DOVBTLES, YOVR Honor and other maye mar-uayle, or paradventure mis-lyke, that after so many books alreadie set forth, bearing the names and tytles of Chronicles of Englande, I should accomber the Readers superfluouslye wyth one mo of the same matter: Neuerthelesse, the contentes of thys and the sayde other former bookes being compared, your wisedome can well discerne, and other shall easely perceyue, that this labor of mine was neyther altogether needelesse nor unprofitable.
For among so many writers, there hath yet none to my knowledge, published any full, playne and meere Englishe historie.
For some of them of purpose meaning to write short notes in maner of Annales, commonly called Abridgements, rather touch the tymes when things were done, then declare the maner of the doyngs, leauing thereby some necessitie of larger explication, and referring the desirous Reader to a further serch and study. Other haue dealt but with the reignes of a few kings, & yet therof haue made long bookes, with many tedious digressions, obscure descriptions & friuolous dilatations: which forme

of writing if it should not be reformed, could not in the whole be folowed without peſtering the Reader with importable Volumes. Other haue intermyngled the affaires of other forreyne Nations with the matters of Englande, yea, euen where the one had no concurrencie or dependaunce of the other. Others, namely ſtraungers, as well in their bookes written purpoſely of England, as in diſcourſes enterlaced in their histories of their awne Countries, and ſpecially concerning the actes of later times, both in matters of Religion and ciuill pollicie, partly following common reportes, and partly vsyng enuious conſtructions haue eyther by ignoraunce or malyce ſlaunderouſly written and erred from the manifeſt truth: ſo farre as to me ſeemeth a better worke could not be taken in hande, then that ſome learned Engliſhe man of good intelligence would by ſome ſpeciall worke, written in ſuch a language as other Nations might for the more part beſt vnderſtand, detect, and with plaine declaration of the truth, confute ſuch errors & vntruths as are written and ſcattered in foreyn ſtorieſ concerning this realme: For ſome ſupply of all which defectes and errors conteyned in the ſaid former Chronicles of Englande, I haue to the beſt of my ſmall ſkill & with the vttermoſt of my diligence, gathered this booke, conteinyng a complete and whole hiſtory from the firſt entrie and habitation of the Britons in this Iſlande, vnto the firſt yere of the reigne of our ſoueraigne Lady Queene Elizabeth, preſently reigning. Large ynough (I truſt) without tediousneſſe, ſhort ynough without darkneſſe, meereſly and onely of Englande, not mingling the ſame with foreyne matters impertynent to oure ſtate, and finally true without miſreporting, ſo farre as the following of the beſt Authours & reporters & mine awne experience (hauing of long time ſeene and purpoſely noted much thereof) could conceaue. And now hauing ended this worke, and

ſeking to whom I might for teſtification of my ſpeciall good will preſent it, or for patronage and defence dedicate it, and principally for all iudgement and correction to ſubmit it: Among many I haue choſen your Maſterſhip, moued therto by experience of your curteous iudgement towards thoſe that trauaile to any honeſt purpoſe, rather helping & comforting their weakneſſe, then condempning their ſimple (but yet well meanyng) endeouours. By which your accuſtomed good acceptation of others, I am the rather boldened to beſeeche your Maſterſhip to receaue this my worke and me, in ſuch maner as you doe thoſe, in whome (howſoever there be want of power) there wanteth no poynt of good will and ſeruiſeable affection. Wherefore at this preſent, not meaning to trouble your Maſterſhip with any farther tedious matter, my prayer ſhall be to God for your long prosperous eſtate with encrease of Gods grace, and ſo thereby to direct your trauayles in the ſeruiſe of the Queenes moſt excellent Maieſtie, and the common weale of this Realme, as you may alwayes leaue to the poſteritie happy and plentifull matter of worthy report.

To the gentle Reader.

AS I HAVE (WITH MY no little trauayle) collected this History, which I name a Chronicle at large and mere History of the affaires of Englande, for that the same is not intermixed with foreine affayres: so most gentle & louyng Reader, I beseeche thee take these my said traueyles not only in good part, but also pardon the rudenesse of my stile & lack of learning which I acknowledge, or otherwise the same should haue beene better furnished. But for some instruction to the better vnderstanding of mine order obserued in the discourse of this History: I thought best to admonish thee, that forasmuch as this Island of Briteyn (whereof the greater part is now called England) had the same time of creatiō that al the rest of the earth had: therefore I begin this booke at the creation of the world, and so continue the same with the blessed line and issue of Adam by Seth his sonne, vnto our Sauour Christ. And by the waye, when Brute, as by the testimonie of most aucthors, first entred this Island and named it Briteyne: there beginneth mine History of this Realme, and from thence lyneally I proceede to the reignes of all such as succeeded Brute in state of kings, euen to the tyme of Wylliam the Conquerour, where I begin my second volume, because in the former parte (as maye at large appeere) thys Islande being first inhabited by Brute, was afterwarde conquered by the Romaines, and then subdued and possessed by the Saxons, & lastly by

by the Danes, and so was it neuer in perfect state of gouernement, vntill the last conquest of the Normanes, from whence the Histories of times doe more plentifully and plainly appeere. And in the discourse of this Historie, folowing the common opinion of the deuision of this Islande in three partes made by Brute to hys three sonnes, Locryne, Albanact and Camber, that is to say, of the part nowe called Englande vnto Locryne his eldest sonne, and of that part nowe called Scotlande vnto Albanact his second sonne, and of that part nowe called Wales to Camber hys thirde sonne, of whose name the same part is called to thys day in welshe Cambry. Forasmuch, I say, as before this deuision, this Island of Briteyn was but one entier Isle, therefore professing to write an History of the Princes of this part, now called Englande: I thought it not meete vtterly to omit Scotland, being a part of this Isle of Briteyn: And therefore in order as the Britones reigned, so I note also the succession of the kings of Scotlande, wherein I doe not professe to write of them any speciall Historie, farther then they had to doe with the kings of this Realme, or the kinges with them, but with a brieue recytall of their kings names & time of their reignes to passe them ouer.

I haue also to admonishe you concerning the numbers that stande in the margent of this booke, from the creation of the worlde to the birth of Christ, hauing a lyne stryken betweene them. Those numbers that are aboue the lyne, are the yeres of the worlde from the creation: And those vnder the line, are the yeres before Christ. But after the comming of Christ, then the vppermost numbers are the yeres of Christ, and the ne-

HARI MASON

thermost are the yeres of euery feuerall king, and so it continueth to the ende of the booke.

Here also I must aduertise you that in the computation of yeres, I follow the accompt of the Hebrues, the which I take to be most true, the which accompt, I haue at large set forth in the .72. page of my first Volume.

Also in the ende of this booke, ye shall finde an exact table, wherein is expressed not onelye the reigne of euery king of this realme, sithen the time that the City of London hath beene gouerned by Bailifes, Maiors and Shrifes, and the day and yere that they first entred into their feuerall reignes: but also the names of those that then were and euer sithence haue beene Maiors and Shiriefes of London, with the yeres, monethes and dayes of their entrie into their feuerall charge. Also I haue placed in this booke two feuerall Tables, the one in the ende of the first volume, and before the conquest, which I haue deuided into seuen parts according to the vij. Ages of the world, as may at large appere in the .72. page of the said Volume as aforesaid, & the other at the end of the second and last volume, that is, from the conquest to the reigne of our Soueraigne Ladye Queene Elizabeth, the which Tables serue for the readye finding of anye name or speciall matter conteyned in the sayde booke, by the letter and order of the Alphabet.

And where I haue in the .xiiij. yere of king Henry the first promised to place the maner & order that was first taken for the holding of the Parliament in the time of king Edward the thitde. I haue sithen that time for sundry good causes thought meete to omit the same, and therefore I admonishe the Reader not to looke for it.

And

To the Reader.

And here to conclude most gentle Reader, I beseeche thee louyngly and fauourablye to iudge and report of mee and my booke, to whose iudgement I most humbly submit the same, and such things as shall seeme to be a misse, or not so well penned and fully set foorth as by a learned and skilfull man the same might haue beene, either fauourably doe thy indeuour to amende the same, or else impute the fault to the diuersitie and variance of Aucthors, among which differences, it shall be harde to trie the truth, and thus I bid thee farewell.

Richard Grafton

ORASMUCH AS THE EXAMples of good and euill doings, in thys that the one sort doe allure to good, the other doe fraye from euill, doe tende both to one good ende in well disposed mindes, it hath euer beene thought a beneficiall woorke to the societie of men to set forth in histo-rie and true report, the doings and liues of men as they haue deserued. And though vertue of it selfe be of worthynesse ynough to be loued for it selfe, and in honest raindes free from vanitie, is to her selfe sufficient recompense, yet hath God for commodi-tie of mankinde planted in nature a prayse worthy affection to be well spoken of for doing well, and shame to beare infamy for doying euill. Thys hath made vertue comended to encrease: This hath restreyned those from sinne, whom conscience coulde not: This hath holden men in order for feare of the sight of men, whome the feare of God that seeth all withheld not: This hath rayced men out of drowtie idleneisse, whome the sounde of Gods promises and threatnings awaked not: This, whereby is quickened endeuour to lyue after death, is the very prooffe in nature, that mans minde confesseth and hopeth for immortality.

As true reporting therfore auayleth to the encrease of well doing, so good ac-ceptation is profitable to the furtheraunce of the true reporters labour, and is the verie recompense that euery honest trauayler in any good worke shall be sure to finde at the hands of euery one that feareth not to heere shame for his euill deedes.

And as it is reason that good be done to him that doth good to many, so where the author and gatherer of this woorke hath with his honest labors made the noble actes and good deseruings of many to liue in good memorie, so I thought it not reason, specially hauing among infinite other receaued commoditie by his labors, that his owne well doings should altogether dyc in forgetfulnesse. I must therefore good Reader, to the intent to prouoke thy fauourable receauing and con-struyng of thys worke, put thee in remembraunce how many wayes the great labors of this man susteyned with great charge and perilles, haue bene to vs profitable, that we be not to him vnthankfull. It hath suffised him to deserue well, it shall not suffice vs to receaue without receauing well, that is, to the encouragement of him and other to deserue well. That which he of modestie maye not vtter, we of honestie maye not hide. This therefore I am to affirme, because I knowe it, and the more assuredly to affirme because many moe knowe it, and most reasonably to allege because the whole Realme hath profite by it, that the man hath not spent one quarter of hys lyfe to his owne ease or commoditie, but as a good Citezen for the benefite of the Citie of London, as a good Englishman for the profite of the Realme of Englande, and as a good Christian for the furtheraunce of true religion. The Bible in English, that vnvaluable Iewell, we haue by his trauayle, first with his charge and attendaunce procuring the translation thereof, then fundrie times copying the same out with his owne hande, thirdly printing it in Fraunce with his great expense and perill, when the rage of those holy fathers which then entuyed Christiā mens christianity, not only would not suffer it to be done in England, but also procured the same beyng printed to be attached in Fraunce & openly burned, himselke hardly escaping with his life. Not discouraged herewith, but still caried with zeale to doe good, he attempted the woorke againe, and to Gods great praise and to the edification of Christes Church, performed it. Sithence that, how beneficiall he hath beene in furthering good wittes to learning, in setting learned wittes to working, because the reheartall in particularitie cannot but haue some affinitie with exprobration, I leaue to their remembraunce that haue tasted of it, and shall be moued in their conscience where it maye doe him good, to testifie it. But the Citie

Citie of London may not forget, or forgetting may not be vntolde of it, or well re-membring may not suppress it, that moe maye be moued by his example and their thankfulnesse, to be suche Citezens as he hath beene, how he hath trauayled in their affayres from time to time, as if anye priuate man among them had but a seruaunt or factor of such faythfulnesse, policie and painefulnesse, as he hath shewed himselke for them all, it should not for shame be forgotten, I will not saye vnrecompensed.
Who knoweth not his diligence in laboring for and attending on that noble worke of that most blessed Prince, King, yea saint, Edwarde the sixt, in erecting the Hospi-talles? his labors and expences in ouerseing the same beyng erected, preferring it before all his awne businesse to his great hinderaunce? It is proueaible ynough if any will be so past honest thankfulnesse to denie it. And nowe lastly, beside a number of good bookes by him published, he hath for the whole realme gathered thys Chronycle of Englande, wherein thou mayest readily see with small trauayle and coste that which heretofore scattered in manye woorkes was chargeable to get and troublesome to finde, beside very much that in none heretofore hath beene vttered.

In this he hath brought things vnknowne from darknesse, vnto true reportes from error, confusion of affayres from disorder, impertynent tediousnesse to reasonable proportion, and hath made a large, playne, true and meere historie of this Realme, wherby men may be certified of truth, the Reader may haue delitefull & profitable knowledge: our Countrie men and the subiects, but specially the princes therof, delyuered from slaundersous reportes of foreyne writers: Kings maye learne to depende vpon God, and acknowledge his gouernaunce in their protection: the nobilitie may reade the true honor of their auncestours: The Ecclesiasticall state maye learne to abhorre trayterous practises and indignities done against kings by the Popishe vsur-ping Clergie: high and lowe may shonne rebellions by their dreadfull effectes, and beware how they attempt against right, how vnhable foeuer the person be that beareth it: we all may be warned to thanke God for the most vertuous, wise and peaceable gouernement that we now enioye in comparison of terrible times heretofore:
Eche man maye haue a glasse to see things past, whereby to iudge iustly of thinges present and wisely of things to come: To beholde the beautie of vertue and deformitie of vice: what sweetnesse remayneth after well doing, what stinges of repentaunce euill doing leaueth: Men of elder honor, maye learne not to deface their forefathers praye: The newer sort maye seeke to bring light and dignitie to their houses: and finally all men in seing the course of Gods doings, may learne to dread his iudgementes and loue his prouidence: maye see how good doings be defended, euill doings and wrongs reuenged, bloud with bloud, violence with violence, iniu-ries with miseries, and so growe into an affection to geue to eache matter his right iudgement, to eche superiour his right duetie, to eche other that which iustice or charitie wyll eth, and to all well doers, & among others to this setter forth of so many well doings, such thankfull acceptation as his whole life employed to common benefite hath deserued. Receaue it therfore good Reader so, as thy selfe maie haue most benefite of it, and he may in his age thinke his youth well spent in doing good to London, Englande and Christianitie. And aboue all things forget not, to geue God thanks for the Queenes maiesties most gracious reigne, so farre in comparison exceeding the tymes that here thou readest of: And beseeche him long to preferue her, without or after whome there is great daunger and small hope: and specially let euery one endeuour for himselke, not to moue God for our sinnes to cal her home from vs to him to hastily:

The first Age, and first part of this Chronicle.

The first Age

In the beginning God made Heauen and Earth: and Moses the deuine Prophet and Historiographer (who was before the incarnation of Iesu Christ, 1569. yeres) sheweth vs howe that G O D deuided hys woorde of Creation into, vi. dayes.

Moses.
Creation of the World.

¶ The first day he made the Light, and deuided the same from the darcknesse, and the light he called Daye, and the darcknesse Night.

The .i. day

¶ The seconde day he ordeyned the Fir-mament to be betweene the Waters, the which deuided the waters from the waters, that is to saye, those that are aboue from them that are beneath.

The .ij. day

¶ The thirde daye he gathered all the waters together that couered the face of the Earth into one place, that the earth might be drie, and that it might bring forth Herbes, and Trees.

The .iij. day

¶ The fourth day he beautified the firmament with lights, and ordeyned the Sonne to shine in the daye, and the Moone and Starres in the night.

The .iiii. day

¶ The fift daye he Created the Fishes in the Water, and fowles vpon the Earth.

The .v. day

¶ The sixt day he Created Beastes, euery one in his kinde: and the same day (as the holy Scriptures doe witnesse) when the Heauen, the Earth, and all

The .vi. day

Creation of Man. Genesis. j. The by. day 3962
all the furnitures thereof, were created and made, God then of the slyme of the Earth made Man, that most excellent Creature vnto his owne likenesse, and similitude, and breathed into him the breath of lyfe. Thus was Heauen and Earth finished with all their Apparell in sixe dayes, and the seuenth day God rested from his labors and sanctified the same, and commaunded it to be kept as his holy Sabaoth.

¶ After that God had created Man (as afore saide) he then gaue vnto him such grace that without any instructions, but onely with the endowment of his originall righteousnesse, he was perfectly learned and seene in all the liberall Artes and Sciences. He was also endewed with the knowledg of all Herbes, Trees, Metalles, Stones, Birdes, Beastes, fowles, Fishes, Wommes, and all other Creatures. Also God gaue vnto him power ouer all things that were vpon the Earth, and in the Sea, so that vnto all Beastes, Fishes, and fowles, he gaue a proper and conuenient name according to their natures, eue in such sort as they are called at this day. Then was he brought by the Almighty Lorde into the pleasant place of Paradise replenished wyth all delights and pleasures, the felicitie of which place Saint Augustine doth describe in this maner.

S. Augustin Paradise

Man lyued in Paradise as he would, so long as he willed that God commaunded, he lyued hauing the fruition of God, of whome came his godnesse, he lyued wanting nothing. Hauing in his power withall, to lyue continually. Heate was euer ready and at hand bicause he should not be hungry, and drinke for that he should not thirst: and the tree of lyfe, that age should not consume and ende the same. No corruption was their eyther in his body or came of his body, which was to the lothsomnesse or annoyance of any of his senses. He feared neither inward diseases nor outward violence. In his flesh was most perfite health, and in cuerie part of his soule no lesse tranquillitie and quietnesse. As in Paradise no grieffe was felt throught heat or colde, so likewise to the inhabitours thereof happened there nothing throught vnlawfull desire, or feare, that might be to the impechment of his god and godly enclined will. In him was there no sorrowfulnesse at all, nor yet any vaine mirth or gladnesse. True ioy was in him, continued by God, towards whome there issued a burning Charite out of a pure hart, a good conscience and an vnfaigned faith: Betwene the Man and the Woman, there was semblably a faithfull societie, proceeding of vertuous and honest loue, and agreeable watching of minde and bodye: and finally a keeping of Gods commaundements without grieffe or grudging, to wete, that of all the trees in Paradise he might lawfully eate, so that he absteyned from the tree of the knowledg of god and euill. Hitherto Saint Augustine.

¶ Then God perceyuing that as yet there was no creature made like vnto man which might be an helper and companion vnto him, he forthwith cast Adam into a slumber, and tooke a rib out of his side, filling the place with flesh, whereof he made the Woman, and named her Heuah, or Eue (that is to say, lyue or be lyuing) and brought her vnto him, whome when Adam sawe, he sayde: This is now bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh, she shall be called Woman, bicause she is taken out of the Man: vwherefore Man shall forsake his father and mother and cleave vnto his Wyfe, and they two shall be one flesh. And the Lord blessed and sayde vnto them. Increase and multiplie, and fill the earth and subdue it, and be ye Lorde ouer the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowles of the aire, and of all the Beastes that moue on the earth.

Creation of the Woman

¶ But after that Man was placed in the highe felicitie as afore sayde, he forgetting God, throught the craft and subtiltie of the Serpent (which a little before was driven oute of Heauen) and by the prouocation of the Woman, brok

broke the commaundement, geuen to him by God, wherfore he with Eue his wyfe were driven out of Paradise and made subiect to death, Sinne and all kindes of miserie: For the earth was restrayned, that it should no more bring forth fruit of it selfe, but that by the sweate and painefull labors of theyr bodies, they should trauaile and leade their lyues. Then also came sicknesse vpon them, and heate and colde began to assaile their tender bodyes. For after they began to sinne, God did open the power of Sathan, but yet against him of the seede of the Woman: he promised that Christ should come and destroy his power, and deliuer vs from his thraldome, death and sinne. This was the first promulgation of the Gospell, at which tyme began the kingdome of Christ and the Church. And so Adam and Eue tooke comfort of the promise that was made of Christes coming, and of these two persons the Church first began.

Gene. iij.

Adam and Eue, & first of Christes Church.

¶ And when Adam was thus for his disobedience and transgression cast out of Paradise, he fell to labour and tilling of the ground, according as almighty God had sayd vnto him, and soone after he knew his wyfe Eue (and as James Philip of Bergamo sayth, in the suppliment of his Chronicles) he begat on her. xv. yeres after the creation of the worlde two Children at one tyme, a Sonne and a Daughter, that is to say, Cain, and Calmana, and. xv. yeres next following which was the. xxx. yere of the creation of the worlde, he begat againe at one tyme a Sonne and a Daughter, that is to say, Abell, and Delboza.

¶ The afore sayde two brethren Cain, and Abell, were the first founders of two contrarie Cities, Babel, & Jerusalem, by the one is vnderstand Confusion, and by the other, the vision of peace. Their father taught them to feare God, and to worship him with sacrifices. Cain was of a naughty and vnhappie disposition, geuen vnto all vice and mischief, and was the first that filled the earth, he offered alwayes the worst and most vile things vnto God: But Abell the yonger Brother, was of contrarye conditions: he gaue himselfe to all vertue, and in all things that he went about, he thought God to be present, his occupation was the keeping of Beastes, and he euer offred vnto God of the best things that he had. For in their Sacrifices his offering was euermore consumed with fire from Heauen, but his brother Cains remained vntouched: wherfore Cain (perceyuing that his brothers doynge, was more acceptable before God than his) enuided him, and ought him most damnable hatred and malice, and in the ende most cruellye and shamefullye murdered and slue him.

Babel, Jerusalem.

¶ But Adam heering of the death of his sonne Abell whom he loued most derely, mourned and lamented his death, and continued mourning for him by the space of one hundred yere. And as sayth Nicholas de Lira vpon the iij. of Gene: Adam did with himselfe decree neuer more to haue knowne Eue his wyfe: But afterward by Gods speciall will and prouidence, he did knowe her, to the intent that of that lyne our Sauour Christ should come, and not of the line of cursed Cain.

Adam mourned for the death of Abell an hundred yere.

¶ And after that Adam had knowne his wyfe againe, he begat on her his thirde sonne named Seth, when he was. C. xxx. yeres of age, of whom came and discended Noe, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Dauid, and consequentye our Sauour Jesu Christ. And Adam (as faith James Philip) had beside Cain, Abell, Abell, Seth, and theyz sisters, other .xxx. Children, and liued. lx. C. xxx. yere.

¶ Now after y Cain had done this horrible murther aforesayd, he fled fro his father, and builded a Citie in the Orient, which was the first Citie in the world, and named it Enoch, after the name of his first begotten sonne, whom he begat of his sister Calmana, in the lande of Jude after he had taken her to wife, as it was laifull for him then to doo for the multiplication and encrease of the worlde, which Calmana was borne. xv. yeres after the creation of the worlde as Cain himselfe was. And as Saint Augustine in his booke of the Citie of God sayth, that as it was then laifull for the brother to take the sister to wyfe for the encrease of the worlde, so is it now most damnable to attempt or do the lyke, for that we are by the expresse worde of God prohibited and forbidden so to doo. This Cain was a great toyle and moyle in the earth, but very couctous and full of malice withall, at the prosperitie of any other, which was the onely cause that he murdered and slue his alone onelye brother Abell as aforesaide: for the which fratricide or brother murthring, he was by the sentence of almighty God publyshed for a vagabond and a ronnagate, & reputed and taken all the dayes of his lyfe, as afterward it shall more plainely appeere in the discription, or rather in the Historie of Abell. Of the foresaide Enoch came afterward a great spacion of people, but they were very wicked full of sinne, and aboute all other thinges they did excede in the Sinne of the flesh, which was the greatest cause that his lyne did so wonderfullye encrease and multiplie. This Cain for that God had pronouced him to be accursed, and sayde that the Earth should not yeelde vnto him any fruite, as it is expresse in the .iiij. of Gene: for that cause he left off from the toyle and laboz of the Earth, the which before he did exercise, and sought out by his wicked imagination the Mathematicall artes. And although he found in that traualle great veration of mynd, and businesse, yet as the paine ceased not, so did not his auaricious couetous and greedye desire cease, by rapyne, spoyle, or by any other wicked meane to attaine to treasure and ryches, to the enryching of himselfe, without regarde or respect by what meane so euer he came by the same, not sparing neyther the robbery nor spoyle of his people, nor yet the robbery of his children, nor of his childers children, and all that came of them or any of them: Of the which mischiefes he was a most chiefe and principall doctoz. Also he altered and chaunged the honest and simple doings that before tyme had bene vsed by honest and good men in their exchaunges and traffiques, and caused all things to be done by weyghts and measures, and brought in craft and corruption.

¶ The name of Cain by interpretation is as much to say as possession, and as Saint Augustine sayth in his. xv. Booke of the Citie of God in the. xvij. Chapter: Cain might well be called possession, for in a little tyme he and his posteritie possessed in a manner the whole Earth, but in the ende they were drowned and destroyed by Noes flood.

¶ Abell the sonne of Adam and brother to Cain borne with hys sister Dalbora in the. xxx. yere of the age of his father Adam; that is to saye. xv. yere after Cain. This Abell in his tender age learned the feare of God and his iustice, in such sort that in all his doings and affaires, he imagined God to be present, and that he coulde doe nothing out of Gods sight and knowledge, and therefore he endeouored himselfe to all vertue and good liuyng, and did did sacrifice vnto God of all the chiefest and best of his Cattell. And therefore almightie God had respect and regarde vnto him, and did multiplie and encrease his Cattell and goodes, which was the cause that his brother Cain enuied him. For the saide Cain, being a laborer & toylet of the earth, and yet notwithstanding insatiabile, greedye, and couetous coulde not abide to see his brother so greatly to prosper and encrease, and therefore by the prouocation of the Deuill, rather desiring to be deprived of all consolation and comfort, then to lyue and remaine in the fellowship and companie of his owne naturall and onely brother Abell, on a tyme sayde thus vnto his sayde brother Abell, brother let vs go forth into the fieldes: To the which innocent Abell not thinking of any guile or deceit did consent. And when they were together alone, sodainely Cain ranne vpon him and slue him, the sayde Abell being then one hundred yeres of age, the which Abell is accounted the first Martir, and the first that possessed Paradise. Cooper.

¶ Afterward God called Cain and cursed him, saying: Cain, what hast thou done? The voyce of thy brothers blood is come by from the earth before me, thou shalt be cursed vpon the earth that did open and receiue at thy hand the blood of thy brother Abell. And when thou shalt labour the earth it shall not yeelde to thee any fruit. Thou shalt be as a Vagabond and fugitiue vpon the earth all the dayes of thy lyfe. And God set a signe vpon Cain, that is to saye a most horrible trembling and quaking of all the members and partes of his bodye and (as sayeth Lira vpon the. iij. of Genesis) God did print a signe or marke in his forehead or face, to yntent he should be knowne vnto all nations, and that he should not be slaine by chaunce where so euer he should be found.

¶ After the death of Abell and banishment of Cain, Adam when he was (as aforesayde) C. xxx. yeres of age begat Seth, and lyned after. liij. C. yeres: which Seth as aforesayde gaue himselfe to all vertue and to the feare of God. Of this Seth (as is aforesayde) the holy fathers were begotten, whose posteritie continued, but the posteritie of Cain perished in the flood as shall appeere.

¶ Iosephus writeth that Adam & Seth made two Columnes or Pillers, one of Brasse, the other of Stone, for they foresaw that the worlde should perithe and be consumed, once by water, as it came to passe at the generall flood, and afterward by fyre, which tyme is yet to come, graued in the sayde Pillers such things as they vnderstood of the glorie of almightie God, to the intent that Gods most holy worde might be preserued from perishing, and that the same should remaine to their posteritie; that those y followed might know what God had done in the former time: And he also writeth that Adam and Seth deuoyded the yere into. xij. Monethes, and did first obserue and teache the course of the Celestial bodies, for that it was impossible that mans wyt could attaine to so high and difficile things, vnlesse God almightie had shewed and declared the knowledge thereof to Adam in his creation.

¶ By Abell which by interpretation is Sorow, or death, and by Seth, which by interpretation, is Resurrection, is signified the death and resurrection of Christ, as sayth Saint Augustine in his. xv. Booke of the Citie of God. Chap. xviii.

bij. C. yeres. This Enos was one that altogether sought the glorie and will of God, not as many other good fathers did, but as one that most specialle and wholly dedicated himselfe to the advancement of Gods highe honor and glorie, and lyued not after the worldly felicitie, but after the will of God, as S. Austine writeth of him in the booke last before alleaged.

¶ Kenan the sonne of Enos in the. lxx. yere of his age begat Malalehel, after whose birth he liued. vij. C. xl. yeres. This Kenan was the fourth in order of the fathers from Adam in the Genealogie of the righteous men, but begotten in the thirde generation. For in the first generation Seth was borne, in the seconde Enos, in the thirde Kenan, in the fourth Malalehel, in the fift Jared, in the sixt Enoch, in the seuenth Mathusalem, in the eyght Lamech, and in the ninth was Noe borne, who was the tenth from Adam: For according to the mind of S. Augustine, the beginning of Adam was no generation, but a formation: Neuerthelesse, the plasination or creation of Adam is reconed among the generations, where he is accounted in the first, and Seth in the seconde, and so consequently, which maner is most vsed.

¶ Malalehel the sonne of Kenan in the. lxx. yere of his age, begat Jared or Jared & liued after. vij. C. yeres: But here (sayth Lanquet) that which Macrobius doth only attribute vnto the Egyptians (meaning the account of yeres) were better accounted by the Hebues, among whom there was alwayes a certaine course of the yere which was obserued by y circuite of the Sonne. The yere was then of. xii. moneths as it is now. The moneth conteyned the same time that it doth now. The whole course of the Sonne & Moone was then, as it is now. The day. xxiii. houres, as it is now, whereby worthily are refused y errors of them which holde that the yeres of that age were ten times shorter than they are now, the which opinions the holy scriptures condemne to be false. For the Scripture sayth that the flood began in the. vij. C. yere of the lyfe of Noe, in the. xvij. day of the seconde moneth, and ceased the. xx. daye of the same moneth in the yere following, in the which place the. xii. monethes is read, whereby it appereth that there was then no fewer monethes than is now. And as at this time, men liued much longer than we do now: so is it true that they had far greater bodyes & were of much more strength than we are now. S. Augustine writeth (as Lanquet sayth) that he himselfe sawe in Utica (a citie in Africa) the iawe tooth of a man of such exceeding greatnesse that it might well haue made an hundred of our teeth, and there he alleageth the sentence of Plinie, who sayth, that the longer that time passeth, the lesser bodyes shall be engendred. And I the writer and collector of this whole Booke, and Hystorie, did see the tenth daye of March. 1564. the checke tooth of a man, and had the same in my hande, which was as great as a Hennes egge, and the same did wey ten ounces of Troy weight. And the skull of the same man, as I am credibly informed, is extant and to be seene which will holde fiue pecks of wheate, and the thinne bone of the same man is also to be seene, which is reported to be six foote in length, and of a marueylous greatnesse.

¶ Jared, or Jared, the sonne of Malalehel in the C. lxx. yere of his age begat Enoch, after the birth of whome he lyued. vij. C. yeres. And in thys time time the children of Seth suffered much violence and wrong of the children of Cain.

¶ Enoch the sonne of Jared or Jared in the. lxx. yere of his age begat Mathusalem, and liued after. iij. C. yeres. This Mathusalem or Mathusalem, as the holy scripture sayth, was of longest lyfe, and being borne in the vij. generation from Adam, did prefigure the. viij. age of the world, which shall be the time of the Resurrection, which shall begin in the last day, and neuer after shall haue ende.

¶ Mathusalem or Mathusalem in the. C. lxxvij. yere of his lyfe begat Lamech, after whose birth he liued. vij. C. lxxij. yeres, and dyed in the yere of the flood. He was borne in the tyme when wickednesse and malice began to abound vpon the earth, not onely amongst the children of Cain, but also among those which were called the children of the Godly. This Lamech was not onely a iust man, but also a Prophet, for he was the father of Noe, and he prophesped of him and sayde, he shall comfort vs from the workes and labours of our handes in the earth which the Lorde hath cursed. And Lamech when he had lyued. C. lxxij. yeres he begat Noe.

¶ Noe, when he was fiue. C. yeres of age, begat Sem, Cham, and Japhet, and here I will retorne a little to the line of Cain, and shewe what cursed ende he came vnto, as matter by Gods sufferance, that with such measure as himselfe had measured to his only & owne naturall brother, whom he had most cruelly murthered, so he likewise at the last was murthered himselfe, and that by one that proceeded out of his owne lyne.

IN The beginning of the worlde most people went naked, sauing that they were partly couered with the skines of some beast, & at that tyme they had no dwelling houses to defend them, neyther from the colde, nor yet from the heate, but after their owne phantasies they made with pretie boughes and twigs of trees, such little pretie lodgings, as we call Cabons, or Boothes. And it so chaunced that Cain being verie olde and also werre, happened one day to lay him downe to rest in a bush that was enclosed with grene boughes as aforesaid. And Lamech one of the kindred of Cain in y fift degree, who by reason of his great age had lost his sight, & yet at a time was disposed to go abroad to kill some wilde Beast, and taking his Bow and Arrowes, he tooke also with him a little boy to lead and direct him where he might haue a good shot. And when they drewe somewhat neare vnto the bush where Cain lay, the little boye espying the bush to wag, and seeing as it were a great thing in the midst thereof, he imagined that there lay some wilde beast, and the boye beyng afraid therof gaue knowledge vnto old father Lamech, that in a bush standing right before him and not farre off, there lay a great and terrible beast. And Lamech vpon the report of the child stretched out his arme & drew a streight draught towarde the bush, where he slew his colin Cain, that lay in the same after he had liued. vij. C. xxx. yeres, as sayth Philo. Of this ye maye reade more in Nicholas de Lira vpon the fourth Chap. of Genesis.

¶ This Lamech as sayth Raymolph Donke of Chester, was the. vij. in degree from Adam, and was of the lyne of Cain, and the most shrewde, for he was the first that brought in Bigamy and spousebreach against the lawe of God and nature, and against Gods owne doome.

¶ And this Lamech had a sonne called Juball or Jabell, who was the first inuenter

inuentor of the Portatiue tents or ledgings, the which first was practised and vsed by the Shepheards and keepers of Cattell. And he also was the first that deuided the Lambes from the Sheepe, and one kinde of Cattell from another.

The same Lamech had also another sonne named Tuball, who was a great louer of Musick, and was the first inuentor of proportions and measures: But he was not the maker of the Instruments, for that was inuented long time after, in the time of Pythagoras. And this Tuball by the sounde of the Hammers that Tubalcain his Brother being a Smith did vse, did imagine the distinction of soundes. Genesis. iij.

Tubalcain the second sonne of Lamech was a warrelike Man, and begotten of his wyfe Sela, this Man was a lover and inuentor of all those things that were meete or necessarie for the warres: he founde out the Arte of forging of Iron. He and his brother Tuball foreseeing the two destructions of the worlde that were to come, the one by water and the other by fire did erect two great Columnes or rounde Pillers, the one of burnt Brick to defende the fire, and the other of Marble to defende the water: and therein did graue the Artes and Sciences that were by them inuented: This Tubalcain was the last of the lyne of Cain.

Loemia the daughter of Lamech and of Sela the Sister of Tubalcain did first finde out the vse of Linnen and Wollen, & the Spinning, Carding and weauing of the same, and made it into cloth, both for lightnesse and warmenesse, where before they did weare beastes skins as is mentioned in Cronica Cronicarum.

B V T Now to returne again to the line of the iust, where before mention is made that Jared begat Enoch & Enoch begat Mathusalem, the sayde Enoch about this time was by God taken by into heauen, which thing doth evidently set forth vnto vs the immortalitie that remaineth after this lyfe, and that God wil saue those that are righteous and condemne them that are wicked.

Also before is bittered that Mathusalem begat Lamech, not that same Lamech of whome the storie last before is written, for he came of the lyne of Cain, but this Lamech whereof mention is nowe made came of the lyne of Seth, and the same begat Noe, as a foresayde.

NOE The sonne of Lamech which came of the lyne of the iust, when he was .v. C. yerres of age, begat Sem, Cham, and Japhet, not all at one time, but he was so olde before he begat any of them. This Noe was a iust & righteous Man & one that loued and feared God, by the which he obtayned the blessing & fauor of almighty God. And after the recitall of the birth of the sonnes of Noe, forthwith the holy Scripture declareth the occasion of the flood, because saith almighty God, the worlde began to waxe wicked. And amonge other the great vices of the worlde, there is recyted the contempt of God, Adulterie, Voluptuousnesse and pleasure of the body, for thus the text saith: When that Men began to multiply vpon the earth and brought forth Daughters, the Children of God, seeing the Daughters of men to be faire, tooke them to their vyues.

The holy Scripture calleth the children of God all those which descended from Seth, the thirde sonne of Adam. And those the children of men that that descended from Cain the first sonne of Adam. For Adam commaunded that the children of Seth should in no wise coople with the children of Cain, which was obserued of a long time, vntill that the zeale and loue of vertue decayed. And God perceyuing thereby that the wickednesse of man was great vpon the Earth, repented him that he had made man, not that there is any such passion in God, but that the Scripture so speaketh to vs after our familiar and worldye maner: and therefore he threated a destruction to the worlde by a flood, and would therefore that Noe should declare this vnto the people. C. xx. yerres before it should come to passe. In the meane tyme God commaunded Noe that he should build an Arke, that should contein in length C. C. Cubites Geometricall, euery Cubite conteyning as S. Augustine saith .vi. common Cubits, which is .ix. feete, and so it was in length, two thousand, seven hundred feete. In bredth it was .xv. Cubites, which was foure hundred fiftie feete, and in deepenesse from the upper decke to the bottome, .xxx. Cubits, which was two hundred seuentie feete, and the rooffe ouer it was one Cubite highe, which was .ix. feete. Cooper. This Arke was not by mannes power brought into the Sea, but by the course of the waters rysing by, it was borne away: and rather by diuine prouidence, than by mans pollece, it was gouerned from running to wreck. And Noe began to build this Arke in the .v. C. xxij. yere of his age, and before the flood, as Berofus sayth, lxxviij. yerres.

In the .vi. C. yere of the lyfe of Noe, and the second moneth, God saide vnto him y after .viij. dayes this flood should come, in which space he brought into the Arke his stufte, prouision and all other necessarye thinges for him, whereat euery man laughed, & toke him as one out of his wit. But finally, as it is written in the Gospell, they were eating and drinking, they maryed and were married euen vnto the day that Noe entred into the Arke, and would not know it euen vntill the flood came and destroyed them all. For Noe shewed it vnto them, aswell in worde as in deede, and the building of the Arke was also a certaine declaration vnto them: But they were both without faith and the feare of God, for which cause they were worthely punished. Thus the time passing the seuenth day came, & that day Noe with his wife and his three sonnes and their wyues entred the Arke. And beholde, sodenlye came together vnto him Beastes of all kindes, not brought thither by man, but euen by the miracle of God: neyther did Noe take them, but suffered them as they came to enter into the Arke, neyther came there anye moe than of vncleane beastes two, a Male and a female. Of cleane beastes seven, foure Males, and thre females, of the which one Male was reserued for Sacrifice after the flood, the residue were kept for generation.

Thus they being entered, the Lord shut the doore of the Arke the .xviij. day of the second Moneth. And behold incontinent the springs of the Sea burst out, the windowes of Heauen were opened, the raine fell continuallye .xl. dayes and .xl. nights, and the waters swelled and rose aboue all Mountaines. .rv. Cubits. All liuing creatures dyed, except fish and such as might endure in the bowels of the earth. The waters encreased. C. l. dayes, and on the .xvii. day of October the Arke stakke vpon the Mountaynes of Armeny. The last day of Januarie, Noe opened a window, and put forth a Crowe, which was euer goyng and comming vntill such time as the waters were

And after this, he taried yet other. vii. dayes, and put forth the Doue again, which at night returned vnto him and brought in her mouth a braunch of an Oliue tree. And he taried yet other. vii. dayes and sent forth the Doue againe, but then she returned no more. Howbeit, yet he would not issue out, but remayned for the commaundement of the Lord, who commaunded him not to go forth vntill the. xliij. day of the second Moneth, wherby it appereth that he remayned a iust yere and ten dayes in the Arke.

Berosus.

¶ Berosus the Chaldean wyrteth of this flood in maner following. Before (sayth he) the famous flood of waters came, whereby the whole worlde perished, there preceded many yeres, which of our Chaldeans were faithfully obserued. They wyrteth that about Libanum was a great Citie of Gyantes called Enoch, who were Lordes of the worlde from the rising of the Sonne vnto the setting of the same (that is from the East vnto the west) and they trusting in their strength and hougennesse of their bodyes, with armour that they had inuented, oppressed all men. They deuised Tents, Musicall Instruments, and all delicacies: They fed of Mans flesh and accompanied commonly with their Mothers, Daughters, Sisters, Men & Beastes. There was no wickednesse which they omitted. When many prophesied and preached that destruction should come, which they did write in stones, but they scorned all things. And there was one of these Gyants wiser than all the other in Siria, whose name was Noa: he with his three sonnes, Samo, Japeto & Chem, and their wyues, Titea, Dandoza, Noela, and Noegla, fearing this destruction, which he percepued by the Starres, began to make a Ship in fashion of an Arke. lxxviij. yeres before the flood. And in the same yere that the Ship was finished, sodenly the Ocean swelled, and all the Seas, floods & Springs roase about the Mountaines with continuall raine that fell from the Heauens, whereby all mankinde perished (except Noe with his Familie) who were saued in the Ship, which the waters bare vp to the tops of the Mountaine Cordiei, where in my tyme remayned part thereof, he therto the wordes of Berosus.

Here endeth the first Age of the worlde, which is from Adam vnto the Flood of Noe, and is after the account of the Hebrewes. xli. C. lvi. yeres, and after the lxx. interpretoys. 39. C. xliij. yeres.

The seconde Age

When Noe had continued a yere in the Arke and more, and the waters being asswaged, and the Earth dyed, God commaunded him to come forth, vnto whom he builded an Altare, and offered of all cleane Beastes and Birdes, a delectable Sacrifice. Then God blessed him and sayde: Encrease and multiplie the Earth.

¶ And after God instituted as it were a newe worlde againe, and first he gaue his worde, and promised that he would neuer more destroy the worlde with water, and for the confirmation thereof, he gaue the Rainebow for a sure token betwene him and man. For in that Bow is expressed both the colours of water & fyre, the one part being blew, and the other red, that it might be a witnesse of both the iudgements, the one past, and the other to come. Also then he graunted libertie to men to eate flethe, which the holy Fathers before the flood neuer vsed.

¶ Moreover, God gaue a newe precept for externall thinges and commaunded more plainely, that who so euer did shed any mans blood, his blood should be shed againe, of them to whom lausfull authoritie for the iudgement thereof was giuen (meaning the Maiestrates and Rulers) for that Man is made to the Image and similitude of God.

A newe commaundem

¶ This Noe was faythfull vnto God, and another father vnto mankinde, kinde, having within the space of one hundred yeres his issue wonderfullpe encreased, being also thoroughly learned in the knowledge of devine and humane things, in the revolution of tymes, in the Historie of the world passed: But most specially in Justice & Religion, and he divided the world into three parts, which he himselfe in the residue of his life traueiled and went through, leaving behind him in all places perpetuall monuments, both of his vertue, and also of his Empire. He planted the first Grape, and inuented the vse of Wyne, with the which he was made dronke, so that he lay dishonestly discovered: who being seene of Cham his sonne, the Father of Canaan, was of him scorned, and he in derision brought his two brethren to behold that sight. But they moued with shamefastnesse and honestie, couered their fathers members and would not see them. The which when Noe perceyued, he blessed them, but Cham he would not curse, because God had blessed him, and therefore he cursed Chanaan his Nephew the sonne of Cham, who as some suppose did deride and mocke his Grandfather.

This Noe lived after the flood. CCC.L. yere, and for his sundrie benefites shewed vnto all Nations, they gaue vnto him diuers names, among the which, these as the most famous are celebrated. Noe, Gyges, Fenix, Uranos, Coelus, Sol, Protheus, Janus, Geminus, Innominus, Quirinus, Patulcius, Bacchus, Voltumnus, Chaos, Ileton, Seede of the world, and Father of all Gods and Princes. The Italians after his deceasse dedicated vnto him by the name of Voltumnus, a Temple, and worshipped him with deuine honours and ceremonies.

And also his wife Vesta, for her great prudence and worthy deserts obtained these names following. Earth, Opis, Aretia, Vesta, Cybiles, the great Mother of the Gods, who taught the Maydens to kepe the holy fire, whereof arose the error and ceremonies of the Virgines Vestalics.

After the vniuersall flood, the World by the children of Noe was shortly replenished with people: for God or Nature neuer yet sayled the necessity of things: Of them there were many mighty nations as hereafter followeth.

Sem the first sonne of Noe Prince of Asia, called also of some Meichisedech, a iust and peaceable King, and priest of almightie God, from whome Christ lineally descended, possessed all Asia, with his children. For of Ham came first the Persians: Of Assur, the Assirians: Of Arpharat, the Chaldeans: of Lud, the Lidians: and of Aram, the Sirians. Hether to Lanquet.

Asia is the thirde part of the worlde, deuided from Europa by the Sea called Bosphorus Thracius, & the great ryuer of Tanais: and from Affricque, by the famous ryuer Nilus, and is in quantitie supposed to be as great as Europa and Affricque. Asia minor is a part of the other Asia, which is now called Turkey, and conteyneth in it these Realmes, Pontus, Bithinia, Phrygia, Cozia, Lycia, Lidia, and Licaonia. Cooper.

Cham the seconde sonne of Noe, Prince of Aphyck called also Innus, Incumbus, Sylanus, Pana, Saturne of Egypt, the rayser and spreader of the wickednesse punished with the flood, inhabited the South part of the World with his children. Of Canaan came the Cananites: of Phyth the Libians: of H'sraim the Egyptians: of Chus the Ethiopians: and of Saba the Arabians.

And it is the same country that we now call Barbary, wherein is the Citie of Carthage.

Iaphet the thirde sonne of Noe Prince of Europa, called also Iapetus, Dilcus, Diris, Maurus and Athlas, receyued of his father Noe for his portion all the countries of Europe, from the Gades, called at this tyme the streits of Harock, vnto the great ryuer Tanais.

Europe as sayth Isidore in the. xiiij. of his Ethimologies and. iiii. Chap. beginneth at the Ryuer Tanais, and so lyeth Westwarde by the great Northren Sea, vnto the ende of Spaine. And the East part and South part of the same is ioyned vnto the great Ocean Sea, and it endeth at the Isles called Gades, and it is the same part of the world wherein we doe now inhabite. But Cooper sayth that Europa is deuided from Asia with the great Seas Hellespontus, Propontis, Bosphorus, Thracius, and Pontus Eurinus, and hath the vttermost boundes in the Northest, the Riuer Tanais, and from Affricque it is deuided by the middle Sea.

Of Iaphet came these Princes and Nations: Comerus Gallus, who first reigned in Italy. Magog of whome came the Scythians, and of them the Turkes. Madaus of whome sprang the Medes. Of Janan the Grecians, which were called Janes. Of Tuball the Spanyards. Of Mosoch the Moscouites, and of Tyras the Thracians.

And of this Iaphet came also Briten who first inhabited this Realme, of him called Briten, for Iaphet begat Janan, and Janan begat Sethum, and he begat Siprius of whome Cypres had his first name, and he begat Saturnus, and he begat Iupiter, and he begat Vardamus, and he begat Etichomus, and he begat Cros, and he begat Assaratus, and he begat Capis, and he begat Anchises, and he begat Eneas, and he begat Assanius, and he begat Silnius, who was the father of Briten.

I finde also alleged by Berofus that Noe had another sonne borne after the flood, who was named Jonithus, or Jonichus, which was a great Astro-nomer, and was the first that attained to the whole science of Astronomie, and thereby did deuine and shew before what should after happen to the. iiii. principall Monarchies of the worlde: He was also Scholemaster to Nemroth who began the building of the towre of Babilon, and at that tyme all the people of the world spake but one tongue.

Sem the first sonne of Noe, the which some doe affirme to be the great and highe priest Melchisedech, was borne in the yere of the worlde as appeareth in the mergent, when his father was. D. yeres olde, and one hundred yeres before the flood. He builded the first citie after the flood, the which hee named Salem, and at this day it is called Ierusalem (as sayth James of Bergamo.) And of him came. xxvij. generations, and also the Patriarches, and Prophets, and finally our Sauour and Redemer Iesu Christ. And the sayde Sem in the. C. yere of his lyfe begat Arpharat, of whome came the Chaldeans.

¶ Sale in the .xxx. yere of his lyfe begat Heber, and lived after that three hundredth threec yeres. In the house of Heber continued the language, which at the first, and before the building of the Tower of Babilon was called Hebre.

¶ Heber in the .xxxiiiij. yere of his lyfe begat Phalech and Tectan, and lyued after that. iiii. C. xxx. yeres. Phalech is interpreted diuision, because it chaunced him to be bozne in the tyme of the confusion of the tongues.

¶ Phalech when he was .xxx. yeres of Age begat Rue, and lived after C. ii. yeres. The first yere of the life of Rue was the first yere of the reigne of Nemroth in Babilon, where he reigned .lviij. yeres.

NEMROTH The sonne of Chus, was among all the other that issued out of Noe, the mightiest and most hardiest, and he was the first that tooke vpon him the Empire and gouernement ouer his Subiects, and his abyding was at Babilon, which Citie he builded. This Nemroth enterprised the building and erecting of an houghe, great, and most highe Tower made of Bricke, which was commonly called the Tower of Babel or Babilon, and he purposed that this Tower should haue extended vnto heauen, to the entent that he would make an euerlasting memozy of him selfe. But after that this Tower began to be of a great heigth, and was halfe finished, God almighty willing to abate and ouerthrow the great presumption and enterpryse of Nemroth, confounded the speches and languages of the workemen that wrought vpon the same Tower, so that no one of them vnderstood another.

¶ But for that the foresaid Tower is by certaine wyters noted to be marueylous great and houghe, I thought it good to note and mencion somewhat thereof vnto you. This Tower & Citie of Babilon was compassed with foure walles square, euery wall beyng fiftie Cubites in bredth, and two hundredth Cubites in heigth. And the length of euery of the square walles, was. xviij. Myles (after the accompt of our Myles) so that the compasse of the foure walles were .lxxiiij. Myles. And in the same Citie were one hundredth Gates of Brasse. And the sayde Towre was builded. CC. lxxij. pace highe. But some wyte that the sayde Towre was three Myle highe. And other wyte that it was fyue Myle highe and. C. lxx. paces. And was in bredth foure Myle. And throughe the middest thereof ranne the famous Ryuer Euphrates, whose heade spring came out of Paradise, and that the same was builded wyth Tyle, and Pitch in stede of Morter. Ranulph, Eliot, Cooper, and other.

¶ Ninus the thirde King of Babilon, was the sonne of Belus, the sonne of Nemroth, that was first King of Babilon, and he reigned. Liiij. yeres, and married Semyramis, which Semyramis after the death of her husband Ninus reigned as Queene of Babilon, xliij. yeres, but not contented with the lymytes and circuite of that Realme, she made a conquest of the whole countrie of Ethiope, and adioyned the same vnto her Realme of Babilon, and she attempted also merueylous fierce and cruell warre against the people of Inde, and by force entered into that Countrey and conquered the same, in such sort, that after that conquest the Indians neuer had other Emperour, kin other Prince but her and Alexander the great.

¶ Mefraim, otherwise called Osiris the seconde sonne of Cham, was the first King of Egypt. He is called Mefraim of Moses as apereth in the .x. of Gene. And Herodotus in his booke of Antiquities calleth him Osiris. This Osiris (sayth Herodotus) did find out in Affricque the vse of Wheate, and the manner of sowing, reaping and dressing of the same. And afterward he came into Egypt where he inuented the Plough, and all that euer appertayned vnto husbandrie. And from thence he passed traouyng through the rude Countreyes and people, who fed of Acornes and fruite, and had nothing else to feede vpon: Those also he taught his inuention. And by this meanes he became a soueraigne Lorde and a great ruler through the vniuersall worlde, except vnto them which were vnder the Empire of the Babilonians. He also did first teach the Almaynes to sowe Corne, to set Trees, to plant Vines in places most commodious. And where there was no store nor plentie of wyne, there he taught them to make drinke of Barlye, Otes, and other Grayne, which drinke they called in theyr tongue, Ceruoy, somewhat applying to the name of his Sister, which was called Ceres. And furthermore at the request of the people of Italy he discomfited the Gyautes called cruell tyrantes, for that they most tyrannously did reigne ouer that countrey. He kept him selfe out of the Realme of Tuscan, and reigned ouer the Italians by the space of .xx. yeres, being resident the greatest part of that tyme in the Citie of Viterbe, which afterward was called Vetulonia. And from thence he passed by Sea into Grece, that is to say, vnto the Prouince of Deloponesse, which is nowe called the Moores lande, and there he reigned in the Citie of Argos by the space of .xxxv. yeres, as Eusebius writeth, and in the end returned againe vnto Egypt. And after all these thinges thus done and finished, the malice of his brother Typhon an Egyptian, being as great as the malice of Cain was to his brother Abell, conspired by treason to slaye him, which at length he brought to passe and cut him in .xxvi. peeces and deuided the same among the conspirators, which were in number .xxvi. After his death as Bocas in his second Booke of the Genealogie of Goddes, sayeth he was called Serapis.

¶ Laabin or Libycus surnamed Hercules, commonly called the great Hercules of Libia, was the sonne of Osiris (as Herodotus sayeth) who did accompany his father in all his great warres and traouailes. And afterward for the reuengement of his fathers death, he offered open warre to all the Gyants of the world. And first he went into the land of Phenice, the which he conquered, and after he went into frigia where afterward Troye was built, and there he slue Typhus the Gyant of that Countrey, and gaue the lande to his abone sonne Athus, and with the same one faire Ladie called Omphale. In lyke maner he discomfited Milinus king of the Isle of Candy. And from thence he came vnto Affricque, which now is called Barbary, and there he destroyed Antheus the Gyant and named the Countrey after his abone name Libia, which before was called Phuthee of the name of Phuth the thirde sonne of Cham. And there he set by a great and highe Colome or Piller in the memozy of his conquest. After he came into that parte of France that is called, Gaule Celtique, where he married Galathe, the onely daughter of Jupiter Celte, the .ix. king of the Frenchme. And in this pastime dyed Jupiter, by the death of whome, great Hercules reigned in France as the .x. king of that Realme with Galathe his wyfe, where they builded a great Citie in the Cuntre of Laurois, the which he named Alexia, of the which Julius Cesar maketh often mention in his Commentaries. And then purposing to go into Italy, he chaunced to light vpon a great armie, and entered into the Cuntre of Allobroges, which now is called Sauoy, and first he brake and tare in peeces the harde & stony rocks, and passed ouer the same rocks and Mountaines which we nowe call the Alpes, making away thoroowe euen by force of people, for it was a maruailous enterprize and a thing neuer lyke to be brought to passe, that in such a streight and so harde a rock and in so high and terrible a Mountaine withall, that there should be awaye made for an armie with their Cattell and Baggages to passe cleane ouer: and there he destroyed all the Theeues and Murderers that lay hidden in those Mountaines who did much hurte to such as were traauylers by that Region. After he had passed the Mountaines he descended into Italy and there he made warre against the Titans, which were Gyants, who within .x. yeres following, after he had bidden them diuers battailes, he destroyed them and cleane droue them out of the Cuntre. And the place where one of the battailes was foughten and they banquished, is called at this daye, the Valley of y Gyants nere to the Citie of Tuscanel in Tuscane. And after this the great Hercules King of France was quietly possessed of all Italy, in the which he reigned after peaceably the space of .xx. yeres as sayth Berofus. And afterwarde when he had crowned Tuscus one of his sonnes, king of Italy, then he went into Spaigne and there dyed. And after his death the Spaniards made for him a sumptuous and costly Sepulture in the place which yet they call Gades Hercules, where standeth the Pillers called Hercules Pillers. Tuscus the sonne of Hercules of Libia, was by him ordeyned king of Italy, he gaue the name of the Prouynce of Tuscane in the which he had remayned long, otherwise called Ethuria, and before that it was called Janicula, of the name of the good father surnamed Janus, and all they that haue rule and gouernment in Italy, they call Janigenes, that is to saye, the children of Janus. Bergamo.

Altheus the sonne of Tuscus was after his father king of Italy. And in his time Atlas Italus king of Spaigne did leaue his Realme to Sicrotus his sonne, and came into Sicile, where he reigned a certaine time, and after he arriued in Italy, and there planted and placed himself as in his awne Realme, and called all the Cuntre by his awne name Italy. Bergamo.

RAGAV or Reu the sonne of Phalech in the .xxxij. yere of his age begat Seruch or Saruch, & lyued after. CC. vij. yeres. In this time there were. iij. Realmes that tooke their first beginning, that is to saye, the Realme of the Scithes, wherein first reigned Canaus, of the which the Riuer Canais did first take his name. The second was the realme of the Amasones the which as Iustine writeth were warlike women descending from the Scithes. The .iij. is the Realme of Egypt. The .iiij. is the Realme of Boheme, the which was so called by a Prince named Bohemus, that was present at the building of the Tower of Babilon as sayth Bergamo.

And in this time Nobilitie was aduanced and tooke place, and that for diuers and sundry causes. First for necessitie: that the generation of Man so greatly encreased, and men prone and ready to all mischiefe, it was of force that the wickednesse of the euill must be suppressed by the honestie and discretion of the good; and therefore they chose some certaine Man more sage, wise and prudent, than other to rule the Commonaltie, to aduance and procure vertue, to defend the innocents, and to punish the wicked. And hereof is he rightly called Noble, the which in vertues before other is notable. Whereof S. Hieron speaketh; I can see noie other thing in Nobilitie (saith he) but that they are by a certaine necessitie compelled to be Noble, least they should degenerate from the Noblenesse of their parents.

S. Hieron.

The second cause was the discord, variance and Brawles among the people for lacke of right iudgement: wherefore it was most necessaric, that by the aucthoritie of the Nobilitie, they shoulde be compelled to concord and vnitie as by them vnto whose iudgement and aucthoritie they must obey.

The thirde cause proceeded of the valyaunt courage and manly prowes of certaine notable persons declared in resisting and encountring the enimies of their Cuntre and repressing their inuasions. And such a one the people had in great reuerence and estimation and worshipped and honored him as one that had deliuered their Cuntre from daungers; and by this meanes most chiefly did the Cuntre yeelde and geue vnto suche worthy Men the name of Nobilitie, to them and their heyres for euer, and for this purpose were they chiefly aduanced to the dignitie of Noble men.

The fourth cause, came of abundance of ryches, that when penurie and scarcetie came, then the common people were relieued and succoured of the ryche, for the which reliefe and succour the poore men had the ryche in great reuerence and estimation, and accompted them euer after as their Masters and Lordes.

Therefore all such as are descended of noble Parents and Ancestors, ought chiefly & before all others to call to often remembrance these fore sayd causes of true Nobilitie, that thereby they maye be the more stirred to such soueraigne vertues, for the which their worthy progenitors first became Noble, thinking themselves unworthy the name, except they haue withall those endowments and qualities for the which the same name was first geuen vnto them.

There were also certaine personages made Noble by Gods deuine prouidence (but not many of them) and some of them continued as Noble, as Dauid, and some were ouerthrowne in short time as Saul, Jeroboam, and many other.

There are many also that haue made themselves Noble by violence and tiranny. And here the olde and auncient writers of Histories doo note, that seldome or neuer among the Turkish and heathen people, there is anye roote or perpetuall successe of Nobilitie, bicause they enter by pride, & continue by violence and tiranny. And euen many among the Christians haue for the verie same cause bene oppressed and confounded according to the saying of Ecclesiasticus in the .x. Chapter. The high and mightie Princes for their pride and tiranny God hath ouerthrowne and cast downe, and hath aduanced therevnto the lowly and meeke. And note also that no man can hate Nobilitie, for that euerie man desireth by nature to be accompted as Noble, euen as we desyre to be accompted verteous and religious. But yet manye

Eccle.10.

B. iij. verteous

berteous and holymen haue fled that vocation, for the great perill that is proper and annexed to the same, and this may at large and sufficiently appere in the Prophet Dauid, whome God himselfe did speciallly elect and choose.

The thirde Age, and thirde part of this Chronicle.

The thirde Age

Abram was a Man more prudent and expert in all thinges both diuine and humane, then any other before him was. He was the first that durst mainteyne God to be the Creator of all thinges, against the opinion of all the Chaldehyes, for the which he was compelled to forsake his country of Chaldehy. And soone after, he by the will and commandement of almightie God, with Thare his father, and his wyfe Sara, and his Nephew Loth departed from the sayde coutry of Chaldehy to go into Chanaan, that is to say, into the lande of Chananee, which afterwarde was called the land of Iury, or the land of promes, & he first arriued in y land of Haran, which is in Mesopotania, there makyng some abode, where for some speciall causes he remainned untill the death of Thare his father. And then God made his first promes vnto Abram sayng. Get thee out of thy Countrey and from thy kynred, and out of thy fathers house into a lande which I will shewe thee. And I will make of thee a mightie people, & I will blesse thee and make thy name great, that thou mayst be a blessing: And I will blesse them that blesse thee, and curse them that curse thee, and in thee shall be blessed all the generations of the Earth.

And Abram went as the Lord commaunded him: and Abram was .lxxv. yeres

peres olde when he departed out of Haran to go vnto Cananee . And he tooke with him Sara his wyfe, and Loth his nephew, with all their goodes which they had gotten, and all the Soules that they had begotten in Haran, and they departed to go into the land of Canaan. And when Abram was arryued in the lande of Canaan, God spake vnto Abram and sayd, vnto thy lyne and seede I geue all this lande. And soone after Abram buylded an Altare vnto the Lord in the same place where the Lord appered vnto him, vpon the which he offered sondry Sacrifices vnto the Lorde . After this, there came a dearth in the lande, and Abram went downe into Egypt to soiorne there . And knowing that the Egyptians were lecherous people, & fearing also that Pharao King of Egypt would not let to kill him, to the entent he might freely haue the vse of his wyfe which was one of the fayrest women in the worlde, he streightlye charged and commaunded her, that she shoulde declare none other vnto the Egyptians (and stoutly to stande therein) but that she was the sister of Abram and not his wife.

¶ And when Pharao was aduertised of the great beuty of Sara, he caused her to be taken and sent home to his house, for the which God sent vnto him many plagues, which lighted both of him and all his householde. But after, when Pharao vnderstoode by his wyse men that the aforesayde plagues happened vnto him bicause of the rauishing & withholding of the wife of Abram: He forthwith restored her vnto her husbände Abram, and did further commaunde that his seruantes should safely conduct her, and all thinges that belonged vnto her, to the entent that nothing should be hurt or spoyled by the Egyptians. Reade. Genesis.xii.

¶ Abram and Loth after they had bene a little time in Egypt, they returned into Cananee. And in the meane tyme Loth and he so greatly encreased in cattaille, that it was impossible for the lande to mainteyne the goodes of them both in that place, and there happened much brabole and vquietnesse betweene the Shepards, and heardees of Loth, and the heardees & Shepards of Abram, wherfore Abram spake vnto Loth and sayde. My Brother and my friende, thou seest daylye what discordes and variaunces there happen betweene thy seruantes and myne, for the keeping and feeding of our Cattaille, I pray thee hartely, because there shall aryse no malice nor displeasure betweene vs two, which I would not should come to passe, for we two are brethren, choose thee a place for thee and thine to go vnto, and if thou choose the ryght hand, I will go on the left. And if thou take the left, I will go on the right hand. Then Loth beholding the Countrey round aboute, and noting the goodly playnes & Medowes that led to the flood of Jordan, which was very pleasaunt for the comfort of his Cattaille, chose that part, and so leaving the East part or Country vnto Abram, departed toward Jordan into the place where afterwarde was Sodom and Gomorra consumed from Heauen with fyre and Brymstone.

¶ And after the departure of Loth from Abram, the Lorde spake vnto Abram and sayde. Lift vp thine eyes and behold from the place where thou art Northward, Southward, Eastward, and Westwarde, for all the land which thou seest will I geue vnto thee and thy seede for euer. Gene.xiii.

¶ Then Abram seeing that he could haue no issue by Sara his wyfe, did by the counsaile of the sayde Sara take one of his Maydens or bondwomen named

¶ In this tyme also God destroyed Sodom, Gomorra, Adama, and Semois: The cause of that destruction as Ezechiell the Prophet sayeth was, for their iniquitie, pride, superfluity of meate, abundance of ryches and ydlenesse, and they reached not forth their handes vnto the pooze, and did abominations against nature. This place is now called Mare mortuum, the dead Sea, whose length and bredth containeth niaue Miles. And at this day it is full of Pitche and boyleth continually out in Vapours, which is a wytnesse & testimony of the deuine indignation and wrath of almightie God vpon such wickednesse. At the tyme of this destruction God by his Angelles preserued Lot his Wyfe and two Daughters; But hauing a commaundement that none of them after they were come out of the Citie should looke back againe, it happened Lot's wyfe breaking the commaundement to looke back againe, and she was forthwith turned into a Salt stone. ¶ Isaac the sonne of Abraham by his wife Sara, was in this tyme borne, a Man beloued of God, of whose lignage Christ descended. He represented the figure of Christ, when God commaunded his father to offer him in Sacrifice, whereby was signified that Christ should be an oblation which should satisfie for sinne and death. When he therfore should haue bene sacrificed by his father, and was come both to the Altar and to his death, he exhorted his father that with a good hart he should obey and fulfill the commaundement of God, sayng. My father it were not iust, that any should be borne, if he would refuse the iudgements of God and his father, or would not shewe himselfe obedient vnto their willes. After, when he came to the age of .xl. yeres, he tooke Rebecca to Wyfe: who being a long time barrein, at the last by the fauour of God, she brought forth two children at one birth, the first Esau the Prince of the Idumeis: and Jacob although the yonger, yet by the will of God, both blessed of him, and also endued by his father with the right of the first borne, and afterwarde was the father of the .xij. Patriarches. Finally, after many troubles and temptations, and being with age also made blinde, he gaue his blessing not to Esau, to whome he would, but to Jacob to whome he would not. ¶ This Iacob not long before his death, prophesied most plainely of Christ and of the vocation of the Gentiles, whose prophesie was this in effect as Vincencius Gallus writeth sayng. Of the stock of my soune Juda shall come a Virgine of whome the Lambe immaculate shall be borne, which is the Lambe of God that by grace shall saue all men, whose kingdome shall be everlasting and neuer corrupted. Therefore the great Lorde shall appere in earth as a man, and shall take vpon him a mortall body, and shall eate as a man: his Starre shall arise in heauen, and he shall shyne in the earth as the Sonne. The heauens shall open ouer him, and out of the Temple no little sanctification of glorie shall come vnto him. He shall poure out the spirite of grace vpo vs, and you shall be his children in the truth. He shall be from Leui a Priest, and from Juda a King, he shall be both God and Man, a Mediator betweene God and Man: and shall take awaye all darkenesse which is vnder the heauen: and there shall be peace thoroow the vniuersall world. The voyce of the euill doers shall be against him, not knowing his resurrection: But the blood of his innocencie, ye shall receiue on your heads. And in his passion, the stones shall cleaue a sunder, the Sonne shall be darkened, and all other things shall be troubled, the inuisible Spirites shall tremble, and Hell shall be spoyled: he shall open the gates of Paradise, and shall make the threatening sworde against Adam to stande, and shall geue vnto his Saints to eate the tree of life: Beliall shall be bounde by him. Then shall yee see Enoch, Noe, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, and mee your father, rysing in ioy from the right hande of God, and shall geue power to his children to overcome pernicious Spirites: and as many on the earth as beleue on him shall also reioyce. Then shall all men arise againe, the Godly to glory and ioy: and the vngodly to shame and perpetuall damnation: & most specially he shall iudge Israell which would not beleue in him, hether to Vincencius Gallus.

¶ In this tyme, Abraham that most holy Patriarche fynished his lyfe in this worlde, after whose death, there arose a great famine in the land of Canaan, for which cause Isaac went to sojourne with Abimelech King of Palestine.

ous, was in this tyme borne: he in his youth, by his excellent fauour, vertue, and wisdom, excelled all his brethren and was of his father aboue all other beloued: for which cause, and for his dreames, he was of his brethren had in great despite, and by them solde into Egypt, where after long imprisonment, in the. xxx. yere of his age, he expounded the dreames of Pharaos, by whom he was made President of all Egypt, and was called among them the Saviour of the world. For God would by this maruelous occasion he should come into Egypt, that his power might be there knowne, & that helpe might be ministred to Iacob and his family in the tyme of famine and dearth. This Ioseph taught the Egyptians both Religion, and Ciuile pollece, which is most woorthy to be obserued. And it is to be noted, that a man inspired with the holy Ghost (as Ioseph was) should institute so hard and so seuerer a manner of administration of iustice among the Egyptians as he did, and yet draw together the whole Realme of Egypt (a Countrie beyng so large and wyde) and ioine them together as it were the members of one body without murmure or grudge. And here we may learne that sometyme seueritie is to be bled to keepe the people in obedience, and the same is here approued of God, although gentle gouernement is to be commended. But to our purpose: After that Ioseph had gouerned the Realme of Egypt by the space of. lxxx. yeres he then deceased, being of the age of. C. x. yeres, whose Bones he gaue charge in his death bed that the Hebrues should cary with them into the land of promes at their departure out of Egypt. The residue of his noble histoye ye may read at large in the booke of Genesis, in the. xxxvij. xxxviij. &c.

¶ Of this Ioseph, Trogus Pompeius, and also his abreniator Iustine do write in this maner: Ioseph was the yongest among the brethren, whose excellent wit they fearing, solde him vnto straunge Marchauntes, by whome he was brought into Egypt. When Ioseph was in Egypt, and by diligent studie and in short tyme had learned the Magicall actes and sciences, he grewe in fauour with the king. For he was both expert in Prodigious, and also first found out the right interpretation and expounding of dreames: yea, there was nothing neither of Gods law nor mans, that seemed vnto him vnknowen. Inso much that he foreseeing the barrenesse of the fieldes to come, gathered in tyme come to prouide for the dearth that followed. And so great was his wit and experience, that his answers seemed not to come of man, but rather of God: But Iustine saith that Moses was the soune of Ioseph, whose excellent fauour did much commend him. And the Egyptians when they were plagued with scabbes and filthinesse of body, were admonished that they should expell him with all the sicke people out of Egypt, least that Pestilence shoulde be more infectious.

Trogus Pompeius.

Iustine.

¶ After the death of Ioseph, the people of God merueilously increased, and liued quietly vntill there was another king in Egypt, to whome Ioseph was not knowne: Then by reason of their great multitude and aboundance of goodes, they were of the Egyptians greatly hated, and by them kept vnder in miserable seruitude and bondage, which they susteyned. C. liij. yeres, vntill that by the mightie power of God, they were deliuered from thence.

¶ Aaron the soune of Amram, nephew to Leui and brother to Moses, was at this tyme borne. And incontinently after his birth, Amenophis then King of Egypt, who also was the. viij. Pharaos, commaunded all the Hebrue children born to be drowned: For Aaron was borne without any icopardie, but so was not Moses.

Awhiles that the Hebrewes were thus entangled in miserie and thraldom, God in a vision in the night apered vnto Amram promising him a sonne to be borne, who should both deliuer his people from the Egyptians seruitude, and also ouerthrow them, plague them, spoile them, and drowne them in the Sea, which vision followed to be true. Therefore when Moses was borne, hys birth was kept secret (by the will of God) and. iij. Monethes was he nourished at home. But his father fearing the crueltie of the Egyptians, made a little vessell of Bulrushes, well pitched within wherein he put the childe, and set it in the Riuer, commending it to the tuition of almightie God, who before had promised him to be borne. Then almightie GOD shewing that not by mannes wisdom and policie, but by his awne diuine prouidence his determinate will and pleasure is brought to good effect, saued this little helpless and innocent childe. For he caused Termuth the daughter of Pharaos to walke to the Riuer syde to sport her, where she sawe this little vessell swimming vpon the water. Incontinent she commaunded it to be brought vnto her, and opening it, founde therein a wonderfull fayre and goodly Babe, at the which she reioysed not a little, and according to the chaunce, she named it Moses, which signifieth preserued from the water. After this, for the fauor and forwardnesse of the childe, she adopted him for her sonne, and caused him to be instructed in all the learnynges of Egypt. It chaunced on a time, that the King for his daughters sake tooke the childe in his armes, and set the crowne vpon his head: which Moses as it were childishly playng, hurled it to the ground, and with his fecte spurned at it. But the Priest the Sodothfayer, beholding this, cryed out and sayde, that this was he, whom before he had prophesied should be borne which should destroy the Kingdome of Egypt, except he were by death prevented. But Termuth excused the childe, alleaging that his age had yet no discretion, and for prooffe thereof, she caused burning coles to be put to his mouth, which the childe with his tongue licked, whereby hee euer after had impediment in his tongue: By this meanes their fury was for that tyme appeased.

En processe of time there arose cruell warres betwene the Ethiopians and the Egyptians: The Ethiopians destroyed Egypt, tooke their Townes, wasted and ouerran their country, euen vnto Memphis their principall Citie. On the other part, the Egyptians by this necessitie compelled, fled for counsaile to their Oracles and Diuinations: where they receyued answer that they must elect an Hebrew Captain of their armie, by whose helpe they should not onely expulse the Ethiopians from their borders, but also bring them vnder their subiectiō. Moses both for his wisdom and personage was chosen soueraigne Capiteine of this Armie, and he so politiquely led his host, that vnbwares he set vpon them, and at the first battaile he discomfited them and put them to flight, not withoute the slaughter of a great number of them. And when they in no place were able to resist him, they fled to their strong Citie Saba. In which, whilst they suffered the siege, & Moses often tymes politiquely and valiantly assaunting them, he was of the Kinges Daughter of Ethiopie vehemently loued, which being no lenger hable to sustaine the force of loue, by certeyne faythfull ministers required of Moses marriage: he vpon vpon condition that the Citie might be rendered vnto him, agreed thereto, so by her meanes was the Citie geuen by and she married vnto him according to his promise. By this occasion he subdued all Ethiopie, returning to Egypt with great triumph and victoꝝ: which prosperitie to the Hebrewes was hope of libertie, and to the Egyptians cause of great feare: wherefore they sought dayly occasion how to destroy him. The which thing Moses perceyuing, diligently imagined how to auoyde their deceytes, and therfore denied himselfe to be the sonne of the daughter of Pharaos, chosing rather to be afflicted with the people of God, then to enioy sinfull pleasure of the woꝝlde. Wherefore, he slue an Egyptian that oppressed an Hebrew, and fled into Madian, not farre from the Mount of Synay, where he was receyued into the house of Jethro the priest of that Citie, who gaue to him in mariage his Daughter Sephora: There he continued. xl. yeres and kept sheepe. Josephus.

After this when king Pharaos without all measure bered the children of Israell, God sent Moses to deliuer his people out of Egypt, who after diuers miracles by him done in the sight of Pharaos for confirmation of his auctoritie, at the last obtained of Pharaos to lead and carie away the children of Israell out of Egypt, and he led them towarde the land of promission: But Pharaos chaunging his minde, pursued the Israelites with most eger cruelty, intending to haue vtterly destroyed them, for so much as they had at that time no place of refuge, nor succour. For on the one side they were enclosed with Hilles, and on the other side with the Sea, and he their most cruell enimie followed at their backs. But here God declared that when extreme necessitie happeneth, and all mans helpe and strength fayleth, then is he readie and hereth the voyce of his people. For at the prayer of Moses and wayling of the Israelites, the water of the Sea contrarie to the naturall course thereof, went back, and by the space of certaine Myles gaue way to the people to passe without daunger: which thing when Pharaos and his host assayed to follo and were in the deepest, the Sea keeping againe his former course, swallowed him by with all his power. wherein God shewed a notable spectacle or example vnto vs, that we may assure our selues that he will be reuenged of the stubborne, impious, and cruell Tirantes, which bere and persecute hys people.

Here endeth the thirde Age of the woꝝlde, and is from Abraham to the departing of the children of Israell out of Egypt. CCC. lxx. yeres.

The fourth Age

The fiftie daye after that the Israelites were thus departed out of Egypt, and were come to the Mount of Sinai, the lawe of the Decalogue or .x. Commaundements was to them geuen by almighty God, with a great and terrible magnificence. At which tyme also God gaue to them a certaine polittique gouernaunce, and a speciall kingdome, in which nothing wanted that appertayned to the true worshipping of God, Priesthood and Ciuil iustice, to the intent that a certaine people should be notably knowne, among whome the worde of GOD remayned: and of whome Christ in tyme to come shoulde be borne: So that among this people alway remayned the Church, the kingdome and the true worde of God, vntill after Christ had suffered. Whereby all men may know that the Church hath alway beene: and that God from the beginning of the worlde hath both reueled and preserved his worde among his people.

In the .xxi. yere of the Dukedome of Moses, Atho, Prince of Media gaue vnto Dardanus part of his lande, who incontinent left all his right in Italy, and went to his newe possession, where he builded a Citie, which after his awne name he called Dardania, that after was called Troye. Vnto this place Verofus continued his Historie and finished.

deuided their lande and dyed in the Mount Sebo, beyng of age .C. xx. yeres, whose eyes were neuer dunne, nor his Teeth loose: He was buryed by Angelles, and his Sepulture was yet neuer knowen vnto Man. Lanquet.

¶ After the death of Moses the Israelites had Princes and Gouvernors, which were created, partly by the aucthorie of wise men, partly set by by the speciall calling of God, by which Princes, many notable and famous thinges were done. And so God declareth that he is present, and doth continually defende his people, although they may seeme for a tyme to be tossed in the waues of these worldly troubles and perilles. These Gouvernors after the custome of the Hebrues were first named Judges.

¶ The number of the children of Israell when they went out of Egypt, were (as it is written in the .xij. Chapter of the booke of Exodus) sixe hundredeth thousand men on foote, beside women and children.

After Moses, Iosua was seconde Judge or Duke of the Hebrues, and reigned .xxviii. yeres after the computation of the Hebrues, he brought the Children of Israell into the lande of promission: and had a great battaile against the Amorites in Gibeon, where he commaunded the Sonne to stande, and it stode still longer then before had beene accustomed by the space of one whole day, and he had a notable victorie, for God fought for him, and he slue in that day .xxxj. Kinges, and almost all their people, and he deuided the land of Chananee to the Tribes of Israell. This Iosua was a Man that feared God, he was also right sage and wyse, mightie in armes, and in peace berpe happye and fortunate, and finally endued with all vertues, who when he was .C. x. yeres of age ended his life.

¶ After the death of Iosua, the Seniors and Elders of the Children of Israell gouerned and ruled them .xvii. yeres. And Israell serued the Lorde all the dayes of Iosua, and long time after, and they knewe all the workes of the Lorde which he had done in Israell.

After Iosua, Othoniell iudged Israell, and gouerned them .xl. yeres. This Othoniell was of the Tribe of Benjamin, and he is surnamed Zenes. He deliuered the Children of Israell out of the handes of the king of Assiria.

Aioth the sonne of Gera, which was the sonne of Gemini, of the lynne of Benjamin, iudged Israell after Othoniell, he deliuered the Israelites from Eglon king of the Moabites, whom also he slue, and he iudged Israell lxxx. yeres as is wozitten in the booke of Judges, the .iiij. Chapter.

SAngar the sonne of Anath iudged Israell next after Aioth, he slue .viij. C. Philistines with an Ore goade, as they were entering into the land of Israell. And he died within the first yere that he ruled Israel, as saith Iosephus.

Debora, or Delbora a prophetisse, a woman of the lynne of Ephraim, was ordeyned Judge ouer Israell. She deliuered the people of Israell out of the hande of Iabin King of Chanaan, which had troubled Israell by the space Judges.iii). space of .xx. yeres : The aforesayde Delbora after she had ruled Israell .xl. yeres, dyed, as appereth in the booke of Judges.

2699 / 1264 Gedion, called also Terobaall iudged Israell .xl. yeres. He deliuered them from the power of the Madianites, vnder tohome they were .viij. yeres, and he slue Oreb, Zeb, and Zalmana, their Princes, with .C. xx. thousand of the Madianites and Arabies. And when he dyed he left .lxx. sonnes behinde him.

2739 / 1224 A Simelech the some of Gedeon iudged Israell tyrannously and occupied that some three yeres, he slue his .lxx. brethren, the sonnes of Gedeon, and at the last was himselfe slaine miserably of a Woman, casting downe a piece of a Millstone on his head.

2742 / 1221 Tola the sonne of Phuah iudged Israell and ruled them quietly. .xxij. yeres, and then dyed.

2765 / 1198 I Air ruled Israell .xxij. yeres. This man prospered greatly in all his attempts, he had .xxx. sonnes, and they were Princes of .xxx. Cities, which were called the towne of Jair.

2876 / 1177 I Ephte ruled the Israelites .viij. yeres, he deliuered them from the Philistines (whome for the sinne of Idolatrie) they serued. .xviij. yeres. He by an brauidised boboe sacrificed his alone Daughter.

2793 / 1170 After Jephthe, Abessan ruled the Israelites .viij. yeres. He had .xxx. sonnes and .xxx. Daughters, the which he bestowed all in marriage in his lyfe tyme, and then deceassed.

800 / 163 A Elon, or Ahialon, gouerned the Israelites .x. yeres.

810 / 153 A Adon or Labdon, gouerned Israell by the space of .viij. yeres, he had .xl. sonnes and .xxx. Nephewes begotten by his sonne, and afterwarde dyed.

818 / 45 Samson the sonne of Manue, of the Tribe of Dan, ruled the Israelites .xx. yeres, and deliuered them from the subiection of the Philistines, vnto whome they payde tribute .xl. yeres. He was a man most strong, which with his hand strangled a Lyon, and with the Cheeke bone of an Assle slue a thousande Philistines, putting the residue to flight. Finally, by the fraude of Dalila an Harlot, he was deceyued and brought into the hands of his enemies, who blynded him, and afterwarde being brought forth to play before the Princes of Palestine, he tooke in his armes the pillers of the house wherevpon the whole house stood, and so ouerthrewe the whole house, and slue in that place at the same present tyme, thre thousande Philistines, and himselfe also was there slaine.

838 / 25 Heli came of the lyne of Ithamar, which was the sonne of Aaron, and he was iudge ouer Israell : he was also the great and high Priest after the death of Ozi, which came of the lyne of Eleazer. And in the tyme of Heli the Arcke of the Lorde was taken by the Philistines, and that came to passe by the fault and foly of Heli, for that he kept not his two sonnes, Ophni and Phinees

Princes in due order and correction, but suffered them to runne in all ryot and wickednesse. For the which at the last he was plagued, for when he heard of the death of his two sonnes and how the Philistines had taken the Arcke, he fel backward out of his scoole and brake his neck, after that he had iudged Israell the space of .xl. yeres. i. Reg. iij.

After the death of Heli, Samuell the sonne of Helcana and of Anne his wyfe, the verie true prophet of our Lord God : iudged Israell .xl. yeres, who being but a Childe was offered by his father and mother vnto God in the Temple, where he bowed vnto God. And he was in so great fauor that almighty God declared vnto him that he would translate the office of Priesthood from the house of Heli, onely for the wickednesse of hys sonnes : and in his tyme the Arcke of God was restored againe by the Philistines. This Samuell by the commaundement of almighty God did annoint Saul the sonne of Cis the first king of Israell.

Saul the sonne of Cis being of the Tribe of Benjamin, was at the impertunate sute, petition and request of the people, made and ordeined the first king vniuersall ouer all Israell. He was a mighty man and great and high of stature, and was so high that being among all the people, his shoulders were sene aboue any mans head. And as he was beautifull and comely in shape and propozion of bodye, so was he also adozned and beautified with many singuler vertues, for he was prudent, sage and wise, and there was not found in all Israell one that did loue, feare, and obey God and his commaundements, more then he did. And for this cause God did chose him out before all the rest.

After that Samuell by the commaundement of almighty God had brought Oyle to annoynt the King, hee called together the people, and specially all the Trybes of Israell. To whome after he had declared vnto them the aucthoritie, right, power, prerogatiues, commaundementes, and executions that kynges shall dayly and from tyme to tyme haue ouer euery of them, as his Vassalles and subiectes, and also that their request to haue a King was against the will and minde of God, and many other persuasions he bled to haue remoued them from that opinion, but they would not, but still cryed out they would haue a King. Then he caused lots to be cast out, to know who should be King, and the lot fell vpon the Tribe of Benjamin, and to conclude, in the ende it fell vpon Saule the sonne of Cis : by reason whereof he was immediately sought out, and annointed and confirmed King.

Saule continued and perseuered in his former vertnes the space of two yeres, as it may apere in the .iij. Chapter of the first booke of Kynges : But afterward afterward he despysed and brake the Commaundementes of almightie God, geuen vnto him by Samuell the Prophet. Wherefore it was declared vnto him that his reigne and continuance should not be perpetual, but that it should be taken from his lyne and issue, and geuen vnto another. Finally, after many great iniuries, verations, persecutions, and wronges by him done to Dauid which had maryed his Daughter, he was ouerthrowne in a battaile against the Philistines in the mountaynes of Gelboe, in the which his whole armie perished. Three of his sonnes, that is to say, Ionathas, Abinadab, and Meechine, with manye other were also slaine and murthered. And because Saule would not dye by the handes of the Philistines, after he had reigned xx. yeres, he fell vpon his awne sworde and slue himselfe, as appereth in the xxxi. Chapter of the first booke of Kinges.

Now that we are come vnto the tyme that this our native country now called England was as the comon opinion is first inhabited by Brute, and called of his name Britaine. It were not amisse that we shewed how this land hath bene heretofore called, and by whom the same hath bene before time inhabited: But for þ here in the wyters of the Histories of this Realme do so greatly vary & are of sundry opinions, & also that almost no one of them all but speaketh doubtfully and diuersly thereof. I thought it best to passe ouer the vaine & fonde story written by the wyter of the English Historie, who sayth, that this Realme was first named Albion of Albine, the Daughter of Dioclesian King of Syria, who had xxxii. daughters and were married vnto xxxii. Kings, and in one night they did cut all their Husbandes throtes: And that then Dioclesian their father beyng wroth with them for those cruell murthers, did therefore cause them all to be put into a Ship, without any person with them and turned them to the aduerture of the Sea, and so by chaunce they arriued in this lande, and called the same Albion, of Albine the eldest Sister: And that afterwarde Deuilles did accompanie with them, and begat Gyautes and Monsters of them, and so this land was first inhabited: which story as it is most fabulous and foolish, so is it also false and slaundersous to shew that this noble Realme should haue so lewde a beginning. But sundrie other wyters, wyrite otherwise: sayng, that it was called Albion of the whyte Clifes that are scene vpon the East costes. But I will passe forward with the report of the Historians that haue written in this our latter tyme, which say that Brute descending of the auncient blood of the Troians, and beyng the sonne of Syluius Posthumus king of Troy, did arriue in this Iland in the yere of the world, two thousand eight hundredth fiftie and five, and the .xj. C. viij. yeres before the coming of our Sauioz Iesu Christ, accompting the yeres after the accompt of the Hebrues continued in the holy Scriptures, which accompt I obserue throughout this whole story. But Policronicon and Fabian say that Brute was the sonne of Syluius Aeneas, for they say Aeneas begat first vpon his wife Lauina, a sonne who was called Ascanius, & he had a sonne also by his first wife whom he named Syluius Aeneas, and this Syluius Aeneas was father to Brute: But other say otherwise, wherefore I refer it to the iudgement of the reader. But now returning to the story of Brute, this following, I find written in an olde Pamplet which hath no name:

After

After the Citie of Troy, by the false coniecture and treason of Aeneas, the Sonne of Achilles and other (vpon peare to be had with the Grekes for themselves, their friends, and parents, and vpon condicion also that their goodes might be referued vnto them) was entered and destroyed: And the king thereof named noble Priamus taken and murdered, and Polixena king Priamus Daughter taken and beheaded vpon the Tombe of Achilles, and Heleus the sonne, and Cassandra, another daughter of king Priam taken and deliuered at large. And for that Aeneas at the time of the taking of the sayde Citie, had hid and conueyed from the knowledge of the Grekes the sayde Polixena, and woulde not deliuer her but by compulsion: Agamemnon, and the other Grekes commaunded Aeneas to take his goodes and friends and to depart out of that lande, and so was he banished.

After that Aeneas with Ascanius his sonne had bene in Sicile and there buried his father Achilles: And after that Aeneas with Ascanius had bene three yeres in Afrique, where Aeneas was louingly receyued of Queene Dido: And after the same Aeneas had taken to wyfe Lauiny, daughter of Latyn king of Italy: And after his death Ascanius his afozenamed sonne tooke vpon him as king of that region: And after that his sonne Siluius had taken to wyfe the Queene Lauiny, and had gotten hir with childe, of whose deliuerance she deceased, and the same childe was named Brute: And that the same Brute being of the age of .xx. yeres was chased in exile out of Italy, for that by misadventure he had kyled his father Siluius in shooting and chasing of a Dere. And therefore being exiled went into those partes of Grece where were of the progeny of the Troians, to the number of .viij. thousand beside women & children kept in seruitude vnder king Pandrasus king of that region: with which king Pandrasus the sayde Brute for his prowesse and amiable personage fortunied at the length to be in great fauour: And after that at the prayers of the sayde Troians the same Brute with the helpe of Asaracus, brother to king Pandrasus by the father side, in Concubinage by a Troian woman had taken Pandrasus and put him in prison: (for whose deliuerance the same Pandrasus gaue vnto Brute in marriage Inuogen his daughter with Ships, treasure, victuall, and other necessaries to seeke aduentures:) And after that Brute had made his sacrifices, prayers, and requestes to the Goddes Diana, and had receyued answer of the sayde Goddesse that he should go into France and there build two Cities, which he named Towers and Towrayn: And after that he had builded the sayde Cities in the remembrance of his Cousyn Turnys which was there kyled and buried in a battell that he had with Goffare then king of Poytenynes: & after diuers victories had by the sayd Brute vpon the Poytenynes in the time that Hely was highe Priest of Israell, and in the yere from the creation of the worlde, M. M. C. vij. hee arryued in this Realme then called Albion and landed in the weſt part of the ſame in a Haven then called Totueſſe, where then inhabited certaine Gyants, whome afterwards he valiantly oppreſſed and deſtroyed, and after that poſſeſſed and enioyed all this Realme, and named it Briteyn after his owne name, and called alſo the inhabitants thereof Briteyns.

¶ This Brute gaue to Coryn his Coſyn a parte of the ſayde land, which he named after his name Cornewall, and the people thereof Cornyſhmen, which Country and people are ſo named at this day.

¶ This Coryn had no children but one daughter, named Gwendolena, which was married to Locryne Brutes eldeſt ſonne. For Brute begat on his Wyfe Innozen three ſonnes, Locryne, Albanact and Camber, and gaue to Locryne his eldeſt ſonne (as aforeſayde) the land on this ſide Humber, which the ſame Locryne after his fathers death named Loegria. And to his ſecond ſonne Albanact he gaue that part of the Northſide of Humber, which he named Albania, whereof a great part is nowe called Scotland. And to his yonger ſonne Camber, gaue he that parte of this land, which is beyonde the Ruyer of Scuerne, and he named the ſame after his owne name Cambria, which of the Welchmen is ſo called at this daye, but the Engliſhmen call it Wales.

¶ Howbe it Fabian, and the Engliſh Chronicle and others ſay that Brute with his company after his firſt landing in this Iſland at Totueſſe as aforeſayde, he ſearched and traualled throughout all this land, and found the ſame to be maruellous ryche and plentifull of wood and paſture, and garniſhed with moſt goodly and pleaſaunt ryuers and ſtremes. And as he paſſed, he was encountred in ſundry places with a great number of mightie and ſtrong Gyants, which at that tyme did inhabite the ſame: Howbeit he alwayes ouerthrew them and wan the victorie. But among all other, as ſayeth the Engliſh Chronicle, there was one that was of paſſing ſtrength named Gogmagog, the which he cauſed to wreſtle with Corineus his kiſnman beſide Douer: in the which wreſtling the Gyant brake a ryb in Corineus ſide, by reaſon whereof Corineus being put in a chafe, with great ſtrength overthrow the Gyant, and caſt him downe the rock or diſſe of Douer, whereof the place was named the fall of Gogmagog, but ſithen that tyme the name is chaunged, and the place called the fall of Douer, and ſo is it called at this day. For this deede and other, Brute gaue vnto his ſayd Nephew Corineus or Coryne, the whole Countrey of Cornewall, as aforeſayd.

¶ Thus haue you heard the opinion of the writer of the Engliſh Chronicle, and of Polychronicon, Fabian, and others: But forasmuch as in theſe our dayes and tyme, a learned, wiſe, & famous Man whoſe name is Thomas Cooper now Vicechancelor of the Vniuerſitie of Oxford, hath with great induſtrie and traualle ſearched the Originall names, and the firſt inhabitation of this Realme, and hath alſo ſhewed many euident and great reaſons and argumentes for the prooſe thereof, aſwell to condemne the fond coniectures of ſuch as ſlaunderouſly haue written of the ſame, as alſo to confirme a truth, and to declare that which is moſt lykely and probable: I thought it therefore very meete in this place to inſert his ſayings in his laſt Dictionary, which he named Theſaurus lingue Latine, vpon theſe two Wordes, Albion & Britannia.

ALBION

Albion.

ALBION ſayth he (the moſt auncient name of this Iſle) conteyneth England and Scotland: of the beginning of which name, haue bene ſundry opinions, one late feygned by him, which firſt printed the Engliſh Chronicle, wherein is neyther ſimilitude of truth, reaſon, nor honeſtie: I meane the fable of the fiftie daughters of one Diocleſian king of Siria, where neuer any other ſtozy maketh mention of a King of Syria ſo named. Alſo that name is Greke, and no part of the language of Syria. Moreover the coming of them in a Boate or Ship from Syria without any Mariners, through the Sea called Mediteraneum into the Ocean: and ſo finally to finde this Iſle, and to inhabite it, and haue generation by Deuilles, is both impoſſible, and much reproche vnto this noble Realme; to aſcribe her firſt name and habitation to ſuch inuenteres.

¶ Another opinion is (which hath a more honeſt ſimilitude) that it was named Albion, ab Albiſ rupibus, that is, of white rockes, becauſe that vnto them that come by Sea from the Eaſt or South, the Bankes and Rockes of this Iſle do apere white. Of this opinion haue I moſt meruaile, becauſe it is written of great learned men. Firſt Albion is no latin word, nor hath the analogie, that is to ſay, the propoſition or ſimilitude of latine, for who hath found this ſyllable, on, at the ende of a latin word. And if it ſhould haue bene ſo called for the white colour of the Rockes, men would haue called it Alba, or Albus, or Album. In Italy were townes called Alba, and in Aſia a Countrey called Albania, and neyther of them tooke their beginning of white Rockes or Walles, as ye may reade in bookes of Geography: nor the water of the Ruyer called Albiſ, ſeemeth any whytter than other water. But if where auncient remembrance of the beginning of thinges lacketh, it may be leſſe full for men to ble their coniectures, than may mine be aſwell accepted as Plinies (although he incomparably excelled me in wiſedome and doctrine) ſpecially if it may apere that my coniecture ſhall approach more nere to the ſimilitude of truth: wherefore I will alſo ſet forth mine opinion, onely to the intent to exclude fables, lacking eyther honeſtie or elſe reaſonable ſimilitudes.

¶ When the Grekes began firſt to proſper, and their Cities became populous, and wared pyſſant, they which traueylled on the Seas, and alſo the Iſles in the Seas called Hellespontus, Aegeum, and Creticum, after that they knew perfectly the courſe of ſaylyng, and had founden thereby profite, they by little and little attempted to ſearch and finde out the commodities of outwarde Countries: and lyke as Spanyardes, and Portyngales, and our Merchants of England haue of late done, they experienced to ſeke out countreyes before vnknown. And at laſt, paſſing the ſtreytes of Marrocke, they entred into the great Ocean Sea, where they found dyuerſe & many Iſles: among which they perceyuing this Iſle to be not onely the greateſt in circuit, but alſo moſt plenteous of euerie thing neceſſarie to man, the ayre moſt wholeſome and temperate, the earth moſt apt to bring forth all things that maye ſuſteyne: The fleſhe of Beefes and Muttons moſt ſweete and delicate, the Wood moſt fine, not lacking any kinde of Metall, hauing abundaunce of Wood and Timber to builde with, alſo great and fayre Ryuers, with great Lakes or Meeres of freſh water, & as well in them as in the Sea, where-with the countrey is environed, there was great plenty of fiſhes of diuers ſorts moſt apt to be eaten: they wondering and reioyſing at their good and fortunate

nate arriual, named this Isle in Greke Olbion, which in English signifieth happy & in latine Foelix. Like as a part of Arabia which is most fertile, is called Arabia foelix. But in processe of time by resort of sundrie people hauing diuerse languages, no maruaile though one letter were chaunged, & the first letter O, turned into A, & so for Olbion, it was at the last called Albion, which worde hath no maner of signification. This chaunging of letters is not vnlikely since at this present tyme the Northren men of this Realme do vse A in wordes, where Southren men vse O, as a Bane, a Stane, a Bare, a Bande: for a Bone, a Stone, a Boze, a Bonde. And among the Grekes were lyke alteration of letters. And it may be the more easely borne, that one bowell may be chaunged in a word, & specially, A into O, which in some mannes mouth soundeth often tymes lyke, then that a sillible unpertinent to the proportion of latine, should be vnaptly added to. Notwithstanding Pomponius Mela maketh mention of a Gyaunt called Albion, whom Hercules slue in Gallia, which was the sonne of Neptuneus, who mought with more reason be demed the first gener of this name vnto this Isle, then y<sup>e</sup> the other surmises should be likely.

If any man can find matter more certeyne concerning the beginning of this Isle, I will not be offended, but congratulate with him his good fortune and diligence. Hetherto Cooper shewing howe this Realme was first called Olbion, and after Albion. And the lyke trauaile he taketh in shewing of hys opinion why this Realme was called Briteyn, & therein wyrteth as foloweth.

Britannia.

Of the first naming of this Isle (sayth he) is yet no certeyne determination, forasmuch as there remayneth no auncient Historie, making thereof remembrance, the olde Britons bookes (such as were) beyng all destroyed by y<sup>e</sup> Saxons: who endeuored themselves vtterly to extinct the honorable renoune with the name of Britons, lyke as the Gothes dealt with the Romaines. Also the part of Titus Liuius, where the conquest of Briteyn is remembred, with the stozies of Iulius Rusticus, and dyuerse other noble wyrters, that wrote speciallye of this Countrey, are vtterly perished. Such as remaine, as the Commentaries of Iulius Caesar, Cornelius Tacitus, Diodorus Siculus, and they that wrote of Cosmographie, haue omitted the originall beginning of the name. The Historie of Gildas the Briton cannot be found, who was after that the Saxons had inuaded the Realme, and therefore mought lacke such bookes as best should instruct him. As for Beda seemeth to haue seene nothing written of that matter. For where he sayth that this Isle took the name Britannia of the inhabitantes of Briteyn in Fraunce, it is nothing like to be true. For that Countrey was (not long before the tyme of Beda) named Armorica, & Armoricus tractus, when this Isle was called of most auncient wyrters Britannia, and (as Solinus wyrteth) seemed to be an other worlde, forasmuch as the West part of Gallia was thought to be the vttermost part of this World. Also Iulius Caesar wyrteth that the places of this Isle were vnknowne to Frenchmen sauing to a fewe Marchantes, and yet they knewe no farther than the Sea coast towarde Fraunce. Moreouer the same Britons affirme that it was left among them in remembrance that the innermost partes of the countrey was inhabited of them which had their first beginning in the same Isle. This well considered with the authoritie of the wyrters, both an excellent Prince, and also a great learned man, and was himselfe in this Isle, it is not to be doubted but that he most diligently searched for the true knowledge of the auncientie thereof.

thereof. And if he mought haue founden that the inhabitants had come of the stock of Aeneas, of whose progeny he himselfe came, he would haue reioyced much for the prowesse and valiant courage which he commended in them. Moreouer, that the name came of Brutus (whome our wyrters imagined to descend of Aeneas the Troyan) is no more lykely then that this Isle was called Albion of Dioclesians daughter, or of white rocks. All the olde Latyn Histories agree that the sonne of Siluius, the second in succession from Aeneas, and of them named the sonne of Ascanius, was Aeneas, called also Siluius, wherunto also the Grekes do accorde, but they name Siluius to be brother to Ascanius, and borne after the death of Aeneas, and was therefore called Posthumus. But neyther the Romaines, nor the Grekes doe write of any man called Brutus before Iulius Brutus which expelled Tarquinus out of Rome. Which name was also geuen to him (by the sonnes of Tarquyne) in derision bicause they tooke him to be foolish and dull wytted. Moreouer, there is so much diuersitie betwene Britannia and Brutus, that it seemeth against reason that the one should proceede of the other. For if Brutus had bene the first gener of the name to thys Isle, he would haue called it Burtia rather then Britannia, which hath no maner of proportion nor Analogie with Brutus. But here (as I haue done before in the worde Albion) I will declare a reasonable cause of coniecture why this Isle was named Britannia. About .xxx. yeres hence it happened in Wilshire at Iupe Church about two Myles from Salisourie, as men digged to make a foundation, they found an holow stone couered with another stone, wherein they founde a Booke, hauing in it little aboue .xx. leaues (as they sayde) of berye thicke Uelume, wherein was something written: But when it was shewed to Priestes and Chanons which were there, they coulde not reade it. Wherefore after they had tossed it from one to another (by the meanes whereof it was torne) they did neglect and cast it aside. Long after a peece thereof happened to come to my hands: which notwithstanding it was all to rent and defaced, I shewed to M<sup>r</sup> Hayster Rycharde Pace, then chiefe Secretarie to King Henry the .viij. whercof he exceedingly reioyced. But bicause it was partly rent, and partly defaced and blurred with wet that had fallen out, he could not finde any one sentence perfite. Notwithstanding, after long beholding he shewed me, it seemed that the sayde booke conteyned some auncient Monuments of this Isle, and that he perceyued this worde Pritannia to be put for Britannia: but at that tyme he sayde no more vnto mee. Afterward I geuing much study and diligence to the reading of Histories, considering whereof this worde Britannia first came, finding that all the Isles in this parte of the Ocean, were called Britannia, after my first coniecture of Albion, remembryng the sayde wyrtynge, and by chaunce finding in Suydas that Pritannia in Greke, with a circumflected aspiracion, doth signifie Metalles, also reuenues belonging to the common treasure, I than conceived this opinion, that the Grekes flourishing in wisdom, prowesse, and experience of sayling, as I sayd before in Albion, and finding the Isles of the great Ocean full of ryche Metalles, as Tymme, Leade, Iron, Brasse, Copper, and in some places great store of Golde and Syluer, they called all those Isles by this generall name Pritannia, signifying the place, by that which came out of it, as one would saye he went to market when he went to Andwarpe warpe or Barow, or to the fayre, when he goeth to Sturbridge, or to his reuemies, when he goeth to anye place from whence his reuenues do come. And yet because this Isle excelled all the other in any condition, it was of some priuately called Albion, that is to say, moze happier or richer. Thus farre D. Cooper. And thus haue you his opinion and iudgement concerning the first name and habitation of this Realme. And nowe I will returne to the Historie of Brute where I left.

Champs.

¶ After that Brute had landed in this Isle as aforesayd, and that he had passed and searched throughout the land, & comming by the riuer of Chamis, for the great pleasure that he had in that Ryuer and pleasaunt Medowes adioyning to the same, began there to buylde a Citie in the remembraunce of the Citie of Troy lately ouerthrowne & rased, & named it Troynouant, which is as much to say as newe Troy: which name endured vntill the comming of Lud, who was king of Briteyn about a thousand and fortie yere after. And the sayd king Lud commaunded it to be called after his abone name Luddes Towne, which now by shortnesse of speche we call London, and the same was builded. iij. C. lvi. yere before Rome was builded, in the time of Heli the high priest of Iewrie.

Troynouant or London.

Rome.

¶ When Brute had thus builded his Citie, and saw that he was stablished in his Realme quietly: he then by the aduice of his Lordes, commaunded the sayd Isle and Countrie to be called as dyuerse Authoꝝ write, after his abone name Briteyn, and his people Britons, and so continued his reigne prosperously. In the which time he established many good lawes and ordinaunces, for the good government of his people. But after this, as in this stoy shall apere, this Realme was conquered and brought in subiection to Straungers dyuerse and sundrie tymes, as first after Brute to the Romaynes, then to the Saxons which conquered this land, & called it Anglia (as saith Polichronicon) eyther of Angli, that is to say, people of Saxony, or of the name of a Queene of this lande that was called Angela. And some also thinke it was called Anglia of Angulus, which is in English a Corner, for that it is but a Corner in respect of the mayne and continent land of the whole worlde. Then was it in subiection to the Danes, and lastly to the Normanes.

Briteyn.

¶ Now, when Brute as is aforesayde, had set this Realme of Briteyn in order, he as the superioꝝ Lord deuided it into three partes, and gaue the same to his three sonnes, as aforesayd. And vnto Locryne his eldest sonne, he gaue this Isle of Briteyn, the which after was called middle England, wherein he had built his Citie called Troynouant, with all the Countries therebnto adioyning, both East, West, and South. And because this part shoulde sounde somewhat toward the name of Locryne, it was called Loegria, or Logiers: and therefore the Welshmen call it in their language vnto this day Hoyer.

Cambria
now called Wales.

¶ To his second sonne Cambre, he gaue the Country of Wales, the which was first named after him Cambria. This in the East syde was sometyne departed from England by the Ryuer of Seuerne, as before is sayde. But now the Riuer named Dee at Chester departeth Englande and Wales on the Northsyde: and in the South, the Ryuer that is called Wyne, at the Castle of Stringlyng parteth the sayd Countryes.

¶ To the thirde sonne Albanact he gaue the North part of this Isle of Briteyn, and called the same Albion, or moze truely the sayd country tooke the name name of the thirde sonne, and was called Albania. This Country was after named Scotlande, and so is it called to this day, and it is deuided as S. Vide sayth, from Loegria or Logiers by two armes of the Sea, but they meete not. The East arme of these two beginneth about two myles from the Mynter of Eburcuring in the West syde of Denilton. The West arme of those twaine hath in the right syde (or sometyne had) a strong Citie named Aclind, which in the British tongue was named Clinstone, and standeth vpon the Ryuer named Clint, supposed of some to be that towne, which is called at this day Burgh on the Sandes, within. v. myle of Carlisle, where that famous Prince King Edward the first dyed, in his returne from Scotland. And of others it is iudged to be the Towne called Aldburgh in Yorkshire set on the Ryuer of Ouse, which runneth from thence to Yorke, the space of. xij. myles or thereabout.

Albion now called Scot-land.

Aclind.

Burgh.

¶ Thus when Brute had deuided this Isle of Briteyn, as before is the word in three partes, and geuen the same vnto hys three sonnes, and had holden the principallitie thereof noble by the terme of. xxiiij. yeres, he dyed and was buryed in London, then called Troynouant.

Locrinus, or Locryne the first and eldest sonne of Brute, was made King of Briteyn, next after the death of his father, in the yere of the worlde. M. D. viij. C. lxxv. In the tyme of the reigne of this Locryne, there was a certeyne Duke (who as the wyter of the Britons stoy sayth, was named Humber) who warred sore vpon Albanactus his brother, beyng the ruler of Albania, now called Scotland, and slue Albanact in plaine battaile. Howe be it, as some writers affirme, the sayde Duke was not at the tyme of his comming into Albania called Humber, but Hunys, or Hunnys, King of Hunes, or King of Scithya without any other addicion.

¶ This King as before is sayde, after he had thus subdued Albanactus, he helde the lande of Albania, vntill that Locryne with his brother Cambre gathered a great power of men of Armes together, and went against him, and by strength of the Britons chased and subdued the sayd Hunes so sharply, that many of them with theyꝝ King were drowned in a Riuer which departeth England and Scotland. And because vnto the wyter of the Stoy of Britons his name was declared to be Humber: therefore the sayde wyter sheweth that the Ryuer wherein the sayde Duke or Capitaine was drowned, tooke the first name of him, which name continueth yet to this day.

Gaufride

¶ Moreover, after the death of Brute his father, Locryne married with Gwendolocna the daughter of Cozyn, Nephew vnto the aforesayde Brute. And it so came to passe, that after the aforesayde victory had against the king of the Hunes, or of Scithya, as aforesayd, that Locryne fell in great phancy and loue with a faire Damoysell named Estrild, who was also the daughter of the aforesayde Humber, as the sayde Authoꝝ wyrteth, and Locryne kept her vnlawfully a certeyne tyme. Wherewith his wife Gwendolocna beyng sore discontent, excited her father and her friendes to make warre vpon the sayde Locryne her husbände, in the which warre Locryne was slaine, when Gaufride.

But because myne Authoz whom I here follovo dissenteth in manye things from Gaufride, witer of the British Hystorie, I haue thought good to recite also as briefly as I can, what the sayde Gaufride reporteth hereof, to the ende that the reader may vnderstande wherein they varie, and then vse his awne iudgement touching the truth of the matter: his wordes in effect are these. When the threc bethzen, Locrinus, Albanactus, and Camber, had of long time peaceably reigned every one in his awne dominion, at the length a certaine king of the Dunes named Humber, arriued with an armie in Albania, and geuing battaile vnto Albanact slue him, and thereby compelled the inhabitours of that Countrie to flie vnto Locryne for ayde and succour; the which thing when Locryne vnderstoode, he ioyning vnto him his brother Camber, and they both assembled together a power of all the warrelike yong men of their Countries, and met and encountered with the sayde king of the Dunes, about the water now called Humber, and in fine discomfited his host and put him to flight, and then pursued him so egerly that he was compelled to take the sayd water, wherewith he was drowned, and therefore was it after the name of the king there drowned called Humber. This done, he deuided the spoyle of the field among his Souldiours, reseruing nothing to himselfe, but such treasure as he founde in the Ships, saue that he kept also for his awne store thre goodly yong Damoselles of passing beutie. Of the which thre, the first of them named Castrildis, was the daughter of a certaine king of Almayn, whome with the other two, the sayde Humber had caried awaye with him from her father, after he had wasted and destroyed his lande. The which Castrildis so farre excelled in beutie, that none was then lightly found vnto her comparable, for her skin was so whyte that scarcely the fynest kinde of Iuorie that might be found, nor the Snowe lately fallen downe from the Clament, or the Lyllys did passe the same: For this cause Locryne being rauished with the sight of her, determined to marry her. The which when Corineus vnderstood, he was in a wonderfull chafe, because Locryne had promised him before to marry his daughter: he therefore taking his battaile Acre in his hande, went vnto the king and spake vnto him on this wise: Is this the rewarde that thou geuest me Sir King for so many woundes as I haue receyued in thy fathers seruice and quarell, all the time that he warred against straunge and vnknowne Nations, that thou I saye, forsaking my daughter intendest this to couple thy selfe in marriage with a damosell of a barbarous Nation? Be thou sure I will be aduenged vpon thee, so long as there remaineth any strength in this right hand of mine, which hath beene the death of so many Gyants in the Sea coastes of Tuscane. And when he had repeated these wordes twise or thrise together, he tooke by his Acre as though he would haue striken the king, but both their friends perceyuing that, ranne betweene them, so that there was no harme done. And so Corineus being pacified, compelled the other to accomplish his promise. Thus therefore came it to passe that Locryne married Corineus daughter called Gwendoloua: Howbeit, the singuler great loue and affection that he bare vnto the sayde Castrilde could not yett out of his minde & be forgotten, wherfore fore he made a Cane vnder the ground in the Citie of Troynouant and enclosed her therein, committing her vnto the custody of his most neere and fauourer friends: for standing in dread of Corineus he durst not vse her company openly, but as it is before sayde priuely and by stealth: in so much as he had the companie of her the space of vij. yeres full, and none knewe it, but a fewe of his verie familyer and faithfull friendes, for so often as he had access vnto her, he feyned that he would make a secret sacrifice to the Goddess of his countrie, and so he brought all men into a false beliefe causing them to thinke that it was so in deede as he sayd. But at the length it came so to passe that Estrild was great with childe and delyuered of a verie faire daughter, whom he named Habzen. At the same season also Gwendoloua was brought a bed of a man childe called Madan, which was committed to his Graundfather Corineus to be brought vp in those Artes that he was skilfull in. Afterwards, when in procelle of time Corineus was dead, Locryne put away his wife Gwendolyn, and caused Estrild to be crowned Quene. The which thing Gwendolyn being maruellous wroth withall, went into Cornewall, and assembling together the power of the youth of the country, began to disquiet Locryne and to warre vpon him. At the length they ioyned battaile and met together nere a Ryuer called Stooze, where the sayde Locryne was slaine with an Arrow. Then incontinent after his death, Gwendolyn folowing the raging passions of her fither, tooke vpon her the gouernement of this realme, commaunding Estrild with her daughter Habzen to be cast both hedlyng into the riuer Seuerne, called in English Seuerne. And further made a proclamation throughout all the whole realme of Briteyn, that the same water should be euermore called Habzen, after y<sup>e</sup> Haydens name, for so euen at this day is Seuerne called in the Welsh tongue. And this did she as one desirous to make thereby the name of the yong Hayden immortal, because she was her Housbands daughter: The same Gwendolyn reigned. xv. yeres after the death of Locryne, who reigned. x. yeres. At the length when she saw her sonne Madan was of a good stature and hable to gouerne himselfe, she caused him to be crowned king, being contented her selfe to leade the residue of her lyfe in her awne country of Cornewall. In this time David, of the Tribe of Benjamin being the sonne of Iesai, or Jesse, was both the Kinge and Prophete of almighty God after the death of Saul: For by the commaundement of almighty God he was annointed king of Israell by the Prophete Samuell, whome Saule (after the spirite of God had forsaken him) partly for enuy that David was so highly praysed of the Israelites, and partly fearing that he would defeate him of his kingdome, vexed with cotinuall persecution: during which tyme, David shewed many examles, both of Godly pacience, & also of loyall obedience toward his Prince. Insomuch as when Saul (by the prouidence of God) fell in his hands: he onely cut a peere of the hemme of his garmēt, in token that if he had listend at that present, he might haue slaine him, & for y<sup>e</sup> dede, afterward he greatly repented that he had bene so bold, as to cut off a pece of the garment of Saul, his souereigne Lord & King: notwithstanding y<sup>e</sup> he was his most grieuous enimie, and enery houre sought his death. This noble king reigned ouer Israell. xl. yeres, that is to say, he reigned ouer Iuda. vij. yeres, & ouer all Israell.

raell. xxxij. yere. He did that was right in the sight of God, and put his trust and confidence in the Lord God of Israell, so that before, nor after him, was not the lyke among the Kinges of Juda: He cleaued to the Lorde, and went not from his steppes, he obserued the commaundementes that the Lorde had geuen to Moses: Wherefore God bare witness of him, that he was a man according to his owne heart and desire: and to him God remued his promises, of the health and saluation that was to be looked for in Christ our Sauour: and for a more certeyntie thereof, Christ of the Prophetes is called the sonne of Dauid. And furthermore, Dauid himselfe by the inspiration of God in his Hymnes and Psalmes most manifestly prophecieth of the Conception, Birth, Life, Death, Resurrection, Ascension, & heauenly Kingdome of our Sauour Christ. Wherefore among the Prophetes and other holy men, his writings were had in great estimation, and of like auctoritie as were the writings of Moses. This noble king expelled out of Israell the Jebusites, and made Ierusalem his Citie: He vanquished the Philistines, and brought the Arke from the house of Aminadab to Ierusalem. Lanquet.

