, and daughter to the Lorde Edmond Haward, shewed openly as Queene at Hampton Court, which dignitie she enjoyed not long, as after ye shall heare.

A great death and strange sickness.

In the latter ende of this month was vniuersally through the realme great death, by reason of newe hote Agues and Fluxes, and some pestilence, in which season was such a drought, that Welles & small rivers were cleane dried, so that much Cattle dyed for lack of water: and the Thames was so shalowe, and the freshe water of so small strength, that the salt water flowed about London brydge, till the rayne had increased the freshe waters.

Raufe Egerton hangd

On the .xxij. daye of December, was Raufe Egerton seruaunt to the Lorde Audeley Chauncelour, hanged, drawen, and quartered, for counterfeiting of the kinges great seale, & had sealed a great number of licenses for Denizens, & one Thomas Harman that wrote them, was also executed: for the statute made the last parliament was very extreme against straungers, and namely against those which were not Denizens, which caused them to offer to Egerton great sommes of money to helpe them to be Denizens, the desire whercof caused hym to practyse, that which brought him to the ende, that befoze is declared.

The bapting of the Castell of Arde.

In the end of thys yere the French king made a strong Castel at Arde, and also a brydge ouer into the Englishe pale, which brydge the Crewe of Calice did beat downe, and the Frenchmen reedified the same, and the Englishe men bet it downe agayne. And after the king of Englande sent fiftene hundred workemen, to wall and fortifie Guyynes, and sent with them five hundred men of warre, wyth Capitaynes to defend them. The noyes ranne in Fraunce, that there were fiftie thousand Englishe men landed at Calice with great ordinaunce: wherfore the French king sent in all haste, the Duke of Wandosme, and diuers other Capitaynes, to the Frontiers of Picardy to defend the same. The king of Englande hearing thereof, sent the Erles of Surrey and Southampton and the Lorde Russell, his great Admirall mirall into the marches of Calice, to set an order there: and after them sent two. Light horsemen of the borderers of Scotlande: whome the french men called Stradiates, which Lordes when they had set all things in a good order shortly returned.

In the beginning of this yere, fine Priestes in Porke shyre began a new rebellion, with the assent of one Leigh a Gentleman, and nine Temporall men, which were apprehended, and shortly after in diuerse places put in execution, insomuch that on the .xviij. day of Maye, the sayde Leigh and one Caterfall, and Chornton, were drawne through London to Tiborne, and there were executed. And Syr John Neuell knight, was executed for the same at Porke.

On the same day was Margarete Countesse of Salisbury, which had bene long prisoner in the Tower, behedded in the Tower, and shee was the last of the right line and name of Plantagenet.

Margaret Countesse of Salisbury behedded.

The ninth day of June, were Dampozt and Chapman, two of the kings Gard, hanged at Greenewiche by the Friers Wall, for robberies in example of all other.

Dampozt, Chapman.

During this season, the commissioners that befoze were sent into Irelande, to inquire of the Lord Gray, certified twentie articles of high treason against him, wherupon he was arreigned and tryed by knyghtes, because he was a Lorde of name, but no Lorde of the parliament: howbeit he discharged the Jury, and confessed the inditement, and thereupon was iudged, and after behedded at the Tower hill, where he ended his life very quietly and godly.

The Lorde Leonard Gray condemned.

In this season was arreigned and condemned three Gentlemen, called Mantell, Roydon, and Frowdes, and were hanged at Saint Thomas of Wateringes. Likewise was Thomas fines Lorde Dacres of the South arreigned befoze the Lorde Audeley of Walden, then Chauncelloz of England, and that day Stuard of the same at Westminster, and there befoze the sayd Lorde Chauncelloz and his Dercs, he confessed the Indytement, and so had iudgement to be hanged. And the twentie and nine daye of June, beyng Saint Peters day at after noone, he was led on foote, betwene the two Shryfes of London, from the Tower through the Citie to Tiborne, where he was strangled, as common murderers are, and his bodye buried in the Church of Saint Sepulchers. The cause of the death of this noble man, and the other Gentlemen, was a murder of a simple man, and an vnlawfull assemblie made in Sussex. Great moane was made for them all, but most speciall for Mantell, who was as witty, and as toward a Gentleman, as any was in the realme, and a man hable to haue done good seruire.

Mantell, Roydon, Frowdes,

This Sommer the king kept his progresse to Porke and passed through Lincolneshire, where was made to him an humble submission by the Temporallie, confessing their offence, and thanking the king for his pardon: and the towne of Staunforde gaue the king twentie pounce, and Lyncolne presented forty pounce, and Boston fiftie pounce that part which is called Linsey gaue three hundred pounce, and Kestren and the Church of Lincolne gaue fiftie pounce. And when he entred into Porke shire, he was met with two hundred Gentlemen of the same Shire, in coates of Weluet, and foure thousand tall yomen, and Seruing men, well hozsed: which on their knees made

And on Barnefoale met the king, the Archebshoppe of Yorke, with thre hundred Priestes and moze, and made a like submission, and gaue the king six hundred pounde. Like submission was made by the Maroz of Yorke, New Castell, and Hull, and eche of them gaue to the king an hundred pound. When the king had bene at York twelue dayes, he came to Hull, and deuised there certaine fortifications, and passed ouer the water of Humber, and so through Lincolne Shyre, and at Alhalontide came to Hampton Court.

At this time the Queene late befoze married to the king called Queene Katheryn Hawarde was accused to the king of dissolute liuing befoze her maryage, with fraunces Diram, and that was not secretely, but many knew of it. And sith her marriage shee was behemently suspected with Thomas Culpeper, which was brought to her chamber at Lincolne in August last in the progresse time, by the Lady Rocheford, and were together alone, from a xi. of the clocke at night, till foure of the clocke in the morning, and to him shee gaue a Chayne, and a rich Cap. Upon this the king remoued to London, & she was sent to Sion, and there kept close, but yet serued as Queene. And for the offence confessed by Culpeper and Diram, they were put to deeth at Tibozne, the tenth day of December. And the two and twentie day of the same moneth, were arreyned at Westminster, the Lozde William Hawarde and his wife, which Lozde William was Uncle to the Queene, Katheryne Cilney which was of counsaile of her hauing to do with Diram, Elizabeth Cilney, Boulmer, Westwoude, the Queenes women, and Walgrau and William Asby, and Dampozt Gentlemen, and seruaunts to the olde Dukes of Norffolke, and Margaret Benet a Butter wife, all indited of misprision, for concealing the euill demeanoz of the Queene, to the slaunder of the king, and his succession: all they confessed it, and had iudgement to perpetuall prison, and to lose their goodes and the profite of their landes, during their liues: howbeit shortly after, diuerse of them were deliuered by the kinges pardon.

The. xvi. day of January the Parliament beganne, in the which the Lozdes and Commons assented, to desire of the king certaine petitions.

- 1 First that he would not bere himself with the Queenes offence, and that she and the Ladie Rocheford, might be attainted by parliament.
- 2 Also because protracting of tyme, which the moze should be to his quietnesse, that he would vnder his great seale, geue hys royall assent, without tariyng the ende of the parliament.
- 3 Also, that Diram and Culpepper, befoze attaynted by the common law, might also be attainted by parliament.
- 4 Also, that Agnes Duchesse of Norffolke, and Katheryn Countesse of Bridgewater her daughter, which were for concealyng the said offence committed to the Tower, Indited of misprision, and the Lozde William and othyer, arreigned of the same, might be liketoyse attainted.
- 5 Also, that whosoener had spoken or done any act, in the detestation of her abhominable liuyng, should be pardoned.

To the which petitions the king graunted, sayng that he thanked the Commons, that they tooke his sorow to be theirs. Whereupon the Queene and

and the Ladie Rocheford were attainted by both the houses. And on Saterday being the. xi. day of february, the king sent his roial assent, by his great Seale: and then all the Lozdes were in their Robes, and the common house called by, and there the acte read, and his assent declared. And so on the thirtene daye, these two Ladies were behedded on the greene, within the Tower with an axe, and confessed their offences, and died repentaunt. And shortly after the king maryed the Lady Katheryn Parre that had bene wife to the Lozde Latimer, and she was sister to the Marques of Northampton.

At this Parliament the king was proclaimed king of Ireland, which name his predecessors neuer had, but were alwayes called Lozdes of Ireland.

In the beginnyng of Marche died sir Arthur Plantagenet Viscount Lisle bastard to king Edward the fourth, in the Tower of London vntattainted, when he should haue bene deliuered, and put at his libertie. And the. xii. day of the sayd moneth, sir John Wodeley sonne and heire to the sayd Lozde Lilles wyfe, was at Westminster created Viscount Lisle.

The Parliament sitting, in Lent one George Ferrers Bourgeois for the towne of Plimouth, was arested in London vpon a condemnation, at the suite of one Whyte, whereupon the Serieaunt at Armes of the common house, was sent to the Counter in Breadstreete to fetch him: but the Clerkes would not deliuer him, wherefoze the Serieaunt and his man, would haue brought him away perforce. Diuers of the Shirifes officers there present, withstood the Serieaunt, so that they fell to quarrelling: and the Serieaunts man was sore hurt. After the fray ended, the Shirifes of London, whose names were Rowland Hill, and Henry Suckly came to the counter, and first denyed the deliury of the prisoner, howbeit afterward they deliuered him. But this matter was so taken in the common house, that the Shirifes and the Clerke, and fine officers, and the partie plaintife, were sent to the Tower, and there lay two dayes, and were deliuered againe by the Speaker and common house.

In this yere James Erle of Desmond came to the king, and was honourably enterteyned and well rewarded. And in September the great Onele came to Greenwich, where he and a Capitaine of the North parts of Ireland called Magannysse, and the Bishop of Cloar, made their submission in writyng, confessyng their offences, and promisyng to serue the king and his heires truely: which submission by the king considered, he vpon the first day of October created at Greenwich the said sir Eustace Onele called great Onele (because he was the chiefe of his linage called Onele) Erle of Cereowen, commonly called Tyrone, and gaue hym a great Chayne, and made Magannysse and his Cosyn knyghtes, and gaue them both Chaynes, and he gaue to the Lozde Mathias, sonne to the Erle, the Barony of Duncan.

At this season the kinges Maiestie prepared for warre unto Scotland, the cause why this war was made is most manifestly declared by that which foloweth, which the kinges Maiestie published by this title. A declaration conteynyng the iust causes and considerations of this present vwarre vwith the Scottes, vwherein also appereth the true and right tycle that the kinges most royall Maiestie hath to his souereigntie of Scotland. And it beginneth thus.

much abhorred and fled, by our neighbor and nephe to the king of Scots, one who aboue all other, for our manifold benefites towardes him, hath moſte iuſt cauſe to loue vs, to honour vs, and to reioyce in our quietneſſe: We haue thought good to notifie vnto the worlde his doynges and behauiour in the prouocation of this warre, and like wyſe the meanes and wayes by vs to ex- chue and aduoyde it, and the iuſt and true occaſions, whereby we be nowe prouoked to proſecute the ſame, and by vtterance and diſmullyng of that matter, to diſburden ſome part of our inward diſpleaſure and grieſe, and the circumſtaunces knowen, to lament openly with the worlde, the infidelity of this tyme, in which thinges of ſuch enormitie do breſt out and appere.

The king of Scottes our nephew and neighbor, whom we in his youth and tender age preſerued and mainteyned from the great daunger of other, and by our aucthoritie and power conducted him ſafely to the reall poſſeſſion of his eſtate, he now copelleth and forceth vs for preſeruation of our honor and right, to ble our pyſſaunce and power agaynſt him. The lyke un- kindeneſſe hath bene heretofore ſhewed by other inſemblable caſes agaynſt Gods lawe, mans law, and all humanitie: but the oftner it chaunceth, the more it is to be abhorred, and yet in the perſons of Princes for the raritie of them can ſo happen but ſeldome, as it hath now come to paſſe.

It hath bene verie rarely and ſeldome ſeene befoze, that a king of Scottes hath had in marriage a daughter of England: We can not, ne wyll not reſpetch the king our fathers act therein, but lament and be ſozy it toke no better effect. The king our father in that matter mynded loue, amitie, and perpetuall friendſhip betweene the poſteritie of both, which how ſone it fayled, the death of the king of Scottes, as a due puniſhment of God for his uniuſt inuaſion into this our realme, is and ſhall be a perpetuall teſtimonie to their reproche for euer, and yet in that preſent tyme could not the unkind- neſſe of the father extinguiſhe in vs the naturall loue of our nephew his ſonne, beyng then in the miſerable age of tender youth: but we then forget- tyng the diſpleaſure that ſhoulde haue worthily prouoked vs to inuaide that realme, nouriſhed & brought vp our nephew to achieue his fathers poſſeſſion and gouernemēt, wherein he now ſo unkindly bleth & behaueh him toward vs, as he compelleth vs to take armour and warre agaynſt him.

It is ſpecially to be noted, vpon what groundes, and by what meanes we be compelled to this warre, wherein among other is our chiefe grieſe and diſpleaſure, that vnder a colour of fayze ſpeche and flatterynge wordes, we be in deedes ſo iniured, contemned and diſpysed, as we ought not with ſuffe- rance to pretermit and paſſe ouer. Wordes, wrytynges, letters, meſſages, ambaffades, excuſes, allegations, could not more pleaſauntly, more gently, ne more reuerently be deuſed and ſent, then hath bene made on the king of Scots behalfe vnto vs, and euer we truſted the tree would bring forth good fruite, that was of the one part of ſo good a ſtocke, and continually in appa- rance put forth ſo fayze buddeſ: and therefore would hardily beleue or gene eare to other, that euer alleged the dedes of the contrary, beyng neuer- theleſſe the ſame dedes ſo manifeſt, as we muſt nedes haue regarded them, had we not bene ſo lothe to thinke euill of our nephew, whom we had ſo ma- ny wayes bound to be of the beſt ſort toward vs. And therefore hauynge a meſſage ſent vnto vs the yere paſt from our ſayd nephew, and a promiſe made made for the repayring of the ſayd king of Scottes vnto vs to Porke, and af- ter great preparation on our part made therfoze, the ſame meetynge was not onely diſappoynted, but alſo at our beyng at Porke, in the licu thereof, an in- uaſion made by our ſayde nephew his ſubiectes into our realme, declaryng an euident contempt and diſpyte of vs: We were yet glad to impute the de- fault of the meetynge to the aduiſe of his Counſaile, and the inuaſion of the lewdneſſe of his ſubiectes: and accordynge thereto gaue as benigne and gentle audience to ſuch Ambaffadors, as repayred hither at Chriſtmaffe af- terwarde, as if no ſuch cauſes of diſpleaſure had occurred, ſpecially conſide- ryng the good wordes, ſweete wordes, pleaſaunt wordes, eſtſoones propo- ned by the ſayde Ambaffadors, not onely to excuſe that was paſt, but alſo to perſwade kindneſſe and perfite amitie to enſue. And albeit the king of Scots hauynge contrary to the article of the league of amitie, receyued and enter- tyned ſuch rebels, as were of the chiefe and principle, in ſtirryng the inſurrec- tion in the North agaynſt vs with refusall befoze tyme, vpon request made to reſtoze the ſame: yet neuertheleſſe vpon offer made, the ſayde Ambaffa- dors, to ſende comiſſion to the Borderers, to determine the debates of the confines in the ſame, with ſo great a pretence of amitie, and ſo fayze wordes, as could be in ſpeche deſired: we were content for the tyme to forbear to preſſe them ouer extremely in the matter of rebelles. Albeit we neuer remitted the ſame, but deſpyous to make tryall of our ſayd nephew in ſome correſpondence of deedes, condeſcended to the ſendynge of Comiſſio- ners to the Borders, which to our great charge we did, & the king of Scots our ſayd nephew the ſembleable. Where after great trauaile made by our Comiſſioners, this fruite enſued, that beyng for our part chalenged a piece of our ground, plainely vſurped by the Scottes, and of no great value, being alſo for the ſame ſhewed ſuch euidence, as more ſubſtanciall, more autentique, more plain and euident cannot be brought forth for any part of ground with- in our realme. The ſame was neuertheleſſe by them denyed, reſuſed, and the euidence onely for this cauſe reiected, that it was made (as they alleged) by Engliſhmen. And yet it was ſo auncient, as it could not be counterſeyt now, and the value of the ground ſo litle, and of ſo ſmal waight, as no man would haue attempted to falſifie for ſuch a matter. And yet this denyall beyng in this wyſe made vnto our Comiſſioners, they neuertheleſſe by our com- maundement departed as friendes fro the Comiſſioners of Scotland, takynge order as hath bene accuſtomed for good rule vpon the Borders in the meane tyme.

After which their reſeſſe, the Lord Marſhel, Warden of the Weſt Mar- ches of Scotland, made proclamation for good rule, but yet added therewith that the Borderers of Scotlande ſhoulde withdraw their goodes from the Borderers of England: And incontinent after the Scottiſh men Borderers, the fourth of July, entered into our realme ſodainely, and ſpoyled our ſub- iectes, contrary to our leagues, enen after ſuch extremitie, as it had bene in tyme of open warre. Whereat we much maruayled, and were copelled ther- foze to furniſhe our Border with a garrilon for defence of the ſame. Where- vpon the king of Scottes ſent vnto vs James Leymouth, Maifter of hys houſeholde, with letters deuſed in the moſt pleaſaunt maner, offerynge re- dreſſe and refozation of all attemptes. of the sayd Leymouth into England, a great number of the Scottes, then not looked for, made a forrey into our Borders, to the great annoyauce of our Subiects, and to their extreme detrimēt, wherewith, and with that benefely dissimulation, we were not a litte moued, as reason would we should. And yet did we not finally so extremely persecute and continue our sayd displeasure, but that we gaue benigne audience to the sayd Leymouth, and suffered oure selfe to be somewhat altered by his wordes and sayre promises, tending to the perswasion that we euer desired to find the king of Scots such a nephew vnto vs, as our proximitie of bloud with our gratuitie vnto hym did require. In the meane tyme of these sayre wordes, the deedes of the Borderers were as extreme as might be, and our Subiectes spoiled: and in a roade made by Syr Robert Bowes for a reuenge thereof, the same Syr Robert Bowes with many other taken prisoners, and yet deteyned in Scotland, without putting them to fine and raunsome, as hath bene euer accustomed. And beyng at the same time a surleasaunce made on both sides, at the suite of the sayde Leymouth for a season: the Scottes ceased not to make sundry inuasions into our realme in such wise, as we were compelled to forget sayre wordes, and onely to consider the king of Scots dedes which appered vnto vs of that sorte, as they ought not for our dutie in defence of our Subiectes, ne could not in respect of our honor, be passed ouer vnto reformed: and therfore put in a redinesse our armye, as a due meane wherby we might attaine such a peace, as for the safegarde of our Subiectes we be bounde to procure.

After which preparation made, and knowlege had thereof, the king of Scottes ceased not to vse his accustomed meane of sayre wordes, which in our naturall inclynation wrought estones their accustomed effect, euer more desirous to finde in the king of Scottes such regarde and respect to be declared in dedes as the correspondēce of naturall loue in the nephew to such an Uncle, as we haue shewed our selfe towardes him, doth require. Wherfore vpon new request and suite made vnto vs, we determined to stay our army at Porke, appoynting the Duke of Norfolke our Lieutenaunt, the Lorde Priuiescale, the Bishop of Durham, and the Maister of our hozles, there to common, treat, and conclude with the Ambassadors of Scotlande, for an amytie and peace vpon such condicion, as by reason and equitye were indifferent, wherby the warre might be eschued, beyng by sundry inuasion of the Scottes than opened and manifest.

In this communication betwene our and their Commissioners, after diuers degrees of commission, shewed by the Scottes, and finally one that was by our commissioners allowed, matters were proponed for conclusion of amitie, nothing difficile or hard of our part, but so agreeable to reason, as the Commissioners of Scotlande sayde, they doubted not, but if it might be brought to passe, that the king of Scottes our Nephieu, might haue a meeting with vs, all matters should easely be componed and determined. Wher vpon they left speaking of anye articles of amitie, and the Ambassadors of Scotlande made much outward ioy in communication of meeting, they shewed themselves in wordes, fashion and behauor much to delight in it, so reioice in it, & therewith thought it easie and facile to be concluded and accomplished and for their part they tooke it then for a thing passed, a thing concluded, and most certaytie to take effect, and onely desyred six daies to obtaine aunswere from their Maister, and our army from that time to stay and go no further: Wherunto our Commissioners then agreed.

After these six dayes was sent a Commission out of Scotlande, with powet to conclude a meting precisely at such a place, as they knew well we would not, ne could not in winter obserue and kepe, wherewith when our Commissioners were discontent, the Ambassadors of Scotlande to releue that displeasure, and to temper the matter, wherby to win more time, shewed forth their instructions, wherein libertie was geuen to the Ambassadors to exceede their commission in the apoyntment of the place, and to consent to any other that by our Commissioners should be thought conuenient, which manner of proceeding, when our Commissioners refused, alleging that they would not conclude a meeting with men, hauing no commission thereto. The Ambassadors of Scotland vpon pretence to send for a more ample and larger commission agreeable to their instructions for appoyntment of the place, obteyned a delay of other six dayes to send for the sayde ample Commission without restraynt of place. And after those six dayes they brought forth a new commission, made in a good forme, and without exception: But therewith they shewed also new instructions, conteyning such a restraynt as the former commission did conteyn, so as the liberty geuen to the Commissioners in the commission was now at the last remoued and taken away by the instructions, with addicion of a speciall charge to the Ambassadors not to exceede the same.

And thus first the Ambassadors of Scotlande seemed to haue will and desire to conclude a place seemly and conuenient, which for want of commission they might not do, and at the last might haue concluded a meeting by vertue of their commission, and then for feare of the commaundement in their second instructions they durst not. And so they shewed their first instructions partely to excuse their king, who should seme secretly to wyll more, then in the commission he did openly professe. And then with an ample commission from the king, they shewed their secret instructions for defence of themselves why they proceeded not according to their commission, not caring how much they charged therein their king, whose fault they disclosed to discharge themselves, trusting that by benefite of the winter approaching, and the time lost in their communication their Maister should be defended against our power for this yere, without doying for their part that by honor, right, laber, and leagues they be obliged and bound to do. And in this meane time our Subiectes beyng taken prisoners in Scotland could not be deliuered vpon any raunsome, contrary to all custome and vsage of the borderers in the time of peace and warre, and in this meane time stayed a great part of our armye already prested, and in our wages to go forward. In this time Ambassadors (as ye haue heard) assembled to talke of an amytie but concluded none. The treating of amytie was put ouer by communication of a meeting.

The communication of meeting was so handled by alteration of commission and instructions on their behalfe, as it appereth a playne deuise onely inuented for a delay, which hath geuen vs light, wher vpon more certainly to iudge the king of Scottes inward affection towards vs, whose deedes and wordes well wayed and considered, doth vs playnely to vnderstande,

Subiects and crafty Scots

how he hath continually labored to abuse vs with swete and plefaunt wordes and to satistie the appetites of other at home and abroade with his unkinde and displeaunt deedes. In his wordes he professeth an indissoluble amitie, he allegeth kindred, he knowledgeth benefites, onely the fault is that he speaketh another language to all the worlde in deedes, and thereby so toucheth vs in honoz and denegation of iustice, as we be inforced and compelled to vse the sword, which God hath put in oure hande as an extreme remedie, wherby to obteyne both quyetnesse for our subiectes; and also that is due vnto vs by right, pactes and leagues.

We haue patiently suffered many delusions, and notably the last yere when we made preparation at Pozke for his repaire to vs: But should we suffer our people and subiectes to be so oft spoiled without remedie? This is done by the Scottes whatsoeuer their wordes be. Should we suffer our rebels to be deteyned contrarie to the leagues without remedie? This is also done by them whatsoeuer their wordes be. Should we suffer our lande to be vsurped contrarie to our most playne euidence, onely vpon a will, pride, and arrogancie of the other partie? This is done by them whatsoeuer their wordes be. And all these be ouer presumptuously done agaynst vs, and geue suche stignification of their arrogancie, as it is nesarie for vs to oppresse it in the beginning, leaist they should gather further courage to the greater displeasure of vs and our posteritie hereafter. And yet in the intreating of this matter, if we had not evidently perceyued the lack of such affection as proximity of bloud should require, we would much rather haue remitted these iniuries in respect of proximity of bloud to our Nephewe, than we did heretofore the inuasion of his father. But considering we be so surely ascertayned of the lack thereof, and that our bloud is there frozne with the colde aire of Scotlande, there was neuer prince moze violently compelled to warre then we be, by the unkinde dealing, vnjust behauior, vnprincely demeanoz of him that yet in nature is our Nephewe, and in his actes and deedes declareth himselfe not to be moued therewith, ne to haue suche earnest regard to the obseruation of his pactes and leagues, ne such respect to the intertainment of the administration of Justice, as naturall equitie byndeth, and conseruation of amity doth require: which we much lament and be soze for, and haue no we our force and puyssaunce agaynst him, not for reuengement of our private displeasure (beyng so often deluded as we haue beene) but for recovery of our right, the preseruation of our subiectes from iniuries, and the obseruation of such leagues as haue passed betweene vs, firmly trustyng, that almightie God vnder whom we reigne, will assist and ayde our iust proceedings herein to the furtheraunce and aduancement of the right, which we doubt not shall euer preuaile agaynst wrong, falshood, decept, and dissimulation.

Hetherto it appereth howe this present warre hath not proceeded of any demaund of our right of superiority, which the kinges of Scots haue alwaies knowleged by homage and fealtie to our progenitozs euen from the beginning: But this warre hath bene prouoked and occasioned vpon present matter of displeasure, present iniurie, present wrong ministred by the Nephewe to the Uncle most vnaturally, and supported contrary to the desertes of our benefites most vnkindly. If we had minded the possession of Scotland, and by the motion of warre to attaine the same, there was neuer king of this realme had moze oportunitie in the minority of our Nephewe. For in anye other realme a prince that hath moze iust title, moze euident title, moze certaine title, to any realme that he can claime, then we haue to Scotland, not deuised by pretence of mariage, not imagined by couenaunt, nor contrived by inuention of argument, but lineally descended from the beginning of that estate established by our progenitozs, and recognised successively of the kinges of Scotlande by deedes, wordes, actes and wytyngs continually almost without interruption, or at the least intermission, till the reigne of our progenitoz king Henry the first, in whose time the Scottes abused the ciuill warre of this realme, to their licence and boldnesse, in omitting of their duetie: which for the proximity of bloud betweene vs, we haue bene facke to require of them, beyng also of our selfe inclined to peace, as we haue euer bene alwayes glad, rather without prejudice to omit to demaunde our right if it might conserue peace, then by demaunding thereof to be sene to moue warre, specially agaynst our neighbor, agaynst our Nephewe, agaynst him whome we haue preserued from daunger, and in suche a time as it were expedient for all christendome to be vniite in peace, wherby to be the moze able to resist the common enimie the Turke.

But for what considerations we haue omitted to speake hetherto of the matter, it is neuerthelesse true, that the kinges of Scottes haue alwayes knowleged the kinges of England superior Lordes of the realme of Scotlande, and haue done homage and fealtie for the same.

This appereth first by historie, wyitten by suche as for confirmation of the truth in memorie, haue truly noted and signified the same.

Secondly it appereth by instruments of homage made by the kinges of Scottes, and diuers notable personages of Scotlande, at diuers and sundrie times sealed with their Seales, and remainyng in oure treasure. Thirdly it appereth by Registers & Records iudicially and authentically made, yet preserued for confirmation of the same. So as the matter of tytle beyng most playne, is furnished also with all maner of euidences for declaration thereof.

First as concerning histories, which be called bytnesses of times, the light of truth, and the life of memorie, and finally the convenient waye and meane, whereby the things of antiquitie maye be brought to mans knowledge, they shew as playnely this matter as could be wyshed or required, with such a consent of wyriters, as could not so agree vpon an vntruth, conteyning a declaratio of such matter as hath most euident probabilitie and apperaunce. For as it is probable and likely, that for the better administration of iustice amongst rude people, two or moe of one estate might be rulers in one Countrie vniite, as this Isle is: so is it probable & likely, that in the beginning it was so ordered for auoyding dissension, that there should be one superior in right, of whome the sayde estates should depende. Scotland, Camber the parties of Wales, and Lochrine that now is called England: unto whom as being the elder sone, the other two brethren should doe homage recognising and knowleging him as their superior. Now consider if Brutus conquered all this Ilande, as the historie sayth he did, and then in his abone time made this order of superiority as afoze: how can there be a tytle deuised of a moze playne beginning, a moze iust beginning, a moze conuenient beginning for the order of this Iland, at that time specially when the people were rude, which cannot without continuall strife and variaunce conteyne two or three rulers in all points equal without any maner of superiority, the inwarde conscience and remorse of which superiority should in some part dulle and diminish the peruerse courage of resistance and rebellio. The first diuision of this Ile we find it wrytten after this sort without cause of suspicion why they should wryte amisse. And according hereunto we find also in histories set forth by dyuers, howe for transgression agaynst thys superiority, our predecessors haue chastised the kings of Scottes, and some deposed, and put other in their places.

We will here omit to speake of the rudenesse of the antiquitie in particularitie, which they cared not distinctly to commit to wryting, but some authors, as Anthonius Sabellicus amongst other diligently enserching, what he might truely wyte of al Europe, and the Ilandes adioyning, ouer and besides that which he wryteth of the nature, maners, and conditions of the Scottes, which who so list to read, shall finde to haue bene the verie same in times past, that we finde them now at this present, he calleth Scotlande part of Englande, which is agreeable to the deuision afozesayde, beyng in dedde as in the lande continuall without seperation of the sea, so also by homage and fealtie brite unto the same, as by particuler declarations shall most manifestly appere by the testimonie of suche as haue left wryting for prooffe and confirmation therof. In which matter passing ouer the death of king Humber, the actes of Dunwald king of this realme, the deuision of Belin and Bzene, the victories of king Arthur, we shall beginne at the yere of our Lorde. 900. which is .642. yeres past, a time of sufficient aunciency from which we shall make speciall declaration and euidence of the execution, of our right and title of superiority, euermoze continued and preserved hether to.

William the Conquerour.

xxv. yeres after that, which was the yere of our Lorde. M. xciiij. the sayde Malcolme did homage and fealtie to William Rufus, sonne to the said William Conquerour: and yet after that was for his offences and demerites deposed, and his sonne substitute in his place, who likewise sayled of his dutie, and therefore was ordeyned in that estate by the sayde William Rufus, Edgar brother to the last Malcolme, and sonne to the first, who did his homage and fealtie accordingly.

Seuen yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lorde. M. C. the sayde Edgar king of Scottes, did homage to Henry the first, our progenitor.

Edgar king of Scottes.

xxviiij. yere after that David king of Scottes did homage to Matilde the Emperatrice, as daughter and heyre to Henry the first. Wherefore being after requited by Stephen, then obteynnyng possession of the realme, to make his homage, he refused so to do, because he had before made it to the sayde Matilde, and thereupon forbore. After which Dauidys death, which ensued shortly after, the Sonne of the sayde Dauid made homage to the sayde King Stephyn.

David king of Scottes.

fourtene yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lorde. M. Cij. William king of Scottes, and David his brother, with all the Nobles of Scotland made homage to Henry the secondes sonne, with a referuation of their duetie to Henry the second his father.

William king of Scottes.

xxv. yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lorde. M. Cxxv. William king of Scotland, after much rebellion and resistance, according to their naturall inclination, king Henry the second, then beyng in Normandie, William then king of Scottes knowleged finally his error, and made hys peace and composition, confirmed with his great seale, and the seales of the Nobilitie of Scot and, making therewith his homage and fealtie.

Within .v. yeres after that, which was the yere of our Lorde. M. C. lxxx. the sayde William king of Scottes, came to our Citie of Cauntorburge, and there did homage to our noble progenitor King Rycharde the first.

fourtene yeres after that, the sayd William did homage to our progenitor king John, upon a hill besydes Lyncolne, making his othe upon the Crosse of Hubert then Archbishop of Cauntorbury, beyng there present a merueylous multitude assembled for that purpose.

Alexander
king of Scottes.

xxvi. yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lord. M. CC. xvi. Alexander king of Scottes maryed Margaret, the daughter of our progenitor Henry the thirde, at our Citie of Porke, in the feast of Chyrlmasse: at which time the sayde Alexander king of Scottes repayed to the sayde feast of coronation, and there did his dutie as aforesayd.

John Bay
koll king of Scottes.

Within. xxviii. yeres after that, which was the yere of our Lorde. M. CC. lxxxi. John Balioll king of Scottes, made his homage and fealite to the sayd king Edward the first, our progenitor.

After this began Robert Bruce to vsurpe the crowne of Scotland, and to moue sedition therefore, agaynst them of the house of Baliol, which made for a season some interruption in the sayde homage: but yet no intermission without the termes of memorie. For within. xliii. yere after, which was the yere of our Lorde. M. CCC. vi. Edward Balioll after a great victorie had in Scotland agaynst the other faction, and enioyng the Crowne of Scotland made homage to our progenitor Edward the thirde.

Dauid
Bruce king
of Scottes.

And. xx. yeres after that, which was in the yere of our Lord. M. CCC. xvi. Dauid Bruce, who was euer in the contrary faction, did neuertheless in the title of the Crowne of Scotland, wherof he was then in possession, make homage to our sayd progenitor Edward the thirde.

Edward Balioll
king of Scottes.

Within. ix. yeres after this, Edward the thirde, to chastice the infidelity of the Scottes, made warre agaynst them: where after great victories, Edward Balioll hauyng the iust and right title to the realme of Scotland, surrendered ceterely the same to our said progenitor at the towne of Roxborough in Scotland: where our sayd progenitor accepted the same, and then caused himselfe to be crowned king of Scotland, and for a tyme enterterned it, and enioyed it, as very proprietary and owner of the realme, as on the one party by confiscation acquitted, and on the other part by free will surrendered vnto him.

James
Stewart king
of Scottes.

And then after the death of our sayd progenitor Edward the thirde, began sedicions and insurrections in this our realme, in the tyme of our progenitor Richard the second, which was augmented by the alteration of the state of the sayd Richard, and the deuolution of the same, to Henry the fourth, so as the Scottes had some leysure to play their bagues, and folow their accustomed maner. And yet Henry the fift for recovery of his right in Fraunce commaunded the king of Scots to attend vpon him in that iourney. And in this time the realme of Scotland beyng descended to the house of the Stewardes, of which our prepheto directly commeth, James Stewart king of Scottes, in the yere of our Lorde. M. CCC. xxiiij. made homage to Henry the fift at Windsoze. Which homage was distant from the tyme of the other homage made by Dauid Bruce. lx. yeres and more, but farre within the freshe memorie of man.

All which homages and fealties as they appere by story to haue bene made and done at times and season as aforesaid: so do there remaine instrumentes made thereupon and sealed with the seales of the kinges of Scotland testifying the same. And yet doth it appere by story, howe the Scottes practised practised to steale out of our treasury diuers of these instruments, which neuertheless were after recovered againe. And to the intent ye may knowe of what fourme and tenour the sayd instrumentes be, here is inserted the effect in worde and sentence as they be made, which we do, to mete with the cauellation and contriued euasion of the Scottes, allegyng the homage to haue bene made for the Erledome of Huntyngdon, which is as true as the allegation of him that is burnt in the hande, to say he was cut with a Sicke. And therefore the tenour of the homage is this.

I John. A. king of Scottes shall be true and faythfull vnto you Lorde Edward by the grace of God king of England, the noble and superiour Lord of the kingdome of Scotland, and vnto you I make my fidelitie of the same kingdome of Scotland, the which I holde, and clayme to holde of you: and I shall beare to you my fayth and fidelitie of life and limme, and worldly honour agaynst all men, and faythfully I shall knowlege, and shall do to you seruite due vnto you of the kingdome of Scotland aforesayd, as God so help and these holy Euangelistes.

Now for the thirde part touchyng recordes and registers, we haue them so formall, so autentiquall, so seriously handled, and with suche circumstances declaryng the matters, as they be ought to be a great corroboration of that hath bene in stories written and reported in this matter. For amonges other thynges, we haue the solempne act, and iudiciall processe of our progenitor Edward the first, in discussyon of the title of Scotland, when the same was chalenged by. xli. competitor: That is to say.

And finally after a great consultation and mature deliberation, wyth discussion of the allegations proponed on all parties, sentence was geuen for the tittle of Baliol, accordyng wherevnto he enioyed the realme. But for confirmation of the ductie of the homage before that tyme obserued by the king of Scottes, it appereth in those recordes howe when those competitor of the realme of Scotlande repaired to our sayde progenitor, as to the chiefe Lorde for discussion of the same, in as much as the aucthoritie of the iudgement to be geuen depended thereupon: It was then ordered that the whole parliament of Scotlande, spirituall, tempoꝛall and of all degrees assembled for that purpose, and considering vpon what grounde and foundation the kinges of Scotlande had in tymes past made the sayde homages and recognition of superiortie, the sayde parliament finding the same good and true, should if they so denied it, yeelde and geue place, and by expresse consent recognise the same. At which parliament was alleged vnto them, as appereth in the same recordes, not onely these actes of the Princes before those dayes, and before reherfed: but also besides the testimonie of stories, the wrytings and letters of foꝛeyn princes, at that time recityng and reherfing the same: wher vpon the sayde parliament did there agree to this

our superiortie, and ensuyng their determination did particularly and severally make homage and fealtie with proclamation, that whosoever withdrew himselfe from doynge his ductie therein, should be reputed as a rebel: And so all made homage and fealtie to our progenitor Edward the first. The realme of Scotland was in the time of the discussion of the title ruled by Gardians deputed by him and all Castels and holdes were surrendered to him as to the superior Lorde in the time of vacation, benefices, offices, fees, promotions passed in that time from the mere gift of our sayde progenitor, as in the right of this crowne of Englande, Shirifes named and appointed, wittes and preceptes made, obeyed, and executed: and finally all that we doe now in the Duchie of Lancaster, the same did our progenitor for the tyme of our contention for that tytle in the realme of Scotlande, by the consent of an agreement of all estates of the realme assembled and consulted with for that purpose. At which time the Bishops of saint Andrewes and Glascoo were not as they now be Archebishops, but recognised the Archebishop of Yorke, which extended ouer all that Countrey.

Nowe if the Scottes will take exception to the homage of their princes as made in warre and by force which is not true: what will they saye or can they for shame allege agaynst their awne parliament, not of some but of all confirmed and testified by their writings and scales: whereunto nothing enforced them, but right and reason, beyng passed in peace and quiet without armour or compulsion. If they say they did it not, they speake lyke the mischies, if they say they did it, then doe they now lyke themselves, to withdrowe their ductie, not so much to be blamed, as to be amended.

Thus appereth unto you the beginning of the right of superiortie, with a perpetuall continuance, without intermission within memorie, certayne omission and forbearynge upon the groundes and occasions befoze specified we denie not. Whereby they haue many times sought and taken their oportunitie to withdrowe the doing of their ductie in knowlege of our superiortie over them, which to avoide, they haue not cared what they sayde or alleged, though it were never so untrue: lying alwayes in a wayt when they might annoy this realme, not without their awne great daunger, perill, and extreme detriment. But as they detracted the doing of their ductie, so God ever granted unto this realme force to compell them thereunto within memorie, notwithstanding any their interruption by resilience, which unto the time of our progenitor Henry the sixt never indured so long as it made intermission within time of minde, whereby the possession might seme to be empayred, from the time of Henry the sixt unto the seventh yere of our regne, our realme hath bene for a season lacerate and torne by diuersitie of tytes till oure time and sythence by warre outwardly bered and troubled: The story is so lamentable for some part therof, as were tedious to cherse.

Sythens the death of our progenitor, Henry the sixt our Graundfather Edward the fourth reigned, who after great traueyles to attain quietnesse in this realme, finally in the time of preparation of warre against Scotlande, dyed.

Richard the third then usurped for a small tyme in yeres, whome the King our father by the strength of Gods hande ouerthrew in battayle, and most iustly attained the possession this realme, who neuertheless after the great tempestuous stormes, finding all matters not yet brought to a perfect quiet and rest, ceased and forbore to require of the Scottes to do their duty thinking it policie rather for that time to assay to tame their nature by the pleasant coniunction and conuersation of affinitie, then to charge them with their faulte, and require dutie of them, when oportunitie serued not, by force and feare to constraine and compell them.