¶ But after all this, he forgat God and committed both murder, and adultery, but he most greuously repented the same, and called vpon God for mercy: but yet God did greuously punish him, neuertheless at the last he did behold his repentance, and forgave him, and restored him to the peaceable gouernement, not onely of all the Israelites, but also of all their borders, and made them all tributaries vnto Israell, and finally sent him a sonne by Bethsabe his Wife called Salomon, whom Dauid in the. xl. yere of his reigne assigned to take the charge and gouernance of the Kingdome of all Israell, and gaue vnto his sayde sonne Salomon a charge, that he shoulde buylde the Temple of God in Ierusalem, and gaue him also a plot and description howe he should buylde the same, and then he dyed. Swendoline ouerred Briteyn.

Swendolena, or Swendolynne the wife of Locryne as before is expressed, which was the daughter of Corineus Duke of Cornewall, did after the death of her Husbände, because her sonne was to yong, take vpon her the gouernement of Briteyn, and was by the common assent of all the Britons, made Ruler thereof. And hauing full possession of the same, she well and discretely ruled it to the quiet and contentation of her subiectes, and so she continued vntill such tyme as Madian her sonne came vnto his laboufull age. Madian, or Madian, the sonne of Locryne and Swendolynne, tooke on him the Gouernance of Briteyn at thys tyme, who (as some write of him) vsed great tyranny ouer his Britons. Notwithstanding, all or the most part agree, that he ruled the same. xl. yeres. At the ende of which terme, he being at disport on hunting, was of wyld Beastes or Wolues slaine or deuoured, and as Raynulphe of Chester sayth, he left after him two sonnes, the one called Memyricius, the other Manlius.

after the death of his father began to reigne as King ouer all Israell. And of him it is written in the. iij. Chapter and the. iij. booke of the Kinges, that he besought God to graunt him wisdom, which God gaue him in such abundance, that he excelled all that euer were before him, namely, in wisdom, policie, and good gouernance. And in the. iij. yere of his reigne, and. iij. Moneth called Zif, which some say is April, and some May, he began to buylde the Temple of God at Ierusalem, that is to say in the foure hundredth eightie yere after the Children of Israell departed out of Egypt. But in the ende, he forgat God and delighted in fleshy lustes and pleasures, he had seven hundredth wyues that were Queenes, and moreouer he had three hundredth Concubines that were straungers and Idolaters, and they turned his heart from God to Images, and Idolatry, so that his heart was not perfect with the Lorde his God, as his fathers was. And because Salomon would not turne to the Lord his God, therefore God sayde vnto him, that he would rent his Kingdome, but not in his tyme, but after his dayes. And Salomon reigned ouer Israell. xl. yere, and then dyed, and was buryed with his father in the Citie of Dauid, and after his death Jeroboam the seruant of Salomon reigned ouer x. Tribes of Israell, and Rehobam the Sonne of Salomon reigned but ouer two Tribes.

The fift Age

Memprius, or Memprius the eldest sonne of Madan, and his brother Manlius, after the death of their father, made great strife for the soueraigne dominion of this Realme of Briteyn: But at the last Memprius by treason, procured the death and destruction of his bother Manlius, and shortly after he tooke vpon him the sole gouernement of this Realme of Briteyn, who in the tyme of his reigne vled such crueltie, and tyranney towards his subiectes, that he endeuoured to make away almost al the nobles of his Countrie, and now thinking himselfe in rest, he waxed slouthfull and tooke pleasure in filthie and fleshly affections, and at length gaue himselfe wholly to Harlots and Concubines, and finally forsooke his lawfull wyfe, and exercised the act of filthie Sodomy, and so brought himselfe into the hatred of God and all his people. And on a tyme goyng on huntynge, when he had lost his people, he was destroyed of weolues, after he had reigned. xx. yeres, leauing after him a goodlye yongling begotten of his lawfull wyfe, named Ebranke.

In this tyme Roboham the sonne of Salomon, began to reigne onely ouer two Tribes of Israel, that is to say, the Tribe of Juda, and Benjamin, and he was the first that reigned in Israel, the Tribes being deuided, as apereth in the. xi. Chapter of the thirde booke of the kings. And the cause why the Tribes of Israel did forsake to be vnder the gouernance of Roboham, was for that he refused and despised the counsaile of the sage, graue, and auncient fathers which were counsailers to his father, and gaue credite to the phancies and opinions of yong men, among whom he had bene brought by wantonly: and in the ende none folowed the house of Dauid but Juda. For Benjamin was geuen vnto Nathan, the brother of Salomon, but nevertheless they saythfully ayded Juda, as often as they needed: and he dyed when he had reigned. xviij. yeres.

Auncient fathers & graue counsellors are to be honoured.

Ebranke the sonne of Memprius, was made ruler ouer this land of Briteyn, in the yere of the world two M. ix. He sent these daughters to Siluius, which was the. xj. king of Italy, or the. vij. king of Latynes, to the ende to haue them married to the blood of the Troyans.

This Ebranke was also a man of a comely stature, & of a great strength, and by his power and might he enlarged his dominion: in so much, that he boanne and occupied a great parte of Germania, by the ayde and helpe of the Latynes, and returned thence with great praye and ryches. After which returne he builded the Citie of Caerbranke, now called Yorke, which should be as sayth the Autho<sup>r</sup> of the booke named the flowres of stoyres, written in French in the. xxiiij. yere of the reigne of the sayde Ebranke, which account to follow, it should seeme that London was builded before Yorke. C. xl. yeres, supposing the Citie of London to be builded in the second yere of the reigne of Brute. In his saide Citie of Ebranke, hee made a Temple to Diana, and ordeyned an Archflampyn to gouerne the same, according to the labours of their Gods, or as we now call him an Archbysshop.

Also he builded in Albania or Scotland, the Citie and Castle of Maydens, the which now is called Edeborough, in the time that Roboham the sonne of Salomon reigned king of Israel. After which buildings finished and done, he with a great armie sayled into that part of Gallia, which now is called France, and subdued the Frenchmen, and a great parte of Germany and returned with great triumph and ryches. And when he had guyded this land of Briteyn nobly by the space of. lx. yeres, as most writers agree, he died and was buried at Caerbranke, or Yorke, leauing after him for his heyre his eldest sonne (as Gaufride sayth) named Brute Breneshield.

At this time Abia the sonne of Roboham, and the fourth king of the Jewes, was after his father king of Juda, and reigned threer yeres, he overcame Hieroboam in battaile. He had. xiiij. wyues, and of them he begat. xxij. sones and. xviij. daughters.

This time also Josaphat the .vij. King of the Jewes reigned next after Asa his father, and he reigned .xxv. yeres in Jerusalem, and followed the good steps of his forefathers: wherefore God blessed him with great abundance and riches. He ordeyned Judges in euerie Citie of Juda, and commaunded the Levites to reade the lawe of God vnto the people, that they might thereby learne to feare God.

Brute Greneshield the sonne of Ebrank was made gouernor ouer this land of Briteyn, and reigned .xij. yeres, and is buried at Caerbranke, or Yorke, leauing after him a sonne named Leyll, as sayth Fabian, Lanquet, and Bergamo. But Rastall and Carton saye that he reigned .xxx. yere.

Carlile.

Leyll, the sonne of Brute Greneshield, after the death of his father, tooke vpon him the kingdome of Briteyn, and ruled .xxv. yeres. This was a iust man and a louer of peace, and in his time he builded a Citie or Towne, which after his awne name, he named Caerleyll, now Carlile, in the which he builded a Temple, and therein placed a flamin, and after dyed and was buried in his aforesayde Towne. This Leyll left after him a sonne named Lud, or as some call him, Lud Hurdibras.

After him Jehoram the sonne of Josaphat the .viij. King of Juda reigned in Jerusalem: he walked in the wicked wayes of the kinges of Israell, as did the house of Achab, for the daughter of Achab was his wyfe, and he did that which displeased the Lord, and slue all his brethren: neuerthelesse, God would not destroy Juda, because of his promise made vnto Dauid, who promised that he would geue him a light in his children alwaye. And in his tyme Edom fell from vnder the hand of Juda and made them a king of their awne. And Jehoram reigned .xiiij. yeres, and then dyed, and was buried in the Citie of Dauid. 4. Reg. 8. 9.

Ochozias.

After Jehoram, Ochozias, or Ozias his sonne was the .ix. king of Juda, he was but .xxij. yere olde when he began to reigne, and he reigned but onely one yere. And in the ende, for yeelding to Idolatrie, hee was slaine by the people of Jehu king of Israell, the same murder being done at his commaundement.

Jehoas, or Joas the .xj. King of Juda, and the first of the house of Nathan, reigned .xl. yeres. In the .vij. yere of his age, he was proclaimed and appointed king, and Athalia his Grandmother was slaine as abouesayd. And as long as he folowed the good admonitions of Joiada the high priest, he prospered: But afterward, falling into Idolatrie and other wickednesse, he slue Zacharias the Prophet betwene the Temple and the aultare, for which deede God punished him by the Syrians, and after he was slaine in his bed by hys awne seruantes.

Lud Hurdibras, or Kathudibras, or as some wyte Rudibras, sonne of Leyll, began to reigne in Briteyn: And after he was stablithed in his kingdome, he appeased the great variance and discordes that sprang in his fathers tyme, and that beyng done, he then builded the towne of Caerkyu, which now is called Cantorbury: He builded also the Towne of Caerquen, now called Wynton or Wychester: And another towne called Mount Paladoure, now called Septon or Shaftesbury. In the time of the buylding of which towne of Septon, as affirmeth Gaufride, an Egle there spake certeyn wordes, the which he sayth he will not wyte nor declare for any certentye. And when he had ruled this land nobly by the space of .xxx. yeres, he dyed, and left behind him a sonne named Baldud or Bladud. But in very deede the sayde Gaufride was here deceyued, taking Aquila for the name of a birde called an Egle, which was the proper name of a man, that liued in the dayes of the aforesayd Lud Hurdibras, who by reason of the great knowledge and skill that hee had in the Judicialles of Astronomie, coude tell before of thinges to come, and therfore was in those dayes taken for a great Prophet, insomuche that when the same King was determined to builde Septon, or Shaftesbury, and had already layed the foundation of the walles, he desired the sayd Aquila, the Horoscope of the beginning of the said woork first considered, to shew his opinion touching the continuance and fortune of the same Towne: And therfore it is that many report how an Egle should then speake. This Aquila is of writers called Aquila Septonius, that is to say, Aquila of Shaftesbury. And of his diuinations and propheticies, there is further mention made in the .ix. booke and last Chapter of the sayd Gaufride.

In euery of these thre Townes, he buylded also a temple, and therein placed a flamin, which is a Bishop.

Gaufride.

Bladud, or Baldud, the sonne of Lud Hurdibras, after the death of his father reigned ouer Briteyn. This man as sayth Gaufride, Polichronicon, and others, was very well sene in the Mathematicallies, and in Negromancie, and by that Art he made the hoate Bathes in the Towne of Caerbadou, now called Bathe, the which Towne or Citie he also builded.

Bale.

John Bale in his booke of the famous writers of Briteyn, writeth of him in this wise: Bladud, surnamed the Magician the .x. king of the Britones, was sent in his youth to the famous citie of Athens in Greece, there to be instructed in Philosophie and the liberall Sciences. And when he had there studied a certaine time, hearing of the death of Lud Hurdibras his father, he returned home againe, bringing thence with him foure expert Masters in many Sciences, not thinking it meete that his Country should lack any lenger such singuler ornaments of learning as they were. These Philosophers as wyrteth Marlin, placed he at Staunforde in a verie pleasaunt soyle, soyle, and made schooles for them, to the intent they should there reade the lybetall sciences, where they had many tymes a great audience. He was a man very cunning and skilfull aswell in prophane sciences of the Gentiles, as in all wisdome and knowledg that the Grecians excelled in: But especially studious and singularly well seene was he in the Mathematicall artes and sciences, for the which cause, one of the Sibelles that liued in his tyme, hearing of the wonderfull fame that went of his name and doctrine, wrote and dedicated vnto him a booke of Prophecies, and foretellings of thinges to come.

 Some affirme that the same Bladud builded the Citie of Bathe, and therein made by a wonderfull arte certeyne hote Bathes, for the vse and commoditie of the people, which do remaine yet to this day, committing the conseruation thereof vnto the Goddesse Minerua, in whose honour he caused a Temple there to be erected, to the entent that beyng preserued by so mightie a God-desse should neuer faile, but continue for euer. They wrote also how that he read and taught Necromancie throughout all his Realme. But these things are verily as I suppose feined matters. Hetherto Bale. And it foloweth after in the same Authour: And when he had at the length prepared himselfe by Artinagique and Sorcery such winges as Dedalus made himself, he attempted to flye in the ayre in the presence of the people, in which attempt he fell downe hedlong vpon the Altare of Apollo, and so brused his body with the fall that he dyed thereof, when he had reigned. xxi. yeres, and was buried at Troynouant. John Harding in the first booke, and. xrb. Chapter of his story, sheweth that the schole or vniuersitie of Stamford aforesayd was forbidden by Austen the Monke, like as other vniuersities of this Realme were, vnder this pretence, that they mainteyned the Arrian and Pelagian heresies, the which his prohibition was the cause of the decay of the same vniuersities and therefore long after his tyme, there was no common professing of learning, but in great Monasteries or Abbeyes. But William of Malmesburye sayth, that the hote Bathes were made by the procurement of Julius Cesar Emperour, hee dyed and was buryed at Troynouant, when hee had ruled Briteyn by the space of. xx. yeres, leauing after him a sonne named Leyr.

Leyr.

Amasia the sonne of Joas was after his father King of Iuda, and reigned in the tyme that Joas the sonne of Joacham was King of Israell. In the beginning he gouerned very well, but yet he did not ouerthrow the hill Altars where they sacrificed to their Idols, and therefore when he had reigned xxix yeres, hee was of his awne people slaine.

Leyr the sonne of Bladud, or Baldud, after the death of his father, was made ruler ouer the Britons. This Leyr was of noble condicions, and guyded his land and subiectes in great wealth and quietnesse, he made the Towne of Caerleir now called Leycester. And albeit that this man reigned long ouer Briteyn, yet is there no notable thing worthe of memory written of him, except as Gaufride sayth, that he had by his wife three daughters and no sonne, and the daughters were named Gonozilla, Ragan, and Cordeilla, the which he loued much, but most specially hee loued the yon-gest, Cordeilla by name.

When this Leyr, or Leyth, after some writers, was fallen into competent

petent age, being desirous to know the minde of his thre daughters, he first demaunded of Gonozilla the eldest how well she loued him: the which calling her Goddes to record, sayde, she loued him more then her owne soule. With this answere, the father being well contented, demaunded of Ragan the second daughter, how well she loued him: To whome she answered, and affirming with great othes, sayde, that she coulde not with her tongue expresse the great loue she bare to him: and added further, that she loued him aboue all creatures. After these pleasaunt answers had of those two daughters, he called befoze him Cordeilla the yongest: who vnderstanding the dissimulation of her two sisters and entending to proue her father, sayde: Most reuerende father, where my two sisters haue dissimuled with thee, and vttered their pleasaunt wordes fruitlesse, I knowing the great loue and fatherly zeale, that thou euer hast borne toward me (for the which I may not speake vnto thee otherwise then my conscience leadeth me) therefore I saye to thee father, I haue euer loued thee as my father, and shall continually while I liue, loue thee as my naturall father. And if thou wilt be further inquisitiue of the loue that I beare thee: As thy ryches and substance is, so much art thou woorth, and so much and no more doe I loue thee.

Gonorilla.

Ragan.

Cordeilla.

The father with this answer being discontent, married his two eldes-daughters, the one vnto the Duke of Cornewale, and the other vnto the Duke of Albania, or Scotlande, and deuided with them two in marriage his lande of Briteyn after his death, and the one halfe in hande during his naturall life. And for his thirde daughter Cordeilla he reserued nothing.

It so fortun'd after, that Alganippus, which the English Chronicle na-meth Alganip king of France, heard of the bewtie and womanhood of Cor-deilla, he sent vnto her father and asked her in marriage. To whome it was answered, that the king would gladly gene vnto him his daughter, but for Dowar, hee would not depart with, for he had promised all vnto his other two daughters.

Alganippus or Alganip King of France.

Alganippus, by his Messengers beyng thus enformed, remembering the vertues of the afozenamed Cordeilla, did without promise of Dowar, take the sayde Cordeilla to his wyfe.

But here is to be noted, that where this Alganippus or Alganip is called in diuers Chronicles the king of Fraunce, it can not agree with other histories, nor with the Chronicles of Fraunce. For it is testified by Reynulph of Chester, and by Peter Dictaniens, by Robert Gargwyne, by Bishop Anthony, and many other Chronicles that long after this tyme there was no king of France, neyther was it long after called France: But at this day the inhabitants thereof were called Galli, and afterwards were tributaries to Rome without hauing any king, till the time of Valentinianus Emperour of Rome, as hereafter in this worke shall be plainely shewed.

Galli.

The story of the Britons sayeth, that in the time that Leyr reigned in Briteyn, the land of Fraunce was vnder. xii. kings, of the which, Alganippus should be one, the which sayng, is full vnlke to be true, and the same maye be proued many wayes, but I passe ouer, for that it is not my purpose to vse any speciall discourse of the kings of Fraunce.

Then it followeth in the History, when Leyr was fallen into age, the aforesayd two Dukes, thinking long befoze the Lordship of Briteyn fell into their handes, arose against their father (as Gaufride sayth) and spoyled him of the gouernance therof vpon certayne condicions to be continued for terme of lyfe, the which in proesse of tyme were minished, as well by Maglanus as by Henninus houbands of the afozenamed Honorild and Ragan: But that most displeased Leyr, was the unkindnesse of his two daughters considering their wordes to him before spoken and sworne, and now found and proved them all contrary.

For the which he being by necessitie constrained, fled his land, and sayled into Gallia for to be comforted of his yongest daughter Cordeilla. Whereof she hauing knowledge, of naturall kindnesse comforted him: And after shewing all the matter to her Husband, by his agreement, receyued him and his to her Lordes Court, where he was cherished after her best maner.

Long it were to shew vnto you the circumstance of the bitterance of the unkindnesse of his two daughters, and of the wordes of comfort geuen to him by Aganippus and Cordeilla, or of the counsaile or purueyance made by the sayde Aganippus and his Lordes, for the restoring againe of Leyr to his dominion: But finally, he was by the helpe of the sayde Aganippus restored againe to the gouernement of the Realme of Briteyn, and possessed and ruled the same as Governour therof, by the space of three yeres after. In which season dyed Aganippus. And when this Leyr had ruled this land by the terme of xl. yeres, as diuerse do affirme, he died and was buryed at his awne towne Caerleyr or Leycestre, leauing after him for to inherite the lande, his daughter Cordeilla.

This tyme Ozias, or Azarias, the sonne of Amasias, reigned king after his father ouer Iuda, and he reigned. Lij. yeres, and towarde the ende of his reigne he began to ware proude, and would haue vsurped the Priestes office, wherfore he was stricken with a leprosie, and dyed. 2. Paral. ij.

Cordeilla, the yongest daughter of Leyr, was by the assent of the Britons made Queene of Briteyn, and she guyded the land full wisely by the terme and space of. v. whole yeres. The which tyme expired, her two Nephewes Morgan and Cunedagius sonnes of her two sisters, came vpon her land, and made therein great waste and destruction, and at the last tooke and cast her into a strong Prison, where she beyng in dispaire of the recovery of her estate (as sayth Gaufride) slue her selfe.

Cunedagius, and Morganus, Nephewes as aforesaide of Cordeilla, deuided this land of Briteyn betwene them: That is to say, the Countrey ouer and beyond Humber towarde Catnesly, fell to Morgan, and the other part of y land toward the West (as sayth Gaufride) fel to Cunedagius.

After two yeres ended, some Pykethankes and Flaterers came vnto Morgan and sayde, that to him it was great reproche and dishonor (considering that he was come of Honorilla the elder sister, and of Maglanus her Husband: And Cunedagius was descended of Ragan the yonger sister, and Henninus her Husband) that he had not the rule of all the land, to which lewde persons Morgan geuing credence, was enflamed with pryde and couetousnesse, and anone by theyr counsaile, assembled a great host, and made warre vpon his Cosyn, brenning and destroyng his land without mercy. Whereof Cunedag

Cunedag being ware, in all haste gathered his people: And after a certeyne message sent by him for reconciliation, seeing that there was no peace to be made, but the same must be determined by dynt of sword, and the iudgement of battayle, he met with his Cosyn in plaine fielde: where the Goddes were to him so fauourable, that he slue many of the people of his sayde Cosyn, and at the length compelled him to flee. After which victorie thus had, he pursued Morgan from Country to Country, vntill he came within the Province or Country of Wales, in the which the sayd Morgan gaue vnto the sayd Cunedag another Battayle: But for that he was farre the weaker, he was there ouerthrowen, and slaine in the fielde. Which fielde or Country where the said Morgan fought, and was slaine, is to this day called Glamargan, which is as much to say, as Morgans land. And thus was Morgan slaine, when he had reigned with his Nephew two yeres.

I Datham the sonne of Ozias, or Azarias was after his father king of Iuda, and when he began to reigne, he was. xxx. yere olde, and reigned. vij. yere. He was a good Man, and one that feared God, and obeyed his commaundementes, but he did not breake downe the hill aultares, that were set vp to sacrifice vnto Idoles.

Riuallus or Riuallo the sonne of Cunedagius, was after his father ruler ouer Briteyn, and he ruled with great sobernesse and kept the lande in great wealth and prosperitie: Albeit that of him is left no speciall memory of anye notable act done in his tyme, except that (as Gaufride sayth) it rained blood in his tyme by the space of three dayes continually within the land of Briteyn. After the which raine ensued a great an exceeding number and multitude of flies, the which were so noysome and contagious that they slue many people. And after (as sayth an olde Authour) ensued great sicknesse and mortalitie, to the great desolation of this land.

Then it foloweth in the history: that when this Riuallo had reigned after most wyrters xlj. yeres, he dyed and was buried at Yorke, leauing after him a sonne, named Gurgustus. And in this time the Citie of Rome was greatly enlarged and encreased by Romulus, or after the minde of Fabian and others first builded.

Chas the sonne of Jonathan was after his father king of Iuda, he was xxx. yere olde when he beganne to reigne, and he reigned. xxx. yeres in Jerusalem, he folowed the wicked wayes of the kings of Israell.

Ezechias the sonne of Ahas was after the death of his father king of Iuda, and reigned. xxxix. yeres in Jerusalem, he loued, feared, and serued the Lorde, and was a Prince, iust, verteous, and religious, he was diligent in the obseruing and keeping of the commaundements of almighty God, and there was not found in any of the kings that reigned before him no defect vnto him, lyke vnto him in bountie and vertue: He brake the Brasen Serpent and restored againe the true honouring of God.

Manasses the sonne of Ezechias was after his father king of Iuda, and he reigned. lb. yeres in Jerusalem, he was a very euill Man, and wrought much wickednesse in Iuda, he set vp Idols and worshipped them, he defiled the Temple, and sacrificed his children vnto the Goddes, he filled Jerusalem with the blood of Innocents, he despised the admonitions of the Prophets,

He also repayed the walles of the holy Citie of Jerusalem, and ordeyned Garrisons in all his Cities. Lanquet.

Gurgustus the sonne of the afozenamed Riuallus was made Ruler of Briteyn after the death of his father. And this man in the Englishe Chronicle is named Gorboduan the sonne of Reignold, of whom there is small mencion made eyther of his reigne, or of any notable dedes done in his tyme, except that the aforesayde Authoz doth witnesse, that he reigned xxxviij. yerres: leauing after him none heyre of his body begotten, and lastly dyed and was buried by his father at the Citie of Caerbzank, other wise called Pozke.

Sillus, or after some wyters, Siluius the brother of Gurgustus (as sayth the English Chronicle) was made ruler ouer Briteyn, and reigned as sayth Lanquet. xliij. yerres, and was buried at Caerbadon or Bathe, and left after him none heyre of his body.

Amon or Ammon the sonne of Manasses was king of Juda, and reigned two yerres, and his owne seruantes conspired against him and slue him in his awne house.

Josias the sonne of Amon, was after his father king of Juda, and he reigned in Jerusalem. xxxi. yerres, he was a good man and feared God, and obeyed his commaundements, and walked in the good wayes of king Dauid, without declyning eyther to the lefte hande or to the right. He purged his lande from all Idols, Images, and Woodes, and burned the bones of the Priestes of Baall, and densed all wickednesse out of the Cities of Manasse, Ephraim, Simeon, and euen vnto Nepthalim: he repayed the Temple, that the holy thinges might be couered. The Booke of the lawe of Moses which had bene lost of a long tyme, was found againe by his meanes, which he caused to be read vnto the people. Finally, vpon to much presumption, he made warre vpon the king of Egypt, where he was wounded and dyed thereof. 4. Reg. 23.

Jachas the second sonne of Josias, was after his father king of Juda, and reigned onely three Monethes, and was taken and brought captiue into Egypt, in whose place his brother Joachun was made king, and reigned. xi. yerres, an insolent and naughtie Prince, who not regarding the prophecies of Jeremie, burnt the bookes thereof, and was at the last slaine, and left vnburied as a Beast.

Lago or Lago, the Coyne of Gurgustus (as sayeth Gaufrid) as next heyre was made gouernour of Briteyn. Of this man also the wyters make small mencion, eyther for the quietnesse of the tyme, or else for the the rudenesse of his dedes, he reigned. xviij. yerres and dyed without issue and was buried at Pozke.

Jachin called also Jechonias reigned ouer Juda thre Monthes, and. x. dayes, he yeelded himselfe wyllingly vnto Nabuchodonosor, by the counsaile of Jeremie: who sent him to Babilon, with all the Noble men and ornaments and Jewels: among whome also was the Prophet Ezechiel.

Josias the fourth sonne of Josias to take vpon him the rule of Juda, and made him sweare by the name of the Lorde that he shoulde saythfully serue the Chaldeys, in token whereof he named him Zedechias, he was the. xxiiij. and last king of the Jewes, and reigned. xi. yerres. This Zedechias brake his amitie with the king of Babilon, and entered into league with the Egyptians. For which cause Nabuchodonosor returned and besieged Jerusalem by the space of one yere. viij. Monthes, and. v. dayes. After which siege, the holy Citie with the most sacred Temple, miserably with pestilence, famine, sword and fyre, was destroyed. The king himselfe with all his Nobilitie taken, his children slaine before his face, his eyes pulled out and sente into captiuitie to Babilon. ij. Para. xxxviij. Chapt.

Thus was the whole Nation of the Jewes without respect eyther of Age or kinde, eyther slaine or brought into Babilons bondage for their obstinacie against God and his Prophets, and for the sinne and transgression of their kings, Priestes, and all the people, the yere after the vniuersall flood. Kinimacus the sonne of Sifillus, as some wyrters haue, but more truly as sayth the olde Chronicle, the brother of Lago, was made ruler of Briteyn, as his brother before him was, and passed his tyme without any notable actes or deedes, so that of him there is no more memozye than is of his brother. For the most of them that write the feates and deedes of the Britons, make but a short reherisall of these five kings, that is to say, from Riuallo to Gorbodug, sayng that after Riuallo succeeded Gurgustus, after him Lago, and after Lago, Kinimacus, and after Kinimacus succeeded Gorbodug. Of these five kinges is made little other mention. Then it follooweth in the olde Chronicle, that when Kinimacus had reigned. Liii. yeres, he died, and was buryed at Porke: leauing after him a sonne named Gorbodug.

In this tyme was that most noble Prophet Daniell, and he flourisheth in Babilon. And in his youth by his wisdome, he deliuered Susanna from death, and he expounded the dreames of Nabuchodonosor: And finally, he was cast into a denne among hungry Lions, where by the power of God he was preferred from harme. Afterwarde he prophesied both of the coming of Christ, and also of the Empires of Babilon, Media, Persia, Grecia, and the Romaynes.

The Scots as their Chronicles shew, did at this time first inhabit Scotland, land where they liued long tyme vnder sundry Capitaines, as they call them, untill the tyme of Fergus, sonne of Ferquard, King of Irelande, who ayded the Scottes against the Pichtes, and was the first king of Scottes, as they say.

England habitid before Scottes as the Scottish Cronicle doth accompt 528. yere.

Gorbodug succeeded his father Kinimacus, in this Realme of Briteyn, and by most wyrters he reigned. lxiij. yeres, and then dyed, and was buryed at London, which then was called Troinouant, and left behind him two sonnes, named Ferrer, and Porrer, but some call them Ferrus, and Porreus.

In this tyme Barachias, called also Zorobabell, Nephew to Joachim, and Jelas the high Priest, with. xlv. thousand, three hundred, three score and ten Jewes, were deliuered free from Babilon by Cyrus, and returned into their awne land: where they repayed againe their Citie, and cast the foundation of their Temple, renewed their labours and Sacrifices, albeit they were sometyme let by their borderers. .i. And in the yere of the worlde 3446. the Temple was cleane finished, and with great ioy dedicated againe unto the Lorde, wherin they offerred their Sacrifices, and celebrated theyr Phase, or feast of Passouer, in geuing of thanks to God which had turned the heart of Darius vnto them.

Ferrer and Porrer his brother, Sonnes of Gorbodug reigned ouer this Realme of Briteyn, and continued in amitie a certain tyme. After which tyme expired, as sayth Reynulph and Gaufrid: Porrer being covetous of Lordship gathered his people together vnknowne to his brother Ferrer, intending to destroy him. wherof he being warned, for lack of space to assemble his people for sauegarde of his lyfe, fled sodainly into Gallia or France, and prayed ayde of a Duke of Gallia named by Gaufrid, Marhardus or Suardus, the which Duke ayded him, and sent him againe into Briteyn with his host of Gallis. After whose landing, his brother Porrer with his Britons met him, and gaue to him Battaille, in the which battaille Ferrer was slaine, with the more parte of his people. But here some wyrters write that Porrer was slaine and Ferrer suruyued. But whether of them both was lying, han did the mother of the same two brethren named, Widen, setting a parte all motherly pittie, with the helpe of her women, most cruelly murdered, in the night season in his sleepe, and cut him in pieces. And thus ended the aforesayde two brethren, after they had reigned in Briteyn in warre and peace. v. yeres. And here endeth the lyne or offspring of Britte, after the opinion of most wyrters, for as Gaufrid sayth, after the death of these two brethren, great discorde arose among the Britons, the which continued long among them, by meane wherof the people were forebered and rayped vnder. v. Kinges, whose names I finde in an olde Bedegge to be Rudaneus, that was King of Wales, Clotemis King of Cornewall, Plamor King of Loegria, Scaterius King of Scotlande, Ysaac King of Northberlande. And as sayth Guydo de Columna the Britons abhorred the bylage of Gorbodug, for so much as first the one slue the other, and chiefly for the vnnaturall disposition of the mother, that so cruelly slue her awne child. The English Chronicle sayth, that after the death of the two forrenamed brethren, then, no rightfull inheritor was left on lyue, wherefore the people were brought into great discorde, insonuch that the lande was deuided into foure partes. So that in Albania was one ruler, in Loegria another, in Cambria the third, and in Cornewall the fourth. But of these foure Rulers, the English Chronicle alloweth Cloten Duke of Cornewall, for most rightfull heyre.

Raynulphe of Chester sayth, that after the death of the sayde brethren, great discorde was in this lande vnder the gouernement of .v. kinges, but he neyther reherfeth their names nor the times of their reignes, saying that he sayth that the discorde continued vnto the coming of Mulmucius Dunwallo. So that here appereth no time certaine, howe long this discorde and variance among the Britons continued, but who so lust to looke in Fabian, in a draught by him drawne, in the beginning of his Chronicle, shall there finde that it continued nere to the terme of .Lj. yeres.

About this time Eldas, by the lycence of Artaxerxes came from Babilon to Jerusalem with .xviij. C. .lxxv. Jewes, to repaire the lawe and Citie of God, and to teache the people: for he gathered and brought in order the bookes of the holy Scripture, before scattered and destroyed, and inuented the same Hebrew Charectes which are used at this day.

And here also I finde noted by Lanquet, that at this time began the computation of the .lxx. weekes of Daniell, euery wecke conteyning .vij. yere, which finisheth at the death of Tiberius, after whome Caius caused his Image to be set in the Temple, vnder the name of great Jupiter.

Mulmucius or Moluntius Dunwallo, the sonne of Cloten, banquished the other Dukes or rulers, and reigned himselfe ouer Briteyn. This man ruled Nobly and builded a house in the Citie of Troynouant now called London, which house as some suppose is now called Blackwell Hall. Also he made many good lawes, the which long after were called Mulmucius lawes. These lawes Gildas translated with great diligence out of the Britische speche into Latyn. And long time after, Aluredus or Alured king of England turned the same out of Latyn into English, or the Saxon tongue. He also gaue priuilege to Temples, to Ploughes and Cities, and to the wayes leading to the same. Wherby as Raynulphe sayth, all such malefactours as fled vnto them for succour and sauegarde of themselves, might not be emperched nor molested any maner of wayes of their enemies, so that had a man done neuer so much harme (as Carton reporteth in his story) if he might once come into the Temple, it was not lawfull for any to mistreate him, and lykewise he shoulde bee suffered therein to go safe and in peace, and afterward go into what Country he would without any harme. And if any man fortun'd to set any violent hand vpon him, he then shoulde leese his lyfe. And as some Authours affirme, he began the foure highe wayes of Briteyn, the which was finished and priuileged also by Belinus his sonne, as after shall be declared. The olde Chronicle testifieth that this Mulmucius, whom he nameth Moll and Carton Douebant made the two Colonies of Malmesbury and Wyres. And many other wyrters affirme that after he had stablished himselfe in this land, and set his Britons in good order, he by the aduise of his Lordes ordeyned him a Crowne or Diademe of Golde, and caused himselfe to be crobored with great solempnitie after the vsaunce of the Dagan

Mulmucius first king of Briteyn made a waye of Daganlabo. And for this cause, after the opinion of some wyrters, he was called the first king of Briteyn. And all the other before reherfed were called Rulers, Dukes, or Gouernours. Of the same Mulmucius it is further written by John Bale Doctour and others, that he was a great fauourer and supporter of all learned men, and that by him was restored to the auncient trade and maner, the science of Chiuallrie, wonderfully decayed before his tyme, and in maner cleane extinguisht.

Finally, when he had guided the lande well and nobly the space of .xl. yeres, he dyed, and was buried in Troynouant, now called London, leauing after him two sonnes, the one named Belinus, the other Brennus.

Belinus and Brennus the two sonnes of Mulmucius, began to reigne ioynntly as kinges of Briteyn: and Belyne held Loegria or Logiers, which is that part that we now call England, Wales, and Cornewall. And Brennus had all the land beyond Humber, with the which partitione eche of them held himselfe well contented, and so was the Realme of Briteyn peaceably gouerned betwixt them, the space of .v. yeres, as Polichronica sayth, and in this meane tyme Brennus builded the Citie of Bristow. After which tyme, the sayde Brennus entending to haue more lande or all, arose against his brother Belyne, and made vpon him sharpe and mortall warre. In the which warre Brennus was ouerset and compelled to fle the lande, and to sayle to Armorica, now named little Briteyn, but as Raynulphe and Gaufride sayth, he went into Norway, and there married the daughter of Elfinge or Elfyng which then was Duke of Norway. When this was shewed vnto Belyne, he considering the sodaine departing of his brother: did in all the hast first lease Albania, and al the other land that belonged to Brenne into his atone hand, and fortified the Cities thereof and other strong places, with his atone Garisons and Souldiours. Wherof when Brenne was aduertised, he in all possible hast assembled a great armie of people of the Norwayes, and tooke his shipping to sayle into Briteyn. And as he was keeping his course vpon the sea, he was encountred with Guithdacus king of Denmarke the which had lye in awaite for him, for loue of a Damself that he had married, which before tyme was promised vnto the saide Guithdacus by the saide Elfinge her father. When these two Princes were met, strong shot and fight was vpon both parties: but finally the Danes overcame the Norwayes, and tooke the Ship by strength, wherein the yong Damself was, who was quickly brought vnto the Ship of Guithdake. And so in fine Brenne with a fewe of his Shippes left, was faine to prouide for his atone safetie by flight.

When Guithdake had thus obteyned the victory, he entending to haue sayled toward Denmarke, the tempestes were so great, and wind so contrary, that he was enforced to land in Northumberland, where at that tyme was Belyne making of preparation of defence against his brothers coming. But when word was brought vnto Belyne, of the landing of the king of Denmarke with a smal company he reioyced at it, and commaunded him with his Shippes and company to be put in sure holde and keeping.

It was not long after, but Brenne had newly rygged and victualled his Shippes, and hearing of the arriual of Guithdacus in Northumberland with

with his wyfe, sent woordes of manace vnto his brother Belyne, willing him to send vnto him his wyfe, wrongfully rauished and deteyned by Guilthdacus king of Denmarke, and also to restore him to his Patrionomy, or else he would shortly inuade his lande, the same for to waste, and as his enemy to destroye. The which request was of Belyne plainly and shortly denied. Wherof when Brenne had knowledge, he shortly after landed in a part of Albania, & made towarde his brother, and his brother towards him: so that their hostes met nere vnto a Wood, named the Calatere, where betuene them was a mortall and terrible battayle, insonuch, that much people were slaine vpon both parties: But in the ende the Britons wan the fielde, and chased the Norwages vnto their Shippes. And as Gaufride sayth, the fight was so cruell & sharpe, that there were of both sydes slaine, to the number of .xl. M. men.

¶ Belinus hauing obteyned this great victory ouer his enemies, after thanks and oblations made vnto his Goddes, after the maner of the Pagan lawe: he then assembled his Lordes at Porke, and there tooke their aduice what he should do with the King of Denmarke. In the which counsaile it was concluded, that the aforesayde Guilthdacus should holde and do homage to the king of Briteyn for the land of Denmarke, and yerely pay vnto him a thousand pound for a tribute: which beyng done with suretie and hostages, the sayd Guilthdacus with his woman, was set at libertie, and returned into his awne Country.

¶ Now when Belyne had by this victorie possessed the quiet state of this Realme, he confirmed the lawes made before by his father, and did ordeine that iustice was ministred throughout the lande. And wher the foure wayes begon by his father were not perfighted and ended: He therfore called workmen and set them to paue the same with stone, that they might the better bee knowen to all traauylers.

¶ The first of these foure wayes was named Fosse, the which stretcheth out of the South, into the North, & began at that tyme at Cotnesse in Cornewall, and passed forth by Devonshire, Somersetshire, and so forth by Cutbury vpon Coffeswolde besyde Couentry vnto Leycester, and from thence by wyld playnes toward Newarke, and endeth at the Citie of Lincolne.

¶ The seconde way was named VVaelingstreete, the which stretcheth ouer what the waies of Fosse, out of the Southeast, into the Northeast. This began at Douer, and passeth by the middle of Kent ouer Chamts beside London, by west of Welminster, and so forth by S. Albones, in the west syde of Dunstable, of Stratford, of Touceter, & of Wedon: by South Killingbourn, by Atherstone, and then passeth besides Bewdley ouer Senerne vnto Gilbertes hill, that now is called the Wrekyn, and so forth vnto Stratton to the middle of Wales vnto a place called Cardican at the Irish Sea.

¶ The thirde way was named Ermingstreete, the which stretcheth out of the West, Northwest, vnto the East Southeast, & beginneth at S. Davids in west Wales, and so stretcheth forth vnto Southampton.

¶ The fourth and last way is called Kyleseldes streete, the which stretcheth forth by Worcester, by Naycombe, by Birmyngham, by Lichfelde, by Darby, by Chesserfelde, by Porke, and so forth vnto Tynmouth, the which were were sufficiently made. And he graunted and confirmed vnto them, all such priuileges as before were granted by Dunwalio his father. The which priuileges with other lawes by him made, such as are desirous to knowe, let them reade the translation of Gildas, made of Adulmucius lawes, out of Britishe speech vnto latine, and there he shall see the whole.

¶ While Belyne was thus occupied, his brother Brenne beyng as aforesayd in a prouince of Gallia, taking his expulsion very grienouly, and beyng without comfort to attayne to his former dignitie, at the last resorted (being accompanied onely with .xij. persons) vnto the Duke or ruler of that Prouince or Country.

¶ For ye shall vnderstande, that in those dayes (as sayeth Eutropius and other wyters) the Gallis occupied diuers Countries. And therefore Titus Linius wrote the histories of the Romaynes, made distinction of the Gallis, and nameth them that Brenne lead when he besieged Rome, and afterwards the Capitoll Senones Galli, of whome the Citie of Sene in Tuscayne tooke name, because (as testifieth the Authoz of Chronica Chronicarum, and other) it was first builded of the aforesayd Galles in the tyme of Brenne being there Duke and leader before the comming of Christ. CCC. lxxx. yeres. And for this cause the Senenses are of the aforesayde wyters reckened also among the Galles.

¶ Now when Brenne was comen to the Duke, whome Gaufride calleth Signinus Duke of Alebrog, the which is to be vnderstande the Duke of Armorica, now called little Briteyn, as Reynulph doth plainely declare, and that he had opened vnto him all his griefe and trouble: the sayde Duke receyued him into his Courte with all curtesie and gentlenesse. And for that he was a personable & of gentle nature furnished with all that belonged to a Gentleman, he within a short tyme after was had in great estimatiō before any other that appertained to his Court. By reason wherof at the last he fell in loue with his daughter, and in the ende married her vpon condicion that if he dyed without issue Male, that he then should be ruler of that Countrie, and if it happened him to haue an heyre Male, that then yet notwithstanding, to ayde and helpe him to recouer his land lost.

¶ The which condicions well and surely vpon the Dukes partie, by the assent of the Nobles of his land were assured. And the sayde Duke within lesse then one yere following dyed. After whose death, when by a conuenient tyme, it was knowne that the Duchesse his wife was not with childe, all the Lordes of the land did their homage to Brenne. To the which Lordes, the more to winne their loue, he departed much of his treasure, and shortly after with their assent gathered a great armie, and so in all haste sayled into Briteyn to make new warre vpon his brother Belyne, and after a little tyme landed there. Of whose landing when Belyne was informed, he in all haste gathered his Britons together in great number & made towarde Brennus, as to his mortall enimie. But the mother of the two brethren, named Conwenna, or after the English booke Conwey, considering the mortall hatred betuene her two children, of a motherly pitie went betuene her two sonnes, and bled her selfe so wisely and discretely, that at length she agreed them. After which agreement, both the brethren with their Lordes and friendes sped them vnto Troynouant, or London, and there after many things done and ordered ordered for the weale of the lande, they agreed to leade both their hostes into Gallia for to subdue to them the sayde Countrie. And in as goodly haste as they might prepare for the iourney, they tooke shipping and so sayled into a part of Gallia, brenning and waisting the Countrie without all pittie. And as sayth Gaufrid, they in short time subdued a great parte of Gallia, Italy, and Germany.

¶ Here Gaufrid doth vary from Eutropius, Titus Linius, and other the writers of the Romaine Histories, for where Gaufrid sayeth that at suche time as Belyn and Brenne made warre in Italy, Gabius and Porfena were the Consules of Rome, that sayng differeth farre from other. For as they affirme, at the time when Brenne besieged Rome, Claudius Emilius, and Lucius Lucretius were Consules, & Furius Camill' was at that time Dictator of Rome, and none lyke vnto the other were Consules many yeres before nor after.

¶ But truth it is, that the sayde two brethren did many great actes in the afozenamed Countries, but not all agreeable with the sayng of Gaufrid. For where he referreth all those deedes to both brethren, the afozenamed Titus Linius speaketh but of Brenne, as hereafter shall appere. Now when Belyn had remained a certeyne of time with his brother Brenne in those partes, by agreement of them both, Belyn returned into Briteyn, & Brenne remayned behinde.

¶ When Belyn was returned into Briteyn, he repayred certaine olde Cities and builded vpon the Riuer of Uske a Citie, and called it Caerufke, nere vnto the Riuer of Seuerne. This Citie was after named the Citie of Legions because the Legions of the Romaines were lodged in the same Citie, and now it is called Caerleon, which in the time of king Arthur was an Vniuersitie and had in it two hundred Philosophers, as Gaufrid writech, which being well learned in Astronomie and other Sciences, diligently obserued the courses of the starres, and by true and infallible reasons, shewed before what straunge and wonderfull things should that time happen vnto king Arthur.

¶ Also he builded in Troynouant an Haven, with a gate ouer the same, in the Dynacle or top whereof was a vessel of brasse, in the which was inclosed the Ashes of his brent body, when he was dead. This gate was long after called Belyns or Belynus gate, and at this day it is called Belyngsgate.

¶ While Belinus was thus occupied in Briteyn, his brother Brenne desirous to winne fame and honour, builded in Italy and in certeyn partes of Gallia certeyn Cities and Townes as foloweth.

¶ The which Cities and Townes were builded of the Galles, or at the least were new repayred in the time that Brenne was their Duke and leader, although some writers suppose that Comum, and Cremona were builded after Brenne was dead. Reynulph sayth, that the Senons, which he meaneth by the Galles dwelling about the Citie of Sena, by the leading of Brennus ouercame the Romaines. xj. Miles from Rome, at the Riuer Albia, and chased chaced them to Rome and tooke the Citie, and after layed siege to the Capitoll. And in a night while the warders of the Capitoll slept, the Frenchmen or Galles by a way vnder the earth came into the Capitoll and were lykely to haue wonne it. But a noble Romaine named Mallius or Manlius Torquatus, awoke by the crying and noyse of a Gander or Ganders. The which Manlius resisted the Galles, for which the Romaines long time after held a feast of Ganders the first day of June: Howbeit, afterward, it was called Junos feast, because they thought that Juno the Goddesse had by her influence geuen that grace vnto the Ganders, that they should by their noyse awake the Romaines. But yet the Galles or Frenchmen, helde the Romaines so shorte, that they were compelled to giue vnto Brenne their Duke a thousande pound weight of Golde, as sayeth Titus Linius, and he sayeth further that the Galles slue of the Senators of Rome a great many in number, whome they supposed to haue bene Goddes, because of the riche apparel that they sate in. But shortly after this, the afozenamed Furius Camillus, which was called againe from the Citie of Ardea, where he was outlawed before, and by the Commonalty of Rome in this distresse made againe Dictator, pursued Brenne and his people, and gaue to them battaile, and slue of them a great number, and wanne from them all the Golde and Jewels that before time the Galles had wonne of the Romaines. The which deede was done. CCC. lxxij. yeres before the comming of Christ.

¶ Now when Brenne was this discomfited of the Romaines, he turned his people toward the Macedones or Grekes, and deuided them into two hostes, whereof he reteyned the one with him, and the other he sent into a Countrie called then Gallacia, and after Gallogrecia, and lastly Galates. Then Brenne ouercame the Macedones, with their Duke Sofreme, and after spoyled their Goddes and their Temples, and sayde in myrth, riche Goddes must geue to men some of their riches. Also he spoyled the Temple of the God Appollo Delphicus, standing in the hill of the Mount Parnassus. Wherefore as sayth Politarpus, the people of that Countrie prayed to God for helpe, and sodainely the earth began to quake, and a great parte of the hill fell vpon the host of the Galles and slue them. And after that, there fell Hailestones of such greatnesse, that it slue another part of the host, and Duke Brennus was sore wounded, whereby he fell in such dispaire, that he slue himselfe with his awne sword.

¶ Now for as much as I haue here shewed you the ende of Brennus, I will now retorne to Belinus his brother, who as before is declared, busied himselfe in the guyding and ordering of his Realme and people of Briteyn, and in executing many notable deedes, like as he constituted and ordeyned three Archflamyns, whose Seas, were at London, Yorke, and Caerleon. And as Master Layland sayth, he buylded the Tower of London, and did many other notable things in his dayes, the which for length I ouerpasse: and finally he dyed and after the Dagan maner, was with great pompe buried and buried at Troynouant in London, when he had reigned with his brother and alone, after some writers. xxvj. yeres, leauing after him a sonne named Gurguinthus, or Gurguint Brabtruc, or after some wyrters Gurguint Barbaronge, which is to meane Gurguint with the red beard.

Gurguintus the sonne of Belyne, a Prince of great wisdom and sober-nesse and when time came succeeded his father, & reigned king of Briteyn. xix. yeres, who following his fathers steppes, loved both peace and iustice. This king forasmuch as the tribute that was graunted to his father by the king of Denmarke, was nowe denyed to bee payed, assembled a great army, and prepared a great flay, and sayled into Denmark, and there wasted & spoyled the Country with sword and fyre, in such wise, that at length the king of Denmarke, with the assent of his Baronage, graunted to pay and continue the aforesayde Tribute of a thousande pound yereley. Howbeit Gau-frid wyrteth, that he slue the sayde King in battaile. After which victoery thus had of the Danes, he with great triumph returned into Briteyn. And in keeping of his course, he encountered with a nauie of. xxx. sayle besyde the Isles of Orades full of Men and women, of which flote, the chiefe Capiteyn was called as most writers affirme, Bartholomew, & which when he was brought vnto the kinges presence, shewed that he with his people were put or exiled out of Spaine, and were named Balenges, and had sayled long time vpon the Sea, to the ende to finde some Prince that woould geue to them a dwelling place, and they to become his Subiectes, and to holde their lande of him, beseching the king to haue compassion vpon them, and to graunt to them some place to inhabite in, that they should no lenger dwell in their Shippes, considering their victuall was spent by reason of their long lyng vpon the Sea.
 After which request thus made by their Capitaine, the king with the aduice of his Barons, graunted to them a boyd and waste Countrie, which was and is the farthest Isle of al the Isles toward & west, the which, Isle as saith the English Chronycle, was then named Irelande, after the name of their Capi-teyn called as he wyrteth Irlamall. But who so will knowe the first cause of the naming of this Isle Ireland, let him reade the. xxxij. and. xxxiii. of the first booke of Polichronica, and there he shall finde the more certenty of the naming thereof, with many other thinges touching the sayd Isle.

Then it foloweth in the story, after Gurguintus was returned into his land of Briteyn, he established and ordeyned to be kept the lawes made by his forefathers, and exercised iustice to his Subiectes, and gouerned his lande well and nobly by the space of. xix. yeres, and then dyed, and was buryed at Caerleon, or after some wyrteth at Troynouant, leauing after him a sonne named Guynthelinus or after some, Guintellius.

Guintelinus, or Guintellius the sonne of Gurguintus, was made king of Briteyn, and he guyded this lande with great meekenesse and sobernesse. He had also a noble wyfe called Marcia, who was learned in many sciences, and among other noble deedes by her done, she set forth vnto the Britons a wholesome and notable lawe, which long tyme after was called Marcians lawe. This lawe, for that it was good and necessary, Aluredus which long after was king of England, translated out of Britisch into the Sar-ons speech, and then was it called euer after in the Sarons tongue, Marthe-helag, that is to say, the lawe of Marcia. To this woman for her wisdom, was committed all the gouernance of the land, and (as Gaufride sayth) shee reigned as Queene of Briteyn a certeyn tyme after her Husband was deade.

In this time the said Guintelyn builded the towne of Warwike, which dedes of Chivalrye, but he was so overcome with wrath and cruellnesse, that commonly he was the death of any that angred him. Besides this, he was comely of personage, and liberall in rewarde, and was also of a merueyous

In his time there came a Prince into this realme out of a Country called land of Briteyn with sword and fire, without all pitie and mercy. Whereof when Mozindus was certified, he in all haste gathered his people, and met with him in the field, and bad him battaile, and fought in such wise, that at the last he chased the Prince to the Sea againe, and tooke many of his Soul-

About this time the Scottes begunne their Chronicles at Fergus or Fergusius the sonne of Ferquard king of Ireland: who (as they write) came with a great power out of Ireland to their ayde in the tyme of dissension, betwene them and the Pichtes, where by wisdom and prowesse he so handled the matter that he agreed those people, and obteyned such fauour, that they elected him to be their king, and he reigned among them. xxv. yeres, and finally in passing the Seas betwene Ireland & Scotland, he was drowned.

Gorbomannus the first sonne of Mozindus was made king of Briteyn, he was a iust and a righteous man both to his Goddes and to his people, that is to saye, he yeelded and gaue to eyther part that was theirs, he gaue to his Goddes due reuerence and sacrifice, and ministred to his people iustice and equitie. And he renewed and repayzed all the olde Temples throug his Realme, and builded some new, and as the English Chronicle sayth, he builded the Towne of Cambridge and Grantham. And in the time of his reigne the land was much more welthier than it was in the dayes of his predecessors. Archigallo or Artogallo, the second sonne of Mozindus, and brother vnto Gorbomannus reigned king of Briteyn. This man folowed nothing the steppes of his brother, but gaue himselfe to all quareling and strife, and imagined causes against his nobles, to pull from them their goodes and dignities, and in their places to set vp bnnoble, and men of rude birth and maner. And so from the riche, by synister meanes he plucked their riches and goodes: by which inordinate meanes, he enriched himselfe, and impouertised his subiectes. For which condicions his Lordes and subiectes murmured against him, and at the last by one assent tooke him and deprived him of all honor and kingly dignitie, when he had reigned. v. yeres. Elidurus the third sonne of Mozindus and brother to Archigallo, was by the assent of the Britons made king. This man became so mylde and gentle to the Britons, that they gaue to him a surname, and called him Elidure the meeke. And among other deedes of meekenesse, this that that foloweth is not the least to be noted. It happened him on a day to be on hunting in a Wood nere vnto Porke called Calater, and there he founde hys elder brother Archigallo late king, wandering in the thickest of the Wood, whom lovingly & charitably he in secret maner conueyed home to his mansio house, into the Citie then named Aldud or Aclint. And (as Gaufride sayth) to the intent to bring his brother to his former dignitie, as after solloweth: For when Elidurus returned home, he feyned him selfe sicke, and in all the haste sent his messengers about his realme to gather an assembly of the Barons of his land together. And when the day of assembly was come, and his Lordes according to his commaundement were present, he called them one by one, as they were of honour into his priuie Chamber, and there by his wyse and discrete wordes he gat graunt of his sayde Lords to ayde and strength him to bring his brother Archigallo to his former dignity and Regality. After which graunt by the Lordes made, he assembled a counsaile at Porke, and there so perswaded the commons that they were content to receiue Archigallo againe to be their king. And then Elidurus when he had reigned. v. yeres, resigned to his brother the Crowne, and all his kingly honor and dignitie.

About this time Ptholomeus Philadelphus, king of Egypt reigned in Alexandria. This prince aboue al other was geuen vnto study & learning. He made a Librarij in Alexandria, which hee furnished with innumerable sortes of bookes of all Sciences. Among which as chiefe was the volume of Moses law. And the king heering that the deuine lawe was in Jerusalem, he being verie desirous to haue it translated, first discharged out of bondage all the Jewes that were in his subiectiō, who were in number aboue one hundreth thousand persons. And then he sent Demetrius and Aristeus to Eleazar the high Priest of the Jewes with great gittes to the Temple of God, desiring that the law might be sent vnto him, with learned men to translate it into Greke. And forthwith Eleazar sent. lxxij. interpreters, who commonly are called Septuaginta interpretes. These the king honorably receyued, & sent them to Demetrius Clerk of his Librarij in Alexandria, who provided a place for them, where they assembled daylie to translate the holys Scripture, and in lxxij. dayes, they finished it. Lud the eldest sonne of Hely, was after his father King of Briteyn. This Man was honorable in all his deedes, and he builded new temples and repayed the olde. He also repayed olde Cities and townes, and specially the Citie of Troynouant, where he caused many buildings to be made, and also made about the sayde Citie a strong wall. And in the west part of the sayde wall, he erected and made a strong and fayre Gate, and commaunded the same to be called by his abone name Luddes gate, which at this day is called Ludgate. And for that he loued this City, he used much and often to lye therein, by reason wherof it was called Caerlud, or Luds towne, & after by corruption of spech, it was after called, & is so named at this day London.

This Lud also (as sayth Gaufrid) was strong and mightie in armes in subduing his enimies. He was also bounteous and liberall and kept a great household, by meane wherof he obteyned the great loue and fauour of all the Britons. And when he had reigned in honour. xj. yeres, he dyed, and was buried in his gate called Ludgate, and left after him two sonnes, as Guydo sayth, the one named Androgeus, and the other Temancius, or Temancius.

But as sayth the flowre of Histories, this Cassibelan was not made king of Briteyn, but rather ruler or protector of the lande, for the time of the nonage of the aforesayde brethren: albeit Gaufrid sayth, that after Cassibelan was set in authoritie, he became so noble and liberall that his name sprang farre, and by his exercise of iustice, the Britons ought to haue more fauour then to eyther of his nephewes: howbeit, he cherished them and brought them by accordyng to their birth. And when they came vnto yeres of discretion, he gaue to Androgeus, the Citie of London, with the Dukedome or Erldome of Kent, and to Temancius the Dukedome of Cornewall.

In this tyme Caius Iulius Cesar, who most commonly is called Iulius Cesar, being sent by the Senate of Rome, as felow and Consull with Lucius Bulbus into the countrie of Gallia, for to subdue the Galles to the Empire of Rome. The which Iulius being vpon the Sea side, as sayth Gaufrid, after he had ouercome the sayde Galles, and beholding the white Clifes or Rockes of Briteyn: enquired of the Countrey, and what people dwelled therein. And when he was sufficiently informed of all the commodities thereof, he had great will to bring the sayde Countrey vnder the obeyfance of the Romaynes, as other Countreyes for the most parte then were. But as Bergamo wyrteth, the time that Iulius made warre vpon the Galles, he knew that they receyued great ayde out of Briteyn, and therefore was he the willinger to conquer it; because they should not be any more ayded by the Britons. And so hauing diligently enquired of the state thereof, he wrote to Cassibelan, willing him as he tendered his abone safetie and the quietnesse of his realme and people, that he would become tributarie vnto the Empire of Rome, like as many other Nations were.

belan with a strong hoste of Britons encountered the Romaines, geuing to them a fierce battaile, in so much, that they were faine to flie to their Ships for surtie; and after with sodaine tempest his Flaue being almost destroyed, he returned againe into France there to winter. Notwithstanding (as Gaufrid and other sayth) after he had renewed his armes, and also rygged and increased his Flaue, he came againe the second tyme: But as before time, so he was now againe by the Manhood of the king and of his Britons manfully and knightly withstanded and chased away, and compelled to flie with great dishonour. In the which battaile, the valiaunt courage of the hardy and noble knight Penmus brother vnto king Cassibelan is worthy of perpetuall memorie, who manfully fighting for the defence of his Countrie and the libertie thereof, besides other noble deedes of armes then by him achieved, ranne vnto Cæsar and plucked his sworde out of his hande, and therewith slue Labienus Tribune or chiefe Captaine of the Romaine Nobilitie: And receyuing againe as Gaufrid wyrteth his deathes wound by the same Cæsar, dyed thereof verie shortly after; and was buried at the Northgate of Troy nouant, and the sayde sworde put in the Coffyn with him by his commaundement.

John Lydgate in his booke named the Serpent of Division wyrteth that Iulius Cæsar buylded in this land diuers Castelles and Cities for a perpetuall memorie of his name, that is to say, a Castell not farre from Douer, the Castelles of Cauntzburie and Rochester, and the auncienteste parte of the Tower of London. The Castell and Cobne of Cæsars Bury, which now is called Sarisburie or Salsburie: he also edefied Cæsars Chester or Chichester and the Castell of Excester.

For which victorie thus twise obteyned, Cassibelan entending to geue thanks vnto his Goddes, and to rewarde his knightes, in goodly haste caused an assembly to be made of all his Lordes and knightes at the Citie of Caerlud, or London, where after due obseruaunces done to their Goddes, after the vse of their Pagan lawes, a great and solempne feast was holden by the king to all that would come with most liberalitie and plenty, in all that was necessarie to such a feast. And the more to encrease the kings honor, and to the comforte and delectation of his Lordes and other being there present, there was all maner kinde of games and pastimes, that at those dayes were exercised and vsed. During the tyme of which feast, two noble and yonge knightes among other hapned to assay epyther other in wrestling, wherof the one was Nephew to king Cassibelan named Hirelda, & that other was named Euelinus, who was allyed vnto Androgeus, Erle or Duke of London. By meane of this wrestling, deuision, or vnfitting words fell betwene them, and after wordes ensued strokes, by meane whereof partes were taken on epyther side, which ranne together in great pye and malice, so that on epyther parte, many and diuers were hurt and wounded. Among whome Hirelda Nephew to the king was slaine, which caused great disturbance in the Court among the Lordes.

Now when that knowledge of the death of Hirelda was brought vnto the King: he was therewith greatly moued, and entending due iustice to be had and ministred by the aduise of his Barons caused the afozenamed Cosyn of Androgeus, who was named Euelinus to be sommoned for to appere before fore him and his Counsaile, and there to acquite him of such crime as to him should be layed, for the death of Hirelda before slaine. But Euelinus by the counsaile of Androgeus his Cosyn, withstoode that commaundement, and shortly after, the sayd Androgeus and Euelyne departed the Court, without taking leaue of the king.

The king disdeyning this demeanour of Androgeus, after diuers monitions to him giuen, gathered his knightes together and made warre vpon Androgeus. Wherfore, after many wayes and meanes sought, at the last he sawe that he was not of power to withstaunde the kinges great indignation, sent his Letters vnto Caius Iulius Cæsar, then being in the Countrie of Gallia, shewing him the circumstance of the matter, and excusing himselfe of all guilt, prayed him in most humble wise, that he would shortly returne with his armie into Briteyn, and he with his whole power should be readie to ayde and helpe him against the Britons.

Of this message Iulius was verie glad, and in all haste made toward Briteyn with a great power. To whome the winde was so fauourable, that in shorte time after this message, he drewe nere the lande: But (as Gaufrid sayth) before he would land, to auoyde all treason that might be brought by Androgeus and the Britons against him, he receyued from him in Hostage his sonne named Scena, with xxx. other of the most Noble of his Lordship, and that done he landed with the helpe of Androgeus. Wherof when Cassibelan had warning, he forthwith made towarde the Romaines; and in a Ualey nere vnto Dorobernia, now named Cauntzburie, there he founde the hoste of the sayde Iulius lodged, and with him Androgeus with all his power. After which knowledge had, they fiercely with their habiliments of warre bered and grieued eche other, till at length both hostes met hande to hande, and fought cruelly, in such wise, that many fell to the ground and were slaine on both parties. But when the Britons (as sayth Gaufrid) had long foughten and knightly defended the Romaines: Androgeus Erle of Kent, came with his people in a wing vpon them, and so sharply assailed them, that they were constrained to forsake the fieldes, and place, that they before had kept: The which flight so discomfited the other, that finally all fled and gane place to the Romaines, who pursued and slue them without all mercie. So that Cassibelan with his Britons that were left, were faine to get them to a place of surtie, there to rest and encampe themselves that they might newly provide to withstand their enemies.

But to conclude, all wyrters agree, that Iulius helde the king so short, that for an vnicie and concord, hee was faine after manye losses to geue pledges and to become tributarie to the Romaines, and to paye verely as Gaufrid sayth, in the name of a tribute, three thousande pounde in Golde. Now when Cæsar had accomplished his will and pleasure, in all thing that to him was thought necessary: He with Androgeus departed the lande with a great number of Hostages and Prisoners, and so sped him towarde Rome, where soone after he was againe by the will of the most of the Senators made Emperour. But finally, beyng Emperour, he was at the last slaine in the Senate house, by the Senators with Bodkins, as Rastell sayeth. And this tribute was thus granted, when Cassibelan had reigned as king of Briteyn full .liij. yeres and more. And by the agreement of most wyrters Androgeus sent Letters to Caius Iulius Cæsar to prouoke him to warre against Cassibelan King of the Britons.

Iulius Cæsar suspected Androgeus.

A battell becometh Cauntzburie.

Iulius Cæsars victory.

Iulius Cæsar made this Realme tributarie to Rome, in the 50. yere before the coming of christ.

rlviii. yeres before the incarnation of Jesu Christ, or as some write fifty. And as Lanquet sayeth, this conquest of Briteyn made by the Romaines, was M. CC. lb. yeres after the uniuersall flood: and M. lbij. after the arrival of Bute: and. vij. C. ij. after the building of Rome, in the second yere of the. C. lxxij. Olimpiade, and the. M. C. xvj. yere before the conquest of Englande made by Mylliam Duke of Normandy, and. M. vi. C. xvj. yeres, before this present yere of our Lorde. M. D. lxxij.

Now after this conquest, Cassibelan reigned as Tributary. ix. yeres, and as sayeth Lanquet, he reigned in all, before the Tribute and after the Tribute. xix. yeres, but other write. xvi. yeres, and some other as Carton, xli. yeres, and then dyed, and is buried at Pozke.

Edeir, after the death of Ewyn, tooke vpon him the gouernance of Scotland, and ruled it. xxxiiij. yeres. In the time of his reigne, as appereth before, Briteyn was subdued to the Romaines, and Scotland also troubled with sundry sedicions.

A traitorous person is fearefull.

Theomancius, or rather Tenantius, the sonne of Lud, and Nephew to Cassibelan, succeeded in the realme of Briteyn. This Man in the English Chronicle is not named King, but his brother Androgeus. But Gaufrid sayth, that for as much as Androgeus feared the hatred of the Britaynes, for his treason wrought against the king and the lande: he therefore conected to abide with Iulius Caesar at Rome, rather then to be king ouer such as he thought would neuer loue, nor fauour him.

The foresayd Tenantius was a noble Martyr, and ruled this land of Briteyn with great diligence and iustice, and defended it well and knightly against all Alyens and straungers, and payde his tribute to the Romaines, which Cassibelan had graunted, and lastly dyed when he had reigned. xxiiij. yeres, and was buried at London.

Cimbelinus or Kymbelinus, the sonne of Tenantius, as sayeth Gurdo, succeeded next after him, who was brought bp at Rome among the Romaines, and there made knight, and was of the Emperour Augustus Cesar so fauoured and beloued, that he was at libertie, whether he would pay the tribute or not. Of him is little written, saying that all wyfters agree, that in the time of his reigne, our Sauoure Christ Jesu was incarnate of the blessed Virgin Marie. And when this Cymbalyn had reigned. xxx. yeres ouer the Britons, he dyed and was buried in London; leauing after him two sonnes, named Guiderius and Aruiragus.

I haue before as is aboue saide declared that our Sauoure Christ was borne in this Kings tyme, which was in the. xix. yere of his reigne, and that was in the yere of the worlde after the account of the Bible and of the Hebrewes, which account I folow. M. D. C. lxxij.

Ewyn, the thirde sonne of Edeir succeeded hys Father in the Realme of Scotland and reigned. vij. yeres. A Prince geuen all to vice and lechery, for being not content, as they write with an hundred Concubynes, with whome he might fulfill his lust, he made a law, that it should be lawfull for his Subiects to haue as many wyues as they were hable to keepe, and that the wyues of his Commoners should be common to the Nobles: and that the Lorde

Lorde should haue the Maydenhead of all Virgins dwelling in his Lordship: the which lawe continued vntill the tyme of Malcolme Canmore, & from thence vnto this tyme, they pay to the Lorde of the soyle a redemption of their Maydenhead. And when he had thus continued. vij. yeres, in exercising of his tirannie and filthy lust, he fell into the hatred of his Lordes, and was by them deposed and slaine in prison.

Stellane, Nephew to Edeir, was chosen king of Scottes, a vertuous, and quiet Prince, who peaceably reigned. xxxix. yere.

And here I thinke meete to note to the reader, that the order that I haue kept in this my story hetherto, hath bene chiefly to expresse and set forth vnto you the pedigrec and discent from Adam to Christ, in the line of the righteous, wherein is to be learned that all those that heard the voyce of the Lorde, and obserued his lawes, prospered and were blessed of the Lorde, and brought to high honour and aduancement: And such againe as hearkened not to the worde of the Lorde, were deliuered as prayes and spoyles to their enemies. And although sometye, I haue vpon sundrie occasions made some notes of the lyne of cursed Cain and others, yet I haue chiefly obserued the lyne of the iust, out of the which almighty G O D promised there shoulde issue of the Seede of the Woman, one that shoulde breake the Serpentes head, which Seede was ment by our Sauoure Jesu Christ, who in this tyme was borne of the Virgin Mary. And here I will as it were drawe forwarde the lyne where I left before, at the kinges of Iuda, (in the tyme that they were made captiue to Babilon, which kinges disceded out of the loynes of Dauid) and will now for the perfighting of my purpose recite the ende thereof. The last king of Iuda that I haue spoken of before, was Sedechias the sonne of Josias, who was captiue in Babilon, from whom issued Joachim, and successively, Jechonias, Salathiel, Zorobabell, Abiud, Eliachim, Azor, Sadoch, Achim, Eliud, Eleazar, Jacob, and Ioseph, who maryed Mary the Virgine, of whom was borne our Sauoure Jesu Christ.

He that heareth the word of God, and both it, shall be happy in his deede.

The ende of the lyne and issue of Iuda was Christ.

And the Virgin Mary disceded also out of the Loynes of Dauid, as first Nathan, the second sonne of Dauid, begat Mathata, and he begat Menana, from whome successively came Melcha, Heliachim, Jona, Ioseph, Iuda, Symeon, Leui, Mathat, Joram, Eliezer, Jesu, Her, Helmadam, Cesan, Abdi, Melchi, Peri, Salathiel, Zorobabel, Reka, Johanna, Iuda, Ioseph, Semei, Mathathias, Ioseph, Jamma, Melchi, Leui, Mathat, Joakim, and Marie the Virgine, who was borne. xv. yeres before Christ, and married vnto Ioseph. Flores historiarum. Polichronicon, and sondrie others.

And here for order and keeping of a full account, endeth the sixt Age of the worlde, or first part of my booke, and this sixt Age was from the Captiuitie of Babilon, vnto the Birth of our most blessed Redemer and Sauoure Jesu Christ, to whom be all honoz, prayse, and gloze, for euer and euer. Which age continued. 627. yeres.

And

¶ And here also I thought it conuenient to make a recitall of the Ages of the Worlde.

- 1 The first Age is from Adam to the Flood of Noe. 1656.yeres.
- 2 The second, from Noe to the birth of Abraham. 363.yeres.and.x.dayes.
- 3 The third, frō Abrahā to the departing of the Childrē of Israell out of Egypt. 430.yeres.
- 4 The fourth, from their departure, to the building of the Temple. 480.yeres.
- 5 The fift, from the building of the Temple, to the Captiuitie. 419.yeres.
- 6 The sixt, from the Captiuitie, to the birth of Christ. 627.yeres.

And thus it may appere, that the number of yerres from the Creation of the Worlde, vnto the birth of Christ, were. 3963.yeres.

¶ And for the better satisfaction of those that knowe not the true summarie or accompt of the aforesayd Ages, I will shew by a perticuler accompt gathered out of the holy Scriptures, how the true knowledge of every Age is collected, which may appere as foloweth

The first Age conteyneth. M. vj. C. lvj. yerres and is proued thus.

Adam being. C. xxx. yerres olde, begat Seth. Seth beyng. C. v. yerres, begat Enos. Enos beyng. xc. yerres, begat Caynan. Caynan beyng. lxx. yerres, begat Malalchell. Malalchell beyng. lxxvi. yerres, begat Jared. Jared at the age of. C. lx. yerres, begat Enoch. Enoch beyng. lxxv. yerres begat Mathusalah. Mathusalah at the age of. C. lxxviii. yerres, begat Lamech. Lamech beyng. C. lxxvii. yerres, begat Noe. Noe at the beginning of the flood, was. vi. C. yerres olde, as appereth in the fist of Genesis. So that the whole summe of yerres of this first Age, were as is aforesayde. M. vi. C. lvi. yerres.

The seconde Age conteyneth. iij. C. lxiiij. yerres, and. x. dayes, and is Proued thus.

The second Age

The flood continued a yere and. x. dayes. Sem (which was Noes sonne) begat Arpharat two yerres after the flood. Arpharat beyng. xxxv. yerres olde, begat Salah. Salah beyng. xxx. yerres old, begat Heber. Heber at his age of. xxxiii. begat Phalech. Phalech beyng. xxx. yerres, begat Megu. Megu beyng. xxxii. yerres, begat Saruch. Saruch at. xxx. yerres begat Nahoz. Nahoz beyng at the age of. xxx. yerres, begat Thare. Thare beyng. lxx. yerres, begat Abraham, and Abraham departed from Chaldee, when he was lxx. yerres olde. So that the whole summe of yerres of this second age, as is aforesayde, is. CCC. lxxij. yerres, and. x. dayes.

The

The third Age conteyneth. iij. C. xxx. yerres, and is collected in this maner.

Abraham was in Charan. v. yerres, and departed in the. lxxv. yere of his age. And he begat Isaac, when he was an hundred yere olde, and in the. xxx. yere of his departing. Isaac begat Jacob when he was. xl. yere olde. Jacob went into Egypt with all his family when he was. C. xxx. yere olde. And Israell remayned in Egypt. CC. x. yerres, at which tyme Moses departed with the Children of Israell out of Egypt, so that the whole somme of yerres of this thirde Age is as aforesayd, iij. C. xxx. yerres.

The fourth Age conteyneth. iij. C. lxxx. yerres, and is gathered in this maner.

The fourth Age

Moses remayned in the Desart of Wildernesse. xl. yerres. Josue, and Othoniell, reigned. xl. yerres. Aioth. lxx. yerres. Delboz. xl. yerres. Gedeon. xl. yerres. Abimelech. liii. yerres. Thela. xxxiii. yerres. Zair. xxx. yerres. Then were they without a Capitaine. xviii. yere vnto the coming of Jephthe. Jephthe. vi. yerres. Abisam. vii. yerres. Elom. x. yerres. Abaton. viii. yerres. Sampson. xx. yerres. Hely high priest. xl. yerres. Samuel, and Saul. xl. yerres. David. xl. yerres. Salomon in the. liii. yere of his reigne, began the building of the Temple. So that the whole somme of yerres of this fourth Age as aforesayd, is. liii. C. lxxx. yerres.

The fift Age conteyneth. iij. C. ix. yerres, and. vj. Monethes, and is collected in this wise.

Salomon reigned after he began the building of the Temple, xxxvi. yerres. Roboam. xvii. yerres. Abia. iii. yerres. Asa. xli. yerres. Josaphat. xxx. yerres. Jozam. viii. yerres. Ochozias one yere. Athalia the Quene. vii. yerres. Joas. xl. yerres. Amasias. xxx. yere. Ozias. lii. yerres. Joathan. vi. yerres. Acas. xvi. yerres. Ezechias. xxx. yerres. Manasses. lv. yerres. Amon. ii. yerres. Josias. xxxi. yerres. Joachas, iii. Monethes. Elachim. xi. yerres. Joachim. iii. monethes: And then began the Captiuitie of Babilon, and not after the. xl. yere of Zedechiah (when both the Temple and the Citie were destroyed and burned) as some suppose. So that the whole somme of yerres of this fift age, are as aforesayd, liii. C. ix. yerres, and. vi. monethes.

The sixt age is from the captiuitie of Babilon, vnto the comming of Christ, and conteyneth fixe C. xxv. yerres, and is proued thus.

The captiuitie continued. lxx. yerres. The children of Israell were deliuered and restored to their freedome in the first yere of King Cyrus. The Temple was begonne to be reedified in the. xi. yere of the sayde Cyrus, and finished in the

the. vi. yere of the reigne of Darius. After that Darius had reigned. xx. yeres, he was restored to libertie, and went to builde the Citie, which was finished in the xxxv. yere of the sayde Darius. Also it is mencioned in the. ix. of Daniell that Ierusalem should be builded by againe, and from the tyme of that building vnto the comming of Christ, should be. lxxii. weekes, and euerie weeke is by that text reckoned for. vii. yeres. So lxxii. weekes amount to. CCC. lxxii. yeres. For from the. xxxii. yere of Darius vnto the. xlii. yere of Augustus, in the which yere our Sauour Christ was bozne, are iust and complet so many yeres. Whereupon we reckon that from Adam vnto Christ are 3963. yeres, vi. Monthes and x. dayes. And from the Birth of Christ, vnto this present time is 1567 yeres. And the whole somme and number of yeres from the beginning of the worlde vnto this present yere are 5530. yere, vi. Monthes and x. dayes.

And here is to be noted that the Ages of the worlde are not called Ages in respect of the number of yeres that they conteyned (as some doe imagine that euery age conteyned certaine thousands of yeres) but for certaine great and marvellous things that happened or were done in the beginning of euery of them.

- 1 In the beginning of the first Age, God made Heauen and Earth and all the Creatures that are therein, and also made Man vnto his awne Image and similitude.
  - 2 In the beginning of the second, God sent the vniuersall flood, and drowned all the creatures in the worlde, eyght persons onely except.
  - 3 In the beginning of the thirde, God made his couenant with Abraham in Circumcision.
  - 4 In the beginning of the fourth, God brought the children of Israell out of Egypt, throu the red Sea, and deliuered his holy law vnto Moses out of the Mount Sinai.
  - 5 In the beginning of the fift, was the Temple of Ierusalem builded.
  - 6 In the beginning of the sixt. The Temple was destroyed, and all the Iewes brought captiue into Babilon.
  - 7 In the beginning of the. vij. our Sauour Iesu Christ was bozne of a Virgin, and toke vpon him our nature, who suffered mosse cruell death and passion for the sinnes of the whole worlde.
- ¶ Thus haue I set forth vnto you the Ages of the worlde, and why they are so called, and also the true computation of them as is expressed in the holy Scripture, which computation I obserue throughout this my Chronicle, because the same agreeing with the Scriptures must of force be most true.

When Caesar Augustus, or other wise called Octavian the Emperour had stablished most sure peace throughout the world, our Redeemer and Sauour Iesu Christ, very God and man, and the onely pacifier of Gods wrath, and the true peacemaker was bozne in the. xl. yere of the reigne of Augustus, after the vniuersall flood 2305. yeres, and from the birth of Abraham 2012. yeres. And after the departure of Israell out of Egypt 1509. yeres. And from the arrivall of Britte in Englande 1107. yeres. After the building of the Temple of Salomon 1029. yeres. From the building of Rome 752. yeres. After the captiuitie of Babilon 614. yeres, and in the last yere of the 194. Olimpiade. And here is to be noted that the first yere of our Lord hath but. vii. daies after some computation, for he was bozne the. xxv. day of December, and the first day of January folowing began the second yere. Lanquet.

And now foloweth the seventh Age of the Worlde, and the seventh part of this booke, which Age beginneth at the birth of Christ, and shall continue to the ende of the Worlde.

The seventh Age

Iesus of Nazareth king of Iewes and onely head of the Christians, with the Father and the holye Ghost, one Eternall God, and almightie Lorde of all things, begotten by his Father God in euerlastingnesse, and in the fulnesse of time, taking flesh of the pure Virgin Marie, by the worke of the holye Ghost, and being verie God and man, according to the holy Oracles of the Prophets, to redeeme with his most precious blood the streyed Sheepe, and losse grote, was bozne in Bethlem a City of Iuda: where incontinent by the glorification of the Angels, the agnition of the Shepherds, the veneration of the wise men, the prophecy of holy Simcon, and the admiration of the Doctours, he was had in honour. And then from the. xii. yere of his lyfe, in age, wisdom and fauour both with God and man he encreased: He was in the. xv. yere of the reigne of Tiberius baptised in Iordane by John Baptist, to the example of his, and so executed all things, subduing his fleche with fasting, the Deuill with prayer, and the world with humilitie. At which time the weekes of Danyell being fulfilled, he taught euery where most constantly, euen to the Crosse, partly with his mightie worde, and partly with his effectuall workes, the kingdome of God, that is, the true knowledge of God the Father and his exceeding charitie towardes mankinde, with the sure confidence in him, the sonne of God: declaring also the way of helth, and the mutuall loue, with the rewarde of the faithfull and punishments of the vnfaithfull. Then for the confirmation of his doctrine and faith, euen with a little beck he commaunded calmenesse to the Elements, helth to all diseases, life vnto the dead, obedience vnto the quick, detection vnto thoughts, abolition vnto sinnes, and flight vnto the Deuill. For all this, after all the passions and labours of mans miserie, which he suffered (sinne onely excepted) whereby he witnessed himselfe to be a very man, and after the innumerable documents and beneficiall deedes (passing mans power) openly shewed vnto his kinde people the Jewes, by which he declared himselfe to be true God, as it was before written in the Prophets: he was by the elders of the Jewes and people (his Disciple Judas Iscarioth betrayng him) taken, accused, endited, scorned, scourged, crowned with thornes, crucified betwene theeues, and euen then all things fulfilled, with the quaking of the earth, and darknesse of the Sonne, he dyed. After which being buried, he losed Hell, and the thirde day folowing, lyke a conquerour of sinne, death and Hell, he rose againe, from which tyme being .xl. dayes conuersant with his, in the .xxxiii. yere of his lyfe, with glorious triumph he ascended to the heauens vnto his father, from whence he came. Where being the onely Mediator, Intercessor and aduocate of his, sitting on the right hand of God his father, shall in the ende of the worlde be iudge over all the lyuing and the dead, rendring to euerie man according to his deserving, to the faithfull certeyntie of lyfe, but to the vnfaithfull euerlasting death. Then good and euill segregated, with the whole worlde purged and pacified: our Lorde Iesu Christ the onely and verie almightie Emperour of the worlde, as he hath from the beginning, so doth he now, and for euer shall reigne, to whom euerie knee of celestiaall, terrestriall, and infernall creatures shall bowe, and euerie tongue shall confesse that Iesus Christ is the Lorde, to the glory of God the father. Lanquet.

¶ And from this place forward vnto the end of this worke, the numbers that are about the lyne in the Margent are the yeres of Christ, and the numbers vnder the lyne, are the yeres of the reigne of euery seuerall king.

Guiderius the first sonne of Cymbalyne began his reigne ouer the Britons: This man was balaunt, hardie, welthie, and trusted much in his awne strength, and for that he thought the Romaines had the aforesaid tribute with wrong, he therefore of a knightly courage denyed to them the payment thereof: wherefore Claudius the fift Emperour of Rome, came into Briteyn with a great armie of Romaines (as sayth Polichronica) and wanne againe the sayde tribute without great fight, and therof came a Prouerbe among the Romaines, that the Britaines were neyther strong in bataille, nor faythfull in peace. And that done, he also subdued the Isles of the Orchades, which stand beyond Scotland within the great Ocean, and after returned againe to Rome, in the sixt Moneth that he came from thence.

¶ But Gaufrid sayth, that in the hoste of the Romaines, there was a Capitaine named Hamo, who extending the hurte of the Britons chaunged his Shilde and Armour, and put vpon him the Armour of a Briteyn, and by that meane being not suspect, he entered into the thickest of the Britons, and lastly came where king Guiderius fought, and shortly after slue the king. But Aruiragus

Culderius
Name.

uiragus seing this sodeyne mischiefe, fearing that the Britons would haue geuen back, quickly caused himselfe to be armed with the cognisaunce and Armour of the king: And as King continued the fight with such manhood and courage, that the Romaines were at that time put to flight. And thus was Guiderius slaine of Hamo, when he had reigned ouer Briteyn. .xxviij. yeres, leauing after him none heyre.

CAratak, king of Scottes, reigned. .xxi. yeres, a Prince more balaunt then fortunate, he gaue his whole minde and courage to defende his Realme and subiects from the seruage of the Romaines, with whome he kept long warre, and ayded the North Britons.

And in this tyme Saint Paule, the elect Vessel of God, being called by a Quision, was made of an open aduersarie and cruell persecutor of the Church of Christ, the most faythful Apottle and true Doctor of the Gentiles: Among whome he taught the worde of God with so great fruit, and encreased so largely the christian faith, that he was after worthily and rightly named the chiefe of the Apostles.

Aruiragus the yongest sonne of Kymbelyn, and brother to Guiderius before slaine, was ordeyned king of Britons in the yere of our Lorde .xlv. This Man did well and knightly behaue himselfe against the Romaines, and slue the afore named Hamo; nere vnto a Hauen or Port of the Sea. And when he was slaine, he threwo him gobbet meale into the same sea. And for this cause, that Hauen was long tyme after called Hamons Hauen, which at this day is called Southhamto. Fabian. But here in a very old Hamphlet, which beareth no name, I finde that in the tyme of Hengist afore mentioned, and in the reigne of Woxtiger, there was a Saxon named Varius Ham and he builded thre townes, one in the South, and named it after his awne name South Hams towne, another North fro thence, which he named North Hams towne. Another West, and by North from thence, which he named (bicause he had there made a staple of wolles) Woluer Hams towne.

¶ Then sayth Reynulph, that Claudius after dyuers happes of Battaille, tooke Aruiragus to his grace, and brought his base daughter Genissa by name from Rome, and maryed her vnto Aruiragus. And because he woulde make the place of the mariage more solempne, he therefore called the Towne of mariage Claudiocestria after his awne name, and after Glouerna, of a base sonne (as some say) of the sayd Claudius Cesar called Glorus, begotten and borne in the same Citie, which afterwarde was Duke of Demecia or Southwoales, and at this day it is called Gloucester. Hector Boecius the writer of the Scottish Chronicle sayth, that Aruiragus before this mariage was made, was deuorced from his former wife, named Uoada, sister vnto Careticus king of Scottes, of a desire that he had to be alyed vnto the Romaines.

¶ Then it foloweth, after the solemnitie of this mariage, which was with all honour finished, Claudius sent certeyne Legions of his Knightes into Ireland, to rule that Countrie, and returned himselfe to Rome.

¶ It was not long after the departing of Claudius, but that Aruiragus roade about his Realme, and with great diligence repayred Cities & townes before decayed and broken with the strength of the Romaines, and as it is of some mencioned, builded the Castle of Douer, and finally intreated his subiects jects with such iustice and good order, that they loued and drad him more then any of his progenitors. And this in continuance of tyme made him very welthy, and thereof ensued pryde, so that he thought great shame to be vnder the rule or guyding of the Romaynes, wherefore, at the last he denyed the Tribute betoze graunted to Rome, wherof, when knowledg came vnto the Senate of Rome, in all hast a Duke was sent from Rome called Vespasian, with certeyne Legions of knightes and Souldiours to subdue Aruiragus.

¶ When Vespasianus was landed in Briteyn (as sayth Reynulph) he sped him so, that in short tyme he subdued Aruiragus to the Empire, and caused him to graunt payment of the aforesayde tribute.

¶ But Gaufride here wyrteth howe Aruiragus heering that Vespasianus was about to lande at Sandwich, met him there with a pyssaunt armie of the Britons, and by mayne force kept him off, that he could not enter the Haven and land: for so great was the multitude of the sayde Britons, that the sight of them made the Romaynes afeard, insomuch that they durst not lande for feare lest the other would haue sodeinly set vpon them, before they could bring themselves in aray and order of battaile, wherefore they hoysed by their sayles, and departed from thence againe, and went to Totnes in Devonshire and there aryued, and beyng landed, their Capitaine and Generall Vespasianus marched incontinent towarde the towne, which then was called in the Britissh tongue, Cair Penchuet goit, as ye would say, the towne vnder the wood, and at this daye is called Excestre, to the entent to besiege it. And when he had continued his siege by the space of seuen dayes, Aruiragus entending to rayse the same, sodeinly came with his armie and set vpon them, and manye went to wracke on both parties, but neither partie had the victorie of the other. On the morow both the Capitaynes were made agreed by the mediati- on and meanes of the Queene Gemilla. Thus it apereth that the tribute was payed againe by her intreatie, and not by any violent constreynt or coercion.

¶ After Vespasian had thus recovered the tribute, he then also made sub- iect to the Empire an Isle lying in the Sea, which we nowe call the Isle of Wight, and after returned to Rome.

¶ When Aruiragus was thus the second tyme subdued, and brought vnder the yoke of the Romaynes, he became more mylde towarde them, so that during his lyfe, from thenceforth, he payde the tribute with lesse grudge, and kept himselfe in their fauours, in such wise that he was of them very wel beloved. And lastly he dyed, when he had reigned. xxx. yeres, and was buried at Glocester, leauing after him a sonne named Marius.

¶ After the decease of Caratake king of Scottes his yonger brother Cor- breid obteyned the crowne, and reigned. xviii. yeres. He was fierce and of a valiaunt courage, and beyng confederate with the Pictes, made often times warre against the Britons.

¶ And for as much as at this time, Nero that notable Tyrant Emperour reigned at Rome, vnder whome a great number of the true Preachers and Apostles of Christ, suffered most cruell persecution, Martirdome, and death, I thought it not much impertinent to the story to make some speciall mention of him, and namely because this lande as is aforesayde, was in his tyme againe made tributarie to the Empire of Rome, the saide Nero reig- ning now as Emperour. But chiefly for that he was a wicked Tyrant and a cruell

A cruell persecutour of the vniuersall Church of Christ.

¶ At this tyme as is aforesayde, Nero the sonne of Domicius, being adopted to be Emperour by Claudius, which married his mother, reigned. xliij. yeres. This man, although he was brought up by the reuerent, wise, and learned Seneca, yet by the ineuitable corruption of his nature, he became horrible in all kinde of unhyuing, and so detestable in dissolute wantonnesse, prodigalitie, monstrous lecheryes, beastly crueltie, and couetousnesse, that he seemed to be borne to the destruction of the whole worlde. He was so greatly delighted in singing and playng with the Harpe, in sword playng, and dryuing of Cartes or Wagons, that he did not onely these exercises priuately, without all measure, but also wearing the garments of Minstrels, Sworde players, and other vile personages, wandered ouer all Italy and Grece, to seeke and haunt common games, where he might trie masteries, and shewe his cunning in those feates: and at his returne, triumphed in the Citie of Rome, and sent into all Countries letters of commaundement to make supplications and reioysing for his victories.

¶ In vncleane lust of his body, he so furiously raged, that he absteyned not from his naturall Mother, Sister, ne any degree of affinitie or kindred. He tooke in open marriage a Boye of excellent fauour, named Sporus, and vsed him as his wife, he viciously bent and gaue himselfe to filthy imbracings of his auncient seruants, & in riotous spending of his treasure he exceeded, for he vsed to fische with Nettles made of Golde, which shoulde be drawne with Cordes of Purple silke: He neuer wore one garment twise: he caused to be put to death his mother, his brother in lawe, his two wyues, and his instruc- tor and Schoolemaster, the reuerend Seneca, hauing thereto no iust cause, nor honest pretence: He commaunded the City of Rome to be set on fyre, and himselfe in the meane season with all semblant of ioy, sitting in an high Tower to beholde the same, played vpon the Harpe, and sang the destruction of Troy. This Nero was so wicked, that at the last he gaue himselfe openly to such naughtie and wanton hyuing, that in the night season he woulde haunte Brothell houses, and other suspitious places, and ostentines breake by mens houses, and eyther robbe and beate them, or else rauishe their wyues. And after that he had committed most abhominable incest with his naturall mo- ther, he commaunded her to be put to death. And then married Poppea, a wo- man of notable incontincencie. And after all this he caused himselfe to be gel- ded and cut in the forme & shape of a woman, and so to be abused. And when the Senate had considered of the outragious life & wicked doinges of Nero, they charged him with the setting of Rome on fyre, and he to excuse himselfe charged the christians therewith, whereof folowed a most cruell persecution of the christians, and in this persecution Peter and Paule, the Apostles of Christ, with many other Martirs were put to cruell death. And by his beastly crueltie, there were also many noble and verteous men put to most shame- full death, among the which were the aforesayde Seneca and Lucan, men of excellent learning. Finally, this wicked Tyrant Nero was proclaymed by the Senate to be an enimie of the weale publique, and iudged to be drawne through the Citie, and to be whipped to death: wherfore he fearing to come into the handes of his enemies, fled into a farme house of his seruants in the Countrie, where at last he was inforced to flea himselfe. At this tyme the Scottes, because Corbreid Galdus the eldest some of King Corbreid was not of sufficient age, made Dardannus the nephew of Metellane their king, who for his seemely personage was greatly beloued of his people. In the beginning of his reigne, he vsed the counsaile of his Nobles, but after thre yeres he left all iustice and honesty, and slipt into most vncleane vices and cruell tyranny, and lastly endeuoured himselfe to haue murdered Galdus with his brethren, and therefore the Scottes deposed him, and put him to death, when he had reigned. iiii. yeres.

Marius.

Marius the sonne of Aruiragus, after his father was king of the Britons: Which Marius as Gaufrid sayth, was an excellent wise man, and gouerned this lande very honourably, and greatly prospered and encreased in welth and riches.

In the time of the reigne of this Marius, a Duke or King of a Nation called Pictes, which descended of the Scythians, named also of some Gothes, or Hunes, came into this Isle. The aforesayde Duke or leader of the Pictes, as Gaufrid sayth, was named Londricus, and he landed with a great Flaue in the Prouince of Albania, now called Scotland, and there summercifully he began to spoyle the Country, with sworde and fire: Whereof when Marius was warned, he in all haste assembled his knightes and people, and made towards them, and gaue them a strong battaile, in the which Londricus was slaine, and a great part of his people ouerthrobne. In the remembraunce of which victorie, King Marius caused a great stone to be erected, and commaunded therein to be grauen these wordes, Marii victoria, that is, the victory of Marius.

Londricus a Duke of the Pictes.

Londricus slaine.

This battaile as the English Chronicle sayth, was foughten at a place which now is called Stanes Hoore. But wherefoeuer this stone is set, the Country thereabout was long after called VVestmaria, and is now called Westmerland.

Stanes Hoore.

Now when the residue of the people of Londricus which were fled from the fildes, vnderstood that their hed & Capitaine was slaine: they made their humble request to the king, that he would accept them into his grace, and that he would geue them some land or country to dwell in. And at the last the king graunted them a place in the farre ende of Scotland, which Gaufrid nameth Cathenesia, where the sayd Scottes, or Pictes first inhabited. And forsomuch as the Britons disdeined to geue vnto them their daughters in marriage, therefore they acquainted them with the Irish men, and maryed their daughters, and grew in processe of tyme vnto a great people. And for this allyaunce betwene the Irishmen and them, their Country (as sayth Reynulph, in the xxxvii. Chapter of his first booke) was called Irelande, and after Dictaia, and lastly Scotland. But I find in an olde written Chronicle, that when they tooke the Irish women to their Wyues, and vnderstoode not their language they were therefore called Sottes, and afterward Scottes, and their countrey which before was called Albania named Scotland, and this was the beginning of the Scottes, as it is there alleaged. Howbeit, Mathew of Westminister, Authoz of the booke, entituled the Flowres of Histories, sayth they were called Scottes, because they were a Nation that tooke their beginning of diuerse Nations: For Scot, sayth he, is a worde signifying an heape of diuerse diuerse thinges gathered or mingled together, according to our common speeche, thou shalt pay scot and lot, that is to say, all such duties as shall bee charged vpon thee.

And when Marius had thus subdued his enimies, he attended and set his minde to the common weale of his lande and subiects, and continued the residue of his lyfe in great rest and quietnesse, and in the ende payde his naturall debt or tribute, and was buried at Caerleyle, leauing after him a sonne named Coplus or Copll, when he had reigned. lii. yeres.

Marius dead.

In this time the Citie and Temple of Jerusalem was taken, conquered, spoyled, and destroyed by Titus, in such wise that scarcely any man coulde iudge where the place was that it once stood in: which chaunced in the. xj. C. and one yere, after the Temple was first builded by Salomon, and the same day of the Moneth that it was first destroyed by Nabuchodonosor king of Babilon. And in the time of the siege of the same, were slaine of the Jewes xi. C. thousand, ouer and beside them which Vespasian slue in the subduing of the Countrey of Galile. And. xvij. thousand Titus sent into Alexandria there to be kept in most vile and peynfull bondage. And two thousand he brought in his triumph to Rome, of the which, parte he gaue to be deuoured of wilde beastes, and parte were otherwise most cruelly slaine: at which time apered the most terrible example of the wrath & vengeance of God, for the contempt of his worde & veritie. For what hart is so stony or hard that will not tremble for feare, when it considereth that God tooke so sharpe punishment vpon his awne people, whom before he loued most entirely, & among all other nations of the worlde, chose them for his peculier flock and Vineyarde. And shortly after Vespasian the Emperour, and Titus his sonne, triumphed at Rome for their victorie and conquest in Judea. Cooper. But hereof ye may reade more in Iosephus, and there shall ye finde a most horrible and terrible Histozie.

The destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple.

Galdus, after the death of Dardannus, was ordeyned king of Scottes. This was the most valiaunt Prince that euer reigned among them, and was endued with many excellent and Princely qualities. At the first entry he punished the wicked counsaillours of Dardannus, and after called a parliament of his Lordes, wherein many noble acts were deuised, and the naughty lawe of king Ewyn (by the which the Wyues of the commons were free to the nobles) was repealed and fordone. Of him the Scottes made manye goodly remembraunces in the honour of his noblenesse and great victozies that he atchieued.

A wicked law.

About this time Petulius Cerealis was sente of the Romaines, as Lieutenaunt to Briteyn, where he discomfited Galdus King of Scottes, banquished the Pictes and the Silurians, subdued to the Romaynes the Countrey of Brigantes or Porckeshire men, ouerthrewe and chased Uodicia the daughter of the valyaunt woman Uoada, and quieted the Kentishe men, and certaine other Britons which rebelled. After this Petulius, a Romaine named Iulius Frontinus was Lieutenaunt in Briteyn, who also warred against the Scottes and Pictes.

And after the death of Galdus king of Scotland, succeeded Lugtack, an Ahatefull and wicked tyrant, & was as much hated of the Scottes for his vice, as his father was beloued for his bertue. He slue many of the rich men onely to confiscate their goods, and committed the gouernance of the Realme to most to most bniust and coueteous persons, and with their company he was most delighted: He defloured his auncles, Sisters, and Daughters, and scorned his wife and graue Counsaylours, calling them olde dotting fooles, wherefore in the thirde yere of his reigne he was slaine of his Nobles.

Mogallus
Scottes.

Mogallus, being ordeyned king of the Scottes after Lugtack, at the beginning gaue himselfe to follow the wisdom and maners of his Uncle Galdus, and obteyned diuers great victories against Lucius Antonius the Romaine Capitaine: but in his age he became hatefull in all kinde of Vices, and chiefly in conetousnesse, lecherie & crueltie. He gaue lycence to theeues and robbers to take the goods of their neighbours without punishment. He first ordeyned the goodes of condemned persons to be confiscate to the kings vse, without respect of wyues, children or debtours, for which naughtynesse he was slaine of his Nobles.

of Briteyn.

Coilus the sonne of Marius reigned King of Briteyn after the death of his father. This man was from his infancy nourished and brought vp among the Romaynes; by reason whereof they were louing and kinde to him, and he to them. And for as much as he knewe the power of the Romaynes to be inuincible, he yeldd and payde to them the tribute during his life. This Coilus also (as Gaufride sayth) was a liberall man, by reason whereof he obteyned great loue of his Nobles, and also of his commons. And as some write, he made the towne of Colchester, but other ascribe it to one Coill that was king next after Asclepiodatus. And after that this Coilus had reigned in soueraigne peace the terme of liii. yeres, he dyed, and was buried at Porke, and left behinde him a sonne named Lucius.

Quarius, which was the chiefe causer of his fathers death, was made king of Scottes, who dissimuled the vices wherunto he was naturally enclined: But as soone as he was established in his kingdome, he wasted all the rentes pertaining to the Crowne, in his leude lustes, and gaue landes and riches to most vile and naughtie persons, because they fauoured his corrupt liuyng, he inuented new exactions vpon his people, and therefore was of his nobles cast in Prison, and his wicked counsaylours hanged. In his place Argadus guided the Realme about. xiiij. yeres.

Scottes.

Ethodius the first, nephew to Mogallus, was ordeyned king of Scottes, and reigned, xxxij. yeres. This Man was greatly deyled with hunting, and made many lawes thereof: He rewarded Argadus for his administration of iustice: He quieted the Isles, and being ayded by the Pictes, he banquished Victorine the Romaine Capitaine, and brake downe the wall of Adrian.

Lucy the first

Lucius, or Lucy, the sonne of Coilus, was made king of Britons, by the ayde and auctoritie of Marcus Aurelius Antonius then Emperour of Rome, who fauoured him singularly: He was a very good Man, and folowed his forefathers steps, in all that was good, and his gouernement was so graue and discrete that he obteyned the loue of all his people. This Lucius as sundrie Authours doe write, did sende to Cleutherius then Bishop of Rome, two godly learned men named Eluanus and Meduinus with certaine Epistles and Letters, praiyng him, that he and his Britons might be receyued to ued to the fayth of Christes Church. Whereof Cleutherius being very glad, sent into Briteyn two noble Clerkes, Faganus and Dunianus, or after some Fugacius and Damianus.

¶ And as the reuerend Maister Jewell, Bishop of Sarisbury, writeth in his Replie vnto Maister Hardings aunswere. Fol. 191. The sayd Cleutherius for generall order to be taken in the Realme and Churches here, wrote his aduice vnto Lucius the King in this maner folowing.

Ye haue receyued in the Kingdome of Briteyn by Goddes mercy, both the lawe and fayth of Christ. Ye haue both the new Testament and the olde: Out of the same through Goddes grace by the aduice of your Realme take a lawe, and by the same through Goddes sufferaunce, rule you your Kingdome of Briteyn: For in that Kingdome you are Goddes Vicare.

¶ Now when these learned men were come, they were honourably receyued of Lucius, the which by their good doctrine & vertuous example geuing, converted the king and a great part of the Britons. Now after that Lucy had thus receyued the fayth, he by the aduice of the aforesayd learned men, & with the instructions sent to him by the aforesayde Cleutherius, did institute and ordeyne, that all or the more part of the Archflamyns, which is to meane Archbishops, and Bishops of the Pagan law, which at that day were in number (as sayth Gaufride and other) three Archflamyns, and. xxiiij. Flamyns, shoulde be made Archbishops and Bishops of the Church of Christ as foloweth.

¶ The first Sea of the first Archflamyn, was at London. The seconde at Porke, and the thirde at Gloucester. To these three Archbishops were subiect the aforesayd. xxiiij. Flamyns or Bishops. To the Archbishopps Sea of London, was subiect Cornewall, & all middle England vnto Humber. To the Archbishopps Sea of Porke, was subiect all Northumberlande, from the Bowe of Humber, with all Scotland. And to the third Archbishopps Sea, which was Gloucester, there was subiect all Wales: In which Province of Wales were. vij. Bishops, where as now is but foure. And at that day Seuerne departed Briteyn and Wales. But after the Saronis had the rule of the land, they altered much of these orders, and to be short, there are now but two Archbishops in Englande, that is Cantorbury and Porke, wherof Cantorbury hath the premacie, and hath vnder him. xv. Bishops in Englande, that is to say, Rochester, London, Chichester, Winchester, Saleisbury, Exeter, Bathe, Worcester, Hereford, Couentry and Lichfield, Chester, Lincolne, Orford, Ely, and Norwich. And in Wales he hath. iij. Bishops, Landaffe, S. Davids, Bangor, and S. Asaph, commonly called S. Asse. And Porke hath but two Bishops in Englande vnder him, which is Caerleyll, and Durhame.

¶ Besydes these good orders taken, the sayd Lucius destroyed the temple of the false God Apollo, which then stood in a place called the Isle of Thorney nere London, and was so called for that it was a place all ouergrowne with Thornes, and he erected and made the sayde Temple a place dedicated to the honour of God, and named it Westminster, as it is called at this day, and endowed the same with such and so great priuileges, that what person soeuer could escape to the sayd Church, for what trespassse so euer it were, the same shoulde be safe body and goodes.

Now after that Lucius had thus set this realme in good order, he died, when he had reigned. xii. yeres, leauing behinde him none heyre, which was the occasion of great trouble to the Realme: For the Britons among themselves coude not agree vpon a Gouernour, by reason whereof there was among them great discord, which continued the space of. xii. yeres, in the which tyme, the Empire and Senate of Rome apointed their Lieutenantes to gouerne and reigne ouer this Realme.

Atrahell the brother of Ethodius (because his sonnes were not of sufficient Sage to gouerne the Realme) was ordeyned king of Scottes, he was of faise and subtile wit, and geuen to such cruelty, that for feyned causes he slue all the frendes of Ethodius to the intent to defraude his heires of the crowne, wherfore he was murdered of his familiers when he had reigned. iiii. yeres.

About the yere of our Lorde. CC. iij. this Donalde procured certeyne wise and learned men to instruct him, his wyfe, Children, and Subiectes in the fayth of Christ, which happened, 533. yeres after the beginning of the Realme of Scotland.

A wall of Turues.
Seuerus Emperour of Rome heying of the great discorde in Briteyn, made hast from Rome, and came into this land to apease the vprozes of the same. And at this tyme the Scottes and Pictes invaded Briteyn, and vexed the Britons very sore: wherfore Seuerus caused a Wall of Turues to be made, wherein were driuen great stakes, which Wall as sayeth Polichronica was in length. Cxxij. Miles, and it began at the Riuer of Tyne and stretched to the Scottishe See, or from the ende of the Lordship of Deira vnto the sayde Scottishe See, or after some Writers, from Durham to the See aforesayde.

And now fulgenius the chiefe leader and Capitaine of the Pictes issued out from Albania or Scotland into the land of Briteyn, & destroyed much of the Countrie beyonde Durham. Wherfore Seuerus with an hoste of Britons and of Romaines met with the sayde fulgenius in a place nere vnto Porke, where after sore fight, the sayde Seuerus was slaine, when he had ruled this land siue yeres, and was buried at Porke, leauing behinde him two sonnes the one named Geta and the other Bassianus, betweene whome there was and euer had bene from the beginning moztall hatred and enmity.

Bassianus Caracalla, after the death of his father, began to rule thys land of Briteyn, he was a Man of nature cruel and fierce and habile to endure all paines and labours, specially in warfare. But as Gaufrid sayth, after the death of Seuerus, great strife arose betweene the Romaines and the Britons then being within the land of Briteyn. For the commons helde for their king Bassianus because he was borne of a Britishe Woman: And on the other side, the Romaines allowed Geta for their king, because he descended of a Romaine. And for this dissension a battaile was foughten betweene twene the sayde two brethren, in the which Geta was slaine, and Bassianus remayned for king ouer all the land.

In the tyme that Bassianus was now both Emperour and king of Briteyn, one named Carassus a Briton of lowe birth, but valiaunt and hardie in martiall affaires: purchased of the Emperour the keeping of Briteyn, or as some write onely of the coastes of Briteyn, and promised to withstand the malice of straungers, as the Pictes and others. By meane whereof Carassus drewe vnto him many knightes, and specially of the Britons, promising to them that if they would make him king, he would cleerely deliuer them from the seruitude of the Romaines. By reason wherof the Britons (as saith Gaufrid) rebelled against Bassianus, & with their Duke and leader Carassus arrered against him deadly warre, conceiuing the better hope of victorie because he was priuily certified of the Emperours death, who was then slaine by a seruant of his abone in Mesopotamia, when he had ruled this land by. yeres.

But Polidore affirmeth that this Carassus tooke on him the gouernance of Briteyn in the tyme of Dioclesian, and sayeth that this lande was in good quietnesse the space of. lxxvi. yeres, with whome the Latyn Stoies seeme to agree.

Carassus reigned after Bassianus ouer Briteyn, who as before is expressed, was by the Emperour of Rome deputed for a substitute or a ruler vnder him. This Carassus for that he was not of power to withstande the Pictes, or for the fauour that he bare vnto them for ayding him against the Romaines: gaue to them a part of the Countrie of Albania, that now is called Scotland: For as witnesseth Polichronica, that part which was thus geuen to the Pictes, was the Southeast part of Albania, and began at Tweede, and endured to the firth, for before that tyme the Pictes inhabited only the Northeast Countrie of Scotland, which now are called ffeff, Angus, Murray, and Rosse. Of the nature and kinde of these Pictes, is somewhat shewed before, in the story of Marius, but more shall be shewed hereafter in place comenient both of their offspring and maners.

Nowe it foloweth when the Romaines had knowledge of the death of Bassianus, they forthwith sent a Duke from Rome named Alectus, with thre Legions of knightes to subdue and vanquish Carassus, who in the ende slue him, when he had ruled ouer the Britons. viij. yeres, and such as are disposed may read more of this man in Fabian and others.

Ethodius the seconde was ordeyned king of Scotlande and reigned. xvi. yeres, he was of dull wyt, geuen to auarice and gathering of riches, and nothing meete to gouerne the Realme: wherfore his Nobles tooke vpon them the charge, and so continued all the tyme of his reigne.

Alectus a Duke or Confull of Rome, sent as before is sayde from the Senate of Rome, began to rule the Britons: and first he restored the land to the subiection of Rome, and then pursued certaine of the Britons that had fauoured Carassus against the Romaines. And in that doing, he vsed and exercised many tyrannies and exactions, by reason whereof he fell in grudge and hated of the Britons. Wherfore, they entending to oppress and subdue the power of the Romaynes, procured and excited a Noble man of the Britons called Asclepiodatus Duke of Cornewall to take upon him to be their Captaine, who gathered a great hoste of the Britons, and made warre upon the Romaines, and chased them from Countrey to Countrey, and from Cobone to Cobone: and lastly Alectus with his Romaines drew him to London and there abode for his more suretie. Whereof Asclepiodatus being warned, he with his Britons came nere unto the sayde City, where by meanes of prouocation of eyther partie used, at the last, the Romaines issued out of the Citie and gaue battaile to the Britons. In the which fight many fell on eyther partie, but the more on the partie of the Romaines, among the which was slaine Alectus, wherfore a Capitaine of the Romaines called Linius Gallus, perceiuyng this mischiese, and the great daunger that the Romaines were in, drew back into the Citie with the Romaines that were left aliue, and defended it with their powers. This was Alectus slaine of the Britons when he had reigned and ruled this land vnder the Romaines the space of. lxx. yerres.

Asclepiodatus or Asclepiodotus Duke of Cornewall (as sayeth Gaufride) tooke upon him the gouernement of the Britons, and with a great Armie besieged London, and kept the aforesayde Linius Gallus and hys Romaines in streight holde, and with knightly force and violence entered the sayde Citie, and slue the afozenamed Linius Gallus, nere unto a Brooke which then was within the sayde Citie, and threwe him into the sayde Brooke: By reason whereof, the same was from thence forth called Gallus Brooke, or Wallus Brooke, and at this time the place where that Brooke was, is called Walbrooke. And after Asclepiodatus had thus banquished the Romaines, he held this lande a certaine of tyme peaceably and quietly, and ruled the Britons with good iustice.

This brooke came from a place which we call now Brooze field, and that place being then a marsh, water ran from thence thow London into Thames

Therco after the slaughter of Ethodius his father, was chosen king of Scottes, and reigned. xij. yerres. At the beginning, he shewed some tokens of honest towardnesse: but after he was so wrapped in all vnclane vice and effeminate lustes, that he was not ashamed to go openly in the sight of the people playng upon a flute, and reioysed more to be a fidelar than a Prince: finally, being pursued for rauishing of the daughters of Nathalas, by a noble man of Argile, he slue himselfe.

Nathalake tooke on him the kingdome of Scotland, by force, murther, and tyrannie, and trusting to the counsayll of Wyches and Inchauntours, was slaine of his awne seruaunt Surrey, whome of all men he bled most fauorably, when he had reigned. xi. yerres.

Coill

Coill, Erie of Colchester tooke upon hym the gouernance of Briteyn, and ruled the same very well for a certeine tyme. But as Gaufride sayth: When the Senates of Rome had vnderstanding of the death of Asclepiodatus, they were ioyous of his death, for that he had euer bene an enemy to the Empire: But forasmuch as at those dayes the Romaines themselves were at great dissention, they could not conueniently send any army to warre upon this Coill, by reason whereof he continued the longer in rest and peace.

Constantius sent from Rome to gouerne Briteyn.

Howbeit at length, the Senate sent a noble and wyse man called Constantius, who when he was arriued in Briteyn with his army, anone Coill assembled his Britons: But before he proceeded further, he sent an Ambassade to the said Constantius, for that he feared the strength and fame of him, which Ambassade declared vnto him condicions of peace, and graunt of the payment of the Tribute: But finally, while this matter was in talke, Coill dyed, and then the Britons for peace sake, entreated this noble man to take to wife Heleyn the daughter of Coill, with the possession of the land of Briteyn, which by him was granted. And thus Coill when he had reigned. xxvij. yerres dyed.

At this tyme Findock the eldest sonne of Athirco was made kinge of the Scottes, he kept peace with the Romaines, and Britons, and quieted the rebellion of Donald (a noble man of the Isles) by whose counsayle, through the consent of his awne brother Carance, he was afterwarde slaine, when he had reigned. x. yerres.

Donald was king of Scottes one yere, he was taken in battail by Donald of the Isles, and shortly after he dyed.

After the death of King Donald, great trouble was in Scotland: for Donald of the Isles tooke on him the Crowne, which was Donald the thirde, and bled much Tyranny the space of. xij. yerres: He neuer laughed, but when he heard of the discorde and slaughter of his Nobles, and therefore in the end for his crueltie he was slaine of Craithlint the sonne of Findock, with. Donald of Isles king of Scottes.

Craithlint the sonne of Findock, after the death of Donald the Tyrant, was made King of Scottes, and reigned. xxiiij. yerres, with great wisdom and iustice. In his tyme happened great variance betweene the Pictes and the Scottes (which continued friendes from the tyme of Fergus the first King of Scottes, to these dayes) for stealing of a Greyhounde, whereof ensued great murder and slaughter on both partes.

Craithlint King of Scottes.

Constantius aforesayde, tooke upon him the gouernement of the Britons, and as is abovesayde, first maryed Heleyn the Daughter of Coill, last King of Briteyn, which Heleyn was very beautifull and fayre, and therewith had learning and many other vertues, and after gouerned Briteyn very wisely and honorably: But within short tyme after, Dioclesian, and Maximinian had geuen by the Imperiall authoritie, he was chosen Emperour, and reigned Emperour and King of Briteyn. xxx. yerres, and then dyed, and is buried in Pozke, leauing after him a sonne named Constantine.