And thus passed ouer the reigne of our father, without demaund of this homage. And beyng our reigne nowe foure and thirty yeres, we were .xxj. yere letted by our Nephew his minorite, beyng then moze careful how to bring him out of daunger, to the place of a king, then to receyue of him homage when he had full possession of the same. Wherefoze beyng now passed sithens the last homage made by the king of Scottes to our progenitor Henry the sixt a hundred .xxij. yeere, at which tyme the homage was done at Windesore by James Steward, then king of Scottes, as afoze. Ibj. of these yeres the crowne of this realme was in contention, the trouble whereof engendered also some businesse in the tyme of the king our father, which was .xxiiij. yere: And in our time .xxj. yere hath passed in the minoritye of our Nephew. So as finally the Scottes resorting to their onely defence of discontinuance of possession, can onely allege iustly but .xiiij. yere of silence in the time of our reigne, being all the other times sithens the homage done by James Steward, such as the silence in them had they bene neuer so long, could not haue ingendered prejudice to the losse of any ryght, that may yet be declared and proued due. For what can be imputed to king Edward for not demaunding homage beyng in strife for that estate, wherunto the homage was due? What should Richard the third serche for homage in Scotlande, that had nether right ne leasure to haue homage done unto him in England? Who can blame our father, knowynge the Scottes nature, neuer to do their dutie but for feare, if he demaunded not that of them, which they would exchue if they might, beyng his realme not clerely then purged from yll seede of sedicion, sparkled and scattered in the cruell ciuile warres befoze.

Law and reason serueth, that the passing ouer of time not commodious to the purpose, is not alleageable in prescription for the losse of any right. And the minorite of the king of Scottes hath endured .xxj. yeres of our reigne, which beyng an impediment on their parte, the whole prescription of the Scottes, if the matter were prescriptible, is thus deduced evidently to .xiiij. yeres, which .xiiij. yere without excuse we haue ceased and forborne to demaunde our dutie, like as the Scottes haue likewise ceased to offer and tender the same. For which cause neuertheless we do not enter this warre, ne minded to demaund any such matter, now beyng rather desirous to reioyce and take comfort in the friendship of our Nephew, as our neighbour, then to moue matter unto him of displeasure, whereby to alienate such naturall inclination of loue, as he shoulde haue towarde vs. But such be the woorkes of God, superior ouer all, to suffer occasions to be ministred, whereby due superiortie may be knowne, demaunded and required, to the entent that accordyng thereunto all thinges gouerned in due order here, we maye to his pleasure passe ouer this life to his honoz and gloze: which he graunt vs to do, in such rest, peace, and tranquillitie, as shall be meete and conuenient for vs.

When

The king sent a great army into Scotland.

When the king had set forth the declaration of the cause of his warre as is aboue mencioned. Then he sent forth the Duke of Norfolke Liueutenant generall, accompanied with the Erles of Shrewsburie, Darby, Comberland, Surrey, Hertford, Anguyth, Rutland, and the Lordes of the North partes, and s<sup>r</sup> Anthony Browne Maister of the kinges Horse, S<sup>r</sup> John Gage Comptroller of the kinges house, and twentie thousande men well appoynted, which entred Scotlande the .xxi. day of October, and taried there eyght dayes without battayle, and bzent the townes of Barton, Ramrige, Styne, Gradyn, Shylles, Lang Ednem, Newton, Skilshell, Newthorne, Smellem Spittle, the two Herdens, Slederike, and the two Broclawes, flozys and the faire Crotte, Edeem Spittell, Roxborough, Kelsey and the Abbey, Lang Spronstow, Ryden, & Hadpyngton. And while the Duke was at Farneton in Scotland, y fourth day there came to speake with him halfe a myle from the hoste, from the king of Scottes, the Bishop of Orkeney and James Leiremouth Master of the household, to entreate peace, but they agreed not. And the armye lay so longe in Scotland as they might for hunger and colde without any countenance of harme, and so for necessitie returned to Barwicke. And all this iourney the Standard of the Erle of Hampton which died at new Castell, was bozne in the foreward, because he was appoynted Capitaine of the same.

The king of Scottes heeryng that the armie was returned, rased an armie of .xv. thousand chosen men of all partes of his realme vnder the guydyng of the Lord Marwell Wardeyn of his west Marches, bostyng to tarry as long in England, as the Duke did in Scotland. And so on Friday beyng Saint Katherynes euen, they passed ouer the water of Esk, and bzent certaine houses of the Greues on the very border. Thomas bassard Dacres with Jacke of Musgrave sent worde to s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Wharton Wardeyn for the king on the west Marches, to come on to succor them: howbeit the sayde two ballant Captaines, although the Scots entred fiercelly, yet they manfully and couragiously set on them, with an hundred light horse, and left a stale on the syde of a hill, wherewithall the Scottes were wonderfully dismayde, eyther thinkyng that the Duke of Norfolke had bene come to the West marches with his great armie, or else they thought that some greater armie came, namely when they espyed s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Wharton, commyng with thre hundred men only. But at that time, so God ordeined it to be, that they at the first bzont fled, and the Englishmen folowed, and there were taken prisoners the Erles of Castelles, and Glancarne, the Lorde Marwell, Admirall and Wardein, the Lorde Flemmyng, the Lorde Sommerwell, the Lorde Oliphant, the Lorde Gray, s<sup>r</sup> Oliuer Senclere the kinges minion, John Rolfe Lorde Dragy, Robert Eskyn sonne to the Lorde Eskyn. Carre Lorde of Gredon, the Lorde Marwelles two brethren, John Kelsey Bassard to the Erle of Rothus, and two hundred Gentlemen more, and aboue .viij. hundred common people, insomuch that some one man, yea, and women had thre or foure prisoners. They tooke also .xxiiij. Gunnes, foure Cartes with speares, and ten pavilions. This was onely the handstroke of God, for the Cardinall of Scotland promised them heauen for destruction of England.

The king of Scottes tooke a great thought for this discomfiture, and also because that an English Herald called Sommerfet was slain at Dunbarre, barre, which things together he tooke so impatiently, that he dyed in a frensie. Although many reported that the king himselfe was at this bickeryng, and there receyued his deathes wound, and fled therewith into Scotlande. But howsoener it was, true it is as is aforesayde he dyed, and the Queene his wyfe was deliuered of a daughter, on our Ladie euen before Christmas called Mary. Of the prisoners aforesayd .xxiiij. of the chiefe of them, were brought by to the Tower of London, and there were two dayes. And on saint Thomas day the Apostle before Christmasse, they were solemnly conueyed through London to Westminster, where the kinges Counsaile late, and there the Lord Chaunceloz, declared to them their vnruth, unkindnesse, and false dissimulation, declaryng farther how the king had cause of warre against them, both for the dewyng of their homages, and also for their trayterous inuasions without defiaunce, and also for keepyng his subiectes prisoners without redemption, contrary to the olde lawes of the Marches, for which doynges, God as they might perceyue had scourged them: Howbeit the king more regardyng his honour, then his Princely power, was content to shewe to them kindnesse, for unkindnesse, and right for wrong. And although he might haue kept them in straight prison, by iust lawe of Armes, yet he was content that they should haue libertie to be with the nobles of his realme, in their houses. And so accordyng to their estates, they were appointed to Dukes, Erles, Bishops, Knightes and other Gentlemen, which so entertained them, that they confessed themselues neuer to be better entertained nor to haue had greater there. But after their new gladnes, tidyngs came to them, of the death of their king, which they sore lamented, and heeryng that he had left an only daughter his heyre, they wisshed her in England, to be married to the prince the kings sonne. The king and his Counsaile, perceyving the ouerture nowe to be made, which way without warre these two realmes might be brought into one, sent for all the prisoners few lackyng, to his Manor of Hampton Court, on saint Stephens day, where they were so well entertained, both of the king and his nobles, that they sayd, they neuer saw king but him, and sayd that God was better serued here, then in their Countrey: howbeit their Birkmen preached, that in England was neither Masse, nor any seruice of God. And they promised the king, to do al that in them lay with their frendes to performe as much as he required. Wheredpon not without great rewardes, they departed toward Scotland on Newyeres day, and by the way they saw the Prince, and came to Newcastell to the Duke of Suffolk, who vpon hostages deliuered them, and so they entered Scotland and were well and gladly welcomed.

Likewise the Erle of Angus, which was banished Scotland, and had of the kinges fee, yerely a thousande marke, and Sir George Douglas hys Brother had fine hundredth Marke. These were accepted into Scotland, and restored by the last kinges will, and the Erle of Angus and diuers of the Lordes that were prisoners, were made of the priue Counsaile of the realme, by the Erle of Arrein, gouerno<sup>r</sup> of the yong Queene, and the realme, as next heire apparant: notwithstanding that the Archebishop of Saint Andrews and Cardinal, enemye mortal to the king and realme of England, for the Bishop of Romes auctoritie (and partly set on by the French king, for the same cause) had forged a will, that the king had made him Gouernour, uermour, associate with two Erles of his affinitie, both of the realme and of the young Queene, contrary to the lawes of Scotland. Whereupon the sayd Erle of Arrain, accordyng to his right, with the helpe of his friendes, tooke vpon him the rule of Gouvernor, and put the sayde false Cardinall in prisen, and deliuered sir Robert Bowes and other prisoners, by their bandes, accordyng to the custome of the Marches. And so in March next folowynge, the Scottes began their Parliament.

All this yere there was neither perfite peace, noz open warre, betwene England and Fraunce, but ships were taken on both sydes, and Marchants robbed. And at the last the Marchauntes goodes on both parties were seized, and likewise the Ambassadors of both realmes were slayed: howbeit shortly after, the Ambassadors were deliuered, but yet the Marchauntes were robbed, and no warre proclaymed.

In the end of this yere, came from the Gouvernor of Scotlande as Ambassadors, sir William Hambleton, James Leymouth, and the Secretorie of Scotland, whose message was so meanelly liked, that they were faine to sende an Herald into Scotland, for other Ambassadors, and so hether came the Erle of Glancarne, and sir George Douglas, and whatsoeuer their answer was, sir George returned in post, and within .xx. dayes, came againe with an honest answer, but that honestie endured a small tyme.

In the beginning of thys yere on Trinitie Sunday, was a rebw league sworn betwene the king and the Emperour at Hampton Court, to be friends to their friendes, and enemies to their enemies.

The thirde daye of June came to the Court, from the realme of Irelande, the Lorde Obryn, the Lorde Hacke William Brough, the Lorde Hacke Gilpatrick. And in Iulye the sayde Obryn was created Erle of Colvoun, and Lorde Hacke William was created Erle of Claurikard, and syr Dunon Obryn was made Baron of Ebzanky, and so with rewardes they toke their leaue, and returned. Also the same Moneth the Scottishe Ambassadors returned with great rewardes.

At this season the king and the Emperour sent Garter and Ceylon kings at armes to demanda certayne things of the French king, which if he did denie, then to desie him, but he would not suffer them to come within his lande, and so they returned. Whereupon the sayde demands were shewed to the Ambassador at Westminster. And in Iuly the king sent over sixe thousand tall men, wherof was Capitayne generall, syr John Malloy, and syr Thomas Seymour Marshall, and syr Richard Cromwell Capytayne of the horsemen, which assaulted a towne called Laudersey, vnto the which assault came the Emperour in proper person: And shortly after came doone the French king in proper person with a great armie, and offered the Emperour battayle, by reason wherof the siege was raysed, and streight the Frenchmen bittayled the towne, which was the onely cause of their commynge. For the next day the Emperour beyng redie at the houre appoynted to geue battail, & the french men made great shew, as though they would haue come forward, but they dalyed of al that day, and in the night they ran away, and trusted some to their horses, and some to their legges lyke tall felowes.

And in thys time by reason of a statute that was lately made, commonly called the statute of sixe articles, there was many men in trouble namely at at Wyndsoze, but for this and suche other that concerne religion, I referre you to the boke of the monuments of the Church published by maister Fox.

The Lords of Scotland who in the last yere (as you haue heard) were taken prisoners in England, were at New yeres tyde released and sent home ransom fre into Scotland vpon their othes and promise to do that in them lay for the conclusio of a mariage to be had betwene Mary the sole and only heire of Scotland, and Edward the prince and heire of England, who immediately vpon their returne did cause to be sommoned & conuocated a parliament in Scotland, and in the same concluded, agreed & determined the aforesaid mariage, and confirming their act vnder their great seale, sent the same vnto king Henry the eight. And for the better conclusion and solemnization thereof: there was time and place appointed: But here vnto the Cardinal of saint Andrewes would not agree: Wherefore the Lordes committed hym to safe custodie, and shortly after by the meanes of the French king, the Lordes of Scotlande went from all that they had done, and namelye the Lorde Hambleton the gouernour, who went both from his oth and promise, the which was the occasion that king Henrye made agayne newe promise for warre, and sent into Scotlande a great power to theyr no little losse and detryment, as in the yere next following shall be shewed.

This yere was in London a great death of the pestilence, and therefore Michelmass terme was adiourned to saint Albones, and there was it kept to the ende.

In the weke of Christmasse came to the king to Hampton Court Ferdinando de Gonzaga Viceroy of Sicile prince of Malfeta Duke of Juano Capytaine generall of the chualrie and armie of the Emperour Charles, which came to the king to appoint what time the armie and the Emperour should be readie to invade Fraunce, and the appointment taken he departed and had for his rewarde a. C. liii. ounces in golden plate, and foure thousand three ounces in gyrlt plate, which all was very curiously wrought. And all the time that he lay here, he lay at the kings cost.

The Sunday before Christmas was Lord William Parre, brother to the Queene, which had married the daughter and heire of Lorde Henrye Burchier Erle of Essex, at Hampton Court, created Erle of Essex. And sir William Parre knight Uncle to them both, was made Lorde Parre of Hoxton and Chamberlayne to the Queene. And on Newyeres day was Sir Thomas Wriothesley the kings secretarie, made Lorde Wriothesley of Tichefelde.

Also this yere was open warre proclaymed with Fraunce, and licence geuen to the kings subiectes to seaze vpon the french men and their goods, as in like cases before had bene accustomed.

This yere the king sent a great armie into Scotlande by Sea, and he made the Erle of Hertford Lieutenaut generall of the same. And the Viscount Lisle high Admirall, which halpaunt capitaynes so sped them, that the thirde day of May the Lorde Admirall arriued with all his flecte, which was two. C. sayle in the Fryth, where hee landed dpuers of hys men, and there tooke diuers vessels, which after did high seruire. And shortly they approached vnto the towne of Lith where they landed their men, and marched forward in thre great battayles, wherof the Lorde Admirall led the hawarde, the Erle of Shrewesburge the arerwarde, and the Noble Erle of Hertford being Lieutenaunt of the battaile: where they founde the Scottes assembled to the number of sixe thousande horsemen beside footemen to stop the passage of the army. And at the first the Scottes made towarde the Englishe men as though they woulde haue set on the bawarde, but when they perceyued the Englishe men so willing to encounter with them, namely the Cardinall who was there present, which perceyued the deuotion the Englishe men had to see hys holynesse, after certayne shot on both sides, they made a sodayne retreat, and leauing their artillarye behinde them fledde towarde Edenborough. The first man that fled was the Cardinall like a valiaunt Champion, and with him the Gouernour, the Erle of Huntley, Murray and Bothwell, with many other great men of the realme. And shortly after the English men mauger all the Scottes might doe, entred the towne of Lich where that night the army encamped them, and there they found such riches as they thought not to haue founde in any towne of Scotland.

Lich taken and spoiled.

The next day the Armye went towardes Edenborough towne, and when they aproched nere, the Prouost of the towne accompanied with one or two Burgessees, and two or three Officers at armes desired to speake with the kings Lieutenaunt, and in the name of all the towne said, that the keys of the towne should be deliuered vnto his Lordship conditionallye that they might goe with bag and baggage, & the towne to be saued from fire: Wherevnto answer was made by the sayd Lieutenaunt, that whereas the Scots had so manifestly broken their promises confirmed by othes and Seales and certefied by the whole Parliament, as is evidently knowne to the whole worlde, he was sent thether by the kings highnesse to take vengeance of their detestable falshood, to declare and shewe the force of his highnesse sworde to all such as should make any resistance vnto his graces power sent thether for that purpose: And therefore he tolde to them resolutely that vnlesse they would yelde by the towne frankly without condition, and cause man, woman and childe, to issue into the fieldes, submitting them to his will and pleasure, he would put them to the sworde, and their towne to the fire. The Prouost answered that it were better for them to stande to their defence. Wherevpon commaundement was geuen to the saide Prouost and Officers at armes vpon their perill to depart. And forthwith the Lozde Lieutenaunt sent to the baward that they should march towards the towne which courageously set forward, and the Englishe Gunners manfully set on the gates, specially Sir Christopher Morice, that they did beat the Scottes from their Ordinance, and so entred the gate called Cany gate by fine force and there slue a great number of the Scottes: And finally, it was determined by the sayde Lozde Lieutenaunt vtterly to ruinate and destroy the saide towne with fire, which thing immediatly was attempted, but because night was come, the armye withdrew to their campe, & then a fre the next day set fire where none was beioze, which continued that daye and two dayes after burning. And shortly after came vnto this armye by lande foure thousand light horsemen sent by the king, which after they were come, the armie forsoke their shippes and sent them whome laden with spoyle and Gunshot which they founde there, and dislodged their campe out of the towne of Lich, and set fire in euery house, and bzent it to the ground: and so returned home by

In this yere also the kings Maiestie prepared two great armies to Fraunce, the one was conducted and led by the Duke of Norfolke, and the gentle Lozde Russell Lozde priuie seale, which encamped at Nuttrell and besieged the towne, where they laye a long time, and left the towne as they founde it: The other armie was led by the valyaunt Duke of Suffolke which was the kings Luetenaunt of that armie, and beyng accompanied with the Lozde Chamberleyn, the Erle of Arondell Marshall of the field, and syr John Gage Comptroller of the kings house, & syr Anthony Browne maister of the kings horses, with dyuers & many other Capitaynes: the .xix. day of July encamped befoze Bulleyn on the East side of the same vpon the hill, where after many sharpe skirmishes they gayned first the olde man, and shortly after basse Boleyn.

The fourtene day of July the kings maiestie in his royall person passed the seas from Dover to Calice, and the five and twentie day encamped him selfe befoze Bulleyn, on the North side within lesse then halfe a mile of the towne, where his grace remayned till the towne was surrendered vnto his maiesty: the which towne he so sore assaulted and so besieged with such abundance of great ordinaunce, that neuer was there a more valyaunter assault made, for beside the vndermyning of the Castell, tower and walles, the towne was so beaten with ordinaunce, that there was not left one house whole therein : and so soze was layde to the charge of the Frenchmen that after the king had assaulted them by the space of a Month, they sent forth of the towne to the king two of their chiefe Capitaynes, called Semble- mound, and Mounfire de Haies, which declared that the chiefe Capitayne of the towne with his retinue was contented to deliuer the towne vnto his grace, so that they might passe with bagge and baggage, which request the kings maiestie, mercifully graunted them. And so on the next day, the Duke of Suffolke rode into Bulleyn, to whome in the kings name, they deliuered the keyes of the towne. And at after none departed out of Bulleyn all the frenche men. The number of the men of warre, that were strong and galant, that came out of the towne were of horsmen. lxxij. of foemen. xv. C. lxxij. of Scners eyght hundred, of hurmen. lxxij. of women and children. xix. C. xxij. So there was in all that came out of the towne, foure thousand, toure hundred, fittie and foure, beside a great number of aged, sick, and hurt persons, that was not able to go forth of the towne. The last person that came forth, was Mounfire de Uruiue, great Capitaine of the towne, which when he approched neere the place where the king stode, he alighted from his horse, and came to the king. And after he had talked with him a space, the king toke him by the hand, & he reuerently kneeling vpon his knees, kised his hand, & afterward mounted vpon hys horse, & so departed.

The xxvij. day, the kings highnesse hauing the Lu. de bozne naked befoze him, by the Lorde Marques Dorset, like a noble and halant Conquerour rode into Bulleyn, and all the Trompetters standing on the walles of the towne, sounded their Trompetts, at the time of his entering, to the great comfort of all the kings true subiectes, the same beholding. And in the enteriug, there met him the Duke of Suffolke, and deliuered vnto him the keyes of the towne, & so he roade toward his lodgyng, which was prepared for him on the South syde of the towne. And within two dayes after, the king rode about all the towne within the walles, and commaunded that our Lady Church of Bulleyn, should be defaced & plucked downe, where he appointed a Mount to be made, for the great force & strength of the towne.

When the king had set all thinges there in suche order, as to his wisdom was thought best, he returned, to the great reioysing of all his lo- uing subiectes.

In the meane season, that the king lay befoze Bulleyn, and was like to haue conquered the same, as at the last he did, as befoze you haue heard, the Emperour tooke a peace with the frenche king, to the no little grieffe and displeasure of the kings Maiestie, and that was the cause that the king so sodainly brake by his armie, aswell at Bulleyn, as also at Butterell, and so he returned.

Shortly after, diuers and many sharpe skirmishes were made by the Frenchmen at Bulleyn namely by the Dolphyn, who with a great power in the night season stole vpon Base Bulleyn, takyng there a great sort of sick persons, and women in there beddes, whome without mercy they slue. Howbeit so manfully the Englishmen, which escaped out of Base Bulleyn beha- ued themselves, gettyng weapons out of the highe towne, that they beate the frenche men againe out of the Base Towne, and after with the helpe of the high towne, they slue a great number of them, and so againe poss- sessed

sed quietly, the sayd Base towne : Besyde I say this skirmishe and many mo, Mounfire de Bees came with. xv. thousand men, and encamped right agaynst the towne on the other syde of the water, extendyng there to haue builded a fort. But the fourth day of February, he was set vpon in his aboue Campe, by the moit valiant and fortunat Erle of Hertford, and Lord Lillie, the Lorde Gray and other : at whose commyng the sayde Mounfire de Bees, with all his puyssaunce fled, leauyng behinde them all their Ordinaunce, Centes, and Plate.

The seuenth day of June, a great armie of Frenchmen, came nere to the haue of Bulleyn, and skirmished with the Englishmen, to the no great gaine of the Frenchmen: but this armie which was accompted to the number of. xx. thousande there encamped, began againe to builde a fort, which before they departed accomplished the same.

In June the Lorde Lisse Admirall of England, with the English flete entered the mouth of Sain, and came befoze new Hauen, where the great armie of France lay, which were two hundred shippes, and. xxvj. Gallies of force, whereof the Bishop of Rome had sent. xx. well furnished with men and money, to ayde the french king. The Englishmen beyng but an hundred. lv. saile, and all great shippes, did not determine to set on the whole nauie, but shot certaine peeces of ordinaunce at them, which caused the Gallies to come abroade, and shot at the Englishmen, which Gallies had great ad- uantage, by reason of the calme weather : twise eche part assaulted other with ordinaunce, but sodainly the winde rose so great, that the Gallies could not endure the rage of the seas : and the Englishmen were compelled to enter the maine seas, for feare of flattes, and so sailed vnto Portesmouth, where the king then lay, for he had knowlege by his espials, that the french armie intended to land in the Isle of Wight, wherefoze he repayed to that cost to see his realme defended.

After the departyng of the English nauie from new Hauen, the Ad- mirall of France, called the Lorde Danibalt, a man of great experiance, halled by his sayles, and with his whole nauie, came to the poyn of the Isle of Wight, called Saint Helenes poyn, and there in good order cast their Ankers, and sent. xvj. of his Gallies daily to the very Hauen of Portesmouth. The English nauie lying in the haue, made them prest and set out towards them, and stil the one shot at the other. But one day aboue al other, the whole nauie of the Englishmen made out, and purposed to set on the Frenchmen: but in their setting forward, a goodly shippe of Englande called the Marye Rose, was by to much folly drowned in the middes of the Hauen, for she was laden with to much ordinaunce, and the portes left open, which were berye low, and the great ordinaunce vnbreeched, so that when the ship should turne the water entered, and sodainly she sank. In her was Sir George Carewe knight, Capitaine of the sayde shippe, and foure hundred men, and much ordinaunce.

At the same tyme certaine of the Frenchmen landed in the Isle of Wight, where there Capitaine was slaine and many other, and were both to theyr great losse and paine, driven againe to their Gallies.

The king perceiuyng the great nauy of the french men to approach, sent letters for men into Hampshire, Sommer set wite, wilshire, and diuers other places adioynng: which repayed to his presence in great numbers, well furnished with armure and breule, and all thinges necessarie, so that the Isle was garnished, and all the frontiers on the Sea coast, furnished with men in great number.

The french Capitaines hauyng knowlege, by certain fishermen which they tooke, that the king was present, and also of the great power that he had in redinesse, they disankred, and sayled alonges the coastes of Suffex, and a smal number of them landed in Suffex, which neuer returned to their ships, for they were taken by by the way.

When they had searched all the coast, and saw men euer redie to receiue them, they turned the sterne, and returned home again, without any act wortie to be wozitten, done, or enterprised: sauynge that in this meane time theye new Fort against Bulleyn, was strongly furnished and finished.

The number of the frenchmen, as diuers prisoners that were taken in the Isle of Wight, and in Suffex did report, were. lx. And at this tyme the french king wrote to the Emperoz, and declared to him that his armye had gotten the Isle of Wight, the Portes of Hampton, & Portesmouth, and diuers other places, which wrytyng was as true, as the french king hath in all his leagues and promises bene to the king of England.

In August folowynge, the noble Erle of Hertford entered againe into Scotland, with. xij. thousand men, and destroped all the towncs in the middle Marches, and passed to the west Marches, to the great detriment and losse of Scotland, and destroyed Coldingham Abbey: and yet the frenchmen and Scottes which lay at Kelfer, durst not once encounter with him.

In this Moneth died Charies, the noble and balaunt Duke of Suffolke, a hardie Gentleman, and yet not so hardie, as almost of all estates and degrees of men, high and low, rich and pooze, hartily beloued, and his death of them much lamented, he was buried at Windsor.

The. xxiiij. day of Nouember, a Parliament began at Westminster, by aucthoritie whereof, was graunted to the king a subledie of two shillinges bill. pence of the pound, of moueable goodes, and foure shillinges the pounce in lande, to be payed in two yere. And all Colleges, Chaunteries, and Hospitals, were committed to the kings order, durynge his lyfe, to alter and transpase: which his grace at the prorogation of the Parliament, promysed to do to the glorie of God, and the common profite of the realme.

A little before this tyme, the noble and balaunt Lord Lisse, Lorde Admirall, landed in Normandie, and brent the suburbs of Trepport, and diuers villages along the Sea coast, and destroyed and tooke almost all the wyppes in the haueu, which was a riche and a goodly praye, and so returned without any dammage.

The french king sore moued with these doynges, sent Mounfire de Bees with. xij. M. men, which entered into the English pale, besyde Grauelyn, and brent Marke and diuers small villages, and then returned.

Euer in maner were skirmishes and Alarmes betwene high Bulleyn, and the new buyded Fortresse, but the losse ranne euer on the frenchmens side.

This yere was meanes made by the Emperoz, that certaine Ambassadors of England and fraunce might mete to common of a peace, wherupon the king of England sent to Guisnes, Cuthbert Bishop of Durisme, sir William am Paget his Secretoz, and doctor Tregonell. And the french king sent to Arde a Bishop, the chiefe prestent of Roan, and a Notarie, but no conclusion came to effect. Wherefore the king hauyng perfite knowlege, howe the frenchmen intended to builde a newe Fortresse on Saint Johns rode, betwene Bullein and Calice: which thing had not onely sore distruffed Calice, but dayly had put Bulleyn in trouble. Wherefore he meanyng to preuent so great a mischiefe, sent ouer the noble Erle of Hertford, and the balaunt Lord Lisse Admirall, and many balaunt Capitaynes, with seuen thousand good Souldiours, which gat the rode but two dayes before the frenchmen appointed to haue bene there, and in that place encamped themselves. Mounfire de Bees leader and conductor of all the french affayres, encamped himselfe besyde Hardilow, and durst not once come forth to set on our men, notwithstanding his former preparation and deuice.

These thinges thus hangyng, many great skirmishes were dayly betwene the Bulleinois, and the french Bastillon: and one day the one part lost and the other gayned, and likewise the losers regayned: but in one skirmish were lost. xvi. English Gentlemen, and. lxxx. other, although there were slain three rascall frenchmen, and in this skirmish was slaine, sir George Bolelard. And in a like tournay was slaine sir Raufe Elderkare, Capitaine of the light horsemen, with a few other Englishmen, but yet a great multitude of frenchmen, at that tyme lay on the grounde.

The. xxiiij. day of December, the kinges Maiestie came to the Parliament house, to geue his royall assent, to such actes as there had passed, where was made vnto him by the Speaker, an eloquent oration, to the which it hath euer bene accustomed, that the Lord Chaunceloz made answer, but at this time it was the kinges pleasure, that it should be otherwise, for the king himselfe made him answer, as foloweth woerde for woerde, as nere as I was able to report it.

Although my Chaunceloz for the tyme beyng, hath before this tyme vsed, a very eloquently and substantially, to make answer to such orations, as hath bene set forth in this highe Court of Parliament, yet is he not so able to open and set forth my mynde and meanyng, and the secretes of my heart, in so plaine and ample maner, as I myselfe am and can do: wherefore I takyng vpon me to answer your eloquent oration Maister Speaker, say that where you in the name of our welbeloued Commons, hath both prayed and extolled me, for the notable qualities, that you haue conceyued to be in me, I most hartily thanke you all, that you haue put me in remembraunce of my duetie, which is to endeuor myselfe to obtaine and get such excellent qualities, and necessarie vertues, as a Prince or Governour should or ought to haue, of which giftes I recognise myselfe, both bare and barrein: but of such small qualities, as God hath endued me withall, I render to his goodnesse my most humble thankes, entyndng with all my wit and diligence, to get and acquire to me such notable vertues, and princely qualities, as you haue alleged to be incorporate in my person: These thankes for your louyng admonicion and good counsaile first remembred, I essones thanke you againe, because that you consideryng our great charges (not for our pleasure, but for your defence, not for our gaine, but to our great cost) which we haue lately susteyned, aswell in defence of our and your enemies, as for the conquest of that that forreffe, which was to this realme most displeasent and noysome, and shall be by Gods grace hereafter, to our nation most profitable and pleasant, haue freely of your awne myndes, graunted to vs a certayne subside, here in an act specifyed, which verily we take in good part, regardyng more your kindnesse, then the profite thereof, as he that setteth more by your louyng heartes, then by your substance. Besyde this hartie kindnesse, I cannot a little reioyce when I consider, the petite trust and sure confidence, which you haue put in me, as men hauyng vndoubted hope, and vnfeyned beliefe in my good doynge, and iust procedynges for you, without my desyre or request, haue committed to mine order and disposition all Chauntries, Colleges, Hospitals, and other places specifyed in a certayne act, firmly trusting that I will order them to the glozy of God, and the profite of the common welth. Surely if I contrary to your expectation, should suffer the ministers of the Church to decay, or learnyng (which is so great a Jewel) to be diminished, or poore and miserable people, to be vncircled, you might say that I beyng put in so speciall a trust, as I am in this case, were no trustie friend to you, nor charitable man to mine euen Christian, neither a louer of the public welth, nor yet one that feared God, to whome account must be rendered of all our doynge. Doubt not I pray you, but your expectation shall be serued, more Godly and goodly then you will wishe or desyre, as hereafter you shall plainly perceue.

Now sithence I finde such kindnesse, on your part toward me, I cannot chole, but loue and fauor you, affirming that no pryncer in the world more fauoreth his Subiectes, then I do you, nor no subiectes or Commons more loue and obaye their soueraigne Lord, then I perceyue you do me, for whole defence my treasure shall not be hidden, nor if necessitie require my persone shall not be vndaduentured: yet although I wyth you, and you wyth me, be in this petite loue and concord, this friendly amytie cannot continue, except both you my Lordes temporall, and you my Lordes spirituall, and you my louyng subiectes, studie and take paine to amende one thing, which surely is amys, and far out of order, to the which I most hartely require you, which is, that charitie and concord is not amongst you, but discorde and dissencion, bereth rule in euery place, Saint Paule sayeth to the Corinthians, and in the .xiiij. Chapter, Charity is gentle Charity is not enuious, Charity is not proude, and so forth in the sayde Chapter: Beholde then what loue and Charity is amongst you, when the one calleth the other Heretick and Anabaptist, and he calleth him againe Papist, Ppocrite and Pharasay. Be these tokens of charitie amongst you? Are these signes of fraternall loue betwene you? No, no, I assure you, that this lacke of charitie amongst your selves, will be the hinderance and asswaging, of the seruent loue betwene vs, as I sayde before, except this would be salued, and clerely made whole. I must nedes iudge the faultie and occasion of this discorde, to be partly by negligence, of you the fathers and Preachers of the spiritualtie. For if I know a mā which liueth in aduiterie, I must iudge him a lecherous and a carnall persone: If I se a man boast and brag himselfe, I cannot but deeme him a proud man. I se here dayly that you of the clergye preache one agaynst another, teach one contrary to another, inueigh one against another without charitie or discrecion. Some be to stiffe in their olde Sumpsums, other be to busy and curyous, in their new Sumpsums. Thus all men almost be in varietie and discorde, and few or none preach truly and sincerely the worde of God, accordyng as they ought to do. Shall I iudge you charitable persones doynge this? No, no, I cannot so do: alas how can the poore soules liue in concord, when you preachers sowe amongst them in your sermons, debate and discorde? Of you they looke for light, and you bring them to darkenesse. Amend these crimes I exhorte you, and set forth Gods worde both by true preaching and good example geuing, or else I whom God hath appoynted his Vicare, and high minister here, will se these deuisions extinct, and these enormities corrected, accordyng to my very dutie, or else I am an vnprofitable seruaunt, and an untrue officer.

Although I say the spiritual men be in some faulte, that charitie is not kept amongst you, yet you of the temporallie, be not cleane and vnspotted of malice and enuy, for you rayle on Bishops, speake slanderously of Priests, and rebuke and taunt Preachers, both contrary to good order, and Christian fraternitie. If you know surely that a Bishop or Preacher, erreth or teacheth peruerse doctrine, come and declare it to some of our Counsaile or to vs, to whome is committed by God the high auctoritie to refoyme and order such causes and behauiours: and be not iudges your selues, of your owne phantasticall opinions, and baine expositions, for in such high causes ye may lightly erre. And although you be permitted to reade holy Scripture and to haue the worde of God in your mother tongue, you must vnderstand that it is licensed you so to doe, onely to infoyme your owne conscience, and to instruct your children and famly, and not to dispute and make Scripture a rayling and taunting stocke, against Priests and Preachers (as many light persons do) I am very sozy to knowe and here, how vnrueerently that most precious iewel the worde of God is disputed, rymed, song, and iangeled in euery Alehouse and Tauerne, contrary to the true meaning and doctrine of the same. And yet I am euen as much sozye, that the readers of the same, solow it in doynge so sayntly and coldely: for of this I am sure, that charitie was neuer so saynt amongst you, and vertuous and godly liuing was neuer lesse bled, nor God himselfe amongst Christians was neuer lesse reuerenced honored, or serued. Therefore as I sayde before, be in charitie one with another, like brother and brother, loue dzed and serue God (to the which I as your supreme heade, and soueraigne Lord, exhorte and require you) and then I doubt not, but that loue and league, that I spake of in the beginning shall neuer be dissolued or broken betwene vs. And to the making of lawes which be now made and concluded, I exhorte you the makers, to be as diligent in putting them in execution, as you were in making and furthering of the same, or else your labor shall be in vaine, and your common welth nothing relieued. Now to your petition, concerning our royall assent, to be geuen to such actes as hath passed both the houses. They shall be read openly, that ye may heere them. Then were they openly read, and to many his grace assented, and diuers he assented not vnto. This the kinges Oration was to his Subiectes there present such comfort, that the like ioye could not be vnto them in this world. And thus the actes reade, as the maner is, and his assent geuen, his grace rose and departed.

In this tyme there was by the frenche men, a boyage made toward the the Isle of Brasile, with a ship called the Barcke Alger, which they had taken from the Englishe men befoze. And in their way they fortun'd to meete sodainely with a little Craer, of whome was mayster one Goldyng, which Goldyng was a feat and hardie man. The Barcke perceyuing thys small Craer to be an Englishe man, shot at him and bouged him, wherefoze the Craer drewe straight to the great ship, and sixe or seuen of the men lept into the Barcke. The Frenchmen looking ouer the boorde at the sinking of the Craer, nothing mistrusting any thing that might be done by y<sup>e</sup> Englishmen. And so it fortun'd that those Englishmen, which climed into the ship, found in the end therof a great nuber of lime pots, which they with water quenched, or rather as the nature therof is, set them a fyze, & thzew them at the French men that were aboarde, and so blynded them, that those few Englishmen that entered the ship, banquished all that were therein, and draue them vnder hatches, and brought the Barcke cleerly away agayne into England.

A peace concluded betwene England and Fraunce.

In the Month of Aprill, by meanes of dyuers princes, an assemble was had, betwene both the realmes of Englande and Fraunce at Guynes and Arde. There were for the king of Englande, the Erle of Hertford, the Lozde Lisle Admirall, Sir Wylliam Paget Secretary, and Doctor Wotton Deane of Cauntozbury. And for the frenche king, the Lozde Clado Doneball Admirall and Marshall of Fraunce, the Bysshop of Eureux, a President and a Secretary. After long debating and diuers bzeches, a peace was concluded, and proclaymed in the kinges Courte, and in the Citie of London on Whitsonday, with sound of Trompettes. And lykewise was it done at Parys and Roan. For the performauce wherof, the Viscount Lisle Admirall, wyth the Bysshop of Buresine, and dyuers Lozdes, and aboue an hundred Gentlemen, all in Velvet coates and cheynes of golde, went to Parys, and were there solemnly receyued and feasted, and shortly returned.

Ambassadors
of Fraunce.

After whose returne, the Admirall of Fraunce, accompanied wyth the Bysshop of Eureux, the Erles of Hauteuile, and Williers, and dyuers great Lozdes, besyde two hundred gentlemen well appoynted, tooke hys Galee at Deepe, and hauyng in his companie twelue sayre Galies, well trimmed and decked, sayled into Englande, and neuer tooke lande, tyll he came to Grenewiche, where he was receyued by the Erles of Essex, and Darby, the xix. day of August. And the next daye, he with all his Galies, landed at the Tower wharfe, and on all the bankes by the water syde, laye peeces of ordinaunce which shot of, but especially the Tower of London, where was shot a terrible peale of ordinaunce. And from thence he roade throug London, in great triumph, the Mayoz and the craftes standyng in the streetes in good order, to the Bysshops Palace of London, where he lodged till Bartholmew euen, on which day he was conueyed toward Hampto Court, where in the waye the prince hauyng with him the Archebysshop of Yorke, the Erles of Hertforde, and Huntynghdon, and aboue two thousand horse, met him and embraced him, in such loboly and honorable maner, that all the beholders greatly reioysed and much maruayled at hys wit and audacitie, and so he came to the Court, geuyng the prince the upper hande as he rode. And at the utter gate of the Court, the Lozde Chaunceloz, and all the kinges counsaile receyued him, and brought him to his lodgyng.

On Bartholomew daye, the king richely appareled, welcomed him, and in great triumph went to the Chapel, where the league was swozne and signed. To tell you of the costly banquet houses that were built, and of the great banquets, the costly Maskes, the liberall huntings that were shewed to hym, you would much maruaile, and scant beleue. But on Fryday folow- yng, he beyng rewarded with a Cupbozde of Plate, to the value of twelue hundred pounde, returned to London, and on Sunday tooke his Galies and departed. Beside this diuers of his companie, had much plate, and manye horses and Greyhounds geuen them. Also the Admirall had geuen to him, of the Citie of London, two flagons guilt, & two parcell guilt, to the somme of an hundred and six and thirtie pounde, beside Wine, Waxe, and Torches: and thus with liberall rewardes and honorable entertainment they retur- ned into Fraunce.

Although this peace pleased both the English and the French nations, yet surely both mistrusted the continuance of the same, considering the olde proverbe, that which the eye seeth, the hart rueeth, for the Frenchmen stil longed for Bulleine, and the Englishmen minded not to geue it ouer: in so much as during the Admiralls of Fraunce being in England, the Capitayne of the newe Fortresse began to make a Pile, euen at the very haven mouth of Bul- leyne: called Chatylsons Cardeyne: but the Lozde Gray Capitaine there, put away the workemen, and tooke away their tooles, and filled the Tren- ches, to the Frenchmens great displeasure. And after, the French king cau- sed vpon a great paine, that all the Trenches and new inuentions, should be cast downe and filled by his owne people, least he should seme to be the brea- ker of the peace.

About Mighelmasse this present yere, Thomas Duke of Norffolk, and Henry Erle of Surrey his sonne and heyre, vpon certaine surmises of trea- son were committed to the Tower of London. And immediately after Christmasse folowing, the king then liyng in extremities of death, the sayde Erle was arreigned in the Gulde hall befoze the Lozde Mayor of London, the Lozde Chaunceloz of Englande, and diuers other Lozdes and Judges, beyng there in commission. The speciall matter objected against him, was for bearing certaine armes supposed to belong to the king, and to the prince. The bearing whereof he denied not, but iustified the same, as of right ap- pertayning vnto hym, and all his auncestors Dukes of Norffolke, and by them bozne time out of minde, without chalenge or impechment. But yet to his inditement he pleaded not guiltie. And for that he was no Lord of the Parliament, he was enforced to be tried by a common enquest of his coun- trie, which founde him guiltie, and ther vpon he had iudgement of death, and shortly after was executed at the Tower hill, whose death was greatly la- mented of many, for that he was a Gentleman endued with great learning and many excellent bertues.

The Duke his father came neuer to any tryall, but was supposed to be attaynted by parliament, which supposed attayndoz was vpon good and iust considerations reuered in the first yere of Queene Marye, where appered not onely the innocencie of the sayd Duke, but to his great honour and com- mendation was declared to be a right valiaunt and true seruaunt to the crowne of Englande.

The king as aforesayde nowe languishing and liyng in the extremes

of death, made his last will and testament, wherein he not onely yelded himselfe vnto almightie God, but also to the order, that during the minoritye of his sonne Prince Edward, his Executors who were to the number of .xviij. whose names shall after be shewed, that they, I say, should also be the counsaylors and ayders of the sayde Prince in all his affayres, aswell priuate as publicke, their names were these.

So soone as the aforesaid Noble king had finished his last will and testament, as aforesayd, he then yelded hys spirite to almightie God, and departed this world the .xxiiij. day of January in the .ix. yeres of hys reigne, and in the yere of our Lorde .1546. whose corpe according to his will was conueyed w all funerall pompe to the College of Windsoze there to be entred.

This Prince of all other that euer reigned ouer this realme, was most renoumed and famous, and whatsoeuer he attempted, the same had most prosperous successe, aswell in warres, as in all other matters of great importance, wherein he delt farre aboue all other Princes, as may appere thorowout the whole discourse of hys historie. Of personage he was tall and mightie, and in his latter yeres somewhat grosse, in witte and memory most excellent. Of such maiestie tempered with humanitie and gentleness, as was comely in so great and Noble a Prince. In knowledge of good letters, he farre passed all the kings of this realme that had bene befoze him, and for his magnificence and liberalitie he was renoumed thzoughout all the worlde.

The description of king Henry the eighth.

Soone as God had called to his mercie king Henry the eight as aforesayde, the executors of the sayde king with other of the nobilitie, assembling themselves together, did first by sound of Trompet in the Citie of London the .xxiiij. day of Januarie .1546. proclayme Prince Edward, who was then at Bishops Hatfield, King of this Realme, by the name of Edward the sixt king of England, Fraunce, and Ireland, defender of the fayth, and of the Churches of England and Ireland in earth the supzeme heade, he beyng then but .ix. yeres of age, and yet endued with notable vertues and great learning.

Shortly after the Erle of Hertford with other of the Lordes resorted to Hatfield aforesayd, and from thence conducted the king with a great and right honourable companie to the Tower of London. During the tyme of whose abode there, for the honour of his maiestie, and suretie of his royall person, Edward Erle of Hertforde one of his Uncles on the mothers syde, was by order of the Counsaylors afozenamed, or the moze part of them, with the assent of the kinges Maiestie, not onely created Duke of Sommer set, but also openly named and published Gouvernoz of his royall person, & Protector of all his realmes, dominions, and subiectes, whose aduancement was well allowed of al the noble men sayng of Thomas Wriothesley Erle of Southhampton, Chaunceloz of England, who for his ouermuch repugnyng to the rest in matters of Counsaile, was not onely depriued from hys office of Chaunceloz, but also remoued from place and aucthoritie in Counsaile, and the custodie of the great Seale of England, which onely belongeth to the Lord Chaunceloz, was by order aforesaid committed to William Lord Saint John, great mayster of the kinges householde, and one of the kinges Executors as aforesayde.

Soone after great preparation was made for the kinges coronation, the which was performed and done at Westminster, the .xxiiij. day of februarye next folowynge (beyng then Shrouesunday) with all the solemnitie and honour that might be, the perticulars whereof I ouerpasse because the lyke hath bene befoze reherfed in this booke in other kinges tymes.

The coronation beyng finished, the kinges Maiestie by the aduice of his Uncle the Protector, and other of his priuie Counsaile, myndynge first of all to seeke Gods high honour and glozy, did therefore entend a reformation in religion, and did not onely set forth by certaine Commissioners or Visitators sundrie Iniunctions for the remouynge of Images out of all Churches to the suppressynge and abandoning of all Idolatrie and superstition within his realmes and dominions, but also certaine Homelies, or Sermons, to be vsually read in the Church vnto the people, which were by his sayde Visitators accompanied with certaine Preachers, thzoughout the realme for the better persuasion of the people published and put in vze. At Easter next fo-lowyng, he set out also an order throughout all the realme, that the supper of the Lorde should be ministred to the lay people in both kindes, that is to say, both in Bread and Wine.

These thinges done, the sayd Lord Protector, with the rest of the counsaile, calling to minde the euill vfrage and daliaunce of the Scottes concerning the matter of mariage betweene the kinges maiestie and the Ladye Mary heire of Scotlande, which as you haue befoze heard in the .xxxv. yere of king Henry the eyght, was concluded by parliament in Scotland, thought it not for the kinges honoz to be in such maner deluded by them. Considering therefoze how honozable and profitable it should be for the quyetnesse and safetie of both the realmes, that these two princes might ioyne in matrimonie did devise sondry wayes and meanes to bringe the same to passe, and the rather for the charge which kinge Henry befoze his death (as it is sayd) had geuen them. But the Lordes of Scotland were so corrupted by the French king and abused by the Scottish clergy, & namely by Cardinall Beton, that they fledde from all that they had befoze promised. Wherefoze nowe was prepared a great and puyssaunt army to passe by land into Scotlande vnder the conduction of the Lord Protector as generall, and the Erie of Warwicke Lieutenaut of the armye. And in like maner was appoynted a nauie to passe by Sea, whereof the great Galley and .xxiiiij. tall shippes were well furnished with men and munitions for the warre, besides many Merchants shippes and other smaller vesselles which serued for the carriage of vittayle.
And of this fleete the Lord Clynton was Admirall, and sir Thomas Woodhouse Viceadmirall.

Warre with Scotland.

Nowe as the Army by land was in a readinesse and set forward to be by a daye appoynted at Berwicke, the Lord Clinton with his nauie set also forward by Sea, and by Goddes helpe had so good passage that they arrived in safetie at Warwicke in time conuenient, and there attended vpon the armie which went by lande and passed along the sea coast in such maner as the army passed by land. So that alwayes as the army by land lacked vit-tayles, the shippes were at hand to vittayle them.

The armie that trauallyed by land marched out of Warwicke the fourth day of September, and in good array passed forward into Scotlande five daies iourney, befoze they could vnderstand of any army assembled in Scotland. And in their passage they tooke and rased downe to the ground certain Castles and holdes, as Douglasse, Anderwicke, Thonetone and the towne of Hadington, which towne of Hadington, was after ward fortified and kept with a garrison of souldiers as in the course of this history shal after appere.

The Scottish armie.

In thys meane season the Scottes had assembled a puyssaunt host, este-med to the number of thirtie thousand men, who to forstalle our armie from further inuasion into the countrie, encamped them selues vpon a streight nere to a litle riuer called Esk, foure miles on this side the Citie of Eden-borough, minding there to attende our comming, because there was none other way conuenient for our armie to passe.

The .ix. day of September both the armies came within the sight of eche other, not distaunt by estimation aboue two myles, the riuer of Fryth lyng on the East, and a hill called Fauxride Bray on the West, whereon standeth

standeth a litle Castle, and the Scottish campe north from vs vpon the Ri-uer of Esk afoze sayde within foure miles of Edenborough.

And at this time our men were in no readinesse to fight, nor did not then think they should haue battaile. In somuch that the Duke of Somerset lord Protector, standing and viewing the Scottes how they aduanced themselues towardes battaile, sayde vnto the Erie of Warwicke who then was with him, that for his life the Scottes ment nothing lesse then to fight at that time.

But here I thinke it not a myste befoze I go any further to the declaration of the fortune of this battaile beyng at hande, something to degresse and shew what the Lord Protector had done a litle befoze this vnprouided battaile, and I do the rather note it, for that I am perswaded that by reason thereof, the successe was the moze prosperous.

Ye haue hearde a litle befoze the setting forward of this warre, how to auoyde bloudshed and to draw the inconstant nation of the Scottes to conformitie and vnitie, & specially in a matter to none moze profitable and benificiall then to themselves, which was to haue aduanced and set forth that mariage, that they themselves had by the consent of their whole parliament agreed vnto. And for the confirmation of the same had geuen forth to king Henry the eyght the great Seale of Scotland, as befoze ye haue heard. The kinges maiestie by the aduice of the Lord Protector and other of the pryncy counsaile had had with them many and sundry conferences, and had sent vnto them many and sundry Ambassadors, and vsed all the meanes that was possible to haue reduced them to the performance of their promise, rather then to hafard their countrie vpon a conquest. And now seying no traualle could preuaile, they were inforced to suffer the two deuouring serpentes of the earth, that is the sword and fire to be let lose and to vse their accustomed rage and fury, with consumption of richesse, libertie and life. The dyscrete Protector thought yet as the last refuge and meane to attayne peace not onely himselfe, but also to moue all other by prayer to call vpon the ayde and mercy of almightie God, that it might please his deuine maiestie to molifie the hard heartes of the Scottes for the better auoyding of the sheddyng of innocent and Christian blood. And for this purpose he caused a speciall prayer to be made, which beyng imprinted was published and commaunded wth all reuerend deuotion to be sayde in all the Churches of England.

A prayer published for the auoyding of the effusion of Christian blood.

But now to retorne againe to the battaile, ye heard that the Armies on both sydes approached so nere, that the one was in the others sight: ye heard also that the Lord Protector was of opinion, that it was not ment of the Scottes to fight at that tyme, but onely that they made a shewe of themsel-ues, which he termed to be but a Scottische bragge, howbeit it proued farre otherwise. For sodainly the Scottes beyng encamped in a vally by the riuer of Esk, arose and made great hast by the hill, minding to haue obteyned the hill, the wind, and the sonne, which if they had gotten, then our men had bene much hindred, the which thing the Englishmen perceyued, who as then were not in good array, neither could their armie of footemen come so soone to the recouerie of the hill as they would. Wherefoze to stop the Scottes of their purpose, the Lord Gray beyng Capitain of the horsemen, was forced (partly out of order) to set forward, and to geue the onfet vpon the Scottes, onely

to

to stay them from the hill. The which English horsemen nobly and valiantly encountered with the Scottes footemen, but the Scottes stood so close, and were so defended with their Pykes, that our men could not enter. By reason whereof diuers of the English Gentlemen that gaue the onset were ouerthrowne and slaine, the which when they that folowed perceyued, they reculed, and in runnyng backe, ranne through a peece of the English arme of footemen (which by this tyme had recovered the hill, and were behinde the English horsemen) and hurt many of them, howbeit the footemen brake not their array, but stood still in good order in the face of the Scottes. The Scottes perceyuing the English footemen to haue recovered the hill, and seing the whole armie readie to geue them the onset, and the batwarde marching towardes them, sodainly (of what occasion no man certainly can tell) they forsakyng their weapons, and their former places fled, the which when our men perceyued, they with a great shout cryed they flie, they flie, & there with all they fled in dede speedily, and our men pursued after in chase as fast, namely our horsemen, and folowed so egerly and with such fiercenelle, that they ouertooke many and spared in dede but fewe. And the chase continued almost the length of fife myles, and al the way was couered with dead men, Pikes, Jackes, Shulles, Swords, Bucklers, Daggers, & other weapons, and the riuer made red with bloud. And at this battail called Muskebrough field, nere vnto a place called Pinkerslough, there were slaine, as some of the Scottes themselues confessed, xiiij. thousand Scottes, among the which number as it was well knowne by credible report, there were slaine of noble men, Lordes, Lardes, and Gentlemen. xxvj. hundred and aboue, and there were taken prisoners of the Scottes. xv. hundred, whereof many were Gentlemen. And among other the Erle of Huntley was one, who was taken by sir Raufe Huane. And within lesse then two yerres folowynge, he made his escape, and gat again into Scotland. And of the Englishmen there were slaine not aboue one hundred persons.

After this battaile finished, with victorie to the great honoz of the Lord Protector, the Erle of Warwike, and other the noble & valiaunt Capitaynes there present, and to the high honoz of the kings Maiestie, and the realme of England, the sayde Lord Protector, considerynge of vertue and well doyng, the proper mede and due reward to be honour, aswell therfore for reward to them that had befoze done well, as also to encourage other hereafter to do the lyke, did adourne many Lordes, Knightes and Gentlemen, with dignities as foloweth.

The next day after this battaile, the Lorde Protector with the armye marched forward to the towne of Lithe, where they remayned. x. or. xii. dayes, and there began to make Trenches and fortifications: But because winter approached, & the season of the yere serued not, it was thought good in tyme to returne home to the Borders. And in their returnyng, first they tooke a Castell called Lowthair, and placed for Capitaine thereof sir Hugh Willoughby. And from thence they marched to the Castell of Hunes, where was shewed some face of resistance, but when the Englishmen had planted their ordinaunce and artillery, they yelded, and there was placed Capitaine Edward Dudley esquier, sonne and heyre to the Baron Dudley. And from thence they passed to the Castell of Rokesborough, which beyng a place very meete to kepe frontire warre, the same beyng yelded, was forthwith by the Englishmen fortified, & there was made Capitaine, sir Raufe Bulmer, and so he returned vnto Barwicke, and thether came vnto him, these Lardes and Gentlemen of Scotland, and submitted themselves vnto the king of Englandes obedience and tooke their othe, whose names folow.

A Lard in Scotland, is a degree next vnder a knight, which we call an Esquier, or such a one as is Lord of a towne.

After that the Lorde Protector had done all the thinges before expressed, he then departed from Berwicke to Newcastell, and there calling to remembrance the worthy seruice done by certayne other gentlemen who before at the makyng of knightes had withdraben themselves from the preferment of honoz, and yet were right worthy thereof, did therefore direct his letters with auctoritie to the Erle of Warwicke, then remayning at Barwicke for the comyng of the Scottish Commissioners, to adorne and aduance to the order of knighthoode these persones following, which was done according y, whose names were these sir Andrew Corbet a right graue and valiaunt Gentleman, a carefull Capitaine ouer his souldiours, and verie skilfull in his peere, and also a strong and worthy Archer, sir Arthur Mainwaring writing a politiqué Capitayn, sir Thomas Hewell the Lord Hewells brother, Sir Anthony Strelly, and sir Richard Uerney.

During the time that the Lorde Protector was occupied with the Scots as aforesayd, the Lordes of the counsaile that remayned in Englande, with great helpe of Thomas Craumer Archebishop of Cantorburye, and other of the Clergy of the realme, greatly furthered and aduanced religion, and namely the booke of Homelycs and Paraphrase of Crasimus, the which Stephyn Gardiner Bishop of Winchester and other were muche offended as ye may reade at large in the booke of the Monumentes of the Church.

But to returne, when the Lorde Protector had put all thinges in order in Scotland as aforesayd, and had fortified the fortes and Castelles vpon the borders, he returned into Englande, and the Citizens of London heering of his comyng determined to receyue him, and conueigh him thorough the Citie with much ioy and triumph. But he hauing knowlege thereof was offended therewith, and forbade any such tryumph to be made for him, for sayd he if any thing hath bene done to the honoz of the realme, it was gods doing, and willed them to giue him the prayse.

Soone after the comyng home of the Lorde Protector, the kinges maiestie called his high court of parliament, and held the same at Westminster the foure and twentie day of Nouember in the first yere of his reigne, and there continued the same vntill the foure and twentie day of December then next following. And in this parliament among other things, there was geuen vnto the kinges maiestie all Colleges, Chauntries and free Chapels to be bestowed and bled at his pleasure. And also in the same parliament was repealed the estatute of six articles made in the time of king Henry the eyght, and diuerse other tending to that effect.

And in the ende of this yere dyed fraunces the french king, for whome a solempne obsequy was kept in Paules in London, and Henrye his sonne succeeded him in that kingdome.

And here once againe to remember the affayres of Scotland, the king and hys counsaile consyderyng the suretye of the same did not onely consist in makyng of good defence vpon the borders, did therefore deuise for the subiection of the inner part of that lande to haue some speciall forte or place for the better pacifying and keeping quyet of that countrey. And in conclusion they thought it meete to fortifie the towne of Haddington, to the which wyth all speede was sent a garrison to defend the same.

A litle before Ester next following, the king by his Lieger in France was credibly certefied that the french king made great prouision to go into Scotland, for the remouing of the English garrison that kept the towne of Haddington as after ye shall heere.

The king heering these newes, caused new musters to be made, and a newe armye to be rayscd, to be sent into Scotlande for the defence of Haddington. And for this prouision there were first certaine letters sent from the kings maiestie vnto certaine Citezens of London, who before had bene reasseled at a certaine balure of goodes. And in the superscription of the sayde letters, the king named euery one to whome he wrote Esquier, requiring them to haue in a readynesse by a day appoynted certayne Demplaunces, and certaine light horsemen, with all the furniture that to them belonged.

Of the which letters certaine of the sayd Citezens were very ioyous because of their new dignities, in that they were made Esquiers which is asmuch to say as horsemen: But the grauer sorte could well haue forborne that preferment, and haue remayned footemen as they were before. And this yere the watch in London, which had not bene vled nintene yeres before was againe kept by sir John Gresham then Maior of London, both on the euen of saint John Baptist, and also on the euen of saint Peter next following, as brauely and freshly as it had bene at any time set out before. And the same was much beutefied with the company of horsemen aboue mentioned.

Soone after this, the king was certefied that Mounfire de Esly Lieutenant to the French king, and Peter Strozy and Mounfire Dandelot and a Dutch Capitaine called the Kingraue, with ten thousand men were arriued in Scotland, and had beseged the towne of Haddington: wherefore in all hast possible the king set forwarde his armye. But before the army could come, there went from Berwicke vnder the guyding of syr Robert Bowes and syr Thomas Palmer knightes. xiiij. hundred horsemen, where of were seuen hundred men of armes, and Dumilances. The frenchmen hauing knowlege of their coming, layde a bushement for them, and the most part of them were eyther taken or slayne, namely syr Robert Bowes and syr Thomas Palmer were taken prisoners, howbeit for all this ouertrew, our Englishmen manfully and valiantly defended the towne of Haddington and often skirmished with the frenchmen, and put them to the worffe. The siege of this towne of Haddington by the frenchmen was long, fierce and terrible, and the batterie was so great that no parte of the walles of the towne were left unbeaten downe. Notwithstanding by the manly and valiaunt courage of the Englishmen, and namely of syr James Wilford who was Capitaine of that towne, whatsoeuer was in the day beaten downe by the frenchmen, the same was again forted in the night by the Englishmen, although the slaughter of our men there was so great, that they filled vp their ditches, and made their rampiers with the dead English carcasses. And this siege continued from the .xxviii. day of June vnto the twentieth day of August next following, and then came thither the Erle of Shrewsbury with the army afoze mentioned, which were to the number of fiftene thousand, of the which there were fiue thousand Almaines, whose Capitaine was named Cortpernie.

The frenchmen and Scottes knowyng of the commyng of the English army, departed with speede from the siege of the sayd towne of Haddington, much commendyng and praysyng the English Capitaynes and souldiors, and specially one Capitaine of the frenchmen, at his departure, came to the towne of Haddington, desiryng audience and sayde, God prosper you ye are good souldiors, the honour is yours, and the shame is ours, the which prayse of enemyes beyng boyde of all parcialitie and affection, is commonly most true. So that after the Erle had well bittayled the towne, and furnished the same with fresh and lustie souldiors, he then departed into England. After whose departure, the Englishmen kept the sayde towne valiantly, both agaynst the Scottes and frenchmen, and helde the same vntill the .xx. day of September, in the thirde yere of the reigne of this king Edward. And then it so chaunced by reason of tumultes and rebellion among our selues in sundrye places within the realme, that the king was forced to send the Erle of Rutland, accompanied with three thousand Almaynes, and three thousand Borderers to the saide towne of Haddington, who rased the same downe to the ground, and brought from thence all their ordinaunce, with all their bag and baggage to Barwicke in all peaceable and quiet maner.

After the returne of the souldiors from Haddington, there happened in London a great mortalitie by pestiencie, and diuers were buryed in the morning before day, and late in the euening, and that in very close maner. Wherefore a commaundement from the king was directed to the Churchwardens, and Curates of euery Parithe in London, prohibityng that no corps should be buryed before sixe of the clocke in the morning, nor after sixe at night. And that there should be at the buryng of euery corps, one Bell rong by the space of three quarters of an houre at the least.

The kinges Maiestie shortly after this, sommoned his high Court of Parliament to be holden at Westminster vpon prorogation the fourth daye of Nouember, in the second yere of his reigne, and there continued the same vnto the .xiiij. day of March next following, which was in the thirde yere of his reigne. And in this Parliament the vse of the Masse was cleene forbydden, and a booke made for the vniiformitie of diuine seruire, and the administration of the Sacraments in the English tongue, was published & set forth.

And in this Parliament also was attainted sir Thomas Seymer, called Baron Seymer of Sudley, brother to the Lorde Protector, high Admirall of England. The causes and articles objected against him, are expressed in the booke of statutes. And the .xx. day of March next following, which was in the thirde yere of the king, he was behedded at the Tower hill, and then it was commonly talked, that the fall of the one brother, would be the ouerthrow of the other, as soone after it came to passe.

After the ende of this Parliament, and at the ende of the next terme, the Lorde Protector's grace, and the rest of the kinges priue and learned counsaile being present in the starre Chamber, called before them all the Iustices of peace, and knightes of the shire, where the Lorde Riche beyng then Lorde Chauncelor, made vnto them this Oration following.

It hath bene vled and accustomed before this tyme, to call at certaine tymes the Iustices of peace before the kinges Maiesties counsaile, to geue vnto them admonition and warnyng, diligently as is their duetie, to looke to the obseruyng of such thinges as are committed to their charge, accordyng to the trust which the kinges Maiestie hath in them. Howbeit at this tyme we call you not before vs of custome, but rather of necessitie: for heryng dayly and perceiuyng as we do, the great negligence and little hede which is taken and geuen to the obseruation of the good and wholesome lawes and orders in this realme, wherupon much disorder doth daily ensue, and the kinges Maiesties Proclamations, and orders taken by the Counsaile (as we are aduertised) not executed, the people brought to a disobedience, and in a maner all his Maiesties studie and ours in setting a good and most godly way to the honour of God, and the quiet of the realme, spent in vaine, and come to nothing. The which as we haue great hope and trust not to be altogether so, yet so much as it is, and so much as it lacketh in keepyng the realme in a Godly order and way, we must nedes impute and lay the fault therof in you which are are the Iudices of peace in euery shire. To whome we are wont to direct our writynge, and to whose trust and charge the kings Maiestie hath committed the execution of all his Proclamations, of his actes of Parliament, and of his lawes.

We are informed that many of you are so negligent, and so slack, in that that it doth appere that you do rather looke as it were through your fingers then diligently see to the execution of the sayd lawes and proclamations. For if you would accordyng to your duties, to your othe, to the trust which the kings Maiestie hath in you, geue your diligence and care toward the execution of the same most Godly statutes, and Inuincions, there should no disobedience, no disorder, noz euill rule be begon, or aryse in any part of the realme, but it should by and by be repressed, kept downe, and reformed. But it is feared that the thing it selfe geueth occasion thereto, that diuers of you do not onely set forth, but rather hinder, so much as lyeth in you, the kings Maiesties procedynges, and are content that there should aryse some disobedience, and that men should repine against Godly orders set forth by hys Maiestie, you do so slackly loke to the execution of the same: So that in some shires which be farther of, it may appere that the people haue neuer heard of diuers of his Maiesties Proclamations, or if they haue heard, that you are content to wink at it, and to neglect it, so that it is all one as though it were neuer commaunded. But if you do well consider and remember your duties, first to almighty God, and then to the kings Maiestie, the welth of the whole realme, the safegarde and surtie of your awne selues: you must needs see, that except such orders as the kings Maiestie hath set, and hereafter shall appoynt to be kept: Neyther the Realme can be defended, if the enemy should invade, noz in peace it can not stande, but vpon the contempt of good and wholesome lawes, all disorder and inconueniences should come: The people should be wyde and sauage, and no man sure of hys awne. And if at anye tyme there was occasion, and cause to bee circumspect and diligent aboute the same, there was neuer more tyme then nowe. How we stand in Scotlande ye knowe, and that other forreine power maketh great preparation to ayde them, and in deede doth come to their ayde, wherof we are surely informed and certefied. Wherfore if there should not be good order and obedience kept in the realme, the realme were like utterly to be destroyed. Neuer forreine power could yet hurt, or in any part preuaile in this realme, but by disobedience and misorder within our selues. That is the way in the which god will plague vs, if he mind to punish vs. And so long as we do agree among our selues, and be obedient vnto our Prince & to his godly orders & lawes, we may be sure y<sup>e</sup> god is with vs & that forreyn power shall not preuaile against vs noz hurt vs: wherfore once againe and still we must and do lay this charge vpon you that are the best of the shire and Iudices of the peace, that with so conuenient speede as you can, that you do repayre downe into your countreys, & you shall geue warning to the Gentlemen of the shire that haue no necessary businesse here, y<sup>e</sup> they repayre downe eche man to his country, and there both you and they, who be reconed the stay of euery shire, to see good order and good rule kept. Prouide that your Sessions of Gaole deliuey and quarter Sessions be well kept, and there in your meetinges to be such that Justice may be well and truly ministred, the offend

doys and malefactoris punished according to the lawes of the realme without any feare of any man, rather then for fauor ye shall suffer those to escape which with their euill example might bring other to the lyke mishap. And that all Vagabons, all lewde & light taletellers & sedicious bearers of false newes of the kings Maiestie or of his counsaile, or such as will preache without licence, be immediatly by you repress and punished. And if there should chaunce any light or lewde felowes to make any rowtes or ryots or unlawful assemblies, any sedicious meetinges, byprozes or byzpynges in any place, by the sedicious and diuelish mocion of some priuie Traytors, that you and they appease them at the first, and apprehende the first aucthors and causers thereof, and certefie vs wth speede. The lightnesse of the rude and ignorant people must be repress and ordered by your grauitic and wisdome. And here you may not (if any such thing chaunce) dissemblye with those such lewde men, and hyde your selues, for it shall be required of you if such misorder be, and surely without your ayde and helpe, or your dissemblyng, such misorder cannot be. For we do not say that we feare any such thing likely to chaunce: But we geue you warning befoze, least it should chaunce, we haue to much experience in this realme what inconuenience cometh of such matters. And though some light persones in their rage do not consyder it, yet we doubt not but you way it and know it well enough. And if it should chaunce our enemies (who is mayntayned by other forreine power and the Bishop of Rome) sodainly to arrive in some places of England, either driven by tempest, or of purpose to do hurt, ye ought to se such orders kept by firing of their Beacons, as hath alreedy bene written vnto you by our letters, to repulse the same in so good array as you can, as we do not doubt but ye will for the safegard of your countreie, so that the enemy shall haue litle ioye of his comming. And for that purpose ye shall see diligently that men haue horse, harnesse, and other furniture of weapon ready, according to the statutes and good orders of the realme and the kings maiesties commaundements, and so for this time ye may depart.

Here is to be noted, that accordyng to the olde adage, Man purposeth but God disposeth. The cause that the former and earnest admonicion was made, specially at this tyme, was onely for feare of the landyng of forreyn powers within this realme. For true it is, that the kings maiestie by the aduice of the Lorde Protector and other of his Counsaile minded this yere the conquest of Scotland, and for the same had made great prouision aswell beyond the sea in Germanie, from whence he had five thousande Launceknights, whose Capitaine was Cortpeny, of whome mention is made befoze at the rasyng and defasyng of the towne of Haddington in Scotland: Besyde these also were made other great prouisions within the realme. And the Scottes at this tyme beyng in great feare of England, made such suite to the Pope, and the french king, that they graunted them great ayde, and the french king was with his power in a great readinesse. But beholde the wonderfull worke of God: That which was feared and of vs purposed, came not to passe, and that which was least feared, & little or nothing thought vpon, sodainly happened, to the great daunger of the destruction of the whole realme of Englande (if almighty God had not holpen vs with the mightye arme of his defence) which chaunced by intestine and ciuil warre among our selues, selues, as after ye shall here. By reason whereof those straungers which before were prepared at the kinges Maiesties great costes and charges for the conquest of Scotland, were employed as necessary men to suppress the rebellion of our awne nation, and to saue England from destruction, such are the workes of the Lorde against mans pollicie.

The kinges Maiestie as aforesayd purposing the inuasion of Scotland, made nowe great prouision for the same. But in this as he did euer before, he vsed all gentle meanes and pollicies to winne them without shedding of bloud, if it were possible: wherefore he nowe wrote vnto them a solempne Epistle exhortatory, to moue them to the consideration of themselues, and the state of their Countreie. The Copie of which Exhortation foloweth word for word as is was written, and the title thereof was this.

Edward by the grace of God Duke of Sommerset, Erle of Hertford, Viscount Beauchampe, Lorde Seymer, Uncle to the kings highnesse of England, Gouvernor of his most royall person, and Protectour of all his realmes, dominions, and subiectes, Lieutenant generall of all his Maiesties Armies, both by lande and sea, Treasurer and Erle Marshall of England, gouvernor of the Isles of Cernesey, and Jersey, and knight of the most noble order of the Garter, with others of the counsaile of the sayd most high and noble Prince Edward, by the grace of God, of England, Fraunce, and Ireland king, defender of the fapth, and in earth vnder Christ, the supzeme head of the Churches of England and Ireland. To the Nobilitie and Counsaillors, Gentlemen, and the Commons, and all other the inhabitauntes of the realme of Scotland, grætyng and peace.

In Epistle
exhortatory
sent to the Scottes.

Considering with our selues the present state of things, and weying more deeply the maner and termes wherein you and we doe stand. It maketh vs to maruaile what euill and fatall chaunce doth so disseuer your heartes, and maketh them so blinde and vnminded full of your profite, and to still conciliate and heape to your selues most extreme mischiefes. The which we whom ye will nedes haue your enemyes, go about to take away from you, and perpetually to ease you thereof. And also by all reason and order of necessitie, it should be rather more conuenient for you to seeke and require moderate agrementes of vs, whome God hath hetherto accordyng to our most iust, true and Godly meanynges and ententes, prospered and set forwarde with your affliction and miserie: Then that we beyng superiours in the field, Maisters of a great part of your realme, should seeke vpon you. Yet to the entent that our charitable myndes and brotherly loue should not cease by all meanes possible to prouoke and call you to your awne commoditie and profite. Euen as the father to the sonne, or the elder brother to the yonger brother: And as the louyng Physitian would do to the mistrustfull and ignorant patient: We are content to call and crie vpon you, to looke on your state, to auoyd the great calamitie that your countreie is in, to haue vs rather brothers then enemyes, and rather Countreimen, then Conquerors. And if your Gouvernor or Capitaynes shall reteyne and kepe from you this our exhortation as heretofore they haue done our Proclamation, tending to the lyke effect for their awne private welth and commoditie, not regardyng though you be still in miserie, so they haue profite and gouernaunce ouer you, and shall still abuse abuse you with feyned and forged tales: Yet this shall bee a witness afoze God and all Christen people, betwixt you and vs: that we professyng the Gospell of Iesus Christ, accordyng to the doctrine thereof, do not cease to call and prouoke you, from the effusion of your awne bloud, from the destruction of the realme of Scotlande, from perpetuall enmitie and hatred, from the final destruction of your nation, and from seruitude to forreyn nations: to libertie, to amitie, to equalitie with vs, to that which your wyrters hath alwayes wished might once come to passe. Who that hath read the storyes in tynges past, and doth marke and note the great Battayles fought betwene England and Scotland, the incursions, rodes, and spoyles, which hath bene done on both the parties. The realme of Scotland fve times wonne by one king of England. The Scottische kings sonnes taken prisoners, some slaine in battaile, some for very sorow and discomfozt vpon losse, dyng and departing the worlde: and shall perceyue agayne that of all nations in the worlde, that nation onely besyde England, speaketh the same language, and as you and we be annexed & ioyned in one Island: so no people are so like in maner, forme, language, and all condicions as we are. Shall not he thinke it a thing very vnnature, vnnatural, and vnrchristian, that there should be betwixt vs so mortall warre, who in respect of all other nations be and should be like as two brethren of one Islande of great Briteyne? And though he were a stranger to both, what would he thinke more meete then if it were possible one kingdome to be made in rule, which is one in language, & to be deuided in rulers which is al one in Countrey. And forsomuch as two successors cannot concur and fall into one, by no other maner of meanes then by marriage, whereby one bloud, one lignage, and parentage is made of two, and an indefensible right geuen of both to one, without the destruction and abolishing of eyther. If God should graunt that whatsoeuer you would wishe other then that which nowe not by fortune hath chaunced, but by his infinite mercy, and most inscrutable prouidence, as careful for you he hath geuen vnto you. The which thing that you should also thinke to come of his disposition, and not by blinde fortune, how vnlkely hath it bene, and howe sodainly hath it turned, that the power of God might be thewed.

Your last king beyng a prince of much excellency and yong, whom you know after a promise broken contrary to his honoz, and misfortune by Gods iust indgement following vpon it, God eyther by sorow or by some meanes otherwise at his inscrutable pleasure, did take away from you, had thre children: Did not almightie God as it were to shew his will and pleasure to be, that the long continued warre and enmitie of both the nations should be taken away, and knit in perpetuall loue and amitie, take the two men children of those babies beyng distant the one from the other, & in diuerse places both as it were at one time, and within the space of foure and twenty houres leauing but one mayden chylde and princes.