This Constantius was a Man of great affabilitie, clemency, and gentleness, and therewithall very liberall, endenouring alwaies to enriche his subiectes, little regarding his awne treasure, thinking that to be his that the Commons had. Wherefore he sayde, that it was better that priuate persons had Constantine.

Constantine the sonne of Constancius and of Helyn, daughter of king Coilus, reigned ouer Briteyn after his father, and ruled the lande with much equitie. And albeit, that at this time he was a heathen and Pagan, yet he vsed no tirannie, neither did he compell the Britons to refuse their law, and to worship Idols, as other Tyrants before had done.

Christians persecuted.

In this time, while Constantine ruled the Britons, one Maxencius which was the sonne of Hercules Maximianus sometime felow in the Empire with Dioclesian, was of the pretorian Souldiours declared Emperour. Thys Maxencius did there behaue himselfe the worst of all men, and enterprised all maner of tirannie, and persecuted the christians with all kindes of torments. And when Constantine heard of the tyranny of this man. He assembled a great hoste of Britons and Galles for to oppresse his outrage and malice.

And for to rule and guyde this land of Briteyn in his absence, he ordeyned a man of might called Octavius, which then was king of Wales & Duke of Swiscop, which some expound to be Westser, some Cornetwall, and some Wynsoze, to haue the gouernement of this dominion. Now when he had prouided all things necessarie for his boyage, he betooke the lande of Briteyn to Octavius, and sped him forward in his iourney.

Octavius vsurped the gouernment of Briteyn.

After whose departure, and during the time that he was occupied in the affaires of the Empire, Octavius being Lieutenaunt in Briteyn vnder the sayde Constantine, ruled the lande to the contentation of the Britons for a certaine time. But when he perceyued that he was in fauour with them, and also that Constantine was now farre from him, and considering with himselfe also, that the sayde Constantine being then Emperour, would not, nor could not so lightly retorne into Briteyn: he therefore with the helpe of hys friendes and such as he was ayded with, withstood the Romaines that were left in Briteyn by Constantine, and vsurped the rule & dominion of the land: whercof when Constantine was truly certified, in all haste he sent a Duke into Briteyn, named Trayherne, the which was Uncle vnto Helyn the mother of Constantine.

Trayherne.
Portchester
Winchester

When this Trayherne was arriued in Briteyn with three Legions of souldiours or men of warre: anon Octavius made toward him with his Britons, and met him nere vnto the Citie then called Caerperis, and nowe named Portchester, but more truly in a fielde nere vnto the Citie of Caeruent, which at this day is called Winchester.

Now when the two hostes were met, they ioynd a most eger and cruell battayle, wherein was a long and terrible fight. But in the ende, Trayherne was inforced to forsake the fielde, and withdrew himselfe and his Romaines into Albania or Scotiande. Whercof Octavius being warned, folowed him, and in the Countrie of Westmerland gaue him the second battaile, where then Octavius was chased and Trayherne had the victorie, the which pursued Octavius so egerly, that he compelled him to forsake the lande of Briteyn and to sayle into the Countrie of Norwaye for his safegarde.

But

But it was not long after, but the sayd Octavius gathered a newe power of people, aswell of Britons as also of Norwayes, and was redye to retorne againe into Briteyn. In which tyme an Erle of Briteyn that entirely loued Octavius by treason slue the sayd Trayherne a little before the landing of Octavius aforesayde, who afterwardes reigned in this lande at the least. liiij. yeres. but not without great and often warres made by the Romaines. And this shoulde be as most wyrters doe affirme, when Constantyne with the ayde of Trayherne had ruled this lande. x. yeres. But Polidore affirmeth that this Realme was in good quiet all the tyme of Constantyne and his successors vnto the. iiii. yere of Gracian, and maketh no mencion of this Octavius, whercof it may apere what great varietie there is euen among the best and most aproued story wyrters.

This Constantine was a right noble and balaunt Prince, and the sonne of Helena, a woman of great sanctimony and borne in Briteyn, the which Hyn as it is reported of her, founde the Crosse at Jerusalem, on the which our Saviour Christ suffered his passion, and thre of the Nayles wherewith his handes and feete were pierced.

The sayd Constantine was so mightie in Martiall prowesse, that he was surnamed Constantine the great. Of whome it is further written, that when he was in his boyage or iourney, which he made against Maxencius the Tyrant, who was an extreme persecutor of the Christians, he saw in the night season, the signe of the Crosse shining in the Element lyke a fyze, and an Angell by it sayng on this wise: In this signe thou shalt overcome. Wherfore receyuing great comfort thereby, he gathered such a courage, that shortly after he banquished the armie of Maxencius and put him to flight, who in the chase was drowned in Tyber.

Finally this good Emperour had the fayth of Christ in such reuerence, that alway most staidously he endeoured to augment the same. And in witness of his beliefe, he caused the booke of the Gospelles to be borne before him. And further made the Bible to be copped out, and sent into all partes of the Empire. Of this man, the kynges of Briteyn had first the priuelege to weare close Crownes or Diademes. He ended his lyfe at Nicomedia, where he receyued Baptisme by Eusebius Bishop there, and was buried at Constantinople, called before Bizance, who lust to know more of his actes and life, may read the sayd Eusebius, who hath written a speciall treatise therof extant among his other workes.

Octavius Duke of the Jelles, tooke vpon him againe to rule as king of Briteyn, and in the tyme of his reigne, he gathered such plenty of Treasure that he feared no man, and he ruled the land peaceably, saue that he was now and then as is aforesayd, troubled with warres by the Romaines. And of him is no notable thing written, except that when he was fallen into age, by the counsaile of the Britons, he sent vnto Rome for a yong Man of the kindred of Helyn mother vnto Constantyne called Maximianus, to whome Octavius offered his daughter in mariage, and to yelde vnto him the Kingdome of Briteyn, the which when Maximianus vnderstood, he consented thereunto, and prepared in all haste for his voyage, and shortly after he with a comenient companie landed at Southhamton, whereof Conan Meriadock being warned did purpose to haue fought with the sayd Maximianus, & thought to haue distressed him, for so much as he knew right wel, that by him he should be put from the rule of the land. But this purpose was letted by the commaundement of the king, or otherwise, so that the sayd Maximianus, was conueyed safely to the kinges presence: and shortly after the king with the consent of the moze partie of his Lordes, gaue his daughter in marriage vnto the sayd Maximianus, with the possession of this Isle of Briteyn. The which marriage being solemnised, and ended, the said Octavius dyed shortly after, when he had reigned as the most wynters agree. liii. yeres.

Romake
Scottes.

After the death of Fincoymake king of Scottes, because his heyres were but children, fierce warre was arreared betwene two noble men called Anguliane, and Romak, for the gouernaunce of the Realme: whereof ensued much trouble in the Realme of Scotlande, and great displeasure thereby engendered betwene the Scottes and the Pictes, for as much as by the ayde of the Pictes Romake tooke on him the Kingdome, and vled great crueltie thre yeres.

362

Scottes.

Not long after the Nobles of Scotland assembled themselues and set vpon Romake their king and slue him, and then was Anguliane ordeyned king: Betwene whome and the Pictes was great warre for the death of Romake, and in the ende therof both Anguliane and Nectanus king of Pictes were slaine. Then was Fethelmak crowned king, which vanquished the Pictes, and was after slaine in his bed by two Pictes, which were his seruautes.

Scottes.

About this time one Eugenius the first, was made king of Scottes. Here the Scottishe Historie maketh a long processe of the fierce & cruell warre that this king kept against Maximus the Romaine Capiteyn, and the Pictes and Britens, which I thinke to be of no more credit than the residue of their Historie, that they haue feyned from the beginning. For vndoubtedly, if they had put the Romaines to so much trouble as their Chronicles shewe, both in the tyme of the Conquest and after: Casar, Tacitus, Plinie, and other woulde haue made some mention of the Scottes, as they did of the Trinobantes, Cenimagnes, Segontiaces, Bibraces, Brigantes, Silures, Icenies, and diuerse other.

that the Britons had the possession of all Scotland.

The Scottes say, that in this time, after long and cruell warre made by the aforesayde Maximianus, they were vtterly extermined and driuen out of their Realme into Ireland and other Countries, and that then the said Maximus the Romain, placed in their land the Pictes and Britons. And Hector Boecius sayth, it was for rebellion: But rebellion could it not be properly named, except they had bene subiectes.

Maximianus or Maximus, the sonne of Leonyu and Cosyn Germain vnto Constantine the great, tooke vpon him the gouernement of this lande of Briteyn. This man was strong and mightie, but for that he was cruell against the Christians, he was called Maximianus the Tyraunt. Betwene this man and Conan before named, was great enuy and strife, and diuers conflicts and battayles were foughten, in the which eyther parte of them sped diuersly: howbeit, at the last, they were made friends. So that Maximianus reigned a while in quiet, and gathered ryches and treasure, but not not altogether without murmure and grudge. Finally, he was prouoked and excited to make warre vpon the Galles, through which counsaile, he with a great hoste of Britons sayled into Armorica that now is called little Briteyn, where he bare him selfe so valiantly that he subdued that Countrie vnto his Lordship, and after gaue the same vnto Conan Meriadok, to holde of him and his successours the kings of great Briteyn for euer. And then commaunded the sayde land to be called little Briteyn.

called little Briteyn.

Now for this victorie, the Souldiours of Maximianus proclaymed him Emperour, by reason whereof, he being the more exalted in pride, passed further into the landes of the Empire, and victoriously subdued a great parte of Gallia and all Germania. For this dede, dyuers Authours doe account him false and perjured, wherefore it should seeme that before his coming from Rome, he was swozne to Gracian and Valentinian the Emperours, that he should neuer clayme any part of the Empire.

Maximianus
Emperour.

Now after that worde was brought vnto the Emperours that Maximianus had by force of armes thus subdued Gallia and Germania: Gracianus with a great hoste came downe to resist him. But when he heard of the Marciall deedes of Maximianus, he feared and fled back to the Citie of Lyons in Fraunce: where afterwarde the sayde Gracianus was slaine, and his brother Valentinian compelled to flee to Constantinoble, for safegarde of his lyfe.

Then Maximianus to haue the more strength to withstand his enimies, made his sonne named Vircour, felow of the Emperour. And in this time that Maximianus warred thus in Italy, Conan Meriadock, to whome as aforesayde Maximianus had geuen little Briteyn, for so muche as he and his Souldiours had no will to marrie the daughters of the Frenchmen, but rather to haue wyues of their owne blood: sent Messengers vnto Dionotus then Duke of Cornewall and chiefe ruler of Briteyn, willing him to send his daughter Ursula with a certaine number of Virgins to be coupled to him and his knightes in marriage, the which soone after was prepared according to the request of Conan, the aforesayde Ursula accompanied with xi. thousand Virgins, were sent by her sayde father toward little Briteyn, as sayeth Gausfred and other. But truely it appereth rather to be a fable, and the wynters herein doe not agree, and therefore I will wade no further therein. But to returne where I left.

Maximianus, being thus occupied in warres in Italy, two Dukes named Gwanus or Guanius Capitaine of the Hunes & Melga, king of Pictes, the which as Gausfred saith, were set on by Gracian and Valentinian the Emperours, to punish and subdue the Britons that fauoured the parte of Maximianus, warred sore vpon the coastes of great Britaine, and occupied a great parte of Albania. Whereof when Maximianus had knowledge he sente into great Briteyn a knight and Capitaine called Gracianus, the which with two Legions of Souldiours bare himselfe so valiantly, that in a short tyme he chased the sayde two Dukes into Ireland, and helde the land of Briteyn in good peare to the behoofe of Maximianus.

chasing of Valentinian his brother, sped him with a great power towarde Maximianus, and shortly after at a Citie in Italie named Aquileia tooke the sayde Maximianus and him beheaded.

When knowledge of the death of Maximianus was come to Gracian, who then had the rule of great Briteyn, he sealed the land and made himselfe king of Briteyn by strength, when or after that Maximianus had governed the same, as most Writers doe beare wytnesse, the space of viij. yeres.

This Gracian having nowe obtayned the soueraigne auctoritie, became a verie cruell Prince and exercised all tyranny and exaction vpon the people, for which cause he was abhorred of all the Britons, and by them was slaine when he had reigned foure yeres. Then was the Realme a good space without a head or gouernor, in the which time the Britons were oftentimes sore vexed with the aforesayde Barbarous people and their forrein enemies.

Augustine whom we call Saint Augustyn.

This time was Augustine the most famous & learned Doctor of Christs Church: he was Bishop of Hippon a Citie in Affrique. This man was of such excellent wyt, that in his childhood he learned all the liberall Sciences without any instructor, and in all partes of Philosophy was wonderfully well learned. At the beginning he fauoured the opinions of them which be called Manichees, but by the continuall prayer of his good mother Monica: and the persuation of holy Saint Ambrose, he was conuerted to the true faith. They both of them being replenished with the holy Ghost, sang the Psalme, Te deum, answering mutually one to another. And afterwardes, in prayer writing and preaching he so much profited the Church, that to this daye his name is worthily had in honour and reuerence of all men.

Beda.

The Scottes (according to their Histories) vnder their king Fergus the second, returned out of Ireland into Albion, and continuing the reigne of three kings, that is Fergus, Eugenius and Dongarde, pursued the Britons with most cruell warres. But here they dissent from the English Chronicles, as well in the computation of tymes, as in the relation of the whole Historie, for after Beda, Gildas and other auncient and credible Writers, the Scottes came first about this time out of Ireland into that Countrey, which they afterwards named Scotland. But howsoeuer these Histories agree, truth it is that the Scottes being confederate with the Pictes, not long from this time, by consent of all Writers, invaded and spoiled the lande of Briteyn so cruellly, that the Briteyns were constreyned to sende for ayde to the Romaines, promising that they would perpetually be subiect to the Empire: which request was heard, & a Capitaine sent with a Legion of Souldiours, who within a fewe dayes chased their enemies out of the land, teaching them to make a Wall of Cornes and stakes, ouertwahrt the lande, from Sea to Sea, that is to meane from the water of Humber to the Scottishe Sea, and ordeyned them Wardeyns and keepers of the Wall (wherewith their enemies might be kept back out of the land) and then they tooke leaue of the the Britons and departed to Rome. But Polichronicon sayeth, that the sayde Wall stretched from Denulton to the Citie of Aclind.

But notwithstanding the sayd Wall, the Britons were againe invaded by the Pictes and Scottes, who spoiled the Countrey verie sore: So that they were driuen to seeke for newe helpe of the Romaines, who sent to them againe a company of Souldiours, which eftsones chased the Pictes, and made a wall of stone of viij. foote thicke, and in heighth. xij. foote: which thing when they had done, comforting the Briteynes, and admonishing them hereafter to trust to their owne manhood and strength, they returned againe to Rome.

The Scottes and Pictes yet once againe after the departure of the Romaines, entred the lande of Briteyn, and spoiled the countrey, and chased the commons so cruellly, that they were altogether comfortlesse, and brought to such misery, that eche robbed and spoiled other, and ouer this the ground was vtillid, whereof ensued great scarcetie and hunger, and after hunger death. In this necessitie they sent for ayde to Accius the Romaine Capitaine beyng then occupied in warres in a part of Gallia. But they had no comfort at his hand. And therefore were forced to send Ambassade to Aldroenus king of little Briteyne to desyre of him ayde and comfort, which they obtained vpon condicion, that if they atchiued the victorie, Constantyne his brother should be ordeyned king of great Briteyn, for to that day they had no king. Which thing beyng graunted of the Ambassadors, the said Constantine gathered a company of Souldiours, and went forth with them. And when he had manfully banquished the enemies, and obteyned the victorie, according to promes made, he was ordeyned king, & guded this land. x. yeres with such manhood and pollecy, that he kept it in quietnesse & from daunger of straunge enemies.

Accius.

Aldroenus.

Constatyne

Here endeth the Dominion and tribute of the Romaines ouer this land of Briteyn, which had continued the space of. 483. yeres.

Constantine the second, who was the brother of Aldroenus king of little Briteyn, was crowned king of great Briteyn and guded wel the land the space of. x. yeres, and in great quietnesse. Of this Constantyne is little written, except that he had by his wife thre sonnes, of which were named, Constantianus, Aurely Ambrose, & Uter surnamed Bendragon. But for that he sawe his eldest sonne named Constantianus to be dull and insolent of wit, he therefore made him a Monke in the Abbey of S. Swithines at Winchester. And the other two brethren, he betoke vnto Gwethelinus Archbishop of London to nourish and instruct. Some wyte that Constantianus entred into religion of pure deuocion, without the consent or knowlege of the king his father.

Constantianus name.

In the Court of this Constantyne (as sayth Gaufride) there was a Pict, that was much loued & greatly fauoured of him, so that he might at all times come to the kinges presence, when he would himselfe. The which beyng an arrant Traytour, and serching conuenient time to execute his detestable treason, by a secret meane slue the king in his Chamber, when he had reigned as king. x. yeres. The Authoz of the story named the flowers of stories, writeth that he slue him with a knife in a very thicke Coppes, as he was a hunting.

In the tyme of this Constantyne of Briteyn, their reigned also among the

the Scottes one of the same name, who was named Constantyne the first, he was a wicked Prince, and geuen wholly to filthy lust and pleasure of the body, and without all vertue of pollicye or noblenesse, wherefore in the ende he was slaine for rauishing of a noble mannes daughter.

Constantius, the sonne of Constantyne, by the meane of Vortigerus Duke of Cornewall, or as some write of the Jewelles, after called West Saxon, was made king of Briteyn. This man as before is mentioned, was thought by his father, for that he was dull of wit and hadtpe of minde to be therefore vnnete to take the charge of the Gouvernement vpon him, and therefore his father made him a Monk as aforesayde. But now it came so to passe that by the practise and procurement of Vortiger he was taken out of the Abbey and made king: By meane whereof the sayd Vortiger had all the rule of the lande, so that Constance had but onely the name.

Constantius
first a Monk
king.

This Vortiger then considering the innocencye and mildenesse of the king, cast in his minde how he might be king himselfe. And among other meanes, he practised to haue about the king an hundreth Pictes, to waite and attend vpon his person as a garde, which beyng brought to passe, he bare himselfe so friendly towards the sayde Pictes, and shewed him selfe so liberall vnto them euery way, that at length he had thereby so wonne their good will and fauour, that they abashed not to say openly, that he was more worthy to be king than Constance.

A Sord first appointed to attend on the king.

And in this while Vortiger gate into his possession the kinges Castels and treasure, and looke what he commaunded, that was done, though some did murmure and grudge thereat, and euer in right or wrong he fauoured the aforesayd Pictes.

Now when he sawe that he had wonne all their fauours, he made them all dronke on a tyme, and then declared vnto them in that case his pouertie and miserie, and that with teares, sayng howe he was not able of his atone proper reuence to wage somuch as fiftie Souldiours, and with that he departed from them vnto his lodging, as a man altogether dismayde, leauing them still drinking and quaffing in the Court. The Pictes hearing him say so, beyng nowe distempered and set in a rage by reason of Wyne, murmured one of them to another, sayng, why do we not kill this blockish Monk, that this noble Man Vortiger, who is so good and beneficial a Lord vnto vs may enjoy the Crowne. And with that they rose vp in their dronken moode, and fell vpon the king and slue him.

After which cruell deede so by them done, they presented the head of Constance vnto Vortiger. Wherof when he was ware, and to thentent that the Britons should thinke that deede to be done against his minde and will, he wept and made semblaunce of all sorow and heavinesse, and caused the sayd hundreth Pictes forthwith to be taken, and them by the iudgement of the lawe of the lande to be beheaded, by reason whereof he was iudged not to be culpable, but innocent of the kinges death.

all to death.

When the kings death was knowne to such persons as had the keeping of the two yonger brethren, Aurelius & Uter, they in all hast for the sauegard of themselves fled into little Briteyn, & there kept them vntill it pleased God otherwise to prouide for them. And thus as ye haue heard was king Constance stance slaine when he had reigned fiiue yere.

Ingallus, the sonne of king Dongarde was ordeyned king of Scotland after the Death of Constantine. He was geuen to peace, quietnesse, and iustice, and was a good and moderate Prince.

Vortiger after the death of Constance, by force made himselfe king of Briteyn, and ruled, but not all without trouble. For it was not long or that the Pictes hauing knowledge of the death and destruction of their knightes and knismen, invaded the Northpartes of the land, & did therein great damage and hurt. And besides this, many of the nobles of the Britons perceuyng that king Constance was not murdered altogether without the consent of the sayde Vortiger, rebelled against him, and dailye sent and sayled ouer into little Briteyn to the ayde and assistance of the aforesayde children of Constantine, which put the sayde Vortiger to great vniquietnesse, the more for that that he wist not, nor knewe not in whome he might put his trust and confidence.

Now yet in all this broyle and vniquiet time, there was in this Realme so great plentie of Corne and fruite, that the lyke thereof had not bene seene in many yeres passed, wherewith was toynd lecherie and pestilence, with many other inconueniences, so that vice was accompted for small or none offence. The which reigned not onely in the Temporalitie, but also in the Spiritualitie and heads of the same. So that suerie man turned the point of his Speare against the true and innocent man, and the commons gaue themselves altogether to dronkenesse and Idlenesse, by reason whereof ensued fighting, strife, and much enuie. Of which aforesayd mischiefes ensued much mortalitie and death of men, that the lying scantly sufficed in some Countreies to burie the dead. And besides this, the king was so heard beset with the aforesayd enemies, that he was constreyned, as sayth Polichronica, to sende for Daynems, as the Saxons, to helpe to withstande his enemies and to defend his land, and also he dailye feared the landing of Aurely and Uter.

Vortiger being thus beset with many enemies, and then being for the exployte of sundrie his affaires at Cauntorbury, tydinges was brought him of the arriuing of three talle Ships full of armed men at the Isle of Tenet. Wherfore, first he made countenance, as though he had bene in doubt whether it had bene the two brethren of Constance or no: But when the same was bloven about, that they were none enemies: anone he caused the leaders and Capitaines of them to be brought vnto his presence, demanding of them the cause of their landing, and of their Nation and Countreie: who answered vnto the king and sayde, they were of the Countreie of Germany, and put out of their Countreie by a maner & sort of a Lot, which is sundrie times vsed in the sayde lande, and the vse thereof grewe for that the people of that Countreie encreased so greatly, that without such prouision had, the Countreie might not suffice to finde the people that were therein: And that therefore sence fortune had brought them into this land, they besought the king that he would take them to his seruice, and they would be ready to fight for the defence of him and his Countreie. And when the king had enquired further, he founde that they had two leaders, named Hengist and Horsa, and they and their people were called Saxons.

The king being thus ascertayned of the maner of these strangers, & that they were of the heathen and Pagan law, said, he was verie sozie & they were miscreants, but he was glad of their coming, forsomuch as he had neede of such Souldiours to defend him and his lande against his enimies: and so receiued them into his wages and seruice, as saith Gaufride and other writers.

¶ Beda the holye man and saythfull Historian sayeth, that Vortiger sent for the Saxons for that they were strong men of armes, and had no lande to dwell in, the which came in three long Shippes or Hulkes, and receyued a place of him to dwell in, in the East side of Briteyn called the Isle of Tenet beside Kent: but Guilielmus Malmisburiensis in his worke De Regibus, sayth, that the Saxons came out of Germany of their owne will and courage to winne worshipp and laude, and not by any lot or compulsion. He sayeth also that they worshipped in those daies, a God named WODEN, supposed to be Mercury, and a Goddesse named FRIA Venus. In the worshipp of which God, the third seriall daye in the weeke, they named Wodensdaye, which we nowe call Wednesday. And in worshipp of the sayde Goddesse, they called the fiftte daye frees day, which we nowe call Friday.

¶ And these foresayde people were of three maner of Nations, that is to saye, Saxons, Anglys and Jewets. Of the Saxons came the East Saxons, West Saxons, and the South Saxons. Of the Anglys, came the East Anglys, the middle Anglys or Mercers, called Mercis, which helde middle Englande, that stretcheth Westward towarde the Riuer of Dee beside Chester, and to Seuerne beside Shrewesbury, and so forth to Bristow, and Estwarde towarde the See, and Southwarde towarde the Chamys, and so forth to London, and turning downeward and Westwarde to the Riuer Mercea, and so forth to the West See.

¶ And of the Jewets came the Kentishmen, and the men of the Isle of Wight. Of the first coming of these Saxons into Briteyn, the writers doe varie. But to returne to the storie.

¶ These Saxons with the kings power did beate downe the enimies aforesayde, and defended the land in most knightly wise, so that the king had the Saxons in great loue and fauour: which fauour Hengistus well perceyuing, vpon a season, when he saw conuenient time, he asked of the king so much ground as the hyde of a Bull or Ore would compasse, which the king graunted him. After the which graunt, the sayde Hengist to the entent to winne a large plot of ground, caused the sayde beasteskinne to be cut into small and slender Thonges. And with the same he met out a large and great circuit of ground, vpon the which he shortly after builded a large and strong Castell. By reason of which Thonge, the sayde Castell was long after named Thong Castle, and it was builded in Lyndsey.

¶ After this, tydings went into Germany of the plentie and fatnesse of the lande of Briteyn, with other commodities belonging to the same: By meane whereof, the Saxons dailye drewe to the sayde lande, and couenaunted with the Britons, that the Britons should exercise and attende vpon their husbandry and other necessarie traffique, and the Saxons as their Souldiours would defende the lande from incursions of all enimies, for the which the Britons should geue to them competent meate and wages.

¶ Then by the assignement and apoyntment of Hengist, there came out of Germany

After whose coming, Hengist vpon a day besought the king that he would see his Castle, which he had newly edified. To whose request the king was agreeable, & at the day assigned he came to the Castle, where he was ioyously receyued. And there among other pastimes, the sayd Ronowen with a Cup of Golde full of Wyne presented the king, saluting and sayng vvaslayle. The king which before that tyme had heard no like salutation, neither vnderstood what she ment, asked of her father what she ment by that worde vvaslayle. To whome it was answered by Hengist, that it was a salutation of good lucke and gladnesse, and that the king should drinke after her, and adding also this answer, that it was as much to say, as drinke hayle. Wherefore the king as he was informed tooke the Cup of the Maydens hand and dranæ: And after he behelde the Damsell in such maner, that he was wounded with the dart of the blinde God Cupide, in such wise that neuer after he coulde withdrawe his lust from her: but lastly by the instigation of the Deuill, asked her in marriage of her father. And by force thereof as witnesseth Polichronica, he put from him his lawfull wyfe, of the which he had before tyme receyued three noble sonnes, Vortimerius, Catagrinus, and Pascencius. Then the king gaue to Hengist the Lordship of Kent, though Garangonus then Erle thereof thereat grudged with many of his Nobles and Comunons.

¶ For this, and because the king had married a Pagan woman, all the Britons in a maner forsooke him and his woorkes. Notwithstanding, yet some there were, as well of the Nobles as other, that comforted the king in hys euill doying. By which meane and other vnlawfull deedes, then dayly bled, the sayth of Christ began soze to decay. And besides that, an heresie called the Ariens heresie began to spring in Briteyn, for the which two Bishops named Germanus, and Lupus (as Gaufride saith) were sent into Briteyn to reforme the people that were infected with the same, and erred from the way of truth.

¶ Then to finish the story of Vortiger, forasmuch as the Britons withdrew themselves from hym, he was therefore constrayned to retayne with him the Saxons. By whose counsaile he afterwarde sent for Octa the sonne of Hengist, the which brought with them another companie out of Saronie. And from this tyme the Saxons sought alway occasion to extinguish vterly the power of the Britons, and to subdue the land to themselves.

¶ When the Lordes of Briteyn saw and considered the great multitude of Saxons, & their dayly repayre into this land, they assembled them together, and shewed to the king the inconuenience & ieopardy that might ensue to him and his land, by reaso of the great power of these strangers, & they aduertised him in aduoyding of greater daunger to expel & put them out of this realme, or the more part of them: But all was in vaine, for Vortiger had such a mind to the Saxons by reason of his wyfe, & he preferred the loue of them, before the loue of his owne natural kinsmen & friends. Wherefore the Britons of one will & mind crowned Vortimerus the eldest sonne of Vortiger king of Briteyn, and depriued the father of all kingly dignify, when he had reigned. xvi. yeres.

¶ Vortimer the sonne of Vortiger, was by the assent of the Britons made King of Briteyn, the which in all haste pursued the Saxons, and gaue vnto them a great battayle vpon the Riuer of Daruent, where he had of them the victorie. And secondarily he fought with them vpon the Fooorde called Epyfoord, or Aglisphorpe. In the which fight Carrignus the brother of Vortimer, and Hozsus, brother to Hengist, or Cosin, after long fight betwene them two, eyther of them slue other, in which fight also the Britons were victours. The thirde battaile he fought with them nere vnto the Sea syde, where also the Britons chased the Saxons, and compelled them to take the Isle of Wight for their suretie. The fourth battayle was nere vnto a Hoore called Cole Hoore, the which was long and soze fought by the Saxons, by reason that the sayd Hoore closed a part of their Hoast so strongly, that the Britons might not approche to them for daunger of theyr shot. Hobbeit, in the ende they were chased, and many of them by constraint were drowned and swallowed in the sayde Hoore.

¶ And ouer and besides these foure principall battailes, Vortimer had with the Saxons sundrie other conflicts and skirmishes, as in Kent, Thetfoorde in Norfolk, and in Essex, nere vnto Colchester, & left not vntill he had bereft from them the more part of suche possessions, as before time they had wonne, and kept themselves onely to the Isle of Tenet, where Vortimer besieged them, with his Nauie, and oftentimes fought with them by water.

¶ And as Gaufride sayeth, when they sawe that they were not able any longer to endure the force of the Britons, and to make their partie good with them, they then sent Vortiger the father (whome they had present with them in all the fieldes that they fought against the Britons) vnto the king his sonne, praiyng him to lycence them safely to depart againe into their country of Germany. And whiles this matter was in talke betweene the father and the sonne, they priuily conueyed themselves into their Shippes, and so returned home againe, leauing their wyues and children behinde them. Fabian.

¶ When that Rowen the daughter of Hengist perceyued the great mischief that her father and the Saxons were in, by the martiall knighthood of Vortimer: she sought such meanes (as sayeth Gaufride and other) that Vortimer was poisoned, when he had ruled the Britons. vij. yeres.

¶ Because the storie touching the end and death of the sayde Vortimer is verie notable, it shall not be amisse to recite it here in effect, as it is written by the sayd Gaufride. When Vortimer had now gotten the victorie of the Saxons, he beganne lyke a good Prince to restore againe vnto the Britons such possessions as were taken from them by the sayde Saxons, and to loue and honour them: And at the request of the holy man Germaine to reedefie such Churches as were by them destroyed and ouerthrowne. But the Deuill by and by enuied at his vertue and godlynesse, who entering into the heart of his stepmother Rowen, moued her to imagine his death: whereupon she sending for all the Wytches and Poysoners that she coulde hereof, caused verie strong Poyson to be ministred vnto him, by a verie familiar and nere friend of his, whome she had corrupted before with many great giftes. Now when this noble warrour had receyued this deadly poyson, he vpon a sodaine became desperately sick, in such wise as their was no hope of lyfe in him. Then commaunding all his Souldiours to come before him to shewe to them what daunger he stood in, and how the houre of death was at hande, he deuoyded among them his treasure and such goodes as his auncetours had left him. And perceyuing them greatly to lament and bewaile the miserable case and daunger daunger that he was in, he comforted them, sayyng, that the waye which he should goe was comen to all fleshe, and so exhorted them that as they had before stiked vnto him like men, and had shewed themselves valyaunt and couragious in fighting against the Saxons, euen so hereafter they woulde lykewise perseuer in the defence of their native Countrey, against all the inuasions of forrein enemies. That done, of a great hardy courage he commaunded a Sepulcher of Brasse to be made spire wise, and the same to be set in that porte or Hauen where the Saxons were commonly wont to arryue, and his dead corps to be layde in it, that as soone as those barbarous people should see once the Sepulchre, they for feare might returne backe againe into Germany. For he sayde that not one of them all durst be so hardie as to approche the lande if they once saw the sayde Sepulchre. O most hardie and dowtie king, who desyred to be feared of them euen after his death, vnto whome he was a terrour in his lyfe time: But when he was dead, the Britons performed not his commaundement, but buried his body at London.

¶ Vortiger was now againe restored to the kingdome of Briteyn, and shortly after Hengist eyther of his awne accorde, or as Gaufride wytteth sent for by the procurement of his daughter Rowen, entred thys land againe with a great multitude of Saxons, whercof Vortiger, being informed in all haste, assembled his Britons and made towardes them. But when Hengist heard of the Britons, and of the preparation that was made against him, he then made meanes for the intreaty of peace, where in the end, it was concluded that a certaine number of Britons, and as manye of the Saxons, should vpon the next May day assemble vpon the playne of Ambziz, now called Sarisbury, or as Gaufride saith, nere vnto the Abbey of Amesburie, founded by one Ambzius: which day being certeynly prefixed, Hengist vsing a new practise of treason, charged all his Saxons by him appointed, that eche of them should put secretly a long knyfe in their hosen, and at such time as he gaue to them this watch or bye worde, Nempnith your Sexes, that is, drawe your knyfes, that euerie one of them should drawe out his knyfe and slea a Briton, sparing none, but Vortiger the king onely. And at the day before appointed, the king with a certaine number of Britons, not ware of this purposed treason, came in peaceable wise to þe place before assigned, where he found ready Hengist with his Saxons. The which after due obedience made vnto the king, he receyued him with a countenance of loue and amitie, where after a time of communication had, Hengist being minded to execute his purposed treason, gaue forth his watchword. By reason whereof anon the Britons were slaine lyke shepe among wolues, to the number (as Gaufride wytteth) of. iiii. C. and. lx. barons & noble men, hauing no maner of weapon to defend themselves withall, except that any of them might by his manhood & strength either get þe knife out of his enemies hand, or else by stoues or such like weapõ as they might come by, any of them, by which meanes diuers of the Saxons also were slaine, so þe this there trechery was performed. And among the number of these Britons þe were thus distressed, there was then an Erle called Edolfe Erle of Chester, or rather after Gaufride Edole, Baron of Glovcester, who seeing his felowes & friends thus murthered (as the said Gaufrid saith) by his manhood recovered a stake out of a hedge, with the which he knightly defended him

ded himselfe and slue of the Sarons three scoze and ten persons, and being ouer set by his enimies and not able to make any longer resistance was compelled to flie to his awne Citie. After which treason thus executed, the king remayned with Hengistus as Prisoner. Fabian.

¶ But the sayde Gaufride writeth moze fuller hereof in this wise. After the Sarons had accomplished their mischeuous purpose, they woulde in no wise slay Vortiger: But threating to kill him, they kept him in a holde, and demaunded him to geue by a delyuer vnto them his good townes and strong holdes as a raunsome for his lyfe: vnto whome the king graunted whatsoeuer they requyred of him, so that he might depart with lyfe. And when he had confirmed his graunt made vnto them by an othe, then was he set at libertie and delyuered out of Prison. This done, the Sarons tooke Porke, Lyncolne, and Winchester, and wasting al the Countreys as they went, they set vpon the common people and slue them, as Wolues are wont to deuoure the sely pore Sheepe that are left alone and forsaken of their Shepheards. Now when Vortiger sawe the great murther and slaughter of his people, he gat him into Wales as a man that wist not what to doe, and howe to be reuenged vpon this wicked Nation.

Mathew of Wellminst.

¶ Of the taking of Vortiger, and slaying of the Lordes of Briteyn (Guilielmus de regibus sayth) that Hengist agreed with Vortiger and his Britons that he should enioy the Castell by him before made, with a certeyne lande thereto adioynng for him and his Sarons to dwell vpon. And when the said agreement was surely stablished, this Hengist entending treason, desired the king with a number of his Lordes to come and feast with him within his sayd Castle, the which of the king was graunted. And at the day assigned the king and his Lords came vnto the sayd Thongcastle to dynner, where he with his, was well and honourably receyued, and also deyntily serued.

¶ But when the king and his Lordes were in their most mirth, this Hengist had commaunded before, that his awne knightes shoulde fall out among themselves: which beyng so done, the remnaunt of his Sarons, as it were in parting of frayes, should fall vpon the Britons, and slay them all, sauing only the king. The which thing was done, as ye heard before deuised, and the king was kept and holden as prisoner.

¶ Hengist then hauing the king as prisoner, and a great part of the rulers of Briteyn, thus as aforesayde subdued, was some deale exalted in pride, and compelled the king to geue vnto him, as Polichronica sayth, three prouinces in the East part of Briteyn, that is to say, Kent, Suffer, Norfolk and Suffolke (as sayth the floure of Histories) But Guido de Columna sayth, that the aforesayde three prouinces were Kent, Essex, Norfolk and Suffolke. Of the which sayde prouinces when Hengist was possessed, he suffered the king to go at his libertie. And then Hengist began his Lordship ouer Kent, and sent other of his Sarons to guyde and gouerne the other prouinces, vntill he had sent for other of his kinsmen to whome he purposed to geue the same prouinces vnto.

¶ Thus Hengist beyng in the possession of this prouince of Kent, commaunded his Sarons to call it Hengistes land, whereof as some Authours wyte, the whole land of Briteyn tooke his first name of England: But that is not so, as after shall be shewed in the story of King Egbert.

¶ The

¶ The Lordship of kingdome of Kent had his beginning vnder Hengist, in the fift yere of Vortigers second reigne, and in the yere of our Lorde after most wyters. iij. C. lxxvj. But Denys and other which say, it begonne. xxj. yeres sooner, aloweth the beginning hereof to be when Hengist had first the gift of the same, by reason that Vortiger maryed his daughter. This Lordship conteyneth the Countrie that stretcheth from the East Ocean vnto the Ryuer of Chamys, and had vpon the Southeast, Southery, and vpon the West, London: vpon the Northeast the Chamys aforesayde, and also Essex, and in this Lordship was also conteyned the Isle of Thanet, which Lordship of kingdome endured after most wyters, from the tyme of the first yere of the reigne of Hengist, vntill the. xxb. yere of Egbert before named, which by that accompt should be. iij. C. xliij. yeres. At which season the sayd Egbert then king of West Sarons, subdued Waldredus then king of Kent, and ioyned it to his awne kingdome. Howbeit Polichronica affirmeth it to endure by the space of. iij. C. lxxvij. yeres, vnder xx. Kinges, whereof Waldredus was the last. The first Christen King of this Lordship was Ethelbertus or Ethelbert, the which receyued the fayth of Christ by Austine or Augustine the Monke, in the yere of our Lorde. iij. C. xxvj. The which Ethelbert caused the Monasterie of Saint Peter and Paule at Cantorbury to be buylde, and as some say, he first began the building of Poules Church in London. He gaue vnto Austyn and his Successors Bishoppes of Cantorbury, a place for the Bishoppes See, at Christes Church within the sayd Citie, and endowed it with many riche possessions, as moze at large shall be shewed in the lyfe of Careticus.

Ethelbertus the first christen king of Kent.

¶ This Hengist and all the other Sarons which ruled the. viij. principates of Briteyn, as after shall be shewed, are called of most wyters Reguli, which is as much to say in our bulgare speche, as small or petie kings: So that this Hengist was accompted as a little king. The which when he had thus gotten the rule of the thre prouinces before mencioned, he sent for mo Sarons, and gathered them together that were sparkled abroade, so that in these prouinces the fayth of Christ was vtterly quenched and layde a sleepe.

Reguli. Small kings

¶ Nowe let vs retorne againe to Vortiger, the which when he sawe the Sarons in such wise encrease their strength, and the Britons dayly to decrease, for as Gaufride sayth, the Sarons had the rule of London, Porke, Lincolne, and Winchester, with other good townes. Wherefore the king for feare of the Sarons, and also for that he was somewhat warned of the cunning of the two brethren, Aurely, and Uter, sonnes of Constantyne: He therefore considering these manye and great daungers, fled into Cambria, or Wales, and there held him for the more suretie, where before he had builded a strong Castle. Of the which buylding, and impediment of the same, and of the Prophet Marlyn many thinges are written by Gaufride, and reported by the common voyce of the people yet at this day.

and passed the Sea, and landed at Cornelle, whereof when the Britons had knowledge, they drew vnto them in all hastie wise. The which sayd brethren, when they saw that they had a competent number of knightes and men of warre, first of all made towarde Wales to distresse Uortiger.

¶ Whereof he being well warned, and knowing also that he coulde not make sufficient defence against them, he therefore furnished his Castle with strength of men and victuall, entending there to sauegarde himselfe, but all was in vaine: for the said two brethren with their army, besieged the Castle and after many assaultes, with wyldesyre consumed the same, and Uortiger also, and all that were with him.

¶ Of this Uortiger it is redde, that he lay with his abone daughter, in trust that Kinges should come of his blood. And lastly, he ended his life as before is expressed, when he had reigned now the second tyme .ix. yeres.

¶ Durannus, for so much as the Children of his brother Congallus were but yong, was ordeyned king of Scottes, and guyded them in good peace and quietnesse a long space: but at the last he was slaine for extortion, that Comset his Chauncelour vsed in his name.

¶ Aurelius Ambrose, the seconde sonne of Constantine was by the Britons made king of Briteyn. Of him it is wrytten that when he vnderstood of the deuision that was in the land of Briteyn betwene Uortiger and the Saxons, and in what maner the Saxons had subdued the Britons, he in all goodly haste, with the ayde of the King of little Briteyn, sped him into his land, and first came to Porke, and there chased the Saxons that helde the Citie with Octa the sonne of Hengist, and tooke the sayde Octa, and kept him as prisoner a certeyn season.

¶ But howe it was, by treason of his keeper or otherwise, he brake Prison and escaped. And after, he with his father gathered a great hoste, and met Aurelius and his Britons, at a place called Crekynforde, where was foughten a strong and mightie battaile, to the losse of both parties, but the greater losse fell vpon the Saxons: for of them was slaine foure Dukes, and .iiij. M. of other men, and the residue chased to their great daunger. Yet this notwithstanding Hengist continued his Lordship in Kent: and Aurelius Ambrose kept the Countrie called Logiers or middle England with Wales, and chased the Saxons that dwelled in the two Prouinces of East Saxon, and East Anglis out of those Countries.

¶ And in this tyme a Saxon named Ella, with his three sonnes, Symon, Pletynger, and Cilla, came with three Shippes or Hulkes, and landed in the South part of Briteyn, & slue many Britons, at a place then named Cuneue-shore, or Comingsborough & chased many into a Wood then called Andresleger, and after occupied that Countrie, and inhabited himselfe & his Saxons within the sayde Prouince, making himselfe king and Lorde thereof: By reason wherof and by his might and power, the said Prouince or Countrie was after named the Kingdome or Lordship of the South Saxons. The which after most wryters had his beginning the xxxii. yere after the first coming of Hengist, which was the yere of our Lorde 482. and the second yere of the reigne of Aurely Ambrose then King of Briteyn.

¶ The kingdom of the South last aboue named had on the East side, Kent, on the

on the South, the See and the Isle of Wight, and on the West, Hampshyre, and in the North Southerey, and conteyned Southhampton. Somersetshire, Deuonshire and Cornewall. Of which sayde kingdome Ethelwald or Ethelwald was the fourth king, and the first christen king. This kingdome endured thortest season of all the other kingdomes: for it endured not aboue an hundred and .xij. yeres, vnder .v. or .viij. kings at the most.

¶ But now to returne where we left: Aurely which as before you have heard, held and occupied the middle part of Briteyn with Cambria or Wales, did his diligence to repayre ruynous places, as well Temples as other, and caused the seruice of God to bee sayde and done, which by the meane of the Saxons was greatly decayed thorough all Briteyn.

¶ And after this, Aurely besieged the Saxons in the hill of Badon or Baathe, where he slue many of them. But daiely the Saxons encreased and landed in great Briteyn, as shall appere. For shortly after a Saxon named Porth, landed with his two sonnes at a Hauen in Suller, after whose name as some wryte, the Hauen was afterwards called Portesmouth, which Hauen is so called to this day. And lykewise they came to lande in diuers places of Briteyn, so that Aurelius had with them manye conflictes and battailes, wherein he sped diuersly, for he was sometime victour and sometime ouercome.

¶ It is wrytten in the English Chronicle and other, that Aurely by the helpe of Marlyn did fetch the great stones now standing vpon the playne of Salburie, (called the Stone Henge) out of Ireland, and caused them to be set there as they now stand, in the remembraunce of the Britons that were there slaine and buried in the tyme of the treyterous communication that was had with Hengist and his Saxons as before in the storie of Uortiger is touched: But Polichronica allegeth the same act to Uter his brother.

¶ In the tyme of this Aurely, as sayeth Polichronica, dyed Hengist in his bed, when he had reigned ouer the Kentishe Saxons. .xxiiij. yeres. After whose death Octa his sonne ruled the sayde kingdome other. .xxiiij. yeres. Albeit that the Britishe bookes and also the English Chronicle, saye that Aurelius slue in battaile Hengist, & then tooke to his grace Octa his sonne, and gaue to him and his Saxons a dwelling place in the Countrie of Galewaye, which seemeth not lykely, for matter that shall after ensue, and also that which before is touched of the Pictes and Scottes in the tyme of the miserie of the Britons.

¶ And finally in the ende of the reigne of Aurely, Pascentius the yongest sonne of Uortiger, which after the death of his father was fled into Ireland for feare of Aurely, purchaced ayde of Guiliamoz king of Ireland. And with a great armie invaded this lande of Briteyn, by the Countrie of Wales, in taking the Citie of Meneua, now called S. Davids, and in wasting the sayd Countrie with sworde and fyre. In the which season and tyme Aurelius laye sicke in the Citie of Winchester.

¶ For which cause he desired his brother Uter to gather an hoste of Britons together, and to appease the malice of Pascentius and his Adherents.

The which accordingly prepared his hoste, and at length ouercame the hoste of Pascentius and slue him and the afozenamed Guplamour in the fiede.

Howbeit, Gaufride reporteth this storie otherwise, affirming that Pascentius the sonne of Nortiger, who for sauegarde of his lyfe, fled into Germany, came with a great armie of Germanes out of the same Countrie against Aurelius to be reuenged vpon him for his fathers death, and gaue battaile vnto Aurelius himselfe, in the which the sayde Pascentius and his Germanes were discomfited and put to flight. Then Pascentius who durst not after the sayde discomfiture returne into Germany, gate him into Ire-land desiring ayde of Guillomannius then king of that Countrie, who taking compassion of him, ayded him with all he might. And so by the helpe of the sayde king arrived at Meneuia, now called S. Davids in Wales: At the which season Aurelius being sick at Winchester, commaunded his brother Uter to gather an armie to appease his malice, the which he did, and then went into Wales to meete hym, where was foughten a cruell battaile betwene them, in the which Uter had the victorie, and Pascentius and Guillo-mannius were slaine.

Now while Uter was thus gone against Pascentius, a Saron, feyn-ning himselfe a Briteyn, and a cunning man in Physick, by the entisement of Pascentius & vpon great rewards by him promised, came vnto Aurely wher he lay sicke, and by his subtil and false meanes, purchascd fauour with those that were nere vnto the Prince, that he was put in trust to minister potions and Medicines vnto the king. This man of some wyters is called Copu, and of some Coppu, but of Gaufride Copu. The which when he had espied his conuenient time, gaue to Aurelius a potion enpoysoned: by violence whereof he hostly after dyed, when he had reigned. xix. yeres, and was bu-ried at Stonhenge besides Amesburie.

In the time of the reigne of the aforesayde Aurely (Polichronica sayeth) that the kingdome of East Anglys began vnder a Saron named Uffa, in the yere of our Lorde. CCC. xxi. The which conteyned that Province which we call now Norfolk and Suffolk. They had in the East and Northsides, the Sea, on the Northwest, Cambridshire: notwithstanding dyuers wy-ters affirme Cambridshire to be parte of the sayde kingdome, and in the West S. Emondes Diche, and Hertfordshire, and in the South Essex. Thys Lordship was called first Uffins Lordship, and the kings thereof were na- med Uffins, or as some write, they were called Uffines people, but at the last they were named East Anglis.

The first christen king of this principate, was Redwallus, but he was not so constant as was meete for his Religion. His sonne named Corpwal- dus was more stedfast, which after was slaine of a misbeleuing man, and for Christes faith as some write. But Guido sayth that Sebertus was the first Christian king of this Lordship, and that he made Pauls Church of Lon- don. This Lordship vnder. xij. kings, endured vntill the Martirdome of S. Edmond the last king thereof, the which was martired in the yere of our Lorde. viii. hundreth. lxx. And of this Lordship at those dayes was Elman or Chetford the chiefe Towne.

The Historie of Scotland sayth, that the Pictes and Scottes were ayded with this Ambrose, and made partakers and chiefe doers in all the victo- ries

Ter the last and pongest sonne of Constantine, and brother of Aurely, tooke vpon him the Kingdome of Briteyn, and gouerned the same ve-ry honourably. This man was surnamed Bendragon. The cause thereof, as sayth the English Chronicle, was for that Merlyn lykened him vnto a Dragon vnder a starre apering in the firmament: whereof there is made long processe in the story of Gaufride, but Layland a man in his tyme very skilfull in the antiquities of this Realme, thinketh this name was geuen him for his great prudence and wisdom where in Serpentes do excell. But how so euer it were, truth it is, that after Uter (as is aforesayde) was made king, he atchieued many victories against the Saxons, and lastly slue theyr chiefe Capitaines, Octa, & Cosa, as Gaufride writeth of him: It is also writ-ten that he was enamored vpo the Dukes wife of Cornewal named Igerne, and for to obtaine his vnlesfull lust, he sought many and dyuerse meanes: So that lastly he made warre vpon her Husbnde named Carolus, or Corleys, and at length slue the sayde Duke at his Castle called Tynntagell, standing in Cornewal, and after maryed his wyfe, and receyued of her the noble knight Arthur, and a daughter named Anne. And in the ende he dyed at Uerolame by force of poyson, when he had reigned. xvi. yeres, and was likewise burped at Stonage or Stonehenge, vpon the plaine of Sarisbury, leauing after him the most puyfaut and noble King Arthur.

Here sayth Fabian I would fayne declare the fame of this noble Prince to the comfort of other to follow his martiall dedes, so that I might somewhat iustifie my report by some autentique Authour, but hereof I doubt the more because of the sayng of Reynulph Monke of Chester, which voucheth vpon William of Malmsbury, wyter of the Histories of Kinges, as is rehered at length in the. vi. Chapter of the fift booke of the sayd Reynulph, vnto the which place because I would be brieve I referre the reader. But somewhat yet to say to the honour of so great and victorious a Champion as was thys Arthure, I will do my endeuour, so farre forth as I may be able to auouche my sayng by sufficient warrandise, and therewith glad the Welshmen, that he should discende of so noble a victour, that so many dedes of honour in his dayes executed. For though of him be written many thinges in the Englishe Chronicle of small credence, and farre discordant from other wyters, yet all agree in this, that he was a noble and victorious Prince in all his dedes, and testific that he fought. xij. notable battayles against the Saxons, and had al- wayes the vpper hande: But that notwithstanding he could not auoyde them out of his lande, but that they helde theyr Countries, which they were posses- sed of, as Kent, Southery, Northfolke, Southfolke. ¶ For as it is reported of him, he slue with his atone hande in one day by the helpe of God, an hundreth and fortie Saxons, he bare the Image of our Lady in his Shielde, which shielde he called Pridwen, his sword was called Calaber, and his Speare was called Rone, after the Britishe tongue or speche. John frofard affirmeth, that king Arthure first builded the Castle of Windfour, and there founded the order of the rounde Table.

¶ In this tyme also I finde mencion made of a noble and valiant man called Arthgall, and he was the first Erle of Warwike, and he was one of the knightes of the round Table of king Arthure, after whome folowed by succession Morwyde, and Morthrude. This Arthgal tooke a Beare for his beest because the first sillable of his name which is Arth in the Britishe speche, and is in English a Beare.

¶ About the fift yere of his reigne, began the Lordship of the West Saxons, vnder the Saxon called Cerdicus and Kenricus his sonne: for Dionice and other say, that this Lordship or Kingdome should haue his beginning the lxxi. yere after the first comming of Hengist, or the yere of our Lord sine hundredeth. xxii. which agreeth with the fift yere of Arthure aforesayd.

¶ This Lordship conteyned the West Countrie of England, as Wiltshire, Somersetshire, Berksheire, Dorsetshire, Deuonshire, and Cornewall, and had in the East syde, Southhamton, on the North Chamys the famous Ryuer, on the South and West, the Sea Ocean.

¶ The aforesayd Cerdicus, which of some is called Childericus, landed first at Cerdishore, which now is called Vermouth, an haven Towne in the Countie of Norffolke. And by the helpe of other Saxons which then dwelled there, the sayde Cerdicus at length obteyned the aforesayde Countries, and named them West Saxons, and reigned therein as Lorde and king a certeyn of yeres, and after him Kenricus his some.

¶ The first christian king of this Prouince: was named Kyngillus, and converted to the fayth by meanes of that verteous man Brennus Bishop of Dorchester. ¶ This kingdome endured longest of all the other, which were seuen in number, or sixe beside this. Some writers accompt the continuance of thys kingdome from Cerdicus to Egbert, and some to the last yere of Aluredus. But Guydo accompteth the continuance of this kingdome from the first yere of Cerdicus vnto the last yere of Edward the Confessor, and by that accompt it should endure sine hundred and. liii. yeres: But most agree that it should be reconed from the first yere of Cerdicus to the last yere of Aluredus, for he made one Monarchy of all the. vii. kingdomes, in the which time passed away. CCC. lxxviii. yeres.

¶ But nowe to returne to Arthur, the which by a long tyme dwelled in warre and mortall battaile with the Saxons, by meane of their daylie repaire into this lande. The which also alyed them with the Pictes and other Nations, and made their partie the stronger by that meane: But yet King Arthur brought them into such an obedience, that they knowledged him to be the chiefe Lorde of Briteyn.

¶ Finally, when he had by a long time maintained his warres against the Saxons, and specially against Cerdicus king of West Saxons: he for a synall concord gaue vnto the sayde Cerdicus (as sayth Polichronica) in his sixe Chapter of his fift Booke, the Prouinces of Hampshire and Somersetshire. And when he had set his lande in some quietnesse, he betooke the rule thereof vnto his Nephew Mordred, and with a chosen armie sayled (as sayth Gaufride and other) into Fraunce where as sundrie Authoers write, he wrought wonders.

¶ After the departure of Arthur (as Polichronica sayeth) the aforesayde Mordred being desirous to be king, feared somewhat the might of Cerdicus king of the West Saxons: he therfore sought for his fauour and to obteyne his good will, gaue vnto him certaine Townes, Fortes, and Castels, and other great giftes, so that at the last he wanne him, in such sort that he consented to Mordreds request: in so much that Mordred was shortly after at London crowned king of Briteyn, and Cerdicus was after the maner of the Pagans crowned king of West Saxons at Wynchester.

¶ Now when knowledge came to Arthur of all this treason wrought by his Nephew Mordred: he in all the haste made towarde Briteyn and landed at Sandwiche, where he was met of Mordred and his people, which gaue vnto him a strong battaile at the time of his landing, and there Arthur lost many of his knightes, as the famous knight Gawen and other. But yet this notwithstanding, Arthur at the length recouered the land and chased his enimies, and after the buriall of his Cosyn Gawen and other of his, that were there slaine, he set forward his hoste to pursue his enimies.

¶ Mordred being thus ouerset of his Uncle at the Sea side withdrew him to Winchester: where he being furnished of newe Souldiours, gaue vnto Arthur the second battaile, wherin also Mordred was put to the worst and constrained to flee. Thirdly and lastly, the sayde Mordred fought with his Uncle Arthur at Baath, where after a long and daungerous fight, Mordred was slaine, and the victorious Arthur wounded vnto death, when he had reigned. xxvi. yeres, and after buried in the vale or Isle of Aualon, nowe

¶ Eugenius the thirde, the sonne of Congallus, was made king of Scotland after Conannus, and reigned. xxxiii. yeres. The Scottishe Historie affirmeth, that he with his Scottes were present in the battailes that Mordred fought against Arthur.

¶ The Scottes say that this Mordred was king of Pictes, and that Arthur was slaine in battaile, and the Britons discomfited, and Guanoza the Queene taken prisoner by the Scottes with great spoyle.

¶ Constantine the thirde, the sonne of Cado, Duke of Cornewal, and Cousyn to king Arthur by assent of the Britons was crowned king, and he was by the two sonnes of Mordred grievously bered, for that they claymed the lande by the right or title of their father. So that betwene him and them were foughten many and sundry battayles, but where or when, it is not shewed, neyther are the names of the two sonnes of Mordred expressed.

¶ But sundrie Authoers agree that after the aforesayde two battailes thus foughten finally the two sonnes of Mordred were constreyned of pure force to fle for their safetie. And so the one fled to London, and the other tooke Sanctuarie in the olde Abbey Church of Winchester, dedicated to Saint Amphibalus.

¶ Whereof Constantine being warned, left not untill he had slaine the one within the Monastery of Winchester, and the other within a Church or Temple of London, of the which crueltie of his, Gildas sore complayneth.

¶ When Constantyne had thus subdued his enimies and thought himselfe now in a sure and quiet state: then arose by his awne kynsman named Aurelius Conanus and arreared mortall battaile against him, and at the last slue him in the fiede, when he had reigned three yeres, who was buried at Stonehenge. But some wypters say, he dyed by the hande of God of a great sicknesse.

Gildas.

Aurelius Conanus.

¶ Aurelius Conanus after the death of Constantine was crowned king of Briton. This man was noble and liberall, but he bled to cherishe and make much of such as loued strife and dissention within his lande, and gaue light credence to them that accused other, were it right or wrong. And as sayeth Gaufride and other, he tooke by strength his Uncle, which of right should haue bene king and cast him into a strong prison, and after slue titannously the two sonnes of his sayde Uncle: But his reigne continued not long, for as sayth Gaufride, he dyed in the second yere of his reigne leauing after him a sonne named Mordred.

¶ And here is to be noted, that after this time, the Britons decreased of Lordship and rule within Briteyn, and drew them toward Wales, so that the Countrie about Chester was the chiefest of their Lordship within Briteyn. For dailye the Saxons landed with their companies, and occupied the principall partes of the same, as shall after appere.

¶ Now

¶ Now in the time of the reigne of the aforesayde Aurely (as sayth Polichronica, Guydo and other) beganne the kingdome or Lordship of Bernicia, vnder a Saxon named Ida in the. D. xliij. yere of our Lord, and in the last yere of the sayde Conanus. This Lordship was in the North parte of Briteyn, and grewe in thort while more and more, so that finally, it was named the kingdome of Northumberlande, and was first deuuyded into two kingdomes, whereof the first as abouesayde was called Bernicia, and the other Deyra. The meres or markes of this kingdome of Northumberlande, were by East and by West the Ocean Sea, by South the Ryuer of Humber, and so downeward toward the West by the endes of the Shires of Notyngnam and Derby, vnto the Ryuer of Werse, or Martia, and by North the Scottishe Sea, which is called North or Frith in Scottishe, and in Britishe, the Werde.

Ida the first King of Bernicia, or Northumberlande.

Deyra.

¶ The Southside of this Lordship is called Deyra, which is now called the Bishoprick of Durham, and the Northside was called Bernicia, which were then departed or seuered with the Ryuer of Tyne, Deyra conteyned the lande from Humber to the Ryuer of Tyne, and Bernicia included the Countrie from Tyne to the Scottishe Sea.

Bishoprick of Durham.

¶ In Bernicia reigned first as is abouesayde, Ida or Idas, and in Deyra reigned first Ella, which Lordships beganne both within three yeres. But in processe of time both in one were named the kingdome of Northumberlande, which so continued, somewhile vnder one king, and somewhile vnder two, the space of. CCC. xxi. yeres, as sayth Reynulph Monke of Chester. And the name continued afterward vnto the Saxons and Danes, vntill the comming of Ederus brother of Ethelstane, and sonne of Edward the elder. The which Ederus in the. ix. or last yere of his reigne toynded this to his awne kingdome. By which reason it should seeme that this kingdome endured vnder that name foure hundreth. ix. yeres.

Ella first King of Deyra.

¶ The first christian Prince of this kingdome was named Edwynus, that receyued the fayth of S. Paulyne (as Guydo sayth.) In this Lordship also were included these Shires and Countries now called, Yorke, Notyngnam Shire, Derby Shire, the Bishoprick of Durham, Copelande and other.

Edwynus the first christian King of Northumberlande.

¶ Among the many kinges of Saxones that reigned in thys Lordship, which after some wypters were to the number of. xxiiij. there was one which was accompted the. viij. king, named Ethelfridus, who destroyed moe Britons than all the other Saxon kinges, and he was father to Oswy, called Saint Oswald.

Ethelfridus.

¶ But most cruelllye raged he against them in a battayle that he had besyde Chester, where by the instigation of Ethelbert King of Kent, he slue also two thousande Monkes of the house of Bangor, as sayth Polichronicon in the. v. Chapter of his fift Booke, the which Monkes were come together to praye for the good speede of the Britons. And besyde this number of Monkes, there were fiftie that fled, whereby they with their leader Bricinall were saued. Of such a number of Monkes in one house, might be demed a wonder: But Reynulph and Guydo also do affirme that in the house of Bangor at those dayes, were three tymes seuen hundreth Monkes which liued by the traunple of their handes.

Gaufride.

¶ The cause of the great slaughter of the aforesayd Monkes is declared by Gaufride in the. viij. booke and. iij. Chapter, who wyrteth thereof as foloweth. Their Abbot sayth he named Dionotus, was a man singularly well learned in the liberall sciences, who when Austyn required the Britische Bishoppes to submit themselves vnto him, and perswaded him to take paynes with him to preach the Gospell vnto the Englishe Nation, proued by diuerse reasons that they ought not to yelde any such subiection vnto him, forasmuch as they had an Archbishop of their owne, nor yet to preach to their enemies the Saxons, which seased not dayly to take from them theyr owne naturall Countrey, for the which cause they hated them deadly, and weighed not what sayth or Religion they were off, neyther did they communicate with them in any thing more than with Dogges. Therefore when Ethelbert king of Kent saw how the Britons disdeined to submit themselves vnto Austyn, and contemned his doctrine, and preaching, beyng highly displeas'd therewith he increased Ethelfride king of Northumberland, and other of the Saxon kinges also, to assemble a great power of men of armes, and then to go to Bangor and destroy Dionotus, with the Clergie there, & all the sayd religious persons that had so dispised the sayd Austyn. The which Princes folowing his aduice and counsaile, gathered together a wonderfull great army, and so marching forwarde towards Wales, came into the towne of Chester, where Buciual head ruler of that towne wayted for theyr comming: Whether also came at that same season an innumerable sort of Monkes and Heremites out of diuerse Prouinces of the Britons, but especially out of the Citie of Bangor, to pray to God to saue and defende their people.

¶ Nowe when Ethelfridus king of Northumberlande had arrered a great power out of all quarters, he set vpon the sayde Buciual, who by reason he had the lesse number of Souldiers, was constreyned to forsake the Citie and fle away, but not before he had slaine a great number of his enemies. Nowe when Ethelfridus had taken the City, and vnderstood the cause of the comming of the sayd Monkes, he commaunded them first of all to be set vpon, and so were there of them the same day a thousand and two hundred martyred. Hetherto Gaufride.

Vortiporius the sonne of Conanus, reigned after his father ouer the Britons: Of this man is no notable thing wrytten, but that Guydo sayth he was a victorious knight, and that in sundry battayles he discomfited the Saxons.

¶ In the tyme of the reigne of this king, a Saxon named Ella the sonne of Iffus, began to reigne on the Southside of the Kingdome of Northumberland called Deyra, as before is exprest.

¶ When Vortiporius had ruled the Britons foure yeres, he dyed, leauing none heire of his body.

¶ And forasmuch as all wryters agree that the kinges of West Saxons, at

at length subdued all the other kingdomes in Briteyn, and made the whole lande of Briteyn but one kingdome or Monarchy, and all other aswell of Britons as Saxons left off: Therefore I entende to bring in the name of euery king of the West Saxons from the first Cerdicus or Childricus, and ioyne them with the kinges of the Britons, for so long as hereafter the sayde Britons continued their reigne within any part of Briteyn.

Malgo a Duke of Briteyn, and nephew to Aurely, reigned ouer the Britons. This Malgo by the testimonie of many wryters was the comlyest and most personable man of all the Britons that then lyued, and therewithall was a hardie knight. And he so withstood the Saxons, and kept them binder, that they dammaged not the lande, the which he then had possession of, and as Gaufride sayth, he subdued sixe Prouinces, that is to say, Ireland, the Isles of the Orcades, Gothland, Iseland, Norway, and Denmark, and held them in quiet possession.

¶ In the tyme of the reigne of this Malgo, reigned in the Lordship or Kingdome of Kent Ethelbert, who (as sayth Reynulph) assembled a great armie, and gaue battayle vnto Ceaulmus sonne of Kenricus, and then king of West Saxons, the cause whereof is not exprest. But this battayle was the first battaile that was foughten betwene the Saxons, after that they obeyned land and dwelling within Briteyn, which was foughten in a place called Wilbaldowne. And in that fight were slaine two Dukes of Ethelbertes, and himselfe with his people put to flight and chased.

¶ Also the sayd Reynulph witnesseth that the yere folowing Cutwolphus the brother of Ceaulmus before named, fought strongly against the Britons at Bedford, and recovered from them foure Cities or townes, named Liganbrough, Egelsbrough, Besington, and Cuytham.

¶ But now to retorne to Malgo king of the Britons, the Authour of the flowre of Histories sayth, that notwithstanding the many vertues, the which God had endued him with, yet in the ende he forgat God, forsaking all vertue and gaue himselfe to sundry vices and sinnes, namely to the abhominable sinne of Sodomy: whereof ensued to him the wrath of God, wherby he was afterwarde sore persecuted of his enemies the Saxons.

¶ It was not long after the aforesayd battaile done at Bedforde, but that the aforesayde Cutwolphus dyed: But yet his sayde brother Ceaulmus desirous of honour, mainteyned his warre against the Britons, so that after he made a newe voyage against them, and gaue them another discomfiture, and tooke from them the Cities of Bathe, Gloucester, and Worcester, which should be as Reynulph accompteth in the. xxij. yere of the reigne of Malgo.

¶ About the. xxxij. yere of his reigne Ceaulmus before named, gathered his Saxons, and fought with the Britons at a place called Isechanlege: where after long fight the sayde Ceaulmus chased the Britons, and waun of them victory: but his brother called Cutha, was slaine in the fight, for whom he made great sorow. Thus in his latter dayes, Malgo beyng oppressed and pursued of his enemies, lastly dyed, when he had reigned. xxx. yeres.

¶ Onwall was made king of Scottes, and reigned. x. yeres. He was a Man of great deuocion, and gaue much to Chutches. He made many lawes concerning the libertie of Priestes. In his tyme Saint Colme of Ire-

¶ In catill brother of Contwallus reigned in Scotlande foure Monethes, and after him Aidane. xxvij. yeres. In his tyme variaunce happened betwene the Pictes and Scottes, because that Lerudeus Kinge of Pictes would not restore to Aidane certaine Traytors which fled out of his land.

¶ Careticus, or Carencius, as some call him, after the death of Malgo, reigned ouer the Britons. This Man was a louer of ciuile battayle, and was in maners and condicions the worst of all men, and therefore was hated of God and his subiectes, in such wyse as they excited and prouoked the Saxons to warre against him (as sayth Guydo) and chased him from Citie to Citie, and from Towne to Towne, vntill they had recovered from him all such land as his predecessor Malgo, had holden before him.

¶ But Polichronicon addeth more therevnto, and sayth, forasmuch as the Saxons knewe of the dissension betwene Careticus and his Britons, they in all haste sent into Ireland for the King called Gurmundus, King of the Africans, and he warred so sore vpon the Britons, that lastly the sayd Careticus was faine to take the Towne nowe called Sicester, and therein besieged him with his Britons a certaine time, where, by daile skirmishes and assaultes he lost many of his people.

¶ When Careticus had a season assayed and proued the strength of his enemies, and sawe that they still encreased and his people lessened and diminished: he sodainely left that Towne, and with a certaine number of Britons tooke ouer Seuerne water and so into Wales, then called Cambria, which should be in the thirde yere of his reigne.

¶ Truth it is, that after Careticus and his Britons were thus driven into Wales, yet he leste not continually to make assaultes vpon the Saxons that were nere vnto him.

¶ In this time, or sone after, Ethelfridus ruled the North Saxons, for as sayth Guydo, he began the reigne ouer Deyra and Bernicia, in the yere of our Lorde five hundred. xciiij. This is Ethelfridus the sonne of Ethelricus that pursued so sore the Britons, & slue so great a number of the Monkes of the Towne of Bangor as is before reherfed, the which daylie warred vpon the Britons, and the Britons vpon him, so that he destroyed & subuerted much of Christes fayth, with the helpe of the aforesayd Gormond: insomuch as the Bishops of London and Yorke, with other ministers of the Church, fled into diuers Countries, so that their Church dozes were shut vp after them, or else occupied in the worshipping of their Idolles and false Goddes.

¶ Thus the fayth that had endured in Briteyn from the time of Lucius the first christian king in Briteyn till this day, nere vpon the space of foure hundredth yeres and odde, was almost extinct throughout all the lande.

¶ And when the aforesayd Gurmund had finished his tirannie within the lande of Briteyn, then he sayled into France, where he was after slaine (as sayth Polichronica) albeit the French Chronicle speaketh nothing of any such man during this persecution, as witnesseth Guydo.

¶ During also this trouble betwene the Saxons and the Britons, the Lordship or kingdome of the East Saxons beganne to take place, as after shall be shewed.

¶ In

¶ In this time also Ethelbert reigned in Kent, and bare himselfe verie valiantly, in such wyse that he enlarged his kingdome to the bounds of Humber. In which time Gregory, who for his notable deedes was surnamed the great, was made Bishop of Rome: This Gregory as before is touched in the storie of Ethelbert, hauing compassion on the Countrie from whence so fayre children came, as he before had scene, and thinking it not meete that it should be inhabited with Pagans or people of misbeliefe, sent into Briteyn a learned man named Austyne, with other of his brethren, to preache to the Anglis the fayth of Christ. But as sayeth Antoninus in the thirde Chapter, and xij. title of his aforesayde worke: when Austyne was thre dayes iourney gone and passed, such a sodaine feare entered into him and his felowes that they turned againe. Then Gregory comforted the sayde companye, and sent them with Letters to the Bishop Arelatensis, wylling him to helpe and ayde him in all that to him needed. The tenour of which Letters and other sent to Ethelbert king of Kent, with their answers, are written with other questions in the Register of Gregory, and in the bookes of Beda and other.

¶ Austyne being thus comforted, sped him on his iourney and landed on the East side of Kent in the Isle of Thanet with xl. of his felowes, whereof some were Interpretours, or such as could speake all languages. Nere vnto the place before named, where Austyne landed, stood at those dayes, the manour or Palace of the sayde king Ethelbert, where at this daye appere some of the ruynous walles, and is called of the inhabitants of that Isle, Richbourgh. It is apparaunt betwene the Isle and the Towne of Sandwich, vpon a Myle and a halfe from the sayde Towne, Eastwarde from Cauntorbury.

¶ Then when Austyne was landed, he sent the sayde interpretours vnto Ethelbert, sayng that they were sent from Rome for the saluation of the king and his Realme. The king before time had heard of the fayth of Christ, for he had to wyfe a French woman that was christened, named Berta, and had receyued her vpon condicion that he should suffer her to lyue after her lawe.

¶ Then after a certaine time, the king spake with Austyne, but that was without the house, after the maner of his lawe, who against the comming of the king arreared and displayed a Banner of the Crucifixe, and preached to him the worde of God. Then the king sayde, it is fayre that ye promise, but for that it is to mee straunge and newe, I maye not so soone assent vnto you. But for that ye become so farre for my sake, ye shall be well entreated, and haue all things that shall be vnto you necessarie, and we graunt you leaue to conuert of oure people as many as ye can. And when they had receyued this comfort of the king, they went with procession to the Citie of Cauntorbury, singing Alleluya, where they led their liues, like as holy fathers did first begin in the Primatine Church, in fasting, prayng, watching, and such lyke godly exercises. Fabian.

¶ At length, when the king had well considered the conuersion and godly lyfe of Austyn and his felowes, he heard them the moze gladly, and lastly, by their good exhortacions & ghostly loue, he was conuerted, and christened in the yere of our Lord five hundredth. xcviij. and the sixt yere of his reigne, as sayth Polichronicon.

¶ Then the king gaue to Austyn a place for his Bishops See, at Christes Church in Cauntorburie, and builded the Abbey of S. Peter and S. Paule, on the East syde of the sayde Citie, where after Austen and all the kinges of Kent were buried, and that place is called now Saint Austynes.

¶ Then Austyn sayled into fraunce to the Bishop of Arelatensis, and was of him consecrated Archebishop of Cauntorburie.

Melitus. Iustus. Paulinus.

¶ Now when Gregoꝝ was certefyed of the good expedition of Austyn, he sent to him mo helpers, as Melitus, Iustus, and Paulinus, with bookes and answers to Austynes questions: that was, that all such goodes as fell to the Church, should be deuided into foure partes: The first part should go to the house and maintenance of the Bishoppes housholde: The seconde to the Clergie, the thirde to the amendment of the Churches, and the fourth to the reliefe of poore people and deedes of mercie.

A charitable diuident.

¶ When Austyn had baptised a great part of the kingdome of Kent, he after made two Archbishops by the commaundement of Gregoꝝ, the one at Cauntorburie, the which before was at London, and the other at Porke, as sayth the wyter of the flowes of stozies: and by the helpe of Ethelbert, he assembled and gathered together the Bishoppes and Doctours of Briteyn, that were before disparkeled. The place of the assembly was long tyme after called Austynes Oke, which is expounded to be Austines strength, & is in the Marches or confines of the people then called Wictij, now Wigorniensis, that is to say Worcester. For this synode, as Bale writeth was holden in Worcestershire.

Archbishops to Caunterburie & Porke

Austynes Oke.

¶ In this place, he charged the sayd Bishoppes, that they should ayde him to preach the worde of God to the Anglis, and also that they should amend certaine errors then vsed in the Churche, and specially for the tyme of keping their Easter, the contrary whereof, the Bishoppes of Briteyn held an opinion untill (sayth Fabian) that Austyn by his prayers & deed there a Myracle by a blinde Angle or Saron.

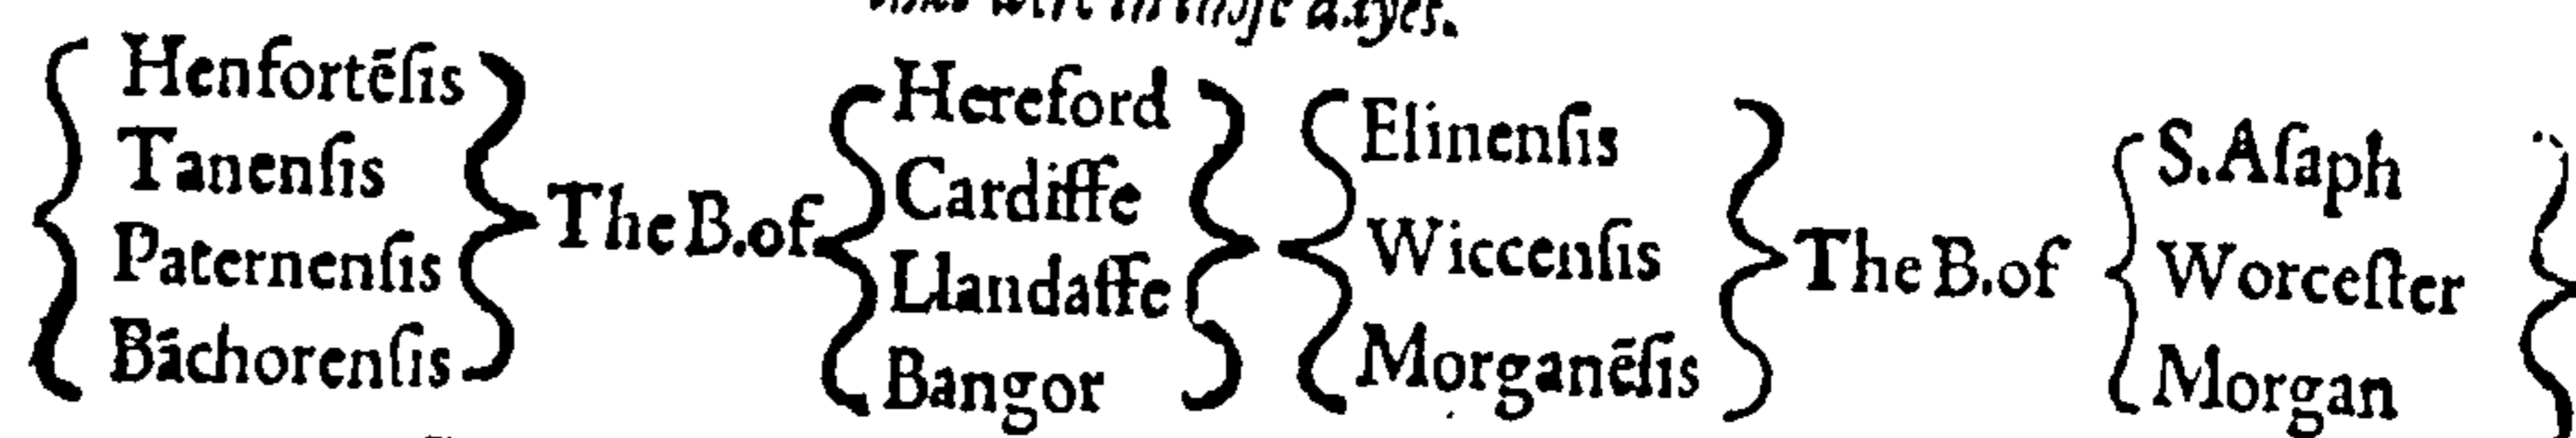

Myracle.

¶ After the which Myracle shewed, the sayd Bishoppes applyed them to the will and minde of Austyn in that matter: But for all this, there were of them that sayd, that they might not leaue the custome which they so long had continued, without the assent of all such as had vsed the same. Then he gathered a Synode, to the which came. iij. Bishoppes, but they agreed not.

¶ The Authour of the flower of stozies, sheweth howe Austyn haning conference with the Britishe Bishoppes and Clergie, coulde in no wise perswade them at the first, to receyue his doctrine: And beeing by him required to come to a second Synode or counsaile, as they were goyng to the same, they came first vnto a discrete godly man, which had of a long tyme led an Anchores lyfe amongst them, to aske him counsaile, whether at the preaching of Austen they should forgo their olde tradicions or no? who answered on this wyse: if he be a man of God, folowe him. To whom they sayd againe, & howe may we knowe that? you knowe (sayth he) that the Lorde gaue this commaundement, sayng: Take my yoke vpon you, learne of me because I am lowely and meeke in heart, then is it likely that he beareth the yoke of Christ him selfe, and also offereth the same vnto you to beare. But if he be proude and hye minded, you may be sure that he is not of God, neyther ought you to take any regarde vnto his wordes. Then sayde they againe, and how may may we discern this? Prouide (sayth he) that he and his may come first into the Synode, and if when you come, he arise by and reuerence you, then you may be sure that he is Christes minister, and is to be heard obediently of you: But if he dispise you, and thinke himselfe to good to geue any such reuerence vnto you being the greater part, dispise you him againe. And it so fortunied after wardes, that Austyn being set downe before they came in, fate still in his Chayre, and made them no countenance at all, neither yelded any reuerence vnto them. The which thing they beholding, were by and by in a chafe, and notyng him to be hautye and proude, endeoured themselves, to contrary and speake against al that euer he spake: But who so desyret to read moze hereof, shall finde the same set out at large in Fabian in his fift part and .C. xix. Chapter.

And all these were vnder the Archebishop of Penecula, called at this day Saint Daupes.

¶ Ethelbert as diuers writers doe write being now confirmed in the faith, among other chargeable and costlye deedes began the foundation of Paules Church within the Citie of London, and ordeyned it for the Bishops See of London. For the Archbishops See that before tyme had beene there, was by Austyne and Ethelbert at the sute and request of the Citizens of Cauntorburie, translated to Cauntorbury. But of the building of the Church of S. Paule, dyuers opinions be. For some write that it was builded or begonne to be builded by Sigebert king of East Anglis, but moze truely king of Essex. This Ethelbert also fouded the Church of S. Androw in Rochester in Kent.

Ethelbert fouded Paules church in London, but some say Sigebert fouded it.

Archebishop rike of Lodū translated to Cauntorbury.

¶ Also (as Fabian sayth) he excited an inhabitant or Citizen of London to bulde a Church or Chappell in the worship of Saint Peter in the West ende of London then called Thorney (and now the Towne of Westmynster, the which at that time was exceedingly forgrowen with Thornes, Bulthes and Byers,) where the sayde Citizen began to bulde the Church of Westmynster, which afterwarde was by Edward the Confessour enlarged or new buylded. But by king Henry the thirde it was newly edified and made as it is now a bewtifull Monastery, and he endued it with goodly possessions and riche Jewels.

freels, Scoffers and such idle persons epyther to auoyde his lande, or else to finde some honest craft or occupation to lyue by.

¶ During also the aforesayde persecution of the Britons, before anye ruler of them were specially named, began the reigne of the East Saxons (as sayeth Reynulph) vnder Sebertus their first king. Albeit that Guydo de Columna sayth, that it began when the kingdome of the East Anglis began. This kingdome, that is to say, Essex, hath on the East side the Sea, on the West Middlesex and London, on the South the Chamys, and on the North Suffolke, and endured two hundreth yeres, as most writers affirme.

¶ The first christian king of this Lordship was the afozenamed Sebertus, conuerted by the meanes of Politus Bishop of London, as sayth Guydo: But after his sayng this Sebertus should be the thirde king of Essex. All writers agree that the kings of this Lordship were most commonly named vnder kings, or Dety kings, & were subiects vnto the kings of Mercia.

¶ But now to returne to the Britons, which in all this time occupied a part of Cornewall and the Countreies of Cambria, as Northwales & Southwales, and there held them in making of assaultes vpon the Saxons as before is sayde, the which so continued by the space of. xxiii. yeres. At which tyme the Britons of one assent chose for their soueraigne and ruler the Duke of Northwales named Cadwane,

Cadwane Duke of Northwales, was by one assent of the Britons made their Lorde and gouernour.

¶ We haue heard before what disorde and trouble was among the Britons in the tyme of Careticus last king, and long after, by reason wherof the Saxons wanne the more lande. And as before it is shewed that Ethelfride king of Northumberland ouerset the Britons at the Citie of Chester, and forced them to flee ouer Seuerne, and so into Wales, where they then chose or elected this Cadwane to be their Duke and leader. The which after he was put in auctoritie, assembled his Briteynes and came againe into Briteyn, and gaue battaile vnto the sayde Ethelfride, in the which they sped diuersly, so that some season the Saxons wanne, and sometime the Britons: But the Britons helde Chester and other good Townes, which they recovered at their last coming.

¶ It should seme by the meaning of Reynulph, that this Cadwan should at the length slea the sayde Ethelfride and Osricus, both kings of Bernicia and Deyra. But Guydo and Gaufride saye, that after this Cadwan had the better of Ethelfride, it was agreed by Mediatours that Ethelfride should enioy all the lande ouer and beyonde Humber into Scotland: and Cadwan also should haue the lande from Humber toward the South. To the which sayng agreeth the Englishe Chronicle, affirming also that he should be the sonne of Bruciuall King of Leycester, the which of other Writers is not testified.

¶ It is also there shewed, that after the sayd accorde betwene Ethelfride and Cadwan, that then they continued during their lyues as two most speciall friendes and louers, during the reigne of this Cadwan, the two sonnes of Colricus, Kingilsus and Quichilinus after the death of their fathers brother, Colwolphus ruled ioyntly the principalltie of the West Saxons. The which in their

in their beginning fought against the Britons at Abyndon beside Oxford, and wanne of them the Towne and other holdes, which the Britons in that Countreie occupied. But by agreement of writers, this Cadwane was not at this conflict, neyther medled he so farre within the lande. But as it should seme by Guydo, these Britons should be some company that should lyue vnder the tribute of the Saxons, the which for the manhood that they had heard reported of Cadwan, rebelled against the Saxons.

¶ Then it foloweth, when this Cadwan had thus continued his amitie with Ethelfride, it fortuneth, that this Ethelfride for hatred or otherwise, put from him his wyfe being great with childe, and tooke to him another. Wherfore this woman being remedlesse, calling to minde the great loue that was betwene her husbände and Cadwan, she went vnto him and most instantly besought him to reconcile hir Lorde and husbände, that she might be restored to his companie. But for that Cadwan, after many meanes and requests made, coulde not bring it about, he therefore tendring her necessitie kept her in his Court vntill she was deliuered of a man childe, whome she caused to be called Edwyn. And soone after was the wyfe of Cadwan deliuered of a sonne, whome the father named Cadwalyn. But the Authour of the Flowre of histories sayeth, that these two children were borne long before this tyme. The which should seme to be true, for so much as this Cadwalyn was of laudfull age to gouerne this lande when his father dyed, the which he coulde not do if he had bene borne but now, and of this ye may reade more in Fabian, in his fift booke and. C. xxviiij. Chapter.

¶ But to returne to the storie of Cadwan: About the. xiiij. yere of his reigne Quinchelinus that was brother vnto Kingilsus, and ioyntly ruled the West Saxons, sent vpon an Easter day a Ruffian called Eumerus, to slea Edwyn king of Northumberland. This Cutthroate ruffian came to a Citie beside the water of Darent in Darbithire, & wayted his tyme, and at the last finding the king finally accompanied, intending to haue runne through him with a sworde enuened: But one Lylla the kinges trustie seruaunt, beyng without epyther swilde or other weapon to defende his Maister, start betwene the king and the sword, and was stricken through the body and dyed, and the king also was wounded with the same stroke: and after also he wounded another which was a knight, and then was he taken, and confessed by whom he was appointed to woork that treason. The knight and the kinge that were wounded, lay long sicke before they were healed. And the night following the Queene was deliuered of a Daughter, the which King Edwyn caused to be Christened of Paulinus Archebishop of Yorke, in token that he would fulfill such promise touching the receyuing of baptisme as he before had made. And she was named Enfleda.

¶ And after Whitfontide then next folowing, Edwyn beyng scantly whole of the wounde, assembled his hoste, and made toward the kinges of the West Saxon, and after a great and foze fight, he vanquished and ouerthrew them. But for all this victoery he forgat to be thankfull vnto God, the geuer not onlve of his health, but also of the same victoery. And afterwarde he receyued letters of exhortation from Boniface then Bishop of Rome, to take vpon him baptisme: And the sayd Bishop likewise exhorted the Queene, and sent vnto her a Glasse to looke in, with a combe of Iuozy richely garnished, and a shirt for ¶ How be it, it was not long after, that the king assembled his counsaile, and by theyr agreement he was of the sayde Paulinus baptised within the sayde Citie, the .xj. yere of his reigne, and the yere of our Lorde. 627. He was the first Christian king that reigned in that Countrie. And after him, many of his Lordes and subiectes were also Christened of the sayde Paulinus, and the flampus or Bishops which were worshippers of false Goddes, were converted and made the Ministers of Christes fayth. In token whereof, they armed themselves as knightes, and bestrydde good hozsles, where before by their law, they might vse no armour, nor ryde but onely on a Mare. Fabian.

¶ From this tyme forwarde by the terme of .vi. yeres, during the lyfe of king Edwyn, Paulinus christened continually in both the Prouinces of Bernicia, and Deyra, in the Ryuers of Gucny, and Swala, which he bled for his fontes, and Preached in the Shire of Lyndesey, and builded a Churche of Stone at Lincoln, the which of some is supposed to be the Minster Churche. And in this tyme was so great peace in the Kingdome of Edwyn, that a woman might haue gone from one towne to another without grieffe or annoyauce. And for the reliefe and refreshing of wayfaring men, this Edwyn ordeined at cleere Welles and Springes, certeyne Cuppes or Dishes of Iron and brasse, and caused the same to be fastned vnto them with small chernes, and no man was so hardy to take away any of those Cuppes, he kept so good iustice, and therewith was knightly of his deedes.

¶ He was the first that wanne the Ile of Cubonia, now called the Ile of Man. And by his meanes Orpwaldus, or Corpewaldus the sonne of Redwaldus king of the East Angles, or Northis, to whom Edwyn had fled for succour, was converted to the true fayth, & a great part of his men with him.

¶ And about this season began the kingdome of Mercia or middle England, vnder the strong Saxon or Danyme called Penda, which Lordship conteyned Huntingtongshire, Herefordshire, Gloucestershire, and other, and that was the greatest of all the other Kingdomes. And at that tyme reigned in diuerse partes of this land seven kinges: Sibertus among the East Saxons: Redwold king of East Angles, now called Essex, Northfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeshire: Ethelbert king of Kent: Ethelwolphus king of Suffex: Kingillus, and Quinchelinus king of West Saxons: Penda, of Mercia, and Edwyn of Northumberland.

¶ And for that this Edwyn excelled the other kinges, they enuided at him, and specially Penda king of Mercia, the which prouoked Cadwan king of Britons against him. So that they two assembled a great host against Edwyn, and lastly met in a place called Hatfield, and after sharpe and sore fight on both sides, there Edwyn was slaine, when he had reigned ouer the Northumbers. .xviij. yeres. Fabian.

¶ When these two kinges Cadwan, & Penda, had thus overcome the king, and slaine both him & many of his people, they became so cruell to men of that countrie, y they destroyed therein great numbers of people, not sparing, men, women, children, religious persons, nor other. Wherefore Paulinus the Archbishop, beholding their cruellnesse, tooke with him the Queene, and Enleda her daughter, & fled by water into Kent. And because the Bishopricke of Rochester chester was then boyde, by reason that Romanus the last Bishop was deade: Paulinus was there ordeyned and made Bishop of that See, and there dyed, and also as Reynulph sayth, he left there his Pall, and the Archbishopricke of Yorke was void. .xxx. yeres after. But the Queene which was named Etherberga, sayled into Fraunce, and became there a Rome, and lykewise her daughter Enleda kept her possession, and was after Abbelle of Stemhalt in the Vale of Whytbie.

¶ After the death of Edwyn, Ostricus that was the sonne of Elfricus, which was brother to Ethelfridus, tooke vpon him to be king of Deyra, and Eaufricus the eldest sonne of Ethelfrida, was made king of Bernicia, both the which reuolted from Christes fayth, and became Ayscreantes. For the which the wrath of God shortly after fell vpon them, for they were both slaine in the yere folowing, of the afozenamed Cadwan and Penda.

¶ And when the sayd two kinges were thus slaine, Oswalde the second sonne of Ethelfride began his reigne ouer the prouince of Bernicia, as chiefe of that Kingdome of Northumberland, and had the rule of Deyra likewise, whereof when Cadwan was ware, he gathered his Britons, and thought to haue slaine him, as he had before slaine his brother Eaufricus. But when Oswalde was warned of the great strength that Cadwan had, he made his prayers to God, and besought him meekely of helpe to withstand his enemye for the saluation of his people. Then after he had thus prayed, the two armies met in a fielde named at that tyme Denysbozne or Denyslake, where was foughten a strong battaile, and in the ende Cadwan was slaine, and his people chased, the number whereof did farre exceede Oswaldes hoste. And thus ended the sayde Cadwan when he had reigned ouer the Britons. .xxij. yeres, leauing after him a sonne named Cadwallync.

¶ Mahomet, of Arabia, at this time when there was great confusion of things both in the East and West, then began his errour, he came out of a base stock, and being fatherlesse, one Abdemonaples, a man of the house of Ismaell bought him for his slaue, and loued him greatly for his fauour and wyt: for which cause, he made him ruler of his merchandise and other busynesse. Then one Sergius a Monke, which for Heresie fled into Arabia, who instructed him in the heresie of Nestorius. In the meane season, his master dyed without children, leauing behinde him much ryches, and his wyfe a riche wydowe of fiftie yeres of age, whome Mahomet maried, and when she dyed, he was made heire, and greatly encreased in ryches: And for his magicall artes, was had also in great admiration and honour of the foolish people. Wherefore by the counsaile of Sergius, he called himselfe the Prophete of God, and shortly after, when his name was published, and then taken to be of great authoritie, he deuised a lawe or kinde of Religion, called ALCARON, in the which he tooke some parte well neere of all the heresies that had bene before his tyme. And after this Wenda was in great fauour with Cadwallyn, insomuch as he tooke parte with him against the other Saxon kings. And about this time Kyngilfus one of the kings of the West Saxons, was by the preaching of Berinus conuerted to the right beliefe, and christened of him at the Citie of Dorchester, within. liij. Myles of Oxforde. And Oswald king of Northumberland, or rather king of Bernicia, was his Godfather, & wedded his daughter afterwarde. And then that Citie was geuen to the Bishop, to the ende that he shoulde there ordeyne his See, where the sayde Berinus late liii. yeres after, and there was buried, vntill Beda Bishop of Winchester translated his body to the City of Winchester, albeit, the Chanons of Dorchester said, that y<sup>e</sup> body of Beryne was not taken thence but another in the stead thereof, & yet in token that it was not remoued thence a Beare of a wonderfull worke stood of late daies ouer that graue where this holy man was first buried. It should seeme that this Citie of Dorchester, is now called Dorset. This See was in the time of William Conquerour translated to Lyncolne.

About this time Sigebertus or Sigilbertus king of the East Anglis set by certayne scooles in diuers places, and ordeyned ouer them Scoolemasters and Mhers, as he sometime had seene in Fraunce. And after the opinion of many writers one of them was by him erected in Grantbridge, being then the head Citie of his dominion, now called Cambridge, the which in processe of time grew to be a famous Vniuersitie, as it is now at this day. And the sayde Sigebert was conuerted to the faith of Christ, by that holie man named Felix a Burgonion: and finally the sayd king betooke his kingdome vnto his nephew Egrius, & became himselfe a Monke in an Abbey which he himselfe buyded.

For he destroyed the Temples of false Gods thorough all that Countrie and ordeyned by the aduice of his Clergie the time of Lent to be fasted. He wedded the daughter of Anna king of East Anglis, named Serburga, of whome he receiued a daughter & named her Eukendoga, the which after was a Nonne in a Monastery in France.

About this time, as it were about the. viii. yere of Cadwallyne, dyed Kyngilfus king of the West Saxons, when he had reigned with his brother and alone. xxxi. yeres. And Kenwalcus his sonne was king after him, the which at the beginning of his reigne would not be christened, and forsooke his wyfe the daughter of Wenda, and tooke to him another. Wherefore Wenda to be aduenged for his daughters cause, gathered his host and chased Kenwalcus out of his kingdome, and kept him thence three yeres. In the which time, he was with Anna king of the East Anglis and was christened of Felix, and after by the helpe of the sayde Anna recouered his kingdome.

When Kenwalcus was thus restored to his lande, he made a Bishops See at Wynchester, and ordeyned there a Bishop named Agilbert, a Frenchman borne, but he came out of Ireland. The which when he had sitten there a certaine of time, he was deposed and put from thence, but the cause why, I know not, and in his place was set one named Wyn, of whome sayeth Polichronichon, the Citie tooke the name of Wynchester, as it were Wynnes Citie. But he was also deposed: And then was Leutherius Bishop, and after Leutherius succeeded Cedda: And after him Theodorius Archebishop of Cauntorbury ordeyned two Bishops to the Prouynce of West Saxon. The one at Winchester, and to that was subiect two Countyes, Southrey and Southhamphire. And the other See he ordeyned at Sherborne, to the which were subiect sixe Countyes, that is to saye Barkeshire, Wyltshire, Somersethire, Dorsetshire, Deuonshire, and Cornewall, but in William the Conquerours time, the See of Sherborne was turned to the See of Sarisbury, as was also the See of Wynnesbury.

It was not long after but that Kenwalcus warred with the king of Britons, the which fought with him at a place called Whyte Gosneborough, and was of him there ouercome. Then Cadwallyne assembled a newe hoste of Britons, and met with Kenwalcus at a place called the hill of Pent, where after a long and sore battaile, the Britons were put to flight.

We haue heard before how Oswald was made king of Northumberland, the which continued his lyfe in iustice and vertue as a king should do, by the space of. ix. yeres: But Wenda king of Mertia, who to him and to all christian men had great disloyne and enmie, about the. ix. yere of Cadwallyne made warre vpon Oswald, and slue him in a field called Meseffelde, where after his death (as Fabian sayth) God shewed for him many miracles. after one yere of his death Oswy his yonger brother recovered the kingdome, and buried his head in the Churchyarde of Lyndesfar, for the bodye was conveyed by the Pagans, and deuyded in sundrie peeces.

¶ When Oswy had a season ruled his kingdome, he by vnlawfull meanes procured the death of Oswyn king of Deyra. This Oswyn was the sonne of Cauftricus eldest brother of Oswald, which Oswyn was good of condition and therewith both meeke and mylde, and being thus slaine, as is aforesayde, the sayde Oswy tooke to him as felow of that kingdome his brothers sonne Odylwald, the sonne of Oswald. This Oswald gaue vnto Cedda Bishop of Wynchester before named, a grounde in a place of the North Countrie in the high hilles called Lastyngery, for to buylde an Abbay vpon, which he there buylde, and after taught his brother Chymbillus how he should rule and gouerne that place.

¶ Nowe Penda Kinge of Mertia, which forgat not the strengthening and fauouring that Anna Kinge of East Anglys had shewed to Kenwalcus his daughters husbande, and his enemye, and therefore desirous to be reuenged on him, gathered a power of men of warre and went against the sayde Anna, and slue him in plaine battaile.

¶ After the which victoery, the sayd Penda, beyng puffed vp with pryde, and glozy, went forward with his host into Northumberlande, entending to slea Oswy, as before he had slaine his brother Oswald. Wherof when Oswy had knowledge, he assembled his power and made towarde him. And for affinite of marriage that was betwene their children, and other causes as after shall apere Oswy offered vnto him many great offers, to the intent to haue had him to haue stayed from battaile, and to haue had peace with him.

Oswy.

¶ When Oswy perceyued the obstinacie and pryde of Penda, and sawe that by no reasonable meanes he coulde moue him to peace, he sayde, seeing this Pagnyn will not receyue our giffes and proffers that we haue offered vnto him, we will now offer it to him that can receyue them. And forthwith he made his vowe vnto God, that if he had the victoerye ouer his enemies, he woulde offer his daughter Elleda vnto him, with sufficient possessions for to buylde. xij. Abbeyes. And shortly after, he ioyned in battaile with Penda, in the countrey of Leedy, not farre from Yorke, which battail was so sore foughte that the lyke was not seene many yeres before: But in the ende Penda was slaine, and .xxx. of his chiefe Capitaynes, and yet he had thre tymes the number of people that Oswy had. And those that escaped the shot and sword, were for the greatest part drowned in the Ryuer Wynwed, which was nere vnto the place of that battaile. And among the Prisoners that were taken at this fielde, the wife of Penda was one, and her sonnes Uncle named Egfridus was another. Fabian.

¶ Then Oswy yelded his thankes vnto almighty God, and according to his former promes, he offered his daughter Elleda beyng of the age of thre yeres vnto God, and tooke her to the Lady of Hilda, Abbelle of Hertsey, or Hertes Islande. And after that the sayde Hilda remoued to the Abbey of Stremhalt in the vale of Whitby. xxx. Myle from Yorke, where she was after Abbelle, and so was Elleda also. And Oswy as he had promised gaue landes and rentes to buylde. xij. Abbeyes, whereof sixe were in Bernicia, and sixe in the Prouynce of Deyra.

¶ This

¶ This aforesayde Penda had diuerse sonnes, as wyrters report, that is to say, Wolferus, Weda, Egfridus, besyde other not mencioned. To this seconde sonne Weda, Oswy had before tyme maryed a daughter of his by consent of Penda his father: Wherfore, by the helpe of Oswy his father in law he was made King of South Mertia, the which Lordship is seuered from the North Mertia by the ryuer of Trent, & it contained by the recorde of Weda fife thousand householdes. This Weda also promised when he maryed the sayd daughter of Oswy, that he would become a Christian man, the which he perfourmed after the death of his father. But when he had scantly reigned thre yeres ouer the sayde South Mertia, he was by treason of his wyfe slaine (as sayth Fabian) but he sheweth no cause. And after that kingdome fell to Wolferus the other brother, the which had wedded the daughter of Ercombert king of Kent, named Ermenilda. This Wolferus was shortlye after christened, so that he is accompted for the first Christined king that reigned in Mertia, and was father to Keneredus, and to Wereburga.

Wolferus.

¶ And for that it is long sithen I spake of Kenwalcus king of West Saxons, it is to be noted that after he had ouercome the Britons (as before is shewed) and at that tyme had not perfited the Bishops See of Winchester, he then busied himselfe thereabout. And according to the will of Kingilfus his father, he gaue to the sustentation of the sayd See, all the land which lay within. vij. miles of the sayde Citie (as sayth the floure of Histories) and finished it some deale to his purpose, but farre from that it is nowe.

Kenwalcus.

Kingilfus.

¶ Soone after that Kenwalcus had ended this worke, he made warre vpon Wolferus of Mertia. But in that iourney fortune was not friendlye vnto him, for he lost thereby and wanne nothing of his entent and purpose.

¶ It was not long after, but Ercombert king of Kent dyed, and his sonne Egbert was king after him. ix. yere. And shortly after chaunced great mortalitie and death throughtout this land of Briteyn, the which continued and encreased more and more during the life of this Cadwallyn, and the lyfe of Cadwallader which folowed him. In the which season or beginning of this mortalitie and sicknesse, dyed many Bishops in this lande, insomuch that Vitalcanus then beyng Bishop of Rome ordeyned Theodorius Archebishop of Cantorbury to haue the rule of the Churches of Briteyn. Somewhat before this tyme, Benet that was in good fauour with king Oswy, and descended of riche kindred, forsooke service and house and all his kindred, and became a Monke. This Benet was he that first brought the craft of Glasing into this land, and tooke to his scholer Weda, when he was but. vij. yeres of age, and taught him during his lyfe.

¶ And here for that speciall mencion is made a little before that Benet was the first that brought into Briteyn the Arte and craft of making of Glasse, I thought it well to adde this note ther vnto, which I find witten in Reynulph in his fourth booke and fourth Chapter. That in the tyme of the reigne of Tiberius Emperour of Rome, which was not long after Christes incarnation, a certeyn craftes man had found out the Art of myxture and melting of Glasse in such sort, as he made the same malliable, that is to say, to abide the Hammer as Tynne and other metalles do: And he came to the Emperour thinking to haue receyued some rewarde, and shewed it vnto him. The Emperour when he saw it, caused some of his awne Glasses to be fet and broken, and the Artificer forthwith amended them. And when the Emperour had well considered of the man and of his cunning, he demaunded of him if there were any man living beside himselfe that could do the like, and he simply answered, none that he knewe or euer heard of, and the emperour answered, neither shalt thou euer do it againe, for this Art would make golde and other precious metall to be of no balure: wherefore he commaunded him to be beheaded, and it was done, which certainly was a tyrannous deede, namely for that he would attempt to suppress the giftes of God.

¶ Howe I will returne againe to Oswy: the which when he had long reigned ouer the Northumbers, he made Cedda that was Abbot of Lastingay, Archebishop of Yorke, more of wyll then of good skill, and put out Wilfride the Archebishop of that See: But it was not long after but that Cedda was deprived of that dignitie, by the authoritie of the Archebishop Theodorius, as he deprived other at that tyme, which came to their benefices against the lawes of the Church, and made him by great instaunce after this, Bishop of the West Saxons. And about the .xxx. yere of the reigne of Cadwallyn, Cissa that was father to Iue king of West Saxons builded the Abbey of Abingdon. Eabian.

¶ In these dayes the Monkes and Clergie of Briteyn set all their minds to serue God, and not the worlde, and were wholly giuen to deuocion, and not to filling of the Paunch and pampering of the bodye: wherefore they were then had in great reuerence and honour, so that they were then receyued withall worship. And as they went by the streetes and wayes, men that sawe them, woulde runne to them and desire their blessings: and well was him then that might geue vnto them possessions, and to builde them houses and Churches. But as they encreased in ryches of worldly treasure, so they decreased in heauenly treasure, as in the dayes of Aluredus some deale began, and sithen that time hath sprong not all to the pleasure of God. Then they applyed nothing that was worldye, but gaue themselues to preaching and teaching of the worde of our Sauour Jesu Christ, and folowed in lyfe the doctrine that they preached, geuing good example to all men. And besides that, they were bitterly boyde of couetousnesse, and receyued no possessions gladly, but were inforced therevnto. Fabian.

¶ At this time Oswy king of Northumberlande dyed and Edfridus hys sonne was kinge after hym and reigned fiftene yeares, after hys father had reigned with hys felowes Oswyne and Oswalde, twentye and eyght yeares.

¶ There dyed also Kenwalcus king of West Saxons, about the .xxxix. yere of Cadwallyne, when he had reigned ouer them .xxx. yeres, and his sonne Kenewynus succeeded him, but entred not into possession before Sexburga his mother had ruled that Prouynce one yere.

¶ We haue heard before howe Wilfride was deposed & put out of the See of Yorke, wherfore he went to Rome and complayned vpon him to Agathon then Bishop of that See, and was well allowed in some things. But the king and Theodorius had there such Docters and friends, that he sayled of his purpose, wherefore he returned to the South Saxons, and after he had preached among them .xv. yeres, he then taught them the arte or craft of Fishyng.

¶ Egfridus or Edfridus king of Northumberlande, claymed the lande that Etheldred king of Mercia helde, for the which diuers assemblies of intreatie were had, but they tooke none effect, wherefore eyther partie gathered his strength, and met vpon a playne, neere vnto the Ryuer of Trent, where was foughten betwene them a long and sharpe fight: In the which among a great number on both parties, was slaine the brother of Egfride named Elswinus, but yet the saide Egfride had the better. Then after this battail, meanes of peace was againe made, so that finally Egfride had great sommes of money in recompence of his brothers death, and so the sayde two kings agreed and rested afterwards in quiet.

¶ Some after this time, Theodorius for diuers causes kept a Synode or Counsaile of Bishops and other men of the Church, at Hatfielde: By authoritie of which counsaile (sayth Fabian) he deuyded the Prouynce of Mercia that Serwolphus then ruled alone, into fyne Bishopricks, that is one to Chester, the second to Worcester, the thirde to Lichfielde, the fourth to Cedema in Lyndesey, and the fift to Dochester.

¶ About the .xlvj. yere of Cadwallyne, Kenewinus king of West Saxons had occasion of warre against the Britons, so that they met neere vnto the West See, where after a sharpe skirmithe, the Britons were chased. And some after Edfridus king of Northumberlande made warre vpon the Pictes or Scottes, because they fauoured & ayded the East Anglys against him. But in the ende by colour of flyng back, they brought Edfride into a strepte among hilles and mountaines, and slue him there with a great parte of his people. And after his death a bastarde brother of his, named Alfri- dus, the bastarde was king of Northumberlande and reigned among them .xviij. yeres.

¶ And shortly after, dyed Cadwallyne king of Britons, when he had reigned .xlvij. yeres, and many other things are written of him by Gaufride, but neyther by Keynulf nor by any other authour of good authoritie, and therefore I passe them ouer.

¶ Ferquhard called Ferquhard the second, the sonne of the late king Ferquharde was made king of Scottes, and reigned .xviij. yeres. This man in his priuate lyfe was verie liberall aboue his power, but when he was authorized king, he became a cruell coueteous and glottenous Tiran, wherefore he was stricken of God with a vile and painfull sickenesse, whereof he dyed.

¶ Aldwyn the sonne of Dowald was authorized king of Scottes, and reigned .xx. yeres: he made peace with the Pictes and Saxons, and at the last was murdered of his wyfe for suspicion of Adultrie.

¶ Cadwalader, began to rule the Britons and also the West Saxons. He made warre vpon Lotharius king of Kent, and destroyed much of that Prouynce, and wanne the Isle of Wight, and gaue the fourth part to S. Wilfride, in the which fourth part were accompted thre hundred households.

¶ The whilest that Cadwalader was busied in one part of Kent, his brother named Gulkyu with a certaine of knights were besieged, and lastly brent in another parte thereof. In reuengement wherof, Cadwalader of newe destroyed the more parte of the sayde Prouynce. And the sayde warre continuing Lotharius afozenamed was wounded and dyed, after tohome Edricus was king, and reigned but a short tyme.

¶ Then Cadwalader made warre vpon the king of Southsex named Athelwalde, and slue him in plaine battaile, and after made his Prouynce subiect to him.

¶ When Cadwalader had ruled the Britons, and also the west Saxons by the terme of three yeres, he then (as sayth Reynulph Monke of Chester) of pure deuotion renounced the pompe and pride of the world, and went on pilgrimage to Rome, where of Sergius then Bishop of Rome, he was confirmed, and after made a whyte Monke, and so continued all his lyfe tyme.

Nicholas Brodugan,

¶ But other write as namely Nicholas Brodugan in his Epitome, that king Cadwalader reigned ouer Briteyn in great peace and tranquillitie .xij. yeres. And then there happened so great a death among his people, that in maner the lyuing did scarcely suffice to burie the dead, and therefore he fled into little Britteyn, whose Colyn Juoz and Jue, being repulled out of Englande by the Saxons, went into Wales, where among the Britons, they and their posteritie remayned Princes. And now vpon this great death and cruell warres among the Saxons, the Scottes thought to slip the Coller of obedience, and entered into league with Charles then king of Fraunce, the articles whereof folow in the historie of Achaius king of Scottes.

Mallo or Gallo.

¶ And here endeth the lyne and gouernement of the Britons, now called Welshmen, which tooke that name of their Duke or leader called Mallo, or Gallo, or else of a Queene of Wales, named Galaes, or Wales. But how soeuer that name came first to them, now they are called Welshmen, which sometime were named Britons, or britons, and descended first of the Troians (sayth Fabian) and after of Brite, and lastly of Mulmucius Dumwallo: Albeit they were mingled or medled with sundrie other Nations, as Romaynes, Pictes, and others. And now they be English, that in their beginning were named Saxons or Anglis.

Welshmen

¶ And after the departure of Cadwalader, this Realme was called Englande, and the Inhabitanes thereof were called Anglis, or English men. And this happened 1972. yeres, or as sayth Fabian 1822. yeres after that Brute first arriued in this Islande: And after the conquest of Cesar 735. yeres: And from the entring of the Saxons vnder their leaders Hengist and Horsa in the tyme of Woxtiger 235. yeres.

¶ Thus then apereth by the former processe of this worke, that the last yere of Cadwalader, was the yere of our Lord sixe hundreth. lxxxvi. which maketh the yere of the worlde foure thousand, sixe hundreth. xliij. So that as Fabian sayth, the Britons had the rule of the moze part of this land, reconing from Brute vnto this tyme, a thousand. liij. C. xxiij. yeres. And now the Saxons or Anglis began fully to reigne, and to haue the whole dominion of this Realme.

¶ After the departure of Cadwalader (as Fabian sayth) this land of Briteyn was in great dissention, by meane of variaunce betwene the Britons and Saxons, and the sayde contencion continued. xi. yeres. And beside this, the great death and mortalitie before mentioned, behemently and greatly encreased, and by reason thereof folowed great scarcitie, whereof ensued ned hunger, and vniuersall famine through the Realme: So that by the occasion of one thing and other, the people of this Realme were wonderfully diminished and decayed, and that so many and so much (as sayth Gaufride, and also the English Chronicle) the quicke bodies suffised not to burie the dead.

¶ Eugenius the first of that name was king of Scottes, and reigned foure yeres. In his tyme, as sayth the Historie of Scotland, he warred vpon Edfride king of Northumberlande, and slue him in battaile.

A pitfull and horrible plague.

¶ Iewe, or Juas, descending of the blood of the Saxons, was ruler or king of west Saxons, next after that Cadwalader had renounced the pompe of the worlde. He ruled the west Saxons berie honourably, and mainteyned such warre against the kentish Saxons, that they of Dorobernia or Cantorbury, graunted him to haue peace, and also gaue vnto him for a recompence of the death of Mulking brother to Cadwalader before slaine, thre thousand pounde.

¶ In the. xi. yere of the reigne of this Iewe, chaunced the wonder & meruaile that is written in Polichronica, in his fift booke, and. xxi. Chapter, and he allegeth Bede for his Authour, of one Bighwaldus, the which after that he had beene a long while dead, was restored againe to lyfe, and tolde manye thinges of great wonder to many men. Whereby he caused great almose, and many deedes of charitie to be done.

¶ In the. xxij. yere of this Jew, Cotredus then king of Mertia assembled his people, and warred vpon Jew. Wherof when Jew had knowledg he likewyse gathered his people together, and they met to both their harmes at a place called Woddenworgh: where after long fight, eyther of them sped so unhappely, that it was not knowen whether part had greatest dammage.

¶ Nowe when Jew had ruled the west Saxons nobly by the space of xxxvij. yeres, by the importunate labour of his wife Ethelburga, he renounced his honourable estate, and tooke on him the wede of a poore man, and became a Pilgrime to Rome. And Ethelburga his wife made her selfe a Nonne in Barking. viij. myles from London.

¶ Also some Authours write that this Jew was the first king that grauted of enery house that had fyre burning in it a penny, to be payed to the Bishop of Rome & his successors, and it was called Rome skot, or Peter pence.

Rome skot, Peter pence.

¶ And as Fabian sayth, when he should renounce his estate and gouernment, he resigned the same vnto Ethellardus his Nephewe. This man also as sayth Cooper, builded the Colledge or Cathedryall Church of Welles, and the Abbey of Glasfenbury.

Sigebert the Cosyn of Cutbert, reigned ouer the west Saxons. He was cruell and tyrannous to his subiects, and turned the lawes and because a noble man of his Realme named the Erle Combranus, did somedeale sharpely aduertise him to chaunge his maners and to be more prudent and temperate towarde his people, he therefore maliciously caused him to be put to most cruell death.

Tyrannie.

¶ Now for as much as this king Sigebert continued in his malice and cruell condicions, and would not amend, his subiects conspired against him, and depriued him of all kingly dignitie: so that he fell after into great desolation & miserie, for being on a season found in a wood or desolate place, wan-

¶ Of this Offa is tolde many things, whereof something I entende to

¶ But nowe let vs returne to Kenulphus, who before time had often warre with Offa, and also had with him many conflicts, but lastly they were agreed. About the. xi. yere of this Kenulphus, Egbert king of Northum-

¶ And finally, when Offa had reigned ouer Mertia. xxxix. yeres. as saith Gyudo, he left the kingdome to his sonne, who also was named Kenulphus, or as some write Egfurtus, and went himselfe to Rome.