When the most wise and victorious Prince late our king and Maister king Henry the eyght in other of his marriages not most fortunate, had by his most lawfull and most vertuous wife Quene Jane, his other two wives before that marriage departed this worlde, and neuer surmise nor question made of that marriage sith that time to this daye, nor so much as all her life time, name or motion to or of any other wife, one Prince of so high expectation, of so great gyftes of God, the right and vndoubted heyze of the realme of England and his maiestie owely of male issue left behinde him to succede the imperiall crowne. If nothing else had bene done, what can any wise or any Christian man that thinketh the world to be gouerned by Gods prouidence and not by fortune, thinke otherwise but that it was Gods pleasure it should be so that these two realmes should ioyne in marriage, and by a godly Sacrament make a godly, perpetuall, and most friendly vnitie, and conoord, toher by such benefites as of vnitie and conoord commeth, maye through his infinite grace come vnto these realmes. Or if any man of you or of any other nation doubteth hereof (except you looke for miracles) to be done herein, and yet if ye marke all the possibilities of the natures of the two Princes, the children already had, the doubtfull chaunce least eche of them should haue a sonne, or both daughters, or not of meete ages, with other circumstances both of the partie of this realme of Englande and that of Scotland, which hath not chaunced in eyght hundred yeres, it must nedes be reconded a great meruell and a miracle. But let it be no miracle seyng that God doth not now speake in Oracles, as a mongest the Jewes he did: And present prophesies now a dayes be but eyther not certayne or else not playne: what more certayntie can bee had of Gods will in this case then the befoze reherced doth byynge: But if God himselfe should speake: what could he speake more, then he speaketh in these? Call you them prouidences or chaunces, yf you be still afflicted and punished, may he not say, I of mine infinite mercy and loue to your nation had prouided a right heyze and a prince to the one, and a right heyze and Princes to the other to be ioyned in my holy lawes, and by the law of nature and the world to haue made, and vnitie conoord and peace, in the which Iste of both the realmes, you refused it, you loued better dissention then vnitie, disoord then agreement, warre then peace, hatred then loue and charitie. If you do then theretofore smart for it, whome can you blame, but your owne election? But because some of those who maketh herevnto impedimentes, cannot but confesse that there appereth Gods prouidence herein, and oportunitie and occasion geuen to vnitie of both the realmes: yet may hereafter say, and heretofore haue sayde, that the fault herein is, that we seeke not equalitie nor the marriage, but a conquest, we would not be friends but be Lordes. Although our proclamations at the last warres doth enough declare the contrary, yet hcre we protest and declare vnto you and al Christian people to be the kinges maiesties minde our Maisters by cur aduise and counsayle not to conquire, but to haue in amitie, not to voyn by force but to conciliate by loue, not to spoyle and kill, but to saue and kepe, not to disseuer and deuozte, but to ioyne in maryage from high to lowe both the realmes, to make of one Iste one realme in loue, amitie, conoord, peace and charitie. Which if you refuse and driue vs to conquire, who is gillie of the bloudshed? who is the occasion of the warre? who maketh the battayles, the brenning of houses, and the denastation which shall folow? Can it be denyed but that we haue the great seale of Scotland graunted by the parliament of Scotland for the marriage which should be made with assuraunces and plcdges vntill the perfozrances. And this in the time that the late king of most famous memory our soueraigne Lorde king Henry the eyght did reigne, and in the time of the same your Gouernoꝝ, who now is the Erle of

Arreigne,

The Scots
by the consent of a parliament graunted their great Seale for the confirmation of

Arreigne, who then beyng a chiefe doer and laborer therein for the high and inestimable benefite of that realme. So sone as he was by the late Cardinal of saint Andrewes and others, with certayne baine feares and hopes and greedinesse of dignitie peruerted, reuolted from his first agreement, and put all the realme to the losse of such holdes and fortreddes as are now taken from you, and to the losse of a foughten fiede, for the which we are sorry if otherwise peace might haue bene concluded, for his owne private iure and rechelesnesse of that noble realme. And what ende can you looke for of these maner of procedinges, but such successe as heretofore hath bene experiminted and assayed? we offer loue, we offer equalitie and amitie, we overcome in warre and offer peace, we winne holdes and offer no conquest, we get in your land, and offer England. What can be moze offered and moze profered, then entrecourse of marchandises, and enterchaunge of mariages, the abolishing of al such our lawes as prohibitech the same, or might be impediment to the mutuall amitie. We haue offered not onely to leaue the aucthoritie, name, tytle, right, or challenge, of Conquerour, but to receyue that which is the shame of men ouer commed, to leaue the name of the nation, and the glory of any victorie (if any we haue had, or should haue of you) and to take the indifferent olde name of Briteynes againe, because nothing should be left on our part vnoffered, nothing on your part vnrefused, whereby ye might be inexcusable. And all the world might testifie, all other meanes not beyng able to do any thing, after many other wayes and remedies attempted, battaile of vs to be taken as an extreme refuge, to attaine right and reason amongst Christian men. If any man may rightfully make battaile for his espouse and wife. The daughter of Scotland was by the great Seale of Scotland promised to the sonne and heyze of England? If it be lawfull by Gods lawe to fight in a good quarrell, and for to make peace: This is to make an ende of all warres, and to conclude an eternall and perpetuall peace, which to confirm we shall fight, and you to breake, is it not easie to discern who hath the better part? God and the sword hath already and shall hereafter if there be no remedie trie it. Who so willetch y marriage to go forwarde: Who so mindeth the peace and tranquillitie of both the realmes: who willetch no conquest to be had, but amitie and loue to go forwarde, we refuse no man: Let him bring his name, and his pledge of good seruire in this quarrell, he shall not onely be receyued to the amitie, but shall haue sufficient defence agaynst the aduersaries, and recompence of his liuyng if he sustain any losse. We neither do nor entend to put any man from his landes, tackes, or offices: Onlesse he will needes resist, and so compell vs theretvnto. What face hath this of conquest? we entend not to disenherite your Queene, but to make her heires inheritoꝝ also to England. What greater honour can you seeke vnto your Queene then the marriage offered? what moze meeter marriage then this with the kinges highnesse of England? What moze sure defence in the noneage of your Queene for the realme of Scotland, then to haue England your patrone and Guarrison? we seeke not to take from you your lawes, nor customes: but we seeke to redresse your oppreSSIONS, which of diuers ye doe sustaine. In the realme of England diuers lawes and customes be accordyng to the auncient blage thereof. And likewise Fraunce, Normandie, and Galcoygue hath sundrie kinde of orders. ons that the Emperoz now hath one custome, and one sort of lawes: These vaine feares and fantasies of expulsion of your nation, of chaunging the lawes, of making a conquest, be driuen into your heades, of those who in dede had rather you were all conquered, spoyled, and slaine, then they would lose any point of their will, of their desyre of rule, of their estimation, which they knowe in quietnesse would be seene what it were, as it were in a calme water. Nowe in this tumult of discorde, when the realme is tossed by and downe with waues and surges of battaile, famine, and other mischies which the warre bringeth, they thinke they cannot be espyed. But looke on them you that haue witte and prudence, & consider the state of your Queene, and realme. You will not keepe her sole and vnmarried, the which were to you great dishonour. If you marry her within the realme, that cannot extinguish the title which we haue to the Crowne of Scotland. And what dissention, enuy, grudge, and malice that shall breede among you is easie to perceyue. You will marry her out of the realme, our title remaineth, you be subiectes to a forreyn Prince of another Countrey, and of another language: And vs ye haue your enemies enen at your elbowe, your succours farre off from you. And be we not in the bowelles now of the realme: haue we not a great part therof either in subiection or in amitie and loue: who shall come into your realme but he shall be met with, and fought with, if neede be enen of your owne nation, who be faythfull and true to the realme of England in the way of this most Godly vnion by marriage. And if any forreyn power, Prince, or Potentate, or whosoever be your ayder to nourishe still discorde, sende you an armie also: How shall they oppresse you, fill your houses, waste your groundes, spende and consume your vittaille, holde you in subiection, and regarde you as slaues which without them coulde not liue, and will take your Queene to bestowe as they lust, and specially if their ruler or king (as perchance he may be) in other warres be otherwise occupied, to be a pray to vs, and a true conquest. Then it shall be to late to say, we will haue a marriage, and no conquest: we wishe peace and amitie: we are wery of battaile and miserie. The stubburne ouercommed must suffer the victors pleasure, and pertinacite will make the victorie moze insolent, whereof you your selfe haue geuen the cause. If they send money and Capitaynes, but no souldiers: first if they be Capitaynes, who ruleth, and who doth obey: who shall haue the honour of the enterprize and if it be well atchieued: But whether it be well atchieued or no, which number is that which shall be slaine: whose blood shall be shed: their money peradventure shall be consumed, and their commaundementes obeyed: But whose bodies shall smart for it: whose landes shall be wasted: whose houses burned: what realme made desolate: Remember what it is to haue a forreyn power within you: a strong power of your enemies vpon you, you as it were the Campe and plaine betwixt them to fight on, and to be troden vpon both of the victor and the ouercommed. And imagine you see before your eyes your wyues, and daughters in daunger of the wantonnesse and insolencie of the Souldiours: The proud lookes of the Capitaynes, and Souldiours whome you call to helpe you: the contempt you shall bring your nation in: And then take heed least in dede that folowe which you feare, that is, that you shall be by them conquered: that ye shall be by them put from your holdes, landes, tackes, and offices:

offices: That your lawes by them shall be altered: that your nation shall by them be destroyed. Consider in this realme: did not the Britons call in the Saxons for helpe, & by them were put out: Where be y<sup>e</sup> Pictes, once a great nation betwixt you & vs: how did the nation of Fraunce put out the Galles out of all Fraunce: how got the Turke first all Grecia, & now a late all Hungary, but beyng called in for to ayd and helpe. And did not the Gothes by like meanes get all Italy, and the Lombards one part thereof now called Lombardie: what loke you for more: Medie souldiours, & hauing their weapons in their handes, and knowyng that you cannot liue without them, what will they not commaund you to do: what will they not encroche vpon you: what will they not thinke they may do: and what will they thinke that you dare do: This forreyn helpe is your confusion, that succoz is your detriment, the victorie so had is your seruitude. What is then to be thought of losse taken with them: the straungers & forreyn souldiours that oppresse you within our power and strength without: and of your owne nation, so many as loue quietnesse, godlinesse, & the welth of your realme, shall help also to skourge & afflict you. Is it not better to compose and acquite all this calamitie & trouble by marriage: To end all sorowes and battailes by such and so honozable a peace: Hath the Emperoz Spain & Burgondie not by title of marriage: How holdeth the French king Briten now lately annexed to that crowne, but by title of marriage: How hath all the great princes of the world happily & with quiet made of two kingdomes one, of diuers Lordshippes one: Of nations alwayes at warre with themselves, or else in doubtfull peace, one well gouerned kingdom, rule, and dominion, but by that most Godly, most quiet, & most amiable composition of marriage: Two meanes there is of making one rule where to title is pretended, and perfect agreement betwixt two nations: Cyther by force and superiortie, which is conquest, or by equality and loue, which is by parentage and marriage. Ye hate the one, that is conquest: and by refusing the other, you enforce vpon you hatred & malice. You wil not haue peace: you will not haue alliaunce: you wyll not haue conkozde, and conquest cometh vpon you, whether ye will or no. And yet if all things were considered, we feare it wyll appeare, that it were better for you to be conquered of vs, then succoured of straungers, lesse losse to your goodes, lesse hurt to your landes, lesse dishonour to your realme. This nation which is one in tongue, one in Countrey and birth, hauing so little diuersitie to occupie the whole, then other powers to come into you, neyther like in language, ne yet like in behauiour, who should rule ouer you, and take you to be but their slaues. But we estones and finally declare and protest vnto you, that although for the better furtheraunce of this Godly purpose of uniting the realmes, and for the sure defence of them which fauoureth the marriage, we are compelled for the tyme to keepe holdes and to make fortifications in your realme: yet the kings Maiesties minde and determinate pleasure is with our aduise and counsaile to be as before is declared, that where fauor may be shewed, not to vse rigor, if by condicions you will receyue this amitie offered, not to folowe conquest, for we desyre loue, vnitie, conkozde, peace, and equality. Let neither your Governoz, nor your Kirkemen, nor those who so often hath falsified their fayth and promise: and by treachery and falshode be accustomed to prozoge the tyme, feede you forth with fayre wordes and bring you into into the snare, from whence they cannot deliuer you. They wil peraduenture prouide for themselues with pencions in some other realme, & set souldiours straungers in your holdes to kepe you in subiection, vnder the pretence to defend them against vs. But who prouideth pencions for you? Howe are you defended when they bee fledde away? Who conquereth you when the straunge Capitaynes hath your Holdes? when your lande is wasted, and the Realme destroyed, and the moze parte kept from you? Who will set by the maryage of the Queene to buye a tittle with the warre of Englande, to mary the name, another mightie king holding the land? If we two be- yng made one by amitie, be most hable to defend vs against all nations, and hauing the sea for wall, the mutuall loue for garison, and God for defence should make so noble and well agreeing Monarchie, that neyther in peace we may be ashamed, nor in warre afrayed of any worldly or fozeine power why should not you be as desirous of the same, and haue as much cause to reioyce at it as we? If this honoz of so noble a Monarchie do not moue you to take and accept amitie? Let the grieve and the daunger of the afozenamed losses feare you to attempt that thing which shall displease God, encrease warre, daunger your realme, destroy your land, vndoe your children, waste your groundes, desolate your cuntryes, and bring all Scotland eyther to famine and misery, or to subiection and seruitude of another nation. We requite but your promised Queene, your offered agreement of vnitie, the ioyning of both the nations, which God of his infinite clemency and tender ioue that he hath declared to beare to both the nations hath offered vnto vs both, and in maner called vs both vnto it, whose calling and prouocation we haue and will follow to the best of our powers, and in his name and with his ayd, admonition, exhortation, requestes and Ambassadors not be yng hable to do it and to finde stablesse in promises, we shall not willing, but constrained pursue the battayle, chastice the wicked and malicious by the angry Angels of God, the fier and sworde. Wherefore we requyre and exhorte all you who hath loue to your countrie, pittie of that realme, a true hart to your Queene and maistres, regard of your honozs and promises made by the great seale of Scotland, and who fauozeth the peace, loue, vnitie and concord, and that most profitable marriage to enter, and to come to vs, and declaring your true and godly heartes therevnto, to ayde vs in this most godly purpose and enterprise: Be witnessse of our doynges, we refuse no man, temporall, nor spirituall, Lorde ne Lard, Gentleman ne other who will ayde this our purpose, and minish the occasion of slaughter and destruction: To whome we shall kepe the promises heretofore declared, & further se reward and recompence made according to the desert. And for a moze sure prooffe and playner token of the good mind and will which we beare vnto you. That which neuer yet before was graunted to Scotlande in any league, truce, or peace betwixt England and Scotland, because ye shall haue prooffe of the beginning of loue and amitie of both the realmes. The kinges highnesse considering the multitude of them which is come to his maiesties deuotion, and of them that be well wilers and ayders of this godly enterprise, hath by our aduice and counsaile graunted and by these presentes do graunt, that from hence forth all maner of Marchauntes and other Scottishmen, who will enter their names with one of the Wardaines of the marches and there professse to take part part wyth vs in this befoze named godly purpose to his owne commoditie, and to serue all such as be of the same agreement: may lawfully and wity- out any trouble and vexation enter into any porte, creeke, or hauen of Eng- land, and there vse their traffique of marchandise, bye and sell, bring in the commodities of Scotlande, and take and carye forth the commodities of England as liberally & as frely, and with the same and none other custome or paymentes theretofore, than Englishmen and the kinges subiectes doth at these presentes: Wynding further vpon the successe hereof, to gratefie so the furtherers of this most godlye enterprise and vnion, that all the world may be witnessse of the great zeale and loue which his highnesse doth beare towards you and your nation. And all this the kinges highnesse by our ad- uise & counsaile hath willed to be declared vnto you, and geuen in commaun- dement vnto vs and all his Lieutenauntes, Wardaines, Rulers, and other hedde Officers, Ministers and subiectes to se executed and done according to the true purpote, effect and meaning thereof. Fare you well.

Some after this, the kinges Maiestie by the aduice of the Lorde Pro- tector, and the rest of his counsaile, that is to saye, about the beginning of June, set forth a proclamation against Enclosures, for that a great number of poore men had complayned of Gentlemen and other, that they had taken from them, Common of Pasture and Common Fieldes, and had enclosed them into Parkes and pasture, and other such like for their owne commodi- tie and pleasure, to the vtter vndoing of the poore men. This proclamation tending to the helpe and reliefe of the poore, commaunded that such as had so enclosed the commons, should vpon a peine by a day assigned lay them out againe: But I thinke there were but few that obeyed the proclamation, which thing the poore men perceyuing, and seyng none amendement follow vpon the proclamation, rashly without order tooke vpon themselves to re- dresse, and so gathering themselves together made them Capitaines and brake downe those inclosures, and cast downe ditches, and in the ende plaide the very part of Rebelles and Traytors.

But because the first stirre and commotion was made in the West partes of this realme, namely in Cornewall hauing to their Capitaines, Humfrey Arondell, Wynslade, Holmes, and Bery, it shall be very meete first to en- treat of them. These Rebels I say demaunded not onely the enlarging of Commons and disparking of Parkes as is abouesayd: But they were chiefly offended with the alteration of religion, and desired agayne to haue the Masse, and to haue the statute of six articles restored vnto them. And al- though the kinges maiestie sent vnto them most gentle letters to cause them to be quyet, and also sent sondry Messenges vnto them, with very good ad- monitions, yet their rage was such, that nothing could stay them: But that they put themselves in array, and purposed to haue come thoro the realme to the king, but they were stayed at the Citie of Excester, which Citie they besieged almost by the space of six weekes, and the Citezens therof manful- ly and politiquely to their great prayse withstoode them and gaue them the repulse.

And first for the pacifying of these rebelles the kinges maiestie sent by his commission the right honorable the Lorde Russell, Lorde Pryuie Seale as his Lieutenaunt, and the Lorde Graue of Wilton, with a number of balli- aunt aunt souldiers, among whome was three thousande of the Launce knightes that came out of Germany. And first the sayde Lorde Russell when he came thether sent vnto them the kinges Maiesties proclamation, the effect wherof was.

That all such persons as were there vnlawfully assembled, and did not within three dayes next after the proclayming thereof, yelde and submitte themselves to the Lord Priuie Seale (the kinges Lieutenaunt) they should from thence forth be deemed accepted and taken for Rebels and Traitors against his most royall person, and his imperiall crowne and dignity, & farther the kings maiesty for a more terroz to the rebels, and the encorage- ment of such of his good subiectes as shoulde helpe and ayde to apprehende and take any of the sayde Rebelles: he by his sayd proclamation did graunt and geue all the Offices, fees, goodes and possessions, that the same Rebelles had at and befoze their apprehencion.

This proclamation notwithstanding, the sayd rebels, continued in their obstinacie and Trayterous purpose. Wherefoze yet once againe the kinges maiesty for auoiding of the shedding of Christian bloud, sent vnto them a most gentle and louing message in writing, to haue reduced them agayne to their obedience, but it would not be. The message was as followeth.

Although knowlege hath bene geuen to vs and our dereft Uncle Edward Duke of Somerset, Governoz of our person and Proteetoz of all our realmes dominions and subiectes, and to the rest of our priuie Counsaile of diuerse assemblies made by you, which ought of dutie to be our louing subiectes, against all order of lawe, and otherwise then euer any louing or kinde subiects hath attempted against their naturall and liege souereigne Lorde: Yet we haue thought it meete at this very first time, not to condempne and reiect you as we might iustly do, but to vse you as our subiects, thinking that the Deuil hath not that power in you, to make you of naturall borne Englishmen, so sodainly to become enemies to our owne natie countrie: Or of our subiectes to make you Traytors: or vnder pretence to releue your selues to destroy your selues, your wyfes, children, landes, possessions and all other commodities of this your life. This we say, that we trust that although you be ignozantly seduced, ye will not be vpon knowlege obstinate: And though some amongst you (as euer there is some Cockyll amongst good corne) forget God, neglect their Prince, esteeme not the state of the realme, but as carelesse desperat men delight in sedicion, tumult & warres: yet neuerthelesse the great part of you will heere the voyce of vs your naturall Prince, and will by wisdom and counsaile be warned and ceasse your euilles in the beginning, whose endes will be, euen by God almighties order, your owne destruction. Wherefoze as to you our subiects by ignorance seduced we speake, and be content to vse our princely auctoritie, like a father to his children, to admonish you of your faults not to punish them, to put you in remembrance of your dueties, not to auenge your forgetfulnesse.

First your disorder to rise in multitudes, to assemble your selues agaynst other oure louing subiectes, to arraye your selues to the warre: who amongst you all can aunswere for the same to almightie God, charging you to obey vs in all things? Or howe can any good Englishe heart aunswere vs, our lawes, and the rest of our very good louing and faythfull subiects, who who in deede by their obedience make our honoz, estate and degree?

Ye vse our name in your wytynges, and abuse the same agaynst our selfe: what iniurie herein do you vs to call those which loue vs to your euill purposes, by the auctoritie of our name? God hath made vs your king by his ordynance and prouidence, by our bloud and inheritaunce, by lawfull succession and our coronation. But not to this ende, as you vse our name, we are your most naturall souereigne Lord & king Edward the sixt, to rule you, to preserue you, to saue you from all your outward enemies, to see our lawes well ministred, euery man to haue his awne, to suppress disorderd people, to correct Traytors, Theeues, Pirates, Robbers and such lyke: yea to keepe our realmes from other Princes, from the malice of Scottes, of french, of the Byshop of Rome. Thus good subiectes our name is wytten, thus it is honozed and obeyed, this maiesty it hath by Gods ordynance, not by mannes: So that of this your offence we cannot wyte to much, and yet doubt not but thys is ynough from a prince to al reasonable people, from a royall king to all kind hearted and louing subiects, from the pryssaunt king of Englande to euery naturall Englishe man.

Your pretence, which you saye moueth you to doe thus, and wherewith you seeke to excuse this disorder, we assure you is eyther all false, or so baine that we doubt not, that after that ye shall hereby vnderstande the truth thereof, ye will all with one voyce knowlege your selues ignozantly led, and by error seduced: And if there be any one that wil not, then assure you the same be ranke Traytors, enemies of our crowne, sedicious people, heretikes, papistes, or such as care not what cause they haue to prouoke an insurrection so they may doe it, nor in deede can waie so riche with their awne labors and with peace, as they can doe with spoyles, with warres, with robberies, and such lyke, ye with the spoyles of your awne goodes, with the lyuing of your labors, the sweat of your bodyes, the foode of your awne householdes wyues and children: Such they be, as for a time vse pleasant perswasions to you, and in the ende will cut your throates for your awne goodes.

You be borne in hande that your children, though necessitie chaunce, shall not be christened but vpon the holpe dayes, howe false this is learne you of vs. Our booke which we haue set forth by the free consent of oure whole parliament in the Englishe tongue teacheth you the contrary, euen in the first lease, yea the first side of the first lease of that part which entreateth of Baptisme. Good subiectes (for to other we speake not) looke and be not deceaued: They which haue put this false opinion into your eares, they meane not the christening of children, but the destruction of you our christened subiectes. Be this knowne vnto you, our honoz is so much that we may not be founde faultie of one iot or worde: Proue it, if by our lawes ye maye not christen your children when ye be disposed vpon necessitie euery daye or houre in the weeke, then might you be offended, but seyng you maye doe it howe can ye beleue them that teach you the contrarie? What think you they meane in the rest, which moue you to breake your obedience agaynst vs your king and souereigne, vpon these so false tales and perswasions in so euident a matter? Therefore you all which wyll knowlege vs your souereigne Lorde, and which will heere the voyce of vs your king, may easily perceiue how you be deceyued, and howe subtilly Traytors and Papistes, with their

falshood seeke to atchieue and bring their purpose to passe with your helpe: Every Traytor will bee glad to dissemble his treason and feede it secretly, every Papist his popery and nourishe it inwardly, and in the ende make you our subiectes partakers of treason and poperie, which in the beginning was pretended to be a common weale and holynesse.

Sacrament
of x<sup>p</sup> body. &c.

And howe are you seduced by them, which put in your heads, the blessed Sacramente of Chyristes bodye, should not differ from othe common bread: If our lawes, proclamations and statutes be all to the contrarie, why shall any private man perswade you against them? we doe our selfe in our owne heart, our counsaile in all their profession, our lawes and statutes in all purposes, our good subiectes in all our doyngs most highly esteeme that Sacrament, and vse the communion therof to our most comfort. We make so much difference therof from othe common bread, that we thinke no profite of othe bread, but to maintayne our bodies: But this blessed bread we take to be the very foode of our soules to euertlasting life. Howe thinke you good subiectes, shall not we beyng your Prince, your Lorde, your King by Gods appoyntment with truth more p<sup>r</sup>euayle, then certayne euill persons with open falshood? Shall any sedicious person perswade you that the sacrament is despised, which is by our lawes, by our selfe, by our counsaile and by all our good subiectes, esteemed, bled, perticipated and daylie receyued? If euer ye were seduced, if euer deceyued, if euer Traytors were beleued, if euer Papistes poysoned good subiectes it is now. It is not the chrystening of children, not the reuerence of the Sacrament, not the helth of your soules that they shoothe at good subiectes: It is sedition: It is highe treason, it is your destruction they seeke. How craftely, how pittcoulsly, how cunningly soeuer they doe it, with one rule, iudge yee the ende which of force must come of your purposes.

Disobedience
to a King is disobedience
to almighty
God.

Almighty God forbiddeth vpon paine of euertlastyng dampnation, disobedience to vs your King, and in his place we rule in earth. If we shoulde be slowe? would God erre? If youre offence be towards God? thinke you it pardoned without repentaunce? Is Goddes iudgement mutable? Your paine is dampnation, your Judge is incorruptible, your fault is most euident.

Like wyse are ye euill informed in diuers other articles, as for confirmation of your children, for the Masse, for the maner of your seruice of Matyns and Euen song: Whatsoeuer is therein ordered hath bene long debated and consulted by many learned Bishops, Doctors, and other men of great learning in this realme concluded, in nothing so much labour and tyme spent of late tyme, nothing so fully ended.

Seruice in the English tongue.

As for the seruice in the English tongue hath manifest reasons for it, and yet perchance seemeth to you a new seruice, and in deede is none othe but the olde. The selfesame wordes in English which were in Latine, sayyng a fewe thinges taken out, so fonde that it had bene a shame to haue heard them in English, as all they can iudge which lust to report the truth. The difference is that we ment Godly, that you our subiectes should vnderstand in English, beyng your naturall Countrey tongue, that which was heretofore spoken in Latine, then seruyng onely them which vnderstood Latine, and nowe for all you which be borne English. How can this with reason offend any reasonable man, that he should vnderstand what any other sayth, sayth, and so to consent with the speaker? If the seruice in the Church were good in Latine, it remayneth good in English, for nothing is altered, but to speake with knowlege, that before was spoken with ignorance, and to let you vnderstand what is sayde for you, to the entent ye may further it wyth your owne deuotion an alteration to the better, except knowlege be worse then ignorance: So that whosoever hath mooued you to mislike this order, can geue you no reason nor answere yours if ye vnderstood it. Wherfore you our subiectes remember we speake to you beyng ordeyned your Prince and King by almighty God, if any wise we coulde aduance Goddes honour more then we do, we would do it, and see that ye become subiectes to Goddes ordinaunce. Obey vs your Prince, and learne of them which haue auctoritie to teache you, which haue power to rule you, and will execute our Justice if we be prouoked. Learne not of them whose frutes be nothing but wilfulnesse, disobedience, obstinacie, and destruction of the realme.

Knowlege is better then ignorance.

For the Masse, we assure you, no small studie nor trauaile hath bene spent by all the learned Clergie therein, and to aduoyde all contention thereof, it is brought euen to the very vse as Chyrist left it, as the Apostles v<sup>s</sup>ed it, as holy fathers deliuered it: in dede somewhat altered from that of Popes of Rome for their lucre brought to it. And although you may here the contrary of some Popishe and euill men, yet our Maiestie which for our honour may not be blemished nor stayned, assureth you that they deceyue you, abuse you, and blowe these opinions into your heades, for to furnishe theyr owne purposes.

The Masse.

And so likewise iudge you of confirmation of Children, and let them answere you this one question. Thinke they that a child chrystened is dampned because he dyeth before Bishoping. Marke good subiectes what inconuenience hereof commeth? Our doctrine therefore is founded vpon true learning and theirs vpon shamelesse errors. To conclude, besyde our gentle maner of information to you, whatsoeuer is conteyned in our booke, eyther for Baptisme, Sacrament, Masse, Confirmation, and seruice in the Church is by Parliament established, by the whole Clergie agreed, yea by the Bishops of the realme deuised, and further by Gods worde confirmed. And how dare you trust, yea how dare you geue eare without trembling to any singular person to disalowe a Parliament? A subiect to perswade against our Maiestie, or any man of his single arrogancie agaynst the determination of the Bishops, and all the Clergie, any inuented argument, agaynst the worde of God.

Confirmation of children.

But now you our subiectes, we resort to a greater matter of your vnkindnesse, a great vnnaturalnesse, and such an euill, that if we thought it had not bene begon of ignorance, and continued by perswasion of certain traitors amongst you, which we thinke fewe in number, but in their doynges busie, we could not be perswaded but to vse our sword and do iustice. And as we be ordeyned of God for to redresse your errors by auengement: But loue and zeale yet ouercommeth our iust anger, but howe long that will be God knoweth, in whose hand our heart is, and rather for your owne causes beyng our chrystened subiectes, we would ye were perswaded then vanquished, taught, then ouerthrowen, quietly pacified, then rigorously persecuted.

Ye require to haue the statute of six articles reuiued, and knowe you what what ye require? Or knowe ye what ease you haue with the losse of them? They were lawes made, but quickly repented, to bloude they were to bee borne of our people: and yet at the first in deede made of some necessite. Wh subiectes how are ye trapped by euill persons. We of pittie because they were bloude toke them away, and you nowe of ignoraunce will aske them againe. You knowe full well that they helped vs to extende rygoz, and gaue vs cause to drawe our sworde very often. And since our mercy moued vs to write our lawes with mylke and equitie, howe be ye blinded to aske them in bloud? But leauyng this maner of reasonyng, and resoptyng to the truth of our aucthoritie, we let you wit, the same hath bene aduulled by Parliament with great reioyse of our subiectes, and not now to be called in question. And dareth any of you with the name of a subiect stand agaynst an act of Parliament, a lawe of the realme? What is our power if lawes should be thus neglected, or what is your suretie if lawes be not kept? Assure you most surely, that we of no earthly thing vnder the heauen make such reputation as we doe of this one, to haue our lawes obeyed, and this cause of God to be threughly mainteyned, from the which we will neuer remoue a heares bredth, nor geue place to any creature liuyng: But therein will spende our awne royall person, oure Crowne, Treasure, Realme, and all oure state, whereof we assure you of our high honour: For herein resteth our honour: herein do all kinges knowlege vs a king: And shall any one of you dare, breath, or thinke agaynst our Kingdome and Crowne?

In the ende of this your request (as we be geuen to vnderstande) ye would haue them stande in force vntill our full age. To this we thinke that if ye knew what you spake, ye would not haue vttered the motion, nor neuer geuen breath to such a thought. For what thinke you of our kingdome? Be we of lesse aucthority for our age? Be we not your king now as we shall be? Shall ye be subiects hereafter, and now are ye not? Haue we not the right we shall haue? If ye would suspend and hang our doyngs in doubt vntill our full age: ye must first knowe, as a king we haue no difference of yeres, but as a naturall man and creature of God we haue youth, and by his sufferance shall haue age. We are your rightfull king, your liege Lord, the soueraigne Prince of Englande, not by our age, but by Gods ordynance, not onely when we shall be, xxi. yeres of age, but when we were of ten yeres. We possesse our crowne not by yeres, but by the bloud and dissent from our father king Henry the eyght. If it be considered, they which moue this matter, if they durst vtter themselves would denie our kingdome. But our good subiectes knowe their prince, and will encrease, not diminishe his honoz, enlarge his power, not abate it, knowlodge his kingdome, not differ it to certaine yeres. All is one to speake against our crowne, and to denie our kingdome, as to require that our lawes may be broken vnto, xxi. yeres. Be we not your crowned, annoynted and established king? wherein be we of lesse maiestie, of lesse aucthoritie or lesse state then our progenitozs kings of this realme? Except your vnkindnesse, your vnnaturalnesse will diminishe our estimation? We haue hetherto since the death of our father by the good aduise and counsaile of our dere & entirely beloved Uncle the Duke of Somerset, our Gouvernour and Protector kept oure estate, maintayned oure realme, preserued our honoz, defended our people from all enemies. We

haue hetherto bene feared and dread of our enemies, yea of Princes, kings and nations. Yea, herein we be nothing inferiour to any our Progenitozs, which grace we knowlege to be geuen vs from God, and howe else, but by good obedience, good counsaile of our magistrates, by the aucthoritie of our kingdome of Englande, hetherto hath gained honour during our reigne: It hath wonne of the enemy & not lost. It hath bene increpled that we of so yong yeres haue reigned so nobly, so royally, so quietly. And how chaunceth that you our louyng subiectes of that our country of Cornewall, and Devonshire, will geue first occasion to slaunder this our realme of England, to geue courage to the enemy to note our realme of the euill of rebellion, to make it a pray to our olde enemyes, to diminishe our honour which God hath geuen, our father left, our good Uncle and Counsaile preserued vnto vs? What greater euill could ye commit, then euen nowe when our fozeyn enemye in Scotland, and vpon the sea seeketh to invade vs, to do our realme dishonour then to arise in this maner agaynst our lawe, to prouoke our wrath, to aske our vengeance, and to geue vs an occasion to spende that force vpon you, which we meant to bestowe vpon our enemyes, to begin to slei you wyth that sworde that we drew forth agaynst Scottes and other enemyes? To make a conquest of our awne people, which otherwise should haue beene of the whole realme of Scotlande? Thus farre we haue disrended from our high maiestie for loue, to consider you in your simple ignoraunce, and haue beene content to sende you an instruction lyke a father, who of iustice might haue sent you your destructions like a king to rebelles. And nowe we let you knowe, that as you see our mercie abuydantly, so if ye prouoke vs further, we sweare to you by the liuyng God, ye shall feele the power of the same God in our sworde, which howe mightie it is, no subiect knoweth, howe puissant it is, no priuate man can iudge, howe mortall it is, no Englishe man dare thinke. But surely, surely, as your Lord and Prince, your onely king and maister, we say to you, repent your selues, and take our mercie without delay, or else we will forthwith extende our princely power, and execute our sharpe sworde agaynst you, as agaynst Infidelles and Turkes, and rather aduenture our awne royall person, state, and power, then the same shall not be executed.

And if you will proue the example of our mercie, learne of certain which lately did arysle, pretending some griefes, & yet acknowleging their offences, haue not onely receyued most humbly their pardon: but feele also by our order, to whome all publique order onely appertayneth, present redress of theyz griefes.

In the ende we admonishe you of your duties to God, whome ye shall answer in the day of the Lorde, and of your dueties towardes vs, whome ye shall answer by our order, and take our mercie whilist God so enclineth vs, least when ye shall be constrained to aske, we shall be to much hardened in heart, to graunt it you. And where ye shall heere nowe of mercy, mercy, and life: ye shall then heere of iustice, iustice, and death. Written the. viij. of July, in the thirde yere of our reigne.

Although they receyued from the kinges Maiestie this louyng message, and most Princely and gentle admonicion, yet was their forward and indurate heartes such, that they stood still at the swordes poynt. Wherefore

the right balliant Lorde Russell, and the Lord Gray, with their tohole power set vpon them, and they to their powers withstoode them very stoutlye, and at the first were many of the straungers slaine and hurt: But at the length the rebels were distressed, taken, and executed, and their foure chiefe Capitaynes first named in this discourse, that is to say, Thomstrey Arondell, Wynslade, Holmes, and Bury, were taken and sent to London and there accorpyng to their desertes had iudgement as traytors, and were drawen, hanged and quartered at Ciborne. And many of the people of that Countrey that were doers or maintainers of this rebellion, were executed among them selues, and many put to great synes, and losse of offices and liuyngs, as they had right well deserued.

Execution of rebelle.

The Maior
of Bodmyn in Cornewall hanged.

And among other the offenders in this rebellion I thought it well to note twaine for the maner of their execution seemed straunge. The first was one Bolwyer who was Maior of a towne in Cornewall called Bodmyn. This Maior had bene busie among the rebelles, but some that loued hym sayd that he was forced thereunto, and that if he had not consented to them, they would haue destroyed him and his house. But howsoeuer it was, this was his ende. On a certayne day Sir Anthony Kingstone beyng Brouost-marchall in the field wrote his letter vnto the sayde Maior declaring that he and certayne other with him would come and dine with him such a day. The Maior seemed to be very ioyous thereof and made for him very good preparation. And at the time appoynted, Sir Anthony Kingstone with his company came and were right hartely welcomed to the Maior. And before they sate downe to dinner, sir Anthony calling the Maior a syde shewed him that their must be execution done in that towne, and therefore willed him with speede to cause a payre of Gallowes to be made, that the same might be redy by the ende of dinner. The Maior went dilligently about it, and caused the same to be done. When dinner was ended Sir Anthony called the Maior vnto him and asked him if that were redy that he spake to him of, and he answered it was redy. Then he tooke the Maior by the hand and prayed him to bring him to the place where the same was, and he so did. And when sir Anthony saw them, he sayde vnto the Maior, thinke you they be strong enough? yea Sir sayd he, that they are. Well then sayd sir Anthony get you euen by to them for they are prouided for you, the Maior cryed I trust you meane no such thing to me, Sir sayth he there is no remedy you haue bene a busie Rebell, and therefore this is appoynted for your rewarde, so that without longer respite or tariyng, there was the Maior hanged.

At the same time also and nere vnto the place, there was a Myller who had bene a very busy wret in that rebellion, whome also Syr Anthony Kingston fought for: But the Myller had warning, and he hauing a good fall felow to his seruauant called him vnto him and sayd, I must go forth, if their come any to aske for me, say that thou art the owner of the Myll, and that thou hast kept the same this foure yeres, and in no wise name not me. The seruauant promised his Maister so to do. Afterward came Syr Anthony Kingston to the Myllers house and called for the Myller, the seruauant answered that he was the Myller. Then sayd Maister Kingston how long hast thou kept this Myll, and he answered three yeres. Well then sayde he come on thou must go with me, and caused his seruantes to lay handes on hym, and and brought him to the next tree, sayng you haue bene a rebellious knaue, and therfore here shall you hang. Then cryed he a sayd that he was not the Myller, but the Myllers seruauant, well then sayd he you are a false knaue to be in two tales, therefore hange him by sayd he, and so he was hanged. After he was hanged, one beyng by, sayd to Syr Anthony Kingstone, surely this was but the Myllers man, what then sayd he? could he euer haue done his Maister better seruice than to hang for him.

In this meane tyme the whole realme in a maner in euery thire were gathered together in vnlawfull assemblies, as Oxfozdshire, Barkehire, Middlesex, Essex, Nozfolke, Suffolke, whose Capitaynes were, Robert Kette a Tanner, and William Kette his brother, against whome was sent by the kinges maiestie the Lorde Marques of Northampton, beyng slenderly prouided of all thinges necessary for such an enterpryse. Which beyng perceyued of the Rebelles, they tooke corage thereby the more stoutely to withstand them. Neuerthelesse he entred the Citie of Nozwich, and liyng there one night, he was sore assaulted by the rebelles, which in number were thre times as many as came wyth him. By reason wherof he was forced to retire, with the losse of diuerse of his company, namely of the gentle Lord Sheffelde, whn by the sayd rebelles was cruelly murdered, to the great discomfort of the sayd Lorde Marques, and other Gentlemen that at that time attended vpon him. And after the said rebels beyng puffed by with vain glorye, vidi vnto the Gentlemen of that countrey great crueltie, in fetching them out of their houses and brought them to their camp, and compelled some of them to be their counsaylors, whether they would or not, as Sergeauit Gaudy, Sergeauit Catlyn, and many other: But yet they trusted them not so well, but they clapped a payre of fetters vpon their heeles, to keepe them safe when they had them from steppyn away. And the place where the common meetyng and counsaile was kept, was at a certayne tree, which they called the tree of Reformation.

After that the Lorde Marques hauyng the repulse as aforesayde, was returned. Then the kinges Maiestie sent that balliaunt and warlike knight Syr John Dudley Erle of Warwicke agaynst them wyth a greater number, & better furnished: Who also had with him two thousand of y<sup>e</sup> Launceknights that we spake of before, which were retayned to go into Scotlande: which Launceknights at that iournay did great and good seruice, and fought balliauntly and manfully, although many of them were slaine. Nowe when the Erle of Warwicke, who was not onely a balliant and hardie Gentleman, but also wise and polittique, was come nere to the rebelles, he marched forwarde in so good order, that the rebelles began to feare. But yet as men desperate they gathered themselues together, and stoutly set forth and aduentured the battaile with the sayde Erle, who beyng a very polittique Capitaine, assaulted them first with the sayde straungers, beyng footemen on the front, whylest he and his horsemen gaue the charge on the flanke of their battaile, whereby the battaile of the sayde rebelles began to bzeake, and in conclusion was vtterly scattered, and a great number of them slaine, and Kette theyr chiefe Capitaine put to flight. Neuerthelesse the residue, as desperate men reinforced the battaile, meanyng to make triall of a newe field. But the Erle loth to procede to the destruction of the whole number, consideryng that they were out alone Nation and people, did very mercifully send an Herault unto them, saying, that if they would deliver unto him such as were their Capitaynes and chiefe heades, the rest should receyue the kinges most gracious pardon, and haue fre libertie to depart euery man to his house and Country. The which pardon they would not at the first seeme to receyue, buttill they sawe the sayde Erles maine battaile to approche, and the horsemen with the straungers readie to geue a newe onset, whereof they standyng in feare, yelded themselues unto the kinges mercie and pardon, who accordyng to the Erles promise made by his Herault, were all pardoned, sayyng certaine to the number of. xxiij. chiefe sturres in this rebellion, who were presently executed. And after Robert Kett, and William Kett his brother, which befoze were fled, were taken, and brought first to the Erle, and then sent by to the king to Westminster, and from thence they were sent againe into Norfolk, and there executed accordyng to their merits. Thus was this rebellion of Norfolk by the singuler prouidence and manhooe of this noble Erle pacified by the punishment of a fewe, without any losse of life, landes, or goodes, to any other of the Countrie.

Robert Kett and William Kett taken and executed.

The French king vnderstandyng the same, did not onely slaye his power for goyng into Scotlande, but beyng in great desyre to haue agayne Bolleyn, he thought now was the time, or else neuer, wherefoze with all speede possible he directed his letters to all his nobles, knightes and Capitaynes that they should vpon the sight of the sayd letters, put themselues in a redynesse, and attend vpon him with suche power and furniture as they were hable to make in the countie of Bollonoys, the first day of September next folowyn.

At which time the king came to Monstrell, where he founde the Constable of Fraunce and Mounsr de Humale putting their armie in a readynesse. And the next day folowyn, the French king beyng accompanied with the sayde Lordes and their power, set forwarde towarde Bolleyn, and after came and besieged sundry pylles and fortes which the English men had there buylde and wonne them, and namely one Castell, which the English men called hable Neuse or newe Hauen, wherein as sayth the writer of the Annales of Fraunce, were foure Ensignes of English men, which beyng soze beaten with the Canon, yelded to the French king. And likewise Bolleyn Barke and Blacknesse, the which fortes when the French king had recovered, and had furnished them with men and munition for defence, he then returned into Fraunce with great triumph.

In this meane time, while the French king was thus occupied about Bolleyn in Fraunce, the kings maiestie was still occupied in quyeting and pacifying of his rebellious people in Englande, and finally to pacifie them and to set them all at rest, the king published his graces most generall and free pardon to all rebels, so that they would forthwith vpon the publication of the sayde pardon, euery man to returne to his house and countrey, which they gladly did, and so thys sedicious and most dangerous rebellion ceased.

Mary Stuart Queene of Scottes conueyed into France.

Also in this busse time, Mary Stuart Queene of Scots was conueyed by Sea out of Scotland into Fraunce, and there the. xix. day of Aprill. 1548. was maryed in our Lady Church in Paris with great triumph and solempnitie, mitie unto Fraunces the Dolphyn, eldest sonne unto king Henry the seconde of that name French king.

After these hurly burlyes were pacified and quieted, many of the Lordes of the realme, as well counsayloz as other mistyking the gouernement of the Protector, began to withdrawe themselues from the Courte, and resortyng to London, fell to secret consultation for redresse of things, but namely for the displacing of the sayde Lorde Protector, and sodainely of what occasion many maruayled and fewe knewe, euery Lorde and Counsayloz went thowoe the Citie weaponed, and had their seruauntes likewise weaponed attendyng vpon them in newe lycerings to the wondering of many. And at the last, a great assemble of the sayde Counsayloz was made at the Erle of Warwikes lodging which was then at Ely place in Holborne, whether all the Confederates in this matter came priuily armed, and finally concluded to possesse the Tower of London, which by the pollicie of Sir Wylliam Paulet Lorde Treasorer of Englande was peaceably obteyned for them, who by order of the sayde Confederates, immediatly remoued Sir John Barkam then Lieutenant of the Tower, and placed in that roome syr Leonard Chamberleyne. And after that the sayde counsaile was broken by at Ely place, the Erle of Warwike remoued forthwith into the Citie of London, and laye in the house of one John Porke Citezen of London, who was then chiefe mayster of the Wynt in Southwarke in Suffolke place, which Porke was shortly after by the ayde of the sayde Erle of Warwike made by the king knight, by the name of syr John Porke.

The confederates withdrewe themselves into private conferences.

The Lorde Protector hearing of the maner of the assemble of this counsaile, & of the taking of the Tower which seemed to him verie straunge and doubtfull, did presently the saide night remoue from Hampton Court, taking the king with him unto the Castell of Wyndsoze, and there began to fortifie the same.

The Protector for remouing in haste with the king to Wyndsoze.

The Lordes of the Counsaile beyng then in London as aforesaide conferred with the Maior of London and his brethren, first wylling them to cause a good and substantiall watch by night, and a good warde by daye to be kept for the safegarde of the Citie, and the portes and gates thereof, which was consented vnto: and the Companies of London in their turnes warned to watch and warde accordingly.

Then the sayd Lordes and counsayloz demaunded of the Lord Maior and his brethren five hundred men to ayde them to fetch the Lorde Protector out of Wyndsoze from the king. But therunto the Maior answered that he could graunt no ayde without the assent of the common counsaile of the Citie. Wherevpon the next daye, a common counsaile was sommoned to the Gyldhall in London.

But in this meane time, the sayde Lordes of the counsaile assembled themselues at the Lorde Maiors house of London, who then was syr John Amcotes fishmonger, and William Locke Mercer, and syr John Ayleph Shiriefes of the sayde Citie. And there the sayde Counsaile agreed and published a proclamation forthwith agaynst the Lorde Protector, the effect of which proclamation was as foloweth.

A proclamation published agaynst the Lord Protector.

First, that the Lord Protector by his malicious and euill gouernement was the occasion of al the sedition that of late had happened wthin the realme.

That he was Ambitious and sought his owne glory, as appered by his building of most sumptuous and costly houses, and specially in the time of the kings warres, and the kings souldiours bypayde.

That he esteemed nothing the graue counsaile of the Counsaillors.

That he sowed sedicion betwene the nobles, the gentlemen & commons.

That the nobles assembled themselves together at London for none other purpose, but to haue caused the Protector to haue liued within limits, and to haue put suche order for the kings maiestie as apperteyned, whatsoeuer the Protector's doings were, which (as they sayde) were vnnatural, ingrate and Trayterous.

That the Protector slaudered the counsaile to the king, and did that in him laye to cause variaunce betwene the king and his nobles.

That he was a great Traytor, and therefore the Lordes desired the Citie and the commons to ayde them to take him from the king. And in witness and testimonie of the contentes of the sayde proclamation, the Lordes subscribed their names and tytles, being sixtene in number.

After the aforesayd proclamation was proclaymed, the Lordes of the most part of them continuing and lying in London, came the next day to the Gyldehall during the time that the Lord Maior & his brethren, sate in their court or inner chamber, and entred and commended a long while with them, and at the last, the Maior and his brethren came forth vnto the common counsaile, where was read the kings letter sent vnto the Maior and Citizens, commaunding them to ayd him with five hundred men, and to send the same to his Castell at Windsor: and to the same letter was adioyned the kings hand and the Lorde Protector's. On the othersyde by the mouth of the Recorder, it was requested that the Citizens would graunt their ayde rather vnto the Lordes, for that the Protector had abused both the kings maiestie and the whole Realme, and without that he were taken from the king, and made to vnderstand his folly, this realme was in great hazard, and therefore required y the Citizens would willingly assent to ayd the Lordes with five hundred men, here vnto was none other answer made but silence. But the Recorder (who at that time was a worthy Gentleman called Maister Brooke) still cryed vpon them for answer. At the last stepped by a wise and good Citizen and sayd, in this case it is good for us to thinke of thinges past to auoide the daunger of thinges to come. I remember, sayth he, in a booke written in Fabians Chronicle, of the warre betwene the king and his Barons, which was in the time of king Henry the third, and the same time the Barons as our Lordes do now demaunded ayde of the Maior and Citie of London, & that in a rightfull cause for the common weale, which was for the execution of diuers good lawes, wher vnto the king before had geuen his consent, and after would not suffer them to take place, and the Citie did ayde the Lordes, & it came to an open battayl, wherin the Lordes preuailed and toke the king and his sonne prisoners, and vpon certaine condycions, the Lordes restored againe the king and his sonne to their liberties. And among all other condicions, this was one that the king should not only graunt his pardon to the Lordes, but also to the Citizens of London, which was graunted, yea and the same was ratified by act of parliament. But what followed of it was it forgotten? no surely, nor forgiven during the kinges life, the liberties of the Citie were taken away, Straungers appoynted to be our Heades and Governours, the Citizens geuen away bodie and goodes, and from one persecution to another, were most miserably afflicted, siche it is to enter into the wrath of a prince, as Salome n sayth, the wrath & indignation of a Prince is death. Wherefore forasmuch as this ayde is requyred of the kinges maiestie, whose voyce we ought to hearken vnto, for he is our high sheherd, rather then vnto y Lordes: and yet I would not with the Lordes to be clerely shakē of, but that they with vs and we with them may ioyne in suite and make our most humble petition to the kinges maiestie, that it would please his highnesse to heere such complaynt against the gouernement of the Lorde Protector as maye be iustly alliged and proued. And I doubt not, but this matter will be so pacified, that neither shall the king, nor yet the Lordes haue cause to seeke for further ayde, neyther we to offend any of them both. After this tale, the commons staid, and the lord Maior and his brethren for that time brake by, and afterwarde commoned with the Lordes.

The Lordes sate the next daye in counsaile in the Starre Chamber and from thence they sent Sir Phillippe Hobby, with their letter of credence to the kinges maiestie, beseching his highnesse to geue credite to that which the sayd Sir Phillip should declare vnto his maiestie in their names: and the king gaue him libertie to speake, and most gently heard all that he had to saye. And truly he did so wisely declare his message, and so grauely tolde his tale in the name of the Lordes, but therewithall so behemently and so grieuouly against the Protector, who was also there present by y King, that in the ende, the Lord Protector was commaunded from the kinges presence and shortly was committed to ward in a Tower within the Castell of Windsor called Beauchampes Tower. And sone after were staid Sir Thomas Smith, Maister Whalley, Maister Fisher, and many other Gentlemen that attended vpon the Lorde Protector. And the same daye, the Lordes of the Counsaile came to Wyndsoze to the king, and the next day they brought from thence the Lorde Protector and the other that were there stayed, and comieied them throughe the Citie of London with as much wonderment as might be vnto the Tower, where they remayned prisoners.

Shortly after the Lordes resorted vnto the Tower, and there charged the Protector with sundry articles, which for tediousnesse I omit.

Shortly after this, the kings maiestie called his high Court of parliament, and helde the same at Westminster, the .xxiiij. day of Nouember, in the thirde yere of his reigne, and there contynued the same vntill the first daye of February next folowynge, which was in the fourth yere of his graces reigne. And among other thinges there enacted and concluded, one statute was made for the punishment of rebelles and vnlawfull assemblies, the which lawe was made by occasion of the late rebellion that had happened in maner thoroowout the realme the yere passed, and was not thought nor ment to haue touched anye Noble man, and specially none such as the Duke of Sommerset was, which after as it shall appere it did, and by that statute he was condemned within two yeres next after.

remembraunce howe the last yere in the time of rebellion, the French king had entred into Bullonoy, and wonne dyuers of the Englishe forts there, beyng of great importaunce for the defence of the towne and Countrey, the default whereof was imputed to the negligent gouernement of the Lorde Protector. And forsomuch as they well vnderstood that the French king vpon further practise, had placed a Capitayne called the Rhynegraue with dyuers regiments of Almayne, Launceknights and certayne ensignes of Frenchmen, to the number of foure or fiue thousande at the towne of Marguyson, beyng the midway betwene Bolleyn and Calice, to the great perill and daunger as well of the Countie of Bullonoy as also of Calice, Guyfnes and all the lowe countrey. The king therfore for the defence of the sayde frontiers, caused all the straungers, which had serued that yere against the rebels, beyng to the number of two thousande, to be transported ouer the Sea to the Marches of Calice. And at Christmas next folowynge by order of the sayde Erle and of the Counsaillors aforesayde, Frannces Erle of Huntynghdon with Syr Edward Hastinges his brother, Sir James Croft, Sir Leonard Chamberleyn, and dyuers other Capytaines and souldyours to the number of thre thousande were sent ouer to the Marches of Calice to ioyne with the sayde straungers, minding with as conuenient speede as they might to remoue the Campe, and otherwise to annoy the French. And about the seauenth day of Februarie certayne commissioners appoynted for this treatie, that is to wyt, the Erle of Bedford, the Lorde Baget, Sir William Peter the kinges chiefe Secretary, and Syr John Mason arryued at Calice: By reason of whose comming, the Erle of Huntynghdon and the armie sent ouer before for the defence of the frontiers were countermaunded from anye further attempt, so that little or nothing was done in that voyage, sauing certayne skirmishes at dyuers times, not much materi- all to be wrytten of.

These commissioners beyng thus arryued, passed from Calice to Bolleyn, there to meete with the commissioners appointed by the French king where as a certayne house was newly erected for the sayd treatie to be had, which was vpon the side of Bolleyn hauen next to Fraunce, where after dyuers meetings and conferences of the commissioners of eyther partie, a final peace was at the last concluded betwene both the realmes. But chiefly among other thinges, for the restitution of Bolleyn and Bullonoy vnto the French, which was vpon certayne conditions folowynge.

First that the French king should yeelde and paye to the king of Eng- lande a certayne somme of money, and the same to be payde at two pay- ments, as it was then agreed, and for the same somme, the king of Eng- lande should render the towne of Bolleyn, and all the fortes thereto ad- ioyning, which he then enioyed, with all suche artillarie and municion as was there founde at the taking of the same vnto the french king. And for the sure payment of the sayde sommes, the french king sent into Englande for hostages and pledges, the Countie of Angwyn, Leuoy the Lorde of Wende- dinc hys brother, the Widame of Charters, and Duke de Humale and other. And on saint Markes daye next folowynge, beyng the .xxv. daye of Aprill about eyght of the clock in the morning, the Englishe men did deli- uer to the french men the possession of Bolleyn, and the Castels and fortes in the Countie of Bullonoy according to the agrements and articles of the peace afoze mencioned. And the fiftene day next folowynge, the French king entred into the sayde towne of Bolleyn, with Trumpets blown, and with all the royall triumph that might be, where he offered one great Image of Siluer of our Ladye in the Church there, which was called oure Ladye Church. The which Image he had caused specially to be made in the honoz of the sayde Ladie, and caused the same to be set vp in the place where the lyke Image befoze did stande, the which befoze was taken awaye by the Englishe men at the wyning of the towne.

Soone after this agreement, the Duke of Sommerfet late Protector, was deliuered out of the Tower, and because of suspition of displeasure and hatred that was thought to be betwene the Erle of Warwike, and the Duke of Sommerfet, a meane was found that their friendship shoulde be renewed through alliance, and a mariage was concluded betwene the Erle of War- wikes eldest sonne, and the Duke of Sommerfets eldest daughter, the which maryage was solemnised at Shene, the king beyng then present.

After the solemnitie of this mariage, there appered outwardly to the worlde great loue and friendship betwene the Duke and the Erle, but by reason of Caritales and flatterers, the loue continued not long, howbeit ma- ny did very earnestly wishe loue and amitie to continue betwene them.

About this tyme there was at Feuerham in Kent a Gentleman named Arden most cruelly murdered and slaine by the procurement of his awne wyfe. And she for the same fact was burned at Cauntzbury, and certayne o- ther that were the doers therof were hanged in diuers places of the realme.

At this tyme also the kinges Maiestie called his highe Court of Par- liament, and helde the same at Westminster the .xxiiij. day of January, in the fift yere of his reigne, and there continued the same until the .xv. day of April in the sixt yere of his reigne.

In this Parliament the booke of common prayer, which in some part had bene corrected and amended, was newly confirmed and established. And in the ende of this Parliament there chaunced a great and contagious sick- nesse to happen in þe realme, which was called the sweatynge sicknesse, wher- of a great number of people dyed in a small tyme, namely in the Citie of Lo- don. And it seemed that God had appoynted the sayde sicknesse onely for the plague of Englishmen, for the most that died thereof were men and not wo- men nor children. And it so folowed the Englishmen, that such Marchants of England as were in Flaunders and Spaine, and other Countries be- yond the sea were visited therewithall, and none other nation infected there- with. And it began first in Aprill in the North partes, and so came through the realme, and continued until September next folowynge. The disease was sodaine and grieuous, so that some beyng in perfite health in one houre, were gone and dead within foure houres next folowynge. And the same being whote and terrible infozced the people greatly to call vpon God, and to doe many deedes of Charitie: But as the disease ceased, so the deuocion quick- ly decayed.

At this tyme also, the kinges Maiestie with the aduice of his priuie Counsaile, and hauynge also great conference with Marchauntes and other, perceiynge that by such coynes and copper moneys as had bene coyned in the the tyme of the king his father, and no boe were commonly curraunt in the realme, and in dede a great number of them not worth halfe the value that they were curraunt at, to the great dishonoz of the kinges Maiestie and the realme, and to the decepte and nolittle hinderaunce of all the kinges Maiesties good subiectes, did now purpose not onely the abacyng of the sayd copper moneys, but also ment wholly to reduce them into Bollion, to the entent to deliuer fine & good moneys for them. And therfore in the Moneth of July by his graces Proclamation, he abaced the peece of .xij. pence comonly called a Teston vnto .ix. pence, & the peece of foure pence vnto thzee pence. And in August next folowynge, the peece of .ix. pence was abaced to six pence, and the peece of thzee pence vnto two pence, and the penny to an halfe penny.

The .xi. day of October, there was a great creation of Dukes & Erles, as the Lord Marques Dorset was created Duke of Suffolke, the Erle of Warwicke made Duke of Northumberland, & the Erle of Wiltshire made Marques of Winchester, & syr Wylliam Herbert maister of the hozse, was made Erle of Pembroke, and dyuers Gentlemen were made knightes.

The .xvi. day of the said month being Fryday, the Duke of Sommerset was againe apprehended, and his wife also, and committed to the Tower, and with him also were committed sir Michell Stanhop, sir Thomas Arondell, sir Raufe Auane, sir Miles Partridge, and other, for suspition of treason and felony, whereof, they all were shortly after indicted, and so standing indicted, the seconde day of December next folowynge, the sayde Duke was brought out of the Tower of London with the Axe of the Tower bozne before him, with a great number of Billes, Cleues, Holbardes, and Polaxes, attendyng vpon him, and so came into Westminster Hall, where was made in the middle of the Hall a new Scaffold, where all the Lordes of the kings Counsaile sate as his Judges, and there was he arreigned and charged with many articles both of treason and felony. And when after much milde speche he had aunswered not giltye, he in all humble maner put himselfe to be tryed by his Peeres, who after long consultation among themselves, gaue their berdict that he was not giltye of the treason, but of the felony. The people there present which was a great number, heeryng the Lordes say not giltye, which was to the treason, thinkyng most certainly that he was clerely acquitted, and chiefly for that, immediately vpon the pronouncyng of those wordes, he that carryed the Axe of the Tower, departed with the Axe, they made such an outcrie and ioy, as the lyke hath not bene heard, which was an euident declaration of their good willes bozne towardes him: But nevertheless, he was condemned to the death, whereof shortly after he tasted. The felonie that he was condemned of, was vpon the statute made the last yere agaynst rebelles and vnlawfull assemblies, wherein among other thinges is one braunch, that whosoener shall procure the death of any Counsaylor, that euery such attempt or procurement shall be felonye. And by force of that statute the Duke of Sommerset beyng accompanied with certayne other, was charged that he purposed and attempted the death of the Duke of Northumberlande, the Lozde Marques, the Lozde of Pembroke, and others of the priuie Counsaile, the which by statute was felonye.

After the Duke was thus condemned, he was againe returned to the Tower, and landed at the Crane of the Wintre, and so passed through London, don, where were both exclamations, the one cryed for ioye, that he was acquitted, the other cryed out that he was condemned. But howsoeuer they cryed, he was conuicted to the Tower of London, where he remayned vntill the .xxij. daye of January next following.

The Duke beyng condemned as is aforesayd, the people spake diuersly and murmored against the Duke of Northumberlande, and against some other of the Lordes for the condemnation of the sayd Duke, and also as the common fame went, the kinges maiestie tooke it not in good part: wherfore aswell to remooue fond talke out of mennes mouthes, as also to recreate and refreche the troubled spirites of the yong king, it was deuised that the feast of Christes Natiuitie, commonly called Christmas then at hand, should be solemnly kept at Grenewiche with open household, and franke resorte to the Court, (which is called keepyng of the Hall,) what time of olde ordinarie course, there is alwayes one appoynted to make spozte in the Courte, called commonly Lozde of Myracle, whose office is not vnknowne to such as haue bene brought by in Noble mens houses, and among great house keepers; which vse liberall feasting in that season. There was therfore by order of the counsaile a Gentleman both wise and learned, whose name was George Ferrers appoynted to that office for this yere: who beyng of better calling then comonly his predecessors had bene before, receyued all his commissions and warrauntes by the name of the Maister of the kings pastimes, which Gentleman so well supplied his office, both in the waye of sundry sightes and deuises of rare inuention, and in act of diuers enterludes and matters of pastime, played by persons, as not onely satisfied the common sozte, but also were very well liked and allowed by the counsaile and other of skill in the like pastimes: But best of al by the yong king himselfe, as appered by his princely liberalitie in rewarding that seruice.

This Christmas being thus passed and spent with much mirth and pastime, wherewith the mindes and eares of murmurers were meetely well appeased, according to a former determination as the sequelle shewed, it was thought now good to proceede to the execution of the iudgement geuen against the Duke of Sommerset touching his conuiction and attaynder of the felonye afoze mencioned. Wherevpon the .xxij. daye of January then next following beyng Fryday, he was brought out of the Tower, and according to the manner deliuered to the Shyrfes of London, and so with a great company of the Gard and other wyth weapones, was brought vnto the Scaffolde, where he shoulde suffer. And there nothing changyng boyre nor countenance, but in a maner with the same gesture that he partely vled at home kneeling downe vpon both his knees, and lifting by his handes erected himselfe vnto God. And after that he had ended a fewe shorte prayers, standing by againe and turning him selfe towardes the East syde of the Scaffolde, he vttered to the people these wordes in effect.

Derely beloued Maisters and friendes, I am brought hether to suffer, albeit that I neuer offended against the king, neyther by woerde nor dede, and haue bene alwayes as faythfull and as true vnto the realme as any man hath bene. But forsomuch as I am by a law condemned to dye, I do acknowledge my selfe as well as other to be subiect therevnto. Wherfore to expresse and testifie my obedience, which I owe vnto the lawes, I am come come hether to suffer death, wherunto I willingly offer my selfe, geuing most hartie thanks vnto the deuine goodnesse, as if I had receyued a most ample and great rewarde: For this it is thought good in the sight of the most mercifull father now to graunt me this time of repentance, & to acknowledge my self, who might through sodaine death haue stopped my breath, that I should neyther acknowlege him nor my selfe, in which behalte I worthely with my whole hart render thanks vnto him. And mozeouer gentle friends, there is yet some what that I must put you in mynde of, verely as touching religion, which so long as I was in authozity I did alwayes diligently set forth vnto you, neither do I repent me of my doings, but rather therof take most abundant and true occasion of reioysing, now that the state of Christian religion seemeth to drawe most nere vnto the forme of an order of the Primative Church. Of which thing I do not onely reioyce, but also interpret it as a great benefite geuen of God both vnto you and me, most hartely exhorting you all that this which is most purely set forth vnto you, you will with like thankfulness accept & embrace and set out the same in your liuinges, which thing if you do not, great mischiefe and perill will follow.

In sodaine fear, amongst the people.

And when he had spoken the aforesayd wordes, sodaynely a terroz and feare possessed all mennes hartes, and surely the people present were so dismayde, that they ranne together vpon heapes, and fled as though they had seene some armed men to make resistauce and cryed out, Iesus saue vs, Iesus saue vs. Those which taried still in their places knew not where they were. The diuerse and sundrye noyses of those which cryed oute, made the sodaine tumulte muche moze confused then it woulde haue beene, albeit of it selfe it was troublesome enough, for as euery man thought himselfe to be in daunger, so he cryed out, so many and sundrye noyses were hearde, this waye and that way they come.

In the meane time whilst these things were thus in doying, the people by chaunce espyed one s<sup>r</sup> Anthony Browne knight, ryng toward the Scaffolde, which was the occasion of a new noyse: For when they saw him comming, euen at that time, they suspected that which was not true, & yet notwithstanding, it was that which they all wisshed for, that the king by that messenger, had sent his vncle pardon, and therefore with great reioysing they cryed out pardon, pardon is come, God saue the king.

The truth of this hurly butyre grewe hereof, as it was after well knowne. The maner and custome is that when such executions are done out of the Tower, the inhabitants of certayne Hamlets round about London, as Hoggston, Newyngton, Shordiche and other are commaunded to geue their attendaunce with weapons vpon the Lieutenannt. And at this tyme, the Duke being vpon the Scaffolde by eyght of the clocke in the morning, the people of one of the Hamlets came late, and comming thorough the posterne gate espyng the Duke on the Scaffolde, made haste and beganne to runne, and cryed to their felowes that were behind come away, come away. The people sodainely beholding them to come running with weapons, and knewe not the cause cried away, away, by reason whereof the people ranne euery way, not knowing whether nor wherfoze.

The Duke in the meane time standing still both in the same place and minde where he was befoze with his Cap which he shooke with his hande made

made a signe vnto the people, that they should kepe themselves quiet, which thing being done and silence obteyned, he spake to them the seconde time in this maner.

Dearely beloved friends, there is no surhe matter here in hande as you vainely hope or beleue, it seemeth thus good vnto almightie God, whose ordinaunce it is meete and necessary that we all be obedient vnto, wherfoze I pray you all to be quiet and without tumult, for I am euen now quiet, and let vs ioyne in prayer vnto the Lorde for the preservation of our noble king, vnto whose maiestie I wishe contynuall health with all felicitie and abundaunce and all maner of prosperous successe, wherunto the people cryed out Amen. Mozeouer sayth the Duke, I wishe vnto all his counsailors the grace and fauour of God, wherby they maye rule all thinges by rightly with iustice, vnto whome I exhort you all in the Lorde to shewe your selues obedient, the which is also verely necessaric for you vnder the paine of condemnation, and also most profitable for the preservation and sauegarde of the kings maiestie. And forsomuch as heretofore, I haue had often times affaires with diuers men, and that it is heard to please euery man, therfoze if there be any man that hath bene offended or injured by me, I most humbly require and aske him forgeuenesse. But especially almightie God, whome thoroughout all my life I haue most greenously offended. And vnto all other whatsoeuer they be that haue offended mee, I doe with my whole heart forgeue them. And once agayne dearely beloved in the Lorde I require you that you will keepe your selues quiet and still, least thorough your tumult you might cause mee to haue some trouble, which in this case woulde nothing at all profite me, neyther be any pleasure vnto you. For albeit the spirite be wylling and readie, the fleshe is frayle and wauering, and thorough your quietnesse, I shall be much moze the quieter: But if that you fall to tumult it will be great trouble and no gayne at all vnto you. Mozeouer I desire you to beare me witnesse that I die here in the fayth of Iesu Christ, desiring you to helpe me with your prayers, that I maye perseuer constant in the same vnto my lues ende. Then he turning himselfe about kneeled downe vpon his knees, vnto whome Docteur Core which was there present to counsaile and aduertise him, deliuered a certaine scroll into his hande, wherein was conteyned a brieue confession vnto God, which being read he stood by agayne on his feete, without any trouble of minde as it appered, and first bade the Shyefes farewell, then the Lieutenant of the Tower, and certayne other that were on the Scaffolde, taking them all by the handes. Then he gaue the executioner certayne money, which done, he put of his Gowne, and kneeling downe agayne in the strawe, butyed his shyrte strings, and then the executioner comming to him, turned downe his collet rounde about his necke, and all other things which did let and hinder him. Then he couering his face with his awne handkercheffe, lifting by his eyes vnto heauen, where his onely hope remainned, layde himselfe downe along and there suffered the heauie stroke of the axe, which disseuered the head from his bodye, to the lamentable sight and grieffe of thousands that heartily praysed God for him, and entirely loued him.

This Duke was in high fauour and estimation with king Henry the eyght, of whome he receyued sundry high and great preferments, by reason that the sayde king had maryed the Lady Jane his sister, by whome he had issue king Edward the sixt. He was not onely curteous, wise and gentle, beyng daylie attendaunt at the Court, but forwarde and fortunate in service abroade, as maye well appere in his sundry voyages both in Fraunce and Scotlande, he was of nature verie gentle and pitifull, not blemished by any thing so much as by the death of the Admiral his natural brother, which could not have bene without his consent.

The .xxvi. day of February next folowynge, for the lyke felony that the Duke of Sommerfet was condemned, were also executed and hanged on a gallowes nere vnto the scaffolde on Tower hill, sir Raufe Ruane, and sir Miles Partridge knightes. And the same day was for the same cause and matter sir Myghell Stanhop, and sir Thomas Arondell beheaded on the Scaffolde.

Not long after the death of the sayd Duke and his complices, it chaunced the reuerend father in God Master Doctor Ridley then Bishop of London to preach before the kinges Maiestie at Westminster. In the which sermon he made a fruitfull and Godly exhortation to the riche, to be mercifull vnto the poore, and also moued such as were in auctoritie to traualle by some charitable waye and meane to comfort and relieue thaim. Whereby on the kinges Maiestie beyng a Prince of such forwardnesse and vertue for hys yeres, as Englande before neuer brought forth, and the same also beyng so well treyned and brought vp in al Godly knowlege, as well by his dere Uncle the late Protector, as also by his vertuous and learned Scholemasters, was so carefull of the good gouernment of the realme, and chiefly to do and preferre such thinges as most specially touched the honoz of almighty God. And vnderstandynge that a great number of poore people did swarme in this realme, and chiefly in the Citie of London, and that no good order was taken for them, did sodainly and of himselfe send to the sayd Bishop as soone as his Sermon was ended, willynge him not to depart vntill that he had spoken with him (and this that I nowe write was the verye report of the sayde Bishop Ridley) and accordynge to the kinges commaundement, he gaue hys attendaunce. And so soone as the kinges Maiestie was at leysure, he called for him, and made him to come vnto him into a great Gallery at Westminster wherein to his knowlege, and the king also tolde him so, there was present no mo persons then they two, and therfore made him sit downe in one chaire, and he himselfe in another, which as it seemed were before the coming of the Bishop there purposely set, and caused the Bishop mawger his teeth to be couered, and then entred communication with him in this sort, first geuing him most heartie thankes for his Sermon and good exhortation, and therein rehearsed such speciall thinges as he had noted, and that so many that the Bishop sayde, truly, truly, for that was commonly his othe, I could neuer haue thought y excellency to haue bene in his grace, that I behelde & saw in him. At the last the kinges Maiestie much commended him for his exhortation for the reliefe of the poore, but my Lorde sayth he, ye willed such as are in auctoritie to be carefull thereof, and to deuise some good order for theyr reliefe, wherein I thinke you meant me, for I am in highest place, and therefore am the first that must make aunswere vnto God for my negligence if I shoulde not be carefull therein, knowynge it to be the expresse commaundement of almighty mightie god, to haue compassion of his poore and nedie members for whom we must make an accompt vnto him. And truly my Lorde I am before all things most willynge to traualle that way, and I doubt nothing of your long and approued wisdom and learnynge, who hauynge such good zeale as willeth helpe vnto them, but that also that you haue had some conference with others what wayes are best to be taken therein, the which I am desirous to vnderstand, and therefore I pray you say your minde.

The Bishop thinkeynge least of that matter, and beyng amased to here the wisdom and earnest zeale of the king, was, as he sayd himselfe so astonied, that he could not well tell what to say. But after some pauise, sayd, that as he thought at this presence for some entraunce to be had, it were good to practise with the Citie of London, because a nuber of the poore there are very great, and the Citizens are many and also wise. And he doubted not but they were also both pitifull and mercifull, as the Maior and his brethren, and other the worshipfull of the sayd Citie, and that if it would please the kinges Maiestie to direct his gracious letter vnto the Maior of London, willynge hym to call vnto him such assistance as he should thinke meete to consult of thys matter, for some order to be taken therein, he doubted not but good should folow therof. And he himselfe promised the king to be one that would earnestly traualle therein. The king forthwith not onely graunted his letter, but made the Bishop tary vntill the same was written, and his hand and signet set therevnto, and commaunded the Bishop not onely to deliuer the same letter himselfe, but also to signifie vnto the Maior that it was the kinges speciall request and expresse commaundement, that the Maior should therein traualle, and alsoone as he might conueniently geue knowlege vnto him how farre he had proceded therein. The Bishop was so ioyous of the hauing of this letter, and that he had nowe an occasion to traualle in that good matter, wherein he was meruaylous zelous, that nothing could more haue pleased and delighted him: Wherefore the same night he came to the Maior of London, who then was sir Richard Dobbes knight, & deliuered the kinges letter, and shewed his message with effect. The Maior not only ioyously receyued this letter, but with all speede agreed to set forward this matter, for he also fauoured it very much. And the next day beyng Monday, he desired the Bishop of London to dine with him, and agaynst that tyme the Maior promised that he would sende for such men, as he thought meetest to talke of this matter, and so he did. And sent first for two Aldermen, and six Commoners, and afterward were appoynted moze to the number of .xxiiij. And in the ende after sundrie metynge, (for by the meane of the good diligence of the Bishop, it was well folowed) they agreed vpon a booke that they had deuised, wherein first they considered of .ix. speciall kindes or sortes of poore people, and those they brought into these thre degrees.

Christes Hospitall.

For these sortes of pooze were prouided thre seuerall houses, first for the innocent and fatherlesse, which is the Beggers childe, and is in deede the seede & breeder of beggery, they prouided the house that was the late Graie Fryers in London, and nowe is called Christes Hospitall, where the pooze children are trayned in the knowlege of God and some vertuous exercise to the ouerthrow of beggery.

Saint Thomas hospital.

For the seconde degree, is prouided the Hospitall of Saint Thomas in Southwarke, and Saint Bartholomewe in West Smithfielde, where are continually at the least two hundred diseased persones which are not on-ly there lodged and cured, but also fed and nozished.

Bridewell.

For the thirde degree, they prouided Bridewell, where the Waga-bond and ydle strumpet is chastised and compelled to labour, to the ouerthrowe of the vicious life of ydlenesse.

They prouided also for the honest decayed householder, that he should be releued at home at hys house, and in the parishe where he dwelled by a weekly reliefe and pencion. And in like maner they prouided for the Lazer to keepe him out of the Citie from clapping of dishes, and ringing of belles, to the great trouble of the Citezens, and also to the daungerous infection of many, that they also should bee releued at home at their houses wyth seuerall pencions.

King Edward the sixt founder of the hospitalls in London.

Nowe after this good order taken, and the Citezens by suche meanes as was deuised, willing to further the same. Then report thereof was made vnto the kings Maiestie: And his grace for the aduancement hereof, was not onely wylling to graunt such as should be the ouerseers and gouernours of the sayde houses a corporation and auctoritie for the gouernement thereof: But also required that he might be accompted as the chiefe founder and Patrone thereof: And for the furtheraunce of the sayde worke and continual maintenance of the same, he of his meere mercie and goodnesse graunted, that where befoze certaine landes were geuen to the maintenaunce of the house of the Sauoy, founded by king Henry the seventh, for the lodging of pilgrimes and straungers, and that the same was nowe made but a lodging of loyterers, bagabondes and strumpets that lay all day in the fieldes, and at night were harborred there, the which was rather the maintenaunce of beggery, then the reliefe of the pooze, gaue the same landes beyng first surrendered into his handes by the maister and felowes there, which landes were of the yerely value of sixe hundred pounde, vnto the Citie of London, for the maintenaunce of the foundation afozesayde. And for a further reliefe, a petition beyng made to the kinges Maiestie for a licence to take in mort- mayne, or other wise without licence landes to a certayne yerely value, and a space left in the patent for his grace to put in what somme it should please him: he looking on the boyde place called for pen and ynke, and with hys abone abone hand wrote this summe, in these maner of wordes (foure thousand markes by yere) and then sayde in the heering of his counsaile, Lord God I yeelde thee most hartly thanks & thou hast geuen me life thus long, to finish this worke to & glorie of thy name: After which foundation established, he liued not aboue two daies.

By example of which act of thys vertuous yong king, sir William Chester knight and Alderman of London, & John Calthrop Citizen and Draper of the sayd City, at their owne proper costs & charges made the Brickwalles & way on the backside, that leadeth from the said new Hospitall vnto the Hospital of S. Bartholomewes: and also couered & baluted the towne ditch from Aldersgate to Newgate, which befoze was very noysome & contagious vnto & said Hospital.

This Hospitall beyng thus erected and put in good order, there was one Richard Castle Alias Casteller Shoemaker dwelling in Westminster, a man of great trauaile and labour in his faculty with his abone hands, and such a one as was named the Cock of Westminster, for that both Winter & Sommer he was at his worke befoze foure of the clocke in the morning. This man thus truly & painefully laboring for his liuing, God blessed and encreased his labors so abundantly, that he purchasid lands and tenements in Westminster, to the yerely value of. ciiii. pounde. And hauing no childe, with the consent of his wife (who also yet liueth and is a vertuous and good woman) gaue the same landes wholly to Christes Hospital afozesayd to the reliefe of the innocent and fatherlesse childre, and for the succour of the miserable soze and sicke harborred in the other Hospitalls about London, whose example God graunt many to follow.

About this time there were three noble ships set forth and furnished for the great aduenture of the vnkowne voyage into the East, by the North seas. The great doer & encourager of which voyage was Sebastian Saboto an Englishe man, bozne at Bristol, but was the sonne of a Genoway. These ships at the last arriued in the country of Muscouia, not without great losse & dainger, and names-ly of their capitain, who was a worthy & aduenterous gentlemā called sir Hugh Willoughby knight, who beyng tossed & driuen by tempest, hee was at the last found in his ship frozen to death and all his people. But now the said voyage and trade is greatly aduanced, & the Marchants aduentering that way are newly by act of parliamēt incorporated & endued with sundry priuileges and liberties.

About the beginning of the Moneth of May next following there were thre notable mariages concluded, & shortly after solemnized at Durham place. The first was betwene the Lorde Guilford Dudley, the fourth sonne of the Duke of Northumberland, & the Lady Jane eldest daughter of Henry Duke of Suffolke and the Ladie Francess his wife, who was the daughter of Mary second sister to king Henrie the eight, first married to Lewys & French king, & after to Charles Brandon Duke of Suffolke. The second mariage was betwene the Lorde Harbert sonne and heire of William Erie of Denbroke, and the Ladie Katherin second daughter of the said Lady Francess by the said Henry Duke of Suffolke. And the thirde was betwene Henry Lord Hastings, sonne and heire of Francess Erie of Huntingdon, and Katherin yongest daughter of the Duke of Northumberland, which thre mariages were compassed and concluded chiefly vpon purpose to chaunge and alter the order of succession to the crowne, made in the time of king Henry the eight, from the said kings daughters, Mary, & Elizabeth, and to comey the same immediately after the death of king Edward to the house of Suffolke in & right of the said Lady Francess: wherein the said yong king was an earnest traualler in the time of his sicknesse, & all for feare that if his sister Marye beyng next heyre to the crowne should succede, that she would subuert all his lawes and statutes made concerning religion, wherof he was most careful: for the continuance wherof he sought to establish a meete order of succession by the allyaunce of great houses by waye of mariage, which neuertheless were of no force to serue his purpose. For tending to the disherison of the rightful heires they proued nothing prosperous to y parties, for two of them were sone after made frustrate, the one by death, the other by deuorze.

In the meane while the king became euery day sicker then other of a consumption in his lunges, so as there was no hope of his recovery, wherby those that then bare chiete aucthority in counsaile, w other Prelats & nobles of the realme, calling to them diuers notable persons learned, aswel in diuinitie as in y lawes of the land, namely, Bishops, Judges, & other, fel to consultation by this weightie case, and lastly concluded according to the deuice of king Edwards will, to declare the said Lady Jane eldest neece to king Henry the eight, and wife to y said Lord Guilford to be rightfull heyre in succession to the crowne of England without respect had to the statute made in the .xxxv. yere of king Henry y eight: The true meaning of which statute, they did impugne & ouerthrowe by diuers subtille and sinister constructions of the same, to disenherite the said kings sisters to whom the succession of the crowne of England of right appertained, aswel by the common lawes of this realme, as also by the sayd statute made in the said .xxxv. yere of the king, as aforesaide. To which newe order of succession all the said kings counsaile, with many Bishops, Lords, Doctors & Judges of y realm, subscribed their names wout refusal of any, except sir James Hales knight, one of the Iustices of y comon place, who being called to this counsaile would in no wise geue his assent either by word or writing, as ye shal here moze in y history of Quene Mary. Now when these matters were thus concluded, & after confirmed by a number of hands as aforesaid, then y noble prince king Edward y sixt by long lingering sicknesse & a consumption of his lunges as aforesaid, approached to his death, & departed out of this life the sixt day of July in the .vij. yere of his reigne, after he had raigned & nobly governed this realme .vij. yeres .v. moneths & .vii. daies. And a little before his departing lifting by his eyes to god, he prayed as fo'oweth

Lord God deliuer me out of this miserable and wretched life, & take me among thy chosen: howbeit not my will, but thy will be done. Lord I commit my spirit to thee. Oh Lord thou knowest how happy it were for me to be with thee: yet for thy chosens sake, if it be thy will send me life & health that I may truly serue thee. Oh my Lord blese thy people and saue thine inheritance. O Lord God, saue thy chosen people of Englande. O my Lord God defende this realme from Papistrie, and maintaine thy true religion, that I and my people may praise thy holy name. And therewithall he sayde I am faint, Lord haue mercy vpon me and take my spirit, and so he yeelbed by to God his Ghost the sixt day of July.

Immediately after the death of king Edward, the aforesaid Lady Jane was proclaimed Queene of this realme by the sound of trumpet, that is to say, the .ix. day of July, at which Proclamation were present the Lords of the Counsaile, the Maior of London with other.

The Ladie Mary a little before lying at Honesdon in Hartfordshire, hauing intelligence of the state of the king her brother, and of the secret practise against her, by the aduice of her friendes with all speede tooke her iourney toward her house of Kenninghall in Norfolk, intending there to remaine vntill she coule make her selfe moze strong of her friendes and allies: neuertheless vnderstanding by them that she could not lie there in surety, being a place open and easy to be approached, remoued from thence vnto her Castell of Fremingham standing in a wood Countrie, and not so easie to be inuaded by her enemies.

The Lady Mary fled into Suffolke.

So soone as the Counsaile heard of her sodaine departure, and considering that all came not to passe as they supposed. They caused speedily a power of men to be gathered together. And first they agreed that y Duke of Suffolke, father to the newe made Queene, should haue the conduction and leading of that army.

But afterwards upon further considerations it was deuised, that the Duke of Northumberland should haue the charge of this great enterprize, which Duke hauing commission from the whole counsaile, without mistrust of that which after fortun'd, toke in hand that unhappy boiage to his aboue destruction as in the history of Queene Mary shall appere. So that setting apart the feare of all perils (which in other lesse cases he neuer vsed) when all things were in a readinesse he being accompanied with no small number of Lordes and Gentlemen, set forward on his iourney, passing to Cambridge, & from thence to S. Edmondsbury.

The Lady Mary being then at Fremingham, heering of thys preparation against her, gathered together such power of the noble men & other her friends in that coutry as she could get. And first of al y noble men y came vnto her aide, were the Ecles of Suffex, Bath, and Oxford, the lord Wentworth, sir Thomas Cornwallis, sir Henry Feringham, sir William Walgraue, with diuers other gentlemen & comons of the Counties of Norfolk, & Suffolk. In this meane season the Lord Windsor, sir Edmond Beckham, sir Robert Dury, & sir Edward Hastings, raised the commons of the shire of Buckingham, to whom resorted sir John Williams, which afterward was Lord Williams of Came, & sir Leonard Chamberleyne with y chiefe power of Oxfordshire. And out of Northamptonshire came sir Thomas Cressham & a great number of Gentlemen out of diuers parts, whose names were to long to reherse. These capitaines w their copanies being thus assembled in warlike maner, marched forward towards Norfolk to the aid of y Lady Mary, & the further they went, y moze their power encreased.

The Lords of the counsaile being in this meane while at London, after they vnderstood how the better part of the realme were enclined, and heering euery day newes of great assemblies, began to suspect the sequel of this enterprize: so that providing for their awne suretie without respect of the Duke (who was now at Bury) they fell to a new counsaile, & lastly, by assent made proclamation at London in the name of the Lady Mary, by the name of Marye Queene of England, Fraunce, and Ireland defender of the sayth, and of the Churches of England and Ireland supreme head. Of which proclamation after the Duke of Northumberland being then at Bury, was aduertised by letters from the counsaile, he incontinent according to y new order receiued from them, returned with his power againe to Cambridge, and forthwith upon his comming thether proclaimed the sayd Lady Marye Queene: which proclamation made a sodaine change of mindes in his army, for they that late before seemed most forward in that quarrell, began first to flie from him, and so euery man chisting for himselfe, he that late before was furnished of such multitude of Soldiours, was sodainely forsaken of all sauing of a fewe, whose perilles were ioyned with his.