¶ And the foresayde Kenulphus king of the west Saxons kept strongly his Lordship against the power of all his enimies, and had his subiectes in due order of obedience. Lastly, he was surprisid with the loue of a woman that he kept at Merton, whose companie he haunted more secretly, then stode with his honour. Whereof hauing knoledge, a kinsman of Sige-bert late king, intending to reuenge the deposing and murdering of his kynsman, awayed the tyme, and beset the house where Kenulph and his Paramour were smally accompanied. But so soone as the sayde Kenulph had espied his enimies, he set vpon them, and as Reymulph sayeth, though they Brithricus of the blood of Cerdicus, began his reigne ouer the west Saxons, in the yere of our Lorde. vij. C. lxxviii. This Man before tyme had maryed one of the daughters of Offa king of Mertia, as before is touched, by whose ayde and power, he put out of his rule Egbert the sonne of Alcumundus, the which Egbert at that day was an vnder king or ruler in the Lordeship of west Saxons, which Egbert was descended of the blood of Genulphus, of whome some part of the story is declared in the. xxv. Chapter of the fift booke of Polichronicon. And after he was thus of Brithricus expelled, he sayled into Fraunce, and there exercised himselfe in the feates of warre with the knightes of Charles court the French king during the life of the sayde Brithricus.

About the second yere of this Brithricus, was seene in great Briteyn a wonderfull sight: for sodenly as men walked in the streete, Crosses lyke unto blood fell vpon their clothes, and blood fell from heauen lyke droppes of raine.

This after some expositors, betokened the coming of the Danes into this lande, the which entered shortly after. For as sayth Keynulph, about the. iij. yere of Brithricus the Danes first entered this land. In defence wherof, this said king sent forth his Steward of his household, with a small compaignie, which shortly was slaine. But by the strength of Brithricus and the other kinges of the Saxons, they were compelled to auoyde the land for that tyme.

Brithricus thus well and knightly ruling his lande, his wife named Ethelburga, not contented with him as she ought to be, sought diuerse wayes and meanes howe she might bring her Lorde out of lyfe, so that finally shee poisoned him with many other of his famely: wherefore shee fearing punishment, fled into Fraunce, and by such frendship as she there had, was well cherished in Charles Court the French king surnamed the great.

Of her it is tolde, that when he had information of the vnstablensse of this womans condicions, he at that season beyng a Widower, and at a time talking pleasantly with her, sayde: Nowe I put to your choyle, whether ye will will haue me vnto your wedded Lord, or else my sonne standing here in your presence: and him that you choose, him shall ye haue and enjoy for your husband: But she chose the sonne, and left the father. Then sayd the king, if thou haddest chosen me, thou shouldst haue had my sonne: but for that thou hast forsaken me, thou shalt haue neyther of vs. And after he closed her in an Abbey, where in processe a lewde man kept with her such companie, that shee was boyded that place, and after demeaned her selfe so viciously, that in processe of tyme she fell in such pouertie, that she dyed in great penury & misery.

Nowe because of the misdeameanor of this Woman, that shee had thus vnnaturally slaine her Lorde and husbände, the king of Anglis, and specially of west Saxons, would not suffer their wyues to be called Quenes, nor yet suffer them to sit by them in places of great honour or kingly seate, by a long tyme after.

Thus as before is shewed, dyed Brithricus, beyng empoysoned by his awne wyfe, when he had ruled the west Saxons. xxv. yeres.

Egbert, or after the Englishe Chronicle Edbright, the sonne of Alcumundus, reigned ouer the west Saxons. This man as is before sayd, was driven out of the lande of Briteyn by the force of Brithricus. But he hauing knowledge of his death, sped him out of Fraunce, and in so knightly wyse behaued himselfe, that he obteyned the gouernement aboue sayd, and was made king of west Saxons.

Bernulphus king of Mertia had this Egbert in great derision, and vsed against him sundrie scoffes, and made of him trifling and rayling rymes, the which for a tyme he patiently suffered. But when he was somewhat stayed in his kingdome, and had proued the heartes of his subiectes, he at the last assembled his knightes and Souldiours, and gaue vnto Bernulphus a bat-tayle in a place called Clindone, in the Province of Hampshire. And albeit that in that fight was great diuersitie of number, as. lxx. viij. againe one, yet Egbert had the victorie: For his knightes were leane, pale, and long brethed, so that they might endure to fight long: But Bernulphus Souldiours were fat, corpulent, grosse and short breathed, and therfore could not endure.

¶ Here is to be noted, that after the death of Offa king of Mercia, or middle England (of whom somewhat is spoken in the story of Kenulphus) reigned his sonne Egfertus, and after Egfertus reigned Kenulphus, the which was father vnto Kenelme, and vnto the two fayre Virgines Quindreda, and Burgemilda. And after Kenulphus reigned the sayd Kenelme: And after Kenelme, Colwolphus; and after him Bernulphus before named.

¶ And nowe to returne to Egbert, who when he had as before is sayde overcome Bernulphus, he sealed that Lordship into his alone hand: and that done, he made warre vpon the kentish Saxons, and at length obteyned also of them the victorie. And lyke wyse, he subdued the Northumbers, and caused the kinges of these three Kingdomes to liue vnder him as tributaries, and ioyned them to his Kingdome.

¶ This Egbert also wanne from the Britons or Welshmen, the towne of Chester, which they had kept in their possession vntill that daye. For the which victories thus by him obteyned, he shortly after called a counsaile of his Lordes at Winchester, and there by their aduises, he was crowned king and chiefe Lord of this land, which before this day was called Briteyn: But nowe he sent into all the Costes of this lande his commaundementes and commissions, that from that day forwarde the Saxons should be called Anglis, and the land Anglia, in Englishe, England.

¶ About the. xviij. yere of the reigne of Egbert, Kenelme before mentioned the sonne of Kenwolphus was admitted for king of Mercia, beyng then but a childe of the age of. viij. yeres. The which by treason of his sister Quendreda was slaine in a thicke wood, by a tyrant called Hefbertus.

¶ In the. xxix. yere of the reigne of Egbert, the Danes with a great hoste entered the second tyme into this land, and spoyled the Isle of Shepey in Kent, or nere to Kent. Whereof, when king Egbert had knowledge, he assembled his people and met with them at a place called Carrum: But he wou in that fight little worship, for the Danes compelled him and his knightes to forsake the field. And beyng encouraged by that victorie, they drew westwarde, and made a confederacie with the west Britons, that liued in seruitude: By whose power they assayled Egberts landes, and did much harme in manye places of his dominion and else where, so that after this day they were continually abiding in one place of the Realme or other, vntill the tyme of Herdikenitus or Canutus fortis the last king of the Danes blood, so that many were maryed to Englishe women, and many that nowe are, or in tyme passed were, are discended of them. And albeit they were many and sundrye tymes chased and driven out of this land, and chased from one country to another, yet that notwithstanding, they ever gathered new strengthes & power, so that they abode still within the land.

¶ Of the king of these Danes, and of what people they be discended, dyuerse opinions of writers there be, which here I passe ouer, because afterward I purpose somewhat at large to say more therein.

The entrance of the Danes.

¶ Nowe it foloweth, in the tyme of the persecution of these Paganes, and Danes, Egbert dyed, when he had well and nobly ruled the west Saxons, and the more part of Englande the terme of. xxxvij. yeres, and was buried at Winchester, and left behinde him a sonne named Ethelwolph, other wise called Edelfhus.

¶ Onuallus, succeeded Achaius in the kingdome of Scotland, and reigned five yeres.

¶ Ongallus reigned in Scotland sixe yeres, & as he was going with an armie against the Pictes (in the quarrell of Alpine a Scot, which claymed the crowne of the Pictes) he was drowned in a ryuer.

¶ Alpine the sonne of Achaius was made king of Scottes: He pursued the Awarre against the Pictes, and slue their king Feredech, but not long after he was vanquished and slaine by Bryndus king of Pictes, when he had reigned foure yeres.

¶ Ethelwolph, or Edelfhus the sonne of Egbert reigned ouer the Saxons or Anglis, in y yere of our Lord. 832. This man in his youth was very willing to be a priest, and was entered into the order of Subdeacon. But after he was married to Osburga his Butlers daughter, a woman of low birth, but in an old writte Chronicle, I find y he was married to Judith, daughter of y French king, which was Lewes y first, by whom he had foure somes, Ethelwald, Ethelbert, Etheldread, and Alured, the which after their father, reigned as kinges of Englande, the one after the other as shall apere.

¶ This Ethelwolph after he had bene a while king, went to Rome, and tooke with him his yongest sonne Alured, or Alfrede, and tarped there the space of a yere. In the which season he repayred the Saxon schole, the which before tyme was there founded by Offa king of Mercia (as saith Guydo) but more truely by Iewe king of west Saxons, as sayth Mathew of Westminster. And for that he graunted of euery house in his Kingdome a pennie, as in his story before is shewed: But this schoole was sore decayed, and the house thereof lately brent, the which this Ethelwolph newly repayred, and set it in much better order than before it had bene.

¶ This king also to reforme the grieuous corrections that he sawe there executed to Englishe men for spirituall offences, as in wearing of Irons and Guyues, he graunted of euery house of his lande wherein fyre was brent a pennie, as Iewe before had done, for the mittigating of the sayd corrections. By the which it should seeme, that there was two pence graunted of euery house throughout the land. For this Rome skot, or Rome shot as it was then called, was of euery house a penny and no more. And therefore it is mistaken of the writers, that alegge the dede to the one king for the other: Notobeyt, it may stande by reason, that Iewe made the first graunt, and this king confirmed the same. But the Authoz of Chronica Chronicarum sayth, that Ethelwolph graunted to Saint Peter the Peter pence, and speaketh no worde of Iewe, nor of none other.

¶ It is also shewed by Polichronica, that this king for the acquiting of the Churches of England, of all maner of kinges tribute, payed yerely to Rome three hundreth Markes: that is to saye, to Saint Peters Church, an hundreth Markes, to the light of Saint Paule, an hundreth Markes, and to the

And after he had disported him there a season, he married the daughter of the sayde Charles in the .xx. yere of his awne reigne.

Judith daughter to Charles the French king. ¶ Then Ethelwolph taking leaue of the frenche king, tooke shipping and landed in England with his wife Judith by name. And for that he contrary to the lawe (made in Brithicus time) set his wife in the kinges throne, and magnified her like a Queene, the Lordes of his land arose against him, and tooke from him a great part of his dominion, and made his eldest sonne ruler thereof, the which was done altogether in the reproch of Ethelburga, that she her Lorde Brithicus as befoze is shewed. But in the end, the matter was appealed, and he to his kingly honour was restored. And in the yere folowing died the said Bertulphus king of Mertia. After whose death, Burdredus was made king of Mertia, or middle England, who befoze had spoused the daughter of this king Ethelwolph.

¶ In the latter dayes of this Ethelwolph, the Danes did much harme in Lyndsey, and also in Kent, and from thence came to London, and robbed and spoiled the Citie. Wherefoze Ethelwolph gathered his people, and at the last met with them in Southrey, vpon a downe called Oclea, and there discomfited them, not without shedding of great plentie of the Anglis blood, and forced them to take the Sea, so that afterward they landed in East Anglia, as shall appere. And nowe this good king ended his life when he had reigned .xxij. yeres.

Ethelwald the sonne of Ethelwolph after his father reigned ouer the west Saxons or Anglis. This man was very wicked, and married the woman which his father sometime kept for his Concubine, or as some write his stepmother: But to be short, there remaineth in story noworthy thing written of him, but that he reigned not aboue one yere, & then dyed, but howe he came to his death as testifieth Reynulph it is vncertaine, except it be as one writer sayeth that he was slaine of the Danish princes, Hunger and Hubba.

Onalde the fift of that name (a vicious and wicked Prince) reigned in Scotlande. .vi. yeres. In his tyme Osbret or Osbright and Ella which were kings of the Anglis and Britaines made warre vpon the Scottes, tooke their king and subdued all the Countrie from Striuelling to the Irish Seas, and from the water of Fryth and Clyde to Cumber, with all the strengthes thereof. This was Clyde March betwene the Scottes and Britons one the one side, and the water of Frith named the Scottishe Sea March betwene them and the Englishmen on the other side: and Sterling common March to three people. Britons, Englishmen, and Scottes. And in the Castle of Sterlyng the sayde king Osbright caused his first money to be coyned, which yet we call Sterling Money. And the Englishmen did there build a bridge of stone for passage ouer the water of Frith, in the midst whereof they made a Crosse, and vnder the same woxit these two verses, ¶ Nicholas Bradyngham in his Epitome sayeth, that after Ethelwald their reigned one Osbright king of Briteyn, who conquered Scotland, and at the last an agreement was taken that from thenceforth the water of Frith should be the March betwene the Scottes & Englishmen in the East parts, and should be named the Scottishe Sea. The water of Clyde to Dunbriton, to be Marche in the west part betwene Scottes and Britons. And at Dunbriton was a Castle called Aclude, and now Dunbriton. So that the Britons had all the landes from Sterling to the Irish Seas, and from the water of Frith.

Ethelbert the seconde sonne of Ethelwald reigned ouer the greater parte of England. And in his time the Danes with more strength entered the west part of this land, and robbed and spoiled the Countrie befoze them, vtill they came to Winchester, and tooke the Citie by strength, and did therein what they would: but the king made such prouision, that by him and his Dukes they were forced to forsake the Citie. And as they went toward their Shippes, they were fought withall, and a great parte of them slaine and taken.

Etheldred the thirde sonne of Ethelwald tooke vpon him the gouernment of the west Anglis. And in the beginning of his reigne the Danes landed in East England, called Northfolke and Suffolke: but they were compelled to forsake that Countrie, and so to make againe into their Shippes, in the which retire they were foughten withall and many of them taken and slaine, and then they sayled Northward, and landed in Northumberlande, where the two kings that reigned there, met with them, and gaue them battaile, their names were Osbright and Ella, and there was a strong fight: But the Danes with the help of such as inhabited in the Countrie, wanne the Citie of Porke and held it a certaine time.

Danes laded in Northfolke & Suffolke.

¶ Then the people of Northumberlande, varied within themselves, and were more readier to ayde and helpe the Danes, then to lye vnder the gouernment of the king of west Saxons. For here is to be noted, that all such kings as reigned there after Egbert, were tributaries, and therefore oppressed pressed the people that lyued vnder them.

¶ Wherefore Etheldredus hearing of the ayde and comfort that the Danes had there, assembled his people and sped him thitherward, and sent vnto the aforesayd two kings that had the rule of that Countrey, commaunding them also to prepare their people against his coming. But howe it was, or the king came with his hoste, the Danes so prouoked the Northumbers to battaile, that they met in playne fielde, and fought a long fight: But in the ende the Danes wanne the price, and slue both the aforesayde kings with a great multitude of their people. After which victorie, they subdued much of the sayde Countrey and destroyed the towne of Aclint, the which as sayth Beda, was one of the strongest townes of the North.

¶ When Etheldred had prepared all thing for the warre, and was set forward toward the North, worde was brought vnto him of the great discomfiture of the Northumbers, and also of dyuers of the sayde Danes, with other that were come to Mertia, and howe that they had wonne the Towne of Notyngham, which tydings letted him of that iourney, and so the Danes kept possession of that Countrey, in suche wise that no Angle had rule therof vntill the time of Adelfstone, or as some write, vntill the tyme of Edredus, so that they helde it in possession the terme of .xl. yeres.

¶ Then the Danes being thus possessed of the North Countrey, manned the same, and fortified the strong holds thereof. And the other companie of them came downe into Mertia or middle England and wanne a part therof with the aforesayde Towne of Notyngham, and dwelled there the more part of the yere following.

¶ Wherefore king Etheldred with the ayde of Burdredus, then king of Mertia, layde siege vnto the Towne: the which when the Danes perceyued should be wonne, they refused the towne & tooke the Tower or Castell, and defended it in strong maner, in so much that they helde it vntill a peace or appointment was concluded betweene the two kings and them: which was, that they should go free where they woulde, and carie with them their horse & harneys without any pillage. And when this peace was thus made, eyther of the kings departed to their owne, and the Danes returned into Yorke and dwelled there the yere following.

¶ And in the yere following, a certaine number of the sayde Danes, taking shipping in the North, purposed to sayle into East Englande, and vpon the Sea, they chaunced to meete with a great flote of Danes, whereof the Capitaines or chiefe leaders, were named Hungar and Hubba: The which by exhortation of the other coming out of the North, made all one course, and lastly landed in East England or Northfolke, and in proesse of tyme came vnto Thetford.

¶ When Edmond king of the Prouynce heard hereof, he assembled an hoste, and gaue vnto them battaile. But Edmond and his hoste was forced to forsake the fielde, and Edmond with a fewe persons fled into the Castle of Fremingham, whome the Danes pursued: But he in short tyme after yelded himselfe vnto the persecution of the Danes. And for that this vertuous Man Edmond woulde not denie, or renie Christ, and his lawes, they therefore most cruellie bound him vnto a Tree, and caused him to be shot to death, and in the ende caused his head to be smitten from his bodye, and cast amongst amongest the thicke of the Bushes, as sayth Fabian.

¶ Then his friendes with great solemnitie caried the body vnto the Abbey, then called Eglidon, or Eglyuon, and now called Saint Edmondes bury, and there buried him in the yere of our Lord. viij. C. lxiij.

¶ But now to returne againe to the Danes. When they had as before is sayd martired this godly Man Edmond, and robbed and spoyled that Countrey, they tooke againe their Shippes, and landed in Southerey, and continued their iourney vntill they came to the towne of Reding, and wanne the Towne and Castle.

¶ And as Polichronicon sayth, the thirde day after they came thither, Hungar and Hubba, as they went in purchasing of prayes, were slaine at a place called Englefield, which Capitaines of the Danes being thus slain the rest of them kept close together, in such wise that y west Saxons could take of them none aduantage. But within fewe dayes after, the Danes were holden so short, that they were forced to issue out of the Castle, and to defende themselves in plaine fielde. In the which by the comfort of king Etheldred, and of Alured his brother, the Danes were discomfited, and many of them slaine: whereof the other being ware, fled againe to the Castle, and kept them with in the same a certeyne tyme.

¶ Then the king commaunded Ethelwold who at that tyme was Duke of Barcoke, or Barkshire, to attend with his people vpon that Castle, and to see that the Danes brake not out at large, while he went into other partes of that Countrey to subdue other of the sayde Danes. But when the Danes knewe of the kinges departure, they brake out, and tooke the Duke vnprouided, and slue him and most of his people, and caused the rest to withdrawe themselves from that towne and Castle.

¶ It was not long after, but that the king was certified of the death of Ethelwoolde Duke of Barkshire, and of the discomfiture of his people, and of the great victorie of the Danes: which vnto him were heauie newes. And foorthwith also, he heard that a Dane was landed named Osricke, whome Polichronicon nameth to be the king of Denmarke, the which Osricke in a short tyme had gathered together by the helpe and assistance of the other Danes a great hoste, and were embattayled vpon A thedowne.

¶ Vnto this battaile Alured was sent for, to his brother the king with great speede, that he should set forward vpon the Danes. But before he could be ready, the hostes of the Anglis, and the Danes were ioyned together with great violence. And although the Danes had wonne the hill, and the christian men were left in the balley: yet by the grace of God, and manhood of themselves, the christian men recovered the hil of the Danes, and slue their Duke or king called Osricke, and fine of their Dukes, with many of their people, and chased the rest vnto the towne of Redyng.

¶ Wherefore the Danes reassembled their people, and gathered a newe hoste, so that within .xv. dayes, they met at a towne called Basingstoke, and there gaue battaile vnto king Etheldred, and had the better. Then the king gathered his people, the which at that fielde were sore scattered, and seperated, and with fresh Souldiours to them accompanied, met the Danes with in two Monethes after, at a Towne called Merton, and gaue vnto them a sharpe battaile, so that many people were slaine on both parties, that is to say, aswell of the Christians, as of the Danes. But in conclusion, the Danes had the honour of the fiede, and the king of Anglis was wounded and faine to sauegarde himselfe by pollecy, because might and strength fayled him.

¶ After these two fieldes thus woome by the Danes, they obeyned and enjoyed a great circuite of grounde, and destroyed man, woman, and childe, that to them were disobedient. And Churches and Temples they turned to the vse of Stables and other vile occupations. And to this great sorow was yet added another.

¶ For where the king hoped well to haue recovered his losses by the ayde and helpe of his subiectes, aswell of other partes of the lande, as of hys owne which was the west Saxons, he sent his comissions into Northumberland, into Mercia, and East Anglia: But he had of them small or little comfort, & in effect it was no comfort at all, so that the Countrie of west Saxons was brought into great desolation. For the king was beset with enemies on euery syde, and besides that, his knightes and Souldiours were tyred, and worted with ouer watching and labour. The number of which aduersities and troubles entring, and deepelye sinking into the kinges minde, with his sore broose and hurt ensuyng of the wound taken at the battaile besyde Merton, shortened his dayes, so that he dyed when he had reigned in great vexation and trouble of the Danes. viij. yeres, without issue of his bodie, and was buried at Winbourn: By reason whereof, the rule of the lande fell vnto his brother Alurede. Some write that he first founded the Cathedrall Church at Exeter.

Alurede the fourth sonne of Ethelwolphe, and brother to Etheldred reigned ouer the west Saxons. This Alured was borne at wantage, x. Miles from Oxforde then a Cobone of the king of the west Saxons, who as some write was. xij. yeres of age before he was set to schole: but for all that, he spent so well his tyme, that he exceeded all his brethren that were long set forth to schole before him. And by the counsaile of a verteous and well learned Monke named Neotus, and other learned men of that tyme, he founded the Uniuersitie of Oxforde, and fraunchised the same with many great liberties and priuileges. But the historie of that Uniuersitie of Oxforde seemeth to make it to be of a much greater antiquity, and to referre the beginning thereof vnto certaine Greeke Philosophers that came into this Iland with Bute and the Troyans, and afterwards placed themselves in a place not farre distaunt from Oxforde, called corruptly Crekelad for Grekelade. The which Philosophers being afterwarde allured with the pleasaunt situation of the place, remoued from thence to the soyle where Oxforde now standeth, and there taught the liberall Sciences. And the same schole being at the length decayed, and brought to extreme ruyne by ciuill warre and alteration of time: Alfred (say some) otherwise called Alurede as a seconde founder restored againe vnto the auncient state, who besides many other godly actes done for the encrease and maintenance of good learning, founded there a College, named the Wyckle Uniuersitie Hall, now called the Uniuersitie Colledge: and in the same ordeyned a Governour by the name of a Master and a societie of. lxxviij. felowes, wherof there were. xxvj. Diuines. xxvj. Philosophers. xxvj. Grammaticians, to the mainteyning and sustenance of the which number, he appointed a competent yerely reuenew to be payde out of the Kings Cofers, by his heires and successours for euer, the which payment did still continue, as the monuments and auncient writings of the sayde College doe testifie, vntill the conning of Wylliam the Conquerour, who was the first that vpon displeasure conceyued against the students and scholers there, withdrew the sayde payment.

¶ Also he translated manye lawes, and namely the lawe of Mertia, and other out of the Britishe speeche into the Saxon tongue. He was also verye cunning and skilfull in building and making of Plottes, and excellent in hunting. He was of goodly stature and the best beloued of his father of all his other children. In his youth he was somewhat giuen to the pleasure of the fleshe, which hindered him from many a verteous purpose, for the repressing whereof, he euening and morning and oftentimes in the night season woulde resort vnto Churches and there deuoutly praye a long season, and at the last he fell into an extreme sicknesse called ficus. For it is sayde that he desired of God that his fleshe might be chastised with suche a sicknesse, whereby he might serue God the better, and yet not to be vnapt to worldly businesse. And when he was cured of the aforesayde sicknesse, then he fell into another more grieuous than that, the which continued with him from the. xx. yere of his age, till he was. xlv. But yet notwithstanding he wedded a noble woman named Ethelwyd, aby whome he had two sonnes, Edward surnamed the Elder, and Egelward, and three daughters: Elfeda that after was Lady of Mertia, Ethelgotha which was made a Queene, and the third was called Elfrida. And he caused all his children as well daughters as o-ther to be brought vp in science and learning, and for that purpose reteyned the learned man Asserius and Meneuia and other.

Ficus.

¶ Nowe after this Alured was admitted king, he considering the great daunger that his lande was in, gathered vnto hym his Lordes, and those whom he coulde not winne without strife, he wanne by strength and power: So that shortly, he assembled a great hoste, and in the seconde Moneth that he was made king, he met with the Danes on Wylton hil on the South part of Wylpe Bourne, and there gaue vnto them a great battaile, but not without great daunger and losse of men on both partyes. Fabian.

¶ Mathew of Westmynster, Authoz of the flowres of stozies, sayth that the victorie fell vnto the Danes, because Alureds army was much fewer in number than the other were: For the force of the nobles and people of the west Saxons was then sore minished and abated, by reason of. ix. battailes that had bene foughten against the sayde Danes the yere past on the Southside of Thames, beside diuers roades and skirmishes made by their horsemen. After the which victorie, the Danes returned to London and wintered there, and thether came also vnto them, Buthredus king of Middle England, and friendly compounded with them for mony and tooke a truce.

¶ Then he remedied his people, and in sundrie places fought with the Danes in the first yere sixe tymes: By meane whereof his people were so sore minished and weakened, that he was forced to take peare with his enemies, vpon condicion that they should auoyde the Countries and Prouinces that he had dominion of.

boyded these Countreies, and drew towards London, and rested them about that coast the greatest parte of the yere following: and from thence to Lynsey in robbing and spoiling the Townes and Villages as they went, and holding the common people in seruitude and bondage, and so continued the space of two yeres and more. But before the thirde yere was ended, they went vnto Repindon, and there put downe oꝛ slue Burdredus then king of Mertia, and they deliuered the kingdome vnto a seruant of his named Colwolphus, vpon condition that he should kepe it to their vse. And then they besieged a towne thereby called Hambourgh, and assaulted it right sharply. After the which assault the inhabitants of that towne of Hambourgh fled vnto Winchester. Fabian. But this storie in all pointes agreeth neyther with Huntingdon, noꝛ the Authour of the flowres of stozies and other auncient Wytters.

¶ Then the king made againe peace with the Danes, as he had done oftentimes before, and in trust thereof he roade with the fewer people, whereof the Danes hauing knowledge, layde bushmentes for him, and set so nere him, that they slue a great part of his companie, in an euening as he rode towards Winchester. But Polodore wyrteth, that this was done in a Manour of the kinges not farre from London, whether the kinge came at that tyme to recreate himselfe with hunting.

The Danes distressed.

¶ And for this treason, Alured was sore amoued against them, and in as secreete maner as he might, he assembled a chosen companie of knightes, and Souldiours, and as Gyudo sayth, fell vpon them sodenlye and distressed a great number of them, and left them not til he had chased them vnto Chesser, oꝛ as some say to Exeter, and there kept the Danes so short, that he constrained them to geue to him pledges to kepe the peace, and to dwell no longer there then they could prouide shipping to sayle into Denmarke.

Penda.

¶ After the which agreement, the king returned to Mertia, oꝛ middle England. And for that he heard that Colwolphus was dead, to whome the Danes had taken that Lordship to keepe, he therefore seased that kingdome and ioyned it to his owne. By reason whereof the kingdome of Mertia surceased, which had continued from their first king named Penda vntill þ time.

Gytrus.

¶ And in the fift yere of the reigne of Alured, the Danes (as affirmeth Polichronicon) sayled from Werham toward Exeter, in the which iourney they lost. C. r. of theyꝝ small shippes by a tempest on the Sea: But some of them remayned and occupied the kinges towne of Chipnam, and the Countrey thereabout, and chased the Anglis and put them to flight, oꝛ made them as subiectes vnto them. And so sore their power encreased, that the Anglis lost and decayed dayly, and they preyayled the more a great deale, by reason of the landing of a Prince of the Danes, called Gytrus, which was named king of Denmarke.

If good life of a King.

¶ King Alured beyng thus ouercome with a multitude of enemies, did lead an vncerteyne, troublesome and vnquiet lyfe, and hauing very fewe folkes about him would walke about in the Wood Countrey of Sommersetshire, and had skant to liue withall, but lyued of suche as he and his people could get by hunting and fishing.

¶ How be it, at the length he was well comforted, and shewed him selfe more at large, so that dayly resorted to him men of Wiltshire, Somersetshire, and and Hampshire, vntill that he was well and strongly furnished. Then as sayth a wyrtter called William of Mahnesburge de Regibus, the king put himselfe in a great ieoperdie: for he put on him the garment of a Minstrell, and with his Instrument of Musicke he entered the tentes and Paulions of the Danes, and in shewing to them his pastime, with ieastes and songes, he espied all their slouth and idleness, and also heard much of their counsaile, and after returned againe vnto his company, and tolde to them all the maner of the Danes.

Edeling.

¶ Then the king with a chosen companie fell vpon them by night, and distressed, and slue of them a great multitude, & chased them from that coast. And when he had thus chased the Danes, by counsaile of his knightes, he buylded there a Tower, and named it Edeling, that is to say, a Tower of noble men: Out of the which Tower he and his souldiours made many assaults vpon their enemies and did to them much griefe and damage, and at the last clerly aduoyded the Countrey of them betwene that and Selwoodes.

¶ This Edeling standeth in a greene Marells oꝛ Moore, so that men can not come at it without Ship, oꝛ Boate, and it conteyneth no great ground, but yet therein is Wenison & other wilde beastes, and foule, & fish great plenty.

¶ Thus king Alured dayly pursued his enemies, by the helpe of God and his Subiectes, who heering of his victories and manfull deedes, drew to him continually out of all Coastes: By whose power & strength he helde the Danes so short, that he wanne from them Winchester, and many other good Townes, and compelled them at the last to sue for peace, the which was concluded vpon certeyne conditions, whereof one and the Principall was, that theyꝝ king named as before is sayde, Gytrus, shoulde be Christened, and a certeyne of his Dukes with him. And for that the king would haue the Danes banished out of the West partes of Englande, he graunted to him East Anglia, to abide and dwell in.

Peace taken with the Danes.

The Danes christened.

¶ Then this Prince of Danes, according to the couenantes, was christened at Winchester, (oꝛ as Mathew of Westminster sayth, at a place called Alre, not farre from Edeling aforesayde) and. xxx. of the greatest of his Dukes with him. And to the Danish Prince, king Alured was Godfather at the Font stone, & named him Athelstane. And after he had a season feasted the sayd Danes, he according to his promes gaue vnto their king the Countrey of East Anglia, which then conteyned, Norfolk, and Suffolke, and a part of Cambridgeshire. And also, as sayth Polichronicon, he graunted to the Danes that were christened, the Countrey of Northumberlande. And the other that would not be christened departed the land, and sayled into France, where they rested them with their cosyns and kinsmen, and at those dayes they wasted and spoiled the Countrey of France in most despitemaner.

Athelstane.

¶ When this Danishe king Athelstane, had the possession of the Countreies aboue mencioned, then were all such Anglis, as inhabited there vnder his obedience. And albeit that he helde the sayde Prouynce as in fee of the king, and promised to dwell there as his liege man, yet that promise notwithstanding, he continued lyke a Tyrant, by the terme of. xj. yeres full, and in the. xij. yere he dyed.

¶ About the. xv. yere of the reigne of Alured, the Danes which before as ye haue heard, sayled into France, returned nowe againe into England, and landed landed in Kent, and at the last came to Rochester, and besieged that Citie, and lay there so long, that they builded a Tower of Tymber, and not of Stone, against the gates of the Citie. But by the strength of the Citezens that tower was destroyed, and the Citie defended vntill king Alured reskewed them. The which had made such puruepaunce for the distrelling of them by water, and land, that they were so nere trapped, that for feare they left their Horses behinde them, and fled to their Shippes by night. But when the king was thereof ware, he sent after them, and tooke .xxj. of their Shippes, and slue many of the sayde Danes. After this iourney the king returned to London and repayzed certeyn places of the same, which the Danes had hurt & febled.

dead.

¶ And in the .xxj. yere of the reigne of this king, the Danes landed in foure places of this Realme, that is to say, in the East England, & the North, and in the West in two places. But by reason the king before their landing had warning of the death of Athelstane the Danishe king of East England, and of other complaintes of the Danes, he therefore went thether himselfe, and in the tyme of his there beyng, the aforesayd newes came to him.

Etheldred.

¶ And so soone as he heard thereof, and that some of the Danes were landed in that coast, and knewe well that the further that they drewe into those partes, the more they shoulde be ayded and strengthened: he therefore sent messengers in all hast vnto Etheldred Erle or Duke of Mertia and the borderers thereabout, to make resstaunce against the Danes which landed in the west. And that done, the king sped him towarde his enemies and set on them so egerly and sharpely, that in the ende he droue them out of East Anglia. And then they landed in Kent, whether also the king and his people folowed, and likewise draue them from thence. Howbeit, of anye speciall fight or battaile, authours make no mention. After this againe the Danes tooke shipping and sayled into Northwales, and there robbed and spoyled the Britons, and from thence returned by Sea into Est England, and there rested them, for so much as the king was then gone westwarde.

¶ In this meane tyme, the aforesayd Danes had wonne the Towne of Chester, but the Countries adioynng therevnto, came so sore and so thicke vpon them, that the Danes were compelled to keepe them within the sayde Towne or Citie, and to defende themselues therein as well as they coule. But their holding and keeping of that Towne continued so long, that they were compelled to eate their Horses for hunger. And at the last by apointment they gaue ouer the Towne, and went thence to Northumberland.

Londoners.

¶ And in the while that the king with his hoste sped him thetherward, they leauing their strong holdes & Castels garnished with men and victuall, tooke againe shipping, and fet their course in such wise that they landed in Suffer, and so came to the Towne of Lewes, and from thence toward London and they builded a Tower or Castell nere vnto the Ryuer of Lewes. But the Londoners hearing of their doings, made out a certaine number of men of armes, who hauing the ayde of the Countrie, put the Danes from that Tower, and after ward did beate it doone to the grounde.

¶ And shortly after, the king came doone thether, and for that he thought that the sayde Ryuer would be a meane to bring enemies estsones into that Countrie, therefore he commaunded the streame to be deuyled into dyuers streames, so that by reason thereof, where a Ship might haue sayled in tyme passed, then a little Boate might scantly rowe. And now by reason of the presence of the king, the Danes were enforced to flie and to auoyde that Countrie, and from thence tooke againe their way toward Wales, and kept along the Ryuer of Seuerne, and byon the border thereof they builded them a Castell nere vnto Wales, and so rested them there for a tyme. And three yeres after this land was vexed with thre maner of plagues, the one was warre with the Danes, the other was death and pestilence of men, and the thirde Hozeyn of Cattell. The which troubles & aduersities notwithstanding, the king honourably and valiantly resisted his enemies, and gaue God hartye thanks whatsoeuer came, and susteyned it with great humilitie & pacience.

¶ And finally, this martiall Prince continuing in all prowes and vertue, at the last dyed, when he had ruled this lande .xxviij. yeres, and first was buried at Wilton, and after certaine yeres remoued and caried vnto Winchester, leauing after him a sonne named Edward the Elder, for the other brother called Egelward dyed before his father.

¶ Thus reigned in Scotlande two yeres, he was so swift that in running, he coule ouertake a Harte or Greyhounde.

¶ Regour reigned in Scotland .xxiiij. yeres. This was a sage, wise, and Gnyssaunt Prince, and a man of great prowes. He recouered fifte and Louthian, & the countries that were taken from the Scottes, by the Danes and other enemies, he also droue the Danes out of Northumberland (as affirmeth the Scottish history) and made that Province tributarie to him: he tooke from the Britens Chumber and westmerlande, and banquished and subdued the Irishmen.

¶ Donald the .vi. reigned in Scotland .xi. yeres. He made a lawe, that all men that did forswear themselves, or spake of the Deuill, should be burned in the lips with a hoate Iron.

¶ Edward surnamed the Elder, the sonne of Alured began after his father to gouerne the Realme of England. This man was not so well learned as was his father, but in honour, fame, and martiall prowes, he was nothing inferiour. Howbeit, Wyllyam of Malmesbury in the .xiiij. Chapter and second booke of the story of Kinges, affirmeth that he was excellently learned, and folowing the diligence of his father king Alfrede, caused his base sonne called Ethelstane, who afterwards succeeded him, to be well instructed in the Latyn tongue. He was also very profitable to the common weale in building and repaying many Castels, Townes, and Cities, which were rased and broken by the Danes, he adioyned to his Lordship all this lande, sauing only Northumberland, which was possessed of the Danes. By his first wyfe he had a sonne named Ethelstane the which was king after him. But the Authour of the flowers of Histories sayth, that he begat Ethelstane of a Concubine named Egwine. By his second wyfe he had two sonnes, Edredus, and Edwynus, and .viij. daughters. And of the thirde wife, he receyued two sonnes, Edmond, and Edred, and two daughters, Eburga, and Edgina.

the Emperoz, and another named Algina, was married to Charles the Simple, King of west France, & the yongest of his daughters as sayth Reynulph, he wedded vnto Lewes king of Guyan, but hereof speaketh nothing the Frenche Chronicle. He set his sommes to schoole, and his daughters to wooll worke, taking example of Charles the Conquerour.

¶ But because there is diuersitie among writers touching the names of his wiues and children, and also of the number of them, he that findeth fault with the Authoz whom I folow, may read Mathew of Westminster in the lyfe of Edward the sonne of Alphred, and Reynulph in his sixt booke, and fourth Chapter, and there he shall see howe, and toherin they disagree, and so try out what is most probable and lykely to be true: But yet that the reader may haue some present tryall hereof, I will shewe what the Authour called Mathew of Westminster, which compiled his story at the commaundement of Richard the seconde, wyrteth hereof, whose wordes are these.

The next yere folowing, the sayd Clito with his companie landed in East England, and gathered to him the Danes of that Countrie, and with theyr ayd destroyed and pilld the Countrie about Crekinford, and Crickland. And then he passed the ryuer of Thames, and spoyled the land vnto Bradenestoke or rather Basingstoke, and so from thence returned againe into East Anglia aforesayde. But where mine Authour hath here Crekynfoord, and Cricklande, Reynulph hath Crekanefoorde otherwise called Kreklade, whome I do rather allowe.

¶ Now the king folowed still his enemies, and spoyled their landes which they helde by composition of him from the Ryuer of Dwise, to the border of Saint Edmondes lande, commaunding the knightes of his hoste, that none should drag or tary after his armye, for feare least the enemies should snatch them vp. But the Kentish men trusting to much in their alone strength, came not away as the king commaunded: wherefore the Danes wayting theyr praye, fell vpon them by bushments, and slue a great number of them, toherewith wherewith the king was soze discontented.

¶ Sone after, both the Armies met, where after long and cruell fight, Clyto with a great number of the Danes were slaine, and the residue constrained to flie, and to crie and seeke for peace, the which was graunted vnto them vpon certeyne condicions, namely, that they shoulde keepe them within the boundes to them limited, & besydes that to pay yerely a certeine summe of money in way of Tribute. After which peace so stablished with them, the king repayred Cities, Townes, and Castels, that by the sayde Danes were battered and broken.

¶ And in the. viij. yere of his reigne, king Edward repayred the walles and also the Citie of Chester. To the which were great helpers, Etheldredus Duke of Mertia, and Elleda his wife, daughter of Alured, as before is shewed, and sister of this king Edward. And after the king builded a strong Castle at Hereforde in the edge of Wales. And he enlarged so greatly the Walles of Chester, that the Castell which before time was without the wall, is now within, and the sayde Citie of Chester is at thys day much moze beautified and enlarged.

¶ In the. xij. yere of his reigne the Danes repentyng them of theyr couenantes before made, and mynding the breach of the same, assembled an hoste and met with the king in Staffordshire at a place called Coten hall, and soone after at Wodnes field: At which two places the king slue two kinges, two Earles, and many thousandes of the Danes that then occupied the countrey of Northumberland. And soone after, dyed the noble man Etheldredus, Duke or Earle of Martia or middle England, after whose death, the king forsomuch as he had often proued her wisdom, tooke the rule of that countrey to his wife Elleda (London onely excepted) the which he tooke vnder his alone rule.

¶ In the. xiiij. yere of this king, a great nauie of Danes which in the time of Alured were driuen into fraunce nowe returned againe, and sayled about the west countrey, and landed in dyuerse places, and tooke prayes, and went to their Shippes againe. And at one tyme among other, they robbed and spoyled at a place called Irchinfielde, and tooke a Britishe Bishop, and caryed him to their shippes, and finally raunsomed him at. xl. pound. But assoone as king Edward had knowledg of their beyng in that place, he assembled his people and made towardes them by lande, and sent another armie by water to encounter with the Danes Shippes vpon the Sea: whereof the sayd Danes hauing knowledg, fled to Irelande, and by that meanes both escaped the king by land, and his nauie by Sea.

¶ Then the king for the strengthening of that countrey made a Castell at the mouth of the water of Auene, and another Castle at Bokingham, and the thirde nere therevnto, that is to say, on eyther side of the Ryuer of Dwise one. And after this he returned into Northampton shire, and Bedfordshire, and fought there with the Danes of those Countries, and at the length subdued them and their leader or Duke called Turketillus.

¶ In the. xvij. yere of this king, Elleda Lady of Mertia, gathered together her knightes: And where the Britons or Welshmen brake into the land about Brekenocke, she with her people withstoode them, and among other prisoners and prayes, tooke there the Queene of Welshmen.

¶ And Toucester, Wigmore,

Temesford

¶ And the yere folowing, King Edward builded or newly reedefyed the Townes of Toucester, and Wigmore, and destroyed the Castell that the Danes had made at Temes foord. And the sayde yere the noble Ladye Elleda wanne the Towne of Darby from the Danes, where they put her in suche adventure, that foure knightes which were called the Gardians of her body were slaine fast by her.

¶ And in the .xxiiij. yere of his reigne dyed that noble Princes Elleda, in the Moneth of June, and was buryed in the Monasterye of Saint Peter, which her Lorde and thec before tyme had buylded within the Towne of Gloucester, which Monasterie was after throwne downe by the Danes.

¶ When Elleda was dead, her daughter named Elwyna helde the Lordship of Mertia for a season: But for that the king considered it to be a thing ouer chargeable for her gouernement, he therefore discharged her thereof, and ioyned it to his kingdome, but not all without some strife. For dyuerse Townes she kept of the king for a tyme, as Notyngham, Comworth, Derby, and other, he supposing that the daughter would haue defended them, as the mother by her lyfe had done, but at the last they came all to the kinges subiection.

¶ When king Edward had reconciled the aforesayde Townes, he then builded a new Towne, right against the olde Towne of Nottingham, on the South syde of the Ryuer of Trent, and made a Bridge ouer the sayd Riuer betwene the sayde Townes. And as sayth Reynulph, the yere folowing in the sayd Citie or Towne of Nottingham, there were two kinges, that is to say of Scotland and Wales, that yelded themselues vnto king Edward. And sundry Authours, as Marian the Scot, William of Malmesbury, Henry of Huntington, and other, doth shew that this king Edward subdued the kinges of Scotland, and of Combrys, about the .ix. yere of his reigne. And of the sayde Authours it is also witnessed, that about the .xx. yere of the sayde Edwardes reigne, the sayd kinges of Scotlande and Combrys, chose king Edward for their chiefe Lorde and Patrone, which should be aboute the season before expressed.

¶ Then this noble Prince, after all thinges were set in order as aforesayde, he builded on the North parte and in the ende of Mertia, a Citie or Towne, and named it Chilwall, and strengthened it with knightes. And after he repayred the Citie of Manchester, which was sore defaced with the warres of the Danes. After which notable deedes by this pyssant prince finished, with the mariage of his children, and many other thinges which I passe ouer for length, this noble Prince sickened, and dyed when he had victoriously reigned ouer the greatest part of this lande. .xxiiij. yeres, and was buried at Faringdon, leauyng after him dyuers sonnes, as is before reherced, of the which Ethelstane was the eldest.

¶ Marian the Scot in hys Chronicle doth wypte that thys Edward subdued Constantine king of Scottes, which reigned in his tyme, and that he helde the Realme of Scotland vnder the obedience of the aforesayde king Edward, the space of .xxiiij. yeres.

Constantine the thirde of that name was ordeyned king of Scottes, and reigned. .xl. yeres.

¶ Athelstane, or Adelstane, the sonne of Edward the elder, after the death of his father tooke vpon him the gouernement of this Realme. He was a worthy Prince, valiant, and politike in all his actes and doirges.

¶ In the seconde yere of his reigne, for an vnitie and peace to be had betwene the king and the Danes of Northumberland, he maryed his sister to Sithicus their king, vpon promes that he would be Christened, the which he performed, but shortly after he put away his wyfe, and returned to Paganisme, and finally dyed miserably.

¶ And when he had thus accorded with the Danes of Northumberland, soone after he made subiect to him Constantine king of Scottes, and the whole Realme of Scotland at Broningfelde, where also he discomfited the Danes, & Aue Malcolme Deputie in that behalfe to the king of Scots, with .xx. thousand Scottes, in the which battayle the Scottes confesse to haue lost more people than were remembred in any age before. And this Athelstane folowed this his good lucke throughout all Scotland, and wholly subdued it, and beyng in possession of it, gaue land there liyng in Almandale by his dede, the Copie wherof foloweth. I King Athelstane, geues vnto Paulan, Oddam and Roddam, as good and as fayre, as euer they mine vvere, and thereto vvitnesse Mavde my wife. By which course wordes, not onely appereth the plaine simplicitie of mennes doyngs in those dayes, but also proue fullye that he was then seized of the whole Realme of Scotland.

¶ And after this conquest, the sayde Constantine so humbled himselfe vnto the king, that he restored him to his former dignitie. Wherefore, the sayde Constantine sayde in the prayse of a king, that it vvas more honour to make a king than to be a king.

¶ It is also witnessed by Reynulph, and other, that this Athelstane, or Adelstane, should marry one of his sisters named Edith vnto Otho the first of that name Emperour of Almaine, and (as some wypte) receyued from him many precious Jewelles: But of this speaketh nothing the Chronicles of the Romaynes. Howbeit, it is shewed there, that the aforesayde Otho had a wyfe named Alinda, which as before is sayde in the story of King Edward the elder, might be the daughter of the sayd Edward, & of Edgina his second wife, and sister vnto this king Athelstane. But Vincencius sayth, that Henry Duke of Saxony, which was father vnto the first Otho, sent vnto Athelstane, requiring of him his sister to marry vnto his sonne Otto: By which reason it maye be truly sayde that Otho or Otto maryed the eldest sister of Athelstane, but not Edith.

¶ Of the aforesayd Jewells sent by Otto, one was a precious vessel of stone called Onychites, which was of such cleerenesse and also so finely and artificially wrought, that it appered to mans sight that grene corne had growne within it, and moued and waued as corne doth standing in the field: Moreouer in it appered vynes burging and bearing of fruite, and men also to fight, mouing and ferring. He also receiued the great Constantines sword, wherein was granen in great letters of Golde the name of the owner: and the hiltes thereof were couered with great plates of Golde, and one of the Nayles was fastened to the Crosse of the sayde sword, that crucified and nayled Christ to the Crosse. Fabian. But Reynulph sayth otherwise. He also receyued the Speare of Charles the great, which after the opinion of some Writers, was the Speare wherewith Longens opened Christes side. And the Baner of Saint Morice, with a part of the holpe Crosse, and a parte of the Crowne of Thorne that our Sauour Christ was crowned with. Of the which Jewels, king Ethelstane gaue part vnto S. Swithines of Winchester, and some he gaue vnto the Abbey of Malmesbury. And some write that this Athelstane was the first annointed king at his coronation, Fabian.

¶ Now it followeth in the Historie, how Constantyne king of Scottes, for all his humilitie, and for all the princely fauour that he had shewed vnto him by king Athelstane, forgetting altogether both fayth and loyaltie, as the maner and custome of the Scottes is, reuolted and brake covenant wyth the king. Wherefore king Athelstane assembled his knights and power, and made towarde Scotlande, and in his waye he turned to the Towne named Saint Johns of Beuerley and offered there his knyfe vpon the Altare sayng, that if he returned with victorie, he woulde rederne his knyfe with a noble price, and that being done, he marched forward on his iourney, and in conclusion, discomfited the Scottes, and brought them againe into due subiectio. And after accordyng to the promise before made, he returned to York, and so to Beuerley, where he redeemed his knife worthily as before he had promised by endowment and great priuileges graunted vnto that towne.

¶ And Reynulph in the vi. Booke, and vi. Chapter, sayeth that king Athelstane after he had subdued the Scottes being then with his Lordes and familiers, neere vnto the Castle of Duntarke, prayed to God that in that Countrie he might leaue some remembrance or token, that those that were then liuyng, and also such as should come after, might know that the Scots by right should be subiects to Englishmen. And forthwith he toke his sword in hande and smote vpon a great stone standing neere vnto the sayde Castell, with which stroke the stone did cleaue an Elle in length, which in the tyme of Edward the third was there to be scene, as Fabian sayeth.

¶ Ye haue heard before, that king Athelstane, after the death of Sithericus king of Northumberland, seased that lande or Prouince into his owne hande, and put out his soune: which after allyed himselfe with Constantine king of the Scottes and maryed his daughter. By whose prouocation and stirring, he gathered a company of Danes, Scottes, and other, and entered the mouth of Humber with a strong Army. Whereof king Athelstane when he had knowledge, did in all goodly haste prepare his armie, and at length met with him and his people, at a place called Brimford, where Athelstane obteyned a great and notable victorie. For after the king by the helpe of God had defended the subtil assault made vpon him by night by his enemies, he in the morning by the helpe of his brother Edmond, and Odde the Archbishop chased his sayd enemies, and slue there Constantine king of Scottes, and siue petre, or vnder kinges, and. xij. Dukes, with the greatest part of all the straungers that were there gathered at that tyme: The which battaile should be done by the meaning of the sayd Reynulph, about y last yere of his reigne.

¶ It is also writen of dyuerse Authours, that the king after this victorie, subdued also the North Briteynes that dwelled at Hereford, and there about, and compelled them to pay him yerely three hundred pound of Siluer. xlv. C. head of Beate, and. xx. pound in Golde. But Guido sayth, that the king caused at Hereford Citie, to come before him all the rulers of the North Briteyn, Briteyn, and there had with them such communication, that he forced them to graunt vnto him as a yerely tribute. xx. pound of Golde, three hundred pound of Siluer, and. xlv. C. head of Beate, with Dogges, and Hawkes to a certeyne number. After which victories, he went vnto Exeter, and repayed it and the walles thereof sufficiently.

¶ John Lydgate a Monke sometyme of Saint Edmondes bury, made a goodly treatise of this king Athelstane, shewing that he was in so great persecution of the Danes, that he was constrained to call at Winchester a great counsaile of his Lordes. Where, after long debating of the matter, and dyuerse Ambassades and messages sent about by the king, and the Danes: It was firmly concluded, that the king should prouide him a Champion to fight with Colbrond or Colbrond, a Gyant and Dane, which the Danes had appoynted for theyr Chiefteyne. Wherefore the king in searching through his landes for such a knight, and none could finde, was in great daunger and distresse of heauinesse. And forso much as he well perceyued, that mannes power fayled, he by the aduice of his Lordes Spirituall, and Temporall, fell to fasting and prayer, and continued therein by a certeyne of tyme wyth perfect and charitable deuotion.

¶ In the tyme of which sayd abstinence, a vision was shewed vnto Athelstane, comfortyng him, and also commaunding him, that early vpon the next morning, he should stande at the North gate of the Citie of Winchester, and there he should finde amongst the number of the poore people, a man clothed in Habners wede whome he should choose for his Champion.

¶ After which vision thus to him shewed, he did accordyng, and founde a man of goodly stature, & some deale stricken in age, and apparelled as he was tolde in the vision. Wherof the king first gaue vnto God his heartie thanks, and after made request to this man, that he would take vpon him this Combate for the defence of the lande: And the man layd for himselfe many causes and considerations, as well for his age as otherwise, that he ought to be hold excused to take vpon him such an enterprize. Howbeit, after much discourting at the last he graunted the king to fulfill his request and commaundement.

¶ And at the day assigned and appoynted, he met in the fildes with the aforesaid Gyant, called Colbrond without the Gate of the Citie in a Meddowe, called Hilde Medc, where betweene them two was foughten a long and cruell fight, so that the king was in great feare of his Champion. But finally by the helpe of God, the man wonne the honour of that fight, and slue that Gyant that was of exceding stature, & also of great and passing strength.

¶ Which victorie by the man thus obteyned, with the helpe and fauour of God: the king then with his Barony fet the Man into the Citie of Winchester with solempne Procession, & conueyed him vnto the Cathedral Church of the same, where he thanked God with great deuotion, and offered there the Acre with the which he had slaine the Danes Champion. After which oblation with due reuerence, and other obseruaunces by him and other finished: The king caused him to be conueyed vnto his Court, where he taried that night with much entreatye. And in the morning early he made such meanes that he would needes depart, and that in the same apparell that he came thither. When the king was aduertised that this man would so hastely depart, whome he entended to haue holden with him in his Court, and to haue endowed him with riche possessions : He commaunded him to be brought vnto his presence.

¶ And when he sawe that he could not cause him to tary, he requyred him to shew vnto him his name : wherof also he besought the king to pardon him. Wherfore the king considering his hasty departing, with many other thinges in him to be considered, was then the more desyrous to haue of him some knowledge. And therfore the king was earnest in his desyre and request, and would haue no nay, but that he should declare his name: Then the man perceiuing that without the kinges displeasure he could not depart without disclosing of his name, sayde, he might not discover his name within the walles of the Citie, without the offence of his conscience.

¶ Wherfore, the king graunted to go with him vntill he were in the brode fieldes: Upon which graunt thus made, the king commaunded dyuerse great giftes to be to him presented, which all he vtterly refused. Shortly to conclude, the king with a certeyne of his Lordes conueyed this sayde man vnto the Townes ende: And when he was thether come, he there requyred him of the performance of his proues. And then the man kneeling on his knee, besought the king of his especiall grace, that he would put apart his Lordes and other, so that he might shewe his name vnto him onely.

¶ Which beyng done, he besought him that he would kepe his name secret for the space of. xxiiiij. houres: the which the king graunted vnto him, and then he sayd, that he was his naturall liege man, and subiect, and that his name was Guy of Warwike. Of which tidynges the king was very ioyous, and offered him then of netwe, many riche rewardees and giftes: But all was in vaine, for he would receyue nothing, so that the king and he lastly departed with weping eyen. And after the sayd Guy of Warwicke purchased in a Wildernesse a lodging in an Hermitage, where, by the terme of two yeres and more, he dwelled and kept an hard life. And he heering that Dame Felice his awne wife fed dayly. xiiij. pooze men for Christes sake, he went thether sondry tymes, and fet there his Almoze, his sayde wife then liyng at the Castell of Warwike, not knowyng of any man what he was, vntill at the last, he was visited with sore sicknesse, and that he knewe well he should dye: Wherfore he sent his wedding ring vnto his wife, requyryng her in all the haste to come and speake with him, which shee obeyed in humble wise, and sped her vnto the sayde Hermitage with all womanly diligence, and founde him dead at her comming, whome shee bespyent with many a salt teare. And as shee was enformed of the Messenger, at the tyme when he dyed, he determined to be buryed in the same place, and even there shee did bury him. And moreouer, as sayth the aforesayde Authour, he admonished his sayd wyfe, by the sayd messenger, that shee should prouide, for shee should die within. xv. dayes next after: which shee also obeyed, and made such prouision that shee was buried in the same place. All which matter the sayd John Lpdgate affirmeth, that he tooke out of a certeyne booke of Giraldus Cambrensis, other wise called Siluester Giraldus, which wrote many thinges of the Princes of Englande, as Reynulph also and others doe witnesse.

¶ All which sayd treatise is shewed at length in meter of. liiiij. stauces, by the diligent labour of the sayde John Lpdgate, the which I haue here omitted for breuitie sake. This Athelstane by the recorde of sundrie wyrters, brought brought againe this land into one Monarchy, and reigned as king thereof xviij. yeres, and was buried at the Monastery of Malmebury, leauyng after him no childe, & therfore the rule of this land fell vnto Edmond his brother.

¶ Edmond the brother of Athelstane and sonne of Edwarde the Elder, reigned next after his brother.

¶ In the first yere of his reigne, the Danes of Northumberlande rebelled against him: And for to make their partie the stronger, they sent for a Prince of the Danes named Aulaffe; then being in Irelande, the which brought with him another prince or ruler of the Danes named Reignald, with a great hoste of Danes and other straunge Nations, and entered the foresayd Countrey, and warred vpon the next borders, in wastling and spoilyng the inhabitants of the same.

¶ When king Edmond had knowlege hereof, anon he assembled hys people, and sped him towarde the Countrey, and at the last fought with the sayde two Princes of the Danes, and chased them from Towne to Towne, vntill he forced them with all their company of straunge Nations to forsake vtterly that Prouince, and further he did beate downe the Countrey of Comberlande, that had much fauoured and ayded the sayde enemies against him, and tooke therein great prayes, and deuyded the spoyle amongst his knights. And that done, eyther for the good seruice that Malcolyne king of Scotlande had in his voyage done vnto the king, or for the truth & allegiance that he in tyme following should beare vnto him, or for both, the king gaue there to the sayde Malcolyn the Countrey of Comberland, and sealed the residue of the Lordship of Northumberlande, and ioyned it vnto his awne kingdome. But yet the Danes returned againe in the tyme of Edred the next king, as after shall be shewed, so that as yet the ende of his kingdome, is not to be accomplished. But Polydore alloweth not them that ascribe the banquishing of the Northumbers vnto this Edmond, affirming that to haue beene Athelstanes deede, who also subdued the Scottes: and so as it seemeth is of opinion that the kingdome of the Northumbers, ended in the sayde Athelstanes tyme.

¶ This king Edmond, as sayeth Henry Archdeacon of Huntingdon, had warre oftentimes with the Danes, who held many good Townes in middle England, as Lyncoln, Nottyngham, Darby, Stafford, and Leycester, the which by his knightly manhood, he toame from them, and he also amended many thinges within the Realme that had beene long tyme out of frame, by meane of the Danes: and as Polydore sayth, established many good lawes very profitable for the common wealth. Of the ende and death of this Edmond, there are diuers opinions, for Marianus the Scot sayeth, that while this king Edmond endeuoured himselfe to saue his Seuer from his enemy, that would haue slain him in a towne or place called Bulkre Church, the king in parting of the fray, was wounded to death, and dyed shortly after.

felony had eriled, and therfore he lept ouer the table and plucked that theefe by the heare of the head to the ground. In which doing the sayde felon, with a knife wounded the king to death, and also with the same knife wounded many other of the kings seruaunts, and at length was himselfe all to heuven in peeces. Fabian. If this be true, it should seeme that kings at those dayes were neyther so honorably garded nor accompanied, nor yet kept so princely estate, as they now vse.

¶ But which of these two meanes was vsed in the kings death, it appereth not certainly, but all wyrters agree that he dyed when he had reigned. vij. yeres and moze, and was buried at Glasenbury, the which before he had sumptuously repayred, and left after him two yong sonnes, as before is remembred Edwyn, and Edgar, but for that they were to yong to rule the land, therfore the rule thereof was committed to Edredus their Uncle, and brother to their father.

¶ Edred or Edred the brother of Edmond and sonne of Edward the elder, was made king, for þ the children of king Edmond were thought to yong to gouerne.

This Edred was annointed king of Oddo or Otho Archbishop of Cantorburie, in the towne of Kingstone vpon Tamys, and soone after, he warred vpon the Danes that then were entered into Northumberland (or after some wryters, that then were there dwelling vnder tribute of the king) subdued before of Edmond his brother, and bet them downe, and caused them to holde and obey vnto their former couenaunts. And the Scottes then also began to varie, but he brought them vnto due obedience.

¶ Wherefore, he being therof aduertised, in goodly and conuenient haste, assembled his people, and sped him thether, and destroyed much of the land. And in that furie brent the Abbey of Rypon, which the Danes kept for a Fortresse and strength, and wanne from them much of their strengthes which they before had wonne, and brought them again vnder his subiection.

¶ When this king Edred had thus sped his iourney and was returning into England, nothing suspecting the sayde Danes, a company of them by the exciting of Hircus a king or prince of the Danes, then folowed the kings hoste, and before he came at Yorke set vpon the kings rereward, and destroyed and slue many a man. For the which doing the king was sore amoued, and turned his people againe, intending to haue destroyed the Countrey vtterly.

¶ Whether of the Danes beyng ware, so lowly meked themselues vnto him, and presented vnto him such giftes, that the king refrayned of that great ire that he purposed to them. But amongst other Articles that he bound them vnto, vnto, one was, that they should banish and vtterly refuse their foresaid Duke or king called Hircus: which thing with dyuers and many other they graunted and firmly bound themselues to keepe, as well by hostages taken, as by other surety, and the king returned into England, and ioyned this kingdome to his other. So that here is reconed the ende of this kingdome, which ended iiii. C. ix. yeres.

¶ In the same yere that the king had thus subdued the Danes, a strong sicknesse tooke him, so that he dyed, and was buried in the Cathedral Church of Winchester, in the. xxviii. yere of his age, & when he had reigned. x. yeres.

¶ Polidore sayth, that when he had quieted the Realme, and banquished his enemies, he became a great benefactor vnto religious houses, but specially vnto the Abbey of Abindon, who thinking to please God therby, & to gratify Ethelboldus then Abbot there accompted for a very holy man, and at the request of his mother Edgina, repayred the same Abbey, first founded by king Iua, as before is said, and at that season sore decayed, and in maner destroyed.

¶ Edwyn the eldest sonne of Edmond, brother of Athelstane, tooke on him the gouernement of this Realme.

¶ This Edwyn was crowned at Kingstone beside London of the Archebishop of Cantorbury: The which selfe daye of his Coronacion, brake sodenly from his Lordes, and entered into a secreete Chamber, and there occupied himselfe sinfully, and rauished another mannes wife, beyng his nere kindwoman, whose husband as one Authour doth testifie, the king had caused to be slaine before, for that he would haue the vnlawfull vse of her betwix, and not considering the allyaunce of affinite & kyndred betwene them. Some wryte that he committed the sayd Act in maner openly lyke a brute Beast, and Guydo sayth that Edwyn contrary to the lawes of the Church, helde a woman as his Concubine. Wherefore Dunstone who a little before was made Abbot of Clastonbury, first monished him of his fault, and after wardes accused him vnto Oddo Archebishop of Cantorbury, by whose power the king was caused to refuse and forsake the company of the woman. For the which Edwyn bare great malice vnto Dunstone, and at length by his extort power, he banished him the lande, and forced him for a season to kepe himselfe in Flaunders. And for the malice that he bare towarde him, he did much displeasure to all the Monkes of England, by banishment, and other wise. Inso-much, that at Malnesfourey he put out the Monkes, and set in secular priestes in their steede. Fabian.

¶ But Mathew of Westminster wryteth, that Edwyn had to his Paramoure, the daughter of a noble woman of the Realme, and the mother also at his commaundement. And that on the day of his Coronacion, he arose sodenly from the Table, as he was feasting with his Lordes and Nobles, and departed vnto his prey Chamber, where those two gentlewomen were, to the entent he might dally with them, and satisfie the sensuall appetite and beastlye pleasure of the body. The which fact of his, sore displeased all his sayde Nobles: and therefore they sent incontinent Dunstone vnto him, to perswade with him to returne againe, and to be mery with them at the table, who as he was by them commaunded, taking his kynsman Bishop Cynesius with him, entered into the kings Chamber, where they found the Crowne of

of the Realme, all of gyltering Golde very riche and betotifull, plucked off his head and hurled after a retchelesse sorte on the ground a pety way from him: And the king himselfe tumbling in the dust betwixt the mother and the daughter, vnto whom the sayd Dunstone sayd on this wyse. My liege Lord, your Princes and Nobles haue sent vs vnto you, to besech you to returne againe vnto your Hall, where is a meete seate for your Royall person and estate, and there to solace your selfe, and to make mery with them, and then blamed the lewdnesse and folly of the Women: and perceyuing the King so vnwilling to aryse, he caught him by the hande, and so brought him backe againe with him vnto the scatt Royall, storming and chafing like a mad man. After this one of the Harlotets called Algina rose vp in a great chafe and fume sayng, how he was a rashe and a sawcie Messenger, that thus would presume to enter into the kinges pzeue Chamber, not beyng called. And so from thence forth, the same woman neuer ceased to persecute Dunstone, till she had brought him into the kinges deadly hated, and highe displeasure: And it foloweth in the same Wyter, howe by the consent of King Edwyn after she had spoyled his Abbey of all his mouables, shee caused him at length to be banished out of the Realme by the kinges commaundement. After the which banishment, he was faine to flie into Fraunce for his sauegard, during the tyme of his sayde exile. And howe there were certeyn tormentors sent beyond the Seas to haue put out his eyes, if they could haue met with him.

¶ It is read of him, that he tooke such precious Jewels as Athelstane had receyued before from Otho the Emperour, geuen vnto Winchester and Salnesbury, and gaue them vnto alyantes and strangers. And thus was he not onely vnkinde to Monkes, but also vsed such tyrannie, and other vnlawfull meanes to his subiectes, that lastly they abhorring his wicked lyfe, and detestable maners, rebelled against him, and specially the inhabitantes of the Countrey of Mertia, or middle Englands, and also the Northumbers and put him clerely from all kingly honour and dignitie, the which deposition greued him so much that he died for sorow, when he had reigned foure yeres, and was buried at Winchester, leauing none heyre of his body, and therefore the rule of the land fell vnto Edgar his yonger brother.

King Edgar united all the prouinces of this realme into one Kingdome, where before they were divided into seven Kingdomes.

Edgar, the seconde sonne of Edmond, and brother of Edwyn the last King, beyng of the Age of. xv. yeres, tooke vpon him the rule of this Realme. In the beginning of his reigne, he called home Dunstone that before was exiled of King Edwyn. Then he made Dunstone that was Abbot of Glascenbury, Bishop of Worcester, and he ioyned and vnited together all the Prouinces and Lordships of England, and made them one Monarchie, and one Kingdome.

¶ In many places he put away Clerkes and Priestes that liue viciously, or as some wyte that had boyues, and set there for them Monkes. And as sayth Guydo, Reynulph, and other, he buylded and repayred to the number of. xl. houses of Religion, whereof Abyndon, Peterborough, Thorney, Ramsay, & Wilton were percell of them. And at Winchester, he put in Monkes, where before were married Priestes.

¶ The cause wherfore (as sayth Fabian) was, for so much as the Priestes were were negligent in the deuyn service, and set Vicars in their places, while they liued at theyr pleasure in other places, and spent the Patrimonic of the Church after their sensuall will.

¶ Then King Edgar gaue to the Vicars the lande that before longed to the Prebendaryes, trusting thereby that they would do their dueties: But it was not long after, but that the sayd Vicars were as negligent as the other, wherfore the king aduoyded the Priestes and placed there Monkes, though some of his Prelates were not contented therewith.

¶ This Edgar kept such iustice and did so sharpe execution vpon Malefactors, that neuer before his dayes were vsed lesse felonyes or robberyes then was in his tyme. And to the entent that he would haue the rauinous beastes destroyed throughout his lande, he caused Ludallus Prince of Wales, to yelde to him yercly by way of Tribute three hundred Wolues. By meane wherof, within foure yeres after, in Englands and Wales myght skantly be found one Wolfe alyue.

¶ Polidore here noteth that the Welshmen, which could neuer willingly abyde to be gouerned of the Engliche Nation, founde the meanes at the length to make themselves a Prince of their awne Nation, as in this kinges tyme they had to theyr Prince and gouernour Ludallus, and long tyme after dyuerse other in dyuerse kinges dayes, which were tributaries vnto the kinges of England: But when they first obteyned this benefite of the sayde kinges, the sayde Polidore confesseth that he hath not found in any antient Chronicle or autentike Wyter.

¶ It is written of sundrie Authours, that Kynadus King of Scottes despised Edgar, for that he was little of stature, wherof King Edgar beyng warned desyred the sayde Kynadus to dyner, and made to him good countenance. After which dyner ended, he tooke the sayde Kynadus by the arme, and so with him helde company vntill they came to the fields: where being disseuered from their seruauntes: Edgar drewe from vnder his garment two swordes, and desyred Kynadus to take the choyce of them, and sayde vnto him, nowe thou hast good leasure to saye thy strength with mine, which before tyme thou hast so much despised: Nowe let vs proue which is more worthy to be subiect to other: It is not fitting for a knight to make great boast at the boorde, and to doe little in the field.

¶ When the Scottish king heard the king thus challenge him, he remembred well his wordes before spoken, and perceyued that they were disclosed vnto Edgar, wherof being somewhat abashed, he answered so humbly and behaued himselfe so lowly and gently, and gaue vnto the king such pleasaunt wordes, that he forgau the trespassse.

¶ This Edgar among other of his Politique deedes, vsed in the Sommer tyme, to scoure the Sea with certaine Shippes of warre, and had a great number alwayes in a readynesse. And against the winter, he provided to lay by the sayde Shippes in sure Hauens, and had readie in his awne service and in his Lordes, a certaine number of Souldiours that were alway ready to man the same, when the king had neede of them. And his Shipmasters were in wages with him throughout the yere, who ever attended vpon the Shippes, to see that nothing lacked that was necessarie. By meane wherof he kept his lande in great quiet from outward enemies. And in the wynter he

he used to ryde ouer the lande, and to vnderstande how his officers intreated the people. And if any were accused of extortion or other crimes, and that duely proued against them, he did vpon all such, sharpe correction.

¶ And for so much as in his dayes, great multitude of Danes dwelled in diuers places of England, which vsed many vices, and specially great drinking, wherof ensued drunkennesse and many other vices, to the euill examples and hurtes of his commons and subiects: He therefore ordeyned certayne Cuppes with pinnes or nayles set in them, and ordeyned and made a law, that whatsoeuer person dranke past the marke at one draught, shoulde forfert a certayne payne: wherof the one halfe shoulde fall to the accuser, and that other halfe to the ruler of the Borough or Towne that the offence was done in, where the same shoulde be examyned and tryed.

¶ It is tolde of this Edgar by diuers Authours, that he vpon a season being at Chester, entred the ryuer of Dee, and there sitting in a Boate, tooke the rule of the sterne, and caused. vii. Kinges, which Guydo calleth Reguli, that is small or vnder kings, and commaunded them to robbe him vp and downe the Ryuer, vnto Saint Johns Church, which lately was an Abbey of black Monkes, and from thence to his awne Palace, in token, that he was Lorde and king of so many Prouinces.

¶ This Noble Edgar had two Wyues: By the first that was called Egelfleda the whyte, he had a sonne that was named Edward, who was after king, and slaine by treason as afterwards shall be shewed. And vpon his second Wyfe Elfrida or as the English Chronicle calleth her Estrid, he begat a sonne named Egelredus or Ethelredus, and after the English Chronicle Eldred, which was king next after Edward the Martir, and of Wilfride, which of some is called a Nonne, he had a daughter named Edith, but shee was base and not in wedlock. For as Guydo sayeth, this Wilfride, knowing that the king cast to her vnlawfull loue, put vpon her the habite of a Nonne, thinking thereby to withdrawe the kinges loue: But that notwithstanding, she was brought to the kings bed. For which deede he was greatly blamed of the Bishop Dunstane, and by him enioyned to doe therefore seuen yeres penance. And the afozenamed Wilfride, after the childe borne, lpyed bertrouly, as sayeth Fabian. Of her daughter Edith, it is read that at lawfull age she was at Milton thorne a Nonne.

¶ Edgar, thus ruling the lande after the death of his first wyfe Egelfleda, wo:de was brought to him of the bewtie of a yong Damisell named Elfrida, or Estrid, daughter of Orgarus Erle of Denonshire: wherfore he sent a knight of his Courte named Ethelwold, to espie whether the Mayde were of such bewtie, as shee was reported of, or not, charging him, if shee were so bewtifull, that then he shoulde aske her to wyfe for him.

¶ But this knight hauing sight of this Mayden, was so wounded with the darte of blinde Cupide, that he forgate his truth and allegeance, which he did owe to his Master and soueraigne, and returned, shewing to the king, that shee was nothing of the bewtie as shee was reported to be, but of meane fayrenesse as other women are. Wherfore he besought the king, considering she was her fathers Heyre and a good mariage, that he woulde be so good Lorde vnto him, as to write vnto her father, that he might haue her vnto Wyfe. The which the king graunted, and at the last he obteyned her and

¶ And vpon a tyme, as it were in game, warned this Ethelwold that then was an Erle by reason of his wyfe, or otherwise, that he woulde one night come and lodge in his house, and appointed the tyme when it shoulde be. The Erle being nothing contented with this monition, ranne home almost dead for feare, and prayed his wyfe of helpe in that tyme of neede, and that shee would in all that she might make her selfe as foule and as vnseemly as shee could, and shewed to her all the residue of the matter. Then the woman cast in her minde, the great displeasure that might ensue towarde her against God, to make that foule, which he had made goodly and fayre, and also to her Lorde and husbände against the king, thinking that he shoulde cause her thus to do, to the entent to mocke and deceyue him. Wherfore, in consideration of the premisses, shee trimmed and decked her selfe in most costly and shewing apparell. And ouer that, if Dame Nature had any thing forgotten or misprinted in her, she left not what might be done by womans help to haue it amended and reformed, and at the kings comming receyued him with all ioye and gladnesse. By which meanes, this yong amorous king was soone caught in the Devils snare, so that he set reason aparte and folowed his awne sensualitie. And for to bring his purpose the better about, he kept forth a countenance as he had bene well contented with all thing, and desyred the Erle, that he woulde ryde with him on hunting, into the wood of Weluctley, that now is called Horsewood, where he awaying his tyme, strake the Erle thro: the body with his shaft, so that he dyed soone after. And then he married this Elfrida or Estrid shortly, and had by her Egelredus. For the which deede sayth Keynulph, this Elfrida buylde a house of Nonnes at Martwell. But some write that it was for the slaying of her stepsonne Edward.

¶ Then Edgar, was crowned king at the Citie of Bath, or as some write at Kingstone of Dunstone Archebishop of Cantorbury, and Oswole Archebishop of Yorke, when he had ruled this land. xij. yeres, but Polidore sayth, that Dunstone was not at his sayde Coronation, but remayned yet a vanished man. The cause why it was so long or this Edgar was crowned, was sayth Guydo, for his vnlawfull lechery, and specially for the offence done with Wilfride. For the which deede he was enioyned. vii. yeres penance, during the which tyme of penance, he was kept from the sayd annoyntment.

¶ It is also reported of this king Edgar, that he beyng vpon a season at the Towne of Andouer besyde Sarisbury, and was enamoured of a Noble mannes daughter, which was of passing bewtye, made such meanes by force or otherwise, that the parentes were agreed that the king shoulde haue his pleasure. But the mother beyng subtyll of toyt, bethought her of a wyfe, and when night came, sent a seruaunt of hers, which was both comely and fayre, vnto the kings bed. In the Morning, when the day began to waxe cleere, the woman began to styre, and woulde haue departed from the king: But the king stayed her, and asked the cause of her so hastie departing: The woman answered, I must be at my worke with my felowes at mine houre, to kepe my taske. And when the king had questioned with her further, he learned that she was a bond woman, and she asked of the king freedome for that nightes seruice. The king at this had good game, and cherished that Damosell so after, that he made her Lady of Ladies. For these insolent and wanton dedes, it is sayd, that by the counsaile of Dunstone, he buylded and repayred so many Abbeyes and houses of religion as is before named. Fabian.

¶ Thus this noble Edgar, passing his tyme in vertue, and sometymes medled with vice, at the last had knowledge of the rebellion of the Briteynes or Welshmen: wherefore he assembled his knightes, and entered the land, and did them great harme and waite. And among other prayes, he spoiled the Countrey of Glamorgan and the Countrey of Ono: But the king dyed within ten dayes after, when he had reigned the full terme of .xviij. yeres, and was buryed at Glasfenbury, leauing after him two sonnes, Edward the Martyr, and Egelredus by two sundry wyues. And here Fabian setteth forth a story of a lewde and false Judge, the which the Reader may there finde set out at large.

I Adulph reigned in Scotlande .ix. yeres: He kept peace with the Englyshe men, and banquished the Danes that invaded his Realme.

King Duffus reigned among the Scottes foure yeres, and was slaine by the treason of a noble man called Donewalde. After his death apered neither Sonne, Moone, nor Starre, the space of .viij. Monethes.

¶ Alue a vicious and wicked Tyrant reigned among the Scottes. He deflowred his awne sisters, and rauished other mennes wyues, and daughters, wherefore he was slaine the fift yere of his reigne.

Edward the sonne of Edgar, reigned after his father: And here ye shall vnderstand, that after the death of Edgar, great strife arose among the Lordes, for the admission of their king. For Elfrida or Estred, with Alphride Duke of Mertia, made diuerse friendes to haue her sonne Egelredus promoted vnto that dignitie, a childe of seven yeres of age, that she and he might rule the land together. But Dunstone with the ayde of other Bischoppes, and of the Erle of East England, or Esser, so withstood that doyng, that he crowned this Edward king at the Towne of Kingstone, to the greuous displeasur of the sayd mother Elfrida, and other of her affinitie.

¶ In the tyme of this Edward apered a blasing starre, after the which ensued many inuonieniences, aswell to men as to beastes, as sicknesse, hunger, moztynne, and other lyke calamities: But none of these thinges fell in the dayes of this Edward, but after his death. The afozenamed Alphride, Duke of Mertia, which in all thinges fauoured much the dedes of the Queene, put out the Monkes at Winchester, that king Edgar had ther set in, and brought in for them wanton Clarke, or as Keynulph sayth, Clerkes with Conturbines (or rather that had lawfull wyues.) But Dunstone, and the Erle of Esser withstood that doyng, and helde against the Duke and such as fauoured his partie: For the which arose great strife betwene the Priestes, and the Monkes of England. For the Clerkes that were before tyme put out by Edgar, sayd that it were a wretched and cursed dede, that a newe common company vnknowen, shoulde put out olde landishe men from their places: and

These I thinke were priestes with their wyues.

and it shoulde not be pleasing to God that had graunted the place to the olde dwellers, neyther ought any good man to allowe such doyng, for the yll example that thereof might ensue. The Monkes sayde, that Christ allowed neyther the olde dweller, nor yet the person: But who so woulde take the crosse of penance vpon him, and folowe Christ in vertuous liuyng he shoulde be his disciple.

¶ For this matter was there holden a generall counsaile of Bischoppes, and all the Clergie of England, at Winchester, but for all this the strife ceased not. In so much that a newe assembly of the Clergie and other was apoynted after at a place called the strete of Calue, where the counsaile was kept in an vpper loft. In thys counsaile Dunstone was greiuously despised and rebuked of some unskillfull men (as sayth Fabian.) And while they were there in this great deuision and argument, which way shoulde be admitted and allowed, sodeynly the Joystes of the loft sayled, and the people fell downe, so that many were slaine, and the people greatly hurt: But Dunstone with few other that tooke his part escaped unhurt. This wonder and other caused silence among them that entended to mainteyne the afozesayd quarell, so that Dunstone had all his will.

¶ When the Queene was warned of his comming, anone she called vnto a seruaunt of hers, whome she much trilled, and tolde to him all her counsaile, shewing to him further, how he shoulde behaue himselfe in the accomplishing of her will and minde. And that done, she went towarde the King, and receyued him with all gladnesse, and desyred him to tarie with her that night: But he in curteous maner excused himselfe, and for speede, desyred to drinke vpon his horse sytting, the which was shortly brought.

¶ And while the Cup was at his mouth, the seruaunt strake him to the heart with a sword, or long dagger sharpe on both sydes, After which stroke by the king receyued, he set spures to the horse, and thought to ryde to the place from whence he came, or else such a way as he thought to mete with his companie. But he bled so fore, that for faintnesse he fell from his horse, his one foote beyng fast in the Styrop: By reason wherof, he was drawen of the horse ouer wayes and fieldes, vntill he came vnto a place then named Coalgate, where he was found dead. And for that the maner of his death was vnknowen, and also he for king not knowen, he was buryed vnworthely at the Towne of Warram, and there rested by the space of thre yeres after. In which tyme and season, God shewed for him dyuerse myzacles, as sight to the blinde, health to the sicke, and heering to the deafe, with diuerse other, as sayth Fabian. But Polydore wyrteth, that his Stepmother Elfrida caused the dead corps to be carped in, and buryed in a secret place, where it was after found by miracle.

¶ At the last the same Elfrida fore repenting her fact, entended to visite him by way of pilgrimage. But how or for what cause she entended inwardly I can not say, but the horse or beast that she rode vpon, might not come nigh the place

Dunstone was fore a gantill priester wynged.

Some write that this was done by a deceptfull practice, and after was taken for a miracle.

¶ Kenneth reigned in Scotland. xrb. yeres. In his tyme, the Danes arriued in Angus with a great company, and wasted the Countre very sore, with whom the Scottes met, and after sore fight and great slaughter, by the manhood of one Hay (an bplandishman, and his two sonnes) obteyned the victory. This Kenneth was slaine by meane of a Lady called Fenella, because he had poysoned Malcolme Prince of Comber.

Egeldred or Etheldred the sonne of Edgar, and Elfride his last wyfe, after the death of Edward his brother reigned ouer this Realme. And in the beginning of this mans tyme, the grounde waxed barreine and all the miseries before signified by the appering of the blasing starre in the dayes of Edwarde, now began to take place and encrease vpon the earth. This king as his other progenitozs before him were, was crowned at Kingstone, of Dunstane, and Oswald, Archebishops. To whome as it is wrytten in the lyfe of Dunstane among his propheties, Dunstane shoulde saye at the day of his coronation. Thou comest to this kingdom by the death of thy brother, in whose death Englishmen conspired with thy wicked mother, they shall not be without bloudshedding and sword, vntill there come people of an vnkowne tongue, and bring them into thraldome. And this trespassse shall not be elensed without long vengeance.

¶ This Egeldred was a man of goodly visage and tall of personage, but his nature was mixed with Lechery, crueltie, and dyuers other vices. It is also read that when Dunstane shoulde christen him, as he helde him ouer the fonte, he fylde the same with his ordure, and that then Dunstane sware by God and by his mother, this childe shall be vnkinde both to God and hys Church. Fabian. Although myne Authour wrote this as matter in that tyme whiche he thought to bee true, yet iudge you nowe thereof as your thinke best.

An angry Bishop.

¶ In the second yere of his reigne, a cloude was seene in England in the morning tyme the which appered halfe lyke blood, and the other halfe lyke fyre, and chaunged after into sundrie colours, and at the last vanished away.

The Danes arriued in Kent, Cornewall, Suffex, and diuerse other places of this realme.

¶ In the thirde yere of his reigne, the Danes allured by his cowardise, and chieflly for that he was vnskillfull of armes, arriued in sundrie places of his lande, as in the Isle of Chanet beside Kent, also in Southhampton, Cornewall, Cornewall and Suffex, and in those coastes much harme: and afterwards, some of them came to London, but there they were put of: howbeit, they destroyed a great parte of Chester and Chestershire.

¶ And in the ende of the same yere, a great parte of the Citie of London was consumed with fyre, but how it began is not expessed. But ye shall vnderstande, that at this daye the Citie of London, had most housing and building from Ludgate toward Westminster, and little or none where the chiefe or hart of the Citie is, at this day, except in dyuers places were housing, but they stood without order. So that many Townes and Cities, as Cauntorbury, Porke, and other, diuers in England passed London in building at those dayes, as I haue sene and knowen by an olde booke in the Guildhall in London named Domes day. But after the conquest it increased, and shortly after it passed and excelled all the other. Eabian.

London, a great parte thereof consumed by fire

From the little Conduit in Chepburton into Fierre bridge and Holborne bridge was the first and chiefe part of the Citie of London.

¶ About the. liij. yere of his reigne, the king married Erle Egbertus daughter, named Ethelgina or Elgina. Of the which he begat a sonne, and named him Edmond, which after was surnamed Ironside, and two other sonnes named Edwyn and Ethelstane, and a daughter named Edgina.

¶ In the. ix. yere of this king, for strife and displeasure that was betwene the Bishop of Rochester and him, he with his knightes besieged the sayde Citie: whereof Dunstane sent to the king, admonishing him, that he should refraine from that crueltie, and to suffer the Bishop and his Citie to be in peace. But this message abated nothing at all the kings courage. Then the sayde Dunstane sent vnto him an hundreth pounce in Golde, wylling him to refrayne of that enterpryse, the which he receyued and brake by his siege.

Golde was of more force then Dunstane.

¶ About the. xi. yere of his reigne, Dunstane died, but it was not long after his death, before the Danes entred into many and sundrie places of the land, in such wise as the king was to seke to which coast he should go first to withstande his enimies. And in conclusion, for the aduoyding of more harme, he was compelled to quiet them with great summes of money: But when that money was spent, they fell to new robbing of the people. Then the king graunted more money: But for all that the Danes robbed and spoyled the Countre of Northumberland and at the last besieged London. The which their outrage troubled the king very sore because he thought they would now haue beene quiet.

The Danes sore spoyled this realme.

¶ And for the encrease of the kinges sorrow, Elfricus that then was maiester or admirall of the kings Flaue, fled as a false traytour vnto the Danes. And after that was reconciled: and fled yet againe the second time vnto them.

Elfricus a Traytour.

¶ Wherefore the king to be aduenged on the father, commaunded the eyes of hys sonne Algarus to be plucked or done out of his head.

King Egeldred punished the sonne of Elfricus in pulling out of his eyes for the offence of his father.

¶ But while this persecution thus contynued, by meanes of Elphegus Bishop of Winchester, a peace was concluded for a tyme betwene the king and the Danes. And the Prince or chiefe Capitaine of them named Aulaff, was so exhorted by the sayd Bishop, that he became a christen man, to whom the king was Godfather, so that shortly after, the sayde Aulaff returned to his owne Countre, without doing of any more hurte, so that for a whyle the warres of the Danes ceased. But while they rested, the bloody flure with brenning feuers so bered the people thorow the land, that many dyed therof.

Bloody flure, and brenning feuers.

¶ And now againe the Danes assailed this land, and did in diuers places great harme, so that for lacke of a good head or gouernour many things in the lande perished. For the Lordes were at such dissension one with another, that when they were assembled to speake or treate of peace betwene that one Lorde and that other, and if any good thing were deuysed for the hurt of their enemies, anone the Danes were warned thereof by some of the same counsaile: whereof were suspected Elfricus and Edricus.

¶ And to this sorrow was ioyned hunger and penury, amongst the commons, that euery one of them was constreyned to plucke & steale from other, so that what by the pillage of the Danes, and inward theenes and byrbours, this land was brought into great misery and mischiefe.

¶ The king being thus wrapped in miserie, left not to gather of his subiectes what he might, as well by vnlawfull meanes as otherwise. For sayth Reynulph, he would for feyned or small causes ditherite men of their possessions, & after cause them to redeeme their awne with great sumes of money.

¶ And besides this, he gaue himselfe altogether to lechery, and to the filthy lust of the body: By which vngacious meanes, he brought this lande into such ruyne, that what he might not helpe by strength, he redeemed with great summes of money. So that from the first entrie of the Danes, as witnesseth Reynulph in his. vi. booke and. xliij. Chapter, and Guydo and other Authours, and from the first tribute of ten thousand pound, he brought it at the last in processe of five or sixe yerres, to. xl. thousand pound. The which peerey during his lyfe and after, to the comming of king Edward was leuied of his subiects, and named for the continuance therof Dane Gelt, which is to meane, money payde to the Danes, or Dane money.

¶ In the. xv. yere of his reigne dyed Oswald Archbishop of Cantorbury, and sone after dyed Ethelgina the Queene. And thus the land continued vnder the greuous Tribute of the Danes, and also the Englishe men susseynded of them great numbers of vilanies and iniuries, as partly hereafter shall appere. The king at this tyme by counsaile of his familiers, about the. xxi. yere of his reigne maryed Emma the daughter of Richard Duke of Normandy: The which Richard was the thirde duke of Normandy, and the first of that name, and also was surnamed Richard without feare, or Richard the hardy, by whome he had issue Edward the Confessor, which after was king of Englande.

¶ By this mariage, Egeldred began to looke a loff, and thought much of himselfe, and toke vpon him with much more courage then before he had done. Wherefore he sent into all the good Boroughes, Townes, and Cities of his land, secret and streight commissions, charging all the rulers, that vpon a certeyne day, which was the day of S. Brice, at an houre assigned in euery place of this land, the Danes should be slaine, and so it was done. And as the common fame telleth, this murder began at a little Towne in Hertfordshire, within. xliij. Myles of London called Welmen: For the which dedde it tooke the first name, because that the weale of that countrie (as it was then thought) was there first wonne. But who that doth well consider the sequels of this dedde, shall finde little wynnynge or weale that ensued of this dedde.

¶ But before I proceede further, I will here touche somewhat of the pyde and abusion of the Danes, which they exercised in Englande, as I haue

haue sene in an olde Chronicle. The Danes by strength caused husbandmen to eare and sowe their land, and to do all other vile labour that belonged vnto husbandry, and the Dane helde his wyfe at picaure, with daughter and seruaunt. And when the husband man came home, he should scanty haue of his aboue as his seruauntes had, so that the Dane had all at his commaundement, and did eate and drinke his fill of the best, when the obner had scant his fill of the worst. And besides this, the common people were so of them oppressed, that for feare and dreade, they called them in euery such house as they had rule of, Lord Dane: But in processe of tyme, after the Danes were boyded the lande, this worde Lord Dane, was in dirision and dispite of the Danes turned by Englishe men into a name of opprobry called Lurdane, which yet is not forgotten, for if one Englishe man will rebuke another, he will for the most part say, thou art but a Lurdane.

¶ But nowe to returne to our first matter: Truth it is when the Danes were thus murdered throughout Englande, tydings thereof sprang into Denmarke: which kindled in them such a fury, that the king thereof named Swamus, assembled shortly a great hoste and nauie of Shippes. And within short tyme after, he with his Danes landed in Cornewall. And by treason of a Norman named Hughe, which by fauour of Queene Emma was made Earle of Deuonshire, the sayde Swamus tooke Exeter, and after bet downe the walles.

¶ Then he entered further into the land: In which season the king sent vnto Edricus, charging him to assemble the west Saxons, and to withstand the further entry of the Danes: The which according to his commission assembled the west Saxons, and made good countenance to withstand the sayd enemies: But when the hostes should ioyne, were it for feare or for treason, he fayned himselfe sicke, and fled from his people. The which for lacke of an head were faine to geue backe to their great hurt, and to their enemies great aduantage and comfort.

¶ Wherefore the Danes, then resorted to Sherborne and Wylton, and anone spoyled both those townes, and there refreshed them: But Swamus had vnderstanding, that the king was comming towardes him with the power of his lande, he therefore departed thence, and returned with great pillage vnto his Shippes, and sayled about the land, and at the last landed in Norffolke: Where he wasting and spoiling the Countrie, came to the Citie of Norwich, the which he robbed and destroyed, and after went to Chetford, and did lykewise to that Towne, and byred it, and spoyled all the Countrey nere there about.

¶ But soone after, a noble man of that Countrie called Duke Uskatell, met with the host of Danes, and gaue vnto them a hard and sharpe battayle, and slue many of the enemies and put them backe. For this and for hunger that then assailed this land, Swamus returned to his Shippes, and departed againe into Denmarke, and taried all the Winter folowing. In which season he made great prouision to reenter the land of England.

In the. xxv. yere of the reigne of the king, the aforesayde Swamus with a strong army landed at Sandwich, and spoiled all the countrey nere vnto the Sea syde, and rested him there, vntill he heard of an armie comming against him. And when he was ware thereof, he returned to his Shippes againe: and and hearing that the king was farre westwarde, he landed in Suffex, and spoiled it wonderfull sore, and there also he was warned of the comming of the English men, and when anone he tooke shipping againe. So that when the English men had thought to haue met with him in one coast, then would he flie and land in another. And when the king prouided to meete with them, on the Sea, eyther they would fayne themselues to flie, or else they would with giftes blynde the admirall of the kinges shawie.

By which subtiltie and crafty meanes, they werped and tyred of English men. And where euer they went they slue, bent, and rauened, without all compassion and pitie.

The king then beyng at Shrewesburie, hearing of the great sleight and crueltie of the Danes, called his counsaile to take aduice what were best to be done for the defence of his enemies. Where it was concluded, that the king to haue peace with the Danes, should pay vnto them. xxx. thousand pound. But while this was in doying, the Danes destroyed a great part of Barkshire.

But when this peace was thus made, Swanus with his company returned into Denmarke. And the yere folowing, the king made Edricus a forenamed, Duke of Mertia. Thus Edricus beyng but of base birth was made riche, he was of tongue false, and subtile of wit, soft and eloquent of speeche, vntrustie, and inconstant of thought and promes, as of him something before is shewed, and after more shall apere.

In the .xxvij. yere of the king, a Prince of the Danes named Turkilus landed in Kent. The which so grienously warred in that countrie, that the Kentishmen were faine to make their peace, and so he departed. But yet the persecution of the Danes seared not: for in one countrie of England or other, they euer were robbing and pilling the English men. So that all the Countrie along the coast, from the North part of England, vnto the Ile of Wight, was by them eyther vtterly destroyed, or greatly empayred. And when the king entended to make prouision for to withstande them, euer Edricus would counsaile him to the contrary, shewing him that he should spend his treasure, and traualle his people in vaine. By meane whereof the Danes entered fiftie mile into England, and bent and destroyed diuerse Villages, and Townes. So that they encreased and wared passing riche, and the English men, nedy, bare, and poore. Thus continuynge this misery, Swanus then being in Denmarke, and hearing of the encrease of his people within England repented him of his former couenantes, and thought that the whole dominion of England should of right belong to him. For the which he prepared his armie and nauie in most defensible wise, and sped him into England, and to the ryuer of Humber, and landed in Northumberland, where the Earle and ruler of that Countrie with all the other rulers of the same, sware fealty vnto the sayde Swanus, and promised to kepe that Countrie vnto his vse. And when he had done his will in that Coast, he entred againe the water, and by the Ryuer of Trent, he passed to Gainsburgh, and so by North Watlingstreete, and subdued the inhabitautes of that Countrie, and forced them to geue him pledges. Which pledges, with also his nauie, he betooke vnto Canutus his sonne, while he went further into the land. And he and his people kept on theyr Journey vntill they came vnto Mertia, killing and sleiyng the men men of that prouince, and reserved the women to vncleane liuyng, aswell the religious as the other, and tooke by strength Winchester, and Oxford, or rather Exeter, and did in them what him liked.

And after he had thus passed the lande, he drew the next way toward London: But in passing the Ryuer of Thames he lost some parte of his people, eyther for lack of a Bridge or for icoparding their passage vnauidedly. And so in fine he came to London and besieged it, where at that tyme the king was. Wherefore Swanus left the Citie, and drew into Essex, and againe the water passed into Kent and so towarde the Citie of Cauntorbury without any let, welding the Countrie at his will, and lastly besieged that Citie. The which manfully defended themselves against their enimies by the space of .xx. dayes, and then was the sayde Citie taken by the treason of a Deacon named Almaricus, the which before tyme Elphegus then Archbishop of that See had preserved from death. Fabian.

Holidore affirmeth that the Danes besieged the Citie of London, and the Londoners though they were somewhat dismayed at the first, by reason of the sodaine feare, yet they so manfully defended themselves, that at the length they were not afeard to set open the gates of the Citie, and to go out themselves in great multitudes and fight with their enimies: And so valiantly behaued they themselves against them, that they slue many of them, and in fine compelled Swanus or Sweno their king to get him awaye with the residue of his armie with such hastie expedition, that he ceased not trauallyng day and night vntill he was two dayes iourney from London, and then went he to Bath and there taried, where he was so sore distressed for lack of victualles, that he was fayne to let Egeldred redeeme the tribute, the which he had a little before graunted and bounde himselfe to paye. And hauing receyued of him a great summe of money for the redemption thereof, he returned into Denmarke, minding ere it were long to repayre to this lande againe with a greater armie then euer he had before.

Mathew of Westminster wyrteth also that after the saide Swanus or Sweno was in dispaire to winne the Citie of London, both because of the losse of his Souldyours that through rashnesse and misadventure were drowned in the Chamys, and also the manly resistance made by the Londoners in defending themselves, he gate him awaye with speede, and went first to Wallyngfoord and then to Bathe, exercising much crueltie all the waye as they went, and lefte nothing vndestroyed, and at Bathe rested him a space to refresh his armie, whether Almarus then Erle of Deuonshire, with all the Nobilitie of the west Saxons together wyth their seruantes and retynue, fearing his tirannie, came vnto hym and deliuered hym hostages, prayng withall that they might, be at peace with him. And afterwardes, when he saw that he might now do what he would, and that no man durst challenge the Crowne and fight with him for the same, he caused himselfe to be proclaymed king of England. But the sayde wyrteth maketh mention neyther of the scarcitie of victualles that shoulde then be amongst the Souldyours, neyther of the redemption of the sayde tribute, nor yet of his sodayn returne into Denmarke: But here to returne to mine Authour.

Then the Danes first spoiled the Citie of Cauntorbury, and tooke the Archbishop and put him in a strong prison, and then set the Citie on fyre. And

parte of the Countrie of west Saxon, they returned againe to London

¶ In all this season I finde no mention that euer the king gaue vnto the Danes any notable battayle, but kept him in holdes and places for his awne sauegarde, and to the small benefite or aduantage of his Realme. And at the last he was chased vnto the Isle of Wight, where, with a small company he Tyrannies he demaunded a great summe of money out of S. Edmondes landes, which the rulers denayed, for so much as they claymed to be free of all kinges Tribute. Wherfore he entered into that territory, and wasted and spoyled the Countrie, and besides that, despised that holy martyr, and threat-

And after builded a Church ouer the place of his Sepulture, and ordeyned there a house of Monkes, and endued them with fayre possessions. And after-¶ Nowe when king Egeldred was certified of the death of Swanus, he by the procurement of his friendes returned home againe to his awne: But the Nobles of the Realme condicioned with him, that he should reforme his olde maners. And for performance thereof, he sent his sonne Edward into Englande before him, and in the Lent folowing the king came himselfe, and with his people sped him toward Lyndsey, where Canutus was at that tyme resiant, not prouided for the kinges so hastie comming.

¶ Wherfore Canutus, being not purueyed to withstande the king, fled to Sandwich in Kent. And for that he there proued such persons, as before tyme his father and he had taken pledges off, and finding them not firme in their promyses, he caused all theyr noses and handes to be cut off, and then sayled into Denmarke, and returned the next yere with a great flauye, and sayled about the land, and tooke prayes in the South countrey, whereof the the kingdom, and reigned .xxxj. yeres. To him the Lordes of Scotlande graunted first the wardes and mariages of their heyses. And not long after Olanus, and Onetus, two Capitanes of the Danes inuaded Scotland, and

Edmond Ironsyde, the sonne of Egeldred, or Etheldred, and also Canutus, the sonne of Swanus king of Denmarke, did by the consent of certeyne of their friendes on eyther syde, take vpon them the gouernement of this lande. The Londoners with the assistance of some Lordes of Englande fauoured Edmond: But the more part of the Lordes fauoured Canutus, and specially the spiritualtie that befoze tyme had swozne fealtie to his father. And he then beyng at Southampton swoze vnto them, to be a true and good Justice, and to entreate the people soberly and righteously.

¶ Then Edmond beyng of the Archebishop of Yorke crowned at London and the solemnitie finished and ended, he sped him to West Saxon, and subdued that Country. In which tyme Canutus drew with his people to London, and would there haue entered: But that was forbodden him of the Londoners. For the which he layde his ordinance about the Citie, entending to haue entered perforce: But it was not long or he was faine to breake his siege and to depart thence.

¶ After this, they met againe in Worcester shire, or as Polydore sayth, at Andouer in Wiltshire, where they fought a more strong and fierce battaile: For this was so strongly foughten on both partes, that men could not iudge which part had the better, nor which the worse: But as Reynulph sayth, eyther of them departed from other, eyther for werynesse of fight, or for lacke of the day.

¶ But on the morowe folowynge, both hostes met againe and fought egerly. The which fight continuyng, Edricus espiynge king Edmond to be at a vantage of wyning of the fielde, sodeinly pight a dead mannes heade vpon the head of a Speare, and cryed to the hoste of English men, flye, flye, you English men and saue your selues, lo, here is the head of Edmond your king. But Edmond beyng thereof warned, sped him to that part of the fielde, and behaued himselfe so comfortably amongst his men, that by his knightly courage, his people recovered that which befoze they had lost, and continued the battaile vntill night, and caused Canutus to flye that Countrie, and to returne againe towarde London.

¶ Then king Edmond beyng aduertised that Canutus was returned toward London, he folowed him and passed the Ryuer of Chamys, and deliuered the Citie from the daunger of the Danes, and after encountered the Danes at a place called Brentford within seuen myles of London, where he had with them a cruell fight, and at length discomfited them. Fabian.

foughten by Andouer, I haue here thought good to supplie his defect by Polydore, who wyrteth hereof, as foloweth: When Canutus was this discomfited, he traueyled all night long to Winchester ward, and gate hun to a place of safetie: But Edmond as some do write pursued him not, but turned to Sarisburie to rescue the Citizens there besieged of another company of Danes. Whether also shortly after came Canutus, where not farre from the same Towne they pitched a newe fielde, and as men hauing nolue gathered a newe courage & refreshed themselves, fought very fiercely and egerly together, but with equall fortune tyll night came that parted them beyng weryed with long fighting. The next morning the English men anoue after the Sonne rising, stood ready aranged in battaile ray, awaityng the coming of their enemies, vntill Canutus came and set vpon them. Then fought they together verie fiercely, but doubtfully withall, and in such wise that many went to wrecke and were slaine on both sydes. And when it drew towardes the euening they gaue ouer on euen hande, neyther partie hauyng victoery of other. On the next morowe both the hostes rested themselves, and tooke their repast, & gathered together the deade corpses of them that were slaine the day befoze, and burned them as the maner was then to do. And all this while they neuer vnarmed themselves. There were slaine at that time aboue .xx. M. on both parties. The night folowynge Canutus dislodged as priuely as he could, & marched towards London: The which city his flecte had now in a maner besieged by water. But as soone as this they flying was once discryed by the day light, Edmond folowed him at the heeles, and with a little ado rayled the siege: Wherefoze, he entered the Citie triumphantly, with great ioy and solempne pompe. Canutus beyng thus disapoynted of his hope, hauing gotten great prayes and bootyes out of the Countries there about, departed thence to see his shippes which were newly entered into the Riuer of Rochester, called in olde tyme Medeganara, and nowe Medway, where the sayde Canutus taried a season, partly to increase his armie, and partly to learne by espyals the secret purposes of his enemies, the which he soone vnderstoode. For Edmond whose nature was not to sleepe bys matters, hauing assembled his power with incredible celeritie, lay in campe not farre from Canutus, & there made a long exhortation vnto his Souldiours, the effect wherof was, that they should call to minde the number of battayles that they had foughten with the Danes already, and remember withall that the time nowe serued if they would play the men, to repress their cruelty and violence: and therfoze he moued them in most earnest maner, that they would not cease to pursue and vige them, till they had with one battaile cleane vanquished and conquered them, that an ende might once be made of their long and great trauailes. The Souldiours beyng incensed with this exhortation, and also wery of the intollarable pride and haughtinesse of their enemies which dayly molested and prouoked them, went with a fierce courage to set vpon them. In like maner Canutus, who had commaunded his Souldiours befoze, to be dayly and hourly in a redinesse against the coming of the English men, came into the fielde, and ioyned battail with them, where they fought more then foure houres together, but at the length the Danes began to geue backe. The which when Canutus perceyued, he commaunded his horsemen to rescue them in the forward. But whiles it so chaunced that some of them

gaue backe for feare, and some made no hast thither, the whole army brake aray, and then feare hauing the vpper hand of shame, they fled away. There were of the Danes slaine at that tyme thre thousand and fiue hundred, of the which number many were Dukes, and Capitaynes of great birth: But of Englishe men. vij. C. at the most, and they all footemen. King Edmondes intent and purpose was to haue had the vse and fruition of that victorie, that is to say, so narrowlye to haue pursued his enemies, that he woulde then haue cleane destroyed them, the which vndoubtedly had bene done, if fortune had not bene against him. For whiles after this great battayle he was in great consultation about the pursuing of his sayde enemies, he thought it would be greatly for his aduantage, if he both rested himselfe the residue of the same day, and the night following, and permitted his Souldiours to do the lyke. And so this little time seemed sufficient vnto Canutus to saue himselfe, but not to Edmond. In like maner on the next morow, king Edmond asone as it was once day, myndyng to haue the spoyle of the fielde, brought his Souldiours out of the Campe, to the entent they should afterwarde pursue their enemies, and the rather because he had intelligence howe they that were the day before dispersed, were now gathered together againe, and had passed the ryuer of Chamys, marchyng as fast as they could towardes Norfolke, and Suffolke. Wherefore king Edmond hastened thither with all he myght, to ayde his people there against his sayde enemies. And so vpon a watchworde geuen he set vpon them. And albeit some layde vpon the hindmost, and some stroke in the middelt, aswell on the right hand as on the left, yet the Danes for all that gaue not backe. Every Captayne encouraged his awne Souldiours to sticke vnto it manfully: But specially king Edmond admonished his Captaynes that they should cause their Souldiours to kepe array, reassyng not to say vnto them with a loude voyce that the same day if they woulde play the men a little while, they should confirme vnto them all their former traualles & victories, or else should be the beginning of most greuous sorowes and miseries, if they gaue neuer so little backe. By the which words the Souldiours were sodeynly so animated to fight, that the Danes began a little to shrinke and geue backe. The which when Canutus perceyued, by and by he set vpon the left wing of Edmondes hoste, the which were likeliest to do most harme, and so releued his distressed Souldiours, and that did he with such violence and manly courage, that he felled and layde on the ground as many as were in his way: By reason whereof it came to passe, that a great number of the English men nowe wearied with long fightyng, and hearing the rumor of the great slaughter of their company on euery syde, sodeynly fled away for feare. The which when King Edmond perceyued, he gate before them, and stayed them for a while: But when at the length his whole army was quite disordered and out of aray, it was not then possible for him to set them in aray, and bring them into the fielde againe which they had once forsaken. Here the English men, when the streytes and passages were all stopped by their enemies, so that none of them had any minde to make resistance, or hope to flye away and escape, were almost all slaine, specially such of them as were the best and worthiest Souldiours.

of two houres, but could not ouertake him.

¶ This losse and discomfiture, though it greatly weakened and dismayed the Englishmen, specially because London and manye other good townes and places were then for feare, rebelled vnto the Danes: yet king Edmond vsed neuerthelesse diligence in preparing a newe armie, and so did likewise Canutus, which at length came vnto his enimie by long and great iourneys. For they knewe well that if they did fight againe, they should with one battaille trie who should haue all. And king Edmond was nowe vtterly determined at the next conflict to put himselfe in extreme hafard, and either to wyne all or lose all. And therefore both the armies being nowe readie to fight, stood so nere together that the one might see the other, not farre from Seuerne side. At what tyme Edricus (as some reporte) began to perswade with the two kings, that they should common together before the beginning of the battaille, to see whether they coulde fall to any agreement betweene themselves, because he knewe right well that this thing should be as much for the commoditie of the Danes as of the Englishmen. For now he that before time was wont to be the chiefe worker of all trechery and mischief, beganne to counterseyt honestie, in going about to set an vnitie and peace, betwixt the two sayde most redoubted and balliant princes. The which princes not mistyking with his counsaile, for that present season, refused not to follow it, albeit they thought it would be to small effect and purpose. And so they communed together a little while, not without the great expectation of the beholders what would be the ende and come of it. But where vpon they concluded among themselves it is altogether vncertaine. Some saye that peace was agreed vpo condition that Canutus should haue Mertia or middle England, and Edmond all the west part of the realme.

¶ But Edricus, which as before is sayde was euer subtile of wyt, considering the good fortune of king Edmond and his knightly courage, thought that at length he should overcome the Danes. Wherefore to saue his lande, and to bring about his malicious treason, he sought the wayes and meanes how he might stand in his grace and fauour, and at length obtayned his content, and swore to him to be his true subiect.

¶ When king Edmond had a while stayed at London, he then made toward the Danes that then were in Kent, and met with them at a place called Otford, and there discomfited them, and chased Canutus to the Isle of Shepey. And there he tooke shipping and sayled about the lande, and at the last entred into the Countrey of Mertia, and spoyled a parte thereof.

¶ Then the two hostes met soone after at a place called Ashedowne, where after a long fight Edricus with his retinue fled to the comfort of the Danes: By meane whereof king Edmond was put to the worlke, for many noble men were slaine vpon his party: among the which the Bishop of Yrncoln, and the Abbot of Ramsy were two, and were come thither to haue intreated a peace betweene the two princes. But when this was layde to the charge of Edricus, he by his vntreue meanes, so excused himselfe, that no man myght charge him with any default.

tion.

¶ Thus this mortall warr continuing betwixt these two martiall princes, to the great desolation and mortalitie of the people, one of the knightes of the partie of king Edmond, gate him to an high place, where he might be somewhat heard of the hoste, and spake in this wise: daylie we dye, and no man hath the victorie: for Edmond maye not be overcome for his great strength, and Canutus maye not be overcome for favour of fortune. What shall then be the fruite of thys continuall strife? none other but when the knightes bene all slaine on eyther partie, then the Dukes compelled by nede will accord, or else they must fight alone without knights. Then seing thys must be the ende, why do they not one of these two? If they accord? why is not this kingdome sufficient for twaine, that sometye sufficed for. viij. If their coveteousnesse and greedie desire of Lordships be so great, that eyther hath indignation to take and part with other, or else the one to be vnder that other, then let them fight alone, that will be the Lordes alone, least if all men fight, all men be slaine, by meane whereof no men shall be left to be vnder the Lordship or leading of Dukes, nor yet to defend kings against their strong enimies or nations. Fabian.

¶ Some sayth Polidore, whome it repenteth not me to follow, doe write that the matter was done after this maner. One of the Capitaines, whether it were Englishman or Dane, it is not knowne, having first lycence graunted him to save his minde, spake in the presence of both the kings on thys wise.

¶ O most doubtie and valiant Emperours, you have nowe fought long ynough one against another: There hath beene bloud ynough shed betwixt you both. Your valiantnesse and the manly courage also of your Souldiours is sufficiently tryed. And yet can neither of you awaye with good or euill fortune. For if it so chaunce that one of you haue the upper hande of the other, he more fiercely pursueth his banquished enimie: Agayne, if his fortune be to be overcome, yet prepareth he a freche battaile against his banquisher. What wilfulnesse is this of yours (noble Princes) that can not be overcome and perswaded by reason? doe you more regard warre then peace? Whether rageth this your greedie desyre of Empire? If you fight for a kingdome, and that be your quarrell and the cause why ye thus warre one against another, deuide you then this most flourishing and wealthie Realme betwixt you, the which in times past was counted sufficient to maintaine. viij. kings: But if glorie doe pricke you to hasard the vncertaine chaunce of Empire or seruitude, deuise you some wayes by your selues whereby the matter maye be determined without any great slaughter or bloudshed which of you both shall haue the souereintie. Thus spake this Capitaine vnto them. But the latter sentence pleased king Edmond, and so did it Canutus also whome fortune favoured. And so by his perswasions they accorded at the length to trie the matter in their awne persons by dynt of sworde, hether to Polidore.

¶ These wordes thus spoken, were right well allowed of both hostes, for at this time, a truce was made betwene both the princes for a certaine tyme, after which tyme ended, were it by the occasion of these wordes, or otherwise, the sayde two princes Edmond and Canutus, agreed to trie their quarrels betwene them two onely.

¶ And for this was assigned by both their agreements, a little Isle then called

called Olney nere vnto Gloucester. In which place, at the daye and tyme appointed, the two Champions met without company or assistance within the sayde Isle, the hostes of both parties standing without the Isle, and there abyding the fortune of this combate. There eyther proued other, first with sharpe Speares, and after with kyne and cutting swordes. What shall I of this make any longer processe, when eyther had other well proued and assayed, by receiuyng of harde and sore strokes, by the first motion of Canutus, as most Writers testefie, they at the last agreed and kissed together as louers, to the great comfort of both the hostes.

¶ And shortly after, by the aduise of both their counsailes they condiscended and agreed vpon a particion of the lande, which immediatly was done to both their contentations, and they loued after, as two brethren, during their naturall lyues.

¶ But the Serpent Idre, of enuy and false conspiracie which euer burned in the heart of Edricus, was kindeled so sore, that of pure force it must breake out. into a light flame, so that what he might not accomplissh by his awne person, he fulfilled by his awne sonne, as testifie diuerse Authours. For as affirmeth Gydo, this sonne of Edricus awaityng his time, espyed when the king was at a house of easement to purge nature, and with a Speare strake him into the fundament, and so into the body, wherof king Edmond shortly after dyed at Orentord. Notwithstanding there is great diuersitie amongst wyrters touching his death which for breuities sake I omit. For Martian sayth, that he dyed at London by naturall sicknesse.

¶ When Canutus had well considered the confession of this Edricus, he lyke a discrete and righteous Prince, sayde vnto him in this wise. Edricus, for that thou hast for the loue thou bearest to me, slaine thine naturall Lord, which I most loued, I will exalt thine head aboue all the Lordes of England. And forthwith commaunded him to be taken, and his head to be striken off, and pight vpon a Speares head, and after set vpon the highest gate in London. But the Authour of Polichronicon sheweth in the. xliij. Chapter of his sixt booke that Canutus after the death of Edmond gaue vnto Edricus the Lordship of Martia or myddle Englande, and by his counsaile created Edwyn the brother of Edmond called the king of Chozles, and througth his counsaile also executed many cruell deedes.

¶ Finally, howsoeuer this noble Prince came to his death, it is agreed that he dyed, when he had reigned one yere, and somewhat more, and is buried at Glascenbury, by his Grandfather Edgar, and left behynde him two sonnes, that is to say, Edmond, and Edward, as sayth Fabian.

¶ Canutus or Knot, by the death of king Edmond had the whole gouernance of the Realme, and forthwith he assembled a counsaile at London, and then was consecrated and annoynted king, of Alured Archebishop of Cauntorbury, where among other thinges that were debated in that counsaile, a question was moued, whether in the composition made betwene Edmond, and Canutus, any speciall remembraunce was made for the

flatterers. ¶ Whereunto, it was answered of the Lordes, naye, affirming furthermore with an othe (for the kinges pleasure) that they to the vttermost of their powers would put off the blood of Edmond in all that they might. By reason of which answer and promes, they thought many of them to haue stand in the great grace and fauour of the King, but it turned all otherwise.

¶ For many, or the moze part of them, specially such as Canutus perceyued and knew, were sworne before to Edmond and his heyses, and also were native Englishmen, he mistrusted and disdeyned euer after. In so much, that some he exiled, and some were slaine, and some by Goddes punishment dyed sodeynly, and came to a miserable ende.

ded.*

¶ But shortly after by the counsaile of dyuerse of his Lordes, he outlawed Edwyne the brother of Edmond surnamed king of Chozles. But yet he was afterwarde reconciled to the kinges fauour, and lastlye was slaine by one of his owne seruauntes.