Queene Mary

Mary eldest daughter of king Henry the eight by the Lady Katherin of Spain, his first wife, and sister vnto king Edward the sixt by the father side, began her reigne the sixt day of July, which day the king her brother died, and she was proclaimed at London (as is before remembred in the ende of the history of king Edward the sixt) the .xx. day of July. 1553. And the .xxiii. day of y said moneth next folowing, was also proclaimed in Cambridge by John Duke of Northumberland, as is afoze mencioned, which proclamation made by the said Duke at Cambridge notwithstanding, for that he was appointed generall of the army in the quarel of the Lady Jane of Suffolke, he was by

by the Maioz of Cambridge, and one Sergeant at armes arrested of treason. And the xxiii. day of the said Moneth he with John Earle of Warwike his eldest sonne and two other of his sonnes, and diuers other Lords & Gentlemen, namely William Marquesse of Northampton, Fraunces Earle of Huntingdon, sir John Gates Capitaine of the garde to King Edward the first, Sir Thomas Palmer & other mo, brought prisoners from Cambridge aforesaid by the Earle of Arondeil, and so conueighed to the tower of London. And the .xvi. day of August next following, the sayd Duke, and the other before named (the Earle of Huntingdon except) were brought into Westminster hall, and there arraigned of high treason before Thomas Duke of Norfolk high Steward of England. And being brought to the barre he vsed great reuerence to his Judges, & protesting his fayth and allegcance to the Queenes Maiesty, whom he confessed to haue grievously offended, he said that he ment not to speake any thing in defence of his fact, but would first vnderstand the opinion of the Court in two poyntes.

The Duke of Northampton berland arraigned.

First, whether a man doing any acte or thing by auctoritie of the Princes counsaile, and by warrant of the great Seale of England, and nothing doing without the same, maye be charged with Treason for doing any thing by such warrant?

Second, whether any such persons as were equally culpable in that crime & those by whose letters & commaundements he was directed in all his doings, might be his iudges or passe upon his trial as his peers?

Wherunto was answered: as to the first, that y<sup>e</sup> great Seale (which he layd for his warrant) was not the seale of y<sup>e</sup> lawfull Queene of the realme, nor passed by her auctority, but y<sup>e</sup> seale of an vsurper, & therfore could be no warrant to him.

And to the second, that if any were as depely to be touched in that case as himselfe, yet so long as no attaindoz were of recorde against them, they were neuertheless persons able in law to passe vpon any trial, & not to be chalenged therfore, but at y<sup>e</sup> princes pleasure. After which answer the Duke vsing a few wordes declaring his earnest repentance in the case, & mouing the duke of Norfolk to be his meane to y<sup>e</sup> Queene for mercy, without further answer confessed the inuitemēt, by whose example the other lords arraigned with him did in the like maner, & therupon had iudgement: so that the .xxii. day of the said moneth of August the sayd Duke, sir John Gates, & sir Thomas Palmer, at the tower hill were executed, & all the rest shortly after were pardoned by the Queene, who (as it was reported) could also haue bene content to haue spared the said Dukes life as well as the rest, for the special' fauor that before time she did alwaies beare vnto him.

After that Queene Marye was thus with full consent of the Nobles, and Commons of the realme proclaymed Queene, she being then in Norfolk at her Castell of Framingham, repayred with all speede toward the Citie of London, & the thirde day of the said moneth of August she came to the said Citie, and so to the Tower. Where the Lady Jane of Suffolk (late afoze proclaymed Queene) with her husband the Lord Guilford a little before her comming, were committed to ward, and there remayned after almost fiue Monethes. And by the waye as the Queene thus passed, she was ioyfully saluted of all the people without any mistaking, saying that it was much feared of many, that she would alter the religion set forth in the time of king Edward her brother, wherof then were geuen iust occasions, because (notwithstanding diuers lawes made to the contrary) shee had daylie Masse and Latine seruice sayde before her in the Tower.

At her entrie into the Tower, there were presented to her certaine Prisoners, namely Thomas Duke of Norfolk, who in the last yere of King Henry the eyght (as you haue heard) was supposed to be attainted of treason: But in the Parliament holden in this first yere of Queene Marye, the said supposed attaindoz was by the auctoritie and act of parliament for good and apparaunt causes alleaged in the sayde acte, declared to be bitterly frustrate and voyde.

The Lady Jane and the Lord Guilford imprisoned.

Prisoners pardoned & released.

boyde. Also Edward Courtney some and heire of Henric Marques of Excestre Colyn Germaine to king Henry the eyght, and Cutbert Constall Bishop of Durham with other persons of great calling: But specially Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Wynchester, whome shee not onely released of imprisonment, but also immediatly aduanced and preferred to be Lorde Chancelor of Englande, restoring him also to his former estate and Bishoprick, and remoued from the same one Doctor Poynt, who a little before was placed therein by the gift of king Edward the first. And touching Edward Courtney, she not onely aduanced him to the Erldome of Devonshire, but also to so much of his fathers possession as there remayned in her handes, whereby it was then thought of many, that she bare affection to him by way of mariage, but it came not so to passe (for what cause I cannot geue any reason) but surely the subiectes of Englande were most desirous thereof.

Stephen Gardiner made Chancelour of England.

Edward Courtney made Erie of Devonshire.

Upon the receauing of this newe Queene, all the Bishops which had bene depriued in the time of king Edward the first her brother for the cause of religion, were nowe againe restored to their Bishopricks. And such other as were placed in king Edwards time remoued from their Sees, and other of contrarie religion placed. Amongst whome Edmond Boner Doctor of the lawes, late afoze depriued from the See of London and committed prisoner to the Marshalsea by order of king Edwardes counsaile, was with all fauour restored to his libertie and Bishoprick; and Nicholas Ridley Doctor in Diuinitie late before aduanced to the saide See by the sayd king was hastily displaced and committed prisoner to the Tower of London. The cause why such extremitie was vsed toward the sayde Bishop Ridley more then to the rest, was for that in the time of the Ladie Jane he preached a Sermon at Paules crosse by the commaundement of king Edwardes Counsaile, where in he dissuaded the people for sundry causes from receyuing the Lady Marie as Queene.

Bishops depouled and Bishops restored.

Edmond Boner Bishop of London.

Nicholas Ridley Bishop of London.

Some after the restitution of Doctor Boner to hys Bishoprick he appointed one late a Chaplein of his called Doctor Borne to preach at Paules Crosse, who was then promoted to the Queenes seruice, and not long afterward made Bishop of Bath. The sayde Doctor taking occasion of the Gospel of that day, spake somewhat largely in the instepping of Bishop Boner being present at the Sermon, which Bishop (as the sayde Preacher then openly sayde) for a Sermon made vpon the same text and in the sayd place the same daye foure yeres afoze passed, was most vniustly cast into the vile Dungeon of the Marshalsea among Theenes, and there kept during the time of king Edwardes reigne. This matter being set forth with great behemency, so much offended the ears of part of the audience, that they brake silence, and began to murmoure and thronge together, in such sorte as the Maioz and Aldermen with other of the wiser sorte then present, feared much an uprore. During which muttering one more feruent then his fellowes, threwe a Dagger at the Preacher, but who it was, came not to knowlege. By reason of which outrage the Preacher withdrew himselfe from the pulpet, and one Maister Bradford at the request of the Preachers brother and others standing there tooke the place and spake so mildely to the people, that with few wordes he appeased their fury. And after the sayd Maister Bradford forde and Maister Rogers although men of a contrarie religion conueied the sayde Preacher into Paules Schoole, and there left him in safetie.

The Garde appointed for the defence of the Preacher.

The next Sondaye following for feare of a like tumult or woyle, order was taken that the Queenes Garde should be present in the place to defend the Preacher with weapon, whereupon the wiser men perceyuing such a number of weapons, and that great peryll was not vnlike to ensue by such appaunce of late not accustomed, woulde not be present at the Sermon: By reason whereof, there was lett a small auditory. Wherefoze afterward there was a commaundement geuen by the Lord Maior, that the auncients of the companyes should be present at the next Sermon in their liueries, and so they did, wherby all became quyet.

Thomas Cranmer Archebishop committed to the Tower.

Sone after this, Thomas Cranmer Archebishop of Cantorbury, and late befoze of king Edwardes priue counsaile, was committed to the Tower of London, beyng charged wyth Treason, not onely for geuing aduice to the disinheriting of Queene Marye, but also for ayding the Duke of Northumberland with certayne horlle and men against the Queene in the quarrell of the Lady Jane of Suffolke.

The coronation of Queene Marye.

The last day of September next following, the Queene passed from the Tower through the Citie of London vnto Westminster. And the next day beyng the first of October, shee was crowned at Westminster by Stephen Gardiner Bishop of Winchester (for the Archebishops of Cantorbury and Yorke were then prisoners in the Tower) as befoze ye haue heard. At the time of whose coronation, there was published a generall pardon in her name beyng enterlaced with so many exceptions, as they that neded the same most, tooke smallest benefite thereby. In which pardon were excepted by name no small number, not onely of Bishoppes and other of the clergie, namely the Archebishops of Cantorbury and Yorke, the Bishop of London, but also many Lordes, Knightes and Gentlemen of the layetie, beside the two chiefe Justices of England, called Sir Roger Cholmeley, and Sir Edward Mountagew, and some other learned men in the law, for counsailling, or at the least consenting to the deprivation of Queene Marye, and ayding of the aforesayde Duke of Northumberlande in the pretended right of the aforesayde Lady Jane, the names of which persons so beyng excepted I haue omittted for shortnesse sake.

A leude general pardon.

Commissioners at the Deane of Paules house.

As sone as this pardon was published, and the solempnitie of the feast of the coronation ended, there were certaine commissioners assigned to take order with all such persons as were excepted out of the pardon & others to copound with the Queene for their seuerall offences, which commissioners saie at the Deane of Paules house at the west ende of Paules Church, and there called befoze them the sayde persons apart, and from some they tooke their fees and offices graunted befoze by king Edward the sixt, and yet neuerthelesse putting them to their fines, and some they committed to warde, depryuing them of their states and lyuings, so that for the time to those that tasted therof, it seemed verie grieuous, God delpyer hs from incurring any suche daunger of law againe.

A parliament.

The fift day of October next folowing the Queene held her high court of parliament at Westminster which continued vntill the .xxj. day of the sayd Moneth. In the first Session of which parliament there passed no mo acts but but one, and that was to declare Queene Marie lawfull heyze in discent to the crowne of Englande by the common lawes next after her brother king Edward, and to repeale certayne causes of treason, felonye and Premeunire conteyned in diuers former statutes, the which act of repeale was for that Cardinall Poole was specialle looked for (as after yee shall heare) for the reducing of the Church of Englande to the Popes obedience, and to the ende that the sayde Cardinall, nowe called into Englande from Rome might holde his Courtes Legantine without the daunger of the statute of the premeunire made in that case, wherunto Cardinall Wolsey (when he was Legate) had incurred to his no small losse, and to the charge of all the Clergie of Englande for exercising the lyke power. The which act beyng once passed, forthwith the Queene repayred to the parliament house, & gaue therevnto her royall assent, and then proroged the parliament vnto the .xxiiij. daye of the sayde Moneth, in which second Session were confirmed and made dyuers and sundry estatutes concerning religion, whercof some were restozed and other repealed.

Treason, Felonye, Premeunire.

At this tyme many were in trouble for religion, and among other Sir James Hales knight one of the Justices of the common place, which Justice beyng called among other by the Counsaile of king Edward to subscribe to a deuice made for the disenherityng of Queene Marye, and the Lady Elizabeth her sister, would in no wise assent to y same, though most of the other did. Yet that notwithstanding, for that he at a quarter Sessions holden in Kent gaue charge vpon the statutes of king Henry the .viij. and king Edward the sixt in derogation of the primacie of the Church of Rome abolished by king Henry the eight, was first committed prisoner to the kinges Bench, then to the Counter, and last to the flecte, where, whether it were through extreme feare, or else by reason of such talke as the Wardeyn of the flecte bled vnto him of moze trouble like to ensue, if he persisted in hys opinion (or for what other cause God knoweth) he was so inwardly troubled and vexed, that he sought to rid himselfe out of this life, which thing he first attempted in the flecte, by woundyng himselfe with a Denknife, well nere to the death. Neuerthelesse afterward beyng recouered of that hurt, he seemed to be very conformable to all the Queenes procedynges, & was therevpon deliuered of his imprisonment, and brought to the Queenes presence, who gaue him wordes of great comfort. Neuerthelesse his minde was not quiet (as after well appered) for in the ende he drowned himselfe in a riuer, not halfe a myle from his dwelling house in Kent, the riuer beyng so shalowe that he was faine to lye grouelyng befoze he could dispatch himselfe, whose death was much lamented. For besyde that he was a man wise, vertuous, and learned in the lawes of the Realme, he was also a good and true minister of iustice, whereby he gaue him great fauour and estimation among all degrees.

Sir James Hales troubled for religion.

Sir James Hales drowned himselfe.

Duryng the aforesayde Parliament, about the .xxiiij. day of October, there was kept at Paules Church in London a publike disputation appointed by the Queenes commaundement, about the presence of Christ in the Sacrament of the Altter, which disputation continued sixe dayes, Doctor Weston then beyng Prolocutor of the conuocation, who bled many vnseemly checkes ly checks and tauntes agaynst the one part, to the prejudice of their cause, By reason whereof the disputers neuer resolved vpon the articles propond, but grew daily more and more into contention, without any fruit of their long conference, and so ended this disputation with these wordes spoken by Dokter Weston Prolocutor, it is not the Queenes pleasure that we should spend herein any longer time, and ye are wel ynough, for you haue the woord, and we haue the sword. But of this matter ye may read more in the booke of the Monumentes of the Church.

At this tyme was Cardinall Poole sent for to Rome by the Queene who was very desirous of his comyng, aswel for the causes before declared as also for the great affection that she had to him being her nere kinsman and consentynge with her in religion. This message was most thankfully recey-ued at Rome, and order taken to sende the sayd Cardinall hether with great expedition. But before his comyng, Queene Mary had maryed Philip Princc of Spaine, as after shall appere.

But here to touche somewhat of the comyng of the sayde Cardinall, when he was arriued at Calice, there was a conference had amongest the Counsaillers of the Queene for y manner of his receiuing. Some would haue had him very honorably met and enterterned, as he was in all places where he had before passed, not only for that he was a Cardinall and a Legate from the Pope, but also for that he was the Queenes nere kinsman of the house of Clarence. Neuerthelesse, after much debatynge, it was thought meetest, first for that by the lawes of the realme (which yet were not repealed) he stood attainted by Parliament: And also for that it was doubtfull howe he beyng sent from Rome should be accepted of the people, who in .xxv. yeres before had not bene much acquainted with the Pope or his Cardinales: that therfore untill all thinges might be put in order for that purpose, he should come without any grea: solemnitie vnto Lambith, where in the Archebishops house his lodgyng was prepared.

In Nouember next folowynge, Thomas Cranmer Archbishop of Cantorbury, notwithstanding that he had once plainly refused to subscribe to king Edwardes will in the disinherityng of hys sister Mary (allegynge many reasons and argumentes for the legitimation of both the kinges sisters) was in the Gylldhall in London arreigned and attainted of treason, namely for aduynge the Duke of Northumberlande with horse and men agaynst the Queene as aforesayde. And the same tyme also the Ladie Jane of Suffolke (who for a while was called Quene Jane) and the Lord Gylldford her husband were in like maner arreigned and attainted, and then againe returned to the Tower, from whence they neuer came but to the Scaffold.

In the begynnyng of January next folowynge, Charles the fift Emperoz, sent into England an honorable Ambassade, among whom was Countye Arguement, and many other noble men, with full comission to conclude a maryage betweene Philip the prince of Spaine his soune and heyre, and Queene Mary as you haue heard: which Ambassade tooke such place that shortly after all thinges were finished accordyngly. But this marriage was not well thought of by the Commons, nor much better liked of many of the nobilitie, who for this, and for the cause of religion, conspired to rayse war rather then to see such chaunge of the state. Of the which conspiracie though there were many confederats, yet the first that shewed force therein, was one sir Thomas Wyat a knight in Kent, who by open Proclamations published there that the Queene and her Counsaile would by this forreigne maryage bring this realme into most miserable seruitude and bondage of straungers.

The .xxv. day of January next folowynge newes were brought to the Court of this surre begon by the sayde Sir Thomas Wyat. And forthwith after this it was knowne that Henry Duke of Suffolke father to the Ladie Jane (which Ladie Jane was yet alive) was sodainely departed from the Court with his two brethren into Warwike shire, and Leycestershire, there to rayse and gather a power of those Countreies to ioyne with Sir Thomas Wyat. The Queene hearing of these tumults did first by her proclamation declare the saide Duke of Suffolke, and syr Thomas Wyat with other Traitors. And forthwith shee sent into the Citie of London for sixe hundred men, which because they ware whyte Coates, on their ar-mors were called the white Coates of London. These white Coates with certaine vntrustie Capitaines were sent into Kent vnder the conduction of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, for whose better surtie the Queene had assigned certaine of her Garde to attende, which in great haste set forth arde, and hauing marched almost to Rochester, Wyat with all his companie beyng in the towne, the sayde Capitaines with the white Coates, sodaynly renolted from the saide Duke, and went straight to the aide of Wyat, wher-by the saide noble Duke beyng thus forsaken by his vnfaithfull felowship, was forced to retourne againe to London, and so to the Courte wythout any effect of his iourney: which repulse vnto him being then an aged man, and fortunate before in all warres, impressed such dolour of minde, that he ly-ued but short while after.

In this meane time as before you haue hearde, the Duke of Suffolke beyng come from London into Leycestershire, and Warwike shire with a very small company (as the sayng was) tooke vpon him there to publishe a Proclamation in his daughters name, purposing therby to haue perswaded the subiectes, that Queene Marie intended to tourne the success on, of the Crowne of Englande vnto straungers, namely vnto Spanyardes, which Proclamation notwithstanding, the people kept themselves quiet. Queene Mary vnderstanding of this, sent fraunces Erle of Huntynghdon to rayse power in those partes to withstande the sayde Duke, the which Erle sped his tyme so well that he prevented the sayde Duke from entring the Citie of Coventrie, where he had great hope of ayde among the common sort: By reason whereof, hee being nowe disappointed of his enterpryse, with his two brethren, the Lorde Thomas and the Lorde John Graue fledde from thence to a Manor of his called Astley sixe miles from Coventrie, and committed himselfe to a man of his being keeper of his parke, called Nicholas Laurence, the which keeper bestowed the Duke his Maister in a hollow Oke within the saide parke, where he remained two or thre dayes vndiscouered, untill the sayde keeper (as it is saide) disclosed his case to the sayde Erle, who immediatly apprehended the saide Duke, and brought him prisoner to the Tower of London.

After that syr Thomas Wyat had preuailed against the Duke of Norfolk, as is aforesaide, and had increased his number with the sixe hundred

The Ambassadors fear of Wyatt

The Emperors Ambassadors, of whome ye haue heard befoze, heering of Wyattes hasty approachyng to London sped themselves away by water, and that with all hast. The Queene then lying at her Palace of white Hall beside Westminster, and heering of her enemies so nere, was counsayled for her safegarde to take the Tower of London, whereunto she would by no meanes be perswaded: Neuerthelesse to make her selfe more stronger of friendes in the Citie, so sone as the sayd Ambassadors were departed (which was the first day of Febzuarie) she came to Gyldhall in London, against which time, order was taken by the Lorde Maior that the chiefe Citizens in their Liveries should be there present. After the Queene had taken her place in the sayde Hall and silence made, she with very good countenance vttered in effect vnto them this Oration following.

Queene Maryes
oration.

I am (quod she) come vnto you in mine owne persone to tell you that which alre dy you do see and knowe, that is how trayterously and sediciously a number of Kentishe rebelles haue assembled themselves against both vs and you: Their pretence (as they sayed at the first) was onely to resist a maryage determined betweene vs and the Prince of Spaine. To the which pretended quarell and to all the rest of their euill contriued articles ye haue bene made priue. Sithence which tyme, we haue caused dyuers of our priuy counsayle to resorte eithers to the sayde rebelles, and to demaunde the cause of this their continuance in their sedicious enterpryse: By whose answers made again to our said counsayle, it appered that the maryage is founden to be the least of their quarell, for they now swarving from their former Articles, haue bewrayed the inward treason of their heartes, as most arrogantly demaunding the possession of our person: the keeping of our Tower: And not onely the plasing and displasing of our counsayloz, but also to vse them and vs at their pleasures. Now louing Subiectes, what I am ye right well know, I am your Queene, to whome at my coronation when I was wedded to the realme and to the lawes of the same (the spowfall ring whereof I haue on my finger, which neuer hether to was, nor hereafter shall be left of) ye promised your allegeaunce and obedience vnto mee, and that I am the right and true inheritor to the crowne of this realme of Englande, I not onely take all Christendome to witnesse, but also your actes of parliament confirming the same. My father (as ye all knowe) possessed the regall estate by right of inheritance, which now by the same right dissended vnto me. And to him alwayes ye shewed your selues most faythfull and louing subiectes, and him obeyed and serued as your liege Lorde and king, and therefore I doubt not but you will shew your selues likewise to me his daughter, which if ye do, then may you not suffer any Rebelle to vsurpe the gouernance of our person, or to occupie our estate, especially beyng so presumptuous a Traytoz as this Wyatt hath shewed himselfe to be, who most certainly as he hath abused mine ignorant Subiectes to be adherentes to his trayterous quarell, so doth he intende by colour of the same to subduethe lawes to his will, and to geue skope to all raskall and forlozne persones to make generall hauock and spoyle spoyle of your goodes. And this farther I saye vnto you in the worde of a Prince, I cannot tell how naturally the mother loueth her childe, for I was neuer the mother of any: But certainly if a Prince and gouernoz maye as naturally and as earnestly loue subiectes as the mother doth the childe, then assure your selues, that I being your souereigne Lady and Queene do as earnestly and as tenderly loue & fauor you. And I thus louing you canyot but thinke that ye as heartily and faythfully loue me againe: And so ioyning together in this knot of loue and con corde, I doubt not but we together shall be well hable to geue these rebellions a short and speedy ouerthrow. And as concerning the case of my entended mariage, against which they pretende their quarell, ye shall vnderstand that I entred not into the treatie thereof without aduice, of all our Pringe Counsayle, yea and by assent of those, to whome the king my father committed his trust, who so consydered and weighed the great comodities that might ensue therof, that they not onely thought it very honorable, but also expedient both for the wealth of our realme, and also of all you our louing subiectes. And as touching my selfe (I assure you) I am not so desirous of wedding, neyther so precise or wedded to my wyll, that either for mine owne pleasure I will chole where I lust, or else so amorous as needes I must haue one, for God I thanke him (to whome be the prayse thereof) I haue hether to liued a Virgin, and doubt nothing but with Gods grace shall as well be hable so to liue still. But if as my progenitors haue done befoze, it might please God that I might leaue some fruite of my bodie behinde me to be your Gouernoz, I trust you would not onely reioyce therat, but also I know it would be to your great comfort. And certainly, if I epyther did know or thinke that this mariage should either turne to the danger or losse of any of you my louing subiectes, or to the detrtment or empayring of any parte or parcell of the royall state of this realme of Englande, I would neuer consent thereto, neyther would I euer marry while I lyued. And in the worde of a Queene I promise and assure you, that if it shall not probably appere befoze the nobilitie and commons in the high court of parliament that this mariage shall be for the singular benefite and commodity of all the whole realme, that then I wyll abstaine not onely from this mariage, but also from any other whereof perill may ensue to this noble realme. Wherefore now as good and faythfull subiectes plucke vp your heartes, and like true men stande fast with your lawfull prince against these rebelles, both our enemies and youres, and feare them not, for I assure you, that I feare them nothing at all, and I will leaue with you my Lorde Hawarde and my Lorde Treasorer to be assistentes with my Lorde Maior for the defence and safegarde of the Citie from spoyle and saccage, which is the onely skope of this rebellious company.

After this oration ended, and the Citezens seeming well satisfied therewith, the Queene with the Lordes of the counsaile returned to Whitehall from whence she came. And forthwith the Lorde Wylliam Hawarde was associate with the Lorde Maior of London, whose name was Sir Thomas White, for the protection and defence of the Citie. And for more suretie, as well of her abone person, as also of her Counsayloz and good subiects, the sayde Queene prepared a great armie to meete with the sayde rebels in the fielde, of which armie Wylliam Erle of Pembroke was made generall:

William Erle of Pembroke.

which

which Erle with all speede requisite in suche a case, prepared all thinges necessarie to such a service belonging.

A generall
pardon.

At thys time also the Queene published a proclamation which conteyned a generall pardon to all them that would forsake Wyat and his adhe-rentes and returne to her. And also in the same was promised an hundred pound lande a yere to him or them and to their heyres that could take Wyat prisoner and bring his body quick or dead to the Queene or her counsaile.

Wyat with his people placed them selues in Southwarke

During this great preparation of defence, as well within the Citie of London by the Maior and hys brethren, as also without by the Erle of Dembrooke appoynted Capitayne generall for the Queene, Wyat with his rebels dyette nere to the Citie and entred into Southwarke the thirde day of February, what time the Lorde Maior in great haste and no lesse good pollorcy (whose soever the devise was) caused the drawe bridge of London to be hewen downe and throtwne into the Thames, for feare that some light hedded Citezens and other raskall people ever apt to rebellion should haue issued and ioyned in ayde of the sayde rebels.

Wyat taketh
his journey to Kingston.

After that Wyat with his complices had lyen two dayes in South-warke, and sawe no possibility of entring into the Citie, he then altered his journey, on the Tuesday next being Shrovetuesday, early in the morning, he tooke his way to Kingston upon Thames, where he found a great part of the bridge broken, which neuerthelesse he caused to be made agayne with such expedition as was maruylous, so that he and all his companie with carriages and artillarie were passed over in safetie or any netowes ther-of came to the Court. And with no lesse celeritie and speede marched forwardes the same night towardes London, which with such ayde as he hoped for there, he thought to haue surpysed upon the sodayne. Neuerthelesse before he came within sixe myles of the Citie, stayng upon a peece of his great artillary which was dismounted by the way: his comming was discouered before daye. whereby the Erle of Dembrooke beyng generall of the Queenes armie (as is aforesayde) was with hys men in good order of battayle in saint James field beside Westminster two or thre houres before Wyat could reache thether: The Erle hauing vnderstanding by hys es-pialles what way Wyat would march, placed his armie in this order. First in a field on the West side of Saint James were all his men of armes and Demy Lancces: ouer agaynst whome in the Lane next to the Parke were placed all the light horsemen. All which bandes of horsemen were vnder the charge of the Lorde Clynton beyng Marshall of the fiede. The great Artillary was planted in the middelt and highest place of the Cawsey, leadyng from the Parke Corner towarde Charyng Crosse. The maine battaile where the Erle was with the Queenes Standard in the field on the Northsyde of the sayde Cawsey. And the hauntgarde on the Southsyde of the Cawsey, next to the house of Saint James with certaine fiede peeces, lying on the flanks of eche battaile. After that both the armyes were in sight, and that the great artillary began to thunder from either syde, without harme (as it happened to any of both) Wyat perceiuing that he could not come the fore right way without great disaduantage, when he was come to the Parke corner, he leauyng the Cawsey, swarued and tooke the nether way toward Saint James, which beyng perceyued by the Queenes horsemen

horsemen who lay on either syde of him, they gaue a sodaine charge, and de-uided his battaile asunder hard behinde Wyats ensignes, whereby so many as were not passed befoze with Wyat, were forced to flye backe towardes Bainford, and certaine of his companie which escaped the charge passed by the backesyde of Saint James towardes Westminster, and from thence to the Court, and findyng the Gates shut agaynst them stayed there a while, and shot of many Arrowes into the Windows, and ouer into the Gardern, neuerthelesse without any hurt there that was knowne: Whereupon the sayd Rebelle ouer whome one knyuet was Capitaine perceiuing themselves to be to fewe to do any great feate there, departed from thence to follewe Wyat who was gone befoze towardes London. And beyng on theyr way at Charyng Crosse, were there encountered by sir Henry Jerningham Ca-pitaine of the Queenes Gard, Sir Edward Bray Maister of the ordinance, and Sir Philip Marys knightes, which were sent by the order of the Erle of Dembrooke with a bande of Archers, and certaine fiede peeces for the re-skue of the Court, who encountered the sayde rebelles at Charyng Crosse aforesayde. After they had discharged the fiede peeces vpon them, ioyned with those rebelles halfe armed, and halfe vnarmed at the pusch of the Dyke, and very soone dispersed their power, whereof some fled into the Lane to-warde Saint Giles, and some on the other syde by a Brewhouse towardes the Champ. In this conflict which was the chiefe tryall of that day, there was not found slaine to the number of .xx. of those rebelles, which happened by reason that vpon their ioynyng with the Queenes Souldiours, the one part could not be discerned from the other, but onely by the myze & durt taken by the way, which stuck vpon their garments comyng in the night, wherfoze the cry on the Queenes part that day was, downe with the Daggles tyles.

Sir Tho-

Charyng
Crosse.

But nowe to returne to Wyat, of whome ye heard befoze, howe beyng come to the Parke corner, and perceiuing the perill apperaunt if he should haue marched streight vpon the Erles battayles which were rainged on ey-ther side of the Cawsey, did therfoze pollitiquely turne from the great Calsey, marching along the wall of the house of saint James towardes London, which could not haue bene without his no little losse of many of his traine, if those that had the charge on that side the field had bene as forward in seruce as the Erle with his battaile and the horsemen afoze shewed themselves to be. Neuertheles Wyat folowing his purposed enterprize, which was to haue entred into London, where he hoped of great aide, marched forward with the small company that was left him as farre as a common Inne called the Well Sauage, nere to Ludgate, beleuing to haue found some readie there to haue receyued him, wherein his hope was much deceyued, findyng the sayd gate fast shut, and strongly garded with a number aswell of most honest Citizens, as also of other bandes of the Queenes assured friends: Whereupon Wyat who comming towardes the Citie made himselfe sure of his enterprize, nowe desperate of the same, was faine to turne hys face, retyring backe againe to Temple barre, where he with the rest of his retinue determined (as it seemed) to trie their last fortune.

The Erle of Dembrooke who all this while kept his force together in the field, heyrng of Wyats approach to London, sent to him an Herault called Cla-renseaur, with great commination to desyst from hys rebellious enterprize:

B b b b .iij.

which

which Herault did his Message accordingly. Albeit that some sayde he promised the sayde Wyat his pardon, which should not seeme to be true, as well for that the Herault had no such commission, as also that it was not lyke that the sayde Wyat being then disarmed of all his forces would have refused mercy in such a case. For true it is, that he with a very few of his forlorne fellows, not many above the number of one hundred persons, stood still as men amazed in the gate of Temple barre, till such tyme as sir Maurice Barkley knight, by chaunce riding towarde London upon his horse with foote-cloth, without any armour, finding the sayd Wyat there, perswaded him to repayre to the Court, and to yelde himselfe unto the Queene, whose advice he folowed, and incontinent mounted by on the sayde sir Maurice horse behind him, and so roade to the Court voluntarily, and not forced by any to yelde himselfe prisoner. This coming of Wyat to the Court being so little looked for, was great cause of reioyce to such as late before stood in great feare of him.

Sir Thomas Wyat submitteyth himselfe to the Queene.

The great stomack and courage of Queene Marye.

But more then marvaile it was to see that day the invincible heart and constancie of the Queene her selfe, who being by nature a woman, and therefore commonly more feareful then men be, shewed her selfe in that case more stoute then is credible. For she notwithstanding all the fearefull newes that were brought to her that day, never abashed, insomuch that when one or two noble men being her Capitaynes, came with all hast to tell her (though untruly) that her battayles were yeldd to Wyat: she nothing moved there-with sayde, it was your fond opinion that durst not come nere to see the tryall: sayng farther, that she her selfe would enter the field to trye the truth of her quarrell, and to die with them that would serue her, rather then to yelde one tote unto such a traytor as Wyat, and prepared her selfe accordingly. But by the apprehension of Wyat, that voyage tooke none effect, for after his coming to the Court, he was immediately committed to the Tower.

The armye that was in the fielde out-charged.

Asone as the taking of Wyat was knowne, the armie whereof mention is made before that lay in saint James field were discharged, and every man lycenced to depart to his home. And forthwith proclamation was made, as wel in the Citie of London as in the suburbs of the same, that none upon paine of death should keepe in his or their houses any of Wyats factious, but should bring them forth immediatly before the Lord Maior and other the Queenes Justices. By reason of which proclamation, a great multitude of the sayde poore Captives were brought forth, being so many in number, that all the prisons in London sufficed not to receive them, so that for lacke of place they were faine to bestowe them in dyuers Churches of the sayde Citie. And shortly after were set by in London for a terroz to the common sort, because the white coates being sent out of the Citie (as before ye have heard) reuoked from the Queenes part to the ayde of Wyat, twentic payre of gallowes, on the which were executed in several places to the number of fiftie persons, which Gallowes remained standing there a great part of the Sommer next following, to the great grieve of good citizens, and for example to the commotioners.

The execution of the Ladye Jane of Suffolke.

The .xij. day of February next following the Ladye Jane of Suffolke and the Lorde Guilforde her husband who before (as you have heard) were attaynted of Treason, the one for the vsurpation of the estate royall as Queene, Queene.

Queene, the other as a principall adherent to her in that case, according to the iudgement geuen agaynst them suffered execution of death, that is to wyte, he at the Tower hill upon the Scaffolde, and shee within the Tower, whose deaths were rather hastened, for that the Duke (of Suffolke father to this Ladie, had of late (as ye have heard) reysed a newe sturre and commotion in his Countrey, making proclamation in the name of his daughter as Queene, which was the shortening of her life, who else was lyke enough to have bene pardoned. This gentle young Ladie endued with singuler gifts both of learning and knowledge as pacyent and mylde as any Lambe came to the place of her execution. And a little before her death being upon the Scaffolde uttered these wordes.

and the Lorde Guilforde her husband.

Good people I am come hether to die, and by a law I am condemned to the same. My offence agaynst the Queenes highnesse was onely in consent to the deuise of other, which now is decimed Treason, but it was neuer of my seeking, but by counsaile of those who should seeme to have further vnderstanding of thinges then I, which knewe little of the lawe, and wiche lesse of titles to the crowne: But touching the procurement and desire thereof by me or on my behalfe, I doe washe my handes in innocency thereof before God, and the face of all you (good christian people) this day, and therewith the wrong her handes, wherein she had her booke. Then sayde shee I pray you all good christian people, to beare me wytnesse, that I die a true christian woman, & that I looke to be saued by none other meanes, but only by the mercie of God in the blood of his onely sonne Iesus Christ. And I confesse that when I did knowe the worde of God, I neglected the same, and loued my selfe and the worlde, and therefore this plague and punishment is iustly and worthily happened unto mee for my sinnes. And yet I thanke God of his goodnesse that he hath geuen mee a tyme and respite to repent. And nowe good people while I am a liue, I praye you assist me with your prayers. And then kneeling downe she said the Psalm of (Miserere mei deus) in English, and then stood by and gaue her mayden (called mystresse Elyn) her Gloues and Handkerche, and her booke shee gaue to mayster Bruges then Lieutenaut of the Tower, and so bntyed her Gowne, and the executioner pressed to helpe her of with it, but she desired him to let her alone, and turned her towarde her two Gentlewomen, who helped her of therewith, & with her other attyres, and they gaue her a sayre Handkerche to put about her eyes. Then the executioner kneeled downe and asked her forgeuenesse: whome shee forgave most wyllingly. Then he wylled her to stande upon the strawe, which done shee sawe the block, and then she sayde I praye you dispatche me quickly. Then shee kneeled downe sayng, will you take it of before I laye me downe? wherunto the executioner answered, no Madame, then tyed shee the Handkerche about her eyes, and feeling for the block she sayd, where is it, where is it? One of the standers by guyded her thereunto, and shee layde downe her head upon the block, and then stretched forth her bodye, and sayde. Lorde into thy handes I commend my spirite, and so finished her life in the yere of our Lorde. 1553. the .xij. day of February.

The swordes of the Ladye Jane at her death.

The same daye a little before this young Ladyes execution, the Lorde Guilforde her housbande who was a very comely tall Gentleman, was executed on the Scaffolde at the Tower hill, as aforesayd, whose dead Carcas lying lying

lyng in a Carre in strawe, was againe brought into the Tower, at the same instant that the Ladie Jane his wife went to her death within the Tower, which miserable sight was to her a double sorow & grieve. Thus these two simple yong soules suffered ignorantly for that, which their parentes & other had unhappily brought about to the bitter subuersio of them & their families.

The. xviij. day of February next folowynge, Henry Duke of Suffolke father to the aforesayde Lady Jane was arreigned at Westminster and condemned of high treason, and the. xxi. day of the same Moneth, was beheaded at the Tower hill. At the tyme of whose condemnation, were also for the same conspiracie condemned many Gentlemen and Women, whereof some were executed at London, & some in diuers other places of the realme. And among other, the Lorde Thomas Gray brother to the Duke beyng taken in Northwales was brought to London and there executed.

The. xxiiij. day of the same Moneth, there were brought out of the Tower, Marthalea, kinges Wenche, and other prisioners of the Kentishe rebels, and such as were of Wyatts faction to the number of foure hundred prisioners, with halters about their neckes to Westminster, where the Queenes pardon was declared vnto them, which they ioyfully receiued, & yelded most humble thankes to God and the Queene, and so were discharged.

The. xv. day of March next folowynge, the Lady Elizabeth the Queenes sister, and next heire to the Crowne, was apprehended at her Manor of Ashridge for suspicion of Wyattes conspiracie, and from thence being that tyme very sicke, was with great rygoz brought prisoner to London, & shortly after committed to the Tower, where also the Lord Courtnay Erie of Deuonshire (of whome before is made mention) was for the like suspicion committed prisoner.

And not long after Queene Marye partly offended with the Londoners, as fauourers of Wyattes conspiracie, and partly perceiuyng the more part of them nothing well inclyned towards her procedynges in religion, which turned many of them to losse, summoned a Parliament to be holden at Oxford, as it were to gratifie that Citie, which with the Uniuersitie, towne, and Countrie, had shewed themselves very forwarde in her seruice, but specially in restoryng of the religion called Catholique. For which appoynted Parliament there to be holden, great prouision was made, aswell by the Queenes Officers, as by the townes men, & inhabitants of the countrey round about. But the Queenes mynde in short space chaunged, and the same Parliament was holden at Westminster in Aprill next folowynge, wherein the Queene proponed two speciall matters: the one for the maryage to be had betweene her & prince Philip of Spaine: the other for the restoryng agayne of the Popes power and iurisdiction in England. As touchyng her maryage, it was with no great difficultie agreed vpon, but the other request could not be so easily obteyned.

The. i. day of Aprill folowynge, Thomas Cranmer Archebischop of Cauntorbury, Nicholas Ridley late Bishop of London, and Hugh Latimer once Bishop of Worcester, who had bene long prisioners in the Tower, were nowe conueyed from thence, and caryed to Windsoze, and after ward to the Uniuersitie of Oxforde, there to dispute with the Deuines and learned men of the contrary opinion. CONNOCIAS

Commissio- nes.

The. xiiij. day of Aprill, these disputers assembled themselves in saint Maryes Church to conuent the three persons aboue named, vpon certaine articles of religion, who being brought out of prison before them, were scuellally one after another examined of their opinions, vpon the articles proponed vnto them, whereof ye may reade in the booke of Monumentes of the Church moze at large, and there finde the whole procedyng in that matter.