Edmond and Edward the sonnes of king Edmond, were sent to Swanus king of Denmarke.

¶ Canutus also by the sayde counsaile, sent the two sonnes of Edmond, named as before is sayde Edmond and Edward, vnto his brother Swanus then king of Denmarke, to be slaine after the opinion of some wyrters: But he abhorring that deede, sent them to Salamon then king of Hungary, as sayth Guydo and other. Where in processe of tyme Edmond dyed, and hys brother Edward maryed Agatha the daughter of Henry the fourth, then Emperour of Almaine.

¶ Of the which Edward and Agatha, proceded Margaret that after was king of Scotland, and Christian that was a Nonne, and a sonne named Edgar, and surnamed Etheling: or as Polydore wyrteth two sonnes, Edmond and Edgar.

uided the gouernement of this realme

¶ Canutus, after he had set certaine things in some order within y<sup>e</sup> realme, he then deuyled the same into foure partes. That is to say, the first and principall parte, which at those dayes was west Saxon, he held vnder his owne guyding. East England the which conteyned Norfolke and Suffolke, he betooke to the rule of the Erle Turkillus a Dane, or as Polydore calleth him Thrugillus. Mertia he betooke (as some write) to the subtil Erle Edricus. And the fourth part which was Northumberland, he betooke to a Dane named Hircius. But lyke as the man of Indee, can at no time chaunge his colour, so this Edricus neuer chaunged his false maners. And notwithstanding the great benefits that he daylie receyued of his princes, euen lyke as he had bene false and deceyueable to other princes before, euen so now he vsed himselfe toward Canutus.

tour put to death.*

¶ Wherefore he being accused and prooued faultie, was commaunded of the king to haue iudgement: The which was done immediatly, and his head for dyuers causes smitten off, and the same head with the body, for spite, cast into a foule and filthie place. But Reynulph Honke of Chester sayeth, that he was slaine by the kings agreement, within his palace at London, and his body with the head throwne after into the Towne Diche: Thus with shame he ended, that in falshood and dissimulation continued most of his life.

¶ In the .xv. yere of his reigne, he called a Parliament at Drenforde, where among other things, it was enacted, that Englishmen and Danes should holde and firmly keepe the lawes of Edgar late king.

¶ And

¶ And in this tyme dyed Swanus, that was brother to Canutus king of Denmarke without issue, wherefore that land fell vnto Canutus. For the which cause, he with a strong armie sayled thether to take the possession, and to set the Countrey in an order, or after some wyrters, to appease and withstand the Vandales that then had pierced that lande, and done therein much harme. Wherein Goodwyn the Erle, whose daughter Edward the confessor after maryed with a certaine number of Englishmen, fell vpon the Vandales by night, and distressed them in suche wise that Canutus had of them his pleasure. For this deede the king had Erle Goodwyn euer after in good fauour and loued Englishe men moze specially.

¶ But Polydore reporteth this stoye touchyng the kinges goyng into Denmarke farre otherwise, after this maner. When the Parliament (sayth he) was ended, he determined with himselfe to refozme many misorders in the common welth, and to beuotifie and furnishe the Realme with Nobilitie, and to do things that generally should redound to the great wealth and comoditie of all English men. But it so fell that he was sodeynly certified of the inuasion made by them of Norway into Denmarke, and desyred with all of his people there to come and ayde them with all speede. The which thing seemed vnto Canutus to be a matter of no small importance. For when Olanus king of Norway heard how the power of Canutus dayly encreased in such wise as he thought was daungerous for his estate, beyng afearde that he would make clayme vnto the sayd kingdome of Norway, which somtymes belonged vnto his auncestours, and therefore desyrous to cut off, and empeach his victories, he together with his brother Harold, a right doughty knight, inuaded the Realme of Denmarke, destroyng and wastyng the Countrey euery where as he went, dayly fighting and skirmishing with the Garrisons that lay in sundry places of that Countrey, in such wise that it was thought he would in short space winne all, if speedy resistance were not made to deliuer the Realme from such an imminent daunger. Wherefore Canutus mustered both Englishmen and Danes with a tryce, and hauing nowe all thinges redyly prepared for warre, tooke shipping, and the winde scruping him well, was soner arriued in Denmarke then a man would haue thought, where he found his enemies in armes, and the Countrey wasted and destroyed on euery syde. Then commaunded he his Banners and Pennons to be displayed, and his Standard to be aduanced and the army to follow, where euery thing was done as soone as it could be spoken.

¶ And here nowe were the Englishe men specially desyrous to do some noble deedes of armes, as well thereby to winne honour and shewe their manly courage and prowesse, as to purchase themselves the greater grace and fauour with their prince. Then met the two armies and fought so fiercely together, that they filled the Clament with great cry and noyse that they made. Long it was or it apered to whether partie the victory should encline. At the length the English men so fiercely assailed the enemies that they ouercame them. On the Morow Canutus pursuyng his enemies, tooke his iourney towardes Norway. And when he was entred into the Countrey, there met him incontinent Ambassadors, which were sent vnto him to intreat of peace, and submission, and to desyre him of a generall pardon, whome he heard very curteously, and after he had receyued hostages of them, he par-

doned them of all trespasses and offences whatsoever they had done against him; And so was the kingdom of Norway recovered againe. Canutus despying nowe of victorie fled for succour vnto his father in lawe the Duke of the Easterlynges that he might lyue with him more safely in exile: The which Canutus whyles he went about to disturbe the quiet state of another mannes kingdom, lost his aboue: yet to say the truth, the same Godly and innocent man lost nothing at all, in asmuch as in all these his aduersities and troubles, he behaued himselfe alwayes in most honest and verteous wise, and therefore was counted of all men a very holy man. And it foloweth a little after in the same wyter: In this battaile Canutus proued the Loyaltie and manly prowesse of the Englishe men, whome for that cause, he euer afterwards loued out of measure, and rewarded them with great giftes accordingly. And when the king had thus taken order with his affayres in Denmarke, he returned shortly into England. And soone after he married Emma the wife lately of Egelredus, of the which he had a sonne, & named him Har- dyranutus, and after the English Chronicle, Hardyknought.

Canutus mar- ried Emma y late wife of Egelredus & had by her a sonne named Hardyknought

¶ But Polydore wyrteth that this marriage was concluded on in the former Parliament. For Canutus hauing none issue, but onely two sonnes base borne, and begotten of a Concubine of his named Aluina, of the which two sonnes the one was called Harold, and the other Sweno: And desirous to haue suche issue as might lawfully succede him, maryed Emma the wyfe of Etheldred, which with her sonnes Alfred and Edward were banished the realme & lyued in Normandy with Richard her brother Duke of that coun- tric, vnto the which Duke the sayde king married also his sister Hestriha, at the same tyme.

Malcolme kinge of Scots ouer- throwne and brought to subiection to the king of England.

¶ In the .xvi. yere of his reigne, the Scots rebelled against him: wher- fore he with a great armie entred Scotlande, and at length overcame the king of that lande, named then Malcolme and brought them againe to hys subiection, as sayth Marian the Scot. By reason of which victorie, Canu- tus was then king of foure kingdomes, of England, of Scotland, of Den- marke, and of Norway.

Leofricus, Egelnotus.

¶ Then as sayth sundry Authours, after that he had betaken this land of England to the gupding of Leofricus, Egelnothus and other, he then retur- ned into Denmarke. And from thence he went in pilgrimage to Rome in the .xviij. yere of his reigne, and redeemed the Schoole of Saxons free of all former Tribute graunted as before in the stozies of Iew and Offa is some- deale touched: which redemption of Tribute (as sayeth Guydo) was called Rome Scot, as ye maye reade more in Fabian.

Rome Scot redeemed.

¶ After his returne from Rome, he beganne somewhat to swell with pride: But to say truth, he was a king of great magnificence, and he bled such iustice mixed with temperance that in his daies, in the west partes of the worlde, there was no Prince of renoune lyke to Canutus and besides that, he was greatly beloued and drad of all his subiects.

Canutus dead and left behinde him two sonnes.

¶ Thys king Canutus when he had reigned ouer this Realme .xix. yeres, he dyed and was buried at Winchester, leauing after him two sonnes begot- ten vpon his wyues, the eldest named Harold, and the yongest Hardikanitus, the which while his father lyued, was made king of Denmarke. Fabian.

But Polydore sayeth that Canutus dyed in Normandy, and was buried at Roane, at Roane, whose wordes are these: It was not long after, but Canutus was enforced to make great warre vpon Richard Duke of Normandy, be- cause he hauing no feare nor regarde vnto the Lawes, had caused himselfe to be deuorced for a berie light and trifling matter from his wyfe Estritha sister (as is aforesayde) of Canutus, who being desyrous to be reuenged vpon the sayde Duke for the same iniurie, prepared a great Flaue and sayled vnto Normandy. Nowe his armie was scarcely set a lande and encamped in the enemies Countrie when worde was brought him of the death of his sonne Sweno Lieutenaunt or Lorde Deputie of Norway, whome he specialle- loued, the which thing so wounded his hart with anguiste and sorow, that he fell into an Ague, whereof he dyed shortly after. Then (as it foloweth in the same Authour) his funerall obsequy being finished at Roane: the Soul- diours vpon safe conduyt and lycence graunted them to depart in safetie, re- turned home againe into England.

Harolde the base sonne of Canutus and of Elgina, or Algina, after the death of his father reigned ouer England. This man for his mymble- nesse and swiftnesse of foote, was surnamed Harefoote. In his begin- ning there was great strife among the Lordes, in a Parliament holden at Orford, for that some were in doubt of his birth, and whether he were the kings sonne or not, and specially Erle Goodwyn which did the vttermost of his power to haue set him by, and to haue preferred his brother Hardikini- tus the sonne of Etheldred and Emma, or anye of the sonnes of Etheldred and Emma that were in Normandy vnto that honor. But Leofricus whom Canutus so much loued and trusted, with the ayde of the Danes and Londo- ners, so stoutly withstoode Goodwyne and hys somes, that they sayled of their purpose.

Harold Harefoote.

¶ Alfoone as this Harolde was crowned, he gate him in all haste to Win- chester, and there tyrannically seased vpon all the goodes and treasure which Canutus had left vnto the sayd Emma, and then banished her the lande. The which Emma sayled then into Flaunders, and there of Baldwin the Erle was reuerently and curteously receyued, and obteyned of him the Castell of Bruges, where she made her aboade during the lyfe of this Harolde. The cause why she went not into Normandy, was because William then Duke there was by reason of his tender yeres and minoritie, not able to gouerne of himselfe, but was vnder the tuition and gouernance of others.

Emma the stepmother of Harold is banished.

¶ This Harold continued his life and reigne with little fruite, and lesse profite to the land, nor yet of the Subiectes, so that of him, either for vice that was in him, which learned men thought not meete to put in memozy, or else for the rudeness of his lyfe, and spending bairnely of his tyme, which was not worthy of memozy, nothing at all is put in remembraunce, but that he dy- ed at London, or as some wryte, at Drenford, and was buried at Westmin- ster, when he had reigned thre yeres and odde Monethes, leauyng after him none heyre, and therefore his brother Hardikinitus which was king of Denmarke, was king next after him.

Hardikinitus

Hardikinitus, or Hardiknot, the sonne of Canutus, and of Emma, was made king of Englande: This man after the death of his brother Harold was sent for into Denmarke, or as some write into Flaunders, where he was with his mother Emma, and was most ioyously receyued and crowned at London of Ethelnotus, then Archebishop of Cantorbury: But he was of such a cruelty, that he sent Alfricus then Archebishop of York, and Erle Goodwyn into Westminster, commaunding them for the injury by his brother Harold done unto his mother Emma, that they should drawe the Corps and dead body of the sayd Harold out of the ground, or place where it was buried, and caufe it to be throwne into the ryuer of Chamys, which was done according to his commaundement. The which Corps after, as sayth Guydo and other, was found by a fisherman, and buried vncruently with in the Church yarde of Saint Clement standyng without the Templebarre of London.

A cruell reuengemēt.

¶ And as Reynulph sayth, for a more cruelty, he caused first the dead hed of his sayde brother to bee smitten off from the bodye, and then thzowen into the sayde Ryuer.

Darre Gelt.

¶ This king also leuyed the afozenamed Tribute named the Dane gelt, and spent it to the litle profite of the Realme, but gaue the same vnto Mariners and Shipmen, and to sundry lewde persons, he gaue great and vnfitting fees and wages, and was of such prodigality, that his Boordes and Tables were couered foure tymes in the daye, and the people serued with great excesse both of meate and drinke.

¶ Nowe for the leuyng of the aforesayde Tribute, the Commons greatly grudged, so that in Worcester two of his seruauntes, which were assigned to gather that money, were there slaine. For the which murder the king was so sore displeasid, that he brent a great part of that Towne.

Murther & mischiefe.

¶ Some Authours write that the king betooke all the rule of the lande vnto his mother Emma, and to the Erle Goodwyn, the which Goodwyn had married the daughter of Canutus, gotten vpo his first wife Elgina: by whom many things were misordered, & specially by the subtilty of y Erle Goodwyn.

Erle Goodwyn a subtilt man.

¶ This Erle had many sonnes, as sayth Reynulph, in his sixt booke, and xv. Chap. By his first wife that was king Canutus sister, & not his daughter, he had one sonne: The which with the stroke of a horse was thzowen into the Ryuer of Chamys and dzowned: and the mother was smitten with a blast of lightning, and so dyed. Of whome it is there remembred that she was so vngacious, and of so vile condicions, that she set yong women to whozedome, for to gather by that vnlawfull meane riches. After which wife so dead, he maryed the seconde, of whome he receyued sixe sonnes, that is to say, Swanus, Harold, Costitus, Wilnotus, Sirthe, & Leofricus, & a daughter named Goditha, which after was maryed vnto Edward the Confessor.

A plague among Erle Goodwyns wyfe and children.

¶ The two sonnes of Egclredus, that is to say, Alphredus, and Edward, which as ye before haue heard were sent into Normandie by Emma theyr mother came in the tyme of the reigne of this king into England to visite and see theyr mother, and brought with them a great number of Normans. Then this Goodwyn imagined in his minde, howe he might preferre his daughter Goditha to one of these brethren, and thought with himselfe that the eldest woulde disdain that marriage, and therefore he thought to ioyne her to the yonger, yonger, and to make him king, and her Queene, and to that purpose he compassed the death of the elder.

A tracterly practice of Goodwyn

¶ And first Goodwyn practised with the Lordes of England, and sayd, it was a great ieopardie for the lande, to suffer so many straungers to enter the land without licence, wherefore it were necessary that they were restrayned in tyme. By which meanes he gate aucthoritie to order the matter in such sort as to him should seeme best, and that of his awne power, because he was of most might next vnto the king: Wherefore he went and met with the sayd Normans, and slue of them the greatest number. For vpon Guyld done, he slue alway. ix. and saued the tenth. And yet because he thought there was to many of them liuyng, he eftsoones tithed them againe, and slue euery tenth knight of them, and that by most cruell death, as windyng theyr guttes out of their bodies (as sayth Reynulph) and among other, put out the epen of the elder brother Alphzed, and sent him to Ely, where he dyed in short tyme after: But Edward was comeied some other way, and was brought to his mother. But the fearing the treason of Goodwin, sent him sone ouer the Sea againe.

Normans cruelly murdered by Goodwyn.

Alphzed had his epen put out and was sent to Ely, and there dyed.

¶ When Goodwyn was after accused for this cruell deede, he excused himselfe, and sware depely that he was forced of the king so for to do.

¶ Then it foloweth, that this Hardikinitus beyng at a feast or mariage dinner at Lambeth besyde London, mery and iocund, while he stood drinkyng he fell done sodeynly and dyed, or waxed dumbe, and lay vntill the viij. day after, not without suspicion of popsoning as some wyte, when he had reigned two yeres and was buried at winchester, leauing after him none issue.

The death of king Hardikinitus.

¶ Here endeth the line or offspring of Swanus, and all the other Danes that ruled in England, so that after this king, the blood of the Danes was cleerly extinct and put out from all kingly dignitie within this Realme of England. And also the persecution of them ceased cleerly after this kings death, the which had continued to eken from their first landing in the tyme of Britlacius king of west Saxon, and the ix. yere of his reigne, by the terme of. C. C. l. yeres.

Edwarde the sonne of Egeldzed or Etheldzed and of Emma his last wife, reigned ouer the realme of England next after the death of Hardikinitus: The which Edward, immediately after the death of his brother in lawe aforesaide, was sent for into Normandy, and pledges layde for him, that he without fraude should be made king. And then he came with a fewe straungers. But Marian the Scot sayth that some of the Lordes had sent for Edward the outlawe, sonne of Edmond Ironside for to be theyr king, but after the affirmance of the same Authour, when he knewe that Edward his nephew was in possession of the land, he would meddle no further.

This was Edward the Confessor.

¶ Then this Edward by the great aduice of Goodwyn Erle of west Saxon, and Leofricus Erle of Chester, was chosen king at London, and of Edsius, or Cadsius Archebishop of Cantorbury, and Alfricus Archebishop of Yorke on Easter Monday folowing consecrated at Winchester, and in processe of tyme after, he wedded Goditha the daughter of the Erle Goodwyn, which he had by his wyfe Thira, sister vnto Canutus the second, that of Guydo is called Editha, the which he entreated in such wise, that he put her not from his bed, nor yet had carnally with her to do. Whether it were for hate of her kinne, or for loue of Chastitie, the truth is not shewed: But all wyters agree that he continued his life without the vse of Women.

¶ This

Dane Gell discharged.

Griffin a rebellion in Wales.

Emma the mother of King Edward accused of incest with the Bishop of Winchester.

A beastly Bishop.

A cruel penance.

It is most like that he durst not be there for shame that he awarded such a trill to a kings mother

A great miracle were true.

The Archbishop was glad he was gone.

This king discharged Englishe men of the great Tribute called Dane gelt, the which before is often mencioned, so that after his time it was no more gathered. And also he subdued the Britons or Welchmen that made warres within the boundes of the lande or frontiers: But soone after they Duke or leader called Griffin, or Griffith, with the ayde of the Irishe men entered the Ryuer of Seuerne, and tooke manye prayes, and departed againe without fight.

In the tyme of the reigne of this Edward, Emma his mother was accused to be familiar with Alwyn or Adwyne, Bishop of Winchester. Upon which accusation, by counsaile of Erle Goodwyn, he tooke from her many of her Jewelles, and caused her to be kept very strightly in the Abbey of Warwell, and the Bishop he committed to the examination and correction of the Clergie: notwithstanding, Polidore saith, they were both committed to ward in Winchester. But his mother more sorowynge the defamation of Alwyne the Bishop, than her awne estate, wrote vnto diuerse Bishoppes, & besought them of iustice, affirming that she was ready to abyde all lawfull and most sharpest tryall.

Then diuerse of the Byschoppes made labour to the king for her, and for the Bishop. But Robert then Archebishop of Cantorbury, beyng with their labour discontented, sayde vnto them in this maner. My brethren Byschoppes, sayde he, how dare ye defende her, that is a wilde beast and not a woman? she hath defamed her awne sonne the king. Fabian, and called her lecherous Lemman the Bishop, Christ her God. Polydore.

But be it so, that the woman would purge the Priest, who shall then purge the womā, that is accused to consent to the death of her sonne Alphyed, and procured benome to the empoisonyng of her sonne Edward? But how so it be, that she be giltye or giltyesse, if she will go bare footed for her selfe ouer foure ploughe shares, and for the Bishop ouer five ploughe shares brennyng, and fire hote: then if she escape harmeless, he shall be assoyled of thys challenge, and she also.

This was of her graunted, and the day of purgation assigned: At which day the king and a great part of his Lordes were present, but this Robert the Archebishop made default and was not there, were it for pitie or otherwise. This Robert was a Monke in an house in Normandy, and came ouer by the sending for of the king, and was first made Bishop of London, and after Archebishop of Cantorbury.

Then shee was blindfolde, and led vnto the place betweene two men, where the Irons lay globyng hote, and passed the, ix. shares vnhurt. Then at the last she sayde, good Lord, when shall I come to the place of my purgation. When they vncouered her eyes, and shee sawe that she was past the paine, she kneeled downe and thanked God. Fabian.

Then the king repented him, and restored vnto her, and the Byschop also, that which he before had taken from them, and asked them for geuenesse: But the Archebishop of Cantorbury fled into Normandy.

Polydore wyrteth that king Edward was offended with his mother, for other causes aswell as for that she was suspected of the incontinent liuyng with the sayd Bishop: for it was layde vnto her charge that she was married vnto Canutus beyng both a straunger and an enemy vnto the Realme: And that that she succoured not her children in the tyme of theyr exile and banishment, and lastly because there went a brute that she should imagine their deathes.

It was not long after, that king Edward gathered a strong nauie at Southampton, or to saye more truly at Sandwich, forsomuch as he was warned that Swanus king of Denmarke intended to make warre vpon hym. But Keynulph sayth that he gathered this nauie to withstande Harold Harfagar, then king of Norway which intended to haue entered England. But he was letted by the aforesayde Swanus, that shortly after made warre vpon the sayde Harold and other.

It is also reported of this king that being on a tyme in a certaine extasie of minde or high contemplation in the tyme of seruice, he fell sodenly into a great laughter, contrarie to his wonted and accustomed maner. And when the standers by meruayled thereat, and asked of him what was the matter that he so did: he answered how the Danes and Norwayes were about by common consent to haue inuaded England with a great nauie, and as they were in a readynesse to hoysse vp their sayles and to set forward, one brought forth a Bolle full of Mede or Methe to drinke vpon a bone voyage: and after that came Bolle after Bolle, so that after drinke came dronkenesse, and after that iangeling, and then strife, and at the last fighting: in the which many were slaine, and the rest returned to their awne home, so that they are now dispersed and gone from their purpose, and I trust (sayth he) that in my tyme forein Nations and straungers will neuer inuade and disquiet thys Realme againe.

In the .x. yere of his reigne (as sayeth Keynulph) and in the Moneth of September, Eustace Erle of Boloigne came a lande at Douer, which Erle had wedded king Edwards sister. And it so came to passe, that when this Erle was landed he conueyed himselfe in so secret maner from his company that none of them could tell what was become of him, and they thought he had bene slaine in the towne: And in this search made for him, the hurly burly was such that a Citizen of the towne of Douer was slaine. By meane whereof the people arose, and in the questioning of this mans death, they ranne at length vpon the Erles company, and slue .xx. of his men, and wounded many mo: then the Erle appered and tooke his mens parte: But in the ende he was fayne to withdrawe himselfe with a fewe persons, and roade vnto the king then being at Gloucester, or as Polydore sayth, at Cauntobury, and made vnto him a greuous complaynt of the men of Douer.

But Mathew of Westmynster reporteth this storie otherwise, sayng: About this time Eustachius Erle of Boloigne, who had married king Edwards Sister named Goda, landed with his treyne at Douer, where hys Souldiours as they sought for lodging after a proude and vndiscret maner fortunied to kyll a Townes man. The which outrageous fact when another Burgesse of the same towne perceuyed, he kyllled him againe that had done the murther. By reason wherof the sayd Erle and his company were greatly moued, and in their rage slue much people both men and women, besides children and olde folkes that were troden to death with men and horses. But when the straungers saw that the Burgeses came still mo and mo, flockyng on euery syde to rescue their neighbours, they toke their heeles like cowards and .xliij. of them beyng slaine in the flight, the rest fled to Gloucester where

Erle Goodwyn sent by the king to take order with the men of Douer for the death of strangers.

the king lay. Howbeit, Polydore sayth that this conflict was at Cauntozbury and not at Douer: But nowe to retorne to the matter. After this ryot, Erle Goodwyn, forasmuch as to him was committed the rule of Kent, was charged to ryde thether, and to take wreche vpon the inhabitantes of that towne. But he withsayde that commaundement, and counsayled the king to send for the Wardeynes of the Castle of Douer, and the Rulers of the Towne, for to aunswere vnto such matters as should be layd against them, and if they were guiltye, to punish them, or else not.

¶ This Counsaile of Goodwyn pleased nothing the king, nor such as were about him, wherefore many mo Lordes were sent for. Among the which Leofricus Erle of Chester, & Seward Erle of Northumberland weretwo.

¶ After which assembly of the Lordes Erle Goodwyn had such monition of some of the counsaile, that he withdrew himselfe from the Court, and gathered to him strength of knightes out of dyuerse shires, as west Saxon, and Kent, and houed at Beuerston vntill his sonnes came vnto him with mo people. Some after, came vnto him his eldest sonne Swanus, and brought with him a faire companie, that he had artered in Orenfordshire, and Gloucestershire: And Harolde his other sonne with a felowship that he had assembled in East Englande and Huntingdonshire, so that of these people were made a great hoste.

Goodwyn accused for vnlawfull assemblies.

¶ Then Goodwyn was accused to the king for gathering of so great an hoste: But he excused him and sayde, it was done to withstande the welthe men, the which proued contrary. Then he was commaunded to send away the people, and to come himselfe with a certeyne number vnto the Court: but that he refused.

¶ Then the king and his Counsaile beyng at London, Goodwyn and Harolde, was againe sent for, and charged to come to the Court with. xii. persones to attend on them, and no mo, and to render into the kings handes all knightes fees that he and Harold his sonne had within England. To this by them was answered, that they might not come to the counsaile of Treachors & guilefull men, and that also with so fewe men in number they might not without perill or shame passe by the Country.

¶ Nowe during this tyme, a part of Goodwynes knightes withdrew them, and his power began to deminish, and the king in this meane season had gathered a strong host. Then Proclamations were made that Goodwyn should come to the Court, as before is sayde, or else to auoyde the lande within five dayes. Wherefore, Goodwyn considering the ieopardie that he was in, tooke with him three of his sonnes, that is to say, Swanus, Costy, and Gurth, or Biorno, and sayled into flanders, where he was receyued of the Erle Bladwyn, whose daughter Swanus his sonne had before married, named Judith. And Harold and Leofricus, two of his other sonnes with a fewe shippes sayled out of Bristowe into Ireland. Fabian.

Goodwyn an obitinate rebell.

Swanus, Costy, and Gurth, & thre sonnes of Goodwyn fled w thery father into Flaunders.

¶ Of this foresayde variance betwene the king, Erle Goodwyn, and his sonnes, I finde much diuersitye among wyrters: For Mathewe of Westminster somewhat dissenting from my Authour, wyrteth hereof as foloweth. Erle Goodwyn beyng greatly moued for the sleying of his men at Douer, assembled a great power out of Kent, Suffer, and the West Saxons. And so did likewise his eldest sonne Swanus out of his Seignory or honour, that is to

is to wete, out of Orfordshire, Gloucestershire, Herefordshire, Sommersetshire, and Barkelshire, as did his sonne Harold also out of his honour of East England, Grantbridge, and Huntynghdon. When king Edward was informed hereof, he also assembled a great army, because he would be in a readinesse to fight with his enemies if neede were. Then came Goodwyn with hys army into Gloucestershire, and sent his messengers vnto the king to require him to deliuer Custachius and his company vnto him, and if he refused so to do, then to shewe him that he would proclayme open warre against him. Vnto whome the king beyng now in a readinesse and well furnished of all things necessary for warre, sent aunswere againe, that he would not sende him Custachius, charging the sayd Goodwyn further, forsomuch as he had raysed an army against him, and without his leaue and licence disturbed the peace of his Realme, personally to apere at the Court at a day apoynted, and there to make aunswere to the sayde iniury, and misdemeamour before him and his Counsaile. But as Goodwyn durst not fight against the king, because hee thought himselfe to weake, so likewise would he not make his personall apurance as he was required. Wherefore, the sayd king by the decree and sentence of his Counsaile, banished him the Realme, with his five sonnes: who shortly vpon his banishment, with his wife Gina, and Costius or Costio his sonne, and his wife Judith, the daughter of Baldwyn Erle of Flaunders, and two other of his sonnes, that is to say, Swanus, and Gurth, taking wyth them great store of treasure, tooke shipping, and sayled streight into Flaunders vnto the sayde Erle. His other two sonnes Harolde, and Leofwinus, went vnto Bristowe, and from thence gate them into Irelande. After that the king put away Edith the Queene, onely of displeasure conceyued agaynst her father, and appoynted that she should be kept in safe custody in the Abbey of Redwell by the Abbesse there, without any honourable entertaynement, hauyng one gentlewoman only to wayt vpon her. Hetherto Mathew. & c.

¶ When the king was asserteyned that the Erle Goodwyn with his five sonnes was in this maner departed out of his land, he shortly after called a Parliament, and by the auctoritic of the same banished Goodwyn and his three sonnes that were gone with him. And that done the king put his abone wife which was the daughter of Goodwyn called Edithe, a Lady of singular vertue and learning, into the Abbey of Warwell with one mayden to be safely kept, and tooke from her such Jewels as she had, as sayth Marian. And so Goodwyn and his said sonnes continued two yeres banished. In the which season he or his retinue tooke dyuerse tymes prayes in the Marches of England and in the ende drew to him such strength, that he was purposed to haue entered the land with force, and to haue warred vpon the king. But by mediators that fauoured Erle Goodwyn, a peace was made betwene the king and him, so that in the ende he was receyued to grace with his sonnes, and his daughter the kinges wife restored to hir first and former honour. And for this peace to be continued for Goodwynes part was deliuered for pledges, a sonne of his called Wilnotus, and a sonne of Swanus, named Macum, or as Polydore writeth, two sonnes of Goodwyn, named Costo, and Biorna. The which two pledges, king Edward sent to William Duke of Normandy to be kept. And Algarus the sonne of Leofricus Erle of Chester, to whome the king had geuen the Erledome of Harold, & he ruled it discretly in the tyme of his absence, and at his returne, deliuered it to him againe, gladly and without grudge.

¶ During the tyme of this Banishment of Goodwyn, William Bassard, Duke of Normandy, came with a good company into this land, and was honourably receyued, to whome the king made great cheere.

¶ And after he had tarped here a certeyne of tyme to his contentation, and pleasure, he returned to his abone with great giftes and rewardes. And Emma the kinges mother dyed shortly after, and was buried at Winchester. And Swanus the eldest sonne of Goodwyn went to Jerusalem, and from thence toward Licia, and dyed by the way of colde that he had taken in goyng barefoote. Then the Normanes that had geuen to the king euill counsaile against Englishe men, were by Goodwyn and his friendes exiled. Among which, Robert Archebishop of Cantorbury that had spoken soze against them was one, of whome Fabian speaketh.

¶ In the .xiiij. yere of this king, the Scottes rebelled against him. Wherfore Seward Erle of Northumberland by the kinges commaundement gathered a great host, and entered that land, and behaued him so manfully, that in the ende he subdued the Scottes, and chased the king out of his Country, so that after king Edward gaue that kingdome vnto Malcoline, sonne of the king of Cambis, or Cumberland, to be holden of him and his heyres kings, as chiefe Lordes of Scotland.

¶ Upon Easter Monday the sayd yere, Goodwyn sitting at the kinges Boorde, with other Lordes in the Castle of Windsor, or as some report, of Winchester, it happened one of the kings Cup bearers to stumble, and to recover againe, so that he shed none of the drinke: wherat Goodwyn laughed and sayde, nowe that one brother, hath susteyned that other, whereby he meant, that the one foote or legge had stayed the other from falling. With which woordes, the king marked him and sayde. Right so my brother Alphyred should haue holpen me, had not Goodwyn beene. The Erle then conceived that the king suspected him of his brothers death, and sayde vnto the king in defending his vnturth: Sir, I perceyue well that it is tolde thee that I shoulde be the cause of thy brothers death. So mought I safely swalowe this morsell of bread that I heare holde in my hande, as I am guiltlesse of the dede. But he had no sone spoken the word, and put the bread in his mouth, but he was choked. Then the king commaunded him to be drawen from the boord by the legges, & so was he conueied to Winchester, & there buried. Fab.

¶ Mathewe of Westmynster sayth, that the king when he sawe him fall dohne starke dead before him, spake vnto them that were present, sayng: haue away this dogge and traytour, and burye him in some common highe way, for he is not worthy of Christian buriall. Then his sonnes that strode by drew him from the Table, and bware vnto the king, buried him in the olde Abbey of the same Citie.

¶ But Marian the Scot sayth, that as Erle Goodwyn sat at the kinges Table on Easter Monday, he was sodenly taken with a Palsy, or some other sicknesse, and dyed the thirde day after: and his Lordshipes were geuen vnto Harold his eldest sonne then liuyng, and Haroldes Erledome was geuen to Algarus the sonne of Leofricus, which was the Erledome of Dorsette after some wyrters,

¶ It was not long after that king Edward sent vnto the fourth Henry then Emperour of Almanie, Aldredus Bishop of Worcester with other noble men, prayng him that he would sende into England his Cosyn Edward the sonne of Edmond Ironside, for so much as he entended to make hym as heyre. The which request was fulfilled, so that he came into England sone after, the which as ye haue heard before was named Edward the outlaw. But as sayth Guydo and other, the yere after he came into England, he dyed at London and was buried at Westmynster.

¶ The yere following king Edward through euill counsaile exiled without gilt Algarus the sonne of Leofricus, the which did associate himselfe with Griffyn king or Duke of Wales, and destroyed the Countrie of Hereforde, and did much harme to the Towne, and set the Mynster on fyre, and slue .vij. Chanons therof. Then the king sent Harold against him, the which chased the Welshmen into their abone boundes, and recovered the sayde Towne by appointment, holden by the sayde Algarus, and trenched it about and amended all hurtes before done by the Welshmen, and lastly reconciled the sayde Algarus and his company vnto the kings grace.

¶ About the .xv. yere of king Edward dyed the Noble Duke Seward, ruler of Northumberlande of a flure, of whome Guydo reherseth dyuers notable actes whiche I passe ouer. Of him it is read that when he sawe well he should dye, he caused his armour to be put vpon him, and so armed and sitting in a Chayre, sayde, thus it becommeth a knight or man of honour to dye, and not lying in his bed as another meane man, and so he dyed and was buried at Porke, or as Keynolph writeth died at Porke and was buried in the Abbey of Salnahan which he himselfe had founded. And his Erledome was after geuen to Costy sonne of Goodwyn.

¶ In the .xvi. yere of this king dyed also the good Erle Leofricus Erle of Mertia and of Chester, & was buried in the Abbay of Couentrie the which before he and his wyfe Godina had builded. This man purchased manye great priuileges for the towne of Couentrie & made it free from any maner of Tolle, except onely of Horse. For the which also to haue free, the common fame telleth, that after long request made to the king by his wyfe named Godina, he graunted her to haue it thereof freed, if that she woulde ride naked thorow the Towne, which she did, by meane whereof, it was freed.

¶ But Saufride sayth that this gentle and good Lady did not onely for the freeing of the said Citie and satisfying of her husbands pleasure, graunt vnto her sayde Husband to ryde as aforesayde: But also called in secret maner (by such as she put speciall trust in) all those that then were Magistrates and rulers of the sayde Citie of Couentrie, and vttered vnto them what good will she bare vnto the sayde Citie, and how shee had moued the Erle her husband to make the same free, the which vpon such condition as is afoze mentioned, the sayde Erle graunted vnto her, which the sayde Lady was well contented to doe, requiring of them for the reuerence of womanhed, that at that day and tyme that she should ride (which was made certaine vnto them) that streight commaundement should be geuen throughout all the Citie, that euerie person should shut in their houses and wyndowes, and none so hardy to looke out into the streetes, nor remayne in the streetes, vpon a great paine, so that when the tyme came of her out ryding none sawe her, but her husbande

And shortly after her returne, when shee had arrayed and apparelled her selfe in most comely and seemely maner, then shee shewed her selfe openly to the people of the Citie of Couentrie, to the great ioy and maruellous reioysing of all the Citizens and inhabitants of the same, who by her had receyued so great a benefite.

¶ Then Algarus his sonne was Erle after him. But Mathew of Westminster wyrteth that his wyfe Godina obteyned the sayde liberties of the Erle her husbande then Lorde of the sayde Towne.

¶ Harold the eldest sonne of Goodwyn was now in great authoritie, and ruled much of the kings armie. The yere folowing Algarus was accused by malice, and was banished the lande. Wherefore he fled againe to Griffyn Duke of Wales as he before had done, of whome he was ioyously receyued and mainteyned. The king being thereof informed, sent Harold into Wales to make warre vpon Griffyn, the which quit him in so knightly wise, that he chased the Welshmen, brent the sayde Griffyns palace at a place called Rutlane, and destroyed his name, and then returned into England about myddlent. But about the Rogation dayes the sayde Harold and his brother Tosly were sent thither againe with a strong armie: at which season they destroyed a great part of Wales, and in conclusion brought the Welshmen vnto due subiection, and forced them to geue pledges for the continuance of the same. And that done pursued so sore vpon Griffyn by the commaundement of the king, that in the ende, his awne people for to purchase their owne lyues shue him, and sent his head vnto Harold in the Moneth of August: so that after the death of this Griffyn, by the commaundement of the king, the Countrie of Wales was committed to the guyding of the two brethren of Griffyn, the which fauoured more the kings partie in the time of warre, than they did their brothers. And this warre in Wales thus brought to an ende, Harold by his pollicie reconciled againe Algarus Erle of Mertia to y<sup>e</sup> kings grace, so that he continued in his fauour during his lyfe after.

¶ In the .xx. yere of the reigne of the king: Harold sayled toward Normandy to visite his brother Wilnotus and Hacun his Nephew, the which as ye before haue heard, were layd there for pledges for the peace to be holden vpon Erle Goodwynes side against the king. But he in his course of sayling was wether driven by tempest into the Countrie or Prouynce of Pountith, where he was taken as a prisoner of the Duke there, and sent vnto Duke Wylliam of Normandy: The which forced hym to sweare that he in tyme folowing should mary his daughter, and that after the death of king Edward, he should keepe the lande of England to his behoofe, according to the will and minde of king Edward as some writers affirme. And it is further written that Harold to be in the more fauour of Duke Wylliam, shewed him that king Edward had in the presence of his Barony of England, admitted the sayde Wylliam for his heyre, and couenaunted with him, that if he ouerlyued the king, he would in safe wise keepe the lande to his ble. which tydings and promise, the sayde Wylliam graunted him his daughter to wife, which then was vnder lawfull yeres of marriage with a great dower.

¶ And for to cause Harold to be the more constant in his promes, he deliuered to him Hacun his Nephew and some of his brother Swanus, the which he much desyred, and kept still Wilnotus the brother of the sayde Harold. After which couenaunts, sufficiently stablished and enacted: Harold departed from Duke Wylliam with great and riche giftes, and shortly after landed in England. And at his coming to the kings presence, he shewed to him all that he had done in the aforesayd matters, wherwith the king was well contented, as affirmeth Fabian mine aucthour.

¶ Mathew of Westminster reporteth the matter thus. Costius Erle of Northumberland, tooke his brother Harold by the heare as he was bringyng a Cup of wine vnto the king, and pulled him downe vnto the ground, all that stood by and behelde it merueyllyng thereat. Then Harold againe desirous to be reuenged vpon him for that vilanye, tooke him in his armes, and floong him on the pavement: But by and by the kings Garde ranne betwixt them, and parted them. After the which altercation, Costius departed the Court in a great rage, and coming to the Citie of Herford, where Harold had prepared a great feast agaynst the kings coming, shue all his brothers seruantes that he found there, and mangled and cut them in peeces, and into euery vessell of Wine, Meeth, Ale, or any other kinde of drinke else, hee cast epyther a legge, an arme, or some other peece of the bodyes so mangled, sendyng the king woorde withall, that whensoever he came to his brothers house, he should be sure to finde powdred fleshe ynoughe to serue him, but if he would haue delicates, he must then be faine to prouide them himselfe. The which mocke of his when the king heard thereof, he commaunded him for his sayde detestable fact and lewdenesse to be banished the Realme. But as Holidore wyrteth, he was offended with him, and sayd vnto him as foloweth: Tolve I not thee before that this mischiefe and inconuenience would ensue hereof vnto this Realme by thy meanes, if thou wentest to William of Normandy: But God epyther turne this harde destiny from vs, or else if it must needes come to passe, graunt that it chaunce not in our dayes.

¶ This cruell deede sprang wide, so that for it he was hated of all men, in somuch that his awne Tenantes, the men of Northumberland, of which prouince he then was Lorde of, arose against him, and in the ende chased him into flanders, with a fewe personnes then awayting vpon him.

¶ But the verteous king Edward not beyng contented with the commons doynge, consideryng it to be done without his aduice or commaundement, sent thither Harold to do correction vpon the heades or Captaynes of the Northumbers: wherof they beyng asserteyned, continued their strength and met with Harold, and his people, and made them to vnderstand that they were freely borne, and freely nourished, and that they might not suffer the cruelnesse of any Dukes.

¶ When Harold had receyued this message, and had well regarded the strength of the Northumbers, he perceyued that without great effusion of blood, he could not correct the misdoers: Wherefore it seemed to him better to fauour the Country, then to take heede of the singuler profite of his brother, so that he returned to the king with this aunswere, and purchased their pardon pardon of him, and also so laboured the king, that he assigned them another Duke of Erie that was named Malcharus. And Costius his brother with his wife and children remayned in Flaunders during the kinges life.

The commō lawes of this Realme.

This king also purged the olde and corrupt lawes, and picked out of them a certain, which were most profitable for the commons, and those were called the common lawes of this Realme, for the institution whereof, there happened many comuocions and much trouble.

And now for an ende of this story, this king dyed the fourth day of January, when he had reigned. xxiii. yer. vij. Monethes, and odde dayes, and was buried at Westminster, and left after him no childe, for he was accounted for a virgine when he dyed.

It is written of him also that he was wont by touch of hand, to heale such as were diseased of the kinges euill, & that of him other kinges and princes of this Realme haue as it were by inheritance receyued the gift of healing that disease, by touch of hand and certeyne prayers, and ceremonies bled withall, like as they receyued also the custome to halowe and consecrate Rynge on Good Friday, which were reputed good and auaylable against the Crampe.

Harolde the second sonne of Ele Goodwyn, and last king of Saxons. This man forgettyng his promes befoze made to William Duke of Normandy, tooke vpon him as king, and was crowned of Aldredus then Bishop of Yorke, or as some wyte, set the crowne on his abone heade without any consecration or ceremonies. Albeit, as Guydo affirmeth, some of the Lordes entended to haue made Edgar Adeling king, which Edgar as affirmeth the sayde auctours, was sonne to Edward that was the sonne of Edmond Ironsyde, and named of some Edward the outlawe. But because this Edward was yong, and chiefly considering the strength and riches of Harolde, therefore Harolde obteyned the Crowne. Howebeit Marian sayth, that king Edward befoze his death, ordeyned that Harolde shoulde be king after him.

Soone after the king was crowned, he began to reuoke euill lawes, and customes, and established good lawes.

In thort tyme after that Harolde was made king, Costie his brother which as afore sayde was chased into Flaunders, made him a flauie of. lx. small sayles of Shippes, or as Matheto of Westminster sayth, of. xl. and sayled about the Isle of Wight, and tooke prayes within the sayde Isle, and in diuerse places of Kent. And from thence he sayled into Lynsey, and did there much harme both with fire and sworde. But sone after he was chased thence by Edwyn, and Malcharus, Erles of Martia and Northumberlande: And then he sayled into Scotland, and finding little comfort there, he went from thence into Norway to desyre ayde of King Harolde, who there reigned at that tyme.

When Costius was thus with his robbers chased, then Harolde Har- sager king of Norway moued thereunto by Costio, with a great flauie of thre hundreth shippes and mo, entered the mouth of the riuer of Tyne.

When Harolde of England had knowledge of this great flauie of the Norwayes, he sent vnto the aforenamed Erles of Martia, and Northumberland, commaunding them to withstand their landing, while he gathered his strength. Then the afore sayde Erles sped them toward the Norwayes, and gaue vnto them a sharpe and a strong fight, but in the ende the Englishe men were put to the worse, and were faine to geue backe, so that the enemies entered further into the land. The king heering of the discomfiture of hys people, made the more hast toward his enemies, so that within sixe dayes after he came to Senyfford Bridge.

In this foresayde place both hostes ioynd and fought a most sharpe and cruell battaile, wherein was ouerthrobene manye a lustie knight vpon the Englishe partie, but many mo vpon the Norwayes, so that in the ende Harolde their king was slaine, and that of the hande of Harolde king of England, as saith Guydo, and Costius was also slaine in the same fight. Danus brother to the sayde Harolde Harfager, with Paulus Duke of the Isles of Orkeies were there taken prisoners. Danus the brother of Harolde Har- sager & Paulus y duke of y Isles, ta- ken prisoner.

It is also specially remembred of the sayde Authour that one knight stood vpon the afore sayde Bridge, and with his Axe defended the passage, whaugre the whole host of the Englishmen, and lixe. xl. Englishmen or mo with his Axe, and might not be ouercome vntill an Englishman went vnder the Bridge with a Boate or Wherry and sticked him vponward with his speare through an hole of the Bridge.

For this victory, Harolde was highly enflamed with pride and also with couetousnesse, so that he deuyded not the prayes of his enimies among hys knightes, but he kept them to himselfe, or gaue parte vnto such knightes as he fauoured, and spared it from them that had well descrued, by reason whereof he lost the fauour of many of his Soldiours.

Harold in- flamed with pride and co- uetousnesse.

In this tyme the daughter of Duke William, the which Harolde shoulde haue married, died within age, but not befoze Harolde (sayth Polydore) was king, wherefoze Harolde thought himselfe the more discharged of his pro- mes befoze made to her father. But William warned Harolde of couenants broken, and mixed threates with prayers and petitions. Wherevnto Harolde answered, that a nice foolish couenant ought not to be holden, namelye the behest of other mennes right and kingdome, without the whole assent of the Senatours of the same lande. And furthermore, a lewde othe might and ought to be broken, and specially when it is compelled to be sworne for neede or for dreede.

Harolde excuses to William Duke of Nor- mandy.

Vpon these answers receyued by Duke William from king Harolde, in the meane while that messengers went and came, Duke William gathered his knightes, and prepared his nauie, and all other thinges necessary vnto the warre, and had the assent of the Lordes of his lande to ayde and assist him in his iourney. The like preparation also (sayth Polydore) was made by William Duke of Nor- mandy ma- keth his pro- uision to come into England.

Harold

Harold to defende the realme from the inuasion of the Normans.

¶ And mozeouer he so informed the Bishop of Rome then named Alexander the second, that he confirmed him in taking of that voyage, and sent vnto him a Banner, the which he willed him to beare in the Ship that he himselfe should sayle in. And so hauing all thinges in a readinesse, he sped him to the sea syde, and tooke shipping in the Hauen of Saint Walery, where he tarried a long tyme before he could haue a iuncte and conuenient winde: for the which the Souldiours murmured and grudged, and sayd it was a madnesse and greatly displeasing vnto God, to desyre a nother mannes kingdome by strength, & namely when God withstandeth it by the working of his Clemēt.

¶ At the last the wind came about, and he tooke shipping, and helde his course towarde England vpon this ground and title folowing.

1. The first and principall was to chalenge his right, and to haue the dominion of the land that to him was geuen of king Edward his nephew.

2 The seconde was to be reuenged of the death and cruell murther of his Nephew Alphred, and brother of king Edward, which he ascribed wholly vnto king Harold.

3 The thirde was, for to be reuenged on the wrong that was done vnto Robert, that was Archebishop of Cauntorbury, which as he was enforced was eriled by the meanes and labour of Harold in the tyme of king Edward, as is afore sayde

¶ Duke William keping his course, at the last landed in Suffex, at a place called Peuenessey nere vnto Hastings. And in his goyng out of his ship, & taking the land, his one foote slipped, & the other stak fast in the sand: the which one of his knightes sawe, & beyng nere vnto him, sayd: now Sir Duke thou holdest Englande, and thou shalt soone be turned from a Duke to a King.

¶ The Duke entering further into the lande, made his proclamations that no man should take any prayes, or do any force to the people: for he sayd that it was reasonable that he should spare that thing that should be his awn.

¶ At this time Harold was king in the North partes of England, and had knowledge of the landing of the Normanes, & he made all the haste towards them that he might, and gathered his strength out of the Countries as he came. But the Duke passed still forward, and at the last came to Kingstone, where he and his armie passed ouer the Chamys, and made such good speede that he came to London befoze the king, where he was holden out vntill he had put in good pledges, that he and his people should passe through the Citie without tariyng, the which he did, and so went through the Citie, and passed ouer London Bridge, and so returned againe into Suffex.

¶ King Harold entending to know the strength of his enemies sent spies into the Dukes hoste, the which made report vnto the king, that all Duke Williams Souldiours were priestes: for they had their vpper lippes and cheekes shauen, and the Englishmen at those dayes vsed the heare of their vpper lippes shad and not shauen. But Harold vnto that answered and sayde, they be no priestes, but are stoute and balyaunt knights.

¶ Then Gurth, or rather Biozno, one of the yongest brethren of Harold, counsayled him that he should stand a parte, and suffer him with other of his Lordes to fight with the Normanes, forsomuch as he was swozne vnto the Duke, and they were not, sayng mozeouer, that if they were slaine or ouerthrowne, throwne, that yet he might defende his quarell, and fight for his Country.

¶ In this meane tyme, Duke Wyllyam sent a Monk vnto king Harold and made him thre offers. The first that according to his othe he should render the land, or deliuer it by vnto him as his awne proper possession, and that done, to take it againe of him, and to hold it of him as in fee, and so to reigne vnder him for terme of his lyfe, and after hys death to returne it to hym againe, or to such a one of his sonnes as he would assigne it vnto.

¶ Secondly, to leaue the kingdome without any moze strife.

¶ Or thirde in exchewing of the shedding of christian mens blood, that he would defend his quarrell in his awne person against the Duke, and they two onely to trie the matter by dent of sword.

¶ But Harold refused these offers, and sayde he would trie his quarrell by dent of swordes, and not by one sword, and that he and his knights and Souldiours would defende their Countrey against all straunge Nations, praiyng God to iudge the right betwene them twaine.

¶ When Duke Wyllyam had receyued this aunswere from Harold, and saw well that there was no meane, but to abide fortune in battaile, he charged his people that might watch, to occupie themselves in prayer, and specially the Priestes and the religious people, where the Englishmen gaue themselves to drinking and surfeiting. Fabian.

¶ Then vpon the morrow being Saturday, and the. xiiii. daye of October, both hostes assayed other in the place where stood the Abbay of Battaille in Suffex. In the beginning of this battaile a Norman called Thilfer splayed a Banner befoze the hoste of the Normans and slue an Englishman that came against him, and after that another, and so the thirde, and at the laste was slaine himselfe.

¶ Then the Holberds smote together with a great shout and cry, and they fought soze a long season. And the Englishmen defended themselves manfully, and the better for that they kept them whole & close together without scattering or spreding abroad. The which when Wyllyam perceyued, he gaue a signe vnto his knightes, that they should geue back, and made a countenance as though they did flie. Then the Normans enbattelred their footemen, & set horsemen for winges on euerie side. By the which, while the Englishmen were disceuered, and soone out of array, the Normans turned againe vpon the Englishmen, and slue them downe on euerie side.

¶ This battaile was soze foughten of the Englishmen, so that Duke Wyllyam was thirde felled that day, by reason that thre horses were slaine vnder him. Lastly, Harold was wounded in the eye with an arrowe, and fell to the ground and was slaine, and his people scattered, so that well was he that might saue him selfe by flyng. Then Duke William buryed his men that there were slaine, and suffered his enemyes to do the same.

¶ When the death of Harold was knowne to the Erles of Mertia and of Northumberland, the which for streightnesse of way could not bring their people to that field, or else for that they wilfully withheld themselves from Harold, because he did none otherwise depart the prayes amongst them & their knightes at the former field of the Norwayes: then they drew the next way to London, and tooke Agatha Haroldes wyfe, and sent her to Chester. And they Alexander Bishop of Rome sedeth vnto Will the Duke of Normandy a Banner to carry with him in his Ship against England.

The ground & chiefe cause of William Duke of Normandys challenge of the Realme of England.

The landing of William Duke of Normandy.

A good policy.

Harold was now in the North partes

An unskillful messenger.

Good counsaile is not alwayes regarded.

These offers made vnto king Harold by William Duke of Normandy.

Good counsaile if it were true.

Battail Abbay in Suffex.

Thilfer,

King Harold slaine and William the Conquerour had the victory.

Agatha Haroldes wyfe committed to Chester.

they and Aldredus Bishop of Yorke with the Londoners, were agreed and promised epyther to other that they would make Edgar Atheling king, and defend his right to the bittermost of their powes. But that promes notwithstanding, when they heard of the great strength that dayly fell to duke William, and of his prouisions, they were faine to breake that apointment. And the sayde Erles submitted themselves, and gaue vnto him pledges, and became to him his liege men by homage and fealtie.

¶ And thus when Harold had ruled the lande, from the fift day of January to the .xiii. day of October, he was slaine, when he had reigned nine Monethes and odde dayes, and was buryed at the Monasterie of Waltham, which he before had founded.

The ende of the gouernement of the Saxons.

¶ And here endeth the gouernement of the Saxons, the which continued from the first yere of the reigne of Hengest in the yere of our Lord. 475. vnto this conquest, which was the space of 590. yeres.

NOwe for as much as it pleased almightie God to suffer this Duke to conquire so noble a land, and to be Lorde and souereigne ouer so many noble inheritours as then were, and nowe are within the same. I thinke it therfore conuenient to shew the dissent of the same Duke, and howe nere of blood he was vnto king Edward that last dyed.

The Pedegree of William Conquerour.

¶ Rollo who was first an Heathen, and after christened and named Robert, who married Silla the daughter of Charles the Simple, sometime king of fraunce, and had for her dooer the Duchy of Normandy, which he ruled .xiii. yeres, and the sayde Robert had by Silla a sonne named William, the which afterward was called Longa Spata, that is to say, William with the long Sworde. This William was Duke after his father. .xx. yeres, and left after him a sonne named Richard, which was named Richard the Hardy, and was the thirde Duke, and reigned. li. yeres and had by his wife a sonne named Richard the good, and Emma that was wyfe to Egeldred and mother to the last Edward the king. After him the good Richard was Duke, and reigned. .xxviii. yeres, and left after him two sonnes, Richard, and Robert. The first sonne after two yeres, was slaine by treason of his brother Robert, so that Robert was then Duke, and reigned. ix. yeres: The which Robert was father vnto this Duke William, and begat him of his concubine, called Arlet. And this William was the seventh Duke of Normandy, and ruled it before he conquered England. .xxx. yeres.

And thus it may apere that Emma was Aunte to Duke Robert, father of William Conquerour, and Emma was mother vnto king Edward, and so this duke William and king Edward of England were by the fathers syde colyn Germaines remooued.

A Summarie of the aforesaid Hystorie.

In the former part of this Hystoie it may apere vnto you (that after the opinion of most wyters) Britene did first inhabite this land, and called it then after his awne name Briteyn, in the .2855. yere after the creation of the Worlde, and in the .1108. yere before the birth of our sauour Christ. And the same land of Briteyn was conquered by C. Julius Cesar, and made tributarye to the Romaynes in the fiftie yere before Christes Incarnation, and it so continued. 483. yeres. And the Briteynes reigned without Tribute, and vnder Tribute, from Britene vntill the fourth yere of the reigne of King Cadwalader, which was in the yere of our Lord. 686. And so the Briteynes had continuance of the Gouernement of this land the space of Briteyn first inhabited by Britene.

Conquered by the Romaynes.

Briteynes receiued the fayth of Christ

Conquered and ouercom by the Saxons.

Conquered & ouercome by the Danes.

Conquered & quietly possessed by the Normans.

1794. yeres. And then was the kingdome of Briteyn deuided into seuen kingdomes. And Briteyn receiued the fayth of Christ in the seventh yere of the reigne of King Lucy, which was in the .C. lxxvii. yere after the birth of Christ. And after the Britons, entered the Saxons in the third yere of Aortiger, and in the yere of our Lord. 450. and they gouerned vntill the last yere of king Athelstane, which was in the .938. yere of Christ. And so the tyme of the Saxons first entraunce into this Realme, and the tyme of their Gouernement, was the space of. 487. yeres. But yet in the time of the Gouernement of the Saxons, that is to say, in the .ix. yere of the reigne of King Balthicus, which was in the yere of our Lord 787. The Danes entered into the Realme, and spoyled and persecuted the people therein most greuously: And at the last Sweno, or Swayn the Dane, obteyned the possession and kingdome of this Realme, in the yere of our Lord. 1012. and he reigned thre yeres. And after him reigned Canutus his Sonne. .xix. yeres. And after him Harold his sonne thre yeres. And after him Hardikenitus the sonne of Canutus, who reigned thre yeres, and was the last king of the Danes, for then the Danes were bitterly expelled and dreyuen out of the Realme, which was in the yere of our Lord. 1042. And thus it may apere that the Danes reigned kinges of this Realme the space of. .xxviii. yeres. And it maye also apere, that from the time of the first entery of the Danes into this Realme, vnto their last expulsion, was. .CC. lb. yeres. And finally, the Normans entered this lande, and made a Conquest of this Realme, as before is expressed, in the yere of our Lord. 1067.

Which is siben vnto this present yere of our Lord. 1568. the number of five hundredth yeres.

To the Reader.

NOwe haue we passed the Historie of the Britons, Romaines, Saxons and Danes that reigned ouer this noble Realme, in the which tyme by reason of the continual warres and manifold spoyles and conquestes, from time to time here practised, and long continued, the olde and auncient writers of the said Hystories, and all their worthy and learned monuments were in maner wholly destroyed & defaced, and therefore but by the helpe of Gildas, Gaufride, Bede and a fewe other, the remembraunce of the Gouvernement, and of all the noble actes of this land had like to haue bene buried with vtter obliuion: But nowe, as we are come vnto the time of more rest: so by Gods sufferance shall follow a more large and ample hystory, praiyng most hartely the gentle Reader to beare with my rude stile and lacke of learnyng and knowledge, which if it were as great as my good will is, the same should want no necessarye furniture: But he that performeth and freely offereth that which he hath, is (as you knowe) bound to no more: and thus much after this sort, for this tyme with your fauour, may suffice.

The Historie of king William the Conquerour.

WILLIAM the Conquerour, Duke of Normandie, and bastard sonne of Robert the first Duke of the same Dukedome, and nephew vnto Edward the Confessor late king of England as before is shewed, began his dominion ouer this Realme of England the .xv. day of October, in the yere of our Lord. M. lxxij. and was crowned king of the same at Westminster vpon Christmasse day next folowing of Aldredus Archebishop of Yorke: because at that time Stigandus Archebishop of Cauntorbury, was then absent, and durst not come in the presence of the king, vnto whome the king ought no great fauour, as hereafter shall apere.

Some write that the sayde Duke required the aforesayde Stigand to consecrate him, because the office of consecrating of kings had alwayes apperteyned vnto the Archebishops of Cauntorbury. But forasmuch as he had aspired vnto the crowne by violence and vnlawfull meanes, the sayde Stigand would not be present at his coronation, nor in any wise assent therunto. Some againe say that the Duke refused to be crowned of him, because he was no lawfull Bishop, inasmuch as he receyued his Pall of Benet the tenth who was an vsurper of the Popedome, and not a lawfull Pope as they then tearmed him. And some againe make the cause of his reiection to be the corrupt life of the sayde Stigand. Polidore wyrteth that immediately vpon the ouerthrow of king Harold, duke William marched towards London, where Edwin Erle of middle England, and Marcarus or Marcatius Erle of Northumberland, earnestly myndyng the conseruation of their country, and to defende the libertie thereof, moued the nobilitie and commons to crowne Edgar Atheling, who onely was left aliue of the blood royall of the Realme. Vnto the which sentence although many did accorde, yet there were some of diuerse opinions concernyng this matter: But for all that, at the last they laid all their heades together and aduysed them selues howe and which way they might honestly submit them selues vnto the sayde Duke. But afterwardes, when he was come to the Citie, they made an ende of consultation, and euery man for feare submitted himselfe and receyued him as though they had bene right ioyous of his comming, deliuering him hostages, & praiyng him with all to receyue them to grace, and that they might be at peace with him: To whome the sayde Duke answered againe right curteously, making them many large and fayre promises, and that done, he was by them (although all were not like ioyfull at that solemnitie) crowned king vpon Christmasse day as aforesayde. But I finde written by one Thomas Chorpe Monke of Cauntorbury, among other things by him verie well noted and collected, of the beginning of the gouernance of William the Conquerour this story folowynge.

wyng. After (sayth he) that the sayd Duke William had obteyned the victory, and had slaine king Harolde, and in like maner had taken the Citie of London, streight wayes he directed and bent his iourney towardes the Castell of Douer, to the entent he might conquere that also, with the other parts of Kent. The which beyng perfittely vnderstood: the Archebishop Stigand, and the Abbot Egelsyne, beyng then the chiefe potestates and gouernours of all Kent, vnderstanding all the Kingdome and Realme to be in an euill case, and that where as before the comyng of the sayde William there were no slaues or bondmen, now that all, aswell noble as meane men were brought vnder the perpetuall seruple yoke of the Normanes, by their neighbours daungers, taking an occasion first of their countries safegard & of their abone, gathered together at Cauntozbury the whole people and force of Kent, to whome they declared the daungers hangyng ouer theyr heades, the misery of their neighbors, the insolency of the Normanes, and the hardnesse of seruile condition: And the whole people rather desyryng to ende their haplesse lyfe, then to beare the vncustomed yoke of seruitude, with a comon consent decreed to meete Duke William, & to fight with him for their auncient laboes and libertyes. The afozenamed Stigand the Archebishop, and Egelsyne the Abbot, chosyng rather death in warre, then to see the miseries of theyr Nation, beyng hartened by the examples of the Machabees, were made Capitaynes of the Armie, and at the day apoynted, all the Kentishemen met at Swanescome, beyng hidden in the woodes, and wayted the comyng of the aforesayd Duke William. And because sufficient warinesse, and heed takyng in doubtfull cases doth no harme, they by their former talke were agreed among themselves, that wher the Duke approached nere, all passages beyng shut vp, least any wayes he should escape, that every seuerall person, aswell horsemen as footemen should carre a greene bough in his hand. The next day after, the Duke comyng into the fieldes and territories nere vnto Swanescome, and seeyng all the country ready set to hedge him in, and marking also a moueable wood with modcrate pace drawing nere toward him, not without astonishment of his mynde, much maruayled at it. And assoone as the Captaynes of the Kentishemen espied Duke William enclosed in the middest of their armie, they caused their Trumpets to be sounded, and their Banners to be displayed, and theyr downe their Boughes, and with their Bowes beyng bent, and their swordes drawn, and with their speares and other kinde of Armour, beyng set in a readinesse, theyr selves ready to fight it out. At the which sight Duke William with his adherentes & complices, not without cause were much amased. And he that a little before persuaded himselfe to haue helde all England in his fist, now doubted much of his abone lyfe. The Archebishop Stigand therefore, and the Abbot Egelsyne were incontiently sent forth to Duke William on the part and behalfe of the Kentishmen, who did their message vnto him after this sort. Sir Duke beholde here the people and inhabitants of Kent commeth forth to meete thee, and to receyue thee as their liege Lorde and gouernour, requiryng peace at thy handes vnder this condicion, that all they and theyr posteritie may quietly and peaceably enioy their auncient libertyes, and that they may vse still their olde and accustomed laboes, otherwise they are nowe in a readinesse presentlye to bid thee battayle, beyng readyer here altogether to leaue leau their lyues, then to depart from their auncient laboes and customes, or to submit themselves vnto slauih seruitude, which they haue not yet bene acquainted with. The Duke perceyuing himselfe to be entrapped, and in a streight, debating a while this matter with his wife Cayteynes, noting also wisely that if he should susteine a repulse or any hinderance at these peoples handes, which were accounted the key of England, that then all the bottom of threde which he a little before had sponne, were vntwisted, and that all his hope and securitie were turned into daunger, did not so willingly as wisely graunt all that which the Kentishmen demaunded of him, and sure pledges therevpon geuen from eyther parte to other. And then the ioyfull Kentishmen did conduct the gladded Normanes, and yelded to them the Countie of Kent and noble Castell of Douer, and so the auncient liberties of Englishe men, and their Countries, laboes, and customes, which before the comyng of William Duke of Normandy, were equally held through the whole realm of England, now was onely in the Countie of Kent, and that by the industry of Stigand Archebishop, and Egelsyne the Abbot of the Monastery of S. Austyns in Cauntozbury as aforesayd, and is vnto this day inuolably obserued and kept, namely that tenure which at this day is called Gauell kynde. Thus farre William Thorne.

Stigand Archebishop of Cantozbury preserued the liberties of Kent.

Wise and very good policie.

Wolde and wise messenger.

The names of the Gentlemen that came out of Normandy with William Duke of that prouynce when he conquered this noble Realme of England.

The which I haue taken out of an auncient recorde that I had of Payster Clarenclus King at armes.

Nowe when as king William had possessed the imperiall Crowne and Diademe of this Realme of England as aforesayde: He then as a conquerour altered and chaunged the whole state and gouernement thereof. And first by displaing of such as before had borne rule, he aduanced the Lordes and people of his awne Nation vnto the highe and principall offices and dignities thereof, insomuch that Reynulph sayth, that there was skant left in England a Lorde that was an English man, and that then it was a shame to be called an English man. Polli. 7. Cap. 4. And after he caused a Proclamation to be made, that all former grauntes, liberties, and priuileges geuen or graunted by any Prince or King of this Realme afozetyne, should be from thence forth vtterly boyde to all constructions and purposes, except suche as should be renued and confirmed by him, by reason whereof, all degrees of people in the Realme, namely all fraternities, corporations, and bodie's politique, were forced to become newe suters to him, and compelled to make newe fines at his will and pleasure: And by this meanes he gathered into his possession the greatest part of all the ryches and treasure of the lande, as well of the Clergie, as of the Laytie. That done, he chaunged the lawes of the Realme, and made such newe lawes as were profitable to himselfe, and grieuous to the people, and he caused those lawes to be set forth in the Norman language to aduance his awne tongue as a woorthy and famous spech, and condemning ours as vile & barbarous: The which lawes are yet wyth vs in the same tongue.

While king William was thus occupied as abouesayde, it so chaunced that the people of Normandie began to quarrell among them selues, and there was such parttakyng among them, that if it had not beene looked vnto in tyme, it had lyke to haue turned to the destruction and confusion of the whole Duchy. Wherefore king William for the pacifyng therof was forced to gather an armie, and to leaue England for a while, and sayle into Normandie. And at his departure out of Englande, when he had set thinges in good order to his minde, he betooke the gouernement of the Realme to hys brother on the mothers syde named Odo, Bishop of Bayon, and in the Lent next folowynge he sayled into Normandie, & led with him the chiefe Lordes & rulers of England, for feare they should haue made any commocion or sturre in the tyme of his absence, with all those also that lay for hostages and pledges. Among the which number, were the Erles Marcarus, or Morcatus, and Edwyn aforesayde, Dukes of Northumberland, and Mertia, and also Stigandus Archebishop of Cauntozbury, and Edgar Ethelyng. To the which Stigandus, king William shewed great reuerence and countenance of much loue, and hartie fauour, but all proued great dissimulation, as after appered appeared by his depoyng, and emprisoning at Winchester a long tyme. And beyng arriued in Normandy, he passed through the countrie triumphantly, and like a conquerour. But Polidore sayth that the cause of his goyng thither was, that for as much as he sawe how that from thenceforth he should be altogether occupied about the affayres of this Realme, and setting of orders in the same, he would first set such a stay in his Duchy of Normandie, that nothing might lightly happen afterwarde, by reason whereof he should be compelled to make his repayre thither againe.

The next yere when king William had sped his businesse in the sayde Countrie, he returned into England with great pompe, and shortly after set a fore taxe vpon the Englishe men, yea, so grieuous was he vnto them, that he neuer ceased to burthen them with newe taxes and impositions. Of the nobles he made so little accompt, that he seemed thereby howe he minded nothing else but their vtter destruction. By reason whereof in some partes of the land was there rebellion against him, namely in Deuonshire, & in Northumberland, but at the last he compelled them by force to obedience, and delt very cruelly with them. Many both of the Nobilitie and Commons he depriued as well of goodes as of aucthoritie and rule, and conferred the same vnto the Normanes and that for very small and light causes.

For these, and for other sterne and cruell deedes done by hym, the sayde Nobles were sore moued against him. And for that cause many of them fled the lande, some into Norway, and some into Denmarke, and some into one Countrie, and some into another. Marcarus, or Marcatus, Erle of Northumberland, and Edwyn Erle of middle England, with Edgar Athelyng, and dyuerse other, as Edgars mother, and his two sisters Margaret, and Christian fled into Scotland. But another Chronicle (sayth Iacobus) wytteth that Edgar entending with Agatha his mother and his two sisters to haue sayled into high Almayne or Hungary where he was borne, was by tempest of the Sea, dyuen into Scotland: where of Malcolyne or Malcolme then the thirde Scottishe king of that name, they were ioyously receyued. And in proesse of tyme, the sayde Malcolyne cast such loue vnto the said Margaret, that he tooke her to wife, as before is touched in the story of Canutus. Of the which Margaret the sayde Malcolyne receyued two daughters, and six sonnes, whereof three, that is to say, Edgar, Alexander, and David, were kinges of Scotland one after an other next after their father. And Holde one of the sayde daughters, was afterwarde married vnto Henry the first of that name king of England, and the other daughter Mary was married to Eustace Erle of Bologne. Of Holde the first daughter, king Henry receyued two sonnes, named William, and Richard, the which both dyed before their father, as after shall apere. And he receyued also two daughters named Holde and Mary, which Holde or Malwde was married to Henry the fourth of that name, Emperour of Almaine. After whose death she was againe married to Geoffrey Plantagenet Erle of Aungeow. Of whom descended Henry surnamed Shortmantell, afterwarde king of England by the name of Henry the second. And the other daughter Mary, was married to the Erle of Bloys, of whome descended Malwde, or Mary that was wife vnto king Stephen.

men as is before sayde, and espied their going thither, and also when he considered howe his Lordes were departed, he then had a neerer eye to the Lordes that remained, and kept them a little strayer: But it was not long after, but that Marcarus was reconciled to the king, and yet after fayled and forsoke him againe. For this & other causes, king William highly aduanced himselfe and his people with the possessions of this Realme, insomuch as they were greatly enriched, and the Englishe men in maner vtterly decayed. Then caused he foure Castles to be made, whereof two were set at Porke, the thirde at Nottingham, and the fourth at Lyncolne, and manned them all with Normanes, or as Polidore sayth one at Nottingham, an other at Lyncolne, the thirde at Porke, and the fourth at Hasting where he first landed. And this did he because that these foresayde places which were very commodius for the enemies, beyng thus manned and fortified might make all men asfearde, & to beware how they went about to disturbe the state of the realme by any newe deuided treason. And to make the people more quiet, and lesse able to rebell, he caused all their weapons and armor to be taken from them, and ordeyned also that euery housekeeper should be within his awne doores by eight of the clocke at night, and then to couer or rake by his fyre, and go to bed. And because they should not passe that houre, he caused a Bell to be rung in euery towne and billage iust at viij. of the clocke, the which is vsed in most countreies of England yet at this day, and is called in the Norman language, Couer le fue, which we now corruptly call Curfew.

About the thirde yere of his reigne: Harolde, and Canutus sonnes of Swanus king of Denmarke, came and sayled into the North part of Humber with a strong nauie of two hundred sayle and more, and in all haste drew them towardes Porke. Whether Edgar Athelyng came vnto them bringyng with him such Englishe men as had before fled into Scotland, by whom his power was encreased. Then the Normanes which had the rule of the towne and Castelles aforesayde, fearing that the Englishe men would ayde the Danes; and with the houses of the Suburbes of the towne, haue filled the towne ditches, set the Suburbes a fyre: whereof the flame was so big, and with the winde so strong, that it tooke into the Citie, and brent a parte thereof with the Minster of Saint Peter. In tyme of which fyre the Danes by fauour of some of the Citizens entred the Citie, Eabian. and slue more than thre thousande of the Normanes.

But Polidore reporteth the matter touching this inuasion of the Danes farre otherwise as followeth: Whiles these thinges were done in England, the Englishe Lordes that were fled into Denmarke, ceased not to moue Canutus the fourth then king of that Countrie, to warre vpon the Normanes, and to inuent newe causes whereby they might the soner incense him therevnto, sayng how the crowne of England ought of right to apperteyne vnto the kinges of Denmarke, as vnto them vnto whome the possession thereof had beene in tymes past no lesse profitable than honourable: and for that cause it should not stande with his honour, to suffer the same to be vniustly possessed of a newe Lorde that had no right or iust title therevnto, specially sith the time selfe serued so well for the purpose, in the which the Norman was so farre as yet from benefiting eyther the Englishe Nation, or such as bordred on them, that he nowe played the open tyraunt, and was hated of them them all: And sayde further, that forsomuche as there was so great hope of victorie and successe, specially if he would preuent his enemye, and take suche holdes and places as were very fit for his purpose, it behoued him not to stay or sleepe the matter. This done; Canutus beyng much moued with these and such lyke perswasions, determined with himselfe to make warre against the Normanes. And it foloweth in the same booke: I am not ignorant howe it is reported in the Englishe Chronicle, that this warre against the Normanes was not made of Canutus, but of his brother Harold by his perswasion: The which thing Saxo Grammaticus a booke of the Danish History doth not affirme, neyther is it likely to be true, because Harold was a quiet man of nature, and one that much desyred to eschewe the trouayles of Martiall affayres and lyued not scarcely two yeres after he was made king, so that out of doubt it is, that he neuer durst be the authour of so great a warfare, neyther had he tyme or leysure thereunto. Hetherto Holidore. But to returne to the matter. It was not long after, but king William ouerthrewe them in battaile, and chased them to their shippes, and tooke so great displeasure with the inhabitantz of that Province for reuolting to Canutus, that he destroyed the land lying betweene Yorke and Durham in such wise, that ix. yeres after it lay vnlaboured and vntilled, except the land of Saint Johns of Beverley onely.

Yorke & the countrey round about vtterly destroyed.

Famyn.

And of the famyn that the people of that Countrey sustayned after ward, great wonders are reported: For it is written that they were for necessitie compelled to eate all kinde of Vermine, as Cattes, Rattes, Dogges, and such lyke, so harde and streit they were kept by the warre of the king. And in that yere also Holde, or Hadode the wife of king William was crowned Queene of England, of Aldredus Archbishop of Yorke, and was also deliuered of a fayre sonne named Henry, who was afterwarde king of England and called Henry the first of that name.

In the fourth yere of the reigne of this king, the Scottes with Malcolme, or Malcolme their king entered Northumberland, and wasted and destroyed soze that Countrey, and slue therein much people, and many they toke prisoners, and helde them as bonde men.

The building of the newe Forest.

After this, king William (whose greedy and couetous appetite and desyre of treasure beyng not yet quenched with the former great taskes or payments set vpon the peopie of this Realme) did by counsaile proccede further to enquire and search of all the Abbeyes in England, to vnderstand what riches was in them, & after an Inuentary taken thereof, caused the same to be brought into his treasure. And the same yere he caused the newe Forest to be made in the Countrey of Southamton, for the finishing whereof he was enforced to pull downe diuerse towones and Churches. xxx. myles of length, and stozed the same with wilde beastes, and then made sharpe lawes for the maintenance and encrease of them, as the losse of eyen, and other lymmes.

Stigand Archbishop deposed.

And soone after there was a sinode or counsaile holden at Winchester of the Clergie of England. At the which counsaile were present two Cardinales, sent from the second Alexander then Bishop of Rome. In this counsaile, Stigandus Archbishop of Cantorbury aforesayd, was deposed from his dignitie, and that for three causes, as Fabian sayth. First for that he had holden wrongfully that Bishoprike, while Robert the Archebishop was liuyng uyng. The second, because he receyued the Pall of Benet the .x. Bishop of Rome, who was compted an usurper of the Papacie. The thirde, for that he occupied the sayde Pall, without the auctoritie of the Court of Rome. Holidore addeth a fourth cause, which was for that contrary vnto the Canons, he helde the Bishoprike of Winchester with the See of Cantorbury.

Stigandus Archbishop of Cantorbury.

And when Stigandus saue himselfe brought into this thraldome, he then thought good to proue what the king who had before in the tyme of his prosperitie pretended so much friendship and good will towardes him, would do for him in this case. But where before he made him a louyng and friendly countenance, and did vnto him great reuerence, then he chaunged all his mildenesse into stoutnesse, and excused himselfe by the Bishop of Romes auctoritie, so that in the ende Stigandus was deposed of his dignitie, and afterwarde committed to perpetuall prison in Winchester, where he dyed shortly after his sayd deposition.

Distinction.

It was reported of this Stigandus, that he was so couetous and sparing, that he would spende nothing moze than he needes must, and vsed to sweare by All halowes, that he had not one pennie to blesse himselfe withall: But that othe was not found true, for after his death, there was found a little key about his necke, by reason whereof there was founde great treasure vnder the earth in mo places than one, as sayth Fabian.

Bishopps deposed.

In this counsaile also were put downe diuerse other Bishopps, Abbots, and Priours, by the meanes of king William, and all to the extent that he might preferre Normanes to the rule of the Church, as he had preferred his knightes to the rule of the Temporaltie, and by that meane stand in the moze suretie of his estate, and bring riches and treasure to his possession.

Wolstane bishop of Worcester.

In this counsaile also, Wolstane that then was Bishop of Worcester, was an earnest suter vnto the king for certeyne possessions fallen into his handes by the death of Aldredus last Archbishop of Yorke, which were withhelden from his See by the sayd Aldredus. But the king would not seme to vnderstand his sute, for hurting the Church of Yorke. Fabian.

Lanfranke.

And shortly after the king gaue that Archebishoprike vnto Thomas a Chanon of Bayon, who was the first that buylded the Synster of Yorke, and sent for Lanfranke then Abbot of Cane, and gaue vnto him the Archebishoprike of Cantorbury. This Lanfranke was an Italian borne, and a very good deuine, and right expert withall in the gouernement both of Spirituall and Temporall thinges. And soone after that he was made Archebishop of Cantorbury, Thomas that before was chosen Archbishop of Yorke came vnto him to be sacced of him as the auncient vsage and custome was. Of whom Lanfranke required an othe, and required his profession in writing concerning his obedience vnto the See of Cantorbury. Thomas answered and sayde, that he would neuer do that, except he might therof here sufficient auctoritie and skilfull reasons, by the which it might apere that he should so do without any empchement or preiudice of his Church of Yorke.

Then the King calling Lanfranke before him sayde, that the sayd Lanfranke trusted moze in his cunning, than he did in good fayth or reason: But he answered so reasonably vnto the king, that in the ende, Thomas by the Kinges commaundement was faine to come againe to Lanfranke to be sacced, and wrote his profession with his awne hand, of his obedience, and read it, in the which was conteyned, that he shoulde be obedient in all that belongeth to the worship of God and all Christian faith, which done he was sacred, and so departed. And shortly after Lanfranke required the like othe and profession of all the Bishops of England.

Lanfranke.

The primas eye of Cauntorbury.

In the fift yere of this Kinges reigne, Edwyn and Marcarus of Mercatus, Erles of Mercia and Northumberland, beyng in feare and daunger of their liues, boyded the kinges Court secretly, and rebelled for a little time: But at length it turned to both their harmes. For Edwyn was slaine as he went toward Scotland, or as some write in Scotland of his alone company, and Erle Marcarus, with the Bishop of Duresme named Egelwinus, tooke the Isle of Ely for their sauegard. But the king helde them so short, that in processe of tyme they were faine to yelde and submit themselves to the kings grace and mercie. Then he sent the Bishop to the Abbey of Abingdon, to be kept there as prisoner, where he was so daintily fed, that at the length he dyed for hunger. But some writers report, that he was so high hearted and loftie of courage, that after he knewe that he should remaine there as prisoner, he would neuer eate meate more, and Erle Marcarus was had to the Tower of London. But Polidore sayth he scaped out of the Isle in a ship, and fled into Scotland, which was the cause why the king warred anon after vpon the Scots. For in the sixt yere of his reigne, he went with a great armie against them, and subdued Malcolme their king, and compelled him to do him both homage and fealtie. He also disherited Gospatrik Erle of Comberland, and exiled him the land, and gaue all Comberland with the honour of Carlisle to Raufe Meschynes, and made him Erle thereof. Also aboute this tyme, king William made the newe Forrest in the Countie of Southhanton: And for the enlarging of the same, he ouerthrowe Townes and Churches a great number by the space of. xxx. myles, and replenished the same with Deere, and then made sharpe lawes for the encrease and maintenance thereof.

In the seventh yere of king William, Thomas Archebishop of Yorke, not beyng content to be vnder the rule and obedience of Lanfranke Archebishop of Cauntorbury, appealed to the Court of Rome, so that the sayde two Archebishops apere both in proper person before Alexander Bishop of Rome. In whose presence Lanfranke, was so well fauoured, that where Thomas aboute named, and Remigius Bishop of Dorchester, were for iust causes deprived of their Croyses and Ringes, he by his fauour and meanes (as sayth Fabian) restored them to their former dignitie. The cause of Thomas his deprivation was, for that he had holpen Duke William towarde his iourney into England: for the which the said Duke promised him a Bishoprick if hee obtained victory. And the other was deprived for that he was proued a Priests sonne.

Then Thomas moued the cause of the Primacie of Cauntorburie, and of the subiection that to him should belong, and sayde that these two Sees were satre asonder, that is to say, Cauntorbury and Yorke, and that neyther of them by the constitution of Gregorie shoulde be subiect vnto another, but that the one is more worthie than the other, forsomuche as hee is of elder tyme. To this answered Lanfranke and sayde that the constitutions of Gregorie made no mencion of Cauntorbury, but of Yorke and London. Then the

the Bishop of Rome remitted this matter to be determined before the king, and the Bishops of England, and he gaue the Pall to Lanfranke.

But because this worde or terme Pall is to many vnknownen, I will therefore here shew vnto you what thing it is. This Pall is an indowment that euery Archbishop must haue, and he is not in full aucthoritie of an Archbishop (by the Bishop of Romes ordinance) vntill he haue receiued the Pall, and it is a thing of white Sylke, the bredth of a Stole that the Priest was wont to weare at his masse, but it is of another fashion. And that ye may the better knowe it, if ye looke vpon the armes of any Archebishop, there ye shall see it set out in white with a great many of blacke crosses vpon it.

Nowe when Lanfranke had thus finished his businesse at Rome, he with the other two Bishops returned into England, where this matter hangyng in variaunce betweene the sayde two Archebishops was had in communication. For triall whereof Bedes History was brought forth: wherein it appered, that from the first Augustines time, to Bedes last dayes, which was. C. xxxij. yeres, the Archbishop of Cauntorbury had the Primacie of all the Bishops in England. Fabian.

When Thomas had heard all these allegations, he denyed all, and laid for him the Epistle, in the which Gregorie Bishop of Rome demed that the Church of Yorke, and of London should be euen Peeres, and neyther of them subiect to the other.

The contention betwene the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and the Archebishop of Yorke, which of the should be chiefe.

To this was answered by Lanfranke, that he was not Bishop of London, nor this question was not moued for the Church of London. But Thomas sayde that Gregorie had graunted to Augustyne power to haue vnder him all the Bishops of Englande, and that London at that day was the principall See of all England. Albeit that the Bishop of Romes minde was that betwene London and Yorke should be no diuersitie of honour, because they beyng Archebishops might lyue in an vnite to the good example of all other. And though Augustyne chaunged the See from London to Cauntorbury, yet Gregorie would not that Augustynes successors should be aboute the Bishops of Yorke. For he woulde haue then set in his Epistle these wordes folowynge: I graunt to thee Augustyne and to thy successors: But for that he would there should no such power stretch to his successors, therefore he made no mencion of them.

Lanfranke, to this answered and said: If that aucthority were graunted to Augustine alone, and not to his successors, it was a simple gift that the Bishop of Rome gaue to Augustine that was so familer with him, & namely while Augustyne sacred no Bishop of Yorke while he lyued. For the See was full during his life, by reason whereof he put not his aucthoritie in execution. But priuileges of Bishops of Rome confirmeth this dignitie to Augustines successors of Cauntorbury, and demeth that it is skill and good reason, that all the churches of England shoulde take light and knowledge at that place.

By these reasons and other, Thomas was at length overcome, & graunted gladly that the farther brinke of Humber should be the beginning of his Diocesse. And furthermore it was there demed, that in all thinges concerning the worship of God and the fayth of holy Church, the Archebishop of Yorke should be subiect to the Archebishop of Cauntorbury: So that if the

And at all feafons when the Archebifhop of Cauntorbury fhould be facred, the Archebifhop of Yorke with the Bifhops of his Province fhould come to Cauntorbury and confecrate him there. And if the Archebifhop of Yorke fhould be ftalled or facred, then fhall he come to Cauntorbury, or elfe where in Englande, where the Archebifhop of Cauntorbury fhall affigne him, and there to be facred of him, and he fhall make to him an othe, with profeflion of obedience.

When the king had heard theſe tidyngeſ, he made good ſemblance vnto the Duke Walreſe, and ſped him the faſter into England: But howſoener it came to paſſe, the two ſayde Erles were warned of the diſcloſynge of thys matter, in ſuch wiſe as they gathered to them ſuch ſtrength that y king could not haue them at his pleaſure, but as he was ſayne by ſtrong hande to chace and outlawe them. And for that he ſayled of his purpoſe of them, he imprifoned Duke Walreſe at Wincheſter, and laſtly caufed him to be behedded, more of tyranny than of iuſtice.

In the .xij. yere of his reigne was holden a great counſayle or Synode of the Clergie of the land in S. Pauls Church of London, where amongeſt many thinges ordeyned for the rule of the Church of England, diuerſe Biſhops Sees were tranſlated from one place to another, as Selwy, to Chicheſter, Kynton to Exeter, Welles to Bathe, Shereborne to Sarisburie, Dorcheſter to Lyncolne, and the See of Lichefield to Cheſter, which thinges thus ordered with many othe. In the .xv. yere of his reigne, Robert the eldeſt ſonne of king William the conquerour, becauſe he might not haue the Duchy of Normandy, which his father had ſometime aſſigned & geuen vnto him, and after for his wilde- neſſe did reſume it againe: He with the ayde and fauour of the french king Philip, & Lewes his ſonne, toke prayes in that Duchy, and put his father to much trouble. In ſo much that at length the father & the ſonne met in plaine fieldes with two great hoſtes, and eyther with other fought a cruell Battail.

rebelled a-
father.

It is read that during this battaile, king William was throwne from his horſe, and in great ieopardie of his lyfe. Whereof his ſonne Robert beyng ware, was ſo moued with pittie that he reſcued his father, and deliuered him free from all the daunger of his enemies. But howe ſoouer it fortunied with the king: The truth is, that many of his men were ſlaine, and his ſeconde ſonne William Rufus ſore hurt, ſo that in the ende king William was faine to reſume the fieldes, and gat at that tyme none aduantage of his ſayde ſonne. For the which dede and rebellion thus made by the ſonne, the father accuſed him after the opinion of ſome wryters.

While king William was thus occupied in Normandy, the Northumbers rebelled, and ſlue in their rage Walter the Biſhop of Durham, but the cauſe is not expreſſed, whoſe death Odo Biſhop of Baion ſhortly after reuenged. After the aforeſayde battaile in Normandy, king William returned into Englande, bringyng with him the ſayde Robert his ſonne, whome he incontinent vpon his returne ſent with an armye againſt Malcolme king of Scottes, for that contrary to the league betwixt them, he had made in hys abſence diuerſe roades into the borders of England. But when Robert vnderſtood that the ſayd Malcolme was retired into Scotland, he ceaſed to purſue him any further, and therefore retyred he vnto the water of Tyne, where he lay in campe a ſeaſon, and there builded a forte, where as at thys day ſtandeth newe Caſtell vpon Tyne: But the towne and wall was builded afterwardeſ by king John, who gaue many great priuileges and liberties vnto the ſame, which was before but a ſmall fiſher towne without walles named Pandon.

In the .xviij. yere of king William, there fell an vnhappy ſtriſe betwene Thurſton Abbot of Glaſcenbury a Norman, and his Monkes, the cauſe whereof (in part ſayth Fabian) was, that the Abbot deſpiſed and would haue ſet apart ſuch ſong and offices as by Gregorie Biſhop of Rome & Auguſtine his diſciſple, of olde tyme was to them aſſigned, and would haue compelled them to haue folowed the ble of William of ſeſtampe. And beſyde that, this Thurſtone waſted and inordinatly ſpent the goodes of that place, in lechery, and by other inſolent meanes, and withdrewe from the Monkes, their olde and accuſtomed diet. For the which cauſes, firſt began great wordes wyth chydynge, and after ſtrokes and fightes, ſo that the Abbot gate vnto him armed men, and fell vpon the monkes, and ſlue two of them at the high altare, and wounded .xviij. of them, and the Monkes with formes and Candleſticks deſeded themſelues in ſuch wiſe, that they hurt many of y armed men.

A knightes
fee in land.

In the .xix. yere of his reigne, king William rayled a newe maner of Care: for he caused to be gathered through England of euery hyde of land .viij. shillings. An hide of lande conteyneth five Pardes, and euery Pard conteyneth foure Acres, and so an hide of land conteyneth .xx. Acres, an Acre conteyneth .xl. perches of length, and foure in bredth, and foure Acres make a Parde, and five Pardes make an Hide, and .viij. Hides make a knightes fee. By the which reason a knightes fee should conteyne .C. lx. Acres, and that is accompted for a plough land for a yere.

And not long after he caused to be searched howe much lande eche of hys Barons helde, howe many knightes fees, howe many towne, and what number of men and of beastes were within this land: whereof he commaunded a booke to be made, which also was done, and that afterward turned this land to sundry griefes and plagues, as after shall apere.

In the .xx. yere of his reigne, Canutus king of Denmarke, with the helpe of the Fleminges came with a great armie toward England: But by the prouision of the king, they were so feared, that they wer let of that iozney.

Coventrie.

Then king William gaue to thre of his Chapleynes thre Bishoppikes. To Nozice he gaue London, to William he gaue Chetford, and to Robert he gaue Chester, which Robert was after remoued to Couentrie. Of this Robert reporteth Reynulph that he scraped from one Beame of his Church in Couentrie five hundzeth marke, to fill the hande of king William. For Leofricus that was Duke of Mertia in the time of Edward the Confessor, had adourned that Church, with great riches of Golde, Siluer & Jewelles.

In this yere Edgar Atheling, which was reconciled to the kinges fauour, by licence of the king, sayled into Apulia.

brent.

Now began the aforesayde plagues to spring: for great mozevne fell vpon brute beastes, and brenning feuers among the people, and also great hunger and barenesse of the earth. Also in this yere great hurt was done in many places of the land by fyre, and specially in the City of London, where vpon the sixt day of July the Church of Saint Paule in London was bzent, and all that was therein, as in a table hangyng on the North syde of the Quyere may apere. And it was in the tyme that Nozice was Bishop of London. And lykewyse was bzent a great part of the Citie of London at the same tyme.

At this tyme king William beyng in Normandy prepared for warre against the French king: But shortly after he fell sicke, and kept his Chamber at Roan a long tyme, wherefoze Philip the French king beyng merely disposed, sayde that William lay in Childebed, and nozished his fat belly. The which wordes when they came to king Williams eares, he was much amoued therewith, and sayd, when I am churched I wyll offer vnto him a thousand Candelles light, with the which he shall holde himselfe finally contented. The which promise, he after performed. For in the moneth of July folowing, when corne, fruite, & grapes were most flourishyng, he entered into Fraunce with a great armie, and set on fyre many Cities and towne on the west syde of Fraunce, and at the last came vnto the Citie of Meaur, and fyred it, and bzent brent a great part thereof, with the Church of our Lady, wherein he bzent a woman beyng closed in the Wall of the sayde Church, as a recluse.

In this heate, or as some say by the leaping of a horse, king William tooke such a disease and sicknesse, that it was shortly after the cause of hys death. And when he felt himselfe thus grieued, he called his sonnes befoze him, and exhorted them in his best and most louyng maner, that they should charitably loue and fauour eyther other of them, and to holde together as louyng brethren, and so afterward made his testament and last will.

He had five children, Robert the eldest, to whome he gaue the Dukedome of Normandy, Richard, the second, who died in his youth, William Rufus the thirde, to whome he gaue the kingdome of England, and Henry the fourth that also succeeded him in the same kingdome. And one daughter named Adela, who he gaue in mariage to Stephen Erle of Bloys or Bonony, who got on hir Stephen that after was king of England. But other write that king Henry the first maryed Adolde the daughter of Margaret Quene of Scottes, and by her had issue two daughters, named Adolde, and Mary. And Adolde was first maryed to Henry the Emperoz, and after to Geoffrey Plantagenet, by whome she had issue king Henry the second. And Mary was maryed to Custace Erle of Bloys, by whome she had issue king Stephen. So that king Henry the seconde came of the elder sister, and Stephen of the yonger sister. The which Adolde and Mary were the daughters of Margaret the wyfe of Malcolyne, or Malcolme king of Scottes, which was sister to Edgar Atheling, and of Edward the outlawe, which was the sonne of Edmond Ironsyde.

dren, & what came of them.

After that king William had aduertised his sonnes as aforesayd, and had made his last will and Testament, he then deliuered out of Prison his abone brother the Bishop of Bayon, Harcarus Erle of Northumberland, Wilnotus the sonne of Harold, or as some do write he was the sonne of Goodwyn, which was sent to William by Edward the Confessor to remain for a pledge for his sayd father Goodwyn. And shortly after these thinges with other were done, he dyed the .viij. day of September, when he had reigned king of England. .xx. yeres, .x. Monethes, and .xxviij. dayes, and in the .liij. yere of his Duchye, and the .liij. yere of his lyfe, or as Polidore wyrteth. lxxiiij. and in the yere of our Lorde. 1087.

After his death, men spake of him as they do of other Princes, and said that he was wise and guileful, riche and couetous, and loued well to be magnified and prayled, a fayze speaker, and a deepe dissembler, a man of goodly stature, but something fatte in the belly, sterne in countenance, & strong in armes, and therewith couragious and bolde, and had greate pleasure in hunting and making of great feastes. But he passed all other in leuiyng of Taskes, which condicion his subiectes construed thre maner of wayes, and sayde, that eyther it was to excell all other in ryches, or else to withstand and defend his enmyes, or to stauche the appetyte of his couetous mynde. He builded two Abbeyes in England, one at Battill in Suffex, where he wan the fiede against Harold, the which was called vntill the suppression thereof the Abbey of Battaille. And the other he set in Southwarke besyde London, vpon the Southsyde of Thames, and named it Warmondsey. And he builded also one in Cane in Normandie where he was buried, and dedicated the same

And when all ceremonies apperteyning vnto the funerall were finished and done, and that he should now be layd in his tombe, there suddenly stepped forth one that resisted and would not suffer him to be buried in that place, saying with a lowde voyce, how that the ground where they purposed to bury him, was percell of his auncient inheritance, which the Duke in his lyfe tyme had wrongfully taken from him perforce, and against his will for the buylding of that Abbey, and had neuer made him any recompence or amendes for the same, and therfore would not to die for it assent ne suffer that he should there be buried, onelesse he were first recompenced and agreed with accordingly, whereupon they were faine to see him recompenced before he could be entered, so that maruell it was that so great and noble a conquerour as he was when he was aliue, could not after his death attayne somuch ground as might receyue and couer his poore Carcas, without great adoo and businesse.

The sayde king had to Issue (sayth Holidore) by Matilde his wife, Robert vnto whome he bequethed the Dukedome of Normandy: Richard, who dyed very yong: William Rufus, and Henry which were afterwarde kings of England one after another. Of this Henry he propheryed before (as the same went) that he should rule both England and Normandy together after his brethren, vnto whome he gaue by testament a great part of his treasure. He had also five daughters, that is to wete, Cicill which was made a Nonne, Constance whome Alley Duke of hether Briteyne married, and Adela the wyfe of Stephen Erle of Bloys, mother to king Stephen, who reigned after the sayde king Henry: The names of the other two are not remembred of writers, which dyed ere they were marriageable, one of the which as is before mencioned should haue bene the wife of Harolde, if fortune had not bene against it.

It is also reported that when this king lay at the poynt of death, and should now depart the world, he much repented him of the cruell handelyng of the English men, specially because he had bene by them so much increased as well in honour as Empire.

And although this king helde Englishmen in great subiection, and as is aforesayd suffered almost no English man to gouerne or rule within the Realme: Yet it should appere he somedeale fauoured the Citie of London, for at the speciall sute and request of the right reuerend father in God William then Bishop of London, the sayde Conquerour in the first yere of his reigne graunted vnto the Citizens of London their first Charter and liberties, in as large forme as they enioyed the same in the tyme of Saint Edward the confessor that reigned before the Conquest. And the Citizens to shewe themselves thankfull vnto the sayde Bishop for his great loue and fauour, did not onely accompt him as a deere and speciall friend vnto them so long as he liued, but also after his death and buriall, beyng entered in the middle Isle of the West ende of Paules Church, they fixed on his graue stone this Epitaph folowynge.

William Rufus, or William the Red, the thirde sonne of William the Conquerour, began to reigne ouer this realme next after his father, the .ix. of September, in the yere of our Lorde. M. lxxxvij. Who being in Normandy at hys fathers death, departed thence before his funerall obsequy was finished and done, and in all haste addressed him into England, where he was sooner arriued than he was looked for, and being come into the Realme, he by and by made Lanfranke then Archebishop of Cauntorbury (in whose friendship and faythfulnesse he had reposed no small trust and confidence) priuie to all his counsaile, praiung him withall to put to his helping hand, that he might be crowned king as shortly as might be, according to his fathers Will and Testament: The which was at the last brought to passe by the importune labour and sute of the sayde Lanfranke, who for his learning was highly esteemed, aswell with the Nobilitie as also of the Commons of the Realme, but yet not without much ado: For a great many bare better good will vnto his brother Robert than vnto him, because he was of a more mylde and gentle nature, and besyde that he was the elder brother, and therefore ought by lawe and conscience to haue bene preferred: But yet the matter was so wrought by the wisdom of Lanfranke, promysing all thinges in his name, that might by any meanes purchase him credite or fauour with the people, that all in maner assented vnto his coronation, and so was he by him the sayde Lanfranke, with the assistance of diuerse other Bishoppes, whose names are all rehered by Mathewe of Westminster annoynted and crowned king at Westminster, the first day of October, the yere of our Lorde abouesayd.

Reynulph Monke of Chester that wrote Polichronicon sayth, that Robert Curthose eldest sonne of William the Conquerour, was at the tyme of hys fathers death in Allmaine, gathering of a great host against his father. And afterward heering that he was dead, and that he had preferred his younger brother to the kingdome of England, was therefore greatly amoued, inso-much that he layde halfe his Dukedome to pledge vnto his brother Henry to mainteyne warre agaynst king William. The which thing done, he gathered a great army, and shortly after landed at Hamton.

When William Rufus had vnderstanding thereof, he in all hast sent vnto him messengers, to whome he gaue in commission to say as foloweth. Thy brother William prayeth thee to take no grieffe with that he hath done, for he calleth himselfe not king, but as vnder king to reigne vnder thee, and by helpe of thee that art greater than he, and his elder brother. And if thou consider it well, he hath nothing misused himselfe against thee, for he hath taken vpon him the gouernement of this Realme for a tyme because of thyne absence. But for that he is now in aucthority and crowned by thy sufferance, he

he prayeth that vnder thee he maye so continue, payng to thee yerely three thousand Markes, with condicion y who soeuer ouerliueth other, may enioy the kingdome. When Robert had heard this messlage vnto the ende, he wagged his head, as he that conceyued some doublenesse in this report. But for that he was liberall, and allowed moze honour than he did his profite, as in other things folowing of his deedes it shall apere, therefore he lightly assented to all that was desired, and returned shortly after into Normandy with pleasant wordes and many fayre promises without profite.

Odo bishop of Bayon brother to king William conquerour

The Lordes conspired against king William Rufus.

Rebellion.

This yere in the beginning of Sommer, Odo Bishop of Bayon, which as before ye haue heard was deliuered out of Prison by William Conquerour, came into England, whom the king ioyfully receyued, and gaue vnto him shortly after the Erledome of Kent. But he tooke vpon him in procelle of tyme to rule, in such wise as the king grudged at his doying. And for this the king and his vncle fell at unkindenesse, so that he withdrewe himselfe from the king, and alped him with the bishop of Duresme, the Erles of Northumberland, Shrewesbury, and others. The which beyng confederate together, conspired against the king, and made his brother Robert Curthose against him, and wrought many thinges to his displeasure and hurt. And amongst all other damages by them done, Roger de Mount Gomorik, Erle of Shrewesbury, destroyed the Countrie and north west parts of England to Worcester towne, by the ayde and helpe of the Welshemen: But in the ende, the Welshemen were so feeble and weak, that a fewe knightes discomfited a great armie of them.

When king William perceyued that almost all the Normanes tooke part against him, he then beyng forced by necessitie, drew to him the Englishmen, and fauoured them by giftes and easy lawes: So that by their strength he did in the ende reconcile the Erle of Shrewesbury, and chased some other of his enemies, and shortly after occupied the strong Castelles and holdes in Kent, belongyng to Bishop Odo his foresayd vncle, and in the ende compelled him to yelde himselfe and to forsweare England. And that done he besieged Rochester, wherein the Bishop of Duresme, the Erle of Northumberlande, and other noble men were gathered, and wan it at the last by yeldyng, so that his enemies were vnto him reconciled also, and in like maner was his brother Robert, who then again taking his leaue of the king returned into Normandy.

Lanfranke dead.

In the thirde yere of his reigne dyed Lanfranke, when he had beene Archebishop of Cantorbury. xliij. yeres. By whose meanes the Monkes of England were brought to the vse of their Religion, which before liued like secular priestes, and not like religious men. Fabian.

About this tyme Robert Curthose Duke of Normandy entending to take his borage into the holy land, layed his Dukedome to pledge vnto his brother William for ten thousand pound. For the leuyng whereof, King William set a taske vpon his commons and subiectes, and rayed a farre exceeding summe, vnder colour of the same, so that Bishops melted their plate, and the temporall Lordes spoyled their Tenantes for the payment thereof. But as some wyte these thinges were done a good space after.

At this tyme also, the king of Scots brake the peace before made with William Conquerour, and wasted and tooke prayes in the Countrey of Northumberland thumberland. Then the king provided a flauie, and sayled thether in the winter tyme: But by the tempest of the sea, halfe his flauie or a great part thereof was drowned, and many of his knightes were lost for colde and hunger. But yet in the ende after diuerse skirmishes and bickeringes, by mediation of friendes, a peace was concluded: So that Malcolyne or Malcolme then kyng of Scottes should be obedient to king William, vnder the same othe that he was before tyme sworn vnto his father, and king William should geue him yerely in the way of a fee. xij. Markes of Golde.

A great tempest.

In the fourth yere of his reigne, and the fift day of October, a passing great tempest chaunced in sundrye places of Englande, and specially in the towne of Winchcombe. For there by tempest of thunder and lightning a part of the steple of the Church was throwne downe. &c.

Also this yere by force of the sayde tempest there was great hurte done at London, insomuch as Reynulph sayth, it blew downe there. vij. hundred houses, and other like mischiefes were done in sundry places by the sayd tempest. And the same tyme was the roofof Bowe Church in London blown downe which killed two personnes, as Fabian sayth.

The roofof Sarisbury church bent & lightning.

In the fift yere of his reigne, he went into Northumberland, and repayed such holdes and Castelles as the Scottes by their warres had eyther raised or else hurt and appayzed, and caused a newe Castell to be made at Carlyll and repayed the same towne which the Danes two hundred yere passed had destroyed. In the same yere the maine roofof the great Church of Sarisbury was consumed and bent with lightning. And after the king returned vnto Gloucester, where he was grievously vexed with sicknesse, so that he thought he should haue dyed. In the which tyme he tooke great repentaunce, and promised that if he might escape, he would amend his liuyng and become a new man: But after that he was restored to health, that promise was soone forgotten. In this yere also the king gaue to Anselme the Archebishopsrike of Yorke. Fabian.

Anselme made Archebishop of Yorke.

Rees kyng or Prince of the welsh men rebelled, & was slaine.

In the. vi. yere of his reigne were exceeding floodes, whereof the like had not in many yeres before beene scene. And after that ensued a wonderfull frost, which frose the great streames in such wise that Horse and Cart passed ouer them. And in the ende when the Ice melted and brake, the payse and weight with the passage thereof brake many a strong brydge both of timber and stone.

About this tyme, the Welshmen with their kyng or Duke named Rees, brake out vpon the Englishmen in the border where standeth the Castell of Brekenoke, and there made masteryes for a while: but in the ende his people were chased and slaine, and he wounded vnto death, so that he dyed the thirde day folowyng. This Rees is accompted to be y last kyng of Wales, for after this day they were so quayed and brought to subiection, that they were vnder moze stedfast obedience of the kings of England then they were before tyme: howbeit they rebelled full often as after shall appere.

And in the yere folowyng, king William to haue the Countrie in moze quyet, hewed downe muche of the wood, and builded in sundrye places of Wales strong Castelles and pylles, by meane whereof, they were plucked moze and moze to obedience and quyetnesse, and specially in the dayes of Edward ward the first, and Edward the thirde.

At this time Malcolme, or Malcolme king of Scotland came vnto Gloucester, to comen with the king of dyuerse matters, and to make a finall agreement. But because king William would haue deemed him in his Court, therefore the same Malcolme departed from the king in great displeasure, for the which and for other causes the warre betweene England and Scotland was reuued, so that shortly after the sayd Scottissh king with his retinue fought with an Erle named Robert Moubraye, which then was Erle of Northumberland, and there was slaine with his eldest son Edward. Now he was slaine Hector Boethius the weth in the .xij. booke of the Story of Scotland on this wise: When they within the Castell were now ready to yelde and brought to extream necessity, and in maner famished for lacke of victualles, a certaine aduenturous and couragious Englishe knight beyng mounted on a very swift Gelding, hauyng a speare in his hande, at the ende whereof were fastened the keyes of the Castell, rode vnto the kinges campe, making semblant as though he had bene come to giue vp the Castell vnto the king. When the Scottes sawe this, they drew together, and for ioye made a great shoute and noyes, thinking their long travayles and paynes had nowe bene at an ende, and then brought him where the king lay, who heering this noyes came out of his tent to knowe what the matter was. The Englishe knight when he sawe the king, helde downe his speare as though he woulde haue deliuered him the keyes: And whilest euery mannes eyes and mynde was fixed thereon, he in the meane time sodenly thrust his speare into the kinges left eye, and so wounded him therewith, that he there presently fell downe starke deade: and that done, he forthwith dashed his spurre into his horse and fled into the next woodes, and so escaped. And it is sayde that when king Rufus heard of this aduenturous deed, he sent for the sayde knight, and gaue him certeyne of his landes and reuencwes in Northumberland, and commaunded him ever afterwarde to be called Percye, because he had perced or bozed out the kinges eye, of whome (sayth he) that familie tooke their beginning, which haue bene sence that tyme Erles of Northumberland. When the king was slaine, the Scottes departed and went euery man his way, and so the siege brake vp and ended. Edward the sayde Scottissh kinges sonne was slaine befoze in a skirmishe at the same siege. Hether to Hector Boethius.

For sorowe whereof, Margaret Queene of Scotland, and sister vnto Edgar Atheling (as befoze in the story of William the Conqueroz is shewed) died soone after. Then the Scottes made Donwalde or Dunkard the brother of Malcolme their king, and put by his sonnes. But king William made Edgar the sonne of Malcolme king of Scottes, and he did vnto him homage for the same kingdome.

Dalidore setteth out these warres and the causes therof, and such things as chanced in Normandy betwixt king William and Duke Robert his brother, and the rebellion of the Welshmen that folowed shortly after on this wise: When the businesse of Scotland (sayth he) was thus quieted, Robert Duke of Normandie who alwayes bare a grudge to the king his brother, for that he was by him defeated of the Crowne, sent Ambassadors vnto the sayd king, & by the same charged him with perjury for that he had not firmly kept and holden the conditions of peace that were agreed vpon betwixt them, wherewith Rufus beyng highly displeased, reysed forthwith a great armie, and sayled into Normandy, purposyng so to trye the matter with him, that he would rather hazard his estate at once, then thus dayly be troubled and biquieted by him: Howbeit his wrath beyng shortly after asswaged, he sought not to fight with him by and by: but after he had once or twice lightly ouerrunne the Countrie thereabout without any great damage or hurt doying, he fell to a communication with him, where after long conference, they were at the length both contented by the intreatie of their friendes, to commit the effect of all matters in controuersie betwixt them, to the hearyng and arbitrement of certeine most graue and honourable personages, who (the causes and allegations of both the sayde parties, first deliberately heard and debated) gaue sentence for the Duke, awarding that the king should pay him a certeyne summe of money in the name of a mulct or penaltie, for that he had thus contrary to the league betwixt them ouerrunne and wasted his Countrie. But when the king vnderstoode their awarde, he was by and by in a great chafe, and sayde that he would in no wyse stande vnto it: Therefore both the sayde parties beyng greatly moued eyther with other gaue ouer talking and fell to fighting. The king toke perforce the Castell of Bure, and Robert by the aide of king Phillip of Fraunce, set vpon those Holdes and Castells which king William helde in Normandy, by vertue of the former composition betwixt them, and first of all he wanne by assault the Castell of Argenton, wherein he toke prisoner Roger Lieutenent or deputie of Poitiers, and with him .lxxx. men of armes, and with like successe also wanne he the Castell of Almes. At the length the king considering with himselfe howe there needed a greater force to subdue his aduersaries, and speedily to finishe the warres that were conuincing vpon him, commaunded in all hast an armie of .xx. thousand men or thereabout to be leuyed in Englande, and speedily to be conueyed ouer vnto him: nowe when all this multitude were assembled and come together at Hastings in Suffer at the tyme appoynted, where the kinges Shippes lay at Anker to receyue them, and that they were nowe in readinesse and willyng to depart: The kinges Agent met them there also, geuyng intelligence vnto the Capitaines that they should signifie vnto the rest, howe the Princes pleasure was of a speciall desyre he had to spare hys people, and deliuer them from further paynes and traualles of warrefare by them to be sustayned, that euery Souldiour there prest should pay ten shillinges, and therebpon to be discharged from that voyage, and to returne home againe, the which thing the more part of them was better willyng to do, then to commit themselues vnto the daungers of the sea, but the intent and purpose of the Prince was to fight against his brother, rather with a golden weapon, than with one of yron or steele, thinking vnder pretence of those warres to gether such a masse of money of his subiectes, as should both be sufficient to bye peace, and also to enrych him selfe. Therefore when both the armyes were nowe in a redinesse to fight, and that king William had found the meanes so to pacify Phillip the French king with gifts & rewards, that he would no more ayde the sayde Duke, then by and by the whole staye and strength of his warres was quite fallen downe, and for wantyng the French kinges ayde, he was of necessitie compelled to sue vnto the king his brother for peace and at the length obeyned it.

When king William had thus finished the warres of Normandy after his mynde, he forthwith returned into Englande, where anon after chaunced vnto him greater businesse than he had before. For the Welshemen hearing of the variaunce that begonne to growe betwixt him and his brother, armed themselues myndyng to rob and pill the Countreyes adioynyng vnto them after their accustomed maner. And so entryng into the Marches, they burned houses and villages, draue away Cattell, tooke prisoners, and slue aswell Normanes as Englishe men: and finally rased towne and Castels where so euer they came. When the king was hereof enfourmed, he assembled a power in all haste to helpe his distressed people, and to kepe the countrie from bitter spoilyng and washyng, and hauing vsed great spede in hys iourney, he set vpon them on a sodein: But for all that the Welshmen did not onely manfully abide the brunt of the assaultes, but also enforced the king to gene back & retyze, and that with no small losse and damage, where fore being now thre daves iourney on his way, in his retyze he determined with himselfe to yelde vnto fortune for the tyme present, and so departed vnto London to prepare a stronger power. After whose departure, the Welshmen waxed so proude and gathered such a courage vnto them, that they besieged the Castell of Mount Gomerike of all the fortes and Castelles in Wales the strongest, and afterward notwithstanding it was for a whyle manfully defended by the kinges garison attempted to race it, and at length hauyng beaten downe the walles thereof they toke it, and very cruelly slue all that they found therein: But the king being this while letted by treason newly sprong vp against him in his awne land, & determining first to suppressse that before he prepared any resistance against them, went into Northumberland where the Authours of this newe conspiracie put themselues in armes against him: For Robert Erie of that Countrie who had oftentimes before required the king to consider the good seruise he had done what tyme he beyng generall of the armie, the Scottissh king was slaine in maner aforesayde, and perreyuyng the king not to be so redye to rewarde him for that worthie deede as he looked he should haue bene, was therewith so moued, that beyng sent for by the kinges letters, he openly refused to go vnto him. And in the meane season ceased not priuily to devise howe and which way he might deprive him of the Crowne: But the conspiracie beyng by chaunce shortly after disclosed, the king toke diuerse of the Conspirators vpon a sodeine and put them to death: But Robert for that he knew himselfe guiltie, and therefore feared least he should be punished according to his deserts, fled away, whom the king pursued to the Castell called at this day the Castell of Sanburghe, wherether he was gotten for succor with his wife and children, which the king forthwith besieged, and because the same beyng most strongly defended aswell by nature as mans industrie and policie seemed impregnable, he began to close it with a wall of Plankes or Bordes, so that no man might enter in or issue out of it. But when Robert distrusting his state and case, or at the least wyse the fidelitie of his friendes, sawe the boorde worke begon, he priuily conueighed himselfe out in the dead of the night, but yet not so priuily but the kinges scout perceyued it and pursued after, and beyng constrained to go vnto Cismouth, he there tooke sanctuary in the Church of saint Oswine the martyr, out out of the which he was by and by drawen by violence, and taken prisoner, and so brought vnto the king: Howe when the rest that were within the Castell ceased not yet to make resistance and to defende them selues, the king to beate a greater terror and feare into them, caused Robert to be brought before the Castell gate that they within might see him, and made proclamation withall, that vntill the sayde Castell were yelded, forthwith his eyes should out of hand be plucked out of his head, the which thing they beholding and fearing aswell their awne partes as the Erles, at the last yelded themselves and gaue by the Castell, of whom part were banished, and some had their eares cut off, and other some one of their eyes put out to make the rest to beware by their example, and so sent home: but Robert was had to the Castell of Windsor, and there cast in prison: When this businesse was at an ende, king Rufus bent all his whole force against the Welshmen, who still continued in their outrage besides all measure, and adressing himselfe with his armie with all hast to Wales warde, when he sawe that the Welshmen would at no hand geue him any oportunitie to fight with them, but hid themselves in woodes of purpose, he then began to waste and destroy the country next adioyning, and attempted to passe through those places euen where most dangerous and hardest passage was, to the intent he might come where the enemies were, and fight with them. But contrarywise, the Welshmen kept either the mountaynes or woodes, who beyng sufficiently prepared and furnished for the tyme, set vpon the kinges armie, sometymes here, and sometymes there, euer as they espyed any aduantage, in such wise, that they either wounded or slue very many of them. The which was the cause that the king desirous to be aduenged on them, pursued them more feruently then circumspectly, through mountaynes and marishes more to his losse and damage, than to the losse and annoyance of his enemies: who after he had lost many of his men and horses, and saw there was no hope for him to do any good there gaue ouer his purpose againe, and made an ende of those warres. Hetherto Holidore.