Sir Thomas Wyatte of whome mencion is made before, was aboute this tyme brought from the Tower vnto Westminster, and there arreigned of high treason: The Erie of Sussex, Sir Edward Hastings and Sir Thomas Cornewallys with other beyng his Judges. The effect of whose Indictment among other thinges specially was, that he the. xiiij. day of February last before, with force of armed multitude and Ensignes displayed, had at Brainford raised open war against our soueraigne Lady the Queene traiterously pretending and practising to depriue her of her crowne and dignitie. And the question was demaunded of him, whether he was guilty or no: whereat he stayed, and besought the Judges that he might first aske a question before he answered directly to the poynte. And he was licensed so to do. The question was, that if he should confesse himselfe guilty whether the same should not be preiudiciall vnto him, so as he by that confession should be barred from uttering of such thinges as he had moze to say. Wherevnto it was answered by the Courte, Maister Wyatte (sayde they) ye shall haue both leaue and leysure to say what you can. Then my Lordes (quoth he) I must cofesse my selfe guilty, as in the end the truth of my case must enforce me, I must acknowledge this to be a iust plague for my synnes, which most grievously I therfore haue comitted against God, who suffred me thus brutally & beastly to fall into this horrible offence of the law. Wherefore all you Lords & Gentlemen with other here present, note well my words. Lo here & se in me the same end which all other comonly had, which haue attempted like enterprise from the begynning. For peruse the Cronicles throughe, and you shall see that neuer rebellion attempted by subiectes against their prince and countrey from the begynning did euer prosper or had better successe, except the case of king Henry the fourth, who although he became a Prince: yet in his act was but a Rebell, for so must I call him. And though he preynted for a tyme, yet was it not long, but that his heires were depriued and those that had right againe restored to the kingdome and crowne, and the usurpation so sharply reuenged after ward in his bloud, as it well appered that the long delaye of Gods vengeaunce was supplied with moze grievous plague in the

the third and fourth generation. For the loue of God all you Gentlemen that be here present, remember and be taught as well by examples past as also by this my present infelicity and most wretched case. Oh most miserable mischieuous, brutish and beastly furious imaginations of mine. I was persuaded that by the maryage of the Prince of Spaine, the seconde person of this realme, and next heire to the crowne should haue bene in daunger, and that I being a free borne man, should with my Country haue bene brought into the bondage and seruitude of Aliens and Straungers: which brutish beastly opinion then seemed to me reason, & wrought in me such effectes, that it led me hedlong into the practise of this detestable crime of treason. But now being better persuaded, and vnderstanding the great commoditie and honoz which the realme should receaue by this mariage, I stand firme and fast in this opinion, that if it should please the Queene to be mercifull vnto me, there is no subiecte in this lande that should more truely and faithfully serue her highnesse then I shall, nor no sooner dye at her graces feete in defence of her quarell. I serued her highnesse against the Duke of Northumberlande, as my Lorde of Brondell can witnesse. My Graundfather more truely serued her Maiesties Graundfather, and for his sake was vpon the racke in the Tower. My father likewise serued king Henry the eyght, to his good contentation, and I also serued him, and king Edward his sonne. And in witnesse of my blood spent in his seruice I carry a mayme. I allege not all this to set forth my seruice by way of meryte, which I confesse but dutie: But to declare to the whole worlde, that by abusing my wyltes in pursuing my misadvised opinion, I haue not onely ouerthrowne my house, and defaced all the well doyngs of me and my auncestors (if euer there were any) but also haue bene the cause of mine owne death & destruction. Neither do I allege this to iustifie my selfe in any poynt, neither for an excuse of my offence, but most humbly submit my selfe vnto the Queenes maiesties mercy & pitie, desyring you my Lorde of Sulset and you Maister Hastings withall the rest of this honorable bench to be meanes to the Queenes highnesse for her mercye, which is the greatest treasure that maye be geuen to anye Prince from God, such a vertue as God hath appropriate to hym selfe, which if her highnesse vouchsafe to extend vnto me, she shall bestow it on him, who shall be most glad to serue truely, and not refuse to dye in her quarell: For I protest before the Judge of all Judges I neuer ment hurt against her highnes person.

Then sayde the Queenes attorney, maister Wyat ye haue great cause to be sozry and repentaunt for your fault, wherby you haue not onely vndone your selfe and your house, but also a number of other Gentlemen, who being true men might haue serued their prince and Countrie: yet if you had gone no farther, it might haue bene borne withall the better. But being not so contented to stave your selfe, you haue so procured the Duke of Suffolke (a man soone trayned to your purpose) and his two brethren also, by violence wherof without the Queenes greater mercie, you haue ouerthrowne that Noble house. And yet not so stayed, your attempt hath reached as much as in you laye to the second person of the realme, in whome next to the Queenes highnesse resteth all our hope and comfort, wherby her honoz is brought in question, and what daunger will folow, and to what ende it will come, God knoweth:

The queenes Attorney
which was

knoweth: Of all this you are the aucthor.

Wyat answered as I will not in any thing iustify my selfe, so I beseech you I being in this wretched estate, not to ouercharge me, or to make mee seeme to be that I am not. I am loth to touche any person by name, but that I haue written, I haue written.

Then sayde the Judge, maister Wyat, maister Attorney hath well moued you to repent your offences, and we for our partes with you the same.

Then sayde sye Edward Hastings maister of the Queenes horse, maister Wyat, doe ye remember, when I and maister Cornewallys were sent vnto you from the Queenes highnesse to demaunde the cause of your enterprise, and what you required: were not these your demaundes, that the Queenes grace should go to the Tower and there remaine, and you to haue the rule of the Tower, & her person with the treasure in keeping. And such of her counsaile as you would require to be deliuered into your hands, saying that you would be trusted, and not trust: which wordes when Wyat had confessed. Then sayde the Queenes Solliciter, maister Wyat your presumption was ouer great, and your attempt in this case hath purchased you perpetuall infamy, and shall be called Wyats rebellion, as Watte Tylers was called Watte Tylers rebellion. Then sayd the Attorney maister Wyat, were you not priue to a deuise wherby the Queene should haue bene murdered in a place, where she should walcke, I doe not burthen you to confesse this, for thus much I must saye on your behalfe, that you misliked that deuise: That (sayde Wyat) was the deuise of Wyliam Thomas, whom euer after I abhorred for that cause. Then was a letter shewed, which Wyat being in Southwarke had written to the Duke of Suffolke, that he should meete him at Kingston bridge, and from thence to accompanie him to London, although he came with the fewer number. Wyat at the first did not seme to remember any such letter, but when it was shewed him, he confessed his hande. Then was it demaunded of him among other things why he refused the Queenes pardon when it was offered him. My Lordes quoth he: I confesse my fault and offence to be most vile & heynous, for the which, first I aske God mercie, and next vnto him my soueraigne liege Ladie and Queene, whome I haue most greenously offended, appealing wholly to her mercie, without the which I cannot challenge any thing, such is my offence already committed. And therefore I beseech you to trouble me with no more questions, for I haue deliuered all things vnto her grace in wryting. And finally here I must confesse, that of all the voyages wherem I haue serued, this was the most desperate and painfull iournay euer I made. And wherem you asked why I did not receaue the Queenes pardon when it was offered vnto me, Oh unhappie man what shall I saye: when I was once entered into this deuillish desperate aduenture, there was no waye, but to wade through with that I had taken in hande, for I had thought that other had bene as farre forward as my selfe, which I found farre otherwise: So that being bent to kepe promise with all my confederates, none kept promise with me: For I lyke a Hoyle went through thicke and thinne with this determination, that if I should come to any treaty, I should seeme to betray all my friendes. But whereto should I spende anye more wordes: I yeelde my selfe wholly vnto the Queenes mercie, knowing well that it is ouerly in her power

The will of God be done on mee. Upon this confession without further tri-all he receiued the iudgement accustomed in cases of Treason, which was to be hanged drawen and quartered. And the .xj. day of Aprill next following he was brought to the Tower hill, and there was pardoned of his drawing and hanging, but had his head striken of, & his body cut in foure quarters & set by in diuers places about the City, & his hed was set vpon the Galloes at Hay hill beside Hyde parke. But here by the way is to be noted, that hee being on the Scaffold redie to suffer, he declared that the Ladie Elizabeth and hys Edward Courtney Erle of Deuonshire whome he had accused befoze (as it see-

The .xvij. daye of Aprill next following, Sir Nicholas Throkorton knight was brought from the Tower to the Guildhall in London, and there arreigned of high treason as adherent and principall counsaile to the sayd Wyat and the Duke of Suffolke and the rest, in the afoze remembred conspiracie agaynst the Queene. But he so stoutly, and therewithall so cunningly answered for himselfe, as well in cleering of his cause, as also in defending & aduoyding such poyntes of the lawes of the realme as were then alleged agaynst him, that the quest which passed vpon his life and death found him not guilty, with which verdict the Judges and counsaile there present were so much offended, that they bounde the Jury to appere at a daye in the starre Chamber before the Lordes: By whose awarde, some of them were committed to the Tower, and some other to the Fleet, where they lay vnto
the .xiiij. day of Nouember next following, and could not be set at libertie vntill they had payde such fines as were taxed vpon them, which you may be sure were not small.

And for that offence the sayd William was the .xviij. day of Maye drawne

The .xix. day of Maye next following the Ladie Elizabeth Sister to Queene Mary was deliuered out of the Tower and committed to the custodie of Sir John Williams knight, afterward Lorde Williams of Came, by whome her grace was more curteously entreated, then some woulde:
wherefore shortly after she was committed to the Maner of Woodstocke vnder the custodye of Sir Henry Benyngfielde of Orenborough in the coun-tie of Norfolke knight, at whose hands she found not the like curtesy: who (as it was well knowne) vsed his office more like a Galloz, then a Gentleman and with such rigor as was not meete to be shewed to such an estate.
But here is to be noted not so much the vnciuile nature of the man, as the singuler singuler lenitie and gracious clemency of that gentle and vertuous Princes, who afterward (as shall appere) coming to the possession of the crowne as her rightfull inheritance, was at that time so farre from reuenge of injuries receyued, that where as diuers princes haue requyred much lesse offences with losse of life, she neuer touched him, eyther with the daunger of life, eyther losse of landes or goodes, nor neuer proceeded further then to discharge him of the Courte, which many thought, was the thing that pleased him best. At whose departing from her presence, shee vsed oney these wordes or the like in sence, God forgiue you that is past and we doe, and if

The .xix. day of Iulye next following, Phillipe Prince of Spaine, tooke his iourney to Winchester, and came thither in the euening, where goyng to the church he was honozably receaued of the Bisshopp, and a great number of the Nobles of the Realme. The next day he came to the sight of Queene Mary, with whome he had long and familiar talke, and the .xv.

of the sayde Moneth being the day of saint James (whome the Spaniards call their patron) the mariage betwene them was in the sayd Citie of Winchester in most honozable maner solemnised. At which time the Emperours Ambassadour beyng present, openly pronounced that in consideration of that mariage the Emperour had graunted and geuen to the sayd Prince his sonne the kingdome of Naples, &c. Hierusalem with diuers other states and seignories. The solemnitie of that mariage ended, the king of Heraulds called Barter openly in the Church in the presence of the king, the Queene, the Lordes as well of Englande as Spaine, and all the people beyng present, solemnly proclaimed the tytle & style of these two princes as foloweth.

departed from Winchester, and taking Hampton Court in their waye, came from thence by water into Southwarke, and so ouer London bridge through

A parliament.

The .xij. day of Nouember next following began a Parliament at Westmencion is made befoze) arryued in England about the .xxiiij. day of the said

Parliament

Parliament to his former estate and dignitie (whereof he was deprived by king Henry the eighth.) After which acte passed, this Cardinall came into the Parliament house, being at that present kept in the great Chamber of the Court of Whitehall, for that the Queene by reason of sicknesse was not able to go abroade (where the king and Queene sitting vnder the cloth of estate, and the Cardinall sitting on the right hande, with all the other estates of the realme being present) and the knightes and Burgeses of the common house being also called thither, the Bishop of Winchester being Lord Chaunceloz spake in this maner.

The words of the Bishop of Winchester Lord Chaunceloz.

My Lordes of the upper house, and you my Maysters of the nether house, here is present the right reuerend father in God, my Lord Cardinall Doole Legate a latery, come from the Apostolique sea of Rome, as Ambassador to the King and Queenes Maiesties, vpon one of the waightiest causes that euer happened in this realme, and which pertaineth to the glozy of God and your vniuersall benefite. The which Ambassade their Maiesties pleasure is to be signified vnto you all by his alone mouth, trusting that you will receyue and accept it in as beneuolent and thankfull wise, as their highnesse haue done, and that you will geue attentiu and inclinable cares vnto his grace, who is nowe readie to declare the same.

So soone as the Lord Chaunceloz had ended his tale, the Cardinall began and made a long and solempne oration, the which for shortnesse sake I haue collected into these fewe articles.

The effect of the Cardinals Oration.

First, he yelded most heartie thankes to the King and Queene, and next vnto the whole Parliament, that of a man exiled and banished from this common weale, they had restozed him againe to bee a member of the same, and to the honor of his house and family. And of a man hauyng no place, neyther here nor else where within the realme, to haue admitted him into place where to speake, and to be heard.

Secondly, that his speciall commyng was for the restitution of this Realme to the auncient estate, and to declare that the Sea Apostolique hath a speciall care of this realme aboue all other, and chiefly for that this Islande first of all other prouinces of Europe, receyued the light of Christes religion from the Sea of Rome.

Thirdly, he exhorted that though the realme had swarued from the Catholike vnitie, that yet being better informed we ought to retorne into the bosome of the Church most open to receiue all penitentes. For the perswasion whereof, he brought a number of olde examples, what perill and hurte hath happened vnto them that haue swarued and gone from the Church of Rome, namely Greece and Germany. &c.

Fourthly, how much we are bounde to God for the King and Queenes Maiesties, and how miraculously God had saued and defended our Queene from her enemyes in most daungerous tymes: And also that he hath prouided to ioyne with her in marriage, such a noble prince as king Philip was, and one of her a wone religion.

Fifthly, he exhorted them all to the obedience of these two princes, and to call vpon God for issue to be had betwene them, adding that king Philips father the Emperour had among other princes traunpled most, for the restitution of the peace and vnitie of the Church: But as almighty God sayd vnto
Dauid,

Dauid, though he had a minde and will to build his Temple, yet because he had shed bloud, he should not build it, but his sonne Salomon should build it. And so because the Emperour hath had so many warres, and shed so much bloud, therefore he could not attaine to bring perfect peace to the Church. But truely (sayde he) this gracious prince king Philip his sonne (as I conceyue) is appoynted of God to it, considering now the calling of him to be ioynd with so Catholique a prince, as is the Queene of this realme, one without all doubt sent likewise of God for the restozing of the sayde realme to the vnitie of the Church, from whence it hath erred and gone astray, as it doth and may manifestly appere.

Sixtly he protested that his Commission was not to prejudice any person, for he came not to destroy, but to buylde: he came to reconcile, and not to condemne: he came not to compell, but to call againe: he came not to call any thing in question all readie done: But his commission was of grace and clemencie to all such as would receyue it. For touchyng all matters past and done, they should be cast into the Sea of forgetfulnesse, and neuer more to be thought vpon.

Finally (sayde he) the meane whereby to receyue this high benefite, is first to reuoke and repeale all such lawes as are impedimentes, blockes, and barres to this most gracious reconciliation. For lyke as he himselfe had no place to speake there, before such lawes were abrogated and remoued as stood in his way, euen so they could not receyue the grace offered from the Sea Apostolique, vntill those like impedimentes of lawes made agaynst the Sea of Rome were clerly abolished and repealed. And so in conclusion aduertised them, first for the glozy of God, and next for the conseruation and suretie of the welth and quietnesse of the whole realme, that they should earnestly trauaile therein, and that then he would make them participant of the benefite of his commission.

The next day, the whole Court of Parliament drew out the forme of a supplication, and the next day folowyng that, the King and Queene, and the Cardinall with all the Nobles and Commons being assembled againe in the great Chamber of the white Hall aforesayd. The Bishop of Winchester there declared what the Parliament had determined concernyng the Cardinalls request, and then offered to the king and Queene the sayde supplication, the copie whereof foloweth.

We the Lordes Spirituall and Tempoꝛal, and the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, representyng the whole bodie of the realme of England, and dominions of the same, in the name of our selues perticulerly, and also of the sayd bodie vniuersally, offer this our most humble supplication to your Maiesties, to this ende and effect, that the same by your graces intercession and meane, may be exhibited to the most reuerend father in God, the Lord Cardinall Doole Legate, sent specially hether from our most holy father Pope Julio the thirde, and the sea Apostolique of Rome, wherein we do declare our selues very soꝛy and repentant of the long Schisme and disobedience happening in this realme and the dominions of the same, agaynst the sayd Sea Apostolique, eyther by making, agreeing, or executing of any lawes, ordinaunces or commaundements agaynst the primacy of the same Sea, or otherwise doyng or speaking that might impugne or prejudice the same. Offering our selues and promising by this our supplication, that for a token & knowlege of our sayd repentance, we be and shall be euer readie vnder and with the aucthorities of your Maiesties, to the uttermost of our power, to do that shall lye in vs for the abrogation and repealing of all the sayd lawes and ordinaunces made or enacted to the prejudice of the See Apostolique, aswell for our selues, as for the whole bodie whom we represent. Whereupon most humbly we beseech your Maiesties, as personages vndefiled in offence of his bodie towardes the sayd See, which notwithstanding God by his providence hath made subiect to you, so to set forth this our humble suite, as we the rather by your intercession maye obtayne from the See Apostolique by the sayde most reuerende father, aswell particularly as generally, Absolution, Release, and Discharge from all daungers of such Censures and sentences, as by the lawes of the Church we be fallen into. And that we may as children repentaunt, be receyued into the bosome and vnitie of Christes Church, so as this noble Realme, with all the members thereof, may in this vnitie and perfect obedience to the See Apostolique, and Popes for the tyme beyng, serue God and your Maiesties to the furtherance and aduancement of his honour and glorie. Amen.

This supplication being first openly read, the same was by the Chauncelour deliuered to the king and Queene with petition to them to exhibite the same to the Lorde Cardinall. And the king and Queene rising out of their seates and doying reuerence to the Cardinall did deliuer the same vnto him. The Cardinall perceyuing the effect thereof to answer to his expectation, did receiue it most gladly at their maiesties handes. And then after that he had in fewe wordes geuen thanks vnto God, & declared what great cause he had to reioyce aboue all others, that his coming from Rome into Englande had taken suche most happie successe, then he caused his commission to be read (whereby it might appere that he had aucthoritie of the Pope to absolve them) which commission was verie long and large. And that being done and all the parliament on their knees, this Cardinall by the Popes aucthoritie gaue them Absolution in maner folowynge.

Our Lord Jesus Christ which with his most precious bloud hath redeemed and washed vs from all our synnes & iniquities that he might purchase vnto himselfe a glorious spouse without spot or wrinkle, and whome the father hath appointed head ouer all his Church. He by his mercy absolve you: And we by the Apostolique aucthoritie geuen vnto vs by the most holy Lord Pope Julius the thirde (his Vicegerent in earth) doe absolve and deliuer you and every of you with the whole realme and the dominions therof, from all heresie and Schisme, and from all and every iudgements, censures and paynes for that cause incurred. And also we doe restore you agayne to the vnitie of our mother the holy Church, as in our letters of commission more plainely shall appere. In the name of the father, the sonne, and holye ghost. Amen.

After this generall absolution receyued, the king and the Queene and all the Lordes with the rest went into the kings Chapell, and there sang Te Deum with great ioy and gladnesse for this newe reconciliation.

The report of this with great speede flew to Rome, as well by the French kinges letters, as also by the Cardinales, whereupon the Pope caused caused solempne Processions to be made in Rome, namely one, wherein he himselfe with all his Cardinales were present, passing with as great solempnitate & pompe as might be, geuyng thanks to God with great ioy, for the conuersion of England to his Church. At what time also he not a little commended the diligence of Cardinall Poole, and the deuocion of the King and Queene. And on Christmasse euen next folowynge, he set forth by his Bulles, a generall pardon to all such as did reioyce in the same reconciliation.

The. xxliij. of Nouember next folowynge, it was commonly reported, that the Queene was quickewith childe, and therefore commaundement was geuen by Edmond Bonner Bishop of London (and as it was sayd) not without the commaundement of the Counsaile, that there should be made in most solempne maner one generall Procession in Lodon, wherein the Priors and all the companyes of the Citie were in their Lynceries. At whose returne to the Church of Paules, there was song verie solempnly Te Deum for ioy thereof.

The second day of December beyng Sunday, Cardinall Poole came to Paules Church in London with great pompe, hauyng borne before him a Crosse, two Billers, and two Dollares of siluer, and was there solempnly receiued by the Bishop of Wynechester Chauncelour of England, who met him with Procession. And shortly after, king Philip came from Westminster by land, beyng accompanied with a great number of his Nobles. And the same day the Bishop of Winchester preached at Paules Crosse, in the which Sermon he declared that the King & Queene had restored the Pope to his right of Primacie, and that the three estates assembled in Parliament, representing the whole bodie of the realme, had submitted themselves to his holynesse, and to his successors for euer. And in the same also he greatly praised the Cardinall, and set forth the passyng high aucthoritie that he had from the See of Rome, with much other glorious matter in the commendation of the Church of Rome which he called the See Apostolique. The Sermon beyng ended, the king and the Cardinall ridyng together, returned to the Court at Whitehall: And the king had his sword borne before him, and the Cardinall had onely his Crosse, and no more.

The. xxvij. of the sayde Moneth the Duke of Savoye called prince of Pyramount came into Englande, accompanied with diuers other Lordes and gentlemen straungers, who were receaued at Grauesende by the Erle of Bedford Lorde priue Seale, and conueyed by water through London bridge to whyte hall where the king and Queene then lay, and the. ix. of January next folowynge the prince of Orange was in lyke maner receyued at Grauesend, and from thence conueyed to the Court, being at whyte hall.

The. xxij. of the same Moneth, the parliament (which began the. xxij. of Nouember before) was dissolved, wherein among other actes passed there, the statute ex officio and other lawes made for punishment of heretiques were reuocued. But chiefly the Popes most liberall Bull of dispensation of Abbey lande was there confirmed much to the contentation of many, who not without cause suspected by this newe vnitie to leese some peece of their late purchase.

At o:it thys time a yong strypling, whose name was Wylliam Fetherstone a Myllers sonne, about the age of. xviii. yeres, named and bruted himselfe to be king Edwarde the first, whereof when the Queene and the Counsaile heard, they caused with all diligence, inquirie to be made for him, so that he was apprehended in Southwarke, and bzought befoze the counsaile at Hampton Court, and there examined. And it was demaunded of hym, why he so named himselfe, to the which, he counterfeytyng a maner of simplicitie or rather frensie would make no direct aunswere, but prayed pardon, for he wist not what he sayde, affirming farther that he was counsailed so to saye and to take vpon him the name, whereof he accused certayne persons, but his talke was not founde true, wherefoze he was committed to the Marshalsea as a Lunatike foole. And the. xxviii. daye of Maye next folowynge, the aforesaide counterfeyte Prince was bzought in a Cart from the Marshalsea, through the Citie of London with a paper on his head, wherein was wrytten that he named himselfe king Edwarde. And from thence was conueyed to Westminster, beyng lead rounde about the hall and shewed to all the people there and afterwarde taken oute of the Cart and strypped, and then whypped rounde aboute the Palace at the same Cartes tayle, and without moze punishment was discharged and set at libertie. But the yere next folowynge, for that he had spreade abroade that king Edward was alpye, and that he had spoken with him, he was agayne apprehended and arreigned of high treason, whereof beyng condemned, he shortly after was drabone to Tyborne and there hanged and quartered the. xiii. of Marche.

The Lorde Courtney set at libertie.

About this time Edward Courtney Erie of Deuonshire of whome before ye haue heard, was delpyered out of the Tower, and was licenced to depart into Italy, where shortly after he ended his life, beyng sick and dead in lesse then. viii. dayes, & was honorably buried at Baddray. This Courtney was the onely sonne and heire of Henry Marques of Excester, Colyn Germane to king Henry the eyght as is sayde befoze, for the sayde king and he were dissended of two sisters Elizabeth and Katheryn, two of the daughters of king Edward the fourth, which propinquitie of blood notwithstanding, the sayd Marques for poynts of treason layde agaynst him suffered at the Tower hill the. xxx. yere of the reigne of king Henry the eyght, to the great dolour of the most of the subiectes of this realme, who for his sundrie vertues bare him great fauour. After whose death thys yong gentleman his sonne beyng yet a child was committed prisoner to the Tower, where he remained vntill the beginning of the reigne of this Queene Mary as befoze you haue heard. This gentleman as it appered was bozne to be a prisoner, for from twelue yeres of age vnto. xxx. he had scarce two yeres liberty, within the which time he dyed, and obteyned quiet, which in his lyfe he coulde neuer haue.

Ambassadors sent to intreate a peace betwene the French king and the Emperour.

In the Moneth of Maye next folowynge, Cardinall Poole who had bene a great laborer for peace betweene the French king and the Emperour, beyng accompanied with Stephyn Gardiner Bishoppe of Winchester and Chaunceloz

Chaunceloz of England, the Erie of Arondell high Stuard of England, and the Lorde Paget, were sent by the king and Queene ouer the sea to Calice, and from thence went to the towne of Marke, where they met with the Ambassadors of the Emperour and the French king. From the Emperour were sent the Bishop of Arras with other. From the French king was sent the Cardinall of Loreine and the Constable of Fraunce. In this treatie Cardinall Poole sate as President and Umpiere in the name of the Queene of Englande. This peace was greatly labored, where at the first there was much hope, but in the ende nothing was concluded: wherefoze the. xviii. day of June, this assembly was dissolved, and the English Ambassadors returned againe into England.

In the beginning of September. 1555. king Philip went ouer into Flaunders to the Emperour his father. And in the moneth of October next following, fell so great a rayne, that the aboundaunce thereof caused the Thames to swel so high, that for the space of foure or fyne dayes, the Boates and Barges rowed ouer all Saint Georges ficke, and the water roase so high at Westminster, that likewise a Boate might haue bene rowed from the one ende of the Hall to the other.

About this time the Bishops of Lincolne, Glocester, and Bristow were sent in commission to Oxford by the Popes auctoritie, to examine Ridley & Latimer vpon certain articles by them preached, which if they would not recant, and consent to the Popes doctrine, then had they power to proceede to sentence against them as Heretiques, and to commit them ouer to the secular power. Those two Doctors neuer thelesse, stood constantly to that which they had taught, and would not reuoke, for which cause they were sone condemned, and after burned in the towne Diche at Oxforde the sixtene day of October. In the time of whose examination, because the Bishops aforesayde declared themselves to be the Popes Commissioners, neyther Ridley nor Latimer would do them any reuerence, but kept their Cappes on their heddes, wherefoze they were sharply rebuked by the Bishop of Lincolne, and one of the officers was commaunded to take of their Cappes. Of these men and the maner of their death, ye may reade at large in the booke of the Monumentes of the Church.

Commissioners sent to Oxforde.

The. xxi. of October a parliament was holden at Westminster in the which among other thinges, the Queene beyng perswaded by the Cardinal (and other of her Clergy) that she could not prosper so long as she kept in her hands any possessions of the Church, did frankly and freely resigne and render vnto them all those reuenues ecclesiasticall which by the auctoritie of parliament in the time of king Henry had bene annexed to the crowne, called the first frutes and tenthes of all Bishopricks, benefices and ecclesiasticall promotions: The resignation whereof was a great diminution of the reuenues of the crowne.

During the time of this parliament, Stephyn Gardiner Bishoppe of Winchester and Chaunceloz of England dyed at his house called Winchester place beside Saint Mary Queryes in Southwarke the ninthe daye of November, whose Corps was shortly after very solempnely from thence conueyed to his church of Winchester, and there buried. In the moneth of Marche next following, there was in manner none other talke but of the great preparation that was made for the Queenes lying in Childbed, who had already taken by her chamber, and sundry Ladies and Gentlewomen were placed about her in euery Office of the Courte. In somuche that all the Courte was full of Midwives, Nurses and Rocks, and this talke continued almost halfe a yere, & was affirmed true by some of her Physicians, & other persons about her, which seemed both graue & credible. In somuch that diuers were punished for saying the contrary. And moreover commaundement geuen in all Churches for Procession with supplications and prayers to be made to almighty God, for her safe deliuey, yea and diuerse prayers were specially made for that purpose. And the sayde rumoz continued so long, that at the last reporte was made that she was deliuered of a Prince, and for ioy thereof, Welles were rung, and Bonifires made, not onely in the Citie of London, but also in sundry places of the realme. But in the ende all proued cleane contrary, and the ioy and expectation of the people vterly frustrate: For shortly it was fully certefied (all most to all men) that the Queene was as then, neyther deliuered of childe, nor after was in hope to haue any. Of this the people spake diuersly: Some sayde that the rumoz of the Queenes conception was spred for a pollecy. Some affirmed that she was with childe, but it miscaried: Some other sayde that she was decaued by a Tympanye or other like disease, whereby she thought she was with child and was not: But what the truth was I referre the report thereof to other that knoweth more.

About this tyme Brookes Bishop of Gloucester, was by the Cardinall sent downe as Commissioner from the Pope to Orford, there to sit by on the examination of Thomas Cranmer Archebishop of Cantorbury, in suche things as should be layd to hys charge by John Storz, and Thomas Martyn Doctors in the lawes, sent specially in commission from the Queene. At which time, the sayd Archebishop, making lowe obedience to them that late in the Queenes name, shewed no tokens of reverence to the Bishop that was the Popes Commissioner, who neuertheless proceeded agaynst him as Judge, and convicted him of heretic. According to the which sentence the xvi. day of Marche following, he was disgraded by Edmunde Bonner, and Thomas Thirlby Bishops of London and Elye, sent downe for that purpose, and he was burned in the same place where Ridley and Latimer before had suffered. Before his death, by the perswasion of a Spanishe frier named frier John a reader of Diuinitie in Orforde, and by the Counsaile of certaine other that put him in hope of life and pardon: he subscribed to a recantation, wherein he submitted himselfe wholly to the Church of Rome, and continued in the same mynd to outward appearaunce, vntill he was brought out of prison to go to the fire. Afore whose execution, a Sermon was made by Doctor Cole Deane of Paules in saint Maries Church in Orford, who in the end of his sermo the said doctor Cole prayed the people to endine their eares to such thinges as the sayde Cranmer would declare vnto them by his awne mouth, for (saith he) he is a man very repentant, & will here before you all renoue his errors. Neuertheles, he did cleane contrary, & with many teares protested, that he had subscribed to the sayde recantation agaynst his conscience, ence, onely for feare of death and hope of lyfe (which seemed to be true) for when he came to the stake, and the fyre kindeled, he put his right hande into the fyre, and helde it there a good space, saying that the same hand should first burne, because it helde the penne to subscribe agaynst his Lorde God.

Immediately after the death of the sayde Bishop Cranmer, Cardinall Poole was made Archebishop of Cantorbury, who during the lyfe of the other, would neuer be consecrate Archbishop. Who so desireth to see more of this matter, may see the same at large in the booke of the Monumentes of the Church, where you shall also finde that about this tyme many were in trouble for religion.

The .xxviii. day of the aforesayd Moneth of March, by the negligence of the keepers Hayde of the Gaole of Newgate in London, who left a Candle where a great deale of Strawe was, the same was set on fyre and bzent all the tynder worke on the Northsyde of the sayde Gate.

The Sommer next following was a new conspiraice brought to light, which was to haue rayfed warre in the realme agaynst the Queene, for maintenaunce whereof their first enterprize was to haue robbed the treasure of the Queenes Exchequer at Westminster, as it fell oute afterwards in prooffe. The vtterer of which conspiraice was one Whyte, who at the beginning was made priuie to the same, whereupon diuers of the conspirators, namely, Henry Beckham, Daniell Dethicke, Udall Throgmarton, and Capitain Stanton with diuers other were apprehended and executed. Moreover Sir Anthony Kingston knight was accused and apprehended for the same, and dyed in the way coming to London.

This yere the hote burning feuers and other straunge diseases which began the yere before, consumed much people in all partes of Englande, but namely of most auncient and graue men. So that in London betweene the xx. of October, and the last of December, there dyed seuen Aldermen, whose names were, Henry Heardson, sir Richard Dabbes late Maior, Sir William Larston late Maior, Sir Henry Hobblethorne late Maior, Sir John Champneys late Maior, Sir John Aileph late Shryefe, and Sir John Gressain late Maior.

About this tyme came to London an Ambassadoz to the Queene from the Emperoz of Cathay, Moscouia, and Russeland, who was honorably receyued by the Marchauntes of London hauyng trade in those Countreys, who bare all his costes and charges from the tyme of hys entrie into England out of Scotland (for thether by tempest of weather he was driuen, and there forced to lande.) And after his message and Ambassade done to the Queene, he departed againe with thre sayre ships from Grauesende into his Countrey, when he had remainned here by the space of two Monethes and more.

Also about this time the Lord Sturton for a verie shamefull and wretched murder committed by him bpō two gentlemen the father & the sonne, of the Surnames of Hargill beyng his neere neighbours, was apprehended and committed to the Tower of London. And although the Queene seemed to fauour him much, as one professing the catholique religion, yet when she vnderstood the truth of his vile deede, she abhorred him, and commaunded that he should be bled according to iustice. Wherefore shortly after he was was brought to Westminster and there arraigned and found guiltie and had iudgement as a murderer to be hanged, and for the same fact were likewise condemned foure of his seruants. And the second day of Marche next following, the sayde Lorde with his saide seruantes were conueyed by the Queenes Garde from the Tower of London throughe the Citie, he hauing his armes pinyoned at his back, and his legges bound vnder the horse belly, and so caried to Salisburie, where the sixt daye of Marche next he was hanged in the market place of the same towne, and his foure seruantes were hanged in the Countrie neere vnto the place, where the murder was committed.

This yere for the more parte there was in Englande a great dearth, namely of corne, for Wheat and Rie were commonly solde for fise Shyllings and sixe Shyllings a Bushell, and in some places at higher prices. But in the later ende of the yere towarde haruest, the price fell so muche, and specially after new corne was come into the Barne, that within lesse space then eyght weekes, from sixe Shyllings it fell to sixtene pence a Bushell and lesse.

This present month of March, king Philip who a long season had bene in Flaundyrs to take possession and gouernement of the lowe Countries as is aforesayde, did now returne into England, and passed thozough London, beyng accompanied with the Queene, and dyuers nobles of the realme: But because a great warre was towarde betweene him and the frenche king, he taried not long here, but in the middest of Sommer passyng the Seas agayne into Flaundyrs made great prouision for the same. At thys time the common people began to mutter and saye that king Philip sought occasions to be absent from the Queene. At which tyme report was made that the french king was verie loth to haue warre with England, albeit the Queene tangling her selfe in her husbandes quarrell, sent a defiance to the french king, by Clarenseaur her Herault, and not long after transported an armie of one thousande horsmen, foure thousande footemen, and two thousand pponers to ayde the king her husbände. Of the which armie William Erle of Pembroke was made generall, vnder whome many noble men and gentlemen (although dyuers suspected to be protestants) were by the Queenes commaundement appoynted to serue.

The. xii. day of July dyed the Ladye Anne of Cleue at Chelsey, and was honozably buried at Westminster.

The Queenes armie being thus sent ouer, ioyned with the armie of king Philip and besieged the towne of saint Quintyne in Fraunce. For the rescue of which towne, shortly after, that is to saye the tenth of August beyng the daye of saint Laurence, the french king sent a great army vnder the conduyt of Duke Mountmoency Constable of Fraunce to remoue y siege of the said towne, and to geue king Philip battaile, if occasion so serued. The frenche men pressing neere the towne to put in succours of mo souldiours, came within the daunger of king Philips horsmen, which beyng led by the Countey of Argymond, Horne, Mansfelt & the Dukes of Brunswike to the number of fise thousand men of armes beside the Swart Ritters and light horsmen gaue suche a furious and cruell charge vpon the frenchmen that they not able to resist the same were altogether defeated, and their battayles as well horsmen as footemen put to flight, wherof king Philip hauyng knowledge pursued them with all his forces, in which pursuete were slayne of the frenchmen a great number, the chiefe wherof were these that folow, John of Burbone Duke of Anghien. The Viscount of Turayn. The eldest sonne of Roche du Mayn. The Lord of Chandenyre, with a great number of other gentlemen that bare armes in the field, and there were taken prisoners these following.

The Duke of Mountmoency Constable of Fraunce and one of his sonnes called Mounfire de Meru.

- The Duke of Mountpencieur.
- The Duke of Longueuple.
- The Marshall of saint Androw.
- The Rynegraue Cozonall of the Almaynes.

- Roche du Mayn.
- The Countie Rochefoucault.
- The Vicount of Courayn.
- The Baron of Curton.
- The prince of Mantua.

Besides many other Gentlemen and Capitaynes. And the. xliij. day of the sayde Month, by the speciall ayde and helpe of the Englishe men, the towne of saint Quintyne was taken, for when the other souldiours after dyuers assaultes were repulsd and gaue ouer, the Englishe men of a stoute courage gaue a newe onset, by reason wherof the towne was taken. And in rewarde of their well doyng, king Philip graunted them the sacrage of the sayde towne: But the swart Ritters which keepe no rule where they be strongest, set vpon the English men in takyng of the spoyle and killed a great number of them. This grudge was with much difficultie appeased, and men thought that if the English men, beyng much fewer in number had not bene oppzessed with the multitude of the other, that it would haue growne to a great slaughter on both partes. At this siege the Lord Henry Dudley pongest sonne to the Duke of Northumberlande was slayne with the shot of a great peece, as he stobped on the wall and steyed to rip his hose on the knee thereby to haue bene the more apt to the assault. After the wynging of thys towne, newes in post were brought into England to the Queene, who caused generall processions to be made and Te deum to be song, geuing all laude and prayse vnto almightie God for this great victorie. And in the streetes of euery Citie and towne of the realme were made Bonfires with great reioysing: Which sodayne thort gladnesse turned very thortly after to a greater long sorrow. For if ought were wonne by the hauing of saint Quintynes, England gate nothing at all, for the gayne thereof came onely to king Philip. But the losse of Calice, Hammes, and Guynes with all the Countrie on that side the sea, (which followed sone after) was suche a buffet to Englande as happened not in more then an hundred yere before, and a dishonoz wherewith this realme shall be blotted, vntyll God shall geue power to redubbe it with some like requitall to the french.

Doctor Weston beyng (as you haue heard before) prolocutor of the conuocation house, was at this time in displeasure with Cardinall Poole, and other Bishoppes, because he was vnwilling to resigne his Deanery of Westminster to the Queene, whose purpose was to place there (as in olde time before) the religon of Monkes, whome in deede he fauoured not, although in all other thinges he stood with the Church of Rome. Neuerthelesse, by very importune suite or rather compulsion, he with his Colleges resigned the Deanry of Westminster. In recompence wherof, he was made

Deane of Windsoz, where not long after he was apprehended in adulterye, and for that fact was by the Cardinall depriued of all his spirituall liuings, from whose sentence he appealed to the courte of Rome. For the following of which appeale, he sought secretly to departe the realme : but he was apprehended by the waye, and committed to the Tower of London, where he remained prisoner, untill by the death of Queene Mary, Queene Elizabeth came to the crowne, by whome he was set at libertie, and forthwith fell sicke and dyed. The common talke was, that if he had not so sodainly dyed, he woulde haue disclosed the purpose of the chiefe of the Clergy (meaning the Cardinall) whiche was to haue taken by king Henryes bodye at Windsoz to haue bzent it as many thought.