In the .vij. yere of the reigne of king William, Anselme that was Archebishop of Yorke was remoued to Cauntorbury as affirmeth one Chronicle: But Reynulph and Guido say, that Hugh Lupus Erie of Chester beyng sick and diseased, in the .vij. yere of the reigne of William Rufus, sent into Normandie for Anselme then Abbot of Berry or Becy for thre causes. The first, to visite and see him, and to be reconciled of him, as the man that he moste trusted. The second cause was that he should relieue some Abbeyes of England, whom the king had bereed with grieuous tribute. And the third, that he should found an Abbey in Chester, which place he after buylded, and made one Richard his Chapleyn first Abbot there, and soone after he was made Archebishop of Cauntorbury: wherby it appereth that the sayde See was boyde ouer the terme of thre yeres. And at this tyme, England and Normandy were sore visited with the plague of pestilence, and the same was so great, as some write, that many lay vnburyed, and the tilling of the ground was put off for that yere, and thereafter ensued great and extreme hunger.

This yere also the Scottes slue their king Edgar, and restored againe to the rule of the lande the aforesaid Donwald. And many straunge and wonderfull sightes were secne this present yere in the Skie, as hostes of

Westminster
Hall builded.

In the .x. yere of this king, strife and dissention fell betwene hym and Anselme Archebischop of Cauntorbury, because Anselme might not be suffered to call his Synodes, and correct his clergie but as the king would. The king also chalenged the inuestiture of Bischoppes, and tooke of the Spirituallie and Temporally great taskes and tributes, the which he spent vpon the walling of the Tower of London, and the making of Westminster Hall as some wyte. But John Kestall sayth in his Chronicle that it is not lyke to be true that the great Hall of Westminster that is now, was buylded by this king, but rather in the tyme of king Richard the second. For sayth he, the Armes that are there both on the timber and on the stone worke, which is the three Lyons quartered with the flower de luce, and the white Hart for his badge, were the armes of king Richard. For there was never king of England that gaue the flower de luce which was the armes of France before king Edward the thirde. And therefore it manifestly apereth that the great Hall which is now, was not builded by Rufus, except it were that he made the foundation thereof: But if Rufus made any Hall there, it was that which is aboute the stagers that we nowe call the white Hall. And besides all this, the kinges seruantes grieved and pilled Englishe men unreasonably. And to this miserie was ioyned the couetousnesse of Reynulph that was sometime Chapleyn vnto William Conquerour, the which at this day was the kinges procurator, and gathered his taskes ouer all England. He was so couetous and so euill disposed, that he would leuy three taskes for two. He pilled the riche, and bare downe the poore, and caused many men to lose their landes for small causes, and therefore the king did greatly fauour him. And by hys meanes, Bischoppes were bought and solde as commonly as other marchandises. Also at this tyme priestes vsed bushed and bryded heades, long tayled gownes and blasynge clothes thynnyng, and golden Girdelles, and road with guilt Spurres, with vsynge of dyuerse other enormities. All which vices Anselme would haue corrected, but he lacked assistance of his brethren the Bischops, for the which cause and other he departed the land: Wherewith the king beyng discontented, sent after him suche personnes as robbed and spoyled him, and intreated him in most cruell maner. For the which deede, Raufe Bishop of Chichester blamed the king, and also rebuked all such Bischops as had refused the party of Anselme, and had fauoured the king in causes concernyng the aforesayde variaunce. And furthermore he withstode the king and his officers in takyng of fynes of priestes for the cryme of fornication, for which causes the king with the sayd Raufe was sore amoued, and discontented, and obteyned such fauour that he suspended many Churches of his diocesse. But in the ende, Raufe demened him in suche wise that he had his awne will, and his Churches enlarged and freed that before were stopped with Thornes. And the king gaue vnto him the fynes of priestes within his Diocesse, and endued the See of Chichester with many great giftes.

And vpon a tyme as king William was ridyng towarde his dysport of hunting, suddenly a messenger came vnto him, and sayde that the City of Cene-mona or Constaucia in Normandy was besieged of the French men: wherefore he without long taryng or aduise-ment, tooke the streight way to the sea sea syde, and sent to his Lordes, charging them to folowe. When the sayde Lordes came to his presente, they aduysed him to tary vntill his people were assembled. But he would do nothing after their counsaile, but sayd such as him loued would surely folowe, and so went to Ship, setting aside all perils.

The mayster of the Ship was afrayde, and saw the weather so darke and clowdie, and the Sea somewhat rough by reason of the south wind that then blew, that he counsailed the king to tary vntill the wynde would blow more fauourably: But he commaunded him to make all the speede he coude vpon paine of his lyfe, sayng that he neuer heard that anye Kinge was drowned. And so he passed the sea and landed in Normandie a good while before there was any byrte of his comming, and there gathered vnto hym his knightes.

When the Captaine of the Siege (whose name was Helias) knewe of the kinges landyng, he feared, and anone began to breake the siege: But by treason he was taken and brought to the kinges presence. To whome the king shewed such pitie, that he suffered him to be at his libertie, which after the opinion of William de Regibus, was done more of pride than of compassion. Holidore wyrteth that when the capteyn was brought vnto the kinges presence, he iested at him as one that had no courage nor mannes stomack. Then the sayde Capteyne turning him vnto the king sayde boldly againe. Sir king, thy fortune is nowe to take me prisoner, but if I were at libertie I would make thee to vnderstand that I were not a man so little to be passed on as thou makest me. And with that the king commaunded him to be set at libertie and then sayd vnto him, now go whether thou wilt, and do the worst thou canst against me: But (sayth he) it is not red that he euer attempted any thing against the king afterwarde.

In the .xj. yere of his reigne, at a towne called Finchester in the country of Barkeshire, a Well cast out blood as before it had done water. And after by the space of .xv. dayes great flames of fyre were seene in sundrie places, and at sundry tymes. This yere also the two Erles of Shrewsbury and of Chester who were both named Hugh, by the kinges commaundement entered with their knightes the Isle of Anglesey, which was the chiefe refuge of the Welthe men, and slue there a number of them, and shewed there such crueltie besides, as the like had not bene heard of before, for vnto some they put out their eyes, to some they cut off their noses, handes, legges, or armes, and some againe they gelded, so that no kinde of cruelty was left vnpacted.

Among the which a priest named Kynradus was drawen out of a Church and serued in the same maner, and had also his tongue cut out of his heade, and one of his eyes put out. In which season and tyme the King of Norway wanne the Isles then called Orkades, and nowe Orkneyes, and after came with his strength vnto the aforesayd Isle of Anglesey to rescue the people of the Isle, where at the same season were the sayde two Erles. Then betwene them was a mortall fight, in the which Hugh Erle of Shrewsbury was stryken with an arrow in the eye, and dyed within .liij. dayes after. But as sayth Guydo, the Danes were chased, and the Englishe men had the victory, but as other do wyte there was no notable thing else there done besides the death of the sayde Erle.

Robert Cosauage that sometyne had bene Abbot of Ramsey, and then by the gift of a thousand pound to the king, was made Bishop of Thetford, repented him after, and bewayled that unskillfull deede, and tooke his way to Rome, and did for it his adioyned penance, and after returned into England, and turned his See from Thetford to Norwiche, and founded there a fayre Monastery of his awne goodes, and not of the patrimonie of Christes Church: But therein resteth a doubt, for he was first Abbot and then Bishop, sayth Fabian.

After that king William as befoze is sayde, was returned out of Normandie, many wonderfull prodigies and tokens were shewed in England, as the swelling or rising of the water of the Chamys, in suche wyse that it drowned many townes, and did much harme by out passyng of his boundes in dyuerse places about London and else where, with dyuerse other thinges which I passe over.

Forest of Windsor.

The death of king William Rufus.

In the .xiiij. yere of his reigne and the beginnyng thereof the thirde day of August as sayth Reynulph, or as some other write vpon Lannias day, thys king William beyng at his disport on huntynge within the newe forest, now called the forest of Windsor, or rather as Reynulph sayth in the newe forest in Hamshyre besydes Sarisbury by glaunying of an arrowe, which a knight named Sir Walter Tirell a frenche man did shote at a Deere, and hit the king, and wounded him to death, so that he gaue but one groone and dyed presently, when he had reigned .xij. yeres, .xj. monethes lackyng. viij. dayes. And it is written by John Hardyng, that king Rufus to enlarge the aforesayde forest did pull downe foure Abbeyes, .xviij. parishe Churches, and all the townes to them belongyng. Water Henningforde wyrteth, that in the place where the king was slaine had beene a Church in olde tyme, the which Church with other in his fathers tyme was pulled downe, and destroyed for the enlargyng of his said forest, and that in the same forest by a like chaunce was slaine also a little befoze Richard the kinges nephew, sonne vnto Robert Duke of Normandy of a knight of his awne.

After this deede, the sayde Walter escaped and saued himselfe, for febe they were that pursued after him. And so the king thus wounded was layde in a horse Litter, and conueyed to Winchester, and was there buryed in the Church of Peter and Paule.

Henry of Huntingdon

Of this William, reporteth Henry of Huntingdon and sayth that though this man were light in some things, yet he was stedfast and stable of his promise, so that what he promised good or euill it should be perfozmed, & though he were named couetous, yet it should apere by this that foloweth, that he sometymes shewed himselfe liberall: for thus wyrteth he of hym.

Vpon a certayne time, when the Abbot of an Abbey in England was dead, two Monkes of the same place, the which befoze had gathered money together, made their friendes to king William, and offered large offers either of them to be promoted to that dignitie. There was also a thirde Monke, the which of meekenesse and humblenesse folowed the other two, to the entent that vpon hym that the king should admit for Abbot, he would haue geuen attendance, tendance, and as his Chapleyn to haue returned with him. The king called befoze him the two Monkes seuerally, and either out profered other: And at the length he cast his eye asyde, and espyed the thirde Monke, the which he supposyd had come for the same cause. Then the king called him and asked him, if he would geue any more than his brethren had profered to be Abbot. But he answered to the king and sayde, that he would offer, neyther yet geue for it one penny, nor woulde haue so great a charge by any wrongfull meane. When the king had well considered of this thirde Monkes answer, he sayd that he was best worthy to be Abbot, and to haue the rule of so holy a charge: and so he gaue vnto hym that promotion, without taking of hym one penny.

Money bid- den for Ecclesiastical promotions.

This king William was variable and inconstant of his behauiour, very couetous, and therewithall cruell, and burdened the people with great taxes. Furthermore he neuer maryed but vsed concubines continually, wherefoze he dyed without issue legitimate, when he had reigned as aforesayd fully .xij. yeres, and almost .xj. monethes.

Of this king it is wozitten that he was wastfull and sumptuous in hys apparell, an example whereof is brought in by a certayne wyrtter to the great reproofe of excelle of apparell vsed in these our dayes. For when his Chamberleyn on a tyme brought him a newe payze of Hosen, he demaunded of him what they cost, who answered thre shillings, wherat the king beyng somewhat moued, commaunded him to prepare him a paire of .xiiij. shillings iiij. pence. Nowe if kinges were then thought to excede that bestowed a Marke vpon a paire of hosen, what is to be thought of many meane men which in our tyme bestow so much of one payze as that king did vpon twentie.

Henrie the first.

Henrie the first of that name, and the fourth sonne of William Conquerour, which for his learnyng was surnamed Beaulercke, toke vpon him the first day of August the yere of our Lorde M. C. the gouernement of this Realme of England, and was crowned king thereof very shortly after at Westminster, of Thomas Archebishop of Yorke, or as Polydore and some other say, of Maurice Bishop of London.

Coronation of king Henrie the first

His elder brother Robert Duke of Normandie was at that season not yet returned from the warres of Siria, and therefore had he the better oportunitie to bring his purpose aboute. For manye there were both of the nobles and others which fauoured the sayde Duke, and woulde haue haue done their endeuour to haue crowned him king if he had bene present: And for this cause he found the meanes, what by geuyng of great rewarde, and what by fayre wordes and large promises to preuent him: But no one thing moued the whole Realme moze to agree vpon him, then the faythfull promise he made to abholishe his fathers lawes, which were deemed of the people to be both against equitie and conscience. But first of all, so soone as he hearde of his brother Rufus death, he seized vpon his goods and moueables, whereby he became the stronger, and better able to go thozowe with this enterprife.

This king in his youth had so well applied his study, that he was well sene in the seuen liberall sciences. And he at his enterie reformed the ministers of the Church, and the dignitie of the same which had bene corrupted by his brother and he restored againe and vled saint Edwardes lawes with the amendment of them, besydes the reformation and amendment of sundry and diuerse other abuses in the common welth.

He banished out of his Court nicenesse and wantonnesse, and committed Reynulph Bishop of Duresme, a man hated of all men for oppression, bribery, and diuerse other notable crymes, and a chiefe Counsaylour and perswader also of the king his brother in all his lewde and vngodly attemptes to the tower of London, the which before as you haue heard was so great with his brother William: and he sent for Anselme that was Archebishop of Cauntorbury, which before was fled for the feare and wrath of William Rufus, and gaue the Bishoprike of Winchester then miserablye spoiled vnto Spfford, a right graue and learned man, and conferred also the rule and gouernement of such Abbeyes as had bene of long tyme vacant vnto Monkes. Furthermore he remitted all such taxes and paymentes as had bene by hys father and brother newly raysed vpon the people.

This king corrected and reformed the olde and vntreue measures that were vled in this Realme, and caused a yarde of the length of his awne arme to be made and vled (and the same thing at this day is most metest to be reformed, for now almost no countrie kepeth eyther weight or measure one with the other to the great hurt of the Realme) and lyke wise he reformed manye thinges that before his tyme had bene abused. Also he abhorred the excesse of meates and drinckes, and vled to fight moze with good counsaile than with the sworde.

In the second yere of his reigne, Robert his brother that by all this time had bene occupied in warres vpon Christes enemies, hauing worde of the death of his brother William, and howe his brother Henry had taken vpon him as king, returned into Normandy, and there made preparation for to come into England.

In this time also Reynulph Bishop of Duresme brake out of the tower of London, and went to Robert Duke of Normandy, who stirred and prickted forwarde the same Duke Robert in all that he might to warre vpon his brother Henry, so that he assembled a strong armye of knightes, and tooke shipping, and shortlye after landed at Portesmouth. But by mediation of friends, a peace was made, and that in such condicion, that he should haue perely three thousande Markes payed vnto him as a tribute, as before was promised hym by William Rufus his brother, with condicions of succession and and other thinges the which for length I passe ouer.

Thus Robert beyng contented, contrary to the mindes of his Lordes, after a while that he had disported himselfe in England, he returned to Normandie, where of his Lordes he was for this and other vndiscrete dedes by him before done, as after shall be shewed, little, or lesse and lesse set by. For albeit by his fathers lyfe he had offended, and vtterly displeased him as before is touched, yet by his manhood and manfull dedes, he wanne the heartes of the people, specially for the worthie actes he did at the winnyng of the Citie of Alcon vpon the miscreantes and Turkes.

This Robert was wise in counsaile, strong in battaile, and also right liberall, and in hys returne from Hierusalem hee maryed the daughter of William, or as Polidore sayth, Roger de Auersana Lorde of Apulia, with whome he receyued great summes of money for his dower, the whiche by meane of his liberalitie was not long vspent. Then fortune began to frowne vpon him, and set his awne Lordes against him, who sent vnto king Henry of England, and moued him to come into Normandy against his brother, and they would deliuer vnto him the countrie and Duchie of Normandie, and take him for their chiefe Lorde and gouernour: wherevnto as sayth the English Chronicle, king Henry soone consented.

But or euer this warre began betweene them, this king Henry had maryed the foresayde Holde or Hawde the daughter of Malcolme or Malcolme king of Scotland, and of Margaret his wife daughter of Edward the outlaw as is expressed in the beginning of William Conquerour. Of the which Hawde, he receyued two sonnes, and two daughters, that is to say, William, and Richard, Hawde and Mary.

Polidore sayth, he begat of his first wyfe William, which was after drowned in the sea, and Hawde the Emperesse. And a concubine a daughter named Mary, & a sonne called Richard, the which were likewise drowned. And of a nother concubine Robert, whome he created Erle of Gloucester: But Hector Boethius wyrteth, howe there was issue betwixt them these folowynge, William, Richard, Enfemia, and Hawde.

About this tyme the Church and Hospitall of Saint Bartholomewe, in west Smithfielde of London was begon to be founded by one of the kinges Mistians named Kaye, and after performed by Rycharde Whytyngdon Cytizen & Alderman of London, a man of worthie fame. This place of Smithfield was at that tyme a laystow of all dong and filth, and the place where felons and other transgressors of the kinges lawes were put to execution.

After this Duke Robert of Normandy came into Englande to his brother, and he was here honourably entertayned, and in the ende at the request of his sister the wife of king Henry, or rather (as Polidore wyrteth) beyng ouercome with the fayre wordes of his sayde brother, he released vnto hym the aforesaid tribute of three thousand Markes: but by euill tales, and couetousnesse of seignorie, this brotherly loue lasted not long, but such a baryauce fell betweene them, that king Henry with a strong armie sayled into Normandie, and helde his brother with so sharpe warre, that he chased him from one country to another, and wanne from him the Citie of Roan, Cane, Valoys, and all the good townes of Normandy, and at the last constreyned him to seeke helpe of the french king, and after of the Erle of flauders, but but he sayled of them both. Then sayth Holidore, when he considered with himselfe how unable he was to match with the king his brother, and saw also how he was distressed on euery side, by reason wherof diuerse of his Lordes and Subiectes forsooke him, and tooke parte with his sayd brother, and that his enemyes dayly encreased, and his power decreased, and waxed lesse and lesse, he determined with himselfe no longer to trye the matter by battayle and force of armes, but to repose all hope of pacification in brotherly charity. And because he thought it would little preuaile to send any Ambassadors for the matter, he beyng accompanied with a few persons went himselfe into England, the said king then lying at Northampton, where the Duke made humble sute vnto him, that he might be at peace with him, byng all the perswasions he could to induce him thereto, and submitted himselfe and his Dukedome and all that he had besydes, wholly to his order, grace, and mercy, with the which request and humble submission of his, the king was nothing at all moued, insomuch that he turned from him in a fume, muttering with himselfe certaine threating wordes against him. And this straunge countenance shewed he, eyther because of his brothers inconstancye, whereof he had had often experience, or else for that he was nowe fully bent and mynded to pursue him with most extreme crueltie, euen to death or bitter destruction. When Duke Robert saw this, he detesting the proud and stately behauiour of his brother, departed the Court and returned into Normandy with all conuenient speede, fully determining, rather than to suffer his honour thus to be desferued, to put him selfe in daunger either of death, or else of perpetuall seruitude. For he well perceyued, it booted not to put any longer hope or trust in brotherly loue. Therefore with such power as he could make, he gaue battaile vnto his brother Henry, who folowed him with a newe armie, in the which battaile he was taken prisoner and sent ouer into England, and put into the Castell of Cardiffe in Wales, where he remayned as prisoner so long as he liued, and when he was dead, he was buryed at Gloucester.

of Normandy
prisoner.

Mathew of Westmynster wyrteth that at the first he was not streightly kept as a prisoner, but was permitted by the kinges licence to haue, hunt, and vse al other pastimes what he would for his disport & recreation, hauyng his keeper with him, and was also allowed such apparell & dyet as was conuenient for his estate, vntill at length he practised to haue conueyed himselfe away: And beyng taken againe (as sayth the aforesayde wyrteth) he by the kinges commaundement had both his eyes put out, but in such wyse that the balles of them were saued. Touchyng his death it is further reported of the same Authour, how king Henry hauyng on a time made a scarlet Robe with a hood (as the fashion then was) for himselfe, & puttyng it on to assay whether it was meete for him or no, and perceyuyng the sayd hood to be somewhat to little for his head, had the yoman of his Wardrop to sende it vnto his brother Robert, because (sayth he) his head is somewhat lesse then mine. And when the messenger that brought it was demaunded of Duke Robert whether any had euer worne it before or no, and the sayde messenger vnauidedly shewed him what the king had done and sayd: Then sayd Duke Robert, nowe may I well thinke that my most wretched lyfe hath bene ouerlong prolonged sith the iniurious king my brother hath so little regard of me, that he clotheth me with his cast apparell, and after that he would neuer eate nor drinke, but pyned pyned away for hunger and sorow.

Nowe when king Henry had fynished his warres in Normandy he returned into England, and at that tyme Robert of Bolisne which was the eldest sonne of Hugh of mount Gomericke Erle of Shrewesbury arose against the king, and manned his Castelles of Shrewesbury, of Brugges, of Arondell, and of Tekynhill, and encouraged the Welshemen against the king. But the king pursued the sayd Robert so egerly, that within xl. dayes he wanne all those Castelles, and slue many of his men, and gate the fauour of the Welshemen by giftes and pleasant wordes, and also compelled the sayde Robert to forsake England: the which sayled into a corner of Normandy, and kept him there secretly, vntill such tyme as William Erle of Cornewall came thether vnto him, which William was also Erle of Mortom in Normandy. When these two Erles were met, they gathered to them a great strength of Normanes, and did great harme within the Prouince. Wherefore the king sailed thether and made sharpe warre vpon them, in the which he lost manye of his men: But in the ende hec put from them their strength, and tooke them both Prisoners, and so kept them duryng their lyues. And that done he set that Countrey in good rest and peace, and after returned into England. After which returne the king made sharpe lawes against theues and other that vsed vnlawfull doynges. In the which lawes was conteyned, losyng of lyfe, of eyes, of stones, and other members of man, as the fault and offence required.

And shortly after, Anselme Archebischop of Cauntozbury assembled a great counsaile at London of the Clergie of England: By auctorizy of which counsaile, diuerse Abbottes & other were put from their dignitie, for that they had taken before tyme their Abbeyes by vnlawful meanes. And among all other decrees one was, that priestes should forgo theyr wiues, as saith Fabian.

Then strife fell betwene the king and Anselme, for that that he would not sacre the priestes that had taken inuestiture of the kinges handes, which before was forbidden vpon paine of cursing. But Giralde Archebischop of Yorke for the pleasure of the king, sacred such Bischoppes: Wherefore Anselme beyng discontented, departed the land, and went to Rome to complaine of this and other thinges to the Bishop thereof, which then was named Pascall the second. And about this tyme Sir Robert le Fitzham Erle of Gloucester buyded the tobone of Tewkesburge, and there was buryed, and also buyded the Castell of Bristow.

In the sixt yere of the king, the Countrey of Flaunders was sore blemished and hurt by meane of the sea, so that the Fleminges were enforced to seeke for succour and place of dwelling, and required of the king to haue licence that they might inhabite in the East part of Tweede, the which to them was graunted. But after a certeyne of yeres they were remoued into west Wales, where they remayned a long while, but after they spred all England ouer.

In the vij. yere of his reigne, vpon a fryday at night in the first weeke of cleane Lent, was seene a straunge and wonderfull starre betwene the South and the West, the which nightly apered at an houre, and continued so by the space of xxx. dayes. And right against that, on the East part appered a great flamyng beame of great brightnesse, whiche stretched toward the

This yere also Anselme by the kinges agreement returned from Rome, and shortly after called a conuocation at London, in the which by the Bishop of Romes auctoritie, it was newly enacted and confirmed, that no temporal man after that day should make any inuesture with Crosse and Kyng.

In the .viii. yere of his reigne, the fourth Henry Emperour of Albaine, the which was affianced to Holde the eldest daughter of this king Henry, when she was of the age of five yeres, emprisoned Pascall Bishop of Rome and dyuerse of the Caroinalles.

In the .ix. yere of his reigne, the Archebishop Anselme professed Gerard Archebishop of Yorke to the yoke of obedience, as he was before taught by Lanfranke his predecessor. And the .x. day of August following, he sacred five Bishoppes at one tyme, as of Winchester, of Sarisbury, of Exeter, of Herford, and Glamorgan. And king Henry ordeyned a bishops See at Ely, and to the Bishoppes See at Lyncolne he gaue his awne towne of Spaldyng, for he had minished that See by the erection of Ely.

In the .x. yere dyed Anselme Archebishop of Cauntorbury, after whose death the See was boyde five yeres, and the goodes of the Church spent to the kinges vse. And when he was prayed to helpe the Church that was without an head and a pastour, he vsed to aunswere that his father and also his brother had accustomed to set there the best proued men that they coulde finde, and to the entent that he might do the same, he toke the more tyme and leysure. And with such mylde aunsweres he put off the tyme, and filled his Coffers with the great summes of the Benefice. And at this tyme, the king married his brother Roberts bastard sonne, to Habell daughter and heyre of Robert Fitzham, and made him the first Erle of Gloucester, who after buylded the strong Castell of Bristow.

About this tyme (as sayth the frenche Chronicle) a controuersie began betwixt the king, and Lewes king of Fraunce sonne vnto Philip the first. This Lewes was surnamed Lewes the great, eyther for the bygnesse of his person, or else for the greatnesse of his dedes. This Lewes sent vnto King Henry beyng in Normandy, and gaue vnto him monition to do his homage for the Duchy of Normandy, and also that he should restore vnto him, or else beate downe the Castell of Gysours, and also make recompence and restitution vnto him for the hurtes and harmes that his Normanes had done in those partes. But all this of king Henry was denied, and shortly after skirmishes and bickerings began betwene the sayde two Princes, king Henry then lying at the said Castell of Gysours, and Lewes at a place called mount Calue. But this encreased in such wise, that shortly after, eyther of the Princes sought for places of more robome, and their knightes met sundrie times. But of any notable battaile betwene them I find no remembrance although the same warres continued two yeres. In the ende of which two yeres William the eldest sonne of king Henry, beyng a childe and within age, contented so well the minde of Lewes, that he refrayned from his warre for that tyme.

In the .xiiij. yere of his reigne, at Shrewesbury, and at Notyngham was a great earthquake from the morning vnto night. The Riuer of Trent in the moneth of June flowed not for the space of a mile so as sayth Guydo, that that men might there haue gone drie thod ouer it, as though the water had bene gone another way, and this continued the space of one whole day. And soone after appered a blasynge starre, whereupon folowed an hard Wynter, great death of the people, and scarcetie of victualles by the great Mozeyn of beastes that ensued. And in this yere also the king founded the Abbey of hide without the walles of Winchester, that of olde tyme was within the walles, and first founded by king Alphred called the new Abbey of Winchester. The Citie of Worcester was in this yere almost all consumed with fyre. And in this tyme began the Parliament in England first to be instituted and ordeyned for reformation and gouernement of this Realme. The maner whereof as I haue found it set forth in an olde Pamphlet, I entende at large to set forth in the reigne of king Edward the third, where and when Parliaments were yere and orderly kept.

In the .xiiij. yere of his reigne he subdued the Welshmen (sayth Polydore) and that not without great slaughter of them, which before by often breakyng out into the frontiers and marches of Englande, wasted those Countreyes very sore.

Aboute this tyme also (sayth the same wyter) Henry the fourth of that name Emperour, vnto whom Habode the kinges daughter was fianced, sent vnto king Henry for his wife, beyng now able to company with a man, who to prepare a conuenient dowry for her, sealed a great payment vpon the people to be leuyed by the Acre, that is to say vpon euery Acre of land that any man helde a certaine porcion: By reason whereof he gathered a great masse of money, the which he sent with her to the aforesayd Emperour.

In the .xv. yere of his reigne, the king intended to haue promoted Fabricus, Abbot of Abyngdon vnto the See of Cauntorbury but in a synode or counsaile of Bishoppes kept at Winsore, the kinges minde was chaunged, and to y See was then admitted Raufe that was before bishop of Rochester

And the same yere one Thurston was chosen Archebishop of Yorke, the which denyed his profession of obedience, that he should owe vnto the See of Cauntorbury, wherefore at length he was depriued of his dignitie. But after by labour that he made to Pascall Bishop of Rome, the sayd Bishop of Rome wrote to the king that he should restore him againe to the sayd See: By the which meane he was restored, but yet disdeyned he to do his lawfull obedience vnto the sayde Raufe Archebishop of Cauntorbury. Then the strife was againe renewed which Lanfranke before had appeased, and at the length brought in argument before the Bishop of Rome. The which at the kinges request promised that he would nothing do, nor ordeine that should preiudice the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, or the dignitie of his Church. But in conclusion the sayd Bishop of Rome gaue such a defuse sentence in this matter, that he left the strife vndetermined. And when the kinges procurators and the Archbishops of Cauntorburies also were absent, were it for mede or for fauour, the Bishop of Rome was so bent, that he forsooke the olde rule vsed before his dayes, and sacred the sayd Thurston himselfe, and gaue him the Pall. For this dede the king was sore discontented with Thurston, and forbad him the entery of his land. Wherefore the Bishop of Rome wrote shortly after to the king, willing him to suffer Thurston to occupie the See peaceably, or he should be accursed, and suspended by the dignitie of the office

with France

In the. xvij. yere of his reigne, the warre againe betweene him and Lewes the French king was renewed, and the occasioner thereof, as sayth the French Chronicle, was Thibauld Erle of Charters or Champaigne, which Thibauld was grieued by the French king, and for necessitie requyred ayde of the king of Englande, to whome the king as his kinsman sent ayde and succour. And afterward the king sayled ouer with a strong army, and sent a noble man named Stephen into the Lordship of Bze, to defend it against the French king. When Lewes vnderstoode that king Henry was landed in Normandy with so great a power, he in all the hast assembled a great and strong power, and came towarde him. But there were such strong Holdes so well manned with Normanes, and also so great and deepe riuers that the French king coude not come at king Henry. But at the last he wanne a towne named Lingues in Cause, in the which towne was a brydge to passe ouer the ryuer of Thee, and so into Normandy.

When a certeyne of the knightes of Lewes had thus wonne the towne afore sayde, the sayde Lewes with his people sped him thortly after and rescued his foresayde knightes, and then spoyled and robbed the towne which was riche, bicause it had beene in rest and quiet many yeres before. He also slue and tooke prisoners all the Normans there dwelling, and put in their steed Frenchmen. And that done, he sped him towarde king Henrie, the which was at a Castell called Male assise, & there made prouision for the defence of the Frenchmen. And when he had garnished and furnished it to hys pleasure and contentation, he then departed from thence. And thortly after the French king came thether with his whole army of Frenchmen, and after many soze and cruell assaultes, he wonne the sayde Castell, and bet it downe to the grounde. After which victorie, as sayth the French Chronicle, there chaunced to the French king manye misfortunes. For thortly after among manye other mischaunces, a Noble Capitaine of his named Angueran de Chamounte, the which had done much harme in Normandy to king Henry and had wonne there sundrie Castels and strong holdes, dyed sodenlye. And in thort time after Baldwin Erle of Flaunders, a man of great strength, and puyssaunce as he besieged a Castell was wounded in the face, and died within sixe dayes after. Then Fauques Erle of Angeros, in whome also thys Lewes assied muche and trusted, married his daughter vnto William the eldest sonne of king Henry, and refused the French kings parte, and ayded and assisted king Henry in all that he might, so that daylie the power of Henry encreased, and the French kings diminished. Finally, these two Princes met with both their armies in plaine field and fought a deadly and cruell battayle, where in the ende the French king was overcome, and lost marche of his people, & was compelled to flee vnto a place called Audeley for his safegarde. But this ouerthrowe of the Frenchmen is by them excused in the most fayrest maner, so that they (as Fabian sayeth) excuse themselves and saye, that king Henry set vpon Lewes when he was not ware, and hys knights at that tyme were all out of order & aray: and also that king Henry had a farre greater number then the French king had, with other wordes in the praise and commendation of themselves, which is to their rebuke.

But Reynulph of Chester sayth that king Henry overcame the French king king in the playne field royally.

Now it followeth in the storie, when these two Princes were agreed, William the sonne of king Henry did homage vnto the French king for the landes of Normandy, by the agreement of his father: for the king thought himselfe to good to be vnder the obeysaunce of the French king. Then king Henry caused his free men of Englande and of Normandy, to doe homage lykewise vnto his sonne William.

Homage.

And sone after Fauques before named, left his Erledome of Angers, in the guyding of king Henry, and went himselfe into the holye lande, and wyllid in his Testament, that if he returned not againe, that then the sayde Erledome should remayne vnto his sonne in lawe William, sonne of king Henry which had married his daughter.

About the twentieth yere of the reigne of king Henry, Queene Mholde or Malode his wyfe dyed in Normandy, the which in her youth, was set by her father the king of Scottes, into a Nonnery and there did weare and vse the hayle and habite of a Nonne. For the which cause when king Henry was agreeable to take her vnto his wife, this matter fell in great disputation, and Anselme then Archebishop of Cauntozburie was soze against that marriage for a tyme: But afterwarde it was sufficiently proued that shec was there wearyng the habite but neuer professed the order. And hir father had so deuised it to the entent to aduoyde vnworthy wooers.

When king Henry had continued in Normandy almost thre yeres, he tooke shipping at Harflete in Normandy, and sayled happely into England the same day, that is to say, the. xliij. day of Nouember. And thortly after William Duke of Normandy with Richard his brother, Mary his daughter, Richard Erle of Chester, with his wyfe the kinges nece, and the Arche-deacon of Herforde and other to the number of one hundred & thre score persones, tooke shipping at the same port, and were all drowned, a Boocher only excepted: which misfortune chaunced partly by the violent rage of tempest, and partly by the ouersight of the maister and other, which in the night had quarelled among themselves, by reason whereof they ranne vpon a rock as sayd the Boocher. From this daunger William Duke of Normandy escaped, and was in the Shipboate nere vnto the land: but when he heard the lamentable cry of his sister, he commaunded the Rowers to retorne and saue her, which done by what misfortune I can not tell, after she was receyued into the Boate, were it by tempest, or ouercharging of the Boate, or otherwise, they were all swallowed of the sea, so that none of them was after found, but part of their goodes.

In the. xxi. yere of his reigne, king Henry made the Parke of Woodstock besyde Orenford, and walled it with stone, besydes other pleasures to the same belongyng. And about this time Fauques Erle of Angers returned out of the holy land, and married the sister of her that before he had married vnto William Duke of Normandy, vnto the sonne of Robert Curthose, and gaue with her the Erledome of Cenomanna. And strife began to kinde betweene king Henry and the said Fauques, for the withholding of the dower or ioynter of his first daughter married vnto William the kinges sonne, and for the cruell handlyng of Duke Robert of Normandy, whom the sayd Fauques loued intyrcly.

In the .xxij. yere of the king, Raufe Archebifhop of Cauntorbury died, and a Clerke named William was placed in the See after him. And the king in this yere began the foundation of the Abbey of Redyng. And John Crementis a priest, Cardinal of Rome was sent from Calixt the seconde of that name then Bishop of Rome, for certeyne matters concernyng the said bishop of Rome. In which tyme of his beyng here, he made sharpe proceffe against such priestes as had eyther wyues or else kept concubines, and rebuked them by open publication, and other wyse, so that he gat himselfe thereby small or little fauour. But this Cardinal was so feruent in the correction of other mennes vices, that he forgat to looke vpon his owne life. For in the night or euenyng of the same day that he had blowen his horne, and sayde, that it was a most detestable offence before God, to arylse from the syde of a strumpet, and then to sacre the body of Christ, he himselfe was taken with a strumpet to his open shame and rebuke, but he excused the matter (sayth Mathew of Westminster) sayng that he was no priest but a corrector of priestes.

In the .xxv. yere of his reigne was called a counsaill at London, where the spirituallie consented that the kinges officers should punish priestes that had Concubines. But the sayd officers tooke money and suffered the Priestes to liue at their pleasures. Which offence at this day is so clerely renounced of all Spirituall men, that there are no fynes at all taken now, neyther yet correction necessary done for the same, neyther duely punished any other where in England, except it be in one house called Widwell in London, where also (as some say) there is but to much fauour shewed, chiefly to such as can make any friendes.

In the .xxvij. yere of his reigne, the Gray Fryers came first into this Realme of England, and had their first house buylded at Cauntorbury. And about this tyme also dyed Henry the fourth Emperour of that name, which (as before is touched) maryed Holde the daughter of king Henry. After whose death the sayd Emperesse came vnto her father in Normandy. For when king Henry was asserteyned of the death of Henry the Emperour, for so much as he had none heyre male, he caused soone after the most part of all the Lordes spirituall and temporall in England, to swere in his presence that they should kepe the land of England to the vse of Hawde the Emperesse, if he dyed without issue male, and that she then suruyued.

In the .xxviii. yere of the king, Geostrey Plantagenet the sonne of Fouques Erle of Angeow, maryed Holde the Emperesse. Of the which two descended Henry the seconde, which after Stephen was king of England. And after the king was returned into England, he released vnto the Englishmen the Dane gelt, which was by his father and brother receyued and taken.

In the .xxx. yere of his reigne dyed the Erle of Flaunders, and as Raynolph sayth, king Henry was by the agreement of the frenche king made Erle, as next heyre and inheritor vnto the sayde Erledome.

In the .xxxij. yere of the king dyed Robert Curthose the kinges brother, the which he had kept as prisoner in the Castell of Cardiffe from the fourth yere of his reigne, whose dead carkasse was buryed at Gloucester.

In the .xxxv. yere of his reigne, was borne of Holde the Emperesse, Henry thortmantell, or Henry the seconde, and about thys tyme was by the king founded the Bishoprike of Carlill, and a great part of London byrened.

Now for a finall ende of this story, king Henry in the beginning of the .xxxvj. yere of his reigne, he beyng in Normandy fell from or with his horse, whereof he tooke his death. But Raynolph sayth, that he tooke a surfet by eatyng of a Lamprey, and thereof dyed, when he had reyned full .xxxv. yeres and odde monethes, and was buryed at Redyng Abbey whereof he was the founder, as he was also of the Abbey of Ciceter the which Mathew of Westminster calleth Ciremeester.

King Stephen.

Stephen Erle of Boloigne, sonne of the Erle of Bloys and Adela daughter to king William the Conquerour, and nephewe vnto king Henry the first, took on him the gouernaunce of this Realme of England, the second day of December .1135. through the counsaile and ayde of many Lordes of England, contrary to their othe made to Hawde the Emperesse.

This was a noble man and hardy. But yet contrary to his othe y he made to Holde or Hawde the Emperesse as aforesayde, hee tooke vpon him the Crowne of this Realme, and was crowned on Saint Stephens day in Christmas weeke at Westminster of William Archebifhop of Cauntorbury, which Bishop in lyke manner had made the lyke othe vnto the sayde Emperesse, in the presence of the king her father as before is touched: In punishment of which periury as men suppose, the sayd Archebifhop dyed shortly after.

The Lordes also of the whole realme as abouesaid had made like othes, and committed the lyke periury, and therfore scaped not punishment. A great part of this periury (as sayth one aucthour) was this: One Hugh Bygot Steward sometye of king Henry the first, immediately after the decease of the sayde Henry came into England, and before the sayde Archebifhop and other Lordes of the land, he tooke wilfully an othe, and sware that he was present a little before the kinges death, when king Henry admitted and chose for his heyre to be king after him Stephen his nephew, because Holde his daughter had displeased him: wherevnto the Archebifhop & the other Lordes gaue to hasty credence. But the sayde Hugh escaped not unpunished, for he dyed miserably in a short tyme after.

When king Stephen was crowned he sware before the Lordes at Oxford that he would not holde in his hande the Bishoprikes and benefices that were boide, and that he would forgeue the Dane gelt as king Henry before him had done, with sundrie other thinges. And because this Stephen feared the commyng of Hawde the Emperesse, he therfore gaue licence vnto to his Lordes that euery of them might buylde a Castell or strong fortreffe bypon his adone ground. And soone after hee agreed with Dauid king of Scots who with Henry his sonne did homage vnto him for Scotland. The same tyme Stephen gaue also vnto Henry the sonne of the sayde Scottishe king, the Erledome of Huintyngdon and the towne of Bedford.

In the which tyme the king layed siege to the Castell of Bedford, the which was possessed and manned of the Scottishe king and wanne it. And that done he then made a boyage into Scotland, where he did not muche eyther to his pleasure or profite. But yet Polydore wyrteth, that whilest king Stephen made himselfe readie to set vpon the Scottishe armie, who were come to defende the borders of the Countrie: Dauid perceyuing himselfe to weake, and not able to withstand his power, sent his Ambassadors vnto him to entreate a peace, which at the length was graunted him vpon condition that he would be content to deliuer his sonne in hostage for the sure perormance and holding of the Articles and couenants concluded betwixt them, the which was done. Then in his returne homeward he toke Alexander Bishop of Lincolne & kept him in durance vntill he had giuen vnto him the Castell of Newwarke. And then he chased Wigellus Bishop of Ely. But sayth Polydore, after he had thus finished the matter with the Scottes, in hys returne againe into England he went to Wales and there besieged and wanne Ludlow the head towne of those partes, the which he founde possessed of his enemies, where Henrie prince of Scotland as he was in fight neere vnto the towne walles, was sodenly of the aduersaries that were within the towne plucked from his horse with a crooked engine of Iron, and therewith had bene taken vp into the towne, if God had not so prouyded that the King came forthwith and rescued him in that present daunger.

About this tyme also he tooke suche displeasure with his louing friend, Roger Bishop of Sarisbury, for that he suspected him as he did all those that had lately buylde any fort or Castell to fauor the Empreffe part, that he caik him into prison vntill the sayd Roger had rendred vnto him his two Castels: of Ufes and Sherborne the which himselfe had builded. For the which the sayde Roger in remembryng the great ingratitude of the king, tooke suche thought that he dyed shortly after, and left behinde him in readie coyne in his sayde Castels fourtie thousand Markes, which after his death came to the Kings Coffers, and with that treasure (sayth Reynulph) he found the meanes to marry his sonne Eustace to Lady Constance the French kinges sister.

About the fourth yere of his reigne, Dauid king of Scottes repenting him of his former agreement made with the king, entred of newe within the boundes of Northumberland about the ryuer of Thayfe towarde the Prouynce of Yorke, and bzent and slue the people, and spoyled the Countrie in most cruell wise, not sparing neyther man woman nor chyld. Against whom Thurston Archbishop of Yorke by the kings commaundement was sent, who with his power did acquite himselfe so valtauntly, that he ouerthrewe the hoite of the Scottes, and slue ten thousand of them, and in fine compelled them to withdrawe againe into Scotland. Reynulph.

In the first yere of his reigne, and in the Moneth of July, Matode the Empreffe with her brother Robert and other of her friends entred the lande at the hauen of Portesmouth, and from thence went to Arundell and tocke the the Castell there. Then Robert Erle of Gloucester leauing her in the sayde Castell, hauing with him onely ten horsemen, with so many Archers on horsebacke, passed through his enemies Countries and sped him to Gloucester, as well to signifie vnto the people the landing of his sister the Empreffe, as to cause an armie to ayde hir. And though the same towne were at his coming manned with the kings power: Yet when the townesmen vnderstood that he was come, they of their owne accorde put the kings Garrisons out of the towne and receyued him, that done the sayde Erle not onely assembled an armie there, but found the meanes also that the places and Countrie adjoining, willingly submitted themselves vnto the Empreffe.

Now when king Stephen who then layde siege to Wallyngford Castell vnderstood that the Empreffe was landed, he incontinent brake by his siege, and with his whole power spedely addressed himselfe to the towne of Arundell and besieged the Castell. But when he had there continued his siege a certaine space, and nothing was yet done accordyng to his expectation, some of them which were secreete friendes and ayders of the Empreffe, ceased not to beate into his head that the same Castell was impregnable, and therefore his lying there was but in vaine, sayng further, that it were best for him to leaue his siege and suffer her to issue out, and to go to some other holde or place where he might more easily come by her, the which was done to this only ende, that she beyng now in the case that she was, not able to hold out any longer for lacke of victualles, might escape the present daunger she was in, and flie to some other place of more suretie, where shee might make her selfe more strong against her enemies. And so Stephen folowynge this deceyueable counsaile, departed incontinent with his armie so farre that the enemies should not feare to issue out whether they would. The which thing the sayd Empreffe perceyuing, departed thence in the dead of the night, and so kept on her iourney to Bristowe, whether there came to her shortly after her comynge great succours out of all partes of the Realme: The which when king Stephen was enformed of, he repented him (but to late) that he had folowed the former euill counsaile. Wherefore he hastened him towards Bristowe to the entent to lay siege to the towne, and there to enclose his enemye if he might by any meanes. But the Empreffe hearyng of his comynge, and vnderstanding his purpose, departed thence, and went first to Gloucester and then to Lyncolne, where she victualled the towne, and so fortified it with men and munition, that she might safely there tary till eyther she were rescued by the Erle her brother and others of her friendes, or else by the fauour and ayde of the Commons, be restored to her right without bloudshed & battayle, and king Stephen deposed. But he beyng aduertised what was there by her done, pursued after with all haste and besieged the same Citie.

After which season the Erle Robert, and Reynulph before named with a great power of Welchemen, and the power of the Empreffe, came agaynst the king intendyng to rayse the siege. Where when both armies were redye to ioyne. The Erle Reynulph of Chester spake to his knightes and sayde, I requyre you, that I that am cause of your perill, may be the first that shall enter into perill. Then answered Erle Robert and sayd, it is not vnworthe to thee that at least the first stroke and dignitie of this fight: for vnto thee it is sittynge, for noblenesse of blood and vertue of strength in the which thou passest lest other men: But the kinges false othe moueth men to warre and fight, wherein we must nowe eyther winne the maystry or be ouercome. And hee that hath none other succour, is constreyned to defende himselfe by knightly and strong dedes of armes and of manhood, and so shall we nowe ioyne with them that are blemished with guile & wickednesse, as Robert Erle of Melent, the Erle also of Albemarle, and Simon of Hampton, the which is a man of great boast and small might.

The oration
of Erle Baldwin.

Three things are requyred to such as fight in bat-
tyle.

Then king Stephen prepared to set forward his people, and Erle Baldwin had wordes of comfort to the kinges people, and sayde: Unto men that shall fight there are three speciall thinges to be considered. The first is the quarrell, least men fall into perill of the soule. The second is the number of men of armes, least men be ouerclayde and oppressed with to great a multitude. And the thirde is, the lustinesse, courage, and strength of knightes, that the matter quayle not for lacke of stoute, hardie courage, and assured fighting in the tyme of neede. As touchyng which thre poyntes, I trust we be well sped. And furthermoze if we note well what enemies we haue. First we haue against vs Robert Erle of Gloucester, who bleseth great threates, and performeth small dedes. In mouth and countenance lyke a Lyon, but in heart a very sheepe. He is glorious in speche, and darke in vnderstandyng. There is also Reynulph Erle of Chester, a man without reason, and full of foolishhardinesse, redy and prompt to all conspiracie, and vnstedfast in al his dedes and attempts: hastie and furious of heart, and vnware of perilles. He assayeth oft to atchieue great dedes, but he bringeth none to effect. And what he fiercely and freshly beginneth, he cowardly and fayntly forsaketh, as infortunate and vnhappy in all his dedes, and is ouercome in euery place, for he is a companion with banished men and sculkers, and the mo of them that are in a company, the sooner they be ouerthrowne: and feeble they be in fighting, for eyther of them putteth his trust in his felow, whyle he hymselfe is ouerthrowen.

But, before he could finishe his wordes, the crie of the enemies with noyses of Trumpettes, and neeyng of horses were heard on euery syde, the battayles approched and ioyned together, and forth flew the arrowes, and a grisely and cruell fight was vpon both sydes so long as it endured. By reason of which fight and the slaughter thereof, the greene fielde was turned into a perfite red, so that many a pale and wanne visage was there sene yelding vpon of the ghost, with armes and legges disseuered and departed from the bodies. A long while this fight stood in doubt, whether partie should obtaine victoery. But in the ende king Stephens partie gaue backe and fled, but hee balauntly abode in the fielde with a fewe of his knightes and was taken, and so he was brought vnto the Emperesse: the which commaunded him to be conueyed vnder sure keepyng vnto Bristow, where he was kept as a prisoner, from Candelmas vnto holy Rood day then next ensuyng.

When the Emperesse had wonne this victoery, and had committed the king to warde, as before ye haue heard, she was not therewith a little exalted, but thought in her mynde, that she was in a suretie of the possession of the whole Realme: But she was deceyued, for the Countie of Kent tooke partie with king Stephen. And after this victoery she departed thence, and toke the towne of Cicester, and afterwarde went vnto Winchester, where shee was solemnly solemply receyued of the Bishop and the people with procession, and from thence came to Wilton, to Oxford, to Reding, and to Saint Albones, into the which Cities and townes she was ioyfully receyued withall honour, but especially was she welcomed of Theobaldus then Archebishop of Cantorbury, and many of the nobilitie besydes. Lastly, she came to London for to enter the state of the land, and while she remayned there, the Quene king Stephens wyfe made earnest labor for the deliuey of the king her husband, promising that he should surrender the land into her possession, and he to become a religious man, either else a pilgrim to his lyues ende. But all was in vaine, for she could purchase no grace as then vpon no maner of conditions.

was neuer purposed to be performed.

The Citizens of London also made great labour that they might vse the lawes of king Edward the Confessor, as they were graunted by William the Conquerour, and not the lawes of her father, which were of moze strenghtnesse, whereof in no wyse they could get any graunt.

The Emperesse was somewhat to
laced.

For this the Citizens were discontented, and knowyng that the Countrey of Kent which fauoured king Stephen would strength theyr party, purposed to haue taken her. But she beyng thereof warned, departed in haste, and left behinde her her stoze of household, and so fled vnto Drenford, where she abode, but her people was deuyded and scattered. And in this while she sent vnto David the king of Scottes and her vncler for to ayde her, who in all haste came vnto her, and so went to Winchester, where she layde siege to the Bishoppes Tower, the which, the Bishop beyng the kinges brother at that tyme helde with great strength.

The flying of the Em-
peresse.

Then the Queene with the ayde of her friendes, that is to say, of Kentishe men and other, made a strong hoste, whereof was chiefe Capitayne a knight named Guillian Ppres. When the Emperesse heard of the great strength of the Queene, and sawe that her aloue dayly diminished rather than encreased, was in such feare that she caused her selfe to be caried in a horse Litter to Gloucester as though shee had bene dead. But Erle Robert her brother was taken soone after, and put in prison, and David king of Scots heeryng of this returned into Scotland.

A wise and

Then meanes was made vpon either side for the deliuey and exchange of prisoners, so that in the end it was agreed, that the king should be deliuered for Erle Robert. But before this agreement was fully concluded, great losse and mischief was done within this Realme euery way, for the Emperesse pilld and spoyled on her partie, and the Queene by manaces and promises borrowed and tooke vpon the othersyde, and the Souldiours stale, extorted, and spoyled vpon both parties, so that riche men were made needy, and the poore oppressed on euery side.

In this meane while the Emperesse returned againe to Drenforde, and victualled it and manned it in her best maner. And lastly the king was deliuered vpon holy Rood day in Harvest, and soone after he compassed Drenford with a great armie, from the tyme of Michaelmasse vnto Christmasse next folowyng, at which tyme and season, the Emperesse bled a newe guile for constraint and necessitie of victuall.

then conſtreyned by neede (as aforeſayd) apparelled her and her company in white clothing, which a farre of ſemed like ſnow, and ſo vpon a plumbe going together as nere as they might, eſcaped the daunger of their enemyes, and ſo came firſt to the pyle or Caſtell of Shereborne, and then to Wallingford. And from thence in ſhort time, ſhe departed with a ſmall company into Northampton vnto her huſband.

So ſoone as the Empreſſe was thus departed from Drenford the tobone was yelded vnto the king, where the king had much of the Empreſſe ſuffe, aſwell harnelle as other ſuffe of houſhold. Then the king entended to haue purſued her, but tidyngeſ came vnto him that Reynulph Erle of Cheſter with an hoſte of Welſhemen was commynge towardeſ him: But by mediation of friendes this Reynulph in the ende was reconciled to the king, and was with him fully agreed. But ſhortly after ſayth Reynulph, in a Parliament holden at Northampton, he was taken of the king by a traine, and not deliuered againe before he had geuen by the Caſtell of Lincolne.

About this tyme as certeyne write, the Jewes then beyng in England crucified a childe named William in the Citie of Northwicke in deriſion of the Chriſtian religion. And in the time of Henry the ſecond, about the .viij. yere of his reigne (as ſayth Reynulph) they crucified another at Glouceſter.

In the .xii. yere of his reigne, king Stephen was againe crowned at Lincolne after the geuyng by of the ſayd Citie where neuer none of his predeceſſors had bene euer crowned before.

Robert Erle of Glouceſter made alſo new warre vpon the king, at Wilton, ſo that he was in great perill, and like to haue fallen into Roberts daunger, and eſcaped but verie narrowly. And there was taken a Barron of the kinges named Sir William Martell, for whoſe raunſome and deliury, the king gaue after to the ſayd Erle the Caſtell of Sherborne. And that done, the ſayd Erle Robert began to buyld a ſtrong Caſtell at Faringdon: Whereof the king beyng informed, aſſembled his knightes and ſped him thetherward, by meane whereof the worke was for that tyme impeached and let. Theſe thinges done (ſayth Polidore) the rage of warre ceaſed for a tyme. In the meane while, the king went vnto London, and there helde a Parliament, in the which he ſpake vnto his Nobles and Prelates as foloweth.

Where you haue hether to (my moſt deare and truſty Lords all) followed me as chiefe and head Capytaine in defending your libertie, I deſire you that you will not nowe forſake me but do the lyke hereafter, and continue as loyall and faythful vnto me your ſouereigne liege Lord, as you haue hether to bene: for as concerning me, though I haue not yet (I confeſſe) done my dunctie in the princely regiment committed vnto me, accordingly yet certes it hath not bene for want of good will, but for that time hath not ſerued thervnto, neyther can I now accompliſh the ſame without your ayde and aſſiſtance. And becauſe you ſhall not thinke that hether to little or nothing hath bene done of any importaunce: you ſhall vnderſtand that our enemyes are already ſo weakened by my meanes, that will they nill they, they muſt needes yeeld them ſhortly to our grace and mercie. There remaineth onely that you will for your partes helpe to maintaine thoſe warres which by oure conſent and counſayle were firſt begonne and taken in hande by mee; for the defence of the common wealth. And manye other wordes ſpake he vnto them of lyke ſentence, ſentence, to the intent to moue them to contribute to the aforeſayde warres as the preſent neceſſitie ſhould require.

When he had thus ſpoken every man promiſed willingly to ayde him with that they might, aſwell for their owne ſafeſtie, as for the defence of the common libertie of the Realme. The Biſhops and Prelates alſo, becauſe it was not lawfull for them to fight, were contented yet to aſſiſt him with money: for the which thing, he being deſirous to gette the ſayd money, cauſed it to be ordeyned and enacted in the Parliament, that whomeſoever ſhould be forward layde violent handes vpon any that was with aſſiſtance, or did arreſt any ſuch; for what tyme ſoever it ſhould be, or take the ſayd prisoners without the ordinarie proceſſe and expreſſe commaundement, ſhould be accounted accuſed, and neuer to be aſſoyled againſt; but of the Biſhop of Rome.

In the .xv. yere of his reigne, the Ryuer of Champe was ſo ſtrongly durt froſen that Horſe and Carre paſſed ouer vpon the Ice.

It is alſo writen by Robert a Chronycle that king Stephen conceyving great diſpleaſure againſt the Citie of Northwicke, becauſe they receyued the Duke of Glouceſter and Hawde the Empreſſe, did therefore cauſe the ſame Citie to be ſet on fyre and brent to coles.

In the .xviij. yere, Reynulph Erle of Cheſter dyed, and was the ſoutherly Erle after the Conqueſt; and his ſonne Hugh was Carle after hym; which was a man of great ſtrength and power. And in the ſame yere (as ſayeth Gyudo and other) dyed Geoffrey Plantagenet huſband of Hawde the Empreſſe. After whoſe death, Henry ſon of Matell that was the ſonne of the ſayde Geoffrey and Hawde, was made Duke of Anjou and Normandy, who in fewe yeres after married Elianour the daughter of the Erle of Houtowe, the which Elianour was before married vnto Lewis king of France, and from him deuorced for neereſſe of blood, when he had receyued of her two daughters named Mary, and Alice, as ſayth the French Chronycle. And ſo this Henry was Erle of Anjou by his father, and Duke of Normandy by his mother, and Erle of Houtowe by his wyfe.

It was not long after, that Euface the ſonne of King Stephen, with aide of the French king, warred vpon Henry Duke of Normandy, the which (as ſome write) was practiſed by Stephen his father, to the intent to let or ſtop him that he ſhould not come into England to claime his inheritance. But Duke Henry defended himſelfe ſo knightly, that the ſaide Euface wan thereby litle honour and leſſe profite.

An olde Chronycle ſheweth that king Stephen entended to haue crowned the ſayd Euface his ſonne king of Englande by his dayes, but the Biſhoppes reſuſed that deede by the commaundement of the Biſhop of Rome.

In the .xxiiij. yere, the king layde ſiege vnto the Caſtelles of Newbury, of Walyngforde, and of Warwike & Warwell, the which had bene kept by the Empreſſe friendes, from the time of her departure vnto that day, and hoped of reſkues by Henry Duke of Normandy. But the king then wan the Caſtelles of Newbury and of Warwell, but Warwike and Walyngford defended themſelues vntill the commynge of Henry the Duke, the which in the ende of the ſayde yere with a great armye entred England, and firſt wanne the Caſtell of Walmesbury.

And thence he went to London, and wanne the Tower, aſmuch by pollecy

lecy and by fayre promifes, as by strength. And such stuffe of victuall and armour as he found therein, he sent to Walingford. And that done, he went to the towne of Walingford, and waanne suche holdes as were thereabout, and diuerse other townes and Castelles mo. Then king Stephen with his power drewe toward the Duke. And finally, by meane of mediators, as Thibalde Archbishop of Cantorbury and other, both Princes to common of peace, met nere vnto the water of Urne, or Arne. But as fast as some laboured for peace, so faste other laboured to haue warre, so that at that communication the peace was not concluded.

After the king and the Duke were departed, the king went toward Ipswich in Suffolke, and the Duke toke the way towarde Shrewesbury, where he waanne the Castell of the sayd towne. From thence he went to Notingham, and waan that towne, but would not meddle with the Castell, because he thought it to strong to be waane. Wherefore the Souldiours that held the said Castell, seeing that the towne toke partie with the Duke, brake out in the night, and set the towne on fyre, and brent a great part thereof.

In this meane tyme Eustace the sonne of king Stephen, was by misadventure drowned, and was butted at Feuerham in Kent, in the Abbey of his father, before had builded, howbeit for al this Thibald Archbishop of Cantorbury let not to labor & conclude the peace betwene the king & the Duke, and endenored himselfe therein so diligently, that with the assistance of other of the Nobles, in the yere folowing a peace was concluded at Walingford, vpon diuerse conditions: wherof one was that the king should continue as king during his life, and that immediately after the conclusion of this peace, the sayd Henry should be proclaymed in all the chiefe cities & townes of England for heire apparant, & be king after the death of the said Stephen, & that the king should take him for his sonne by adoption & rightfull heyre vnto the crowne. To the which coneuantes iustly to be holden, the king was first sworne, and then his base sonne William and after his Lordes spirituall and Temporall, and so went both vnto London, where they were royally receiued. And when the king had feasted the Duke, and geuen vnto him riche giftes, he toke his iourney toward Normandy. But the English Chronicle sayth that the accord was made vpon the deuision of the land betwene them, that is to say, that both should reigne together, and either of them to enioy halfe the lande. But how that deuision was made, or which part of the land eyther of them should holde, no mention thereof is made. And the former accorde should be concluded. viii. dayes folowng the Epiphany of our Lorde in the towne of Orford: and the king dyed in the moneth of October folowng, when he had reigned. xviii. yeres. x. monethes and. xiiii. dayes, leauyng no lawfull issue behynd him, and was buryed in the Abbey of Feuerham whereof he hymselfe was founder.

And as before ye haue heard in the latter ende of the story of king William the Conquerour, that king Henry the second, and king Stephen, came of two sisters, after the opinion of some wyrters which were the daughters of king Henry the first who had maryed Holde the daughter of Malcolme king of Scottes, whereof the elder was named Holde married to Geoffrey Plantagenet

Plantagenet of whome he begat king Henry the second: And the other sister named Mary was the mother of king Stephen: So also is it to be vnderstand, that by king Henry the seconde returned the blood of the Saxons to the crowne of England, and so it did by Stephen, but yet more properly by king Henry the first, as by the discent of his mother expressed before in the ende of the story of William Conquerour may apere. By which reason it followeth, that the blood of William Conquerour reigned ouer England but lxxviii. yeres, one moneth and. xvi. dayes, if it be accounted from the first yere of king William Conquerour, vnto the last yere of king Henry the first: But if we reckon it to the ende of the reigne of king Stephen, then was it. lxxvii. yeres, and. xii. dayes.

Henry the seconde of that name, sonne of Geoffrey Plantagenet Erle of Anceow, and of Holde or Madode the Emperesse daughter of king Henry the first, began his reigne ouer the Realme of England the xxv. day of October M. C. liii.

This king was some deale red of face, and broad breasted, short of body, and there with fat, the which to asswage he tooke the lesse of meates and drinckes, and much exercised himselfe in huntynge, hawkynge, and such lyke pastimes. He was harrish of voyce, but yet eloquent and well learned, and also noble and baliaunt in knyghthood, wise in counsaile, but bread ouermuche destinies. He was free and liberall to straungers, and heard and holdyng from his familiers and seruautes. And whome he loued or hated entirely, hard it was to turne him to the contrary. He loued rest and peace, to the ende he might the rather solow his pleasure, with no vices reherced by Gerald and others, the which for length I passe ouer.

Howbeit as Reynulph witneseth he was not barren of all vertues, for he was of so great a courage, that he would often say, that all the worlde sufficed not to a couragious heart. And he encreased his heritage so mightily, that he waanne Irelande, anone after his coronation by strength, and toke the king of Scottes prisoner, and ioyned that kingdome of Scotlande to hys awne. From the South Ocean, vnto the North Ilandes of Orcaides, he closed all the landes as it were vnder one dominion, and spred so largely his Empire, that we read not that any of his progenitors had so many Proutyces and Countreys vnder their gouernance and rule. For besyde the Realme of England and Scotland, he had in his rule Normandy, Gascoyne, and Guyan, Anceow and Poyters: and he made subiect to him Aluerne and other

Of the which wife he receyued sixe sonnes, and thre daughters, the which five sonnes had to name, William, Henry, Richard, Godfrey, and John, but what the sixt was called is not remembred of wyrters. The eldest of the maydens was named Holde or Halode, and was maryed to the Duke of Saron, the second Elianoz, maryed to the king of Spaine, and the thirde named Jane, maryed to the king of Sicile.

Princes are subject to spile.

This Henry was prosperous in his begimnyng, and infortunate in the ende, and specially in the last five yerres of his reigne, for in the first of those five yerres, his strength began to minishe: The second yere he lost a boyage in Irelande: In the thirde, he lost Alluerne, warring agaynst the King of Fraunce: In the fourth yere he lost Briteyn, and in the fift the Citie of Cenomanna, and Turon, with many Holdes to them belongyng.

When tidynges was brought vnto this Henry of king Stephens drath, he fortunod to lye at the siege of a Castell which was withholden and kept from him by the frenche king. And beyng aduertised by his counsaile forthwith to breake bp his siege, and to hasten him into England to take possession of the Crowne, least happely any styre or busynesse might arise by protractyng of tyme: he vpon the affiance that he had in his rightfull cause answered againe, that no man durst be so hardie as to attempt any thing agaynst him. And so though he were dayly counsailed to the contrary, yet would he not depart before he had wonne the sayde Castell. That done, he sped him into England, and was crowned at Westminster of Theobald Archbishop of Cantorbury, not without great solemnitie and reioysing of the people, the Sondag before Christmas day. 1154. At the which coronation he made a very sweete and comfortable oration vnto the people, and so louyngly spake vnto them both generally and priuately, that euery man conceyued thereby great hope of his good gouernment to come, and that they should haue a very good and gracious Prince of him.

The coronation of King Henry the second.

In the first yere of his reigne, after he had chosen certeyne graue, wise, discrete, and well learned men in the lawes of the Realme to be of his priuie counsaile, and had by their aduice reformed the sayd lawes, then because iustice and equitie should no lenger be oppressed by such malefactorz, as being called out of foreyn countreyes by king Stephen to serue him in his warres, were not afeard to commit all kinde of mischief, vnder pretence of a libertie permitted to Souldiours by the law of armes in warre tyme: he made proclamation, that all such straungers whatsoeuer they were, should aduoid the Realme by a day assigned, vnder a great paine: But especially the Flemings whereof at that tyme there was a great number come hether, whome he hated more then any other Nation. That done, he rased diuerse Castelles that before in the tyme of King Stephen were buylded, eyther for displeasure of the owners, or for that they stood not commodiously and for his purpose: Or else for feare least they should at any time be fortifyed of his enemyes agaynst him. Furthermore, he banished many of the Lordes and gentlemen that were highly in king Stephens fauour. And from such as by purchase, gift, or otherwise helde any landes, sometimes belongyng to the Crowne, he tooke the sayde landes and leased vpon them in whose handes soeuer they were.

Strangers aduoided out of the realme.

Castelles destroyed and rased to the ground.

Lordes and gentlemen are banished.

Landes that belonged to the crowne are taken in agayne.

were. By the which fact of his, a number (sayth Polidoze) were offended, gatheryng plainly thereof, that he would in tyme to come be nye himselfe, and regard his awne commoditie.

In the begimnyng of the seconde yere which was the yere of our Lorde M. C. lv. Queene Cleanoz his wyfe was brought a bed of a man childe whom he called Henry.

The birth of Henry the first sonne of King Henry the seconde.

This yere he went downe into the North Countrie; and so to Yorke, where he sealed into his handes certeyne Castelles and Fortes which had bene a great while possessed of priuate personnes: But especially the strong Castell of Scarborough. After this he tooke from the Scottishe king the Countrie of Comberland, and then went he to Northumberlande, and recovered that Countrey wholly, notwithstanding that it was geuen vnto king Dauid of Scotland by Hawde the Emperesse his mother, because the sayde Dauid tooke part with her agaynst king Stephen, the which countreyes were at that season in the handes and possession of Malcolme who succeeded the said Dauid: But because he would not seme altogether vngratefull vnto him, that had so well deserued of his mother, he permitted the sayde Malcolme still to enioy and reteyne the Erledome of Huntingdon, the which, as is before sayde, king Stephen gaue vnto Henry the eldest sonne of Dauid: But yet on condicion that he should sweare to do homage and fealtie vnto him for the same Erledome.

In the thirde yere of his reigne, about the moneth of October were sene in the firmament wonderfull lightes, that is to say two Sunnes. And in the Moone was there sene also a red Crosse. Of this wonder sheweth the Authoz of Chronica Chronicarum, sayng that about this tyme in Italy there appeared thre Sunnes by the space of thre houres in the West. And in the yere folowyng appeared thre Moones whereof the middle Moone had a red crosse ouerthwart, which is there set out and noted for a prodigie and token of the Schisme that afterwardes fell amongst the Cardinales about the election of the Bishop of Rome Alexander the thirde, the which Schisme endured almost .xx. yerres.

3 Strange & wonderfull lightes.

About this tyme Adrian the fourth of that name called Nicholas was Bishop of Rome, bozne at Saint Albons or nere there aboutes, and as Reynulph wyrteth was a bondman of the Abbey, who because he desired to be professed a monke in the sayde Monastery, and could not be receyued, went shortly after beyond the seas, where he profited so much in learning that the Bishop of Rome made him first Bishop of Alba, and afterwardes Cardinal, and at the last after the death of Anastasius Bishop of Rome, he was chosen Bishop of Rome. And beyng aduanced to the Papedome, he gaue many great priuileges to the sayd Abbey. At the length he dyed beyng choked with a flie in his drink; who a little before his death affirmed that there was no kinde of life more miserable than the Papacie, he that desireth to knowe more of this Bishop, may reade the seconde booke and sixt Chapter of William of Petwobroghe.

4 Adrian the fourth an English man made Bishop of Rome, and his successour of the Papacy.

The same yere also Hugh Mortimer a very prowde and hauyde man fortified dyuers towne and holdes agaynst the king, as Gloucester, Worcester and the Castle of Bridgenorth. And when he sawe the kings powet bent agaynst him, he humbly submitted himselfe, and had his pardon.

Hugh Mortimer a rebel, submitted himselfe and is pardoned.

Richard,

The birth of Richard after called Richard Cœur
de Lion.

Richard, surnamed (for his manhood) Cœur de Lyon, in English, Lyons hart, was this yere borne at Oxford, in the kings Palace there, which as is before sayde was buylded by Henrie the first, and afterwards given by Richard Duke of Cornewall brother unto King Henrie the thirde, unto the order of the Carmelites then newly come into this Realme, to make them a house to inhabite in, which was called as it is yet at this day, the white Friars.

After this sayeth Polidore, the Realme of England was very quiet and King Henry at peace, as well with his aboue subiectes as with other forrein nations, untill worde was brought him that his brother Geoffrey made a great streere and businesse beyonde the sea, the originall cause wherof was this. Geoffrey Plantagenet his father lying on his death bed, left behinde him three sonnes, that is to say, Henry, Geoffrey and William, and ordered by his will and last testament that whensoever his eldest sonne Henry should chauce to be in full possession, as well of the Realme of England, as of the Dukedome of Normandy, that then and from thenceforth, his brother Geoffrey to haue and hold as in his aboue proper right and inheritance the whole Countie and Erledome of Anioye: And in the meane season, untill it fell vnto him, to haue the possession of these three Tobones following, that is to saye, Chinon, Lendum and Mirabellum, bicause that when God should call for his father he hauing the aide of the aforesayd three tobones might the easier come by his right, and not be lightly kept from the possession thereof. And fearing least his sonne Henry (who was then absent) would afterwarde breake this his will and testament; he compelled dyuers noble men and prelates that then were present to promise him vpon their othe that they would not suffer his body to be entered before they had receiued a corporall othe of his sonne Henry for the firme and inuolable performace thereof. The which othe Henry afterwarde tooke (though full sore against his will) more to auoyde the great infamy and dishonour that should haue else ensued vpon the deniall thereof, then otherwise. But not long after when by the death of King Stephen, he was crowned King of England, being inflamed with ambition, and following the nature of all couetous persons, who the more they haue, the more they desire, he so vsed the matter with Adrian the fourth then Bishop of Rome, that he was by him dispensed of his aforesayde othe. And being so dispensed withall, contrarie to all right, equitie, law and conscience, he then little regarding his fathers will, made warre vpon his sayde brother, and in short time subdued him: & so spoiling him of his rightfull inheritance seased the sayde Erledome into his owne handes. Howbeit, he gaue him afterwarde certaine other landes in recompence, bicause he should not lack lying to maintaine his estate. But the sayde Geoffrey being thus vnnaturally intreated of his brother lyued not long after. Polidore.

All this while there was priuie grudge and hart burnyng betwene King Henry of England and Lewes of Fraunce, neyther could the same be otherwise quenched, then by oft renuyng of amitie and frendship betwixt them, the which yet was euermore but coloured and dissembled on both parties for the tyme, insomuch that it would burst out againe vpon the least occasion that might be. The chiefe cause of this mutuall grudge was for that Henry married Aleanor, from whom the said Lewes as is before said, had bene before deuorced, after he had had two daughters by her. This Aleanor was nere and might heire vnto William sometymes Duke of Aquitaine, and Erle of Tholose, who dyed in the holy land: Wherefore King Henry hauing now marryd the sayde Aleanor claped as in her right the Erledome of Tholose, which then was withholden from him by the Erle Raymond, who had married lady Constance the french kinges sister, wherevpon both the sayd kinges were in armes ready to assayle eche other with sharpe and cruell warre, had not the matter bene taken vpon by their frendes, and a peace concluded betwixt them. For confirmation wherof, it was agreed betwixt the sayd two Princes, that Henry the second sonne of King Henry, but the eldest then aliue, being a child of .viij. yeres of age, should marry the daughter of Lewes the .viij. named Margaret being then but three yeres olde. The which daughter the sayde Lewes receiued of his seconde wife Constance the daughter of the King of Spaine: and this conclusion of peace & marriage was (as both Polidore and William of Newbrough do affirme) the .viij. yere of the reigne of King Henry.

This yere also was the Citie of Cauntorbury almost all brent and consumed with fyre, although Fabian sayth that it was in the sixt yere.

The same yere also dyed Theobald Archebishop of Cauntorbury. This man was a great fauourer of good letters and learned men, but especially he loued (for what qualities I know not) Thomas Becket a Londoner borne, the sonne of one Gilbert Becket, & of a woman of Siria. Insomuch that he not onely made him Archebisson of Cauntorbury, but also was a meane vnto the king that he was made Lordechauncelour of England. Of the which Theobald it is also written, that immediately after his election to the Archebissonrick, he went to Rome, and there receiued his Pall of Innocent the second, and was made of him Legate. And hereof it came that al other Archebissopes that succeded him were euermore called Legati nati.

The same yere Queene Aleanor was brought a bed of a daughter named Hawode. And shortly after the death of the sayde Theobald, Thomas Becket aforesayd, was by the kinges procurement chosen and consecrated Archebisson of Cauntorbury, that is to say the .ix. yere of King Henry.

And this yere the Queene was brought a bed at Roan of a daughter which was called Aleanor, after her mothers name.

About this tyme King Henry caused all the States and Prelates of his Realme to swere fealite to his sonne Henry, a Prince of great towardnesse: And of all other, Thomas Lorde Chauncelour and Archebisson of Cauntorbury was the first that tooke the othe, with reseruacion of the fealite all ready made vnto the king his father so long as he lyued.

Not long after the sayd Archebisson resigned the office of the Chauncelourship, and gaue by the great Seale into the kinges handes, the which the king tooke in very euill part.

The yere following which was the yere of our Lord .M. C. liiij. and the .x. yere of the reigne of the king, there fell great variance betwene the king and the sayde Thomas Becket, insomuch that the kinges minde was nowe cleane alienated from him: The occasion and ground of which variance shall afterwarde be declared.

In the .xi. yere of his reigne the Welshmen rebelled againe, the which rebellion was by the king easely appeased without any great slaughter. For the chiefe doers and beginners hereof, he so punished, that it was thought that William king of Scottes doth homage and fealtie to king Henry.

The. xij. yere of his reigne dyed Malcolme king of Scottes, next after whome succeeded his brother William, who as sone as he was crect ned went to London and there did homage and fealtie vnto king Henry, as Malcolme had done before. But Reynulph in his. vij. booke, and. xiiij. Chapter setteth forth the maner and doyng of this homage as foloweth. This yere (sayth he) the. xij. day befoze September, William king of Scotland by the assent of his Lordes and Barons came vnto Porke where then King Henry was with his Nobles, and there sware fealtie and made his homage vnto the sayd king Henry of England. And also the sayd king William did then and there confesse and acknowledge by his letters patentes that he and his successors, men of Scotland, should do homage, allegeance and fealtie to the kinges of England, as often as they shall be requyzed therevnto. And in token of this subiection, the sayde king of Scotland offered his Hat, and his Saddell vpon Saint Peters aulter in the Church of Porke, which are extant there to be seene at this day. And mozeouer the Lordes of Scotlande there present at that time, tooke their othe in solempne maner, that if the king of Scotlande would withdrawe him at any tyme from the sayd fayth and loyaltie, that then they would ryse against him, and so remaine his enemyes, vntill he would returne and reconcile himselfe.

Geoffrey the kinges sonne married to Constance the daughter of the Duke of Briteyn.

About this time dyed Conanus Duke of Briteyne without issue male, leauyng behinde him one onely daughter named Constance, which though she were then vnder age and not yet mariable, king Henry found the meanes to mary his sonne Geoffrey vnto, and so was his strength and dominion not a littell encreased thereby.

Made married to Duke of Barony.

In the. xiiij. yere of his reigne dyed Hawde the Emperesse the kinges mother, a woman as well for her wisdome and pollecy in warres, as all other her notable qualities incomparable.

This tyme also the Kinge maryed his daughter Hawde vnto Henry Duke of Barony.

King Henry with his son, farther into Briteyne.

After this the king beyng at peace with all fozeine nations from the. xiiij. yere of his reigne the space of two yeres and moze, because he would not idely consume the tyme, neyther yet suffer his souldiours by feastyng, banquettyng, and other vsittying pastymes, which they are commonly wont to geue themselves vnto in peace tyme, which should withdrawe their myndes from martiall affayres, taking his sonne with him, made a boyage into Briteyne, where he spent a great part of his time in ridyng about and vietyng of the Countrie, and in fortifyng of towones and holdes, and finally in hauyng of famillier conference and friendly talke with the noble men there. Then departing from thence he went into Normandy, and there also tooke order with matters of that Countrie accordyngly. These thinges done, in the beginning of the next spring, he returned into England, but not without some misfortune vpon the sea: for one of his Shippes was drowned by tempest, wherein as it is reported were thye hundred persons which were all drowned. And after his returne he went to Windsor, where he made his abode and kept his Christmas, and the greatest part of all the Nobles of the realme were there with him. And thether came also king William of Scotlande with with his brother David to signifie vnto him how glad and ioyfull they were of hys prosperous successe in his late boyage, whom he right curteously embraced againe, geuyng them at theyr departure many riche and large giftes.

Now to returne vnto Thomas Becket: the cause of the aforesayd baryauce and discention betwixt the king and him was as it is written of diuers Authours of good credite, that certein wicked persons of the Clergie whose murders, robberyes, and grieuous transgressions against the lawes of the Realme, beyng declared to the king by his Judges: The king therewith was not a little agreeued, and for reformation therof, called a Parliament in the. ix. yere of his reigne at Northampton, requiryng to haue established by auctoritie thereof, that due punishment might be executed vpon such transgressors of the Clergie of this Realme accordyng to the auncient order of the lawes: notwithstanding the prerogative and priuelege which the ecclesiasticall persons claymed, sayng that they were exempt from all temporall iurisdiction. Thomas Becket then beyng Archebishop of Cauntorbury, vnderstandyng the king to go about to set lawes, preiudiciall to the priuelege of the Clergie, would not agree therevnto, desiryng the king that vnder Christ our newe king, and vnder the newe lawe of Christ he would not bring in anye newe proceedyngs agaynst the ordinaunces and decrees of the auncient holye fathers: And if he would, he sayde that he neither ought to sustaine it, nor would not. The king beyng moued therewith, allegeth againe and exacteth the olde lawes and customes of his Grandfather, obserued and agreed vpon by Archebishops, Bishoppes, Prelates, and other priueleged persons, requiryng likewise of him, whether he would agree to the same, or else now in his reigne condempne that, which in the reigne of his Grandfather was well alowed. And those constitutions are in number. xxviij. or. xxix. whereof certeine folowe.

1 Concerning the nomination and presentation into benefices, if any controuersie arise betweene the layetie and Clergie: or betweene one spirituall man with another, the matter to be brought into the kings temporall Court, and there to be decided.

Lawes and constitutions ordeyned by king Henry the first.

2 Churches, suche as be de feodo Regis, to be giuen at no time without the assent and permission of the king.

3 All spirituall and ecclesiasticall persons being accused of any crime, what soeuer it be, and summoned by the kings iustice to come and appeere in the kings court, there to make answer whether the matter appertain to the spiritual court or to the temporal: so that if the said persons be found guilty and conuicted of anye crime, the Church not to defende hym nor succour hym.

All ecclesiasticall persons are subiect in all criminall causes to the temporall law.

4 No Archebishop nor Bishop, nor person being of any Ecclesiasticall dignitie, to attempt to go ouer the Sea out of the Realme without the kings knowledge and permission, and in so doing, yet notwithstanding to be bound, taryng in any place to procure no damage eyther to the king or to the realme.

That no ecclesiasticall person depart this realme without the kings licence.

they were borne and brought bp.

¶ Besides these constitutions there were many other which I passe ouer, for that the afore rehearsed articles are the chiefe. And now let vs returne to the matter betwixt the king and Thomas Becket aforesayd.

The king as is aforesayde, conuentynge hys nobles and Clarkes together, required to haue the punishment of the aforesayde misdoers of the Clergie. But Thomas Becket would not consent therevnto. Wherefore the king demaunded of him whether he woulde consent with hys Clergie, that the customes then set forth in the realme (meaning the first parte of the aforesayde decrees) should be obserued. To the which the Archbishop consulting together with his brethren, giueth aunswere agayne, that he was contented the kings ordinances should be obserued, adding this withall Saluo ordine suo, that is, sauing his order. And so in lyke maner all the other Bishops after, being demaunded in order, answered with the same addition Saluo ordine suo. Onely Willarius Bishop of Chichester, perceyuing the king to be exasperate with that addition, in stead of Saluo ordine suo, was agreed to obserue them bona fide. The king hearing them not simplye to agree vnto him but with an exception, was greatly offended, who then turning to the Archbishop and the Prelates, sayde: that he was not well content with that clause of theirs Saluo ordine suo, which he sayde was captious and deceptfull, hauing some maner of benym lurking vnder it, and therefore required an absolute graunt of them, without any exception, to agree to the former ordynaunces. To thys the Archbishop replyeth that they had sworne vnto hym their fidelitie, both lyfe, body and earthly honour: Saluo ordine suo: and that in the same earthly honour, all those ordynaunces were comprehended. And to the obseruing of them they would bynde themselves after none other foyme, but as they had sworne before. The king with this was moued, and all his nobilitie, and that not a little. The day beyng well spent the king when he could get none other aunswere of them, departed in great anger, geuyng no worde of salutation vnto the Bishops. And likewise every one of the Bishops departed to his awne house. The bishop of Chichester among the rest was greatly rebuked of his felowes for chaungyng the exception contrary to the voice of all the other. The next day folowynge the king tooke from the Archebishop all suche honours and Lordshippes as he had geuen him before, in the tyme that he was Chauncelour, whereby appered the great displeasure that the king bare against him and the Clergie.

Not long after this, the king remouyng from London, vnknoyng to the Bishops, sayled ouer into Normandy, where the Bishop of London called Gilbert, not long after resorted to him to craue his fauour: and gaue him counsaile withall to ioyne some of the Bishops on his syde, least if all were against him, peraduenture he might the sooner be ouerthrowne. And thus the greatest number of the Bishops were by this meanes reconciled againe vnto the king, except the Archebishop and a fewe other Bishops. The king thinking to trie all maner of wayes, when he sawe neither feare, nor threates coulde turne them, he did then assay them with gentlenesse, but it would not serue. Many of the Nobles labouring betwixt them both, exhorted the Archebishop to relent vnto the king, but it would not be. Likewise the Archebishop of Pozke, with diuers other Bishops & Abbots especially the Bishop

Bishop of Chester did the same: Besydes his awne household daily called vpon him, but no man could perswade him. At length he hauing vnderstandyng, partly by them that came to him: what daunger might happen not onely to himselfe, but to all the other of the Clergie, vpon the kings displeasure, and partly also consideryng the olde wyse and kindnesse of the king towards him in tymes past, was content to geue ouer to the kings request, and came to Drenford to the king, reconcilyng himselfe aboute the addicion which had displeasid the king so much. Whereupon the king beyng soone what unittigated, receyued him with a more cheerefull countenance (but yet not so familiarly as before) sayng that he woulde stur his ordinaunces and proceedinges after that forme confirmed in the publique audience: and open sight of his Bishops and all his Nobles. After this, the king beyng at Clarendon, there called his Nobilitie and Prelates before him, requiryng to haue that performed, which they had graunted in consenting to the obseruing of his Grandfathers ordinaunces and proceedinges. The Archebishop of Cantorbury suspectyng somewhat in the kings promise, went backward, and now would not, that before he would: And to perswade him to obedience: first came vnto him the Bishop of Sarisbury, and of Norwich, who for olde matters were in daunger to the king long before, weeping & lamenting to the Archebishop, desyryng him to haue some compassion on them, and to remit this pertinacye to the kyng, least if he so continued, through his stoutnesse to exasperate the kings displeasure, haply it might redound to no small daunger, not onely to them which were in icopardie all redy, but also to himselfe to be imprisoned, and the whole Clergie to be endaungered. Besydes these two Bishops, there went to him other two noble peeres of the Realme, labouryng with him to relent, & condiscend to the kings desyre. If not, they should be enforced to vse violence, as neyther would stand with the kings fauour, and much lesse with his quietnesse: But he would not geue ouer. After this came to him two Kulers of the Temple called Templars, one named Richard de hast: another called Constance de Hauerio with their company, lamenting and bewailynge the great perill, which they declared hure him to hang ouer his head, and yet neyther with their teares, nor with their kneelynges would he be remoued. At the length came the last message from the king, signifyng vnto him with expresse words, and also with teares what he should trust vnto, if he would not geue ouer vnto the kings request.

By reason of which message, he either terrefied or else perswaded, was content to submit himselfe: Whereupon the king incontinent assembling the States together, the Archebishop first before all other begynneth to promise to the king obedience, and submission vnto his customes, and that cum bona fide, leauing out his former addicion, Saluo ordine, mentioned before, in steede whereof, he promised in verbo veritatis, to obserue and keepe the kings customes, & swaure to the same. After him the other bishops likewise made the like othe. Whereupon the king commaunded certeine instrumentes obligatory to be drawen, of the which the king should haue one, the Archebishop of Cantorbury another, and the Archebishop of Pozke the thirde, requiryng also the sayd Archebishop to set to his hande and seale. To the which the Archebishop although not denyng but that he was willyng so to do, yet desired resppte in the matter while that he beyng come but newly to his Bishoprike might better peruse with himselfe the aforesayde customes and ordinances of the king. This request as it seemed but reasonable, so it was lightly graunted, and so the day being farre spent, they departed for that season, and brake vp.

Thomas Becket repented and sought to the king.

Alas one of the foure wyrders of the lyfe of this Thomas Becket, recordeth that the Archbishop whis bolage toward Winchester began greatly to repent that he had done before partly through the instigation of certain about him, but this selfe of his grosse error, who going before the Archbishop did chauncely and earnestly rebuke him, for geuyng ouer to the kings request, agaynst the privilege and liberties of the Church, pollutyng not onely his fame & conscience, but also geuyng a pernicious example to them that should come after, with many like wordes.

To make the matter short, the Archbishop was so touched upon the same, with such repentance, that he purged himselfe from company, lamentyng with teares, with fasting, and with much penauice, tearyng and scourgyng his owne body, did also suspend himselfe from all deuynne seruite, and would not receyue comfort, before he had sent to the Pope, and had graunt that he should be absolved of him, wherunto he had to him againe letters by the same messenger that came from the sayde Archbishop. In which letters, he not onely absolved him of his trespass, but also with wordes of great consolation did courage him to be stout in the quarrell he took in hand. Upon these letters of the Pope, Becket was not a little comforted & encouraged. The king heering of Thomas Becket going backe, how he denied to set his seale to those sentences which he had subscribed vnto before, toke no little displeasure against him, insonmich as he threathyng to him banishment and death, began to call him to reconynges, and to burthen him with paymentes, that all men might vnderstand that the kings mynde was set agaynst him. The Archbishop hereupon, whether more for the loue of the Pope, or dread of his Prince, thought to make an escape out of the realme, and so crept out in the night with two or thre with him, steading from his household, & attempted to take the sea privately, but the weather not seruyng him, he was driven home againe. And shortly after that he was gone, his departure was knowen and noysed abroade: By reason of which noyes the kings officers came to Cauntorbury, and purposed to haue seased upon his goodes on the kings behalfe. But as it chaunced the night before their comyng, Becket returned and was founde at home, wherefore they did not proccede in their purpose. Nowe Becket well vnderstandyng the king to be sore bent against him, and perceuyng that the Seas would not serue him, made haste to the Court, the king lyng then at Woodstocke, where the king receyued him after a certeyne maner, but nothyng so familiarly as he was wont, taunting him iestingly and merily, as though one Realme were not able to holde them both. Becket, although he was permitted to go and come at his pleasure to the Court, yet he coulde not obtayne the fauour that he would, perceuyng both in himselfe, and confellyng no lesse vnto others howe the matter would fall out, so that eyther he should be constreynd to geue ouer with shame, or stoutelye he must stande to that which he had so boldly taken in hande. The Archebishop of Yorke in the meane time goyng betweene the king and Becket, laboured to make peace and loue betweene them: But the king in no case would be reconciled, onlesse the other would subscribe to his lawes. So that while the king would none otherwise

The kinges wrath increaseth agaynst Thomas Becket.

Thomas Becket cometh againe to the Court, to the king.

otherwise agree, neither that Becket would in no wise subscribe, there was a foule discorde betwixt them. The king for his regall auctoritie thought it much that any subiect of his should stande against him. The Archbishop againe thinking himselfe to haue so good a quarrell as in the defendyng of the liberties of the Church, and also bearing himselfe bold vpon the letters of the Pope lately written vnto him, thought himselfe strong ynough against the king and all the realme besyde. Wherefore the Archebishop trustyng to these thinges, would geue no place, but by vertue of his Apostolike auctoritie gaue censure vpon these lawes and constitutions of the king, condemnynge some, and other some approuyng for good and Catholike. Besides this there came also to the king Rotrodus Archbishop of Roan sent from the Pope to make peace betweene the king and the Archebishop. To the which the king was well content to agree, so that the Pope would agree to ratifie his ordinances. But when that could in no wyse be obteyned at the Popes handes, then the king thus being stopped and frustrate of his purpose by reason of Beckets Apostolike Legacie, being Legatus a latere: thought good to send vnto the Pope: and so he did to obtayne of him, that the same auctoritie of the Apostolike Legacie might be conferred to another, after his apointment which was the Archbishop of Yorke: But that the Pope denied. Notwithstanding at the request of the kinges Clergie, the Pope was content that the king should be Legate himselfe, wherat the king tooke great indignation as (Houeden wyrteth) so that he sent the Pope his letters againe.

Rotrodus Archebishop of Roan.

The king desired to be the Popes Legate.

And when the kings Ambassadors were returned with the aforesaid letters, & had declared the kings pleasure & request. The Pope at the last graunted, that the Legate should be remoued, & that the Archbishop of Yorke should be placed in that office after his owne request. And yet addeth this promise withall, that the sayd Becket should receyue no harme nor damage thereby.

Thomas Becket cited to appere at Northampton.

Alas as the king had receyued the Popes letters to authorize the Archbishop of Yorke in the Legacie, he then caused Becket to be cyted vnto appere by a certayne day at the towne of Northampton, there to make answer to suche things as should be layde to his charge. So when the daye was come, all the Deeres and Nobles with the Prelates of the realme by the kings proclamation being assembled in the Castell of Northampton great faulce was found with the Archebishop, for that he being cited personally came not himselfe, but sent another for him. The cause why he came not (Houeden sayth) was this, because the king had placed his horse and horsemen in the Archebishops lodging, which was a house there of Chanons, wherewith he being offended, sent worde agayne that he would not appere onlesse his lodgings were auoyded of the kings horsemen. Wherupon by publique sentence as well of the Nobles as of the Bishops, his moueables were adiudged to be confiscate for the king.

A iudgement geuen agaynst Thomas Becket.

The Archbishop againe for his parte against the order and forme of that iudgement complayned, alleging for himselfe, that seing he was the Primate & spirituall father, not only of all other in the realme, but also of the king himselfe, he thought it not couenient, & father so to be iudged of hys children, nor the pastor of the flock so to be codeimned. And this was the first daies action.

A route of Thomas Becket.

The next daye following the king layde an action against him, for one that was his Marshall called John, for certayne iniurie done to hym, and required of the sayde Archbishop the repaying againe of certayne money,

King Henry comended an action agaynst Thomas Becket.

f. s. which

which he as he sayde had lent vnto him in the tyme he was Chauncelour, the somme whereof was fyue hundred Markes. This money the Archebishop denyed not but that he had receyued it of the king, albeit by the waye and tytle of gift (as he tooke it) though he could bring no proote therect. Whereupon the king required hym to put in assurance for the payment thereof, wherewith the Archebishop making delays, not well contented at the matter, he was so called vpon, that eyther he should be comtable to the king for the money, or else he should incurre present daunger, the king being so bent against him. The Archebishop being brought to such a strayne, and destitute of his awne suffraganes, could not here by no meanes escape, had not fyue persons of their awne accord stepped in, being bound for him, every one in one hundred Markes, and this was vpon the second day concluded.

The morrow after which was the thirde daye of the Counsayle, as the Archebishop was sitting beneth in a conclaue with his fellow Bishops about him, consulting together, the sayde Bishops labored by sundry wayes and meanes, and with verie vehement perswasions and learned arguments to wyll him to obedience and to submit himselfe to the king, the which perswasions for the length of them I doe here omit: But to conclude, when they had long spent their labour, good wyll and wisdom, to haue reduced him to good order, he would not condissend vnto them, but sayde as follooweth.

I perceyue sayth he, and vnderstand that ye go aboute to maintaine and cherishe but your owne cowardnesse vnder the colourable shadewe of sufferance, and vnder the pretence of dissembling softnesse, to choke the libertie of Christes Church: who hath thus bewitched you, O vnfaciable Bishoppes? what meane ye? why do you so vnder the impudent title of forbearing, beare a double heart, and cloke your manifest iniquitie? What call ye this bearing with tyme, the detriment of the Church of Christ? Let termes serue the matter, why peruert you the matter that is good with vocables and termes vnto true? For that ye say we must beare with the malice of tyme, I graunt with you, but yet we must not heape sinne to sinne. Is not God able to helpe the state and condicion of his Church, but with the sinfull dissimulation of the teachers of the Church? Certes God is disposed to tempt you. And tell me I pray you, when should the governours of the Church put themselves to daungers for the Church, in tyme of tranquillitie or in tyme of distresse? Ye will be ashamed to denie the contrary, but in distresse. And now then the Church lying in so great distresse and beration, why should not the good pastour put himselfe in perill therfore? For neither do I thinke it a greater act or merite, for the auncient bishops of the olde tyme, to found the Church than with their blood, or then now for vs to shed our blood for the liberties of the same. And to tell you plaine, I thinke it not safe for you, to swarue from the forme and example which you haue receyued of your holy elders.

After these thinges were spoken, they sate all in silence a certaine space, being locked in together as aforesayde: But at the length to finde a chift to cause the doore to be opened, I wolde sayth the Archebishop speake both two Erles that are about the king, and named them who they were, which being called, opened the doore and came in with haste, thinkyng to heare some thing which shoulde appease the kinges minde, to whome the Archebishop spake in this maner. As touchyng and concernyng the matters betwene the king king and vs, we haue here conferred together. And forasmuch as we haue them not here present with vs now, which know better in the matter than we do, whose aduise we would also be glad to follow, therefore we craue so much respite as vntill to morow, and then we will be redy to geue by our answer vnto the king: with this message two bishops were sent vnto the king, which was the Bishop of London and the Bishop of Rochester.

London to helpe the matter, and to set quietnesse, addyng somethyng more to the message, sayde to the king, that the Archebishop craued a litle delay of tyme to prepare suche wytyngs and instrumentes, wherewith he should set forth and declare his mynd, in accomplishing the kinges desyre. &c. Wherefore two Barons were sent to him from the king to graunt him that respite or stay, so that he woulde ratifie that which the messengers had signified to the king. To the which the Archebishop answered that he sent no suche message as was intimate in his name: but onely that the next day he woulde come and geue answer to the king, in that which he had to say. And so the conuocation of the Bishops dissolved, and they were dismissed home. So that the most part of them that came with the Archebishop and accompanied him before, for feare of the kinges displeasure seuered themselves from him. The Archebishop thus forsaken and destitute (as the history of hym sayth) sent about for the poore, the lame, & the halt, to come in and furnish his house, sayyng, that by them he might sooner obtayne his victory, than by the other, which had so slypt from him.

On the next day folowynge, because it was Sunday nothing was done. So the day after, which was the second fery, the Archebishop was cited to appear: But the night before being taken with the disease of the Cholike, all that day he kept his bed, and not able as he sayd to aryse. Every man supposed it to be but a feyned sicknesse, certeyne of the chiefe Nobles were sent to trie out the matter, and to cite him to the Court, Robert Erle of Leicester, and Reginald Erle of Devonshire. To whom the Archebishop answered, that as that day he was so diseased that he coulde not come, and though he were brought in a horse Litter: so that day passed ouer.

The morrow after, certeyne that were aboute him, fearing no lesse but that some daunger would happen vnto him, gaue him counsaile in the morning to haue a Masse in the honour of the holy Martyr Saint Stephen, to kepe him from the handes of his enemies that day. When the morrow was come being Tuesday, there came to him the Bishops and Priates, counsailling and perswadyng him couertly by insinuation (for apertly they durst not) that he woulde submit himselfe aswell for all other his goodes, as also his Archebishoprike to the will of the king, if peradventure his indignation by that meanes might asswage. Addyng moreouer, that onlesse he would so do, perjury should be layd against him, for that he vnder the othe of fidelitic had promised to kepe the kinges lawes and ordinaunces, and now he would not obserue them. To this Becket answered againe: Brethren ye see and perceyue well howe the worlde is set against me, and how the enemy riseth and seketh my confusion. And although these be dolorous and lamentable, yet the thing that grieneth me most of all is this: the somes of myne awne mother be prikes and thornes against me. And albeit that I do holde my peace, yet the posteritie to come will knowe and report howe cowardlye you

Thomas Becket, is counsailed to haue a Masse of S. Stephen to defend him from his enemies.

Thomas Becket was charged with perjury.

haue turned your backes, and haue left me your Archebifhop and Metro- politane alone in this conflict, and how you haue fitten in iudgement againft me (although an vnworthie finner) nowe two dayes together, and not that onely in the Ciuile or Spirituall Court, but also in the temporall Court redy to do the fame. But in generall this I charge and commaunde you all, by the vertue of pure obedience, and in perill of your awne order, that ye be not pre- fent personally in iudgement againft me. And that ye fhall not fo do, I here appeale to our mother and refuge of all fuch as be oppreffed, the Church of Rome: and if any feculer man fhall lay handes vpon me (as it is rumored they will) I ftreightly enioyne & charge you in the fame vertue of obedience, that you exercise your censure Ecclefiasticall vpon them, as it becometh you to do for your father and Archebifhop. And this I do you to vnderftand, that though the world rage, and the enemy be fierce, and the body trembleth, for the flefh is weake, yet God fo fauouring me, I will neyther cowardlye fhynke, nor bilye forfake my flocke committed to my charge.

But the Bifhop of London contrary to this commaundement, did incon- tinent appeale from him. And thus the Bifhops departed from him to the Court, faue onely two, that was Henry Bifhop of Wincheftre, and Jofelyne of Sarifbury, who returned with him secretly to his Chamber and comforted him. This done, the Archebifhop the next day addreffed him to the Masse of S. Stephen with all folemnitie, as though it had bene an high feftiuall day, with his Metropolitane Pall, which was not vfed to be worne, but vpon the holy day. &c. The office of his Masse began Sederunt Principes & aduer- fum me loquebantur. &c. that is, Princes fate and fpake againft me. &c. (The kinges feruants beyng also there, and beholding the matter) for this Masse Gilbert Bifhop of London accused Becket afterwarde, both for that it was done per artem magicam, & in contemptum Regis, (as the wordes of Houeden purport) that is both by art magique, and in contempt of the king.

The Masse beyng ended, the Archebifhop puttyng off his Pall, his Mit- ter and other robes, procedeth to the kinges Court, and taketh also the Sa- crament priuily about him. And comyng towardes the kinges Chamber there to attend vpon y<sup>e</sup> king, as he was entering in at the doze, he taketh from Alexander his Crofyer, the Croffe with the Croffestaffe, in the fight of all that ftode by, and carryeth it in himfelfe, the other bifhops folowing hym, and faying he did otherwife then became him. Amongest other, Robert Bifhop of Hertford offered himfelfe to beare his croffe, rather than he fhould fo do, for that was not comely: but the Archebifhop would not fuffer him. Then fayde the Bifhop of London vnto him, if the king fhall fee you come armed into his Chamber, perchance he will drawe out his fwoorde againft you, which is ftronger than yours, and then what fhall this your armour profite you? The Archebifhop answereth againe: if the kinges fwoorde do cut carnally, yet my fwoorde cutteth fpirituallly, and ftriketh downe to hell: But you my Lorde, as ye haue played the foole in this matter, fo you will not leaue off your folly fo farre as I can fee, and fo he came into the chamber. The king heering of his comyng & the maner thereof, taried not long, but came where Becket was fet in a place by himfelfe with his other Bifhops about him. First the cryer calling all the Prelates and all the Lordes of the Temporallie together: that beyng done, and euery one placed in his feate, accordyng to his degree: The king beginneth with a great complaint againft the Archebifhop, for his maner of entering into the court, not as into a kings court, but as a traytor, fhewing himfelfe fo like a traytor as hath not bene feene before in any chriftian kinges court: To this all there present gaue witnesse with the kings wordes. And fo altogether with one crye called him on euery fide Traytor. Wherevpon, great horroz and feare was what fhould befall on him. The Archebifhop of Yorke comyng downe to his men, fayd he could not abide to fee what the Arche- bifhop of Cantorbury was like to fuffer. Likewise, the Tipftaues and other ministers of the afsembly comyng downe with an outas agaynst him, crof- fed them to fee his hautie ftobernesse, & the bufinesse that there was towards him. Certeine there were of hys friendes one or two, fittying at his fecte, fome comfortyng him foftly, and bidding him to lay his curffe vpon them: Other contrary, bidding him not to curffe, but to pray and to forgiue them: and if he loft his life in the quarrell of the Church and the libertie thereof, he fhould be happy. Afterward one of them named Iohannes Stephani, wil- luyng to fpeake something in his eare, but could not be fuffered by the kinges Marshall, who forbade that any man fhould haue any talke with him. Then he, because that he could not otherwife fpeake vnto him, wrought by fignes, makyng a croffe and lokyng bp with his eyes, and waggyng his lippes mea- nyng that he fhould pray, & manfully ftande to the Croffe. In the meane time cometh to him Bartholomew Bifhop of Exeter, defiryng him to haue regard and copaffion vpon himfelfe, & also of them, or elfe they were all like to perifh for the hatred of him, for there cometh out, faith he, a precept from the king, that you fhall be taken, and fo fuffer for an open rebell, and who fo hereafter taketh your part fhall haue the like punifhment. It is fayd mozeouer, that Jofelinus Bifhop of Sarifbury, and William Bifhop of Norwiche are to be had to the place of execution for their refiftyng, and makyng interceffion for you. When he had thus fayd, the Archebifhop lokyng vpon the fayd bifhop of Exeter said: Aduoyde fayd he, hence from me, thou vnderftandest not, nei- ther doest thou fauour thofe thinges that be of God.

The Bifhops and Prelates then going afide by themfelues from the o- ther Nobles (the king fo permitting them to do) tooke counsaile together what was to be done. Here the matter ftode in a doubtfull perplexitie, for eyther must they incurre the daungorous indignation of the king: or elfe with the Nobles they must proceede in condemnatio againft the Archebifhop for refiftyng the kinges fancies, which they did not fauour themfelues. In this ftraite neceffitie, they denyng what way to take, at length agreed vpon this, that they with a common affent fhoulde appeale the Archebifhop to the See of Rome vpon perurie. And that they fhoulde oblige and binde them- felues to the king, with a fure promife to woork their diligence in depofing the Archebifhop vpon this condition, that the king fhould promife their fafety, and difcharge them from the perill of that iudgement which was towarde him. So all the Bifhops obligyng themfelues thus to the king, went feozth to the Archebifhop, of whome one fpeaking for the reast (which was Hlary Bifhop of Chichefter) had thefe wordes. Once you haue bere our Archbi- fhop, and fo long we were bounde to your obedience: but now for as much as you once fwearing your fidelitie to the king, doe refist hym, neglecting hys Injunctions and ordinaunces concerning and perteyning to his terrene honor and dignitie, wherefore we here pronounce you perjured, neither be we bound to geue obedience to y Archbishop thus perjured. But putting out selues & al oures in the Popes protection do appeale you* to his presence. And vpon the same assigned him his day & time to apere. The Archbishop answering again said, he heard him wel ynough, And vpon this sedeth vp to Rome in al hast to the Pope, signifying to him by letters the whole matter, how and wherefore & by whom he was appealed: After the Archbishop was thus appealed to Rome as before you haue heard, he then sitting w his crosse wayting in the Court, at the last the king sent by certain Erles and Barons commaundment to him (Robert the Erle of Leycester doing the message) that he should without delay come and render a full accompt of all things that he had receyued in fruits & reuenues of the realme, in the time he being his Chaunceloz, and especially for the 30000 Markes for the which he was accomptable to the king. To whom the Archbishop aunswereth, that the king knew how ofte he had made his reconning and accompt of those things which he nowe required. Further and besides, he sayde that Henry his sonne and heyre of the Realme, with all hys Barons and also Richarde Lucye his chiefe iustice tolde him that he was free and quit to God & holy Church from all receiptes and computations, and from all secular exactions on the kings behalfe. And so he taking this his discharge at their handes, entered into his office, and therefore other accompt besides he woulde make none. When this worde was brought to the king, he required his Barons to do the lawe vpon hym: who iudged him to be apprehended and layde in prison. This done the king sendeth vnto him Reginald Erle of Cornewall and of Deuonshire, and Robert Erle of Leycester, to declare to hym what was his iudgement. To whome the Archbishop aunswereth, heare my sonne and good Erle, what I say vnto you: how much more precious the soule is then the bodye, so muche more ought you to obey me in the Lord, rather than your terrene king: Neither doth any lawe or reason permit the children to iudge and condemne their father. Wherefore to aduoyde both the iudgement of the king and youres, and of all other, I put my selfe onelye to the Arbitrement of the Pope vnder God alone, to be iudged of him and of none other. To whose presence here before you all I do appeale, committing the orderng of the Church of Cantorbury my dignitie, with all other thinges apperteyning to the same, vnto the protection of God and his. And as for you my brethzen and felow bishops (which rather obey man than God) you also I call and clayme to the audience and iudgement of the Pope, and hence I depart from you as from the enemies of the Catholike Church, & of the auctority of the Apostolike See.

While the Barons returned with this aunswere to the king, the Archebishop passing through the throng, taketh to him his Palfrey, holdyng hys Crosse in the one hande, and the Bridle of his Palfrey in the other, the Courtiers folowyng after cryng Traytor, Traytor, tary & here thy iudgement: But he passed on vntill he came to the vttermost gate of the Court, which being fast locked, there he had bene stayed, had not one of his seruaunts called Peter, named Deunctorio, fyndyng there a bunch of keyes hangyng by, first proung one key, and then another, at the last chaunced vpon the right key, and so opened the gate and let him out. The Archebishop went streight way to the house of Chanons where he did lye, callyng in to him the poore where they

they could be found. When supper was done, making as though he would go to bed (which he caused to be made betwixt two Altars) he in the meane tyme prently, while the king was at Supper in the Euenyng, prepareth his iourney secretly to escape away, chaunging his garment and his name beyng calied Derman, first went to Lincolne, from thence to Sandwich, where he tooke Ship, and sayled into Flaunders, & from thence iourneyed to Fraunce as Houeden sayth. But Alanus differyng in the order of his flight, sayth that he did not flie that night, for at supper tyme there came vnto him the Bishops of London, and Chichester, declaryng to him that if he would surrender vnto the king his two maners of Otford and Wingham, there were hope to recouer the kinges fauour, and to haue all remitted: But when the Archebishop would not agree therewith, forasmuch as those Manours were belonging to the Church of Cantorbury: And the king heeryng thereof, was greatly offended. Insomuche that the next day, Becket was faine to sende to the king two Bishops and his Chapleyn to haue leaue to depart the realme. To the which message the king aunswered, that he would take a pause vntill the next day, and then he should haue aunswere. But Becket not taryng for his answer, the same day conueyed himselfe away secretly, as is aforesaid to Lodouicus the french king. But before he came to the french king, Gilbert the B. of London, & William Erle of Arondel, sent from the king of England to Fraunce, preuented him, requiryng of the sayd french king in the behalfe of the king of England that he would not receiue nor reteyne within his dominion the Archbishop of Cantorbury. Moreover, y at his instance he would be a meanes to the Pope, not to shew any familiaritie vnto him. But the king of England in this poynt seemed to haue more confidence in the french king, then knowledge of his disposition. For thinkyng that the french king would be as a good neighbour to him, in trustyng to him he was deceyued. Neither considered he with himselfe enough the maner and nature of the french men, at that tyme against the Realme of England, who then were glad to seke and take all maner of occasions to do some acte against England. And therefore Lodouike the french king vnderstandyng the matter, and thinkyng percase to haue some aduantage thereby agaynst the king and Realme of England by y occasion hereof: Contrary to the kings letters of request, not onely harboureth and cheriseth this Dereman, but also wytyng to the Pope by his Almoner and brother, entreateth him vpon all loues, as euer he would haue his fauour to tender the cause of the Archebishop Becket. Thus the kinges Ambassadors repulsed of the french king returned, at what tyme he sent another Ambassade vpon the lyke cause to Alexander the Pope, then beyng at Sene in Fraunce. The Ambassadors sent on this message were, Roger Archebishop of Yorke, Gilbert Bishop of London, Henry Bishop of Winchester, Hillary Bishop of Chichester, Bartholomew Bishop of Excester with other Doctors and Clerkes: Also William Erle of Arondell, with certeyne mo Lordes and Barons. Who comyng to the Popes Court, were friendly accepted of certaine of the Cardinalles, amongst the which Cardinalles, there arose also discention about the same cause, some iudgyng the Bishop of Cantorbury in the defence of the libertyes of the Church, as in a good case was to be mainteyned: Some thinking againe that he beyng a perturber of peace and bunitie, was rather to be brided for his presumption, then to be fostered soffered and encouraged therein. But the Pope partly bearing with his cause, and partly incensed thereunto wth the letters of the French king, did wholly encline to Becket. Wherefore the Pope the next day solowyn<sup>g</sup> sitt<sup>ng</sup> in consistory with his Cardinalles, when the Ambassadors were called for, to the heeryng of Becket's matter, first begynneth the Bishop of London, next the Archebishop of Yorke, then Exeter, and thzough the Bishoppes every one in their order to speake. Whose Orations beyng not well accepted of the Pope, and some of them also disderneyd: The Erie of Arondell perceyving that, somewhat to qualifie and temper the matter to the Popes eares began after this maner.

the Erie of Arondell which he made in French.

Although to me it is vnknowen (sayth he) which am both vnlettered and ignorant, what it is, that these Bishoppes here haue sayde, neyther am I in that tongue so able to expresse my minde as they haue done: yet beyng sent and charged thereunto of my Prince, neyther can, nor ought I but to declare (as well as I may) what the cause is of our sendyng hether, not to contende or strue with any person nor to offer any iniury or harime vnto any man, especially in this place, and in the presence here of such a one, vnto whose becke and auctoritie all the worlde doth stoupe and yeelde. But for this intent is our Legacie hether directed, to present here before you, and in the presence of the whole Church of Rome, the deuotion and lone of our king and maister, which euer he hath had, and yet hath still toward you. And that the same may the better appere to your excellencie, he hath assigned and appoynted to the furniture of this Legacie, not the least, but the greatest: not the worst, but the best and chiefest of all his subiectes, both Archebishops, Bishoppes, Erles, Barons, with other Potentates mo, of such worthinesse and parentage, that if he could haue found greater in all his Realme, he woulde haue sent them, both for the reuerence of your person, and of the holy Church of Rome.ouer and besydes this I might adde to more, which your holinesse hath sufficiently tryed and proued all ready, the true and heartie fidelitie of this our Soueraigne toward you: Who in his first entrance into his kingdome wholly submitted himselfe, with all that is his besydes, to your will and pleasure.

And truly to testifie of his maiestie howe he is disposed to the vnitie of the Catholique fayth, we beleue there is none more faythfull in Christ than he, nor more deuoute to God, nor yet more moderate in keepyng the vnitie of peace whereunto he is called. And as I may be bolde this to protest for our king and maister: so neyther do I deny touching the Archebishop of Cantorbury, a man also not destitute nor vnfurnished with giftes and ornaments in his kinde of calling, to be a man both sage and discrete, in such thinges as to him apperteyne, saue onely that he semeth to some, more quicke and sharpe than nedeth. This blot alone if it were not, and the breache betweene him and our king had not happened, both the regimentes together of the Temporallie and Spirituallie might quietly haue flourished, one with the other, in much peace and conorde, both vnder a Prince so worthie, and a Pastor so vertuous. Wherefore the case so standyng as it doth, our message hether and our supplication is to your vigilant prudence, that through your fauour and wisdom, the necke of this discention may be broken, and that reformation of vnitie and loue may by some good meanes be sought.

This Oration of his, although it was liked of them for the softnesse and moderation moderation thereof: yet it could not so perswade the bishop of Rome to condescende to their sute and request, which was to haue two Legates or Arbitrers to be sent from him into England to examine and to take by the controuersie betweene the king and the Archebishop. But the Pope beyng encensed as is sayde before, would not graunt to their petition, forasmuch as it should be (sayth he) preiudiciall, tending to the oppression of the Archebishop to graunt vnto it, he beyng not present. And therefore willed them to tary hys comyng, or else, he beyng absent, he would not he sayde in any case proceede against him. But they allegyng againe, their tyme to be expyred appoynted them of the king, hauyng besydes other lettes & causes, as they alleaged, said, they could not there wayte for the comyng of Becket, and so returned backe their cause frustrated without the Popes blessing to the king. Within foure dayes after, Becket commeth to the Popes court, where he prostrating himselfe at his feete, brought out of his bosome a scroll conteynyng the customes and ordinaunces of the king afore mentioned. The Pope receiuyng the sayd scroll, and readyng it in the open heeryng of his Cardinalles, condemned and cursed the most part of those decrees of the king, which he called Consuetudines auitas, that is, his Grandfathers ordinaunces: Besides, the Pope moreouer blamed Becket, for that he so much yeldd vnto them at the beginning, as he did: Yet notwithstanding, because he was repentant for his vniadvised fact, he was content to assoyle him for the same, and that the rather because of his great troubles, which for the liberties of the holye Church he did sustaine, and so with great fauour for that day they dismissed him.

The next day, Alexander the Pope assemblyng his Cardinals together in his secret Chamber, appereth before them the Archebishop of Cantorbury, who made there a solempne Oration, and there and then resigned into the handes of the Pope the Archebishopsrike of Cantorbury, & his Oration beyng ended, he was bidden to stand apart. The Pope then coferring wth his Cardinalles, about the resignation of Becket, what was best to be done: Some thought it best to take the occasion offered, thinking thereby the kings wrath might easily be swaged, if the Church of Cantorbury were assigned to some other person, and yet the sayd Becket to be otherwise prouided for notwithstanding. Contrary, other again thought otherwys, whose reason was: For if he y<sup>d</sup> for the liberties of the Church had ventured not only his goodes, dignitie, & auctoritie, but also his life, should nowe at the kinges pleasure be depriued, like as it might be a president hereafter to others in resisting their king in like sort, if his cause were mainteyned: so contrary, if it were quayed, it should be an example to all other hereafter none to resist his Prince in the like case, & so might redound not only to the weakening of the state of the Catholike Church, but also to the derogation of the Popes auctoritie. Briefly this sentence at length preuayled, that Becket receyueh his pastoral office at the Popes hand againe, with commendation & much fauour. But forsomuch as he could not be well placed in England, in the meane while the Pope sendeth him with a Monkes habite into the Abbey of Pontiniack in France, where he remayned two yeres, & from thence he remoued to Senon where he remayned .v. yeres, and so the time of his exyle continued in all .vij. yeres.

Upon this, the king beyng certified by his Ambassadors of the Popes answer, holwe his fauour encilned more to Becket, than to him, he was moued moued with wrathfull displeasure. Who vpon the same directed out certaine Injunctions against the Pope & the Archbishop of Cantorbury, much like, & the same in effect that are before reherfed in the beginning of this Hystory.

And besides his Injunctions, the king also let forth his proclamation that all maacer of persons both men and women, who soeuer were founde of the kindred of Thomas Becket, should be banished without taking anye parte of their goodes with them, and sent to him where he was, which was no little veration to Becket to beholde them. Moreover, for so muche as he was then lying with Swaryn Abbot of Pontiniack, to whome the Pope as is aforesayde had commended him, therefore the king wryting to the same Abbot, required him not to retayne the Archbishop of Cauntorbury in his house, eyther else he would dzyre out of his realme all the Monkes of his order. Wherevpon Becket was inforced to remoue from thence, and went vnto Lewes the French king, by whome he was placed at Senon and there founde of him the space of fiue yeres, as is aboue mencioned.

After the aforesayde Injunctions and proclamation were thus set forth, which greued and troubled Becket not a little, then he for helpe resorted to the Pope, and obteyned of him letters to the king, and likewise the king agayne wrote to the Pope: And at the last the Archbishop in his owne name wrote to the king, and to sundrie of the Clergie, namely to certaine Bishops, who verie learnedly and plainly aunswered him, in suche maner as he had no hope of any good enterpiment in this realme. And in the ende he receyued a learned & worthy answere from the whole Clergie of England, (which for length I ouerpasse) so effectually & substantially written, as there could not be a better. But all this moued him nothing: And now that he saw himselfe to be of smal estimation among the Clergie of England, he therfore earnestly besought the Pope of aide & helpe against his aduersaries: and at the last he obteyned of him certaine curses & excommunications. And first he put his curse in execution vpon the Ministers of his church of Cantorbury, and then executed the same vpon certaine Bishops that had contempned hym, and lastly he procured two Legates to be sent from the Pope to the king to curse him and all the whole realme, if the king would not restore him againe to his pristinate state and dignitie.

Becket sateth to curse king.

Communication betwene the French king and the king of England, & Thomas Becket.

The king being thus vexed with the Archebishop, departed into Normandy, and shortly after into Fraunce to the French king, where then the Archbishop was present, and the French king perceyuing the king of England to be disquieted, and he desirous to procure peace, or at the leastwise pretending to set agreement betweene them, brought the matter to a communication among them. In the which communication the French king made himselfe as an Ampere betwene them. The king of Englande vnderstanding that the Archbishop would commit himselfe to his arbitrement, was the more wylling to admyt his presence. Wherevpon many being there present, the Archebishop (prostrating himselfe at the kings feete) declared vnto him kneeling vpon his knees that he would commit the whole cause, whereof the dissension arose betweene them, vnto his aboue arbitrement, adding thereto as he did before Saluo honore dei, that is, sauing the honour of God. The king then as is sayde before was greatly offended at this worde Saluo honore dei, and also hearyng and seing the stiffenesse of the man, sticking so muche so muche to this worde Saluo honore.&c. was highly therewith displeased, rebuking him with many grienous wordes, as a man proude and stubborne, and he also charged him with sundry & great benefites bestowed vpon him, as a person vnkinde and forgettyng what he so gently had done and bestowed vpon him.

And speakyng to the French king then beyng present: See Sir if it please you (sayth the kyng of Englande) whatsoeuer displeaseth this man, that he sayth to be contrary to the honour of God. And so by this meanes he will bendicate and chalenge to himselfe both that is his and myne also. And yet notwithstanding, for that I will not seeme to do any thing contrary or prejudiciall to Gods honour, this I offer him: There haue bene kinges in England before me, both of greater and lesse puissaunce then I am: Lykewise, there haue bene Bishoppes of Cauntorbury many both great and holy men, what the greatest and most holyst of all his predecessors before him, haue done to the least of my progenitors & predecessors before me, let him do the same to me, and I am content. They that stood by, hecryng these wordes of the king cryed all with one voyce, the king hath debased himselfe ynough to the Bishop. The Archebishop stayng a little at this with silence, what sayth the French king to him, my Lorde Archebishop, will you be better then these holy men? will you be greater then Peter? what stande you doubting? heare, now haue you peace & quietnesse put into your aboue handes if ye will take it. To this the Archbishop answering againe: truth said he, my predecessors before me were much both better and greater than I, and of them, every one for his tyme, although he did not extirpe and cut off all, yet some thing they did plucke by and correct, which semed aduerse and repugnaunt agaynst Gods honour. For if they had taken altogether away, no such occasion then had bene left to any man, to rayse by this fyre of temptation agaynst vs as nowe is rayfed, to prooue vs withall, that we beyng so produced with them, might also be crowned with them, beyng likewise partakers of their prayse and rewarde, as we are of their labour and trauaile. And though some of them haue bene slacke or exceede in their duetie doyng, in that we are not bound to follow their exaruple.

Thomas Becket and were to the king of Englande.

Peter, when he denyed Christ, we therefore rebuke him: But when he resisted the rage of Nero, therein we commend him. And therefore, because he could not finde in his conscience to consent vnto him, he ought in no wyse to dissemble with him, neyther did, by reason whereof he lost his life. By such lyke oppressions the Church hath alwayes growen. Our forefathers and predecessors because they would not dissemble the name and honoz of Christ, therefore they suffered: And shall I to haue the fauour of one man suffer the honour of Christ to be suppressed. The Nobles standyng by hearyng him thus speake were greatly agreued with him, notyng in him arrogancy and wilfulnesse, in perturbying and refusyng such an honest order of agreement: But specially one among all the rest, who there openly protested, that seeyng the Archebishop so refused the counsayle and request of both the kinges, he was not worthy to haue the helpe of either other, whome as the kingdome of England had reiected, so the kingdome of Fraunce should not entertaine.

Allanis, Herbertus, and other of his Chapleynes that commytted to Rozy the doyngs of Becket, do recorde (whether truly or no I can not say) that that after this, the French king sendyng for him, as one much sorowynge and lamentyng the wordes that he had spoken at the commyng of Becket, did prostrate himselfe at the feete of the Archebishop, confessyng his fault in geuyng that counsaile to him in such a cause, perteynyng to the honour of God, to relent therein, and to yelde to the pleasure of man: Wherefore declaryng his repentaunce, desyred to be assoyled thereof. So that after that the french king and Becket were great friendes together, insomuch that king Henry sendyng to the king, to entreate and desyre him, that he would not support nor maintaine his enemy within his Realme: The french king utterly denyed the kinges request, takyng part with the Archebishop rather than with him.

Besides these quarelles and grudges betwene the king and the Archebishop aboue mentioned, there folowed yet moreouer a nother, which was this. Shortly after this communication betwene the kynges and Becket, the king of England returning againe from Normandy into England, which was the yere of our Lord M. C. lxxij. and the. xiiij. yere of his reigne about Midsonnet kept his Court of Parliament at Westminster. In the which Parliament through the assent of the Clergie, and the Lordes Temporall, he caused his sonne Henry to be crowned king. Which coronation was done by the handes of Roger Archebishop of Yorke, with the assistance of other bishops ministring to the same, as Gilbert of London, Joselyn of Sarisbury, Hugh of Duresme, and Gualter of Wochefer. By reason whereof, Becket of Cauntorbury beyng there neyther mentioned nor called for, tooke no little displeasure. And so did Lodowick the french king, heeryng that Margaret his daughter was not crowned with her husbunde, whereupon gatheryng a great army, he marched toward Normandy. But that matter was sone composed by the king of England, who sendyng his sonne to him in Normandy, intreated there, and concluded peace with him, promisyng that his son should be crowned againe and his daughter also. But the Archebishop not ceasing his displeasure, sent againe vnto the Pope, complainyng vpon these foure Bishops, especially of the Archebishop of Yorke, who durst be so bolde in hys absence, and without his knowledge or his licence to entermeddle to crebene the king, beyng a matter proper and peculier to his iurisdiction. At the instance of whom, the Pope sent downe the sentence of excommunication against the Bishop of London. The other three Bishops with the Bishop of Yorke, he suspended, whose sentence and letters thereof, for the aduoyding of prolixitie I here omit. This beyng done, the Archebishop of Yorke with the foresayde Bishops resorted to the king with a greivous complaint, declaring how miserable their case stode, and what they had sufferyed for fulfillyng of his commaundement. The king heeryng this was highly moued.

And in the meane season, the french king for his part, and his Clergie, and Courtiers slackt none occasion to insite and sollicite Alexander the Pope, against the king of England, to excommunicate him also, sekynge thereby, and thinkyng to haue some bauntage agaynst the Realme: Neither was the king ignozant of this, which made him more ready to apply to some agreement of reconciliation. At length cometh downe from the Pope two Legates, the one the Archebishop of Roan, & the other, the Bishop of Auerne, with direction, and full commission either to driue the king to be reconciled, or to be interdicted by the Popes censures out of the Church. The king vnderstanding himselfe selfe to be in greater streights than he could well aduoyde, at length through the mediation of the french king, and of other Prelates & great Princes, he was content to yelde to peace and reconciliation with the Archebishop whome he receyued both to his fauour, and also permitted and graunted him free returne to his Church againe. Albeit concerning his possessions and landes of the Church of Cantorbury, although Becket made great labour therfore, yet the king beyng then in Normandy, would not graunt him that, before he should repayre into England, to see how he would there agree with his subiectes. Thus peace after a sort beyng concluded betwene the king and him, the Archebishop returned into England, where he was right ioyfully receyued of the Church of Cauntorbury: Albeit of Henry the yong king he was not so greatly welcommed. Insomuch that he commyng by to London to the king, was returned and commaunded backe to Cauntorbury, and there bidden to kepe his house.

Roger Houeden maketh mention in his Chronicle, that the Archebishop vpon Christmas day did excommunicate Robert de Broock, for cuttyng off the tayle of one of his horses the day before.

In this meane tyme, the foure Bishops before mencioned whome the Archebishop did excommunicate, as is aforesayde, sent to him humbly, desyryng to be released of their censure. To whome when as the Archebishop would not graunt clerely and simply, without cautels and exceptions, they went ouer vnto the king, declaryng to him and complainyng of their miserable estate and incurteous handlyng of the Archebishop. Whereupon the king conceyued great displeasure in his minde toward the Archebishop. Insomuche that he lamented oft and sundry tymes to them about him, that among so manye as he had done for, there was none that would reuenge him of his enemye: By the occasion of which wordes, certaine that were about the king, to the number of foure, heeryng the king thus complain and lament, addressed themselves in great heate of haste to satisfie the agriued minde and quarell of their Prince: who within foure dayes after the aforesayde Christmas day, saylyng ouer into England, hauyng a forwarde and a prosperous wynde in their iourney, beyng in the deepe of winter, came to Cauntorbury where Becket was commaunded to kepe. Where after certeine aduiseement and consultation had among themselves, they pressed at length into the Bishops palace, where the Archebishop was sittynge with his company about him: And first they assayed him with gentle wordes to see whether he would relent to the kinges minde, and come to some conformitie, and said, that they had brought to him a commaundement from the king, which, whether he had rather openly there in presence, or secretly, to be declared vnto him, they bid him chose. Then the company beyng bidden to aduoyde, as he saie alone, they sayde: you are commaunded from the king beyond the Sea, to repayre to the king here his sonne, there to do your dutye to him, in swearyng to him your fidelitie for your baronage and other thinges, and to amend those thinges wherein yee haue offended against him. Whereupon the Archebishop denyng to sweare, and perceyuyng theyr entent, called in his company againe: and in multiplyng of wordes to and fro, at length they came to the Bishops which were excommunicate for the coronation of the king, whome they commaunded him in the kings name, that he should absolue and set free againe. The Archebishop answered that he neyther suspended nor excommunicated them but the Pope, wherefore if that were the matter that greued them, they should resort to the Pope, he had nothing to do with the matter. Then sayde Reginald one of the foure. Although you in your awne person did not excommunicate them, yet thozow your instigatio it was done. To whom the Archebishop againe answered: and if the Pope sayde he, tending the iniuries done to me and to my Church, wrought this reuenge for me, I confesse it offendeth me nothing. Thus then sayde they, it appereth by your awne wordes that it pleaseth you right well, in contempt and contumely of the kings Maiestie, to sequester his Bishops from their ministrie, who at the commaundement of the king did seruire in the Coronation of his sonne. And seing ye haue presumed thus to stande against the exaltation of this oure soueraine oure newe king, it seemeth lykely that you will aspire to take his crowne from him, and to be exalted king your selfe. I aspire not sayde he to the crowne and name of the king, but rather if I had foure crownes to geue him more, I would set them all vpon him, such good wyll I doe beare him, that onely his father the king excepted, there is none whose honor I more tender and loue. And as concerning the sequestring of those Bishops, this I geue you to vnderstand, that there was nothing done in that behalfe without the knowlege and assent of the king himselfe, to whome when I had made my complaint at the feast of Mary Magdalene of the wrong and iniurie done to me and my Church therein, he gaue me his good leaue to obtaine at the Popes hand such remedie therein as I could, promising moreouer his helpe to me in the same. What is this quoth they that thou sayest? Makest thou the king a traitor & bewrayer of the king his awne son, that when he had commaunded the Bishops to crowne his sonne, he would geue thee leaue after to suspend them for so doing? Certes, it had bene better for thee not to haue accused the king of this prodicion. The Archebishop said to Reginald one of the foure, that he was there present himselfe at that time and heard it, but that he denyed and swore it was not so: and thinke you said they, that we the kings subiectes will or ought to suffer this? And so appoaching neerer vnto him sayde, he had spoken ynough against his awne head: whereupon followed great exclamacion and many threating wordes. Then the Archebishop sayde, I haue sithen my comming ouer, susteyned manye iniuries and rebukes, concerning both my selfe, my men, my cattell, my wyues & other goodes, notwithstanding the king writing ouer to his sonne, required him that I should lyue in safetie and peace, and nctwe besydes all other, you come hether to threaten mee. To this Reginald answered and sayde, if there be any that worketh you iniurie, otherwise then right is, the lawe is open, why doe you not complayne? To whom sayde Becket should I complayne? To the yong king sayde they. Then Becket sayde, I haue complayned ynough if that woulde helpe. I haue sought for remedie at the kings handes so long as I could be suffered to come vnto his speeche: but now seing I am stopped from that, neyther can finde redresse of so great vexations and iniuries as I haue and daylie doe susteyne, nor can haue the benefite of law or reason: such right and lawe as an Archebishop maye haue, that will I exercise and let for no man. At these wordes one of them burst out in exclamacion and cryed, he threatneth: he threatneth: what, wyll you also also interdict the whole Realme and vs altogether? Nay, that shall he not sayth another, he hath interdicted to many already. And drawyng more nere vnto him, they protested and denounced him to haue spoken wordes to the icopardie of his awne head. And so departyng in great violence, and with many high wordes, rushed out of the doores: Who by the way returnyng to the Monkes, charged them in the kinges name to kepe him forthcomming that he should not escape away. What quoth the Archebishop, thinke ye that I will fle away? Nay, neyther for the king nor for anye man aline will I stirre one foote from you. So sayd they, thou shalt not aduorde though that thou wouldest. And so they departed in hie clamour of wordes. The Archebishop, foloweth them out of the Chamber doze, cryng after them, here, here, here shall you finde me, layng his hand on his crowne. The names of these foure men, were these, Reginald Bereson, Hugh Mozteuill, William Thzacy, and Richard Briton: But Fabian nameth them, William Briton, Hugh Mozuile, William Thzacy, and Reignold Fitzbrye, who goyng to harnessse themselues, returned the same day againe: But fyndyng the Hall doze of the Palace of Cauntorbury shut against them, they went to an inwarde backe doze, leadyng into an Orchard, and there brake by a Windowe and opened the doze, and so entered into the place. The Monkes (beyng about Euen-song tyme) had got the Archebishop into the Church, who beyng perswaded by them, caused his crosse to be bozne before him, and so thzough the Cloyster by a doze which was broken by for him, proceeded into the Quier. The harnesssed men folowed after, and at the last came to the Church doze, which doze the Monkes would haue shut against them, but (as their stozey sayth) the Archebishop would not suffer them. So they appoaching into the Church, and the Bishop meting them vpon the stapes, there he was slaine, euery one of them striking him with his sworde into the head. And after they had thus slaine him they fled into the North countrie, and at length with muche a do, obteynyng their pardon of the Pope, thzough the kinges procurement (as some stozey record) they were enioyned in penance to go on pilgrimage to Jerusalem. And thus an ende of the stozey of the life and death of Thomas Becket.

Richard Prioz of Douer succeeded Thomas Becket and was chosen Archebishop after him, a man of an yll lye and an inordinate waster of the goodes of the Church.

Now when Becket was thus murdered, the king fearyng the Popes wrath and curse to be layd vpon him (whereunto Lodouike or Lewis the French king also holpe what he could to set the matter forward) sent to Rome the Archebishop of Roan with certeine other bishops and Archdeacons vnto the Pope, with his excuse, which the Pope woulde in no wise heere. And after, he sent second messengers, which some of the Cardinales receyued, shewyng them that on good fryday (beyng then nie at hande) the Pope of custome was vsed to asloyle or to curse, and that it was noysed that the king of England with his Bishops should be cursed by name; and his lande enterdicted, and hereupon the kinges messengers were put in prison. Whereupon certeyne of the Cardinales shewed the Pope that the Messengers had power to swear to the Pope, that the king should obey to his punishment and penance. Which was taken both for the king and for the Archebishop of

And shortly after, as sayth Fabian, Cooper, and other, the Pope Canonized Thomas Becket for a Saint & holy Martyr.

The kinges Ambassadors lyng as is sayd in Rome, could find no grace or fauour a long tyme at the Popes hande. At the length with much a do, it was agreed that two Cardinalles should be sent downe, to enquire out the matter concernyng them that were consentyng to Becket's death. The king perceyving what was in preparing at Rome, neither beyng yet certeine, whereto the intent of the Pope and the commyng downe of the Cardinalles woulde tende, in the meane time addressed himselfe with a great power to enter into Irelande, geuing in charge and commaundement (as Houndeden wyrteth) that no bringer of any brieft or any letter should in his absence come ouer into England, or passe out of the Realme, of what degree or condicion so euer he were, without speciall licence and assurance, to bring nothing that should be preiudiciall to him, or to the realme.

The aforesaid order being set and ordeyned, the king with foure hundreth great ships taketh his iourney to Ireland in the aforesayd yere of his reigne where he subdued in short tyme the whole lande vnto him, which at that time was gouerned vnder diuerse kinges, to the number of fiue. Of whom foure submitted themselues vnto the sayd king Henry: Onely the fift who was the king of Conacta, denyed to be subdued, keepyng him in Woodes and Marishes. And hauyng subdued that countre, he by the helpe of the Archbishop of Armach, reformed their religion in thre speciall poyntes. First, he ordeyned that the deuine seruice should be sayde and song, and the Sacramentes ministred after the English maner: Secondly he tooke order for tythes and other duties to be payde vnto the Curates and Ministers by the lay people. Thirdly, he ordeyned that euery man should make his testament and last wil in the presence of his neighbours, or at the leastwise cause it to be read before them.

In the meane season while the king was thus occupied in Ireland, the two Cardinalles sent from the Pope, Theodimus, and Albertus, were come to Normandy: vnto whome the king the next yere folowynge resorted about the Moneth of October. But before, duryng the tyme of the kinges beyng in Ireland, the Bishop of London, and Joselyne Bishop of Sarisbury had sent to Rome, & procured their Absolution from the Pope. The king returning out of Ireland by Wales into England, & thence into Normandy, there made his purgation before the Popes Legates as touchyng the death of the aforesaid Becket, to the which he swore that he was neither ayding nor comfortyng, but onely spake rigorous wordes against him, for that his knightes would not auenge him against the sayde Becket. For the which cause this penance was enioyned vnto him vnder his othe.

1 First that he should sende so much money to the holye lande, as woulde finde two hundreth knightes or Souldiours for the defence of the lande by the space of thre yerres.

2 Also that from the terme of Christmasse day then next folowynge, he should should set forth in his awne person to fight for the holy land the space of thre yerres together: onlesse he should be otherwise dispenced withall by the Pope.

3 Item, that if he would make his iourney into Spaine as the present necessitie did requyre, there to fight against the Saracens: as long tyme as he should there abide, so long space might he prolong his iourney to Jerusalem.

4 Item, that he should not hinder, nor cause to be hindered by hym any appellation made to the Pope of Rome.

5 Item, that neither he nor his sonne, should recede or disseuer from Pope Alexander, or from his Catholique successors, so long as they should recount him or his sonne for kinges Catholique.

6 Item, that the goodes and possessions taken from the Church of Cauntorbury, should be restored againe fully and amplye, as they stode the yere before Thomas Becket departed the Realme, and that free libertie should be graunted to all such as were outlawed for Becket's cause to returne againe.

7 Item, that the foresayd customes and decrees by him established against the Church, should be extinct and repealed, such onely except, that concerned his awne person, &c. besides other secret fasting & almose dedes enioined him.

All these former conditions the king with his sonne did both agree vnto, debasyng himselfe with great humilitie and submission before the sayde two Cardinalles: by the occasion whereof, the Cardinalles tooke no little pride, vlyng this verse of the Psalme, Qui respicit terram, & facit eam tremere, qui tangit montes & fumigant. That is, which looketh vpon the earth, and maketh it tremble, which toucheth the hilles and they smoke, &c. Moreover, it is mentioned in Histories of the sayd king that a little after, at what time William king of Scottes made a roade into the Realme, he returnyng out of Normandy into England, came first to Cauntorbury, and by the way so sore as he came within the sight of Becket's Church, lighting off his horse, and puttyng off his hosen and shoen, he went barefoote to his Tombe, whose steppes were found bloody through the roughnesse of the stones. And not onely that, but also receyued further penance by euery Monke of the Cloyster, that is to say a certeyne discipline of a Rod. The which by all likelihood was the secret penance that the Cardinalles enioyned him.

In the .xxi. yere of his reigne he caused a conuocation of Bishops to be holden at Westmynster by Richard Archebishop of Cauntorburie. In which conuenticle, then being present all the Bishoppes and Abbottes of the prouince of Cauntorburie, a great contention arose betwene the two Archebishops of Cauntorbury and Porke, as it had done a little before in king William the Conquerours time and. bii. yere of his reigne 1074. about the obedience that the Archbishop of Porke shoulde doe to Cauntorbury, that is, whether the Archebishop of Porke might beare his Crosse in the Diocesse of Cauntorbury, or no: Also aboute the Bishoprick of Lyncolne, of Chichester, of Worcester, of Hereford, whether these Churches were vnder the iurisdiction of the See of Porke, or not, &c. Upon these and such other like matters rose such controuersie betwene these two Sees, that the one appealed the other to the presence of the Bishop of Rome.

In this and suche cases lyke, howe muche better had it bene if the primacie had remainyd more nere in the kinges handes at home, wherby not onely much labour and trauaile had bene saued, but also the great and wast full expences bestowed at Rome might with muche fruite and thanke haue bene conuerted to their cures and flockes committed vnto them, and also percase their cause no lesse indifferently heard, at the least moze spedely might haue bene decided: but to the purpose againe.

In this controuersy diuerse of the Bishop of Yorkes Clergie, suche as were of Gloucester, belongyng to the Church of Saint Oswalde, were excommunicate by the Archbishop of Cauntorbury, because they being summoned, refused to appere before him. At length, that is to say, the next yere folowynge, there was a Cardinall sent downe from Rome by the kinges procurement, who studied to set peace betwene the two Archbishops. So that the way of agreement was taken, by the meanes of the king at Winchester, that as touching the Church of Saint Oswalde in Gloucester, the Archebysshop of Cauntorbury should cease of his clayme thereof, molestynge the See of Yorke no moze therein. Also he should absolue againe the Clerkes thereof of whom he had excommunicated before. And as concernyng the bearyng of the Crosse and all other matters, it was referred to the Archebysshop of Roan and of other Bishops of Fraunce, so that for the space of fyue yeres an order was taken betwixt them, till they shoulde haue a full determination of their cause.

Shortly after this, the king purchased a dispensation of the Bishop of Rome for the voyage which he promised to make in proper person into the holy lande, to fight against the enemies of the Christian religion before two Cardinales as is aforesayde: The which dispensation was graunted vpon condition that he should builde three Abbayes in Englande. For the accomplishment whereof he put out of the house of Waltham secular Chanons, and placed in their steede reguler. And for the second he aduoyded the monks that were in the Abbey of Ambresburie, and set in their place Mynchions or Nonnes which he brought with him from beyond the Sea. And for the third he repayred after a homely sorte the Charterhouse of Wytham in the dioces of Bath and Welles.

Reynulph of Chester in his booke entiled Polichronicon, in his. vij. booke and. xxi. Chapter, sayth that thys king had long kept a bewtifull Ramosell for his Paramour, whome he called Rosamond, and that the sayde king had buylded for her at his place of Woodstock beside Oxforde a Boboze or chamber, which was so artificially wrought, and was such a laberinth and so full of turnings, dozes, and wayes most curiously deuyfed and made, that it was not possible without teaching to come to any that was therein, and that the same is called at this day Rosamonds Boboze: and he sayth that the cause of the making of the sayd Boboze, was for that the Queene could not abide the sayde damosell, and therefore would she haue done hir displeasure if she might haue come by her: and it is also written of some that at the last the Queene by a clewe or bothome of threed that was brought vnto hir, founde the way and came vnto hir, and that she lyued not long after, but dyed and was buried at Godestowe besyde Oxenford in the Chapterhouse there. And vpon hir Tombe was written this Epitaph.

Hic iacet in tumba, rosa mundi, non rosa munda

Non redolet, sed olet, que redolere solet,

Which is Englished by Fabian in meter as foloweth,

The

*The Rose of the worlde, but not the cleane flowre,
Is here nowe grauen: to whom beautie was lent,
In this graue full darke, now is her Bower,
That by her life was sweete and redolent.
But nowe that she is, from this life blent
Though she were sweete, nowe fowly doth she stinke,
A myrrour good for all that on her thinke.*

The sayde Authour sayth also that the aforesaide Rosamond had a little Coffer scarcely two foote long, merueylous artificially wrought, which is yet (sayth he) to be seene there, wherein Gyautes seeme to fight, beastes do startle and stirre, and fowles flyng in the ayre, and fishes swim in the water, without any mannes mouyng or helpe.

In the. xxi. yere of his reigne, he caused Henry his sonne to be the second tyme crowned king, with Margaret his wyfe the daughter of the frenche king, by Roger Archbishop of Roan, in a Parliament holden at Wyndchester, as he had promised to her father that he woulde do, as before ye haue heard.

And this yere the king deuided the realme into sixe partes, and ordeyned vpon euery part three Iustices of Assise yerely to passe through the Realme, which now are called the Assises. The circuite or limitation of which Iustices was thus disposed. The first company had Norfolke, Suffolke, Cambridgeshire, huntingdonshire, Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Essex, and Herfordshire.

The second company, had Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire, Staffordshire, Warwickshire, Northamptonshire, and Lecesterhire.

The thirde company, had Kent, Surrey, Southhamptonshire, Sussex, Barkeshire, Oxfordehire.

The fourth company, had Herfordshire, Gloucestershire, Worcesterhire, and Shropshire.

The fift company, had Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Devonshire, and Cornetwall.

The sixt companie, had Guertwikeshire, nowe called Yorkeshire, Richemondshire, Lancaster, Copeland, Westmerlād, Northūberland & Cōberlād.

But now these circuites are altered, & so are the number of the Iustices. In the. xxij. yere of his reigne, as saith Cooper, or as some other write in the. xxi. king Henry the sonne, by the exciting of the king of Fraunce, Alcanor his mother, and certeyne of the Nobles, as Robert Erle of Lecester, and other tooke armes, and arrered deadly warre against his naturall father. Diuerse strong battailes were foughten, aswell in England by the deputyes and friendes of both partes, as also in Normandy, Poytow, Guyan, and Briteyn, where they were corporally present: But the victory alway enclined to the father. There toke part against king Henry the father, Lewes king of Fraunce, William, king of Scotland, Henry, Geoffrey, and John his adone sonnes, Robert Erle of Lecester, Hugh of Chester, and other. But in the end, the sonnes with their allies were cōstrayned to bend to their fathers will, and to desyre peace, which he gently graunted vnto them, and forgaue them their trespassse. But William king of Scottes forfeited and lost the Erledome of Huntingdon, for taking of king Henry the sonnes part against the father.

And besides that, beyng discomfited and taken Prisoner at the Castell of Alnewike in Northumberland, he was compelled to yelde for his ransome the Citie of Carlelyll, the Castell of Bambourgh and the newe Castell vpon Tyne, and swore for euer to be true vnto the king, and as well he as his successors to do their homage as often as it should be required. The cause of which warres was as some wyte, because the king had emprisoned Quene Meanoz his wife for the loue of the Lady Rosamond mentioned before in the last yere, a Damosell of incomparable beautie. But Fabian sayth, that after the taking of William king of Scottes, the sayde William by the assent of his Lordes spirituall and temporall did homage to king Henry at his Citie of Porke, where the sayde William graunted by his Letters patentes, that he and his successors kinges of Scotland, should make their homage and fidelitie vnto the king of England as often as they should be necessarily required. And in signe and token thereof, the king offered his Hat and his Saddell vpon the Altar of Saint Peter in the Church of Porke, which for a remembrance of that dede, the sayde Hat and Saddle were there kept many yeres after. And mozeouer, the Lordes of Scotland tooke a solenne othe that if their king at any time would withdraw him from his allegiance, they would all arise against him, and be to him as enemies, vntill he were returned vnto his sayth and keepyng of his promise. And for the better confirmation of the sayd composition, the king of Scottes beyng summoned, came afterwarde vnto the kinges Parliament holden at Northampton, and at another season into Normandie.

In the .xxiii. yere of his reigne, the king and his sonnes were made agreed, and a newe aliaunce by marriage was made with Lewes of Fraunce: For Adela his daughter was fianced to Richard king Henry his sonne.

In this kinges tyme there arose great discorde and variance at Rome for the election of the Bishop thereof. For some of the Cardinalles chose one Octavian: But other some, and the more part chose Alexander. At which time the Emperour, to whose iudgement it was referred, when that Alexander disceyned to abyde his iudgement, he confirmed Octavian. Then did Alexander flee into Fraunce, and there excommunicated out of the company of the faythfull, both Frederick the Emperour, and Octavian the Antipape: And in a counsaile at Claremount, disannulled the actes of the counsaile of Paue. This Schisme continued almost .xx. yeres: But shortly after Alexander Bishop of Rome returned out of Fraunce into Rome, and was receyued of the people contrary to the Emperours minde. Then folowed sundry and great warres betwene the aforesayde Alexander and Fredericke, and therein was great effusion of blood: But in the ende, Fredericke the Emperour was driuen to the worse. And at the last by perswasion and entreatie of sundrie noble personages, the Emperour submitted himselfe to Alexander Bishop of Rome, and came vnto him to Venice, where, of a long time the Pope would not speake with him, but caused him to attend: But at the last a tyme was appoynted him to come to the Popes presence, where he so behaued and humbled himselfe, that he suffered him to treade vpon him, and to set his fete in his necke, and while he so did his Quier sang this verse of the Psalter, Super Aspidem & Basiliscum ambulabis, & conculcabis Leonem & Draconem, that is: Thou shalt walke vpon the Adder and the Basilisae: and shalt treade downe the Lion and the Dragon. But Frederick seeyng the Pope so to vse him, sayd vnto him, I do not this obedience to thee but to Peter: and the Pope answered both to me and to Peter. Of this outrageous pride, let the Reader iudge. But this is to be noted as a truth, that the sayde Bishop of Rome, stirred and procured mortall and cruell warres, as before is sayde, without any iust cause, but onely for his priuate election, and would neyther obey to counsaile nor aucthoritie, nor yet condiscend to any atonement.

In the .xxiiiij. yere also of this king, there chaunced great tempestes of thunder and lightnyng in the middle of Winter: And in the next Sommer folowynge there fell hayle of such bignesse that it slue both man and beast. And in this tyme there arose great discorde and variance among the Nobilitie in Englande.

In the .xxv. yere of his reigne king Henrie gaue vnto his base sonne Geoffrey the Bishoprike of Lincolne in a Synode holden at Northampton, after it had bene vacant a long tyme, who wastfully consuming the reuenues thereof, not myndyng to enter into the ministerie, within short space after resigned it. But the same Geoffrey was afterwards preferred vnto the Archbishoprike of Porke.

About this tyme, the king restored Robert Erle of Leicester (who as is before sayd was taken prisoner in the battaile of Saint Edmondes bury) to his Erledome in a Parliament holden at Oxford, and made his youngest sonne John, Lorde of all Irelande. Margaret also the wife of king Henry his sonne was brought a bed of a daughter called Margaret, which liued not aboute thre dayes after her birthe.

About this tyme also there were a great multitude of Jewes in every quarter of the realme, and had but one place assigned them to bury in, which was London, whether all the Corpes and dead bodyes of their Nation were brought to be buryed, where so euer their chaunce was to die in the Realme. Therefore fynding it to be a great anoyance and discommoditie vnto them, they became suiters vnto the king that they might haue a place assigned them to bury in wheresoeuer they dwelt, the which was graunted vnto them.

In the .xxvi. yere of his reigne Lewes the French king came into England to visite the Church and Tombe of Thomas Becket, as he had bowed to do, whome assone as he was landed, kyng Henry with his Nobles met and receyued very honourably. The which done, they went both together to Cauntorbury, and there offered at the Tombe of the sayd Becket, (such was the blindnesse of that time.) And when he had perfourmed his bowe, and had adozned the said Tombe with many riche Jewels, he returned into Fraunce and died as it was sayd very shortly after, leauyng behinde him one onely sonne named Philip, who succeeded him, and as Polidore sayth was crowned king by his fathers life time.

In the .xxviiij. yere of his reigne, as sayth Fabian, Henry his eldest son, who in the life of his father as aforesaid, was crowned king, died very penitently.

In the .xxx. yere of his reigne: Heraclius the Patriarke of Jerusalem came into England to haue ayde agaynst the Saracens, who had wonne a great great part of Christendome which they possessed in the holy lande, and also prayed ayde for the defence of the City of Jerusalem, which shortly after was wonne by Saladyne the Prince of Surrey. But by the report of Peter Dicroy a frenchman, the sayde Citie was wonne by Godfrey du Bulyon, in the yere of our Saviour Christ. M. xcix. and so continued vnder the rule of ir. Christian kinges, vntill the last king named Guy of Lesyngham, who lost it, in the yere of our Lord. M. C. lxxix. and the. xxxvj. yere of his reigne.

Then it foloweth in the story: This Heraclius made earnest request vnto the king for aide as is aforesayde, and profered him the kingdome thereof, and the keyes both of the Citie and of the Sepulchre of Christ, and deliuered him letters from Lucius the thirde of that name then Bishop of Rome, charging him that he should take vpon him that iourney, and to haue minde of the othe that he before tyme had made. The king deferred his aunswere: And Baldwyn then Archbishop preached, and exhorted men to take the Crosse, by whose meanes, many there were that aduowed that iourney. In the ende, the king gaue aunswere and sayd, that he might not leaue his land without keepyng, nor yet leaue it to the pray and robbery of the french men: But he would geue largely of his awne to such as would take vpon him that boiage. With this aunswere the Patriarch was discontent and sayd: We seke a man and not money, well nere every Christian Region sendeth vnto vs money, but no land sendeth to vs a Prince. Therefore we aske a Prince that nedeth money, and not money that needeth a Prince. But the king layd for himselfe such excuses, that the Patriarch departed from him discontented and comfortlesse. Whereof the King beyng aduertised, entending to recomfort him with some pleasant wordes, folowed him to the sea syde: But the more the king thought to satisfie him with his sayre speeche, the more the Patriarche was out of quiet: insomuch that at the last the sayd Patriarch sayd vnto him: Thou hast hether to reigned gloriouly, but hereafter thou shalt be forsaken of him that thou at this tyme forsakest. Thinke on him what he hath geuen to thee, and what thou hast yelden to him againe: holue first thou wast false to the king of fraunce, and after slue Thomas Becket, and lastly thou forsakest the protection of Christes sayth. The king was amoued with these wordes, and sayde vnto the Patriarch: Though all the men in the land were one body, and spake with one mouth, they durst not speake to me such words. No wonder sayde the Patriarche, for they loue thine and not thee: that is to say, they loue thy goodes temporall, and feare thee for losse of promotion, but they loue not thy soule. And when he had so sayde, he offered his heade to the king sayyng, do by me euen as thou diddest by Thomas Becket, for I had leuer to be slaine of thee, then of the Sarisyns, for thou art worse than any Sarasyn, and thy people foloweth pray and not a man. But the king kept his patience and sayde: I may not wende out of my lande, for mine awne sounes will rise against me, when I were absent. No wonder sayd the Patriarche, for of the deuill they came, and to the deuill they shall, and so departed from the king in great pye. Fabian.

And here the olde Historiographers finde a great fault with the king for his refusall of the office made by the Patriarch, declaring that to be the greatest cause of Gods plagues which after ensued vpon hym by his children, as the Patriarche prophesied vnto hym, which story is a good lesson to good Princes, Princes, not to denie their necessarie helpe to their distressed neighbours, especially the cause pertayning to God.

The wisdom, discretion, manhoode and ryches of thys Prince was so sprede and renowned thorough all quarters that messages came to hym from Emanuell Emperour of Constantinople, Frederyck Emperour of Rome, and Wylliam Archebishop of Treuer in Almayn, and Duke of Saxony, and from the Erle of Flaundyng, and from the french king, vpon determination of great questions and strifes, to aske counsell and determination thereof of this king Henry, as of one most wise, and schoolemaister of all wisdom and iustice, to haue solution of their questions and doubtles. Moreover Alphonfus King of Castile, and Sauncius king of Nauerne, beyng in strife for certeine Castelles, and other possessions, submitted them of their fre accord, and by their othe to abyde the awarde of this king Henry, who made a warde and pleased both. Whereby it is not to be presupposed that this king, to whome other Princes did so resort, as to their Arbitrer and decisor, did attend to any slouth or vicious liuyng. Wherefore this Princes actes may be a myrrour vnto all Princes.

The. xxxiiij. yere of his reigne, Geoffrey Duke of Briteyn died at Paris, leauyng his wife Constance great with childe, which shortly after was deliuered of a sonne named Arthur.

Among many other things in this king memorabile, this is one to be noted (folow it who can) that he reignyng, xxxv. yeres, & hauyng so many warres with his enemies, yet he neuer put any tribute, impost, or tax vpon his subiectes, nor yet vpon the spiritualty, first frutes, or appropriation of benefices, belyke they were not then knowen, but sure it is, they were not vled. And yet his treasure after his death, being weyed by king Richard his sonne, amounted aboue nine hundred thousand pound, besyde Jewelles, precious stones, plate, and houtholde stuffe. Of the which substance, xi. thousand pound came to him by the death of Roger Archbishop of Yorke, who had procured a Bull of the Pope, that if any priest dyed in his prouynce without testament, then he should haue all his goodes.

But as there is no felicitie or wealth in this mortall worlde so perfite, which is not darkened with some clowde of combrance and aduersitie: So it happened to this king, that among his other princely succeses, this incommoditie folowed him withall that his sonnes rebelled and stode in armour against him, taking the parte of the french king against their naturall father. First Henry his sonne whome the father ioynd with him as king, at the coronation of which king, Henry his father tooke vpon him as Steward, or Sewer and set downe the first dishe of Sewer, renouncing the name of a king for that daye. At which tyme the aforesayde Archebishop of Yorke, sitting on the right hande of the yong king, sayd: Sir ye haue good cause this daye to ioye: For there is no Prince in the worlde that hath suche an officer this day. &c. And the yong king disdainyng his wordes, sayde: my father is not dishonoured in this doing, for I am a King and a Queenes sonne, and so is not he. And not onely this, but also afferwarde he persecuted his father, as ye before haue heard. Wherefore he escaped not Gods plague from his youth, after he had reigned a fewe yeres, he dyed as aforesayde, teaching vs what is the price and rewarde for the breaking of the iust commaunde-

After him likewise, Richard his sonne (who for his courage was called Cuer de Lyon) rebelled against his father in the. xxxiii. yere of his reigne. And also John his yongest sonne did not much degenerate from his Brethrens steppes. In so much that the aforesayde Richarde, lyke an vnkinde childe, persecuting and taking part with the French king against his father, brought him to such distresse of body and minde, that for thought of heart he fell into an Ague, and within foure dayes dyed in Normandy when he had reigned. xxxiii. yeres. ii. Monethes and odde dayes, whose Corps, as it was caryed to be buried, at Founteueraud in Fraunce, Richarde his sonne coming by the way and meeting it, & beginning for compassion to weepe, the blood burst incontinent out of the nose of the dead king at the coming of his sonne, geuing thereby as a certaine monstracion, howe he was the Authoz of his death.

Richarde the first.

Richard the first of that name, and eldest sonne lyuing of king Henry the second, for his valiaunt and lustie courage, surnamed Cuer de Lyon, that is the heart of a Lyon, began his reigne ouer thys realme of England the sixt day of July in the yere of our Lozde. 1189. and reigned. ix. yeres and. ix. monethes and odde dayes.

This king Richard prouyded diligently after the death of his father to set good rule in Normandy. For first of all he sommoned a Parliament in Normandy, and caused all the Nobles of that Countrie to sweare fealitie vnto him. After that beyng desyrous to know what treasure his father had left behynde him, and where it was, he commytted to warde Stephen Lieutenant of Amioy, and by that meanes compelled him to bring out all the treasure which he had long before layde vp in dyuerse Castels by the commaundement of king Henry his father.

And whyles he was thus occupied (sayth Polydore) his brother John came vnto him, whom he receyued very curteously, and aduanced him to many high dignities and preferments, as afterwarde shall be declared.

Then calling to remembraunce the captiuitie of Alianor his mother, which as yet was in durance in Englande, he streight wayes sent ouer hys letters and commaunded that she shoulde be forthwith set at libertie, committing the whole order and gouernement of the realme vnto her, who beyng set at libertie, roade throughout the Realme, and shewed great curtesy vnto the

the people in all places: and as one that in her selfe had felt the grieuous miseries of captiuitie, pityng the case of all such as were pressed therewith, losed all captiues and prisoners wheresoeuer she came.

Then enterng into league with Philip the French king, he receyued againe all the holdes and peeces which his father had lost a little befoze, at what tyme, also he tooke vnto him Adela sister vnto the French king, which was promised vnto him in his fathers life tyme: But shortly after hauing a vehement presumption that she had bene carnally knowne of his sayd father, he sent her home againe vnto her brother, but not without an honourable dowrye, and manye riche and large giftes. And after this he sped him into England, and first of all went vnto Winchester, & then to Saresbury, where he founde no small treasure: For as the same went, there was found besides apparell, Jewelles, and plate, nine hundred thousande poundes in coyne. From thence returned he to London, and was the thirde day of the moneth of September folowng crowned at Westminster of Baldwyn Archbishop of Cantorbury. Upon the which day the Jewes that then dwelt in England, and namely in the Citie of London and suburbes of the same, beyng assembled together, a great number of them presumed farther then was lawfull for them to do. For which presumption, they were first rebuked, and after one of them was stricken by one of the kinges chiefe officers, which thing beyng scene of the common people, who supposed the same to be done by the kinges commaundement, did therefore in a fury (as persons asmuch hated of the people as the deuill himselfe, for their vsury and other their vnhappie condicions) fall vpon them, and chased them to their houses, and robbed and spoyled them without all pitie, and bent some of their houses, whereof the rumour came to Westminster to the kinges heeryng. Wherefore in all haste he sent downe, geuyng streyte commaundement that they shoulde ceasse off that ryot: But the people were in such yre and madnesse, that they refrayned not for all the kinges commaundement, buttill they had executed the full of their malice. And albeit, that this ryot was afterwarde grieuously declared against the Commons of the Citie, yet it passed vnpunished, for the great number of the transgressors. And the sayd day of Coronation, all prisoners that lay in any prison about London at the kinges sute, or for other small and trifyng actions, were freely discharged and deliuered.

Some after the king gaue many dignities, namely to his brother John he gaue the Proynyces of Nottingham, Devonshire, and Cornewall, and created him Erle of Lancaster. And then the king ordeyned the Citie of London to be ruled by two Bailifes, whose names and surnames, together with the names of all the Mayors and Shyifes of the Citie of London are registred in a Table in the ende of this booke, with the severall yeres that euery of them was in, aswell of the reignes of euery king, as also the yeres of our Lozde.

And here is a meete place to say somewhat of the gouernement of this noble Citie of London, for that in this first yere of the reigne of this famous Prince, the same was gouerned by two Baylifes, as may appere by Fabian. The which Fabian also sayth, that the same befoze tyme was gouerned by persones graue and wyse, and were named Portgreues, or rather Portgraves, the which is deriued of two Saxon wordes (as he sayth) that is to say,

Port, and Graue, or rather Graue, for so are the rulers of the townes in Duchelande called at this day, that is to say, all such Rulers of townes or Countries as are nere the sea, are called Mergraue, as at this day in Andwarpe, the chiefe ruler is called Mergraue, that is to say, the Erle or Lorde of a towne or Countrie ioyning to the sea, and such rulers as are higher into the lande, and farther from the sea, are called Lantgraue, that is, the ruler or Erle of a Citie or Countrie within the lande so that these wordes Portgraue, which Fabian interpreteth, the ruler of a towne, I do accompt it not so nere the truth, as to enterpret it as it is at this day in London, we call the ruler thereof not onely Maioz, because he is the chiefe ruler of the Citie, but we adde for a moze dignitie vnto that state, and call him Lorde Maioz: So thinke I of Portgraues, for Port is a towne, and Graue is an Erle, and that they were then accompted as chiefe Lordes or Erles of the Citie, and were of no lesse estimation then the ruler is now, although peradventure not so glorious. And the name of the Shirifes of London at this day, which are vnder officers vnto the Maioz, are in all the Queenes writtes named Vice commiti, that is vnder Erles, or vnder Lordes, or vnder rulers.

It was not long after that the king had thus exalted his brother John (as aboue is shewed) but that he also preferred him to the maryage of the Erle of Gloucesters daughter, by reason whereof he was Lord of that Erledome. These great aduancementes made him after vnkinde to his brother and by pryde thereof to couet after the whole kingdome.

This yere also King Richard was assolyed, of the rebellion that he vsed against his father. In recompence whereof (sayth Guydo) he voluntarily tooke vpon him and promised to warre vpon Christes enemies, but to speake truly, it was at the request of the Pope.

And this yere, as sayth Fabian, King Richard gaue ouer the Castelles of Barwike, and Rokefborough to the Scottishe king, for the summe of ten thousand pound, for the exployte of his voyage to Jerusalem.

And about this tyme as sayth John Maioz, in his Chronicle of Scotland, there were many robbers and outlawes in England, among the which number, he specially noteth Robert Hood, whom we now call Robyn Hood, and little John, who were famous theues, they continued in woodes, mountaynes, and forestes, spoiling and robbing, namely such as were riche. Murderers commonly they did none, except it were by the prouocation of such as resisted them in their rifelynges and spoyles. And the sayde Maioz sayth, that the aforesaid Robyn Hood had at his rule and commaundement an hundreth tall yomen, which were mightie men and exceedyng good archers, and they were mainteyned by suche spoyles as came to their handes: And he sayth moreover, that those hundreth were such picked men, and of such force, that foure hundreth men who soeuer they were, durst neuer set vpon them. And one thing was much commended in him, that he would suffer no woman to be oppressed, biolated or otherwise abused. The poozer sort of people he fauoured, and would in no wise suffer their goodes to be touched or spoyled, but relieved and ayded them with suche goodes as hee gate from the riche, which he spared not, namely the riche priestes, fat Abbottes, and the houses of riche Carles. And although his theft and rapyne was to be contemned, yet the aforesaid Authour prayseth him and sayth, that among the number of theues, Robert Hood otherwise called Robyn Hood.

Robin Hood had an hundred tall yomen waiting vpon him.

A worthy vertue in a theefe.

theues, he was worthie the name of the most gentle theefe.

But in an olde and auncient Pamphlet I finde this written of the sayd Robert Hood. This man (sayth he) descended of a noble parentage: or rather beyng of a base stocke and linage, was for his manhoode and chivalry aduanced to the noble dignitie of an Erle, excellyng principally in Archery, or shootyng, his manly courage agreeyng therevnto: But afterwardes he so prodigally exceeded in charges and expences, that he fell into great debt, by reason whereof, so many actions and suites were commenced against him, wherevnto he answered not, that by order of lawe he was outlawed, and then for a lewde shift, as his last refuge, gathered together a compaigne of Rosters and Cutters, and practised robberyes and spoilyng of the kinges subiects, and occupied and frequented the forestes or wilde Countries. The which beyng certefyed to the King, and he beyng greatly offended therewith, caused his proclamation to be made that whoesoever would byng him quitte or dead, the king would geue him a great summe of money, as by the recordes in the Erchequer is to be seene: But of this promise, no man enioyed any benefite. For the sayd Robert Hood, beyng afterwardes troubled with sicknesse, came to a certein Honry in Yorkshire called Bircklies, where desiryng to be let blood, he was betrayed & bled to death. After whose death the Prioresse of the same place caused him to be buried by the high way side, where he had vsed to rob and spoyle those that passed that way. And vpon his graue the sayde Prioresse did lay a very fayre stone, wherein the names of Robert Hood, William of Goldesborough, and others were grauen. And the cause why she buried him there, was, for that the common passengers and traualers knowing and seeyng him there buried, might moze safely and without feare take their iorneyes that way, which they durst not do in the life of the sayd outlawes. And at eyther ende of the sayde Tombe was erected a crosse of stone, which is to be seene there at this present.

Gerardus Marcator in his Cosmographie and discription of England, sayth that in a towne or village called little Mozauie in Scotland, there are kept the bones of a great and mightie man, which was called little John, among the which bones, the huckle bone or hip bone was of such largenesse, as witnesseth Boethus, that he thrust his arme through the whole thereof, and the same bone being conferred to the other partes of his body, did declare the man to be. xiiij. foote long.

But before the king tooke his iourney, great preparation was made for money. At that time it appereth that taxes, tolles, exactions, and subsidies, eyther were not knowen, or not so much then had in vse as of late tymes they haue bene: By reason whereof, this king was driuen to make other shift, by sellyng Lordships, Castels, Offices, Liberties, Priuileges, Bishoprikes, &c. And as he sayd himselfe, he would haue solde London also, if he coude haue found any able to buy it. Vpon this occasion it came that diuerse Bischoppes, namely such as were best monyed, purchased to their Bishoprikes dyuerse Lordshippes, as Godfrey Bishop of Winchester, purchased Wargraue, and Menes. And Hugh Bishop of Durham purchased the Lordship called Hadberge with all the appurtenances, for fine hundreth Markes, &c. And also he purchased the whole Province of Durham of the king to be his afore, and himselfe to be made Erle of the same, wher vpon the old wyrters as Pouedcn

Cestrensis

Cestrensis, and other, rebuke the sayde Bishop in their Chronicles, the king also testyng at the same, sayng, that of an olde Bishoppe, he had made a pong Erle.

Now when king Richard had appoynted all things for his journey, and the same beyng in a redynesse, he then commytted the custodie of his realme of England into the handes of foure men, that is to say, two Prelates, and two lay men, of whom the two Prelates, which were Hugh Bishop of Durisime, and William Bishop of Ely, were the chiefe and principall. These two falling at variance amongest themselves for superiortie, at length this order was taken by the king: That the Bishop of Durisime (who a little before had purchased of the king certeine free Lordshippes, and also to remaine as Justice without controlment or checke as aforesayd) should have vnder his custodie, from Humber to the Scottishe sea: The other Bishop, which was the Bishop of Ely, should have all the South partes besides: But the sayde Ely beyng more ambitious, so practised with the king, and by the kings Ambassadors sent his letters to the Pope, that at the last he obteyned the auctoritie Legantine ouer the whole realme of England.

And as soone as the king had thus set the realme of England in an order, he then sayled into Normandy, where he setting that country also vnder safe keeping, did shortly after mete with the French king called Philip the second, and after with Frederick the Emperour, & they together set forward on their journey vntil they came to Turon, and there they passed away the winter. In the which time eyther of them with other made assurance for the continuance of that great iourney. And at the spring time of the yere, these three great Princes set forward on their boiage toward the holy lande. That is to say, king Richard by the sea, and the Emperour and king Philip by land, and appoynted to meete together in the land of Scicill. But king Richard, as sayth an olde written Chronicle, before his departure called all his Lordes and knightes vnto him, and did swere them for euermore to be true vnto him, and to take his part. And in token thereof he gaue to euery of them a blew Lace or Ribband to be knowen by, and hereof (sayth that olde Chronicle) began the first occasion of the order of the Garter.

In this meane time in England, the Jewes in diuerse places of this realme, as Lincolne, Staunford, and Linne were robbed and spoyled: And at Poike to the number of foure hundred and mo, did cut their master baynes, and so bled to death, as sayth Fabian.

These two kings according to their appoyntment met in Scicill, where grudge began to kindle betwene them. And the cause thereof as Reynulph sayth, first began for that king Richard demped vnto king Philip the halfe of his winninges in Cyprus according to the couenant assured betwene them at Turon. But king Richard sayde that the conuention stretched no farther then to such goodes as should be wonne within the limmites and boundes of the holy lande. Another cause of grudge was, by reason that the French king ayded not the Erle of Campayne beyng in distresse and neede. Wherefore the sayd Erle beyng therewith discontent, sayd to the French king: Sir hether to I haue done according to my duetie: But hereafter I will doe as neede compelleth me. For your grace hath hether to cherished mee but for mine, but now I will go to him that is more redier to geue then to take, and so departed vnto king Richard where he was right well enterteyned. And the third cause was, as sayth Reynulph, that king Richard at his first entring into Scicill maryed the sister of the king of Nauerne, where before he had promised the sayde French king to haue maryed his sister Adela. But the French Chronicle chargeth king Richard to be in great fault, namely that he was a breaker of promise in all that he couenaunted with king Philip, and also that he solde the Isle of Cyprus which he wan before he came vnto Syria vnto the Templers, for thirtie thousande Markes, and after tooke it from them againe by strength, and exchaunged it with Guy of Lesyngham that was the last christened king of Jerusalem, for the same kingdome, and therefore the kings of England were long time after called kings of Jerusalem. Also that he should take from a knight of the Duke of Ostrich & said Dukes Banner, beyng first set vpon the walles of Alcon at the skalyng thereof, and in despite of the sayde Duke, did treade it vnder his feete, and did vnto it all the despite that he might, and set his awne Banner in the same place. And also that where Conradus Marques of Tyre was trayterously slaine by two of his awne seruantes, king Richard should lay the charge of the fault thereof vnto the French king. And for these grudges and sicknesse, with also feare of treason (as sayth the French Chronicle) to be wrought betwene Saladin the Soudane and king Richard: king Philip returned first into Appulia, and then to Rome, whether he had bowed a pilgrimage, and from thence into France.

But howsoeuer the breach was betwene the foresayd two kinges, great pittie it was, for as long as they continued in amitie together, so long they did many valiaunt and famous actes, as in winnyng of Alcon, and diuerse other Cities, and many mo had like to haue bene done, if they had not differed themselves. And not long after the departure of the French king, king Richard at the next spring following returned also. Who in his returne, driven by distresse of weather about the partes of Austria, in a towne called Sinaca, was there taken by Leopold Duke of the same countrie, who solde him to the Emperour for three score thousand Markes (though all wyrters do not agree vpon the somme) and for no small ioy thereof, the sayd Emperour wyrteth to the French king these Letters folowynge.

Henry by the grace of God Emperour of the Romaynes euer most noble, to his welbeloued and especiall friend Philip the famous king of France sendeth gretyng, with further declaration of his sincere loue: Inasmuch as the Emperour doubteth not but that your kingly magnificence, is alwayes right ioyous to heere of any such thing with the which the Almightye power of our creator hath adorned and aduanced vs and our Romaine Emperour, we thought good by the tenor of these presentes to declare vnto your noblesse that the enemye of our Empire, and perturber of your Kingdome the king of Englande, as he was passyng the sea in his returne homewardes from the lande of promes, it chaunced (the ship in which he was, beyng wrecked) that he was dryuen by the winde into the coast of Istria, vnto a place which is betwene Aquileia and Venice, whether the sayde king by the sufferaunce of God after his Shiptwreck with a fewe other escaped. Where vpon our faythfull friend the Erle Maynard of Gooce, and the people of that countrey, hering that he was in their land, & diligently considering, what prodicion spoyle and treason the sayde king had vsed in the lande of p̄zomes, did pursue him intending to take him captiue: And after they had put the king to flight, they tooke viij. of his knightes prisoners. And afterwardes the sayde king went forward to a Borough in the Archebishopske of Salburge named Frisors, where Fredericke of Wetsow, as the king was postyng toward Austria in the night season, tooke fire of his knightes prisoners. And our welbeloued cosyn Leopold Duke of Austria layng wayte by euery way did take the king captiue at Dena in a billage nere therevnto, in a simple house. Now therefore seeing he is in our possession, and hath bene alwayes the cause of molesting and troubling of you, we considering the p̄misses, thought good to signifie thus much vnto your noblenesse, assuring our selues that the same will be right pleasant and acceptable newes vnto you, and an occasion of ioy and gladnes. Seuen at Rithout, the fift Kalendas of January.

Ceur de lion, why he was so called.

It is read of this Richarde that during the tyme of his imprisonment, he should slay a Lion, and teare the heart out of his body, and thereof it came that he was called Richard Ceur de Lyon, that is, the heart of a Lion. But of the learned it is thought that this is but a fable, but rather that he was so called for his invincible courage and strength. The time also of his imprisonment, his brother John by the setting on of the French king, made great war within the land, and tooke by strength the Castell of Windsoze, of Notyng-ham and others, and the French king made strong warre in Normandy.

Howbeit, as touching the returne of king Richard out of Syria, and his taking by Leopold Arche Duke of Austrich, the matter is farre otherwise reported by Polidore after this maner: When he had comforted the christian men in Syria, with such words as are before rehearsed, he then having prepared his shauie for that purpose, sent away before him his wyfe Berengaria with her sister Ione and a great part of his army into Sicill, which from thence sayled into Englande: And then he himselfe followed with the rest, which were but a fewe in number, minding to sayle into Thracia: But by tempest his chaunce was to be driuen into Dalmatia, where he arryued and changed his apparell, because he would not be acknowne, and determined with him selfe to go home into England through high Almayne, trauallyng at his ease, sometime on horseback, and sometime on foote. And when he was come to the Countrie of Austriche, he remembering the breche that was betweene him and the Duke of the same countrie for casting downe his banner from the walles of Acon at the boyning therof: And therefore mistrusting that the saide Duke would be reuenged on him for the sayde dishonour, and being also aduertised by his espialles, that the fame of his comming was now bruted abroade throughout all the Countrie, he beganne to feare himselfe, and therefore trauallyed very circumspectly, sending euer hys spialles before to search the wayes that he should passe by. But yet coude he by no meanes escape that which was by destiny appointed to happen vnto him. For as sone as he was entered into the Citie of Vienna, which is the chiefe Citie of that Countrie, he was by his tongue knowne to be an Englishman. And because he was more delicate and deyntie then became a person being so homely appareled, he was thereby suspected of manye to be the king himselfe, & the rather because it was a constant rumoz, that he was come into the Countrie. The Duke hearyng of this, beset the house by and by wherein he was was lodged with men of armes, that none should escape out, and then sent he other into the house to view and see what maner of guesstes were within. When king Richard perceyued that the house was thus beset rounde about with harnessed men, in such wise that it was not possible for hym to flie, he caused himselfe to be apparellled lyke a king, and hauing the same constancie of minde which he euer vsed in all his martiall affaires, he trusted himselfe vnto the souldiours, now being entred the house, demaunding of them what the matter was, that they in such forcible wise came vnto him, who answered that they came to take him. To whome he answered againe, how it was not seemely for a king to yeelde himselfe prisoner vnto any but to the Duke himselfe, and therefore if the Duke himselfe would come, he would be content to yeelde himselfe vnto him. Then came the Duke, whome the king met and deliuered him his sword, and so yeelded himselfe vnto him, who being glad that he had gotten such a praye vnlooked for, had him home with hym to hys house, geuing him berie fayre wordes all the waye as he passed, and then deliuered him vnto certeyne noble men of his Countrie to be safely kept. &c.

In this meane time that the king was so occupied in the warres with the Saracens as is aforesayde, the Bishop of Ely of whome mention is made before, being first authorized by the king as gouernoz of this realme, & after made the Popes Legate, tooke then not a little state vpon him in the absence of the king, in such ambitious and proude sort that he made all the realme cry out vpon him. This Bishop whose name was William Longchampe a Norman borne, and commyng of a base stocke, after he had aspired to the Bishopricke of Ely, and then to be Chaunceloz of England, and after the Popes Legate, hauing now in the absence of the king the whole rule and gouernement of the Realme in his awne hande, grewe out of measure in suche pompe and pride, that he became intollerable both to the Clergie, and to the Laity. First he beginneth to assemble a generall counsaile together at London. The colour and pretence was for Religion, but in berye deede, as sayth the olde storyes, the cause was his awne pompe and ambition, with importunate oppression of the Clergie. And no lesse troublesome was he also vnto the Laity, wonderfully oppressing the Commons, abusyng the kinges authoritie, and aduansyng vaine glozy. His vse was to ride with a thousande horses continually, so that the noble mennes sonnes were glad to become his slaues. And with the best Barons, Erles, and Peeres of this realme, maryed he his Cosyns, Nieces and kinswomen (I will not say his daughters) and for all that, his Grandfather was but a poore Ploughman, and his father a Cobheard. And hauyng so tirannously abused his office, fearyng least he should haue bene called to his examination, he fled with a fewe of his trusty seruautes to Douer Castell, minding to haue stolen ouer the sea: And commyng in the night in a womans apparell, with a peece of cloth vnder his Arme, and a mat yard in his hande, vpon suspicion (as God would haue it) beyng knowen what he was, his kercheffe was pulled off his head, & his shauen crowne appeared on his head. And then was he drawen along the sea vpon the sandes, with a great wondering of the people: Some rated him, some reuiled him, some bespattered him, some drawyng him by the armes, some by the legges from place to place, his awne seruautes not beyng able to helpe him. And at the last they brought him into a seller, where they shut him fast in, and so covered him from the people with shame ynough, untill the counsaile of the realme sent for him, and after was brought to the Tower of London, and there imprisoned, examined, deprived, and banished the realme: And at the length restored againe by king Richard, and after beyng sent to Rome by the way there dyed. 1197.

But Polidoze sayth, that king Richarde beyng moued therevnto by the dayly complaints of his nobles, deprived him of the Governourship by hys letters, and placed in his steede William Archebishop of Roan, which was the cause that he would haue fled the realme, neither maketh he any mention that he was restored by the sayd king.

And after this, king Richard beyng prisoner, sent Hubert bishop of Sarisoury into England to haue the guydyng therof, and also to treat with the Lordes and Commons for the kinges deliery, and for his raunsome: But for the payment of the sayd raunsome all the Wolles of the white Monkes and Chanons in England were solde, and Ringes and Crosses of Prelates, with vesselles and Chalices of all Churches throughout the realme, and xvij Shrynes were scraped and spoyled of the golde and siluer, and rich and pooze payed dyuerse summes of money to their great losse.

Now to returne to king Richarde, at the length he was raunsomed for an hundreth thousande pounce, as Polichronicon, Fabian, and Cooper say, from the couetous captiuitie of the Emperour, and beyng deliuered, he returned againe into England, and landed at Sandwicke, and so came to London, where when he had arrested him a little while, he then roade with a certeine number of knightes to Nottingham, and wanne the Castell by force, and after that the Castell of Tykhill. And shortly after called a counsaile of his Lordes at Winchester, where by auctoritie of the sayd counsaile he deprived John his brother (then beyng in fraunce) of all honour, and tooke from him all such landes as he before had geuen vnto him, for that in his absence he ioyned with the frenche king agaynst him, and also sought to haue possessed the Crowne and realme of England into his awne possession.

And shortly after, that is to say, in the viij. yere of his reigne, he caused himselfe to be crowned againe at Winchester. After which coronation he called a Parliament, by auctoritie whereof, he resumed againe all patentes, and annuities, fees, and other grauntes before his voyage by him solde and graunted, and caused the parties to be contented with such reuenues and profits as they had receyued of the sayde offices or landes, in the tyme of his absence: And spared not for any sufficiencie of wytyng, that by him before was made.

When the king by these aforesayd meanes had gathered some money, he then in the moneth of July sayled into fraunce, and besieged a Castell called Arques, and sped there, as sayth Polichronica, dyuerfly, which worde diuerfly may well here be spoken. For who so readeth the frenche Chronicle, shall finde that the frenche king was victor, although the Englishe booke sayth otherwise, but who had the victory in dede is vnertaine. But the frenche Chronicle sayth, that king Richard so scarred the frenche kinges host, that he tooke the kinges Sumpter horse and parte of his treasure. And shortly after a peace was concluded.

Then

Then John which had turned to the french king against his naturall brother, seeing the fame and honour of his brother, and weaknesse and feblenesse of himselfe, made meanes vnto Alianoz his mother, by whose mediation he was reconciled againe vnto his brother the king, and after became his true knight.

When the king and his brother John were thus agreed, they roade ouer the land to visite the countries, and to see how they were guyded by the kings officers. Among other, two there were, which shewed that they would do many things to the kinges profite, the one was Abbot of Cadonence in Normandy, and the other was named William with the long bearde, as sayth Reynulph.

The Abbot warned the king of the fraude of his officers, whereby he thought by the punishment of his officers, he should winne great fauour of the people. Then this Abbot gate a warrant of the king, and went to London, and there called before him diuerse officers, and caused them to make there accomptes before him. But he dyed shortly, so that his purpose tooke small effect.

And William with the long bearde shewed vnto the king the outrage of the riche men, which (as he sayde) spared their awne, and pilled the pooze people. It is sayde that this William was bozne in London, and purchased that name by the vse of his beard. He was quicke of witte, and somethyng learned, bolde of speche, and graue of countenance, & toke vpon him greater matters then he could compasse, and some cruelnesse he vsed, as apered in the accusyng of his awne brother of treason, the which was a Citizen of London, and had shewed to him great loue and friendship, euen bringyng him by in his youth.

This William stirred and excited the common people to desyre and loue fredome and libertie, and blamed the excesse and outrage of riche men. By such meanes he drew to him many great companies, and with all his power defended the pooze mennes causes against the riche, and accused diuerse to the king, shewyng that by their meanes the king lost many forseytes and escheates. For this cause, gentlemen and men of honour hated him, but he had such comfort of the king, as he kept on his purpose. But afterward, the king heeryng of the congregations that this William made, commaunded him to ceasse off such doynges, that the people might exercise their artes and occupations: By reason whereof, it was left for a while, but it did not clearly ceasse. For within a while after, they folowed him more then they did before. And then he preached vnto them, the which Sermon is at length set out in Reynulph, the. viij. booke, and. xxx. Chapter, and likewise in Fabian. But after his Sermon, he was sent for to the Archebishop of Cauntourbury, but he came with such a multitude folowyng him, that the Lordes were contented to remit him at that tyme with faire and pleasant wordes, and secretly commaunded certeyne personnes to espie when he was boyde of company, and then to take him and put him in sure keypyng. The which accordyng to the commaundement at tyme conuenient (as they thought) set vpon him to haue taken him: But he with an Acre resisted them, and slue one of them, and after fled into Saint Mary Bow Church in Cheape, and tooke that for his sauegard, defending himselfe by strength.

But within a little while after, by meanes of the heades and rulers of the Citie, the people minished, so that ere it were long he was left with a few persones, and so was taken, but not without shedding of blood. After which taking, he was arreigned before the Judges, and there he and. ix. of his adherentes had iudgement to die, and were hanged the day folowynge. But yet the rumor ceased not, for the common people raysed a great cryme vpon the Archbishop of Cauntorbury and other, and sayd, that by their meanes, William that was an innocent of such crymes, as were objected and put against him, was a defender of the pooze people against extorcioners and wrong doers, and that hee was by them put wrongfullye to death, affirmynge him an holy man, and a martyre, in such wise as foloweth. They sayde that a man beyng sicke of a feuer, was cured by vertue of a cheyne which this William was bound withall durynge the tyme of his imprisonment, which by a Priest of the kindred of the sayd William was openly declared and preached. Whereby he brought the people into such an error that they gaue credence to his wordes, and secretly in the night conueyed away the Fetter that he was hanged vpon, and scraped away the blood of hun where he was headed and quartered, so that they made there a hollow place, by fetchynge away of that earth, and sayd that sicke men and sicke women were cured of diuerse sicknesses by vertue of that blood and earth. By these meanes, and spreadynge abroade the same therof, that place was the more visited by women and indiscrete persones, of the which some watched there all night in prayer: so that the longer this continued, the more outcry and slander ranne by on the Judges and Justices that put him to death.

Howbeit, at the last, when his dedes were declared, as the sleayng of a man with his awne hand, and vsynge of his Concubine within Saint Mary Church of Bobo, in the time of his there beyng, as he openly confessed at the houre of his death, with other detestable crymes, somewhat cooled the hastie flame of the hoate Pilgrimage: But not clearely vntill the Archbishop accursed the Priest that brought by the first tale, and also caused that place to be watched, that such Idolatrie should there no more be vsed.

Reynulph in his. vij. booke and. xxxi. Chapter maketh mencion that about this tyme a Prince of Wales, whome he called Rices or Rize dyed, in whose prayse this that followeth is writtten, by the sayde Authour.

O blisse of battalie, chyld of chivalrie, defence of Countrie, brose of armes, Arme of strength, hand of largenesse, eye of reason, brightnesse of honestie, bearing in brest, Hector's prowesse, Achilles sharpnesse, Nestors sobernesse, Tydeus hardinesse, Sampsons strength, Hector's worthynesse, Curialus swiftnesse, Ulixes fayre speech, Salomons wisdomme, Aiaz hardinesse. O clothing of naked, the hungries meate, fulfilling the request of all that desyred. O Eloquence, felow in seruice, honest of deede, and sober in worde. Glad of semblaunt and loue in face, goodly to euerye man, and rightfull to all, the noble Diademe and bewtie of Wales is now fallen, that is, Rize is dead. All Wales grometh, Rize is dead, the name is not lost, but deferred. The blisse of Wales passeth, Rize is dead. The enimie is here, for Rize is not here. but he is unhilled, for fame dureth euermore, & suffreth not the noble Duke to be hid from speeche. His prowesse passed his maners. His wisdomme passed his prowesse, his Eloquence exceeded his wisdomme, and his good counsailes passed his Eloquence. Hetherto Reynulph.

In the Month of Aprill and in the. ix. yere of his reigne, when the king had prouyded to sende foorth twentie thousande pounde to the Emperour, for full payment of hys ransome, the pledges which had lyen for the same came sodainely into England, and shewed vnto the king, that after hys departing the Emperour sent them vnto the Duke of Ostrich, to remayne with him vntill the money were payde. And they sayde also that the Duke was accursed of Innocent the thirde, then Bishop of Rome, by reason of hys wrong done to king Richard, and that his Prouince was vexed with manye mischiefes. And as the Duke roade foorth on a day in his disport, being saint Stephens daye, he hurt his foote in such wise with a thorne, or other benym which rankled and grewe so soze, that lastly he must die or cut it of. But in hope of recouery, he continued vntill in the ende there was none other way but death. Then he sent for his Bishops, and desyred to be assoyled of the sentence of the Churche which he stood in. The which was denyed him, except he would sweare to stande and abyde the ordinance and iudgement of holy Church, touching the wrong that he had done to king Richard. The Duke swore and was assoyled: and shortly after, the two Bishops, pledges for the money, were set at their libertie.

Now king Richard calling to mind that his bittermost day of the truce taken betweene the frenche king and him drew nere at hande, he therefore made him readie and sayled into Normandy: where before his comming, the frenche king, by occasion of the Normans (as sayeth the frenche booke) was entered the Countrie of Burges, towarde whome king Richard sped him with all possible speede, so that both hostes laye parted wyth the ryuer of Osson or Olyne. Then to follow the frenche booke, for so much as the Englishe Chronicle speaketh little or nothing of this act, let wise men that reade thys Chronicle conster it after their discretions: for although the Frenchman wrote it to the honour of his countrie men, it will the rather redound to their dishonor. For thus sayth the sayd Chronicle, these two hostes thus as is abouesayde lying together without skirmishe or assault, king Richard contrary to the minde and opinion of his Lordes, with a few accompanied and unharnessed, came to the french kinges tent, and there in presence of his Lordes did homage to the french king for the Duchie of Normandie, and Counties of Angeow and of Poyters, and there swore to the king to kepe peace durynge his lyfe: And after. liij. dayes met againe and finished the sayde peace with an assured othe on either partie, and after departed as friendes, eyther resortynge into their awne country: but it semed a faynt peace, for within foure monethes next folowynge, king Richard with his hoste entered into the Prouynce of Berry, and layde siege to the Castell of Wypersone, and gate it by strength. And after went to the Castell of Royncourt, which was deliuered to him by appoyntment.

When the french king heard of the wyppynge and ouerthrow of the Castell of Wypersone, he in dammagynge of king Richard, layde siege to the Castell of Aubeuyle, and assayed it egerly: But it was so strong and so well defended fended by the Normans, that the French king was holden off. When king Richard had garnished & fortified the Castell of Royncourt with all things necessary to the warre, he drue him toward Aubeuyle to remoue king Philip from that siege, and fell vpon the Frenchmen vnwarly. But the Frenchmen quit themselves so knightly, that they chased king Richard and his people, and tooke a Norman knight prisoner, named Guy de Thonars, a man of great hardinesse. And then king Philip returned to the towne and Castell of Aubeuyle, and assaulted it more sharpely, so that in the ende the Souldiours of the towne yelded it with the Castell for a summe of money. And when he had possession of the towne, he threwe downe the Castell plaine with the ground, and after strengthened the towne with Frenchmen, & then went to the Castell of Gysoz, and from thence to the Castell of Royncourt: And assailed it in so cruell maner, that shortly he wan it, & toke therein .xv. knights, and .viii. women with plentie of victuall and Armour.

In this tyme and season, king Richard gathered againe a new strength, and allyed himselfe with Baldwyn Erle of Flaunders, and Reignold Erle of Dampnartyn and of Woleyn. By whose meanes (as sayth the French booke) king Richard wasted sore the Countrie of Fraunce, and bent therein some Townes and villages, and tooke therein many riche prayes. Fabian.

In the .x. yere of his reigne, and about the begynnyng of the moneth of October, king Richard entered into the country of Anequecyn with a strong host, and made there cruell warre in destroyng of the country, & assaulted the Castell of Gysoz, & threwe to the ground a strong hold called Courcellys, and bent thereabout many villages. Wherewith king Philip was so sore annoyed, that with a small number of knightes he pierced the hoste of Englishmen, and entred the Castell or towne of Gysoz. But of his men were taken a great number, chiefly such as were men of name, with the which prisoners and many riche prayes the king departed, leauyng the French king with- in Gysoz.

It was not long after that king Richard was thus departed, but king Philip calling to mynde the lesse and dishonour that he had receyued by that warre, assembled a great army, and entred the Duchie of Normandy, and wasted the country from Newelborough to Beawmont le Rogier. And that done, he returned into Fraunce, and lycenced his knightes eche man to go into his owne countie.

When the French king had thus taken his pleasure in the spoyle of a great peere of Normandy, then king Richard with his army entered the former countie of Anequecyn, and Beuogcyn, and there tooke as he before had done many rich prayes, and so came away, whome the Bishop of Beuuaris being a good knight and hardie of his handes, with a companye of knightes and other, folowed to haue reskewed the prisoners that king Richard had taken. But they themselves were discomfited, and a great many of them taken and slaine. At the same tyme the Erle of Flaunders with the helpe of the Englishmen, toke the towne of S. Omer from the French king.

Sone after Christmasse next folowyn, king Richard besieged a Castell nere vnto Lymogis. This Castell in the French tongue is called Chalons, & in the English boke it is named Gaillard. But Reynulph calleth it Caule.

The cause of this siege (as sayth most wyrters) was for certeine riche treasure treasure that was founde within the Seigniozy of king Richard, the which one Wydomer bicount of Lemonke had founden, and withhelde the same from king Richard, and for his sauegarde fled into the afozenamed Castell, and defended it manfully from the first weeke of Lent, vntill the sixt day of Aprill. Upon the which day, king Richard walking vnwisely aboute the Castell, to espie the feblenesse thereof, one named Bertrand Guedon marked the king, and wounded him in the heade (or as some wyzte) in the arme, with a venemous quarrell. After which wounde receyued by the king, he commaunded sharpe assault to be made to the Castell, in the which assault the Castell was wonne.

Then the king caused inquirie to be made who it was that did hurt him, the which being founde, was brought vnto the kinges presence, and named himselfe as aforesayde, but after some wyrters, he was called Peter Basile. Then the king demaunded of him, why he did so lye in waite rather to hurte him, then any other of the company? And he answered, because thou slewest my father and my brethren (sayd he) and I intended to aduenge their death what soeuer became of me. Then the king forgaue him his offence, and suffered him to go at libertie. And all the other of the Souldiours that were taken in that Castell were forthwith hanged. But Reynulph sayth, that after king Richard was dead, the Duke of Flaunders which then was present, caused the sayd Bertrand to be slaine quicke, and after hanged.

After the death of king Richard, reigned his brother Iohn Erle of Morton, yongest sonne of Henry the seconde, called Iohn without lande, who at the tyme of hys brothers death was in Normandy, where immediatly after the death of hys sayde brother he possessed his treasure, and was proclaymed king of England the .vi. day of Aprill 1199. & then sent Hubert Archbishop of Cantorbury into England to make prouision for his coronation. But

But in this meane time the French king helde a counsaile at Cenamanna in Turon, where (to the derogacon of king Iohn) Arthur the sonne of Seaffrey Plantagenet, and Nephew to the sayde Iohn, was made Duke of Briteyn: who incontinently after, with a great armie entered the Countrie of Angeou and tooke possession thereof. And king Philip with his people entred the Duchy of Normandy, and layed siege vnto the Citie of Eureux, and wanne it with all the strong holdes there aboutes, and stuffed them with victuall, and strengthened them with his aboue knights, and that done wasted and spoiled the Countrie, vntill he came to the Citie of Meur, where met with him the afozenamed Arthur, and did to him homage for the Countrie of Angiers. On the other side, the Britones which fauoured Arthur tooke and kept for his behoofe (as sayth Polidore) these townes, Gorneium, Buitauentu and Gensolium: and following also the good successe of victorie, recouered againe the Citie of Angiers, the which king Iohn had taken from Arthur the yere before.

In the Moneth of May following, Alianour sometime wyfe to king Henry the second, and mother to king Richard the first came into Fraunce, to the French king to Meur aforesaid, & made him homage for the Countrie of Poyters as her inheritance. And sone after the French king returned into Fraunce, & the Duke of Briteyn with hym, which as yet was within age.

King Iohn heyring of thys warre in Normandy, and losse of the Countries aboue named, was greatly moued, charging y French king with breche of truce, wherby he assembled a counsaile and asked ayde of his Lordes and commons, to wyne agayne the aforesayde landes, and there was graunted vnto him as some write thre shillings of euery plough land thorough England beside the subsidie of the spirituall lands. And when all things were in readinesse that was meete for that voyage he then on Saint Iohn Baptistes daye following sayled into Normandy, and came to Roan, where as he was royally receyued, & shortly after a truce was concluded betweene the French king and him for one yere following. And then there came vnto hym the Erle of Flaundrys, and all other the Lordes of Fraunce that were of king Richards bond and friendship, and were swozne vnto him.

Not long after, king Philip taking homage of Arthur for the Duchye of Normandie and all other the possessions of king Iohn beyond the sea, promised him helpe against king Iohn. After this king Iohn and the French king spake together about an houres space. And the French king asked so muche lande for himselfe, and Duke Arthur, that king Iohn would none graunt, and so departed in wrath.

The same yere a Legate came vnto king Iohn into England and commaunded him vnder paine of interdiction of his land, that he should deliuer the Archebishop which he kept in Prison. And the king deriyed so to do, vntill he had payed him sixe thousand Markes for his raunsome, because he was taken in harnesse in the fielde, and had before swozne that he would neuer weare harnesse agaynst any Christian man.

At this time a deuozement was made, betweene king Iohn and Auis his wife, daughter to the Erle of Gloucester, because they were in the thirde degre of kindred. And after by the Counsaile of the French king: King Iohn married Isabell daughter of the Erle of Angolisme, fianced before vnto Hugh Erle

King Iohn sayleth into Normandy with a great power.

Philip the French king apdeth Arthur against king Iohn.

This was y Archebishop of Beuon that was taken by king Richard the first in the last yere of his reigne.

Erle of March, and had by her two sonnes, Henry and Richard, and thre daughters, Isabell, Alianor, and Jane.

At this tyme fell strife betweene king Iohn, and Geoffrey Archebishop of Yorke for diuerse causes. First because he would not suffer and permit the Shirife of Yorke in such affayres as he had to do for the king, within his diocesse. Secondly, because he did also excommunicate the sayd Shirife. Thirdly because he would not saile with him into Normandy, to make the mariage betweene Lewes the French kinges sonne, and his neece. &c.

Polidore sayth, that the cause of this fallyng out of king Iohn with his base brother Geoffrey Archebishop of Yorke, was for that he had reprovued him for his great exactions and payments which he layde vpon his people without all measure, by reason whereof he was so much offended with him, that he spoiled him of all that he had, and then banished him out of the court: And such (sayth the aforesayd Authoz) was the kinges displeasure conceyued against him, that he could not by any meanes be pacified, neyther entreated to receyue him to grace againe, vntill it was a yere after: But here Polidores sayng is not to be hastily credited of the reader, for truly such was the blindness of the tyme, that Polidore had no good opinion of king Iohn, and therefore wyrteth very vehemently against him in his History, which vehemency or fonde malice I thought meete rather to suppress, then to make any mention thereof.

Also in this yere as sayth Reynulph, William king of Scottes did homage to king Iohn at Lincolne, or as some write at London, and sware in the presence of a Legate of Rome, and .xiiij. Bishops, to be true lige man to him, and to his heyres kinges. But Hector Boethus sayth, that this homage was done for the landes of Northumberland, Comberland, and Huntingdon, which the Scottishe king helde of the king of England, and not for the realme of Scotland, the which is not true.

At the same time king Iohn, earnestly requested the sayd Scottishe king to ayde him agaynst Philip of Fraunce, but he made many excuses that he could not so do, specially without the consent of his Peeres and Commons, that done he hastened himselfe home againe into Scotland.

This yere in the moneth of December were scene in the Clament about ten of the Clocke in the night time, in the Prouince of Yorke five Moones, one in the West, another in the East, the thirde in the South, the fourth in the North, and the fift in the midst of the Clament. The same tyme also in the spring season king Iohn sayled into Normandy, and shortly after went vnto Paris, where he was very honourably receyued of the French king, from whence after he had made a new league with him, he went vnto Chiuon, but the sayde league continued but a while. For it was not long after, but that the French king required of king Iohn that he should depart with all his landes in Normandy, and Dictaia, and else where within the dominion of Fraunce, vnto Arthur his nephew, and that incontinent, or else he would warre against him, and forthwith made great prouision for warre, and ioyning with him the sayd Arthur, with a great army and pryssance, set vpon certeyne of his townes and Castels in Normandy, and put him to much inquietnesse. When king Iohn heard of this, he forthwith assembled a counsaile, and prayed an ayde agaynst the French king, which was graunted vnto him.

lost all that he had in Normandy.
Troubles & vexations en-crease upon
king Iohn.

And with all speede possible prepared an army & sailed ouer, and gave an onfet o. i his enemies with such force (as by the prouision of almighty God the geuer of all victoꝝ) the French king and his complices had such a repulse at the English mennes handes, that they pursuing the French men, in their flight did so nerely folow them into their holde, and so enforced vpon them, that they not onely tooke the sayde Arthur prisoner, with manye other of the Frenche men, but also gaue such an ouerthrow to the rest, that none was there left to to beare tydynges home.

This Arthur was sonne to Geoffrey Duke of Briteyn, which was the elder brother of king Iohn, and so thys Arthur was king Iohns Nephew. And to make the matter moze euidēt, king Henry the second had eyght children, one Mylliam, which dyed in his childhood, the second Henry, which also dyed in his youth, after he was crowned king, hys father being alque, the thirde Geoffrey Duke of Briteyn, which also dyed in hys fathers life tyme, leauing behunde him two children, Arthur and Brecca, the fourth Richard the first, surnamed Cœur de Lyon, the fift Iohn who succeeded Richard hys brother, with thre other daughters named, Elianor married to the king of Spayne, Ione Countesse of Chouloise, and Maloude Duches of Saxon, that afterwards was Empreſse.

The sayde Arthur being thus taken in warre, was brought before the king at the Castle of Falaise in Normandy, who being exhorted with manye gentle wordes to leaue the French king, and to encline to his Uncle, answering agayne stoutly and with great indignation, required the kingdome of Englande with all there to belonging to be restored to him, as to the lawfull heire of the Crowne: by reason whereof, prouoking the kinges displeasure against him, he was sent to the Tower of Reane, where at the length, whether by leaping into the ditch, thinking to make his escape, or whether by some other priuie hande, or by what chance else it appereth not certaine by stories, he finished his life, by the occasion whereof, the sayd Iohn was had after in great suspicion, whether iustly or vniustly God knoweth.

Thys yere as sayeth Fabian there were chosen in London. xxxv. of the most substanciall and wisest Citizens, which were called the counsaile of the Citie, out of the which number perelye the Baylifes, and afterwarde the Maiors and Shirifes were chosen.

This yere as Historiographers write, king Iohn for lacke of good prouision to be made in tyme, lost all his holdes and possessions in Normandy, through the force and power of the French king.

And after these losses came other troubles vpon him as great or greater enemies, that was the Pope and his Cardinales, by occasion of chosynge the Archbishop of Cauntozbury which afterwarde shall be at large declared.

And thys yere also (as sayth Reynulph) happened many great and wonderful tempestes, with lightminges and thunder, and the same also was of long continuance, and in that tempest there fell hayle of the greatnesse of Venues egges, the which destroyed fruite, corne and cattell, besyde manye other hurtes that the same did. And the same time also there were seene spirites in the ayre (as the aforesayd aucthour sayth) fleyng lyke fowles bearing fyre in their billes, and did set diuerse houses on fyre.

And in the sayde yere in the moneth of July dyed Queene Alianor the kinges

kinges mother, and shortly after dyed also Hubert Archebishop of Cauntozbury: whose deccasse after it was knowen to the Monkes of Cauntozbury, before his body was yet comitted to the earth, the yonger sort of y Monkes there gathered themselues together at midnight, and elected their Subprior Reignold: without the kinges licence or yet his knowledge, and they proulye placed him in the Metropolitall seate, singyng Te deum at midnight. And because the King should not make their election voyde, they charged him forthwith to go to Rome to the Pope for his confirmation, and made him to sweare that he should kepe all thinges secreete by the way as he went, & not to make their doyngs knowen to any man before he came to the Pope. But he contrarye to his othe, as soone as he came into Flaunders, opened a broade all the matter and vttered their counsaile. Whereupon the Monkes beyng not a little agreed with him, sent to him proulye that without delay he should go forwarde of his iourney. And so soone as he was departed, the next day folowynge they sent to the king, desirynge of him his gracious licence Canonically to choose their Archbishop. The king most gently and fauorably granted their petition, requiring them instantly, and desirynge that for his sake they would shewe fauour to Iohn Gray then Bishop of Norwiche, and president of his counsaile as they did indeede, erecting him into that seate of high Primate.

Nowe when this their election was presented vnto the king, the king gaue vnto them his great and heartie thankes, and of his awne costes and charges he sent his messengers vnto Rome to the Pope to haue the same election ratified.

After the former elections made as aforesayde, the suffraganes of Cauntozburge beyng not a little offended at the sayde elections, sent speedilye to Rome, to haue them both staid, for that they were not called to neither of the elections: By reason whereof there grewe a great tumult.

This yere sayth Fabian by reason of fowle weatheryng, wheate was solde for. xv. shillings the quarter, which was then thought a great price, and euen so it was if ye consider the value of their money, which was then valued at. xx. pence the ounce of siluer, and now it is currant with vs at five shillings the ounce, and so after that rate, when they payed. xv. shillings for a quarter, the same was of our money. xv. shillings a quarter.

And in the Sommer next folowynge, king Iohn maryed his bastarde daughter vnto Leuolyn Prince of Wales, and gaue with her the Castell and Lordship of Elyngsmer, beyng in the Marches of Southwales.

This yere the Suffraganes of the Prouynce of Cauntozbury of the one side, and the Monkes of Cauntozbury on the other hyde, came before the Pope with their leuode elections. First the Monkes presentynge Reignold their Subprior, desired that their election might be confirmed. The Suffraganes likewise complayned that the Monkes woulde presume to choose the Archebishop without their consent, and therefore desired by diuers reasons the first election to be of none effect. The Pope decisyng the matter betwene them both, pronounced with the Monkes, chargynge the Suffraganes and Bishops to meddle no more with that election, but to let the Monkes alone.

The Monkes of Cauntozbury now hauynge the whole election in their awne handes, fell also at a square among themselues, the yonger sort with the elder. The yonger sort which had chosen Reignold their Subprioꝛ, would haue that election to stande. The olde sort of Monkes replied againe, sayng: that the first election was by stealth and by night, and by the yonger part also without the consent of the elder Monkes, and also done without the kinges licence or appoyntment, and without the due solemnitie thereunto belongyng. And as concernyng our election, say they, it was done in the cleare day light, by the which it had aucthoritie, and in the presence of oure liege Lorde the king, and his consent and counsaile, beyng to the same.

This Allegation thus proponed, the Subprioꝛs proctor, or man of law, stood foorth and proued the former election to be good, and this latter to be voyde and of no value, after this sort. Whether the first election (sayth he) were iust or vniust, ye ought first by the lawe to haue condemned it, befoze ye should haue presumed to the seconde: But this ye did not, therefore is this your latter doying no election at all, the first therefore is rather to be ratified than yours.

When they had thus multiplied talke vpon both sydes, with many frivulous allegations a long time, land could not agree vpon one person. Pope Innocent condemned both these elections, commaūding them to chose Stephen Langton, then Cardinall of Saint Chyrligone for the Archebischop of Cantorbury. The Monkes then answered, that they durst not so do, without the consent of their king, and also for that it was preiudiciall to their auncient liberties. The Pope by and by (sayth the story) as one in a fury, takyng their wordes out of their mouthes, sayd thus vnto them, we will you to knowe it, that we haue full power and aucthoritie ouer the Church of Cantorbury: neither are we wont to tary the consent of Princes, therefore we commaund you vpon paine of our great curse that ye chose him onely whom we haue appoynted you.

The Monkes at these wordes were abashed and terrefied (although they much murmured in their hearts) yet consented all in one, & ther vpon sang, Te Deum: only did Doctor Helias Brautfield withdrate himselfe from that election, whom the king had sent for the admission of the Bischop of Norwiche.

Thus was Stephen Langton in the high Church of Uiterby by Innocent the Popes awne mouth made Archebischop of Cantorbury. From thence foorth therefore (sayth Mathew of Paris) the Pope could do no lesse, but mightely defend him from all vexation and daunger, considering that he was of his awne preferment.

Vpon this occasion king Iohn conceyued an excedyng displeasur against the Monkes of Cantorbury (as he had good cause) they doying so many euils against his Princely prerogatiue: Without his licence they elected their Archebischop, and put by the Bischop of Norwiche whom he had appoynted: They wasted a great part of his treasure for the warres, and bitterly against the kings minde they made Stephen Langton their Metropolitane, whom he toke for a grieuous enemy vnto the whole realme, chiefly for that he was alwayes so familiar with the French king. Wherefoze in his anger he banished them out of his land to the number of. lxxij. for their contumacy and contempt of his regall power.

The Monkes of Cantorbury thus beyng banished, the king forthwith sendeth messengers to the Pope with his letters, wherein he doth sharply and and expressly quarell with the Pope: first, for that he so vncourteously did aduillat the election of the Bischop of Norwiche, & set by one Stephen Langton, a man vnkowne to him, and brought by amongst his enimies along wyme in the kingdome of Fraunce, consecrating him Archebischop of Cantorbury, and letting the other go. Also, which is moze, it redowneth, sayth he, to the subuersion and derogation of the liberties apperteyning to his crowne, that his consent being not asked befoze of the Monkes, which should haue bene done, they notwithstanding rashly presumed to promote and preferre the same election. Wherefoze he cannot maruaile he sayth, ynough, that neither the sayde Pope, nor the court of Rome doth consider, and reuolue with themselves, how necessary his loue and fauour hath bene alwayes hether to vnto the Sec of Rome: and that they fixe not the eye of reason vpon thys, what great fruite and reuenues hath proceeded hether to them oute of the realme of Englande, the lyke wher of hath not bene receyued out of any other Country besides, on this side the Alpes. He addeth moze ouer & sayth, that for his liberties, he will stand, if neede be, vnto death, neyther can he be so remoued and shaken off from the election of the bishop of Norwiche, which he seeth to be to him so commodious and profitable. Finally thus he concludeth, sayng: that in case in this his request he be not heard, he will so prouide by the seas, that there shall bee no such gadding nor coursing ouer any moze to Rome, suffering the ryches of the lande anye moze to be exported ouer, whereby he should himselfe be the lesse able to withstand his enimies. And seing he hath of his awne at home both Archebischops, Bischops, and other Prelates of the Church, both of Englishmen and of other, sufficiently prouided and instructed in all kinde of knowledge, therefore he shall not neede to seeke for iustice and iudgement any farther abroad. Now when these letters came to the Popes intelligence, he directeth letters to the king agayne in this forme.

Innocent Pope, seruaunt of the seruants of God, to oure welbeloued sonne in Christ, the king of England, health & Apostolicall blessing: where as we haue written to you heretofore exhortyng and entreating you after an humble, gentle, and diligent sorte, concerning the matter of the Church of Cantorbury, you haue written to vs agayne after a threating sort, and vbrayding manner, both spitefully, and also frowardly. And where as wee moze and aboue that our right and duetie required, haue borne and geuen to you: you agayne for your parte haue geuen to vs not so much as by right and duetie ye are bound to doe. And though your deuocion (as ye say) hath bene to vs very necessary, yet consider agayne, that oures also is not a little oportune and expedient for you. And where as we in suche lyke cases haue not shewed at any time the lyke honor to any Prince, as vnto you, you agayne haue so much derogated to our honour, as no Prince else hath presumed to doe, but you alone, pretending certaine frivulous causes and occasions I cannot tell what, why you would not condescend to the election of Stephen Langton Cardinall of Saint Chyrligono chosen by the Monkes of Cantorbury, for that the sayde Stephen, as you say, hath bene conuersant and brought by among your enimies, and his person to you vnkowne. But you know what is the Proverbe of Salomon: The net is cast: but in bayne in the eyes and sight of the flyng birdes, with much other matter moze in the same same epistle, wherin he falleth into commendation of Stephen Langton his Cardinall, declaring howe learned he was in the liberall artes, and in diuinitie, insomuch as he was prebentated at Paris, also come of an honest stock, and an English man borne, and not vnknownen to the king, seeyng the king had written thise to him befoze. &c. Moreouer, declaring in the sayde letter, howe the messengers of the king had sperefied to him another cause, which was, for that the Monkes of Cauntozbury which had to do in the election, came not to him befoze for his consent, declaring moreouer in the sayd letter, howe the sayde Messengers of the king intreated in the kinges behalfe, that forsomuch as the Popes letters wherein the king was commaunded to send his Proctours to Rome for the same matter, came not to the kinges hande, neither did y Monkes direct any such letters or message to the king to haue his consent, therefore, that the Pope considering the same, would graunt so much for the regard of the kinges honour, that the Monkes of Cauntozbury should procede, not without the kinges assent therein: And forasmuch as that hath not bene done as yet, therefore they desyred some delay therein to be geuen sufficient for the doying thereof. Wherevnto he sayde, that he had graunted and fulfilled his request, in sendyng his messengers and letters once or twise for the same purpose, although he sayd it was not the maner of the See Apostolike, who hath the fulnesse of power ouer the church of Cauntozbury, to wayte for Princes consentes in such elections, who then coulde not be suffered to do that which they came for. &c. Wherefoze in the knittynge vp of his letter, he concludeth in these woordes.

And therefore, seeyng the matter so standeth, we see no cause why we should require or tary for the kinges fauour or consent any more therein, but intend so to procede in this matter, neither enclynnyng on the right hande, neyther yet on the left, accordyng as the canonicall ordinaunces of the holy fathers shall direct vs: that is, that all impediments and delayes set asyde, so to prouide that the Church of Cauntozbury be no lenger destitute of her Pastour. Wherefoze, be it knowen to your discretion or kingly prudence, that forsomuch as this election of Stephen Langton, hath orderly and concordably thus proceded without fraude or deceite vpon a person meete for the same: therefore we will not for no mannes pleasure, neyther may we without daunger, of fame and of conscience, differre or protract any lenger the consummation of the sayde election. Wherefoze my welbeloued sonne, seeyng we haue had respect to your honour aboute that our right and duetic requireth, studeye to honour vs so muche as your dutie requireth againe, so that you may the more plentifully deserue fauour both at Goddes handes and oures, least that by the doying the contrary, you bring your selfe into such a pecke of troubles, as afterward ye shall scarce rid your selfe of againe. For this knowe for a certeine, in the ende it must needes fall out, that he shall haue the better, vnto whom euery knee heauenly, earthly, and infernall creatures do bowe, whose turne I serue in earth, though I be vnworthie. Therefore settle not your selfe to obey their perswasions whiche alwayes desyre your vnquietnesse, whereby they may the better fishe in the water when it is troubled, but commit your selfe to our pleasure, which vndoubtedly shall turne to your prayse, glory, and honour, for it should not be much for your safety in this cause to resist God and the Church, in whose quarrell that blessed Martyr and glorious

Geuen at Laterane the tenth yere of our popedome,

Not long after this letter was sent out, there folowed especiall charge and commaundement sent into England vnto certeine Bishops there, requyryng them by auctoritie Apostolicall, that if the sayd king would not receiue the afozenamed Prior of Catozbury and his Monkes, that then they should enterdict the king throughout all his realme. For the executing whereof, foure Bishops were appoynted by the auctoritie of the popes Bulles, that is to say, William Bishop of London, Eustace Bishop of Ely, Walter bishop of Winchester, and Giles Bishop of Herford. Which sayd foure Bishoppes went vnto the king, and shewed them their commission from the Pope (as is abouesayde) willyng him to consent thereto. &c.

But the king refused the same, and would by no meanes graunt they request: Wherebpon, they departyng from his grace, went the morow after the Annunciation of our Lady, and pronounced the sayde generall interdiction throughout the realme of England: so that the Church doores were shut vp with keyes and other fastenings, and with walles. &c.

Howe when the king heard of this, he began to be moued against them, and tooke all the possessions of the foure bishops into his handes, appoynting certeine men to kepe the liuyngs of the Clergie throughout the realme, that they should enioy no part thereof. Which thing when the Bishops vnderstoode, they cursed all them that kept or should meddle with Church goodes, against the will of them that ought them: and vnderstanding for all that, that the king nothing regarded their doynge, they went ouer the sea to the Archbishop of Cauntozbury and informed him what had happened. Who heeryng the same, willed them againe to returne to Cauntozbury, and he would come thether to them, or else sende certeine personnes thether in his steede, that should do as much as if he were there himselfe. Then when the Bishoppes heard this, they returned againe into Englande to Cauntozbury, which tydynges came shortly to the king, that they were come againe thether, and because he might not himselfe trauaile to them, he sent thether Bishops, Clerges, and Abbottes, to entreate them that the king might receyue the Archebishop Stephen, and the Prior and all the Monkes of Cauntozbury, promisyng in his behalfe, that he should neuer take any thing of the church goodes against the will of them that owe them, but would make amendes to them of whome he had taken any goodes, and the Church should haue all her fraunchesse in as ample maner as in Saint Edwardes time the Confessor.

When the foune of agreement was thus concluded, it was ingrossed in a payze of indentures, which the foresayde foure Bishops to the one part therof set to their seales, and the other part the sayd Clerges, Bishops, and Abbots, carped to the king. When the king saw the order therof, he lyked it well, sayyng he would not agree to make restitution of the Church goodes. So he sent to the foure Bishops againe, that they should put out that point of restitution: But they answered stoutly that they would not put out one worde. Then the king sent to the Archbishop, by the foure Bishoppes, that he should come to Cauntorbury to speake with him, and for his safe conduit to come and go againe at his will, he sent his Justices as pledges, that is to say, Gilbert Peltwyn, William de la Bereuer, & John Lefitz: which thing this done, the Archbishop Stephen came to Cauntorbury & the king heeryng therof came to Chilharn, from whence he sent his Treasurer bishop of Winchester to him, to haue him put out of the Indentures the clause of restitution aforesayde, who denyng to alter any worde of the same, moued the king in such sort, that immediately was proclaymed throughout England at the kings commaun- ment, that all those that had any Church liuing, & went ouer the sea, that they should come againe into England at a certein day, or else lose their liuyngs for euermore. And further in that Proclaymation, he charged all Shirifes with- in the realme to enquire if any Bishoppes, Abbottes, Priors, or any other Church men, from that day forward, receyued any commaundement that came from the Pope, that they should take his or theyr body, and byng it before him. And also that they should take into their handes for the kinges vie all the Church landes that were geuen to any man through the Bishop Stephen or by the Prior of Cauntorbury from the time of the election of the Archebishop. And further charged that all the woods that were the Archbi- shops, should be cut downe, and all solde.

When tidynges came to the Pope that the king had thus done, being mo- ued thereby with fiery wrath, he sent to the king two Legates, the one called Dandolph, and the other Durant, to warne him in the Popes name, that he should ceasse off his doynge to holy Church, and amend the wrong that hee had done to the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and to the Priors & Monkes of Cantorbury, and to all the Clergie of England. And further that he should restore againe the goodes that he had taken of them agaynst their will: or else they should curse the king by name: and to do this, the Pope tooke them his letters in Bulles patent.

These two Legates comyng into England, resorted to the the king to Northampton, where he helde his Parliament, and saluting him sayde: they came from the Pope of Rome, to reforme the peace of holy Church. And first they sayd, we admonithe you on the Popes behalfe that ye make full restitu- tion of the goodes that ye haue rauished of holy Church and of the land. And that ye receyue Stephen the Archbishop of Cauntorbury into his dignitie, and the Prior of Cauntorbury, and his Monkes. And that ye yelde againe vnto the Archebishop all his landes and rentes without any withholdyng. And sit yet moreouer, that ye shall make suche restitution to them as the Church shall thinke sufficient.

Then answered the king, as touching the Priour and hys Monkes of Cauntorbury: all that ye haue sayde I will gladly doe, and all thing else that ye would ordeyne: But as touching the Archebishop, I shall tell you as it lyeth in my hart. Let the Archebishop leaue hys Bishoprike, and if the Pope then shall intreate for him, peraduenture I may like to geue him some other Bishoprick in England: And vpon this condition I will receyue and admyt him.

Then sayde Dandolph vnto the king: holy Church was wont neuer to disgrace

disgrade an Archbishop without cause reasonable, but euer she was wont to correct Princes that were disobedient vnto her.

What, how now, quoth the king: threaten ye me? Nay sayd Dandolph, but ye haue openly tolde as it standeth in your hart: and now we will tell you what is the Popes will, and thus it standeth: that he hath wholly inter- dicted and accursed you, for the wrongs ye haue done to holy Church, and to the Clergy: and for as much as ye dwell in your awne malice and will come to none amendment: ye shall vnderstand that from this tyme forward, the sentences vpon you giuen haue force & strength. And all those that you haue commoned withall befoze this time, whether that they be Cleres, Barons or Knights, or any other whatsoever they be, we assoyle them safely vnto thys day. And from this time forward, of what condition soeuer they be, we ac- curse them openly and specially by this our sentence, that doe with you com- mon. And we assoyle moreouer Carles, Barons, Knightes, and all other maner of men of their homages, service and fealties that they should doe vn- to you. And thys thing to confirme, we geue playne powre to the Bishop of Winchester, & to the Bishop of Norwiche. And the same powre against Scot- land to the Bishop of Rochester and of Sarisburie. And in Wales, we geue the same power to the Bishop of Saint David and Landaff and of S. Asse.

And moreouer we send throughout all christendome, that all the Bishops beyonde the sea, shall accurse all those that helpe or counsell you in any ma- ner of neede, that ye haue to doe in any parte of the worlde. And that they also assoyle them against you, how many soeuer they be. And further we as- soyle them by the aucthoritie of the Pope, and also commaund them to warre with you, as with him that is enimie to the Church.

Then the king heeryng thys, answered, what may ye doe to me more? If I had knowne this to be the cause of your comyng, I would haue kept you back for one yere. Dandolphe the Cardinall answered: full well we thought at our first comyng, that ye would haue bene obedient to God and to holy Church, and to haue fulfilled the Popes commaundement, which we haue shewed and pronounced to you as we were charged therewith: But now if ye had wist the cause of our comyng, ye woulde haue made vs tarie one whole yere, which ye might as well haue sayde, that ye woulde haue a whole yeres respite by the Popes lycence. But for to suffer what death that you can ordeyne, we wyll not spare to tell you all the Popes message.

Vpon this occasion Pope Innocent yet once agayne commaunded vpon paine of his great curse, that no man should obey king Iohn, neyther yet keepe company with him, to common or counsaile with him, yea, his awne famillier household to doe him anye kinde of service, eyther at bed or at boord, in Church, Hall or stable: But what followed thereof? the greater parte of them which after such sort fled from him, by the ordinance of God, of dyuerse and sundrie diseases the same yere dyed. And betwene both nations English and French, fell that yere great amitie, but secret, subtile and false, to the bit- ter betrayng of England. Neither was the Pope content onely with this, but moreouer the sayd Pope Innocent gaue sentence definitive, by counsaile of his Cardinales, that king Iohn should be deposed and put from his seate Regall, and another put in his rowme. And to the speedy execution thereof, he appointed king Philip the French king, promising to geue him full remission of all his finnes, and the cleare possession of all the realme of England to him and his heyres for euer, if he did eyther kill him or expell him.

Moreover, he wrote vnto other Nations that they should take on them the liuery or badge of the crosse, and be reuenged on him for the manifolde injuries done to the Church vniuersall, by that Turke and Pagan king Iohn, as he called him.

But for all that the Pope could do vnto him, he ceased not to be auenged on such Bishoppes and Priestes as trayterously had conspired against him, partly by puttyng them to exile, and partly by seasyng vpon their goodes and liuynges. And mistrustyng that his people would not now continue true vnto him, by reason he stood accursed, and also the land was interdicted for his sake, he caused the whole realme to be sworne vnto him againe. And then assembled he an armie intending to warre vpon Alexander the second king of Scottes, for that he receyued many of the Nobles of the Realme that dayly fled vnto him for succour, and by that meanes to be auenged vpon him, for breaking the league that was betwixt them.

And when he had thus prepared for warre, he hastened him shortly after to Northumberland, and marchyng forward from thence toward Scotland, he invaded the frontiers of his enemyes, and offered them battaile. But the Scottish king perceiuyng himselfe to weake to resist the power of England, and therefore thinking that it would be little for his profite, if he had then ioyned battaile with him, did by the aduice of his counsaile refuse to fight, and so dismissing his army, he sent vnto king Iohn, and made great sute to bee at peace with him, the which at the length he bought, though with much a do, and for a great summe of money: But to returne from whence we haue digressed.

The next yere after the aforesayde interdiction, the French king began his attempt in hope of the crowne of England, beyng well manned with the Bishoppes, Monkes, Prelates and Priestes, and their seruantes to mainteine the same, braggyng of the letters which they had receyued of the great men there. But beholde the worke of God: The Englishe nauie tooke three hundred of the French kinges Shippes, well loaden with wheate, wyne, meale, flesh, armor, and such other like, meete for the warre, and an hundred they brent within the haven of Damme, not farre off Bruges, takyng the spoyle with them.

In the meane while the Priestes within England had provided them a false and counterfeited prophet, called Peter Wakefelde, a Yorkshire man, who was an Hermite, an idle gadder about, and a pratlyng marchant. Now, to bring this Peter in credite, and the king out of all credite with his people, diuerse baine persons bruted dayly among the Commons of the realme, that Christ had twise apered vnto him in the shape of a childe betwene the priests handes, once at Yorke, another tyme at Womfret, and that he had breathed vpon him thise sayyng, peace, peace, peace, and teachyng many things, which he anon after declared to the bishops, and bid the people amend their naughty liuyng: Beyng rapt also in spirite, they sayde he behelde the ioyes of heauen, and sorowes of hell, for scant were there three in the Realme, sayde he, that liued christianly.

reigne no longer then the Ascension day next folowynge, which was in the yere of our Lord .1211. and was the .xiiij. yere from his coronation, & this he sayd he had by reuelation. Then it was of him demaunded, whether he should be slaine, or be deposed, or should voluntarily geue ouer the crowne? He answered that he could not tell: But of this he was sure (he sayd) that neither he nor any of his stocke or linage should reigne after that day.

The king heeryng of this, laughed much at it, and made but a scoffe therat: Tush sayth he, it is but an ideot knaue, and such a one as lacketh his right wittes. But when this foolish prophet had so escaped the daunger of the kinges displeasure, and that he made no more of it, he gate him abroade and prated thereof at large, as he was a very idle bagabond, and vsed to trattle and talke more than ynough, so that they which loued the king caused him anon after to be apprehended as a malefactor, and to be thowen in prison, the king not yet knowyng thereof.

Anon after, the fame of this phantasticall prophet went all the realme ouer, and his name was knowen euery where, as foolishnesse is much regarded of the people, where wisdom is not in place: specially, because then he was emprisoned for the matter, the rumour was the larger, their wonderinges were the wantoner, their practises the foolishher, their busye talkes and other idle doynge, the greater. Continually from thence, as the rude maner of people is, olde Gossypes tales went abroade, newe tales were inuented, fables were added to fables, and lyes grewe vpon lyes. So that euery day newe slaunders were layde on the king, and not one of them true, rumors arose, blasphemyes were spred, the enemyes reioysed, and treasons by the priestes were mainteyned, and what lyke wyse was surmyed, or other subtiltye practised, all was then fathered vpon this foolish prophet, as thus sayth Peter Wakefelde, thus hath he prophesied, and thus it shall come to passe, yea, many times when he thought nothing lesse. When the Ascension day was come, which was prophesied of before, king Iohn commaunded his regall tent to be spred in the open fielde, passing that day with his noble counsaile and men of honour, in the greatest solemnitie that euer he did before, solacyng himselfe with Musically instrumentes & songes, most in sight amongst his trustie friendes. When that day was past in all prosperitie and myrth, his enemies beyng confused, turned all vnto an allegoricall vnderstandyng to make the prophet good, and sayde, he is no longer kyng, for the Pope reig- neth and not he: yet reigned he styll, and his sonne after him to proue that prophet a lyer.

Then was the king by his counsaile perswaded, that this false prophet had troubled the realme, peruerted the heartes of the people, and raysed the commons against him, for his woordes went ouer the sea, by the helpe of his prelates, and came to the French kinges eare, and gaue to him a great encouragement to invade the lande: he had not else done it so sodeinly. But he was most folly deceyued, as all they are and shall be that put their trust in such darke drowsye dreames of hippocrites. The king therefore commaunded that he should be hanged by, and his sonne also with him, least any more false prophetes should aryse of that race.

The king thus compassed about on euery side with enemyes, and seeyng the great daunger that was like to folowe, and himselfe to be brought to such afterward, we will receyue and holde of our mother Church of Rome, as for ferme doyng fealtie to our holy father the Pope, Innocent the thirde, and to all the Popes that come after him in the maner abouesayde, and in presence of the wise man Pandulph the Popes Subdeacon, we make liege homage, after him, and the realmes of England and of Ireland we should mainteyne truelly in all maner of poyntes against all maner of men by our power, tho-row Goddes helpe.

But Sir Thomas Dooze knight wrytyng in a booke of his entituled, the supplication of soules, against the supplication of beggers, certainly affirmeth that there was neuer any such tribute graunted, eyther for England or Ireland. And he sayth further, that neither Rome can shew any such graunt, nor neuer could, & if they could it were right nought worth: for neuer could any king of England geue away the realme to the Pope, or make the lande tributary, though he would, and that no such money (sayth he) is there payd, nor neuer was. This sayng I leaue to your iudgemēt. But I maruaill much that maister Dooze beyng a great learned man, would not for the auouch-ment of his credite, and the truth of so great a matter, in reponing a thing so manifestly wrytten by a great number of Authours, as namely Reynulph of Chester, Polydore, and a great number of other, which affirme the aforesayd History to be true, that he doth not allege so much as the testimonie and aucthoritie of some one aucthor, for the prouyng of his assertion: But as aforesaid
I leaue this to the iudgement of the reader.