At this time, although open hostility and warre were betwene England and Fraunce, yet contrary to the auncient custome afoze vsed, the towne of Calice and the Fortes thereaboutes were not supplied with any new accrues of souldiozs, which negligence was not vnknowne to the enemy, who long before had practised the wyning of the sayd towne and countrey. The French king therefore beyng sharply netted with the late losse of Sainte Quintines, and a great peece of his countrey adioyning, and desirous of reuenge, thought it not meete to let slippe this occasion : And hauing presently a full army in areadinesse to employ where most aduantage should appere, determined with all speede to put in prooffe the enterprize of Calice, which long and many tymes before was purposed vpon. This practise was not so secret, but that the Deputies of Calice and Guines had some intelligence thereof, and informed the Queene and her counsaile accordingly. Nevertheless either by wilfull negligence there, or lacke of credite, by the Queenes cunsaile here : this great case was so slenderly regarded, as no prouision of defence was made untill it was somewhat to late. The Duke of Guise being Generall of the French Army, proceeded in this enterprize with mercenous policy. For approaching the English frontier vnder colour to bitayle Bulleyme and Arde, he entred the same vpon a sodaine, and tooke a litle Bulwarke at Sandgate by assaulte, and then deuided hys armye into two partes, sendyng one parte with certayne peece of great artillery along the Dounes by the sea side, towardes Rife Banke : the other parte furnished also with battery peece, marched strayte forth to Newnam Bzidge : meaning to batter these two fortis both at one tyme, which thing he did wyth such celeritye, that coming thether very late in the eueing : he was maister of both by the next Morning, wherent the first shot discharged at Newnam bzidge, the head of the maister Gunner of y<sup>e</sup> peece, whose name was Horseley, was cleane stricken of. The Capitaine considering the great power of the French army, and hauing his fort but slenderly manned to make sufficient resistance, fled to Calice : And by y<sup>e</sup> time he was come thether : the other part of y<sup>e</sup> French army that went by y<sup>e</sup> sea side with their battery had woone Rife Banke, being abandoned to their hads. The next day, the Frenchmen with fure double & Canones thre Culuerins began a battery from y<sup>e</sup> sand Hilles next Rife Bank, against y<sup>e</sup> towne of Calice & continued the same by the space of two or thre dayes untill they made a litle breach of the wall ; next vnto the Water Gate, which neuerthelesse was not yet assalutable, for that which was broken in the daye, was by them within the towne made by againe in the the night stronger then afoze. But the batterie was not begonne there by the French, for that they entended to enter in that place, but rather to abuse the English to haue the lesse regarde to the defence of the Castell, which was the weakest part of the towne, and the place where they were asserteined by their espyalles to win an easie entyre. So that whyle our people traunpled fondely to defende that counterseyt breach of the towne wall : the Duke had in the meane season planted. xv. double Cannons against the Castell, which Castell being considered by the rulers of the towne to be of no such force as any rampiers) it was deuised to make a trayne wyth certayne Barrels of powder to this purpose, that when the frenchmen should enter (as they well knewe that there they would) to haue fyrd the sayde trayne and blowne by the keepe, and for that purpose left neuer a man within to defend it. But the Frenchmen at their entyre espyed the trayne and so auoyded the same, so that deuise came to no purpose, and without any resistance they entred the Castell, and thought to haue entred the towne by that waye : But by the prowes and hardy courage of Syr Anthony Ager knight and Marshall of the towne with his souldiozs they were repulsd and driven backe agayne into the Castell, and so hard followed after, that our men forced them to close and shut the Castell gate for their suretie, least it should haue bene recovered against them as it was once attempted by Sir Anthony Ager, who there with his sonne and heyre, and a Pursuaunt at Armes called Calice with diuers other to the number of. xv. or. xvi. Englishmen lost their liues.

The same night after the recule of the Frenchmen, whose number so encreased in the Castell, that the towne was not able to resist their force. The Lorde Wentworth Deputy of Calice, sent a Pursuaunt called Guyne into the Duke of Guise requiring composition, which after long debate was agreed vpon in this sort. First that the towne with all the great artillery, victualles, and munition, should be freely yelden to the French king, the liues of the inhabitants onely saued, to whome safecoudyete should be graunted to passe where they lysted, sauing the Lorde Deputy with fiftie such other as the Duke should appoint to remaine prisoners, and be put to their raunsome.

The next morning, the Frenchmen entred and possessed the towne, and forthwith al the men, women, and children, were commaunded to leaue their houses, and to go into the two Churches of our Lady and Saint Nicholas vpon paine of death, where they remaind a great part of that daye, and one whole night, & the next day untill thre of the clock at after none, without eyther meat or drink. And while they were thus in the Churches, the Duke of Guyse in the name of the French king, in thre hearings made a proclamation, straightly charging and commanding ai & euery person that were inhabitants of the towne of Calice, hauing about them any money, plate, or Jewels, to the value of one grote to bring the same forthwith, and laye it downe vpon the highe Altars of the sayde Churches vpon paine of death, bearing them in hande also that they should be searched : By reason of which Proclamation there was made a great and sorrowfull offerrozy. And while they were at this offering within the Churches, the Frenchmen entred into their houses, and ryled the same, where was found inestimable riches and treasure: But specially of ordinaunce, armor and other munition. Aboute two of the clocke the next day at after noone, beyng the seuenth of January, all the Englishe men (except the Lorde Deputie, and the other reserved for prisoners) were suffered to passe out of the towne in safetie, beyng garded through the armie with a number of Scottishe light horsemen. There were in this towne of Calice five hundred Englishe Souldiours ordinary, and no mo. And of the townes men not fully two hundred fighting men, (a small garrison for the defence of such a towne) and there were in the whole number of men, women, and children, as they were counted (when they went out of the Gate) foure thousand and two hundred persons. But the Lorde Wentworth Deputie of Calice, Sir Hauke Chamberleyn Capitaine of the Castell, Harlestone Capitaine of Ricebanke, Nicholas Alexander Capitaine of Newnambridge, Edward Grymstone the Comptroller, with other of the chiefe of the towne to the number of fiftie (as aforesayd) such as it pleased the Duke of Guise to appoint, were sent prisoners into France.

Thus haue ye heard the discourse of the ouerthrowe and losse of the towne of Calice, the which enterprize was begonne and ended in lesse then viij. dayes, to the great maruaile of the worlde, that a towne of such strength and so well furnished of all thinges as that was, should so sodainly be taken and conquered: But most speciallye in the winter season, what tyme all the Country about beyng marhe ground is commonly ouerflouen with water, The sayde towne was wonne from the French, by king Edward the thirde, in the tyme of Philip de Valoys then French king. And beyng in the possession of the kings of Englande two hundred. xi. yeres, was in the tyme of Philip and Mary, King and Queene of England, lost within lesse then. viij. dayes, beyng the most notable forte that Englande had: For the winnyng wherof king Edward aforesayde in the. xxi. yere of his reigre was faine to continue a siege one whole yere and more, wherfore it was iudged of all men, that it could not haue come so to passe without some secreete trechery.

Here is also to be noted, that when Queene Mary and her Counsaile heard credibly of the French mens sodaine approche to that towne, she with all speede possible (but somewhat to late) raysed a great power for the rescue thereof, which if winde and weather had serued, might happily haue brought succour thither in tyme. But such terrible tempestes then arose and continued the space of foure or five dayes together, that the like had not bene seene before in remembrance of man, wherfore some sayde that the same was done by necromancy, and that the Demill was raysed by, and become French (the truth wherof is knowne to God) but very true it is that no ship could brooke the Seas by reason of those extreme stormes and tempestes. And such of the Queenes shippes as did aduerture the passage, were so shaken and torne with violence of weather, as they were forced to returne with great daunger, and with the losse of all their tackle and furniture. Thus by negligence of the Counsaile at home, conspiracie of traytors else where, force and false practise of eneymes, holpen by the rage of most terrible tempestes, of contrary wynds and weather, this famous Forte of Calice was brought againe to the handes and possession of the French.

So saene as this Duke of Guise, contrary to all expectation, had in so few dayes gayned this strong towne of Calice (afoze thought impregnable) and

and had put the same in such order as best seemed for his aduantage: proboode of the spoyle, and pressing forward upon his sodain fortune, without geuing long tyme to the residue of the Capitaynes of the fortes there, to breath upon their businesse, the. xiiij. day of the sayde Moneth, with all prouision requisite for a siege, marched with his army from Calice vnto the towne and fort of Gynnes, five myles distaunt from thence. Of which towne and Castell, at the same tyme, there was Capitaine a valiaunt Baron of England called William Lorde Gray of Wilton, who not without cause suspectyng a siege at hande, and knowyng the towne of Gynnes to be of small force, as beyng without walles or Bulwarke, compassed onely with a trench before the French mennes arriual had caused all the inhabitauntes of the towne to aduoyde, and so many of them as were apt to beare armes, he caused to retire into the Castell, which was a place well fortified with strong and massy Bulwarke of Bricke, haung also a high and mightie tower of great force and strength, called the keepe. The towne being thus abandoned, the french men had the more easie approche to the Castell who thinkyng to fynde quiet lodgyng in those vacant houses entered the same without any feare. And beyng that night at their rest (as they thought) a chosen band of Souldiours appoynted by the Lorde Gray, issued out by a posterne of the sayde Castell, and slue no small number of their sleepe ghestes, and the rest they put out of their newe lodgynges, and mauger the Duke and all the French power, consumed all the houses of the towne with fyre. That notwithstanding the sayde Duke with all diligence began his trenches, and albeit the shot of the great Artillarie from the Castell was terrible, and gaue him great impechment: yet did he continue his worke without intermission, and for examples sake wrought in his awne person as a common Pioner or labourer. So that within lesse then thre dayes, he brought to the number of. xxxv. battery peeces, hard to the brim of the Castell ditch to batter the same on all sydes, as well forthright as a crosse. But his principall battery he planted agaynst the strongest Bulwarke of all called Mary Bulwarke, thinkyng by gainyng of the stronger, to come more easily by the weaker.

His battery being thus begonne, he continued the same by space of two dayes with such terrible thundering of great artillarie, that by report of Rabutyne a French wyter, there were in those few dayes discharged well nere to the number of eyght or nine thousand Canon shot. Through the violence wherof, by the twentieth daye of the sayde Moneth, the sayde great Bulwarke was layde wyde open, and the breache made reasonable and easie ynough for the assault. Neuerthelesse, the sayde Duke beyng a man of warre, and nothing ignoraunt what deuises be commonly vsed in Fortes and townes besieged, to entrap and dammage the assaylants, afoze he would put the persons of his good souldiours to the hazard of the assault, caused the breache to be betwed once or twice by certayne forward and skillfull souldiours, who mountyng the top of the breache brought report that the place was faultable. Neuerthelesse, to make the clyme more easie, he caused certayne Arquebussiers to passe over the ditch, and to keepe the defendauntes occupied with shot, while certayne proners with mattoches and shorvelles made the breache more playne and easie, which thing done accordingly, he gaue order to Hounsiere Dandalot coronall of the French footemen, that he with his bandes should be in readynesse to geue the assault when signe should be geuen. In which meane time the Duke withdrew himselfe to an higher grounde, from whence he might playnely discouer the behauiour as well of his souldiours in the assault. geuing, as also of the defendantes in answering the same. And perceyuing not so many of the Englishe part appearing for defence (as he looked for) gaue order forthwith that a regiment of his most forward Launceknights shoulde mount the breach to open the first passage, and that Mounfire Dandalot with his bandes of the French should back them, which order was folowed with such whot haste and desperate hardinesse, that entring a deepe ditch full of water, from the botome whereof to the top of the breach was well foztie foote, without feare eyther of the water beneath, or the fyze aboue, they mounted the breach. And where as y Duke had prepared dyuers bridges made of planke bozds bozne bp with Casque and emptie pypes tyed one to another for his men to passe the sayde ditch, many of the sayde assaillantes without care of those bridges plunged into the water, and tooke the next waye to come to the assault. Which hotte haste notwithstanding, the sayde assaillantes were in this first assault so stoutly repulsed and put backe by the defendants beyng furnished with great stoze of wyld fyze and other fyrasyes for the purpose, that they were turned downe hedlong one vpon an other, much faster then they came bp, not without great waste and slaughter of their best and most braue souldiours, to the small comfort of the stout Duke, who (as is sayde before) stood all this while vpon a little hyll, to behold thys busynesse: wherefore not enduryng this sight any longer, as a man arraged ranne amongst his men, so reprovynge some, and encouragynge other, that the assault was foote hot renued, with muche more behemence and furie then befoze, and wpyth no lesse obstinacie and desperation receyued by the defendants, where by all the breach vnderneath was fylled with french carcasses. Thys notwithstanding, the Duke still redoubled his forces with freshe companies, and contynued so many assailltes one vpon an other, that at the last charge beyng most behement of all the other, our men beyng tyred and greatly diminished in their number by slaughter & bloody woundes, were of fyne force driuen to auoyde, and gaue place of entry to the enemye, which was not done without a maruaylous expence of bloud on both sydes: for of the frenche part there were slayne and perished in these assailltes aboue the number of eyght or nine hundred, and of the Englishe but little fewer, amongst whom the greatest losse lighted vpon the Spaniardes who tooke vpon them the defence of the sayde Mary Bulwarke, inasmuch (as the report went) that of fyne hundred braue souldiours which king Phillip sent thether for succours vnder the conduite of a valiant Capitayne Spaniard, called Moundragon: there were not knotne to haue comen away any number wozth the reckning, but eyther slayne, maimed or taken. These outrageous assaillts were geuen to the Castell of Guynes on the daye of saint Sebastian the. xx. of January aforesayde. Afoze the ende of which day, there were also gayned from the Englishe two other principall Bulwarkes of the sayde Castell, which beyng likewise made assailltable by batterry were taken by the Almaynes and entred into by the breaches.

The Lord Graye with his eldest sonne and the chiefe Cappytaynes and souldiours souldiours of the sayde Garrison, who kept the inner warde of the Castell (where the most high and principal Tower called the keepe stood) thinking themselves in small suretie there, beyng a place of the olde sort of fortification, after they sawe the vtter warde possessed by the enemye, and suche a number of the most forward souldiours consumed and spent, and no lykelyhood of any moze ayde to come in time, by the aduise of the most expert souldiours there, concluded for the best to treat with the Duke for composition, according to the which aduise he sent forth two gentlemen with this message in effect. That the Duke beyng a man of warre, and seruing vnder a king, should not thinke it straunge if the Lord Gray beyng lyke wise a man of warre and seruing his prince in lyke maner, did his deuour in well defending the place committed to his charge, so far forth as to answer and bide the assault: Considering that otherwise he could neuer saue his owne honor, neyther his truth and loyaltie to his prince: In respect whereof according to the lawe of armes, he required honorable composition, which message though it was well accepted of the Duke: yet he deferred his answer vntill the morow, what time the messengers repaying to him agayne, composition was graunted in this sort.

First, that the Castell with all the furniture thereof, as well victuals, as great artillery, powder and all other munitions of warre, shoulde be wholly rendered without wasting, hiding or minishment thereof.

Secondarily, that the Lord Gray with all the Capitaines, Officers, and other hauing charge there, shoulde remayn prisoners at the Dukes pleasure to be ransomed after the maner of warre.

Thirdely, that all the rest as well souldiours as other should safely depart with their armour and baggage to what partes it seemed them best: Neuertheless to passe without sounde of Drume or Trumpet or displaying of any Ensignes, but to leaue them behinde.

These condicions beyng receyued and approued on eyther partie, the day following, that is to wpyt, the two and twentieth day of the sayde Moneth of January, all the souldiours of the sayd fortresse, as well English as Strangers with all the rest of the inhabitants and other, except the Lord Graye Sir Arthure his sonne, Sir Henry Palmer knight, Moundragon aboue named Capitayne of the Spaniardes and other men of charge reserued by the composition, departed with their bag and baggages, from thence towards Flaunders. At whose issuing forth, there was esteemed to the number of eyght or nine hundred hable men for the warre, part English, part Burgonyons, with a small remnaunt of Spaniardes.

After the winning of this towne and Castell, the Duke aduising well vpon the place, and considering that if it shoulde happen to be regayned by English men, what a noysome neighbour the sae might be to Calice now beyng french, and specially what empeachment shoulde come thereby for the passage thether from fraunce, considering also the nere standing thereof to the french kinges fortresse of Arde, so that to keepe two garrisons so nigh together, shoulde be but a double charge, and not onely needlesse, but also daungerous for the cause afoze reherfed. Vpon these considerations (as the frenchmen write) he tooke order for all the great artillery victuals and other munition to be taken forth, and the Castell with all the Bulwarkes and other fortifications there, with all speede to be rased and thzobone downe, and the stufte to be caried away and employed in other moze necessary places.

Then rested nothing within all the English Pale on that side vnconquerred but the litle Castell oꝝ Pile called Hamme, which though it were but of small foꝛce, made by art & industry of mannes hand, & beyng altogether of olde workmanship without Rampiers oꝝ Bulwarke: yet neuerthelesse by the naturall scituation thereof, beyng on all sides enuironed with fennes and Harthe groundes, it coulde not easely be appoched vnto, eyther with great ordinaunce foꝛ the battery, oꝛ else with any armye to encampe there foꝛ a siege, hauing but one strayght passage thereto by a narrow causey traucted and cut thorough in diuers places, with deepe ditches alwayes full of water, which thing beyng well foꝛseene by Edward Loꝛde Dudley then Capitayne there, hauing as good cause to suspect a siege there as his neyghboꝛes had, afoꝛe the Frenchmennes comming to Guynes: caused all the Bridges of the sayde Causey beyng of woode to be broken, to geue therby the moze impechement to the French, if they shoulde attempt to appoche the same, as shortly after they dyd, and kept dryers of the passages: But to deliuer the Duke and his souldioꝛs from that care, there came to him glad newes from those that had charge to watche the sayde Causey, how the Capitaine hauing intelligence of the rendering of Guynes, secretly the same night, had conueyed himselfe, with his small garrison by a secret passage ouer the Harrys into Flaunders: wherby the Duke beyng now past care of any further siege to be layde, in all that frontier tooke order soꝛthwith to seale the sayd litle foꝛte into his handes, as it was easy to do, when there was no resistance.

When this peece was once seized by the French, then remayned there none other place of defence oꝛ strength of English on all that side the Sea foꝛ the safegard of the rest of the countrey, wherby the French king became wholly and thoroughly Loꝛde and Maister of all the English Pale, foꝛ now (as ye haue heard) there was neyther towne, Castell, noꝛ other foꝛtesse more oꝛ lesse on that side (sauing Bootes Bullwarke nere to Grauelyng which now king Philipe keepeth as his) but that it was eyther taken away by foꝛce, oꝛ else abandoned & left open to the enemy. And (as the Frenchmen write) beside the great riches of Golde and Siluer Coyne, Jewels, Plate, Woolles, and other Marchandise (which was inestimable) there were found thꝛee hundred peeces of Brasse mounted on wheeles, and as many peeces of Iron, with such furniture of powder, pelletes, Armour, bittuals and other munitions of warre, scarcely credible.

Thus haue you heard the whole discourse of the conquest of the noble towne of Calice, with all the English foꝛtresses and Countrey adioynnyng made by the Duke of Guyse, the newes wherof when they came to the French king, no neede to aske how ioyfully they were receyued, not onely of him and all his Court, but also vniuersally through the whole Realme of Fraunce. Foꝛ the which victoꝛy there was (as the maner is) Te deum song, and benefices made euery where, as it is wont to be in cases of common ioy and gladnesse foꝛ some rare benefite of God, insomuch that shortly vpon thys conquest there was a publike assembly at Paris of all the states of Fraunce, who frankly in recompence of the kinges charges employed in winnyng of Calice

Calice and the places afoꝛesayde, and foꝛ maintenaunce of his warres to be continued afterwarde, graunted vnto him thꝛee Millions of French crownes, wherof the Clergie of Fraunce contributed one Million besyde theyꝛ diuines. And no maruaile though the French did highly reioyce at the recovery of Calice out of the Englishmens handes: foꝛ it is constantly affirmed of many, that be acquainted with the affayres of Fraunce, that euer sithen the same towne was first wonne by Englishmen, in all solempne Counsailles assembled to treat vpon the state of Fraunce, there was a speciall person appoynted to put them in remembraunce from tyme to tyme of Calice, as it were to be wished, that the like were vsed in Englande vntill it were regayned from the French.

Now semed euery day a yere to the French king vntill he personally had visited Calice, and his new conquered countrey: Wherfoꝛe about the ende of January afoꝛesayde, he tooke his boꝛage thither accompanied with no small number of his Nobilitie. And immediatly vpon his arrivall there he perused the whole towne and euery parte thereof from place to place, deuising with the Duke of Guyse foꝛ the better fortification thereof, what should be added to the olde, and what should be made newe, and what should be taken a way. And after order taken foꝛ that businesse, he placed there a noble and no lesse valiaunt knight called Mounsier de Thermes to be Capitayne of the towne, and so departed agayne into Fraunce.

Calice.

After the French kinges departure from Calice, he made great hast foꝛ the accomplishment of the mariage, mooued betwene Fraunces his eldest sonne called the Dolphin, and Mary Stewart daughter and sole heire of James the fift, late king of Scotlande, which Princes if Scottes had bene faythfull of promise (as they seldome be) should haue married with king Edward the sixt: foꝛ the breche of which promise began all the warre betwene England and Scotland, as you heard in the latter ende of the life of king Henry the eyght, and in the beginning of king Edward the sixt. This mariage (though it be not of my matter) I thought not to omit, foꝛ that many thinges were ment thereby, which thanks be to God neuer came to effect. But one speciall poynt was not hidden to the worlde, that by meane of the same, the realme of Scotlande shoulde foꝛ euermoze haue remayned as vnitid and encoꝛporeate to the Crowne of Fraunce, and that as the sonne and heire of euery French king doth succede to the inheritaunce and possession of a countrey called the Doulphyn, and is therefore called Doulphyn. And like as the principalltie of Wales appertayneth to the eldest sonne of England, who therefore is called the Prince of Wales. Euen so the Doulphyn & heire of Fraunce shoulde thereby haue bene king of Scotland foꝛ euermoze, which name and title vpon this mariage was accordingly geuen to Fraunces Doulphyn and heire apparaunt of Fraunce to be called king Doulphyn. The meaning wherof was vtterly to exclude foꝛ euermoze any to be king of Scotlande, but onely the eldest sonne of Fraunce. This memorabile mariage was solempnized in the Citie of Paris, the .xxiii. day of Aprill in the yere of Christ. 1558. with most magnifique pompe and triumph, and honored with the presense of the most part of the Princes, Prelates, Loꝛdes, and Barons of both the realmes, as it were foꝛ a confirmation of this new alliance, which as it was much to the aduantage and benefite of Fraunce, so nothing coulde be more prejudice and derogation of the crowne to Scotland, as a deuse tending to the perpetuall abolition and extinguyshment of the name and estate of kinges in that realme.

But now to retorne to the matters of England, from which I haue in part digressed. The newes of this conquest of Calice, were not so ioyfully receaued in Fraunce, as they were generally greuous and displeasent to the whole realme of Englande: But specially to Queene Mary, who beyng a Princes of heart and courage more then commonly is in womankind, thought her selfe so much touched in honoz by the losse of her sayd towne and possessions on that side the sea, as shee counted her life y<sup>r</sup>some, vntill the same were eyther recouered agayne, or the losse redoubled with some like victo<sup>r</sup>y agaynst the French elsewhere. In respect whereof, shee creased not to trauallye aswell with king Philip her housband, as with her obone priute counsayle and the Lordes of the realme, what waye should be best to reuenge this iniurye, and specially now whilst the French king was occupied in warre with king Philip, to endamage some of his countreyes by way of inuasion and to surprize some of his townes vpon the sodayne. And among sundry deuises, none was thought so fyt to be attempted, as an Hauen towne in Bytaine called Brest, which in the time of king Richarde the second and long befoze was kept and maintayned with an English garrison vntill the said king rendered the same to the French king agayne by composition. This towne aswell for the conuenient situation, alwayes ready to receaue fresh succours and victualing out of England by Sea, as also for that it was knowne to the Queene and her counsayle at that present not to be furnished with any Garrison of Souldiers sufficient to repulse the power of a Prince vpon the sodaine, was thought the best marke to be shot at for the time. Wherefoze vpon this case well debated, there was immediat order geuen to Edward Lorde Clynton then high Admirall of England, with all expedition to prepare himselfe with all the Queenes shippes of warre, furnished with souldioz<sup>s</sup>, munition and victuall, to ioyne with the Admirall of king Philip, who had like order from the sayd king to ioyne with the Hauie of England, for the atchieuing of this enterprize. But befoze I declare to you the aduenture of these two great Hauies by sea: it shall not be impertinent to touch some accidentes in the meane time by land.

Whiles king Philip beyng absent from the low countrey, was (as you haue heard) occupied with his warres in Fraunce, Mounsier de Thermes the new Capitayne of Calice, beyng a man very expert in the warres (whose propertie is neuer to neglect any time of aduantage) cast in his minde hobo during king Philipps absence, to do some singuler seruire to the French king. And espiyng well the beastiality of the Fleminges his Neighbours, how little they vnderstood the great weakning of their countrey by the losse of Calice, and that there was no new prouision made for the defence thereof more then was befoze, whilst Calice was English, by the losse whereof, their frontiers was now become open for the French at all times to enter: He therefore taking out of Calice so many of his souldioz<sup>s</sup> as might be spared from thence, adioyning to them all the forces of the French Garrisons in Artoys, Bullenoyse, and Picardy, whereof (besides the Souldioz<sup>s</sup> of Calice being to the number of seuen hundred footemen, and three hundred light hozsmen Scottish) there were assembled fourteene Ensignes of the French, and high Dutch, wyth .xiiij. or .xiiiij. hundred Swart Ritters and men at Armes of Fraunce, amounting in the whole to the number at the least of .xiiij. or .xiiiij. thousand fighting men, entred into Flaunders with full determination to spoyle and waste all king Philips countrey along the Sea coast, and namely a proper Hauen towne called Dunkirck, and with like purpose to haue surprized the towne of Graueling if occasion woulde so serue.

This Capitayne following his enterprize, of a polley passing by the towne of Graueling, layde siege to a litle towne not far from thence called Berghes, which he wanne in a small time and with small resistance, leauing the saccage of the same vnto his Souldioz<sup>s</sup>, where they founde many good booties. And without long staiyng they marched forth to Dunkirck afoze: sayde, and planting a siege in lyke maner there, battered the same so sharpe-ly with the Cannon, that within lesse then foure dayes he became Maister of the towne, which he in like maner put to the sack, where was found more plentie of spoyle and good booties, then in any place befoze, so far forth as the meanest slaues and Lackeies came away riche. And after, setting the towne a fyre (whereby all the country about were merczously put in feare) in his retorne homewardeg he tooke the streight way to Graueling. And staiyng his Army there certayne dayes by reason of sodaine sicknesse coming vpon him, there were dayly skirmishes betweene the French and the Garrison men of Graueling.

During this pastime, the Countie Ayguemount (whome we call Egmond) Lieutenant Generall for king Philip in the low countrey, with all hast possible assembled all the power aswell of king Philipes Garrisons as also of men of warre in the low countrey to the number of .xiiij. or .xv. thousand footemen, and two or thre thousand hozsmen, whereof there were fiftene hundred Swart Ritters, determining so to affront the French, that eyther they should passe no farther into the countrey, or at the least waye to impeach them from the siege of Graueling, whereof there was great appa<sup>r</sup>ance.

Mounsie de Thermes heering of this power assembled (though skarcelly well recouered) made all possible hast toward Graueling, where he was no soner arriued, but that he saw his enemies ready raunged in the field. By reason whereof, leauing of the pursuyng of his entended siege: his studie was now nothing else but how he might bring home his company in safe- garde to Calice.

The Countie of Egmond, espiyng the Frenchmen bent to march a way with the spoyle of the countrey, cut betweene them and home, placing his battailes in such order, that the Frenchmen had no way to passe, but vpon the Sandes betweene the towne & the sea: where as by good chaunce lay a great flete of Queene Maryes shippes of warre, within the daunger of whose Gunshot, the Frenchmen had no shift but to passe as their iourney lay. And to beyng forced eyther to famishe or to fight at disaduantage, Mounsier Thermes without staiyng any longer, caused his Wantgard to passe ouer the Ryuer somewhat nere the towne to auoyde the shotte of the English shippes. And staiyng vpon the further side for the residue of his battayles there there came such thicke Hayle shot of Artillery out of the towne of the one side and from the English Shippes on the other side, that there was a full battery made vpon the Frenchmen on all sides, which they neuertheless boade without breaking order for the time, when sodainely appered before them two great tropes of horsemen of .xv. hundred a peece, part Swart Rufflers and part Burgonions, whereof the one in front, and the other in flanke, gaue strong charges, vpon the French Vauntgard, who beyng well backed with their other battayles (whereof the most part had then passed the Riuer) stoutly repulsd these two first tropes, though not without losse of many their best souldiours. So thus both partes beyng at a stave, and seuered somewhat a sunder: The Countie Egmond himselfe with .xliij. hundred men of Armes, and his foote battayles following, afoze the French had wel recovered breath, recharged vpon them with all his forces together so terribly that he thokt all their battayle, and the number fell to a mayne flight without further tryall. So by that time that the footmen on eyther side came to the push of y<sup>e</sup> Pique, the victozy was sone had, by reason (as y<sup>e</sup> French men reporte) that the Almaynes beaten backe with artillery aswell of the towne as of the shippes afozesayde, brake their order and came not to the Shock, whereby the whole charge of the battayle rested vpon the French bandes onely. This fielde was foughten the .xiiij. day of July .1558. vpon the Sea Sandes, nere to Grauelyng, wherein besides those that were slayne, beyng esteemed to the number of siue thousand fighting men: There were taken prisoners Mounsie de Thermes Capitaine of Calice, Mounsie Senarport Capitayne of Bulleyne, Mounsie Willebone Gouvernoz of Picardy, Mounsie Annebault, Mounsie Mozullers, and Mounsie Chanly, beside a multitude of Gentlemen, and valiaunt Capitaynes, and souldiours, but specially the bandes of Calice went to worcke, so as very fewe returned home to bring tidinges: which gaue such a terroz to the souldiours remaining in Calice: that it is verily beleued that if the Admirals of Englande and Flaunders had bene present there woth their Flaues, as the sayd other fewe shippes of England were, and vpon this todayne had attempted Calice with the ayde of the Countie Egmond hauing his power present: the towne of Calice might haue bene recovered again with as litle difficultie & haply in as thorte a time as it was before gained by y<sup>e</sup> Duke of Exyfle. But the sayde Admirall as it appered, knew nothing thereof, wherefoze following their prescribed course, and ioyning together at the place appoynted, sayled from thence with prosperous winde and wether, and by the .xxix. day of the same moneth and in the sayd yere with seven skoze Shippes of warre appered by breake of the day betoze the haven of Conquest commonly called Conquet in Britayne, standing vpon the mouth of the Riuer that commeth from Brest: At whose arrivall there (as the maner is) they sounded their Trumpetes, and with a thunderyng peale of great ordinaunce gaue aloude Salue to the Britaines. And by eyght of the clocke the same morning, maugre all the power of the country being assembled there in Armes, with many peeces of great Artillery to defend the enterp of their porte: The English men mannyng foorth their Shipboates, with many valiaunt Capitaynes and souldiours, recovered landing and within thort time became Maisters of the said town of Conquet, which they put to y<sup>e</sup> saccage with a great Abbey and and many pretie townes and Villages nere there aboutes, where our men founde great stoze of pillage and good booties. But the Flemynges beyng couetous of the spoyle, passing further into the lande, before they could recover their shippes agayne, were encountred by the power of the Countie, by whom there were slayne of them to the number of foure or siue hundred. The Admirals perceauing the power of the Countie greatly to increase, and hauing intelligence that the Duke of Estamps the french kings Lieutenant in Briteyne, was very neere comming en with a great number of horsemen and footemen, esteemed to be about twentie thousande (as the Frenchmen themselves affirme) thought not best to attempt any assault against the towne of Brest, or to make longer aboade there. Wherefoze after they had set fyre on the towne of Conquet and all the Villages thereabouts, they embarked themselves, and tooke the sea agayne with their booties all in safete (except the Flemynges) thinking to doe some further exploit elsewhere vpon the coast. But by thys time there were such numbers of people raysed in all those partes for defence of the same coastes, that the Admirals afterwarde attempting in dyuers places to lande their men, and finding eche where more appaunce of losse then of gayne, returned home without atcheeuing their pretended enterpryse.

slaughter of Flemynges

In this meane while king Phillip and the French king with two most puissant armies affronted eche other nere vnto the water of Some, eyther of them being obstinately bent to driue the other out of the fielde, for which cause they entrenched their Campes. During which time, there was nothing done betweene them worthe memoire, more then daylie skirmishes of no great accompt. Neuertheless the Countie of Fraunce could not but susteyne extreme damage in so long susteyning suche a maine multitude, specially of men of warre which those two mightie kinges had assembled. And day by day came freshe companies to eyther party, so as it was thought a thing impossible that suche two princes beyng so neere could depart without some cruell bloody battayle to determine their quarelles: But God in whose handes are the hearts of kinges (when least hope was) conuerted their obstinate mindes from warre to peace, which came chiefly to passe by the mediation of the Duches of Loreyn, who had bene a long and earnest traouler to that ende, and neuer ceased untill by her intercession both the sayde kinges appointed speciall Commissioners to treat vpon peace. So that after dyuers conferences, they at last concluded vpon all controuersies except the matter of Calice, whereof Queene Mary by her Ambassadors required restitution: But the French partie would in no wise here thereof. By reason of which difficultie, this treatie could not come to any good conclusion. King Phillip thinking himselfe bound in honor to stand in that case with the Queene his wyfe, who for his sake had entred into a needlesse warre against Fraunce, and thereby lost her sayde towne with all the Countie adioyning as you haue heard before, did therefore stave a long time, before he concluded peace with the French king.

1558

Queene Marie seing no lykelyhood nor hauing any hope of the restitution of Calice, and considering also that most of her affayres had but hard successe, conceaued an inwarde sorrowe of minde, by reason whereof about September next shee fell sick of a hote burning feuer, which sicknesse was common that yere throught all the realme and consumed a maruailous number, as well noble men, as Byshops, Judges, Knightes, Gentlemen and riche farmours : But most of the Clergy and other auncient and graue persons. In which, whyle the Queene laye languysing of a long sicknesse, and so continued untill the. xvij. of Nouember next betweene the houres of fiue or sixe in the moorning, and then ended her life in this woorld at her house of saint James beside Westminster, when she had reigned fiue yeres, foure Monethes and a. xj. dayes, and in the. xliij. yere of her bodily age. And the same day about sixe of the clock in the euening dyed Cardynall Poole, Legate of the Bishop of Rome, late afoze made Archebischop of Cauntzbury, at his house ouer agaynst Westminster called Lambeth. This Cardynall was dissended of the house of Clarence, that is to saye, one of the yonger sonnes of Margaret Countesse of Salzburie, daughter of George Duke of Clarence, brother to king Edward the fourth. The death of this sayde Queene made a maruellous alteration in this realme, namely in the case of religion, which like as by the death of king Edward the sixt it suffred a chaunge from the establishment of his time : So by the death of this Queene it returned into the former estate.

The description of Cardynall Poole.

When true knowlege was had that Queene Mary was deceased, who left her lyfe in this woorld the. xvij. day of Nouember as is befoze mentioned in the latter ende of her historie in the tyme of a Parliament, the Lordes that were assembled in the vpper house, beyng resolved according to the lawes of the land to declare the Lady Elizabeth, sister to the sayde Queene Mary, to be very true and lawfull heire to the crowne of England, sent immediatly to the Speaker of the sayde Parliament, willing him with the Knightes and Burgeses of the nether house without delaye to repayre vnto them into the vpper house, for their assents in a case of great importaunce. Who beyng come thether, after silence made (as the maner is) the Archebischop of Yorke Chauncelour of Englande whose name was Nicholas Hethe Doctoz in diuinitie, stode by and pronounced in effect these wordes folowynge. The cause of your calling hether at this tyme is to signifie vnto you, that all the Lordes here present are certainly certefied that God this present Moorning hath called to his mercy our late soueraigne Lady Queene Mary, which happenes as it is most heauy and grienous vnto vs, so haue we no lesse cause an other way to reioyce with praise to almighty God, for that he hath left vnto vs a true, lawfull and right Inheritrice to the crowne of this Realme, which is the Lady Elizabeth second Daughter to our late souereigne Lord of noble memorie King Henry the eyght, and sister vnto our sayde late Queene, of whose most lawfull, right and title in the succession to the crowne (thanks be to God) we neede not to doubt. Wherefore, the Lordes of this house haue determined with your assentes and consentes to passe from hence into the Palace, and there to proclayme the sayde Ladye Elizabeth Queene of this Realme, without farther tract of tyme. Wherevnto the whole house answered with euident apparaunce of ioy, cryng, God saue Queene Elizabeth, long may Queene Elizabeth raigne ouer vs. And so this parliament being dissolved by the act of God, the sayde Lordes immediatly calling vnto them the Kings and principall Heraults at Armes, went into the Palace of Westminster, and directly befoze the hall dooze in the fore noone of the same day, after seuerall sounding of Trumpets made in most solempne manner, proclaymed the new Queene, by thys name and title. Elizabeth by the grace of God Queene of England, Fraunce and Ireland, defender of the faith. &c. to the great comfort and reioysing of the people, as by theyr manors and countenances well appered. After which proclamation made at Westminster, the sayd Lords with all speede repayred into the Citie of London, where like Proclamation was made in their presence at the Crosse in Chepe, with no lesse vniuersall ioy, and thanks geuing to God of the hearers.

In this place I intende to conclude and ende thys my rude and vnlearned woork, not woorthye the name of a Chronicle, praiyng the gentle Reader to pardo me in that I do not passe forth with the declaration of the Historie of thys most gracious and vertuous Prince, in such maner as I haue done with other before, for diuers causes do moue me to stay here, not only for that my woork alreedy is come to a full volume, but also for that her graces proceedings in her gouernement bene such and so great as require a larger discourse of matter. As first to consider how her Maiestie finding this realme in hostilitie with Fraunce, with how great felicitie and no lesse prouidence of counsaile shee brought both realmes to peace. And the towne of Calice before lost (as you haue heard) in the time of hir sister, by an honorable peace concluded with the French king, shee brought to passe eyther to haue the same againe restored within a certayne time prefixed, or else the sayde French king to forseyt and paye vnto her certayne great sommes of money, reseruing neuerthelesse the right and title of the sayde towne and countrie to the realme of Englande. And perceyuing that by the losse of the sayde towne and by other occasions this realme was much disfirnished of Armour and munition: Shee of her high pollecy and with no small charges prouided a new furniture & store thereof in a much more large propozcion. And in like maner espyng in time the subtile compasse of the French king in landing of men of warre in Scotland, whereof might haue ensued perill of inuasion into England that way, did nobly & prudently prevent the same to the vtter frustration of all his fine and secrete deuises: besides the wayling and disappointing the house of Guyse, of their attemptes in Fraunce, tending to the vtter destruction of all such in that realme as would not professe the Popes religion, wherein if the late Duke had preuailed, it was not unlike, but that he encouraged thereby, would haue made some further enterprisc to the small quiet of this realme. Adde herevnto the benefite inestimable which this realme hath receiued by the conuerting of the base and copper monies into fine Silver and Golde: but specially the most mercifull gouernement and rule sithens her coming to the state of Queene, wherein the euill doer hath not his free scope, nor the honest person kept from iustice: neyther yet any rigour or extremitie vsed in cases, though some of them haue nerely touched the suretie of her highnesse person.

These things I say with many other beyng of so great importaunce require to be handled in a higher maner of stile then is for me to write. And better is litle or nothing to be sayde by me in these and many other most honourable and Princely affayres, then for lacke of learning and eloquence in expressing, to darken or rather deface the excellencye of the same. And farther also, I am certified that there are sundrie men of excellent knowlege and learnyng, that purpose the setting forth of her highnesse Historie, so that dutie bindeth mee hauing respect vnto the honor of her Maiestie and this noble Realme of Englande here to stay, referrynge the desirous Reader that would vnderstande such particuler thinges as haue passed in the time of her Graces reigne, vnto suche brieue notes as are set forth in the small Abridgements of Chronicles of our tyme.

A Table declaring the reignes

of euerie king of this Realme, sithen the conquest, and the yeares of our Lorde, and Monethes and dayes of their beginning, and also the names and surnames of all the Maiors, and Shirifes of London, with the yere and daye of their entrance into their charge. And for the better vnderstanding of this Table, the same is deuided into. iiii. partes or titles. The first is the yeres of our Lorde, then the Monethes and dayes wherein enery King began his reigne, then the yeres of the Kings reigne, and lastly, the names of the Bayliffes, Shirifes and Maiors, placed iustly vppon the verie day of the Moneth, wherein euerie of them entred into their office. And for example, I would know in what yere of our Lorde King Henrie the. viij. began his reigne, and in what Moneth and daye, and who were then Shirifes and Maiors of London. First I seeke out among the Kinges, and at the last, I finde King Henrie the. viij. and in the first title I finde the yere of our Lorde that he began his reigne in, which was. 1509. and the. xxij. day of the Moneth of Apriill. And immediately followeth the Moneth of September, and the. xxvij. days, wherein George Pennoar and John Ducket entred into their office of Shirifualtie, and likewise followeth in the same yere the Moneth of October the. xxvij. day, wherein Thomas Wadburie entred into his office of the Bayliffie of London. And thus may ye in like maner find a true accompt of the yeres of any King, Shirife, or Maior of London.