But before the releasement of the interdiction, the king was miserably compelled kneelyng on his knees to geue ouer both his crowne and scepter to the Pope of Rome, for the space of fīue dayes, and as his client, bassall, feodary, and tenant, to receyue it of him againe at the handes of another Cardinall. And to this was he bound obligatory, both for himselfe, and for them which should succede him, payng yerely for a knowledge thereof, a thousand Markes for England and Ireland as aforesayde. So was the interdiction discharged the second day of July after sixe yeres three monethes and .xviij.
dayes from the first proclaymyng thereof.

diction of

In this new rufflyng, the king easily graunted that Abbots, Deanes, & Curates should be elected freely euery where, so that the lawes of the realme were truelly obserued. But against that were the Bishops, alleagyng theyr Canonical decrees, & rules synodall, determinyng the king therein to haue nothing a do, but onely to geue his consent after they had once elected. But among that company, there were some that consented not to that error: A sozt also there were of prelates that time which were not pleased that the landes interdiction should cease, till the king had payde all which their Clergie in all quarters of the realme had demaunded without reason: yea euery lawcy Sir Iohn for his part, euen to the very breakyng of their hedges, the stealyng of their Apples, and their other occasionall dammages, demaunded allowance which grewo to an incredible summe and impossible to be answered.

Notwithstanding that which is vttered before, concerning the bitter malice of the clergie against the king, yet did the Popes Legate and Cardinal Nicholas Tusculanus muche fauour the king hys doinges and allowe his proceedings, wherefoze certaine of the Clergie reported of hym that he was exceeding parciall, and regarded not their matters ecclesiasticall as he should haue done, for leauing the accompt of their restitutions, he went with the kings officers as the kings pleasure was to the Cathedrall Ministers, Abbeyes, Bishops, Deancies and great Churches vacant. And there for the parties. But vpon him onely whome the king nominated, he compelled most commonly the election to passe, which bered them wonderfully: Upon this therefore they rayfed a new conspiracie against the kings person, and we behelde (sayth Houeden) about the same time manye noble houses and assemblies deuoyded in many places: the fathers and the aged men stode vpon the kinges parte, but the yonger sort contrarye. And some there were that for loue of their kindred, and in other sundrie respects, forsoke the king againe: yea, and the same went that time (sayth he) that they were confederated with Alexander the Scottish king and Leoline Prince of Wales to worke him an vtter mischiefe. A counsell at Oxford the Archbishop called, where as some would not tarry, considering the confusion thereof: the other sorte hauing verie obstinate hearts, reuyled the king most spitefully behinde hys back, and sayde, that from thenceforth, he ought to be taken for no Gouvernour of theirs. Their outragious and frantick clamours so much preuayled in those dayes, that it grewe to a greuous tumult and a most perillous commotion.

Lateranc.

In the yere of our Lord 1212 as witnesseth Paulus Emilius and other Histories, Pope Innocent the third held a generall counsaile at Rome called the counsell of Laterane. The chiefe causes of that counsell were these. In the dayes of this Innocent, heresie (as he calleth it) beganne to rise vp very high, and to spreade forth his braunches abroade. By reason whereof many Princes were excommunicate: as Dtho the Emperour, Iohn the king of Englaunde, Peter king of Aragon, Raymond the Erle of Cholorse and a great sort more. And many landes were interdicted, as England, Irelande, Pro-uance, Colouise, Aquitaine, Sataloni, and such other lyke as is aforesayde. So that it could be none otherwise (sayth Houeden) but with the sharpe Axe of the Gospell (for so the Pope called excommunications) they ought of necessity to haue bene cut of from the church. Therefore was thys counsell prouyded and proclaymed, and Prelates from all Nations thereunto called. And to colour those mischiefes which he then went about, he caused it by his Legates and Cardinales to be nosped abroade that hys intent was therein onely to haue the Church vniuersally reformed, and the holy lande from the Turkes handes recovered. But all this was but craft and falshood as the sequelle thereof hath manifestly declared. For hys purpose thereby was to subdue all Princes, and to make himselfe riche and wealthy. For there he made this Act, and established it by publique decree, that the Pope shoulde haue from thence forth the correction of all Christian Princes, and that no Emperour shoulde be admitted, except he were sworn before, and were also crowned of him. He ordeyned moreouer that whatsoeuer he were the which shoulde speake euill of the Pope, he shoulde be punished in hell with eternall damnation, Conradus Vspersensis, Hieronimus Marius. He also ordeyned a ricular confession. Also in this counsaile was first inuented and brought in transubstanciation.

Stephen
communicated.

But nowe let vs retorne to king Iohn againe, and marke howe the priestes and their adherentes were plagued for their homely handling of his Maiestie. In the aforesayd counsaile of Laterane, and the same yere, was Stephen Langton the Archebishop of Cauntorburye excommunicated of Pope Innocent, with all those Bishops, prelates, priestes, Barons and Commons which had bene of counsaile with him in the former rebellion. And when the sayd Archbishop had made instant sute to the Pope to be assolued, anone he made him this aunswere with great indignation: Brother mine, I swore by Saint Peter, thou shalt not so soone at my hande obteyne the benefite of absolution, for why, thou hast not onely done harme to the king of England, but also thou hast in a great many of thinges iniured the Church of Rome here: and therefore thou shalt tary my leysure. The Archbishop was also at that tyme suspended out of the Church, and commaunded to say no Masse at all, neither yet to exercise any other ecclesiasticall office, because he would not at tyme conuenient execute the Popes curse vpon the rebellious Barons: With them the sayd Pope had bene so depely offended and angered a little before, that the great Charter of the liberties of England, with great indignation and countenance most terrible, he rent and destroyed by sentence diffinitive condemnynge it for ever. And by and by, therevpon cursed all the other rebelles with Bell and Candell. The greater Capteines of them which were the Citizens of London for that assay, were pronounced excommunicate by name, and remayned still in that state: wherfore they appealed to the generall counsaile.

Also in the sayde yere, those great men were likewise sommoned to appere at Rome in the generall Synode, which neuer consented to the kinges depolyng: though they were called (they sayd) thereunto by the Archebishop of Cauntorburye and others, and required by other to subscribe to the same, yet could they not of conscience do it, because he had humbled himselfe, and also granted to kepe peace with all men. Thus was the whole realme miserably then deuoyded into two factions, through the malice of the Clergie, & so strifes increased in the land euery where. Yet were there of the Lordes and Gentlemen a great number at that tyme that folowed the king, and allowed his doyngs. But they which were on the other syde, not a little suspectyng the state that they were in, fled spedely to the frenche king Philip, desirynge him that he would graunt vnto them his eldest sonne Ludouicke, and they would elect him to be their king, and that without much tariance. They besought him moreouer, that he would sende with him a strong and mightye power, as were able to subdue him vtterly, that they might (they sayd) be deliuered of such a wicked Tyrant. Such was the report that these wicked men gaue of their Christian gouernour appoynted to them of God, whom they ought to haue obeyed though he had bene euill, euen for very conscience sake. And as certeyne of the Lordes and Barons, were in doyng to chose the sayde Ludouick for their king, the Pope sent thither one Gualo, the Cardinall of S. Martyn, to stop those rashe and cruell attemptes, chargynge the frenche king vpon his alleageance, that he with all power possible, shoulde fauor, mainteine, and defende king Iohn of England, feodarie and tenant to the sea of Rome. The frenche king thereto made aunswere, as one not contented with that arrogant precept. The realme of England, sayd he, was neuer yet any part of Saint Peters patrimonie, neither is it nowe, nor yet at any time shall be hereafter. This spake he, for that he was in hope to obteyne it for hys sonne, by treason of the Barons.

Barons,

Barons, which are bound to defende the same. If the Pope shall introduce or set by such a president in the Christianitie, he shall at his pleasure bring all Christen kinges and their kingdomes to naught. I like not this example in these dayes begonne. I cannot therefore allowe this fact of king Iohn of England, though he be mine bitter aduersary, but I much lament that he hath so endamaged his realme, and hath brought the noble ground & Queene of Prorynces vnder miserable tribute. The chiefe Lordes and men of his nobilitie standyng by when he vttered these wordes, beyng as it were in a fury cryed with one voyce. By the blood of God, in whome we trust to be saued, we will stick in this article to the losyng of our heades (let the king of England do therein what him liketh) that no king may put his land vnder tribute, and so make his nobilitie captiue seruauntes. With that came in Ludouicke the kinges eldest sonne, and sayd vnto them all there present, I beseeche you let not my purposed sourney: the Barons of England haue elected me for their Lorde and king, and I will not surely lose my right: But I will fight for it euen to the death, yea so long as heart shall styrre within my breast, and I doubt not but that I shall well obteyne it, for I haue friends among them. His father the king stood still as he had bene in a dooyme, and answered neuer a worde, but fared as though he had dissembled the matter.

King Iohn
plexitie.

About the same tyme, were such treasons and conspiracies wrought by the Bishops, Priestes, and Monkes throughout all the realme, that the king wist not where to become to finde trusty friendes. He was then compelled by the vncertainty of his subiectes to trauaile from place to place, but not without a great army of men, loking euery day when his Barons and their confederates would cruelly set vpon him. At the last he came to Dover, and there looked for aide from other quarters, which loued him better then did his aboue people. And thether to him resorted from Flaunders, Brabant and Holland, on the one syde, and from Guyan, Gascoyn, and Poyters on the other syde, and from other countries more, a wonderfull number of men. The report went then that the Pope had written to those countries, mightily to assist him for dyuerse considerations. One was, for that he had both submitted himselfe and his dominion to his protection. Another was, because he had taken on him a little before, the Iuery of the crosse to winne againe Jerusalem. The thirde was, for that he had gotten by him the dominion of England and Ireland, and feared to lose both, if he should chaunce to decay. Also in this tyme king Iohn sailyng to the Isle of Wight abode there the space of thre Monethes, and remained of purpose for the quieting of him selfe from tumultes, and led there a solitary life, among ryuers and watermen: where as he accounted rather to die then to liue, beyng so trayterously handeled of his Bishops and Barons, and not knowyng iustly howe to be aduenged on them. Upon the Purification of our Lady therefore, he tooke vpon him the crosse or voyage against the Turkes for the recouery of Jerusalem, moued therevnto rather for the doubtles he had in his people, then for any other deuotion else. And thus he sayde to his familer seruauntes: since I submitted my selfe and my landes, England and Ireland to the Church of Rome (so soe come to it) neuer thing prospered with me, but it hath gone against me.

In the next yere after, Symon Langton was chosen Archebishop of York, but that election was anon after dissolved, for information was geuen to

to the Pope, that the sayde Sutton was brother to Stephen the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, which had bene the occasion geuer of all the tumults which were at that tyme in England. And the Pope had the more hate vnto him, for that he had brought him by of naught, and did finde him at that tyme so subbozne: wherfore he placed in his roome Walter Gray bishop of Winchester.

In the same yere, Gualo the Popes Legate renewed his great curse vpon Lewes the french kings sonne, for vsurping vpon king Iohn. Likewise vpon Symon Langton and Geruys Hobruge, for prouoking him to the same, and that with a wonderfull solempnitie. For in that doing, he made all the Belles to be tong, the Candels to be light, the doores to be opened and the booke of excommunications and interdictions publiquely to be reade, committing them wholly to the Deuill for their contumacie and contempt. He also commaunded the Bishops and Curates to publishe it abroad euer all the whole realme, to the terroze of all subiects. The sayde Symon and Geruys laughed him to scozne, and derided much his doings in that behalfe, sayng: that for the iust title of Ludowike or Lewes, they had appealed to the generall counsell at Rome.

The Magistrates of London and Citizens of the same did likewise blypnd and disdeynously mocke all that the Pope had there commaunded and done: And in spite both of him and his Legate, they kept company with them that were excommunicate, both at Table and at church, shewing themselves thereby as open contemners both of him and his lawes. Lewes being at London, and taking himselfe for king, constituted Symon Langton for hys high Chauncelor, and Geruys Hobruge for his chiefe preacher. By whose daylie preachings, as well the Barons as the Citizens themselves, being both excommunicate, caused all the Church doores to be opened, and the seruiue to be song, and the sayde Lewes was in all pointes fit for their hands.

About thys tyme was Handulph the Cardinall collecting the Peter pence, taking great paines therein. And for his great labours in those affayres for holy Church, and for other good matters, he was made Bishop of Norwiche to the augmenting of his dignitie and expences.

It chaunced about this time, that the Vicount of Melun, a very noble man of the realme of Fraunce, which came hether with Ludowike to fall deadly sicke at London, and also moued in conscience to call certayne of the Englishe Barons vnto him, suche as were there appointed to the custody of that Citie, and thus he sayde vnto them. I lament your sorowfull case, and pittie with my hart the destruction that is comyng towards you and your Countrie. The daungerous snares which are prepared for your bitter confusion, are hidden from you, you doe not beholde them, but take you heede of them in tyme. Prince Ludowike hath sworne a great othe, and .xvi. of his Erles and noble men are of counsell with hym, that if he obteyne the Crowne of England, he will banishe all them then of seruiue and depriue them of landes & goodes, as many as he findeth now to go against their liege king, and are traytours to his noble person: And because you shall not take this tale for a fable, I assure you on my sayth lyng now at the mercy of God on my death bed, that I was one of them, which was sworne to the same. I haue great conscience thereof, and therefore I geue you thys warning, I pittie pooze Englande, which hath bene so noble a Region, that nowe it is come come to extreme miserie. And when he with teares had lamented it a space, he turned againe vnto them and sayde: my friends, I counsaile you earnestly to looke to your selues, and to prouide remedie in tyme, least it come vpon you vnbwares. Your king for a season hath kept you vnder: But if Lewes preuaile, he will put you from all. Of two extreme euilles, choose the more easie, and kepe that secreete which I haue tolde you of good will. With that he gaue ouer and departed this lyfe.

When this was once noysed among the Barons, they were in great heauinesse, for they sawe themselves betrapped euery way, and to be in exceeding great daunger. And this dayly augmented that feare which then came vpon the Barons: They were extremely hated of the Pope and his Legates, euery weeke came vpon them newe excommunications. Dayly detriments they had besydes in theyr possessions and goodes, in their landes and houses, corne and cattell, wines and children, so that some of them were driuen to such nede that they were enforced to seeke prayes and bootyes for susteynyng their miserable lyues. For looke what Prince Ludouicke obteyned by his warres, either territories or Castelles, he gaue them all to the French men in spight of their heades, and sayd, that they were but Traytours, lyke as they had warnyng before, which grieued them worst of all. At the last they perceyuyng that in seekyng to aduoyde one mischiefe, they were ready to fall into another much worse: They began to cast their wittes together, consentyng to submit themselves wholly and humbly to their late soueraigne Lorde king Iohn. And for that they were somewhat in doubt of their lyues, for the treason before committed, many of the friendes of them, which were of most credite with him, made sute for them. So were a great number of them pardoned, after instant and great sute made for them.

And here I thinke mete to put in remembraunce such certeine severall matters as happened to be done in this Realme, in all the tyme and processe of the former history, which of purpose I deferred, because I thought best and most comodious for the reader to haue the whole story of this king Iohn or rather his tragedy together and in one place, then in several yeres to haue set out the same in sundry partes as they chaunced. And therefore now I will returne to the order that I kept from the first yere of this king vnto the fift yere of his reigne, where I began with the story aforesayde, in the yere of our Lorde a thousand two hundreth and thre.

In the .vi. yere of his reigne (as sayth Fabian) at Drenford in Suffolke was taken in the sea a monstrous fishe, which was in the forme and shape of a man, and was kept sixe monethes alme vpon the land, and fed with rawe fleche and fishe. And because they could haue no speach of it, they cast it into the sea againe.

And in this yere both the Welsh men, and Irishe men rebelled, for that as some write that the king would haue set taskes vpon them to haue ayded him against the French king. And after he had pacified the Welsh men, he was compelled to demaund an ayde and taske of all England for the quieting of Irelande. And besyde that taske he demaunded of the white Monkes of England sixe thousande Markes, the which they denyed, makyng their excuse by their generall head, wherewith the king was sore displeased, and at his returne out of Irelande, he sore troubled and vexed them, and tooke of them them much more then he required first, and caused many of the Monkes to forsake both their houses and the realme. And after that he had prepared his armie and all thinges that belonged to the same, he with a great number of shippes sayled into Ireland and shortly subdued them, and setting all thinges in good order, he returned againe into England.

In the .viii. yere of his reigne, and the first day of the moneth of October his first sonne Henry by name was bozne by Isabell his seconde wife at Winchester.

In the .ix. yere of his reigne, he graunted to the city of London, that where before tyme the same Citie was ruled by two Baylifes, that now they should elect among themselves a Maior and two Shirifes, which should haue the rule and gouernaunce of the sayd Citie, and from thence forth the name of Baylifes should cease.

Some write that the cause of this alteration of Officers was, because the purueyers for the kinges houholde, beyng then a great dearth of corne, would haue taken bp of the prouision of the Citie to serue the king withall: The which thing Roger Winchester and Edmond Hardell then Baylifes, would in no wise suffer them to do: Wherevpon the king taking great displeasure with them, depriued them of their offices, and after wardes committed them to warde: But yet beyng at the length pacified againe, in the steele of two Baylifes, he gaue the Citizens aucthoritie perely to choose amongst themselves a Maior and two Shirifes, which should haue the gouernment of the Citie: The first Maior was Henry Fitz aleyne, and the first Shirifes, Peter Duke, and Thomas Feele.

And in the .x. yere, London bridge which before was made of Timber and repayred by a Colledge of Priestes, was nowe begonne to be builded of stone.

Nowe to conclude, in the .xviij. and last yere of his reigne, the Barons submitted themselves vnto him as is abouesayde in the ende of the story, and then kinge Iohn with a great armie went into Suffolke and Norfolke, and there hee afflicted suche as had swozne to his enemies, with great and grienous mischiefe. After that, he destroyed the two Abbeyes of Peterborough, and Crowland, for the great treasons which they also had wrought against him, and so he departed from thence to Lincolneshire. And in this yere the .xviij. day of July dyed Pope Innocent the thirde, and was buryed in a Citie called Perusim, in Italy, where as he had trauallyed to make a peace betwene the Genouayes, and the Dyces, for his alone commoditie and aduantage. After him succeeded one Cintius, otherwise called Honozius the thirde, a man of very great age, yet liued he in the Papacie ten yeres and a halfe and more. When this was once knowen in Englande, a great reioyce had all they which were king Iohns enemyes, speciallye the priestes: yet had they small cause as will appere hereafter. They noysed it all the realme ouer, that this newe Pope would set a newe order, and not rule thinges as the other Pope did: thinking thereby, that he would haue done all thinges to their commoditie, but they founde it otherwise, for he made all them which were excommunicate to pay double and treble, before they could be restored againe to their former lyuinges.

And in the same selfe yere, king Iohn came to Swinestedes Abbey, not not farre from Lyncolne, he rested there two dayes, where as certeyne wy-ters report that he was most trayterously poysoned, by a Monke of the same Abbey, beyng of the order of Saint Barnard, called Simon Swynthede, and as Carton sayth in his booke called fructus temporum, and Polichronicon also sayth the same, the aforesayde Monke named Simon, hearyng the king vpon an occasion to talke of breade, should say that if he liued a yere lenger, he would make that lose of breade beyng then of the value of one haltepeny, woorth twelue pence, meanyng that he woulde so persecute his rebellious people, that he would not leaue one of them to be the owner of a plough. The Monke hearyng the king thus speake, conceived of the king a very euill opinion, insomuch that forthwith the Monke went to his Abbot the wyng him the whole matter, and what he was mynded to do. He alleged for himselfe the prophetic of Cayphas, sayng: it is better that one man dye, then all the people should perishe. I am well content, sayth he, to die & to become a martyr, so that I may bitterly destroy this Tyrant. With that the Abbot wept for gladnesse, and much commended his feruent zeale as he toke it. The Monke then beyng absolued of his Abbot for doynge of this act afozchande, went secretly into a Gardeyne vpon the backeside, and findyng there a most benemous toade, he so pricked him, and pressed him with his penne knife, that he made him vomit all the poyson that was within him. This done, he conueyed it into a cup of wine, and with a smilyng and flatterynge countenance he sayd thus to the king, if it shall lyke your Princely Maiestie, here is such a Cup of wine as ye neuer dranke before in all your life tyme, I trust this wassall shall make all England glad. And with that he dranke a great draught, the king pledging him. The Monke anone after went to the Farmoz, and there dyled, his guttes gulching out of his belly, and had continually from thence forth three Monkes to sing Masses for his soule, confirmed by their general Chapter. The king within thorte space after, feelyng great griele in hys body, asked for Simon the Monke, and aunswere was made that he was departed this lyfe: Then God haue mercy vpon me (sayde the king) I suspected as much. With that he commaunded his Chariot to be brought, for he was not able to ryde. So went he from thence to Slaford Castell, and from thence to Newarke vpon Trent, and there within lesse then three dayes he dyled, when he had reigned. xvii. yeres. vi. monethes and odde dayes, and was honourably buryed at Worcester, with all his armed men attendyng vpon the buryall.

The death of
king Iohn.

The description of king Iohn.

King Iohn thus departing as is abovesaid, left behind him foure sones, and three daughters. First Henry who succeeded him in the same kingdome, the second, Richard king of Almaine, & third, William of Valentia, the fourth Guydo Dismay. He had also another sonne, who after was made Bishop. Of his daughters, first was Isabell married to Frederick the Emperoz, the secd married to Willia Marshall erle of Worcester, the third to & erle of Leicester.

Roger Houeden sayth, that this king Iohn was a mightie and valiaunt prince, but not fortunate as many were. Not altogether vnlike to Marius & noble Romain, he tasted fortune both wayes, but much in mercy. In warres sometime he won, & sometime againe he lost: He was also very bounteous & liberal vnto straungers, but to his owne people, for their daily treasons sake, he was a great oppressor, for he trusted moze to fozeynes then to them.

Henric

Soone as king Iohn was dead and buryed, as is sayde befoze, the Princes, Lordes and Barons, so many as were of his part, aswell of Strangers as of them that were bozne here, by counsaile of the Legate Gualo, gathered themselues together, and all with one consent proclaymed Henry his sonne beyng then of the age of .ix. yeres, for king of this realme of England. And for that onely cause was king Iohn buryed at Worcester, and not by testament, for that onely place of the realme in those dayes appered most sure and safe, where they which were friendes to the Crowne, might best deliberate with them selues in that matter, what was best to be done. So went they from thence to the towne of Gloucester, with William Marshall Erle of the same, and there was this yong king annoynted and crowned king by the Legate Gualo, assisted by Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Joseline the Bishop of Bath, with other which then were in the realme, and called Henry the thirde, and this was done in the feastfull day of the Apostles Simon and Jude. 1216. After the which coronation he was committed to the tuition of Henry Bishop of Winchester afozsayd, or as Polidore writeth, to William Erle of Gloucester.

The Court of Rome at that tyme, not beyng slacke in their affayres, sent heether with all spede, and commaunded that they should manfully stande by the yong king, and to defende England with armour and his excommunications against Lewes the French kinges sonne, and his complices. And then Honorius the Pope not onely confirmed his Legate Gualo, or Swalo, but also committed to his discretion, all that apperteyned to that office of his, no appellations to the contrary admitted. Upon this auctoritie, the Legate beyng bolde, compelled the Prelates of Englande to be sworne true to the yong king: and those that refused to take that othe, he punished very sore.
And Henry or after some writers Peter, Bishop of Winchester, was not all behinde in that commission for his parte, who put a grieuous tare vpon the beneficed men and Priestes of his diocesse, to helpe the king in his warres against Lewes, which was not all amisse. Such as were great beneficed men, and might well pay, those Gualo reserued to his owne auctoritie, and in the ende for great summes of money dispensed with them. Some that were obstinate and frowarde, he disgraded: some he excommunicated, and sent to Rome for their absolutions, not leauing one Priest unpunished that had taken part with Lewes, hauing euery where his searchers and spyes to finde them out.

And in this time, diuers of the chiefe of the Barons forooke Lewes the French kinges sonne, namely the Erles of Deuonpore, and of Chester, with all their retinue, and submitted themselues to the yong king.

Sone

Some after the coronation of the king, certaine commissions were sent out into all places of England to gather strength of men to withstand the aforesayde Lewes, and to put him and his frenchmen with other Alyaunts out of the land, which then had vnder their rule and custody, the Castelles of Berkhamsted, of Hartford and dyuers other. And for that Lewes would not cease of his warre and retorne into Fraunce, therefore theaforesayde Legate Gualo, accursed him first by name, and after al such as him maintained or fauoured in this warre against king Henry. Then theaforesayde Erles accompanied with Wylliam Erle Marshall of Englande, Wylliam le Bruize Erle of Ferreys with many other went to Lyncoln, and wanne the Cobone vpon the straungers, where was slaine a frenchman called Erle of Berches with many other Souldiours. And there was taken of Englishmen, Serle Erle of Winchester, and Homfrey de Bohan Erle of Hartforde with dyuers other men of name.

Gualo of Swalo as some called him, & Popes Legate cursed Lewes the French kings sonne.

Lewlyn prince of Wales.

And in this while Lewlyn or Luellen Prince of Wales, for that he ayded the parte of Lewes was accursed and his lande enterdicted.

After the Cobone of Lyncolne was thus wonne from the frenchmen, Lewes with the other parte of his Souldiours, drewe towarde London: for so much as worde was brought to him that his father had sent him a new company of Souldiours the which should land in England shortly. Truth it was that such an ayde of Souldiours was made by the french king, and committed to a Capitaine called Eustace the Monke, the which was encountered vpon the Sea, with a capitaine or Master of the five Portes called Hubert at Burgh, and gaue to him battayle, and discomfited hym at length, and sent the head of the sayde Eustace vnto the king.

Eustace a Monk made capitaine of an army.

When Lewes heard of these tydings, and considered howe daylie hys strength minished, he was more inclinable vnto peace: so that in conclusion, he toke money sayth Reynulph and peelded by hys Castelles and strengthes which he helde, and after was assoyled, and so returned into Fraunce: But of this money that Lewes receyued there are dyuers opinions. The Englishe booke named it a thousand Marke, and the frenche booke sayth. xv. thousand Marke.

Now, after that the straungers were auoided, then inquisition was made to knowe what persons had fauoured the partie of Lewes against the king, and there was founde a great multitude, of the which the king pardoned a great number of the laye fee: But the spirituall were put to such fines, that they were compelled to lay that they had to pledge to please the king, and besides that, to sue to Rome to be assoyled.

And this yere Reynulph Erle of Chester, for considerations him mouing, toke his iourney into the holy land. But one writer sayth, that he tooke that iourney vpon him, because he had contrary to his allegeance made homage vnto Lewes aboue named, and for malice which he bare vnto king John, entended at the time of that homage doyng, to haue made the sayde Lewes king of Englande.

And at this time was a Parliament holden at London, wherein was graunted two Shyllyngs of euery Plough lande, through Englande, which was for the charge that he before had with Lewes at warre. And this Parliament king Edwards labors were again restozed, & Magna carta confirmed.

This yere also king Henry began to build the new worke of the Church of Westminster, which was that part where now all the kings are buried in.

This yere Alexander king of Scottes maryed dame Jane the sister of king Henry. And this yere was great harme done in England by violence of a whirle winde, and fiery dragons were scene flying in the ayre.

Shortly after Proclamations were made in London, and throughout all England, that all straungers should aduoyde by Michaellmasse next following, except such as came with Marchandise, and to make sale of their wares vnder the kinges safeconduyt. Which Proclamation was chiefly made to aduoyde foulkes de Brent and his complices, which kept the Castell of Bedford against the kinges will and pleasure.

Of this foulkes it is written by Polidore and others, howe that about this season, he assemblyng together a great rowte of Ruffians and Robbers issued out of the Castell of Bedford which he then helde, and wasted and destroyed all the Countrey, with the townes and villages thereabout, but specially the towne and Abbey of Saint Albon.

This yere also king Henry was the seconde tyme crowned at Westminster the. xvij. day of May. And the sayd yere Reynulph Erle of Chester returned out of the holy lande, and began to buyde the Castelles of Chartley and Beston.

At this tyme also was holden a generall counsaile of the Bishops, and Clergie of the Realme at Oxford. In the tyme of which counsaile, a man was taken, which shewed himselfe to be Christ, and hee reprooued manye abuses, which the Clerkes at those dayes vsed, as sayth Iabian. And to approue that he was Jesus the sonne of God, and that he was come to reforme those abuses, he shewed the Caretes and woundes in his bodye, handes and feete, lyke vnto Jesus that was nayled on the Crosse. Then was he examined, and found a false dissembler: Wherefore by the iudgement and auctoritie of that counsaile, he was iudged to be nayled vnto the Crosse, and so deliuered to the executioners, the which at a place called Adurbury, or Alburbury, nayled him vnto a Crosse vntill he was dead.

This yere the men of Caithnes in Scotland burned their bishop, because he cursed them for not payng of their Tithes. For which cause the king of Scottes did hang foure hundreth of the cheefe doers, gelded their children, and dishonored the Erle of that Countrey. Cooper.

And in this tyme there was a great conspiracie in London against king Henry, made by one Constantyne the sonne of Arnulph, with the which conspiracie the king was so offended that he had thought to haue ouerthrowne the walles of the Citie of London: But shortly after, the sayde Constantine was taken and condemned, and was hanged drawen and quartered: This Constantine was borne in the Citie of London, & taken by Hubert Brough, who offered the same Brough at the tyme of his taking, to haue let him scape xv. thousand markes: But Brough refused it.

This yere John king of Jerusalem came into Englande, and required an ayde of king Henry to recouer againe Jerusalem, which the Turkes had wonne from him: But shortly he returned without any great comfort.

This yere the king began the foundation of Sarisbury Minster, and laide the first stone of the Church.

And

And this yere the king layd siege vnto the Castell of Bedford that Foulkes de Brent had so long holden by strength : This siege began vpon the Euen of the Assention of our Lorde, and so continued vntill the day of the Assumption of our Lady next folowynge. In the which tyme many strong assaults were made, and great losse of men on both parties. But finally, about the aforesayde day of Assumption, it was taken by fierce assault: Where in was taken Foulkes de Brent, and about the number of. lxxx. Souldiours, whereof the moze part were put to death, and the sayde Foulkes after he had lyeu a certaine of tyme in prison, was for his finance deliuered, and banished the land. And in this time came the Gray Friers first into England.

About this time a Parliament was holden, in the which was graunted to the king and his heyres kinges of this realme by the Barony of England, the warde and mariage of their heyres.

This law for wardes was first made by king Edgar, in the yere of our Lorde. 962. But the mariages of them was added by king Edward the Confessor in the yere of our Lorde. 1056. And here is to be much lamented that Wardes are bought and solde as commonly as are Beastes, and mariages are made with them that are many tymes very vngodly, for dyuerse of them beyng of yong and tender yeres, are forced to iudge by another mannes affection, to see with another mannes eye, and say yea with another mannes tongue, and finally consent with another mannes hart. For some of these fences be perfited to the parties in that minoritie, and so the elder beyng vnfree, and the yeres vnripe, eche of them almost of necessitie must hate the other, whome yet they haue had no iudgement to loue. And certainly the common bergaynyng and selling of them is to be abhorred, beside the shamefull polling that many vse, which if they consent not to suche as are their sellers, they shall be handeled as the common sayng is, lyke Wardes, and stripped almost out of al they haue, when the same should do them most good. God graunt the Maiestates maye take some good order therein, for surely it is nedefull, for many do so vse them, as the same is not sufferable in a Christian realme. For who seeth not daylye, what innumerable inconueniences, deuorces, yea and some murders haue of suche mariages (or rather no mariages at all) proceded, the present tyme sheweth to many examples, which minister sufficient cause for vs to bewayle the same: But the greatest iniury is to God who hath made that free, namely matrimony, which the lawe of the realme maketh bonde, the redresse whereof belongeth onely to the Prince, in whome like as the same God hath caused mo vertues to meete than in any other creature of her callyng, so we doubt not, but that his Godhead will when his good pleasure shall be, houchsafe not onely to preserue her highnes with the encrease of vertue and wisdom, but also to moue her heart to the Godly redresse of these and many other enormities and abuses, to the great comfort of all her graces louyng and obedient subiectes.

This yere Richarde the brother of king Henrie, did very baliuantly in Fraunce, and ouerthrew great numbers of frenche men, and recouered Poyters, and kept the Gascoynes in due obedience.

In the .x. yere of the reigne of this king, the Plees of the Crowne were pleded in the Tower of London. And at this tyme the souldiours that kept dyuerse Castelles and holdes in Poyters in Fraunce, were compelled to yelde and geue by the same into the hands of Lewes the French king, which of long tyme befoze belonged vnto the kinges of England.

The king at this time bearing great fauour to the Citie and Citizens of London, graunted vnto them the Shyrualtie of London and Middlesex in free farme for thzee hundred pounce by the yere. And he graunted also that all the weares in the Thames should be plucked by and destroyed for euer. And also by his Charter ensealed, he graunted that the Citizens of London should passe tolle free throughout Englande. And that if any Citizen were constreyned in any Citie, Borough or Towne in Englande to pay any tolle, that then the Shryfes of London to attache any man comming to London of the sayde Citie Borough or Towne where such tolle was payde, and hym and his goodes to with holde and keepe vntill the Citizens of London were restored of all suche money as they payde for the sayde tolle, with all costes and dammages susteyned for the same. And the same yere also he graunted to the sayde Citizens of London free wareyn, that is to say, that the Citizens haue free libertie of hunting a certeyne circuite aboute London.

This yere the king confirmed the Charter and liberties of the Citie of London, & also certain liberties and priuileges he graunted to the Shryfes of London, as hauing of Clercks and other.

Also about this time a Parliament was holden at London, in the which it was ordered that the English Grote should be coyned of a certaine weight and of the one side the kings picture, and one the other side a crosse as large fully as the Grote, to aduoyd clipping. And at thys tyme was vsed to be coyned that standard and finenesse that was called sterling money, which befoze as ye maye reade was first coyned in the Towne of Sterlyng in Scotland, and therefore it taketh the name of Sterlyng.

This yere the Towne of Lymolyn with diuers holdes in Pierregot and Aluerne in the Countrie of Guyan, were geuen by to the afozenamed Lewes the french king. Wherefoze the king sent ouer his brother Richarde Erle of Cornwal shortly after, and landed at Burdeaux with foure hundred Shippes. But some other wyters saye, that the king himselte sayled with an armie into Briteyne against Lewes the french king, where after spoyling the Countrie, a peace was concluded betweene the sayde two kinges.

And in this yere dyed Stephen Langton Archebishop of Cauntorburie, and the great Deane of Paulles, Maister Richard Wethirshed was his successor. And the kings Maiestie still continuing his fauour to the Citie of London did graunt that the Citizens should vse one common seale.

Stephen Langton died.

At this time there was an order taken in the Citie of London that no Shryfe should continue in the Shyrualtie lenger then one yere, the cause was, that they were had in suspicion to be great Bybers and takers of rewardes.

This yere was graunted to the king a fiftene of the tempoaltie, and a disme and a halfe of the spiritualtie to recouer his landes lost in Normandie, Guyan and Poyteu. And about this time also Hubert of Burgh being then chiefe Justice of England had displeased the king in such wise, that he was compelled to flee the kings sight. And after by the labour of Bishop Edmond of Dounthey he was againe restored to the kings fauour. And at this time in London, was great hurt done by fyze.

John Scot.

Upon complaint brought before the king by the friendes of Lewlyn or Luellen Prince of Wales, that William le Bruce should conspire against the king, or as some say, for that he kept unlawfully the wyfe of the afozenamed Lewlyn, or Luellen: he was after long imprisonment hanged. Also at this tyme dyed Reynulph Erle of Chester, Lyncolne and Huntynghdon. And his sisters sonne named John, sonne unto the Erle of Anguise who was his heyre, and helde that Lordship after him. This John of most wyrters is called John Scot, for so much as his father was a Scot. This foresayde Reynulph had no childe, albeit he had foure sisters. The eldest was named Hawde, and was married to David Erle of Anguise, and was mother to the aforesayde John Scot. The seconde was named Hawes, and was married unto the Erle of Arundell, the thirde Agnes, which was married to the Erle of Darby. And the fourth named Mabely, which was married unto the Erle of Winchester called Quinacie. This Reynulph dyed at Wallingforde, and was buried in the Chapter house of the Monkes of Chester, and ordeyned the afozenamed Scot to be his heyre, for that he would not haue so noble a Lordship run, or be deuided among so many distaues. And this yere dyed Maister Wethershed Archebishop of Cauntorbury, whose successour was Edmond of Mountney.

And at this time beganne great variaunce betwene the king and his Lordes, because he put out of his seruice certeyne Englishe men and trusted straungers aswell in his counsaile, as in other offices.

About this time the king began the foundation of the Hospitall of Saint John without the East gate of Oxforde.

This yere the king put from him the straungers, and restored the Englisshmen to their offices: and the same yere also the Jewes dwellyng in Norwiche were accused for steling of a child whom they purposed to haue crucified

And this yere Frederick the second of that name Emperour of Almain, married the sister of king Henry named Isabell. In the which yere also fell wonderfull fore weather, with such thunder and lightnyng as the like had not bene sene. And there folowed an earthquake to the great feare of the inhabitantes of Huntynghdon.

This yere the king married Alianor the daughter of Raymond Erle of Prouince, and the bishop of Cantorbury married them in his Church of Cantorbury. And shortly after she was crowned at Westminster as Queene of England, where in the fielde of Westminster now called Tothyll lyng at the west ende of the Church, were royall pastymes, and goodly Justice kept by the space of. iiii. dayes.

And this yere at a Parliament was made the statute of Herton, in the which yere also were seene as it were hostes of men fighting in the ayre.

About this time dyed John Scot before named Erle of Chester without Issue: wherefore the king consideryng the great prerogatiue belonging to that Erledome, gaue unto the sisters of Reynulph other possessions, and tooke the Erledome into his awne handes.

This yere also Queene Elianor founded the hospitall of Saint Katheryns besydes the tower, for the reliefe bot. of men and women.

Shortly after a Legate named Octobone came into England to refoyme the Clergie, but the youth of the Clergie lyked him not, and it chaunced him that that as he passed through Oxforde, the schollers picked a quartell vnto his seruantes, and fought with them, and slue one of them, and put the Legate in such feare, that for his sauegard he tooke the Belfrey of Osney, and there held him vntill the kings ministers came from Abingdon, who with strength mixed with fayre wordes deliuered him, and conueyed him after with a convenient companie to Wallingforde, where he accursed the misdoers, and punished them in such wise, that the Regentes and maisters of that Uniuersity, were compelled in the ende, to go barefooted, through Chepe to Paules at London, and there to aske of him forgeueneffe, and had that trespassse wyth great difficultie so forgeuen.

And about this tyme, Sir Simond Mountford maryed the kinges sister, named Alianor countesse of Pembroke, and he gaue wither to the sayde Sir Simond in the name of a dowry the Erledome of Leicester.

The yere folowynge a Clercke of Oxforde that feyned himselfe mad, and before tyme had espied certeyne secret places of the kinges Court, came by a window toward the kinges Chamber, at his manor of Woodstocke, entending to haue slaine the king in his bed. But he was espied by a woman and taken and conueyed to Couentry, and there arreyned of that dede: where after lawfull profes of his malicious entent made, he for the same, was there hanged, and drawen. Solidoze wyrteth that the king as hap was had chaunged his bed that night, and so escaped the daunger of the treason.

And this yere also the .xxviij. day of June was bozne at Westminster, Edward that was after surnamed Longshanks, who after his father was king.

In the .xxv. yere of the reigne of this king, a Citizen of London whose name was Gerard Bat, which had bene chosen Maior of London, was chosen againe. And after his election, was presented vnto the king: But the king hauyng some information of his euill dealyng the yere before, sayde that he would not admitte him to that office, vntill suche tyme as he came to Westminster, with which answer the sayde Gerard and his companye returned to London. It was not long after or the king came to Westminster, where accordyng to their duetie, they waped to knowe his pleasure. Then the king called vnto him the sayd Maior, and after certeyne questions to him ministred, he caused him to be sworne in his presence. After which othe, the king charged him by the vertue of the same, that he should not take of the bakers, Brewers, and other victuallers of the City fortie pound, which other of his predecessors, and he himselfe the last yere had done. And also that he incontinently after his comyng to London should restore vnto the sayd victuallers and other Citizens, al such money as he had with wrong in the former yere taken of the Commonaltie of the Citie. But because the sayde Gerard alleged for him certeyne considerations, besechyng the king to pardon him of that restitution: The king in displeasure swore a great othe that he should not that yere be Maior, nor at any tyme after. And so the Commons certified of the kinges pleasure, chose in his place or heede Reyner de Buringay. And afterward the king went into Wales, whereof David Prince of Wales herpyng, met him at Ruthland, and submitted himselfe vnto the kinges grace. After this he sayled into Normandy with a goodly army to recouer Guyan, and other Countries, but returned without any good successe. And the same yere were first chosen within the Citie of London Aldermen, which then had the rule of the same, and of the severall wardes thereof, and were then yere-ly chaunged, as nowe the Shirifes of London are chaunged.

The king this yere prepared a goodly armye, and sayled into Fraunce, and warred vpon the Frenche king. The cause of this warre (as sayth the French Chronicle) was made by the styring of a Frenche man, named the Erle of Marche, because he refused to doe homage to Alphons, brother of Lewes the tenth of that name, and surnamed, S. Lewes, then king of Fraunce.

This Lewes the yere befoze had married his brother Alphons vnto the daughter of the Erle of Colouse, and had geuen to his sayd brother the Erledome of Poyters, with all the landes of Aluerne. By reason whereof, he would haue caused the sayde Erle of Marche to haue done homage vnto the said Alphons for such landes as the sayd Erle helde of the Erledome of Poyters. But for that the sayd Erle knew well that the right of Guyan belonged to the king of England, he therfore, and for other aliaunces made betwene king Henry and him, refused the doyng of that homage, and after came to king Henry, and moued him to make warre vpon the French king. By reason whereof the king sayled ouer as aforesayde, and landed with a strong power at Burdeaur. And as the French Chronicle affirmeth, this Erle of Marche married the mother of this king Henry.

In this time the French king warred vpon the landes of the Erle of Marche, and had wonne two Castelles of his, named Founteynes, and Williers, with diuerse other which I here omit. And when he had beaten downe some of them, and had manned some with newe Souldiours: he then went vnto a Castell named Habcome, or Habcoune, and brake a Bridge after him, because he was enformed that the king of England was nere vnto him. At the sayd bridge was a small skirmishe, and little harme done. Then the French king tooke the way ouer the riuer of Charent, toward Caiborough, wasting and destroying the Countrey as he went, and so forth towarde the towne called Sainces. Nowe king Henry with his power made towarde him in all that he might. In keepyng this course the hauntgarde encountred with the Erle of Woleyn, which was vpon the Frenche kinges partie, and that time the Erle of Sainces, bare the banner of the Erle of Marches, beyng the hauntgard of the king. But betweene these two Erles was a sore fight, so that many vpon both parties were slaine, among the which the sayd Erle of Sainces was slaine. Then came on both strengthes on eyther syde, so that both the kinges fought in that battaile, and a great slaughter of men vpon both sydes: But in the ende the Frenche men were victors, and tooke prisoners. xx. men of name, as knightes and men of higher degree, and three Clerkes of great fame and riches, besyde other to the number of fife hundredeth meane people (as sayth the French booke.) But of these men of name, nor yet of the thye Clerkes, no mention is made what they payed for theyr ransomes.

Then the Erle of Marche, by meane of his sonne, was reconciled to the French king, and restored to his landes, except thye Castelles, which were named Mespyr, Cretaine, and Easterday, the which the French king retyened ned in his possession. And sone after came vnto the French king the Lordes of the Castelles of Mirable, and of Mortaygne, submittyng themselves also vnto the kinges grace, besechyng him of pardon, that they had so to his high displeasure fauoured his enemye the king of Englande. And after came in diuerse other Lordes and Capitaines, that he was in possession of all the Countrey of Guyan and Poyters, vnto the riuer of Gerond.

I haue rehearsed the more of this Chronicle of Fraunce, to the entent that the readers may the better perceiue the pride and boldnes of the French men, for in all their wytyng, when they come to any matter that soundeth any thing to theyr honour, it is wyrtten at the length, and in most thewyng maner, to their honour and worship: But if it found any thing to their dishonour, then shall it be abreniated and hid, that the truth shall not be knowen, for they euer delight to tell of winnyng, but neuer of losyng. Now after this euill fortune, king Henry returned againe into England.

Griffith the sonne of Lewlyn Prince of Wales being prisoner in the Tower of London, purposyng to breake prison and so to escape, fell ouer the wall of the inner ward, and there brake his neck. And this yere the Plees of the Crowne were pleaded in the Tower of London. Thys yere a Maior of London and a Shrieue were both deposed from their romes, because they were both proued perjured, and other were chosen in their places.

And this yere also Robert Grosted Bishop of Lyncoln complayned to the king of the waste of the goodes and patrimony of the Church within this Realme of Englande, which daylie were consumed by alyen Bishops and Clerkes of thys lande, which shortly after were auoyded.

Thys yere a Jewe digging in the grounde to enlarge his Vineyarde founde vnder a stone a Booke, wherein was wyrtten in thye languages, Greeke, Hebrew and Latyne of thye wordes that should be, of the which he appointed Christ to be the beginning of the thirde worlde, which was expressed in this maner. In the beginning of the thirde worlde, Gods sonne shall be borne of a mayde. &c. by the occasion whereof, the sayde Jewe was conuerted to the fayth of Christ.

At thys tyme dyed Frederyck the second of that name Emperour, who afore as ye haue heard married Isabell syster vnto the king. Of the which Frederyck mencio is made befoze in the. xxiii. yere of king Henry the second. After whose death much strife ensued about the election of the Emperour, some chose the Duke of Thoyngne, some the Erle of Holland, and some chose the kinges brother Richard Erle of Cornewall: which caused strife that endured long after, so that the onely Emperour of Almayn was not of all men allowed, vntyll Radulphus Duke or Erle of Habspurge in Almayn, was chosen by one assent vnto that dignitie, and there vnto admytted by Gregorie the. ix. of that name in the yere of our Lorde. 1273. And so that variance continued. xxvii. yeres, to the great empouering of Italy, and the landes of the Empire.

In Englande thys yere happened so mightie an earthquake, that the lyke hath not beene heard of. And thys yere the king sealed the fraunchise and liberties of the Citie of London vpon the Euen of S. Bartholome to the Apostle for a iudgement that was geuen by the Maior & Aldermen agaynst a Wydow named Margaret Wiel, and the rule of the Citie was committed

At thys tyme dyed Robert Grosstred Bishop of Lyncoln who was a wise and a learned man. Innocent the Pope at that tyme grieved greatly the Church of England with soze and weighty taskes and payments, whome this Grosstred did sharply rebuke by an Epistle for hys doings. And amongst many other his abuses this was one, he gaue unto a childe a nephew of his, a Prebend which fell in the Church of Lyncoln, & sent the child unto the bishop, charging him to admit the same childe, and to see him estalled. But this Bishop boldly denyed his admision, and wrote unto Innocent the Pope againe, that he could not, nor woulde receyue any suche bnto cure of soule, that could not rule himselfe. Therefore this Robert was summoned to apere before the Pope, and therupon accursed. Then he appealed from Innocents Court, to Christes abone throne.

This yere the Maior and Aldermen, and Citizens of London, who in tymes past were wont to ryde by lande the morowe after the day of Simon and Jude to present their Maior at Westmynster where he tooke his othe, did nowe take Barges, euery company a severall Barge decked with Banners, Streamers, and flagges very richly, and so rowed by water to Westmynster, and vse the same still to this day.

This yere also the king summoned a Parliament at London, in the which it was enacted that a coyne of a certeine weight of siluer called a grote should be stamped, and that it should haue on the one syde the picture of the kinges face, and on the other a crosse extended in length to the extreme partes therof, to the entet there should be no deceyt vsed by diminishing or clipping y same.

This yere was a great wynde upon the day of Simon and Jude, which did much harme in many places of England.

And in this yere the king graunted unto the Shyriefes of London that they should yerely be allowed seuen pound for certeyne priuileges or ground belongyng to Paules Church, the which at this day is allowed by the Barons of the kinges Eschequer, unto euery Shyriife, when they make theyr account in the office of the Pipe.

The king also graunted to the Citizens for their moze ease, that where before time they vsed yerely to present their Maior unto the kinges presence, in any such place as he should be in then in Englande: that nowe from this time forward, they should for lacke of the kinges presence beyng at Westmynster, present their Maior so chosen to the Barons of his Eschequer, and there to be swozne and admitted, as he before times was before the king.

And nowe sayth Fabian, by the procurement of Sir Richarde Erle of Cornewall, for displeasure which he bare towarde the Citie, for exchaunge of certeine ground to the same belongyng. The king vnder colour that the Maior had not done due execution vpon the Bakers for lackyng of theyr lyses, seized the liberties of the Citie. That is to say, that where the Maior and Commualtie of the Citie had by the kinges graunt the Citie to ferme, with dyuerse customes and offices for a stynted and an asserteyned summe of money: nowe the king placed officers in them at his will and pleasure, the which were accomptable unto him for all reuenues and profites that grewe within the sayd Citie. But within foure dayes folowynge, the Citizens agreed with the sayd Erle, for sixe hundzeth marke. After which agreement with him concluded, they were againe restored to their liberties.

In this tyme and yere was Sir Edward the kinges sonne and heyre marryed unto Alianor the kinges suster of Spaine, or as some other write, to the daughter of Alphons king of Castile. To whom the king his father gaue the Principalltie of Wales, with the gouernance of Guyan and Irelande, whereof beganne that the kinges of Englande ordeyned their eldest sonnes Princes of Wales. And in the same yere the king and Queene landed at Douer, and so came to London, and were lodged at the Tower, where he sent for the Maior and Shyriefes of London, with whome he reasoned greuouly for the escape of one called John Gate: This John had murdered a Priour allyed to the king. The Maior excused himselfe, and burdened the Shyriefes therewith, sayng that vnto them belonged the keeping of all the Prisonnes and prisoners that were within the Citie of London. And so the Maior returned home: But the Shyriefes remayned there as prisoners by the space of a moneth after or moze. And in their places, and for them were chosen Stephen Dyster gate, and Henry Walmode. But howe the olde Shyriefes passed out of the kinges daunger, I know not.

This yere the Ladie Alianor wife vnto Prince Edward came through London, where she was honourably receyued of the Citizens, and the Citie hanged with riche clothes of Silke and Golde. And there was present the Prince her husband, who conueyed her through London vnto Saint Johns without Smithfielde, and there was lodged for a whyle, and after remoued to the Sauoye.

And not long after, the king seized the liberties of London for certeyne money which the Queene claymed for her right of the Citizens, so that in the ende they payed vnto her foure hundzeth Markes and had theyr libertyes againe restored.

And about this time were brought vnto Westmynster an hundzeth and two Jewes from Lincolne, the which were also accused of the crucifyng of a childe at Lincolne in despite of Christes religion, which Jewes were after sent vnto the Tower of London. Of the which afterward, xviij. were conuict and hanged, and the other remayned long in prison.

And

And this yere the king of Scottes and the Queene his wife came into England to the king to his Manor of Woodstocke, where he disported hym for a season, and then returned againe home, leauyng his wife with her mother untill she were brought a bed and lighted of her childe. And shortly after the king and the Queene, and the Queene of Scottes, came to London, where they were honourably receyued, and so conueyed to Westminster.

Queene of Scott & brought a bed in England.

This yere certeyne Lordes that came out of Germany made their homage vnto Sir Richarde Erie of Cornewall and brother vnto the king, the which as then stode king of Almaine, and of Romaines. And shortly after he departed from the kinges Court, and sped him with his wife, and Sir Henry his sonne vnto the sea syde, and after tooke shipping in Farnesey, and landed at Dordrite in Holland. And soone after, he was crowned king of the Romaynes in the Citie of Aquis Granum.

Richard erle of Cornewall made king of Romaines.

And now the kyng of England set forward toward Wales for to subdue Lewlyn or Luellen the sonne of Griffyth the which with his Welsh men rebelled against the king, because Sir Edward his sonne, to whome he had a little before geuen the Erledome of Chester, would haue chaunged some of their skittishe conditions. And for to bring his purpose the better about, he sent for an army of Souldiours into Ireland, and tarped for their comyng at his Castell of Brecknocke. But the yere passed so farre on, that he could do no good that yere, and therefore returned to London.

Lewlyn the son of Griffyth Prince of Wales rebelled.

And this present yere, where there had bene a great and long sute betwene the Abbot of Waltham, and the Citizens of London, about certein toll to be payde at the sayze there holden: It was agreed that from thence forth the Citizens of London should come and go toll free, and that the distrelles taken for the same should be restored, and if any were perished by keeping, then the Abbot to make them good,

The Abbot of Waltham & the Citizens are made friends.

Nowe approached great vexation and trouble to the Citie and Citizens of London, as after shall appere. It so chaunced by the meanes of some euil member, that bare no good will to the Citizens of London, that a certeine greiuous Bill of complaint was made and written in a great roll of Parchment, and the same Parchment was enclosed in greene ware, and was cast or left in the kings Wardrobe at the Castell of Windsor, into the which Wardrobe, the kinges grace did often vse to come, & in this roll was written certeine most heynous articles and complaints against the Maior and rulers of the Citie, for the misgouernement of the same. And this Bill the king found, and after he had read and perused the contentes thereof he grewe into great displeasure therewith. And thereupon he sent Mancell one of his Justices to London, and there commaunded hym the next holyday folowynge, that by the kings auctoritie he should call a folkmote at Paules crosse, where then was present Sir Richard de Clare Erie of Gloucester, and diuerse other of the kinges counsaile. In which place the sayde John Mancell caused the sayde roll to be read to the people that were there assembled, and after the reading thereof, he stode by and shewed the people the kinges pleasure and minde was that they should be ruled with iustice, and that the liberties of the Citie should be mainteyned in euery poynt. And if the king might know those persones that had wronged the Commonaltie of the Citie, they should be greiuously punished to the example of other. And then the sayd John Mancell cell charged openly the Maior, to commaund that euery Alderman in hys warde should the morrow following, assemble his Wardmote. And that all those Wardmotes should assemble in one place, and chose of themselves without any counsell or aduise of any of their Aldermen, xxxvj. persons, and them to present before the Lordes and him, at the same houre the next day in the Bishops Pallace at Paules. Then vpon the morrow all thing was done accordyng to his commaundment. And when the sayde xxxvj. persons were presented before the saide John Mancell, Henry Baa and other Justices: the sayde Mancell sayde vnto them that they vpon their othe should certefie all such persons as they knewe guiltie in the Articles before shewed vnto the commonaltie, wherevnto the sayde xxxvj. Citizens answered, that it was contrarie to their libertie to be sworne so many for any matter of trespassse betweene the king and any of the Citizens, wherefore they required a sparyng. With which answer the sayde John Mancell being discontented, warned them to appere before the kings Counsaile at the Guildhall vpon the morrow following, where they kept their day, and thether came the sayde Justices, John Mancell and Henry Baa, Sir Henry Wengham Chancelour of England, Philip Louell vnder treasurer, and dyuers other of the kings counsaile.

A wardmote is a assembly of the people of the warde for like purpose as is said before of a folkmote.

Then the sayde John Mancell, exhorted the sayde persons to be sworne, and bled vnto them many perswasions, but all was in vayne, for they excused themselves still, that it was contrarie to their othe, and against the libertie of the Citie. Wherefore the kings counsell departed from the hall somewhat discontented, & shewed vnto the king the demeanour of the said Citizens.

The king commaunded the Maior out of his sight.

Vpon Candelmas euen, the Maior being warned that the king should come to Westminster, he with the more parte of the Aldermen came vnto knights Bridge, and houed there to salute the king, and to know his further pleasure. But when the king came neere that place, and heard of their being there, he sent vnto them a Squire of household, and charged them that they shoulde not presume to come in his sight: wyth which message, they beyng greatly discomfited, returned home to the Citie.

Shortly after, Mighell Tony and Adam Basyng returned from the Courte, whome the Maior before had sent thether, that by such friendes as they could make to vnderstande the cause of the kings wrath and displeasure. They brought worde, that the king was well minded vnto the Citie, but he was in full purpose to haue such persons chastised, that had oppressed the commonaltie of the same.

The next day following came vnto the Guildhall, John Mancell with other of the kings counsell, the which to the people there assembled, uttered manye sayze and pleasaunt wordes: among the which he declared that the kings minde and will was, to correct all suche persons as had oppressed the commonaltie of this his deereff beloued Citie: and asked of the commons whether they woulde be agreeable to the same: who incontinently beyng a multitude whereof many were without discretion, and knew full little what that question meant, cryed, yee, yee, yee. And after that graunt thus had of the Commons, the sayde John Mancell discharged the Maior, Shirifes, and Chamberleyn of their offices and deliuered the custody thereof, vnto the Constable of the Towre, & put in the some of the Shirifes, Michaell Tony and and John Adrian. And mozeouer all rolles and tolles and tallages before made, were deliuered vnto the sayde John Hancell, the which he there sealed and deliuered them vnto the Chamberleyne. Now when the Commons had well marked and considered whereaboutes he went, they returned home to their houses altogether confounded and amazed.

Then the sayd John Hancell with diuerse of the kinges counsaile, kept their dayly courtes, and called before them .xij. wardes of the Citie. Of euery of the which .xij. wardes was taken thre men, so that of those .xij. wards there were .xxxvi. men empaneled and swozne for to enquire of the aforesayd articles, and what persones in the Citie had offended them. This Court thus kept and holden at the Gyldehall, no man was called to aunswere, nor no question put vnto any person by the sayd enquest, or by any other. And soone after, that is to say vpon the first Sunday in Lent, the Maior, Aldermen and Shirifes, with the sayd enquest, and foure men of euery ward were charged to appere at Westminster, before the king: at which apperance they were countermaunded vntill the next day folowynge. At which season they comynge into the kings Exchequer found sittynge there, the Erles of Gloucester and of Warwick, John Hancell, Henry Baa Justices, the Constable of the tower, then Custos of the Citie, & diuerse other of the kings counsaile. Then was called Raufe Hardell that yere Maior, Nicholas Bat, Nicholas Fitz Josue, Mathewe Bokerell, John Tolesham and John le Minour, Aldermen. Then sayd John Hancell, that the king by his lawes and inquisition of the Citizens of the Citie, had found them culpable, that they had wronged and hurt the communalte of his Citie by diuerse meanes, as by the sayde inquisition apered, and forthwith caused it to be read before them. And when the more part thereof was read, he sayd vnto them, thus may you see that the communalte of the Citie hath bene by you most grievously oppressed, and by your meanes and counsaile the common weale of the same destroyed as by altering of the tolles and other good auncient customes, turnynge them to your singuler aduantage and lucre. All which matters the sayde Raufe and his company denyed, and that the commons was not by any such meanes by them nor none of them grieved or hurt, and that they offered to be iustified and iudged by the law and customes of the Citie.

Then Henry Baa Justice asked them whether they would holde the aduerture of the enquirie that they had heard read before, or else stande vpon the sayng of the other wardes, that had not yet bene swozne, but they kept them to their first aunswere. Then John Hancell demaunded of the Maior what was their law and custome. The Maior aunswered and sayd, that for trespassse of a Citizen done against the king, he should defende him by .xij. of the sayd Citizens, and for murder and sleayng of a man by .xxx. Citizens, and for trespassse against a straunger by the othe of sire and himselfe. Then after many reasons made by the sayde John Hancell, and also by the Maior and Aldermen, day was geuen them againe to appere the next day folowynge before the king and his counsaile.

Vpon the day folowynge, the king with many of his Lordes sittynge in the said Exchequer, the aforesaid inquisition was read. And that done the Maior and Aldermen were called by name, and two Aldermen moze, which the day before were not called, that is to say, Arnold Chedmare, & Henry Walmode.

When

When Raufe Hardell had heard the king speake in the matter, he tooke such feare, that he and Nicholas Bat without any farther answere, put them in the kinges grace, sayng to them their liberties and Fraunchises of the Citie. But the other six besought the king of his rightwisenesse, that they might then be demed after the lawes and customes of the Citie. Then was layde to their charge, that besyde many wronges by them done to the king, and to the communalte of the Citie: they had altered the kinges Beame, and ordered it to the aduantage of themselues, and of the riche men of the Citie. Wherevnto the parties aunswered and said, that the alteration of the Beame was not done by them onely, but by the aduice and consent of fiue hundreth of the best of the Citie. For where before the Weyer vled to leane his draught toward the Marchandice, so that the buyer had by that meane .x. or .xij. pound in a draught to his aduantage, and the seller so much disaduantage, nowe for indifferencye and equalitie of both persons or Marchauntes, was ordeyned that the Beame should stande vpright in the cleft thereof, enclinyng to neyther partie, as it doth in weiyng of Golde and Silver, and the buyer to haue of the seller allowed vnto him for all thinges * foure ponde of the hundreth.

After these reasons and sundrie other by them made, the king commaunded that in the morning next folowynge, a folkemote should be called at Paules Crosse, and so that court was dissolved, and the Maior and the other returned to London.

The next day the folkemote beyng assembled at Paules crosse, these six Aldermen heeryng the murmuracion of the common people, and knowynge that neither the Aldermen, nor the worshipfull of the Citie, should haue any sayng in the matter, fearing their cause, wet into a Canons house of Paules, where at that time the sayd John Hancell and other sent from the king taried the assembling of the people, and shewed vnto them that they entended not to pleade any lenger with the king, but were contented to put themselves fully in the kinges grace and mercye, sayng alway to them and all other Citizens their liberties and Fraunchise of the Citie.

After the which agreement the sayd John Hancell with other came vnto the Court of Folkemote, where was rehearsed vnto the People a faire and pleasant tale, promisyng to them their liberties should be wholly & inuio-lately preserued by the king, with many other thinges to the great comfort of them. And lastly it was demaunded of them, whether the law and custome was such as was the day before rehearsed or no? Wherevnto like vndiscrete and vnlearned men, they cryed and aunswered rudely, nay, nay, nay, notwithstanding the sayde lawe and custome had before this time bene vled tyme out of mynde. But to this, neither Maior, nor Alderman, nor other of the chiefe of the Citie that might replie nor impugne or make any reason for the defence of their auncient lawes and customes.

It was not much to be marueyled that the king was thus offended against the Citie, for by suche euill disposed people as he had about him, the land was euill ruled, and much mischief was vled: whereof ensued much sorow after, as appereth in the sequele of this historie, as sayth Fabian.

Then John Hancell called the Maior and Aldermen before him and charged them to be at Westminster the next day folowynge to geue attendance upon the kinges grace. The next day the Maior and Aldermen satieng the kinges comming in the great Hall at Westminster, lastly the king came into Saint Stephens Chappell, where a while he had communication with his Lordes, and after went into the Chequer Chamber, and there sate him downe and his Lordes about him. Anon after the Maior and Aldermen were called into the sayde Chamber, and shortly after called by name, and commaunded to stande nere to the barre. Then Henry Baa Justice sayde vnto the Maior and the seven Aldermen, that forsomuche as by forme of the kings lawes they were found culpable in diuerse articles touching transgression agaynst the king, therefore the Court awarded that they should make fine and ransome, after the discretion of the sayde Court: But for that they had put them in the kinges grace and mercy, the king hath commaunded the fine to be put in respyte, y<sup>e</sup> be not pained so grieuouly as ye haue deserued.

After which iudgement geuen, they kneled dobone, and then the Maior with weping teares, thanked the king of his bountie and goodnesse, and besought him to be good and gracious Lorde vnto the Citie and to them as his faythfull subiectes. Wherevnto the king made no aunswere, but rose streight by, and went his way, leauyng them there. And assoone as the king was departed, they were all arested and kept there till they had found surety, and euery Alderman of them discharged of his ward and office that they had within the Citie, but shortly after they put in sureties, and so returned heauily to London.

Anon after that, was William Fitz Richard by the kinges commaundement made Maior, and Thomas Fitz Thomas, and William Crappisgate Shirifes.

After this, day by day, the Chamberleyn was called to an accompt before the sayde John Hancell of all such tolles as was gathered in the tyme of the Mayraltie of John Colyham, and of Raufe Hardel, and there were present to here the sayd accompt diuerse of the Communalty of the Citie, but none of the heades: By the which accompt no fault could be found agaynst any of the Personnes that were conuict before the king. By reason whereof, diuerse of them were shortly after admitted againe to the kinges fauour, and restored to their offices, but not without payment of money, whereof the certeintie is not knowen.

And in this yere wheate was so scant, that it was solde at London for xxiii. shillinges a quarter, and scarnter shoulde haue beene, if plentie had not come out of Almaine: For in fraunce and Normandie it sayled likewise. By meane of this dearth and scarfitie, much pooze people dyed for hunger, and many of diuerse countries of England, came vnto the Citie, and nere thereabout for comfort of victuall: For it was then better chepe in London then in many shires of England there aboutes. And shortly after was the sayde John Hancell made knight and chiefe Justice of England.

Also this yere the king helde a Parliament at Orenford, which was called in Latinum Parliamentum, that is to say, the mad Parliament. For in this Parliament were made many actes agaynst the kings prerogatiue and pleasure, for the reformation of the state of the lande, which after turned to the confusion and hurt of the land, and the death and destruction of many noble men, so that by occasion thereof began that hatefull strife, called at this day the Then as is aforesayde, to aduoyde the enozmitie, and to refozme the euill rule that was then vsed in the lande, by such euill persons as daylie were about the king, manye and diuers ordinaunces were made: wherevnto the king (somewhat agaynst hys wyll) and Sir Edward his sonnes and others agreed. And for that these actes should be holden firme and stable, there were at this Parliament chosen. xij. Peeres, which were named Douze perys, to whome authoritie was given by vertue of this Parliament to correct all such as offended in breaking of these ordinaunces, and such other, as by the sayde xij. peres, shoulde afterward be deuysed and ordered touching and concerning the same matter and purpose. Of which. xij. Peeres the names ensue.

The Archebishop of Cantorbury, the Bishop of Worcester, Sir Roger Wygot then Erle of Norfolk and Marshall of Englande, Sir Symon de Mountford Erle of Leycester, Sir Richard Clare Erle of Gloucestre, Sir Humfrey Botham Erle of Herfford of Warwike and of Arondell, Sir John Hancell chiefe Justice of Englande, Sir Roger Mortimer, Sir Hugh Wygraue, Sir Peter de Sauoy, Sir James Audely, and Sir Peter de Mountford. And for that the kings brother on the mothers syde, that is to saye Sir Eym Erle of Wynchester, Sir William de balaunce, Sir Godfrey de Lyndsey and Sir Guy de Lyndsey, woulde not assent to the aforesayde ordinaunces, they withdrew them towarde the Sea side with such staffe as they had, and would haue departed the land, if they might then haue had shipping: for lack whereof they were fayne to retorne, and so went to Wynchester. But it was not long after, that they were lycenced to depart the lande, with a certaine companie, and a certaine summe of money to paye for their costes, and their day set by Bartholomewtyde to aduoyde vpon payne of imprisonment, which day by them was kept.

It was not long after the finishing of thys Parliament but that strife and variaunce beganne to kinde betweene the king and the Erles of Leycester and Gloucestre, by meane of such officers as the sayde Erles had removed, and put other in their romes. Among the which John Hancell was discharged of hys office, and Sir Hugh Wygot then admitted for him. And because the aforesayde peres heard of the murmure of the Courte, fearing that the king should be aduertised shortly to alter from his promise, therefore they entending to make their partie the stronger, the next day following, the king being at Westminster, the Erle Marshall, the Erle of Leycester, with dyuers other came vnto the Guildhall at London, where the Maior, Aldermen and commonaltie of the Citie were assembled, where the sayde Lordes shewed an instrument, or wytyng, at the which hanged many labelles with Seales, as the kings seale, Sir Edward his sonnes, with manye other of the nobles of the lande, the which was the content of the Articles which were made and ordeyned at Orenford, wylling the Maior and Aldermen (considering the saide actes were made vnto the honour of God, fidelitie vnto the king, and profite of the realme, that they would also in vpholding of the same, set to also their common Seale of the Citie. After which request thus to the Citizens made, and after aduise and counsell among themselves taken, they despyed a spaving of the Lordes, till they might speake with the king, and know his pleasure in that behalfe. But finally no scarryng at that tyme might be graunted, so that in the ende, by the labour that the Lordes made, with helpe of such solicitors as they had within the Citie, the common Seale was put to, and the Mayor and diuerse of the Citie swozne to main- teyne the same, their allegeance saued to the king, with preservation of the li- berties and fraunchises of the Citie and so departed.

Then day by day, the sayd Douze Peeres assembled at the newe Temple, where they kept their counsailes and Courtes for the reformation of the olde griefes, and remoued from the king diuers of his Whenyall seruautes, and set in their places and office such as pleased them.

And vpon the. ix. day of August, proclamation was made in diuerse ac- customed places of the sayd Citie, that none of the kinges takers should take any thing within the liberties of London, without the will of the owner, ex- cept two Tenne of Wine, which the king accustomedly had of euery ship co- myng from Burdeaur, payng but fortie Shillynges for a Tonne. By meane of which Proclamation, nothing was taken by the kinges officers, but it were streight payed for within the Citie & libertie of the same, which vltance continued but a while.

In the. xliij. yere, the king helde a Parliament at Westminster, and ano- ther (or else proroged the same) to Winchester. And in this yere, Sir Hugh Bygot Justice, with Roger Tuckley, and other, kept his Court at Saint Sauours, and there held their Plees called Itinerarii. The which is to meane the traueylng or the way Plees. For ye shall vnderstand, that at those daies they were kept in diuerse places in Englande, which now beene holden at Westminster, and Judges ordeyned to kepe a circuite, as now they kepe the Sizes in time of vacation. At this sayd Court, these Judges punished fore- Baylifes and other officers, that before them were conuict for diuerse tres- passes, & specially for takyng of amerciamentes otherwise then the law per- mitted them to do. For the which the sayde chiefe Justice emprisoned them, and after seassed them at greivous fines. Also he sommoned the Citizens of London to come to the same Court, for Tolles that they had taken vpon the further syde of the water. But it was answered that the tolles that they there toke, were taken lawfully as they were redy to proue in places & Court con- uenient to the same, which was within the precinct of their libertie. But not- withstanding that aunswere, the saide Sir Hugh charged them vpon a quest of. xij. knightes of Surrey to enquire of that matter and other, the which acquitted the sayde Citizens, and shewed that the sayd Toll belonged to them of ryght.

After this, the sayde Sir Hugh with other, came vnto the Gyldehall, and kept his Court and Plees there, without all order of lawe, and contrary to the libertyes of the Citie, and there punished the Bakers for lack of Size, by the Tomberell, where befozetymes, they were punished by the Pil- loyre, and ordered many other thinges at his will, more then by anye good order of lawe.

This yere came vnto London from beyonde the Sea Richard king of Almaine, and Erle of Cornewall, with his wife and children, which had bene there and taken possession of that kingdome, as befoze is shewed. Against whose comyng the Citie of London was richely hanged, with clothes of Silke Tomberell was a kinde of Pillory made foure square that turned round about.

Silke and Arras, and ioyfully he was receyued of the Citizens.

And in the. xliij. yere of his reigne in the Parliament holden at West- minster was reade in the presence of all the Lordes and commonalty at sun- drie times, all the actes and ordinaunces befoze made in the Parliament hol- den at Orenford, with certeyne other articles by the aforesayde. xij. Pieres therevnto added. After the readyng of which articles, there beyng requested the Archbishop of Cauntorbury with other, to the number of. ix. Bishops be- syde Abbots and other, denounced all them accursed that attempted in woꝛde or deed to breake the sayde Statutes or any of them.

In this Parliament also was graunted a taske called the Scutage, that is to say. xl. shillinges of euery knightes fee through the realme of England, the which extended to a great summe of money. For after dyuerse wyters, there be (saith Fabian) in England in the possession of the Spirituality and of the Temporality, or at those dayes were, ouer & aboue. xl. thousand knightes fees, which after that rate should extende to fourescore thousand pound.

The sixt day of Nouember folowynge, the king came to Baules, where by his comaundement was assembled the Court of folkemote, where the king fearing rebellion of his nobles, did according to the former ordinaunces made, aske licence of the Commonalty of the Citie, for to passe the sea, and promi- sed there in the presence of a great multitude of people, that he would be good and gracious Lorde vnto the Citie by the mouth of Sir Hugh Bigot his chiefe Justice, and to mainteine their liberties vnhurt: for the which the people for ioy made an exceedyng shout.

Vpon the. viij. day of Nouember the king roade through the Citie to- warde the sea syde. And vpon the day of Saint Brice, or the. xiiij. day of No- uember, he tooke his ship, and so sayled vnto Burdeaur, where when he had tarped a season, he roade vnto the French king, then beyng king Lewes vnto Paris. Of whom he was honourably receyued, and was logged in his aboue- Palace, by the space of a whole weke, makyng to him great feastes, and ge- uing to him and his, many costly and riche giftes. And from thence king Hen- ry roade vnto Saint Denice, where of the Abbot and Couent he was recei- ued with procession, & tarped there by the space of a moneth. In which season a maryage was concluded, betwene John Duke of Briteyne, and one of the kinges daughters. And at his departing, he gaue to the Abbot a Cuppe of Golde, and a Bason with an Ewer of Siluer. And for his more consolation certeyne Lordes and other Noble men of Fraunce gaue attendaunce vpon him, to conuey him, and shewe him a part of Fraunce, with all disport of hun- tyng and hawkynge, and other many pleasures of the Countre.

And in this time, the French king assembled his Parliament at Paris, where he shewed vnto his Lordes, that his conscience grudged with the withholdyng of all such landes as Phillip the second wanne from king John in Normandy, vpon the which he desyred their saythfull and fruitefull coun- saile, where after many reasons and argumentes made, it was concluded for a finall concorde to be had betwene king Henry and him, that if king Henrie with the agreement of his Lordes would resigne into the French Kinges handes, all such title and right as he had in the whole Duchie of Normandy, Angeow, Poyteau, and Mayne, for him and for his heyres for euer, that then the French king of his great bountie and grace, should geue vnto the king of England, and to his heyres kinges, the Lordship of Guyan, Angeou, and Mayne, and by rightfull title, euer after to be called the Duke of Guyan, and besydes that, he shoulde bee admitted for a Peere of fraunce: To all which condicions, as appereth by the french Chronicle, king Henrie at his retourne from his dispozt was agreable, and with consent of his Baronne, and in their presence, with also the Barony of France, did his homage vnto the sayde Lewes for the Duchie of Guyan, and after made his othe accozding to the same. And after great giftes receyued on eyther syde, king Henry returned vnto Burdeaux.

Of this peace speaketh Guido, and sayth, that king Henry sayled into fraunce, and asked restitution of the french king, of such landes as Philip the second his ayle had with extort power taken from king John his father. But because he found the french king straunge in his answer, and also had little trust in his Lordes to haue their ayde, he fell to agreement with the french king, and solde him his title that he had in Normandy, Gascoyne and Guyan, the which extended vnto the yerely value of twentie thousand pound, taking for the same title thre hundred thousand of small Turon money, whereof a pound is in value after sterlyng money but two shillings and thre pence, or there about, so that he should after that rate haue for his sayde title, after the value of sterlyng money. xxxiiij. thousand. vij. C. fiftie pound.

While king Henry was thus occupied in fraunce, dissention fell in England, betweene Sir Edward the kinges sonne, and Sir Richard Erle of Gloucester. For the appeasing whereof, a Parliament, that is to saye, a counsaile of his Lordes was called at Westminster, which continued by the space of thre weekes and moze. To the which counsaile the Lordes came with great companies, and specially the sayde Sir Edward, and the Erle of Gloucester, the which entended to haue lodged within the Citie. Wherefore the Maioz went vnto the Bishop of Worcester, and Sir Hugh Bigot, and Sir Philip Basset, to whome the king with the Archbishop of Cantorbury had taken the rule of the lande in his absence, the which went vnto the king of Almaine to haue his aduise in that matter: where it was concluded, that neyther the sayd Sir Edward, nor the Erle, should come within the Citie there to be lodged, nor none that helde vpon eyther of the parties. And further it was prouided, that all such as were within the Citie, and was of the age of. xij. yeres and aboue, should be in harnesse to watch and kepe the City both day and night and that the gates should be shut vpon the day, & certaine men in harnesse to kepe every gate of the City. And sone after, for y<sup>e</sup> safegard of the Citie, and sure keeping of the peace within the same, the king of Romanes, with the sayd Sir Hugh came into the Citie, and there were lodged with their companies, and suche other as they would assigne to strength the Citie if neede required.

Shortly after the king came to London from beyond the sea, and was lodged at the Bishop of Londons Palace. After whose comyng, by his assignement, the Erle of Gloucester was lodged within the Citie, and Sir Edward his sonne was lodged in his awne Palace at Westminster. And sone after the king commaunded him to be lodged at S. Johns without Smithfield Barres in the Suburbes of London, and al the other Lordes were lodged in other places without the Citie. And the king of Romaines removed againe againe to Westminster.

In the which tyme an order was taken betweene the sayde partyes, and a new assembly or Parliament was appoynted in the Quindena of Saint John Baptist. And from that tyme to the entent that all thinges might be set in an order, it was prouided vnto the feast of Saint Edward, at which tyme all thinges were in quiet, and so continued a tyme.

And here Fabian telleth a tale of a Jewe, sayng that at Tewkesbury there fell a Jewe into a Jakes or Gonge vpon a Saturday, which was his Sabboth day, and would not for reuerence of his Sabboth day be plucked out, whereof heeryng the Erle of Gloucester that the Jewe did so great reuerence to his Sabboth day, thought he would do as much to his holy day, which was Sunday, and so commaunded him to be kept there vntill Monday at which tyme he was found dead.

A Jewe drowned in a Genge.

This yere the king kept a great feast at Westminster and there made diuers knights. Among the which John Duke of Briteyn which had married one of the kings daughters was there made knight. And soone after was Sir Hugh Spencer made chiefe Justice.

1259

And sone after this he commaunded a folkemote to be called at Paules Crosse, where he in proper person with the king of Almayne, the Archebishop of Cauntorby, and many other nobles came: where the king commaunded the Maioz that every striplyng of the age of. xij. yeres and aboue should the next day be swozne before hys Alderman, to be true to the king and to his heyres kinges of England, and that the gates of the Citie should be kept with harnessed men, as before by the king of Romanes was deuysed.

About this time also, at a fayze kept at Northampton variaunce fell betweene the Londoners and the men of the Towne, so that betweene the Citizens of London and them continued long sute and plee, and it was for a man of Northampton that then was slaine, to the great beration and trouble of both partes: But in the ende the Citie of London had the better.

The Barons also at this tyme with the consent of the peres discharged Sir Hugh Spencer, and admitted for him Sir Phillip Basset to be chiefe Justice, vntwitting to the king. By reason whereof, another grudge and displeasure began to kindle betweene the king and his Lordes, and encreased moze and moze. But by the pollecie of the king of Almayn, and some prelates of the lande, it was set in quiet for a while, but it continued scantly to the ende of the yere.

And this yere the Barons admitted and made the Shirifes of diuers Shires of England, and discharged such as before the king had admittted, and named them Gardians and keepers of the Counties and Shires. And besydes that, the sayde Barons would not suffer the Justice, that the king had admitted to kepe the Plees and lawes called Itinerarii, but such as were of their admysion. Wherewith the king was greuouly discontented, in so much that after that time, he labored that he might make frustrate and vterly boyde the aforesayde statutes and ordynances: In so much, that vpon the second Sunday in Lent next following, the king commaunded to be read at Paules crosse a Bull of the graunt of Urban, Bishop of Rome and the third of that name, as a confirmation of another Bull before purchased of hys predecessour Alexander the thirde, for to asloyle the king and all other that be- fore fore had sworne to the maintenance of the aforesayde Articles made at Drenforde. And after caused the absolution to be shewed throughtout the realme of Englande, Wales and Ireland, geving strayte charge to all his subiects, that none to be so hardie to disobey the sayde absolution. And if anye person were founden disobedient to his commaundement that he were streight way committed to prison, and not to be raunsomed noz delyuered untill the kinges pleasure were further knowne.

In the Month of June next following, the king of Almain tooke shipping and sayled into Almayn. And king Henry at a folkemote holden on
S. Peters daye in the Month of July following had lycence to sayle into Fraunce. And the next day he departed from London towarde the sea syde, with the Queene and other Lordes, his two sonnes Sir Edward and Sir Edmond being then in Guyan. When the king had bene a while in Fraunce, he returned vnto Burdeaur, where he fell sicke, by occasion whereof, he tarried in those parties untill December next folowynge. And in this meane time dyled Richard Clare Duke of Gloucester, and Sir Gilbert de Clare his son was Erle after him. To whom the father gaue great charge that he should bpholde the former ordinaunces.

And it happened soone after, that a Jew fell at bariance with a Christian man at Cole Church in London besyde the great Conduit in Chepe, and wounded the Christian man within the same Church. Wherefore the people of the Citie in a fury, pursued the sayd Jewe to his house, and there slue him, and after fell vpon the other Jewes, and slue and robbed many of them.

And shortly after the king landed at Douer, and came to London in the beginnyng of January folowynge. And this yere about the .vi. of December began a great frost, and continued the space of one moneth and moze, in such wise that the Thames was so frozen that men passed ouer on horseback. And in the same Winter the kings Palace at Westminster perished by fyre, namely a great part thereof, which happened by negligence.

About this time also a displeasure and bariance began to growe betwene the Constable of the Tower, and the Citizens of London, for that the Constable contrary to the liberties of the Citie, tooke certeine shippes passyng by the tower with wheat and other victuall, and caryed the same into the tower, makyng the price thereof at his awne will and pleasure. Wherebpon great harne had ensued, had not bene the policie of wyse men: Which thing was shewed vnto the kinges counsaile, by whose direction, the matter was committed vnto Sir Philip Basset then chiefe Justice, and other, to set an order and rule betwene the sayd parties. Then before them were brought all evidences and priuileges for the aduantage of both parties: Where finally after long plee and argument, it was firmly demed and iudged, that if the Constable or any other officer of the Tower, would at any tyme take wheate or other victuall to the vse of the king, or of the Tower, that he should come vnto the market holden within the Citie, and there to haue it two pence in a quarter within the Maiors price, and other victualles after the same rate:
And if he, or any of his officers would do contrary to that ordinaunce, that then the Shyrcifes should make report vnto the kinges counsaile, and to withstande him in all that they might, so that the kinges peace were kept.

At this tyme was spreadd many tales, and there arose among the people a mutterynge and murmurynge, that shortly there would be warres betwene the Lordes and the king, for the Bull of dispensation befoze mencioned. But by the helpe and mediation of good wise men, these murmours and grudges were so appeased, that the king agreed againe to the maintenance of those statutes, and sent his writtes whercin the sayd articles were comprised, into all the Shires of England, geving straight commaundement to all men to obserue and kepe the same, and such other as were to them adioyned by the discretion of the Erle Marshall, the Erle of Leycester, Sir Philip Basset, Sir Hugh Bigot and others, the which shortly after was reuoked and denied. Wherebpon the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, fearyng what after might ensue, made him an errand to Rome, and so by lycence of the king and of the Lordes he departed the land, and by that meanes kept him out of the realme untill the trouble was appeased and ceased.

Then vpon a midlent Sunday the Maior and the commons beynge present at a folkemote holden at Paules Crosse befoze Sir Philip Basset, and other of the kinges Counsaile, the Maior was sworne to be true vnto the king, and to his heyres kinges. And the next day after at the Cuyldhall, eue-ry Alderman in the presence of the Mayor tooke the same othe. And vpon the Sunday folowynge, euery strippling of the age of .xij. yeres and aboue, befoze his Alderman in his warde was newly charged with the same othe.

Then the displeasure betwene the king and the Barons began to breake forth, which by a long tyme had bene couered and hidden, insomuch as diuerse of the Barons assembled themselues in the marches of Wales, and gathered vnto them strong power, and sent a letter vnto the king, vnder the Seale of Sir Roger Clifford, besechyng him to haue in remembraunce, the othe and manifolde promises that he had made for the obseruing of the statutes made at his towne of Drenforde, with other ordinaunces made to the honour of God, for sayth and allegeance to his person, and for the weale and profite of his realme: Willyng him further, to withstand and despye all such persons, as will be against the sayd actes, sayyng the Queene and her children.

After the which letter thus sent, and receauyng of it no answere, the said Barons, with Baner displayed went agaynst suche as they knewe that helde against the sayde actes. And first at Hertford they tooke the Bishop of that see, and as many of his Chanons as were aliauntes bozne, and tooke suche treasure and Cattaille as they there found, and bare it with them. And after went and sent vnto such manours as the sayd Bishop and Chanons had, and robbed and spoyled them, and some of them, they threwe to the grounde and consumed with fire, and put the sayd Bishop and Chanons in safe and sure keping, and set others in their places: and after went into other partes of the realme, where they supposed to finde any of their enemies, keping still theyr course towarde London, bearing befoze them a Baner of the kings armes, and goyng on theyr iourney, much people drewe vnto them. And in their passage, euer as they found any that they knewe to be against the maintenance of the sayde actes, those they imprisoned and spoyled their places and houses, were they spirituall or temporall men, and in dyuerse of the kinges Castels they set in such men as they lyked, and put out such as the king had placed there befoze, and gaue vnto them an othe, that they should be true and sayth-full to the king, & kepe those Castels to his vse & to the weale of the realme.

folkemote.

Barons begin to surr.

About Midsummer folowing, they drewe nere to London, and sent a letter to the Maior and Aldermen vnder the seale of Sir Simon Mountford, requiring to knowe of them, whether they would obserue and mainteine the actes and statutes made at Orenford or not, or else they would aide and assist such personnes as entended the breche of the same, and sent vnto them a copie of the same actes with a prouiso, that if there were any of them that should seeme to be hurtfull to the realme or common weale of the same, that they then by discrete persons of the land should be altered and amended. The which Copie the Maior bare vnto the king beyng then at the Tower, accompanied with the Queene and the king of Allmaine, which lately was returned from beyond the sea, and Sir Edward his sonne and other of hys Counsaile.

Then the king entending to knowe the minde of the Citie asked the Maior what he thought of those ordinaunces and actes, knowyng well that before his commyng thether, he had counsayled with the Aldermen, and some of the Commons of the Citie.

The Maior then abashed with that question, besought the king that he might common with his brethren the Aldermen, and then he would declare vnto him both his and their opinions. But the king sayd, he would here his aduice without more counsell. Then the Maior boldly sayde, that before tymes, he with his brethren and commonaltie of the Citie, by his commaundement were sworne to mainteyne all actes made to the honour of God, to the fayth of the king, and profite of the realme, which othe by his lycence and most gracious fauour they entended to obserue and kepe. And mozeouer to aduoyde all occasion that might growe of grudge or barypance betweene his grace and his Barons within the Citie, they would aduoyde all aliauntes and straungers out thereof, if his grace were so contented. With the which answer, the king seemed to be pleased, so that the Maior with his fauour departed, and sent answer to the Barons, accordyng to the sayd communication, their libertie alwayes bpholden and saued.

Then shortly after, forsomuch as dyuerse noble men of the land, which helde against those statutes, were ridden toward Dorset, and there entended to haue taken shipping for feare of the Barons, the king sent after them diuerse persons of his household, and of the Citizens of London to refozine and endure them to retorne and tary with the king.

And in this tyme all aliauntes and straungers, the which were taken suspect of any fauour borne to the one part or to the other, were aduoyded the Citie. But it was not long after that Sir Edward the kings sonne, set them or many of them in offices within the Castell of Windsor, Then watch was kept dayly within the Citie, and in the nightes a certeine were appointed to ryde about the Citie, with a certeyne number of footemen to attend vpon them to seatche all the Citie ouer, but of that ensued harme: for while the ridyng watch was in one part of the Citie, some euill disposed personnes vnder the colour of watchmen, and to search for straungers, robbed and spoiled many houses within the Citie. For remedie wherof, a standyng watche was appointed in euery warde: But now the king hearing that the Barons approached nere the Citie, he shortly after departed thence.

Then the Barons entered the Citie in the moneth of July. And shortly after after, the king returned to Westmyster, with the Queene and other of hys counsaile. And sone after by the consent of the king and the Barons, Sir Hugh le Spencer was made chiefe Justice and keeper of the Tower.

The next day after Mary Magdaleyn daye, a writ was directed vnto the Maior and Aldermen, charging them that the kings peace were firmly kept within the Citie. And in the same writ it was also expessed, that the king and his Barons were louingly agreed. Furthermore it was by the same writ commaunded that if within the precinct of their fraunches, were any person or persons knowne, that would withstande the aforesayde ordynances and statutes, that all such should be attached and put in prison, & their goodes attached for the king, vntill they knewe his further pleasure.

Ye shall vnderstande, that while the Lordes laye thus in the Citie, dyuers couenticles and gatherings were made of the Citizens and other, that robbed in the Citie and did much harme. The which was finally corrected, they were so borne out and mainteyned by their maysters. And lyke wise the Commons of the Citie were farre out of rule by the insensyng of ryotous persons, that in assemblies and courts, that then were kept at the Gyldhall or other places, simple and vndiscrete persons should haue the voyce, and the worshipfull men little or nothing regarded, wherof ensued daylie much unhappinesse and sorrow, as after shall appere.

The Barons then, to obteyne the moze fauour of the Citie willed them to shewe if they had any parte of their libertie withdrawn that they might againe to them be restored, and also to deuise some newe to their weale and profite, and they would labour to the king that they might haue them graunted. For the which comfote of the Lordes, the Maior called the commons vnto the Gyldhall, and shewed to them the beneuolence of the sayd Lords, and willed them that euerie officer for hys offyce, to deuise such things as might be beneficiall for the Citie.

Wherbyon they counsayled together and made a note in a paper, of dyuers statutes, prouisions and ordynances to be graunted, which might (sayth Fabian) moze properly be named abhominations, for they were deuised to their singular profite, and to the great hurte of all other Marchauntes comming to the Citie, and to all other Fayres and Markettes of England, and also Preiudiciall to the vniuersall weale of the Realme.

The which when they were perused and ouersene by the heades of the Citie, it was shewed vnto the sayde Commons, that their ordynances were not lawfull nor charitable considered, and therefore they knewe well they should not be admytted, wyllyng them to deuise other, but all was in vayne. By meane wherof, both those and other that were right necessarie for the common weale of the Citie were reiected and put of.

The Barons departed from London the morowe after Saint James day, and went toward Windsor, to see the guyding of the Castell: where at their comming they put out the sayde aliantes before set in, by Sir Edward the kings sonne, who being accompanied with other went to Fulham to the king and shewed him that the Barons had spoiled them of such goods as they had, and that without cause. But the king put them of for that season and warned them to sue to him about Michelmass, when moze of hys counsaile was with him, and then they shoulde haue iustice.

The. xliij. day of September, the King, the Queene with his somes and other nobles of this land tooke shipping and sayled into Fraunce, to be present at the French kinges Parliament then holden at Bonony, and shortly after he returned againe and the. viij. day of October next folowynge, landed at Douer, and the Friday folowynge came to London.

The. xv. day of October there were a Jury of. xij. knightes of Middlesex, sworne betwene the Abbot of Westminster and the Citie of London, for certaine priueleges that the Citie claymed within Westminster. Where, by the said Jury it was founden before Gilbert of Preston then chiefe Baron of the kinges Exchequer, that the Shirifes of London at those dayes might lawfully enter into the towne of Westminster, and all other Tenementes, that the Abbot had within Middlesex, and vnto the gate of the sayde Abbey, and there to make sommons and distreynne for lacke of appearaunce, all and euery Tenant of the sayd Abbot.

And soone after Michelmasse, the former complaint of the alyens or straungers, was shewed before the king and the Lordes in the Parliament, or rather counsaile holden at Westminster, where at the last, sentence was geuen, that the Barons should restore all such goodes as they and their company had taken from such persons before that day, as well to aliauntes as other, spirituall or temporall persons: And also that such meniall seruauntes as should be dayly in the kinges house, and about his person, should be such as the king would chose and admit himselfe, the which two articles, the Barons utterly denied. Wherefore olde rancoure tooke place, and dissention kindled his fyre of malice againe betwene the king and his Lordes feruently.

And in the yere folowynge, the Commons of the Citie of London chose vnto their Maior for that yere Thomas fitz Thomas, and without counsell of the Aldermen sware him at the Guildhal vpon the day of Simon & Jude, and made no presentment of him vpon the next day folowynge, neyther to the king, nor yet to the Barons of the Exchequer, as they of right ought to haue done: For the which presumption the king was grievously discontented against the Citie. And sone after he being aduertised that the Citizens would take part with the Barons, caused Sir Edward his sonne to take the Castell of Windsor by a traine. Whereof, when he knewe that he was in possession, the king early in a morning a little before Christmasse, departed from Westminster, and road to the sayd Castell, whether shortly after came many of the Lordes vpon the kinges partie. And as fast the Lordes and knightes which helde with the Erle of Leycester, drewe them toward London, so that on eyther partie great numbers of people were assembled. And in this tyme some well disposed persons laboured to haue peace and concorde betwene the king and his Lordes: By whose meanes at the last, it was agreed, that all matters concernynge the aforesayde articles or statutes made at Drenford, and after by the. xij. Piers, should be demed and iudged by the French king, so that he should allow or disallow those that should be kept or broken, and as he iudged, so both parties to be contented to stand vnto & abide firmly & surely. Upon which agreement, copies were made of the sayde statutes, and with letters (shewynge the effect of the former agreement) sent vnto Lewes the French King as aforesayde. And at Christmalle next after, the King tooke shipping, with Sir Edward his sonne, and other of the Counsaile, and and sayled into Fraunce for the aforesayde cause. And for the partie of the sayde Barons, was sent ouer Sir Peter de Mountford and other. Then before Lewes king of Fraunce those statutes were sore argued.

In the ende, the French king hauynge before him both the parties, the. xxiiij. day of January, sytting in iudgement gaue expresse sentence, that all and euery of those statutes and ordinaunces should be from that day forward utterly fordone and set at naught, and all such bandes and promises that the king or any other had made for the maintenance of the same, should be admitted and canceled, and the king and all other, for any matter concernynge those statutes set at libertie.

After which sentence thus geuen, the king returned into Englande, so that he came vnto London the. xv. day of February. But the Barons beyng sore amoued with this sentence, and notynge great parcialitie in the French king, departed from London westward, and so into the marches of Wales, where they drewe to them great power, and warred vpon the landes and Castelles of Sir Roger Mortimer, & threw some of them vnto the ground, and spoyled of his what they might finde, and ouer that, burnt of his manours and houses. In whose ayde, Sir Edward the kinges sonne commynge, hys people were distressed, and he almost taken.

For reformation of which matter a newe Parliament or counsaile was called and appointed to beholden & kept. xv. dayes after Easter at Drenford, but it neuer toke effect. Howbeit another Chronicle sayth, & from this Parliament then holden at Drenford, the king and his Lordes parted in displeasure.

Then the Barons drewe toward London, and the king remayned at Woodstocke. And then newe assurance by wytyng indented was made betwene the commonaltie of the Citie, and the Barons, without consent of many of the rulers of the sayde Citie. Wherefore the Commons, as men in a rage and furye, made of them selues two Capitaines, whiche they named Constables of the Citie, that is to say, Thomas Bitwelsdon, and Stephen Bukerel. At whose commaundement, by tollynge of the great Bell of Paules all the Citie should be readye shortly in harnesse, to geue attendaunce vpon their said Capitaynes,

About the beginnyng of Lent, the Constable of the Tower, Sir Hugh le Spencer, came with a fayre company of men of armes before him into the Citie, and desyred assistance of the afozenamed Constables. The which commaunded the sayde Bell to be tolled: By meane whereof, the people shut in their shops, and came out in harnesse in great multitudes. The which after proclamation made, that they should follow their Capitaines, without knowledge what to do, or whether to go, folowed their sayde Capitaynes, and so went to Chiffleworth. viij. miles beyond Westminster, and there spoyled the Manor of the king of Romaynes, and set it after vpon a fyre. And that done, his water Milles and other commodities that he there had, put them vnto utter ruyne, and after with great noyse and cry returned to London.

This dede as saith Iabian, was the cause of the moztall warre folowynge. For where before time the said king of Romaynes had gone about for the alliaunce that was betwene him and the Erle of Gloucester, a treatie of peare, to be had betwene the king and his Barons: after that dede done, he was enemye vnto them to the vttermost of his power.

The king heryng of this ryot, gathered vnto him a great power. And for that he heard that Sir Peter de Mountfort was at Northampton gathering of people to strength the Barons partie, he sped him thether, and wan the towne vpon him by force, and slue many of his men, and in the ende toke him and Sir Simond the sonne of the Erle of Leycester, with diuerse other on liue, the which, with many Burgesles of that towne, that had taken their partes, the king sent vnto diuerse prisonnes, and some he closed within the Castell of the same towne.

A ryot made vpon the Jewes.

And aboute this tyme, that is to saye, the weeke befoze Easter, all the Jewes in London were spoyled and robbed, and the number of fife hundzeth of them were slaine, and diuerse of their houses bzent and destroyed, and such of them as were saued, were conueyed for great neede vnto the Tower, and there kept from the fury of the Commons. And the occasion of this riot was, for that one Jewe woulde haue forced a Christian man to haue geuen vnto him more then two pence for the bsury of twenty shillynges for a weeke lentyng. For ye shall vnderstande that in those dayes by licence graunted vnto the Jewes of the king, they might take by bsury of euery man that of them would borow money, two pence of a pound for a weekes lentyng, and so of greater and of smaller summes after the rate.

A bsury allowed among the Jewes & suffered in England.

And soone after the Jewes were thus punished, many houses of religion within the Citie, and nere there about, were searched for goodes of aliauntes, and muche founde. Whereof a part was brought vnto the Barons, but the more part was stolne and bzibed.

In this season the king passed by dyuerse Countries, and lastly came into Suffer, with a strong power. Whereof heryng the Lordes, they made preparation to go against him. In all which tyme the Wardens of the fife Portes kept the sea with shippes that no straungers should enter the land to ayde the king against the Barons.

In the ende of Aprill, the Barons with a multitude of the Citie, which they put in the balwarde, departed from London, takyng their iourney towarde the king. And when they were well onwarde vpon their way, worde was brought vnto them, that the king with an howge power was at Lewes. Wherefore they by an whole assent, deuysed a letter, and sent it in the name of all the Barons vnto the king, whose names herebnder folow, but not all.

The names of the Barons of England.

Sir Simond de Mountfort Erle of Leycester, and high stewarde of Englande. Sir Gilbert de Clare, Erle of Gloucester, Sir Robert Ferrers, Erle of Derby, Sir William de Mounthdesey, Sir Hugh le Spenser, chiefe Justice, and Sir Henry Mountfort, sonne to the Erle of Leycester, Sir Richard Gray, Sir Henry Hastyns, Sir John fitz John, Sir Robert Deuenpount, Sir John Gyulle, Sir Robert Roos, Sir William Marmon, Baldwyn Wake, Sir Gilbert Gifford, Sir Nicholas Deme-graue, and Sir Godfrey de Lucye, with many other.

Which letter sealed with the seales of the sayde Erle of Leycester, and of Gloucester, conteyned as foloweth.

A letter writ ten by the Barons vnto the king.

To the most excellent Lord, king Henry, by the grace of God king of Eng- lande, Lorde of Irelande, and Duke of Guyan, the Barons and other faythfull your seruauntes, their fidelitie and othe to God and to you coueting to kepe, send to you due salutypng with all reuerence and honoure, vnder due obeyssaunce.

obeyssaunce. Lyketh it your highnesse to vnderstand, that many beyng aboute you, haue befoze tymes shewed vnto your Lordship of vs many euill and vntrue reportes, and haue found suggestions, not al onely of vs, but also of your selfe, to bring this your realme vnto subuersion. Know your excellency, that we entend nothing but health and surety to your person, to the vttermost of our powers: and not alonely to our enemies, but also yours, and of all thys your realme, we entend vtter greuaunce and correction. Besechyng your grace, hereafter to geue to them little credence, for ye shall finde vs your true and faythfull subiectes to the vttermost of our powers. And we Erle of Leycester, and Erle of Gloucester, at the request of other, & for our selues, haue put to our seales, the .x. day of the moneth of May.

The aunsvvere vnto the aforesayde letter.

Henry by the grace of God, king of England, Lord of Ireland, & Duke of Guyan: To Simond de Mountfort, and Gilbert de Clare, and their complices. Whereas by warre and generall perturbauce in this our realme, by you begon and continued, with also brennynges and other hurtes, and enoynties, that evidently it appereth that your fidelitie to vs due, ye haue not kept, nor the suretie of our person ye haue little regarded, for so much as our Lordes and other trustie friendes which dayly abyde with vs, ye vere and greue, and them pursue to the vttermost of your powers, and yet dayly entend as ye by report of your letters haue vs asserteyned: We the grieffe of them admit and take to be our alone, specially when they for their fidelitie, which they to vs dayly impend, stand & abyde by vs, to oppresse your infidelitie and vntruth. Wherefore of your fauour and assurance we set little store, but you as our enemies we vtterly desye. Witnesse our selfe at our towne of Lewes, the .xij. day of this moneth of May.

The kinges aunsvvere to the Barons letter.

And besydes this, the king of Romaynes, Sir Edvard the kinges sonne, and other Lordes beyng then vvith the king, sent vnto them another letter vwhereof the tenor ensueth.

Richard by the grace of God king of Romaynes, alwayes Augustus and Edward the Noble first begotten sonne of the king of Englande, all other Barons firmly standing and abyding with our souereigne Lorde the king, to Symond de Mountfort, Gilbert de Clare, and all other their false fellowes: By the Letters which ye sent vnto the king our most souereigne Lorde, we vnderstanding that we are desyed of you. Acuerthelesse, thys worde of defiance appered vnto vs sufficiently befoze, by the deprivation and brenning of our manors, and caryng awaye of oure goodes. Wherefore we wyll that ye vnderstande, that we desye you as our mortall and publike enemies. And whensoever we maye come to the reuengement of the iniuries that ye to vs haue done, we shall acquite it to the vttermost of oure powers. And where ye put vpon vs that we are neyther true nor good to oure Souereigne Lorde the king. We geue you to vnderstand that ye therein say, falsely and vntruely of vs. And if that sayng ye Sir Symond de Mountfort and Sir Gilbert de Clare wyll testifie in the Court of our souereigne Lord the king: we are readie to purchace to you suretie and safe comming, that there we maye proue our true and faythfull innocencie, and your false and trayterous lyng. Witnesse with the Seales of Rycharde king of the Romaynes and sir Edward afozenamed. Geuen at Lewes the .xij. day of May.

Another letter sent to the Barons.

When

A terrible battail called the battail of Lewes in Suffex betwene the king and his Barons.

The king & his brother & some taken.

The king grauntech to the Barons, all theyr requestes.

When the Barons had receyued these Letters from the king and hys Lordes, they perceyued well that there was none other meane, but to defend their cause by dent of sword, wherfore, they putting their trust in God, sped them forth toward the king. And vpon Wednesday being the .xxiiiij. day of May, early in the morning bothe the hostes met: where after the Londoners had geuen the first assault, they were beaten back, so that they began to drawe from the sharp shot and strokes, to the discomfort of the Barons hoste. But the Barons encouraged and comforted there men in suche wise, that not all onely the freshe and lustie knightes fought egerly, but also suche as before were discomfited, gathered a newe courage vnto them, and fought witho it feare, insomuch that the kings Ward lost their places. Then was the felde couered with dead bodys, and gasping and groning was heard on euery side, for eyther of them was desyrous to bring others out of lyfe. And the father spared not the sonne, neyther yet the sonne spared the father. Alliance at that time was turned to defiaunce, & christian bloud that day was shed without pittie. Thus durynge the fyght by the more parte of the daye, lastly the victorie fell to the Barons, so that there were taken the king, and the king of Romaynes, Sir Edward the kings sonne, with many other noble men, to the the number of .xxv. Barons and Banarets, and of the common people there were slaine aboue twentie thousand as saith Fabian & Cooper.

When the Barons had thus obtayned the victoerye, prouision was made for the safe keepynge of the prisoners, so that all were sente vnto diuerse Castells and Prysons, except the king and hys brother the king of Almayne, and Sir Edwarde his Sonne, the which the Barons helde with them vntill they came to London. Then a newe graunt was made by the king, that the aforesayde statutes should stand in strength. And if anye were thought vnreasonable, they to be corrected and amended by foure noble men of the realme, that is to saye, two of the spiritualtie, and two of the temporaltie. And if those foure could not agree, then the Erle of Angeou and Duke of Burgoyne to be iudges of the matter. And this to be firmlye holden and obeyed by the king and his brother: The kinges graunted that their sonnes and heyres should remaine with the Barons as prisoners vntill all thinges were finished, according to the former agreement. And vpon this was a Parliament appoynted to be holden at London the Whitsontyde following, but that came neuer to passe. Then the Tuesday before the Ascension day, a peace was proclaymed in London betwene the king and the Barons.

The next day the king and the Barons came to London with the king of Romaynes, and Sir Edward the kinges sonne. Then Sir Edwarde as pledge for the king, and Sir Henry sonne to the king of Almaine, were sent vnto the Tower, and there lodged, and from thence to Douer Castell. And the king was lodged in the Bishops Palace beside Paules, and the king of Almaine and diuerse other within the tower. Then it was agreed by the king, that for his more suretie, and for the weale of the lande that the Erle of Leycester should be resiaunt in the kinges Court. Vpon which agreement and other, many of the Prisoners were set at large.

In this meane while, before the Battaille of Lewes, the Queene and the king of Romaynes had sent ouer the sea for Souldiours, to ayde the king agaynst the Barons, which nowe were come in great number vnto Douer, and Kynges by power are forced to do an other wil, and not as they list.

Here is the first mention made of a Parliament holden by the thre estates.

The king swozne but shortly brake his othe.

and there hoied on the Sea to haue landed. Whereof heeryng the Barons, they sent the king of Romaynes as prisoner to Barkhamstede, vntill the sayd Alliautes were returned: and caused king Henry with a great power to ryde thether, and to force the sayde hoste of straungers to retorne vnto their Countreyes from whence they came.

And when the king had returned the sayde straungers, he shortly after with the agreement of the Barons, sayled ouer into fraunce, and returned againe within short tyme.

And shortly after the Lordes of the Marches of Wales assembled themselves together, and did much harme vpon the Lordshippes and Shanoys of the Erles of Leycester and Gloucester. Wherefore the king so soone as he returned out of fraunce, forthwith roade to Gloucester, and called there a Counsaile of his Lordes, by the aucthoritie of which counsaile, it was enacted that as many of the sayd Lordes as came not in by the Octaues of Saint Hillary next folowynge, & yelded them vnto the kings grace, should be exiled. And in the sayd Counsaile it was also agreed, that in the sayd Octaues there should be a Parliament holden at Westminster. At the which tyme the king with his Lordes spirituall and temporall, and commons of his lande, began his foresayd Parliament. And in the same it was there moued (the king himselfe beyng present) that neither he the king, nor yet Sir Edward his sonne, nor none of them should after that day greue or cause to be greued the Erles of Leycester and of Gloucester, the Baronnes, Banerettes, or knightes, the Citizens of London, and Barons of the five Portes, nor none other person or persons of high or low degree, that was vpon the partie of the sayd Erles, for any matter of displeasure done against the king, and the sayde Sir Edward his sonne, at any tyme before that day. And that to do and vpholde, the king before his Lordes was swozne.

After this there was read a Charter or Pardon, concernynge the cause and matter of offence aforesayde. And afterwarde also was concluded a confirmation of the statutes of the Focest, with many other actes and statutes before graunted of the king, as Magna Carta, and other.

The .xij. day of March next folowynge Sir Edwarde the kinges sonne that before was also swozne to performe suche promises as the king had made before in the Parliament, was deliuered and set at libertie, and lykewise was Sir Henry the kinges sonne of Almaine, the which had bene kept as pledges (as before you haue heard) about the space of .ix. monethes & odde dayes vpon assurance made, that the sayd Sir Edward should dwell and abyde in the kinges Court, and not to depart from thence without licence of the king, and of a certeine of the Barons.

Then were many Instrumentes and Bondes made by the king and Sir Edward his sonne for the performance of diuerse and sundry couenants made betwene the king & his Barons, which shortly after tooke small effect.

Now shortly after, that is to say, betwene Easter and Whitsontide, for the ordering and maner of executynge of the aforesayde statutes made at Dr-enforde, fell great dissention betwene the Erles of Leycester and Gloucester, so that wordes of displeasure were vttered betwene them, the king and they also beyng then at Gloucester. Then the king and his Barons had much to do to set them at quiet and rest. And the same season, the Barons of the five Dissention among the Lordes.

Portes with their ships were vpon the sea, and robbed and spoyled all that they might take, for all was fish that came to the net, sparing neither English Merchantes nor other. And the Bootie that they gate was no small thing. Of whiche as the common fame went, some of the Barons had no small share.

The Whitsonde folowynge, the king with the Erle of Leycester, and Sir Edward his sonne, with many other his Lordes beyng at Hereford in the Edge of Wales: the sayd Sir Edward secretly and without licence, departed from the Court, and went vnto Chester, where he called vnto him the Erle of Gloucester, and the Lordes of the marches, the Erle of Maren, Sir Roger Mortimer, and other, and they fallynge into felowship, and ioyning in a confederacie, went from thence vnto Gloucester breaking the bridges as they went, to the entent that he were not folowed vntill he had assembled his power.

When knowledge of this came to the Erle of Leycester, he in all haste sent vnto Sir Symond his sonne that he should gather his knightes vnto him. The which accordyng to that commaundement, assembled vnto him with much people, and with them dreyw toward Winchester, so that he came before the Citie the. xiiij. day of the Moneth of July, where he was shut out, for so much as the Citizens knewe not whether he came as the kinges friend or not. And also a little before, they had receyued a letter from Sir Edward, willyng them to kepe them out of the Citie, and to suffer them by no meanes to enter. For these causes the Citizens closed their Gates against the sayde Sir Symond and his company. But it was not long before the Citie yelded and gaue vp. Then they spoyled the towne, and slue the greatest part of the Jewes that were therein. And that done, they layde siege vnto the Castell, and assaulted it: But sodeynly a feyned newes was brought vnto them, sayng that Sir Edward and his power was commyng euen at hande, wherefore they departed shortly thence, and went to Kenelworth.

And the last day of July Sir Edward and his hoste came vnto Kenelworth aforesayde, and fell sodeynly vpon the hoste of the afozenamed Sir Symond, and with sheddyng of little blood tooke there prisoners, the Erle of Orenford, William de Mount Canise, Adam de Newmarket, Sir Baldwin Wake, and Hugh Neuile, with dyuerse other, and Sir Symond fled into the Castell and so escaped. Then the afozenamed Prisoners were sent to Gloucester, and there put in safe keepyng.

In this meane tyme Sir Symond Erle of Leycester tooke his leaue of the king, which then from Hereforde passed the Ryuer of Seuerne, and so went vnto Worcester, and the Erle with great paine passed the Bridges before broken by Sir Edward, and so coasted the countries in gathering of the people as he went: so that at the length he had with him a strong power. And when Sir Edward heard therof, he made towards him so fast as he might. And the first day of August they met at Eusham in Worcestershire, where betwene them was foughten a cruell and bloody battayle, in the which was slaine the sayd Sir Symond the Erle, and Sir Henry his sonne and heyre, Sir Hugh le Spencer, Sir Peter de Mountford, and many other noble men that helde vpon the Barons partie. After which discomfiture, some malicious persons in despite of the Erle cut off his head and his prey members, and fastened them vpon either syde of his nose, and after made a present thereof vnto the wyfe of Sir Roger Mortimer: his fecte also and his handes were cut of from the body and sent to sundrie places, and the truncke of hys bodie buried within the Church of Eusham.

Some after this victorie thus obtayned by Sir Edward, the king and he met with no small ioy and comforte to them both. And then by the auctoritie of the king all the prisoners that before had bene taken, and imprisoned were deliuered and set at libertie, and manye other daylie accused and set in for them. And about the. viij. daye of September next following a Parliament or counsell was holden at Winchester, where by the auctoritie of the same, all statutes and ordynances before made, by the Barons at Orenford in the. xli. yere of the king, were vtterly fordone and set at naught. And all bondes and wytyngs made by the king, or any other for the obseruing of the same, were cancelled and broken. Also at thys counsell was ordeyned, that all suche as had fauoured the Barons, being then in prison, or at large, should be disherited and then the king resumed into his handes all grauntes before made and geuen to any person. And for Sir Symond Mountfort the sonne of the Erle that was slaine could not agree with the king at the Parliament, he was restored againe to the Castell of Kenelworth as he before was assured, the which he with Sir Henry de Hastynge and other, kept and defended against the kings power, a long time after.

After the Parliament ended the king came to Windsor wyth a great power, entending, as the fame went, to destroye the Citie of London, for the great wrath and displeasure that he had conceyued for the ayding of the Barons against hym. Of the which when the Mayor and Aldermen were enformed, they were stricken into a wonderfull feare: Although manye of the rude and rashe commoners were in full purpose to haue defended the Citie against the king: and thus among them were dyuerse and sundrie opinions, and no great maruaile, for at those dayes the Citie was inhabited with sundrie nations and people.

At the last the sad and graue Citizens being called together by the Mayor and his brethren to the Guildhall, it was among them agreed & thought meete, to make a most humble supplication vnto the king, and to sende it by some religious person. Of the which they made diuers, and sent them by sundrie persons, but all auayled nothing. For the king was most greuously incensed against the Citizens by some of hys Counsaile, so that he woulde not looke vpon, nor hearken vnto any of their supplications. And if it fortunied any to moue the kings fauour towards the Citizens, he would so storme and geue vnto them such vnpleasent and wrathfull lookes, that no man durst once open his mouth vnto him for them.

Then the Citizens were counsailed by their friends that they shoulde make a wytyng, and seale it with the common seale, and in the same they shoulde offer themselves, and put them wholly in the kings grace and mercy, touching their liues and goodes. And at the last accordyng to this counsaile, they deuised a wytyng, and sealed it with their common seale, and that done chose. viij. persons of the Citie, suche as had friendes in the Courte, and the. vij. day of October sent them toward Wyndsoze, and as they passed thorough Colbrook they met a knight of the kings, called Sir Roger Leyborne, the

which caused the sayde. viij. persons to turne againe vnto the Citie, and he accompanied them vntill he came almost at the Citie, and there departed from them, and roade vpon the backeside of the towne vnto the tower. But at his departing he willed them to warne the Maior with certeine of the Citie to meete with him vpon the morow at Barkyng Church. And on the morow, when the Maior and the sayd Sir Roger met, the same Sir Roger after a long processe made, shewed and declared the kinges most grieuous displeasure agaynst the Citie, and also tolde them what meanes their friendes and louers had made to obteyne the kinges graces fauour for the Citie: But in the ende he concluded that there was no grace to be obteyned for them, except they would by their common seale, bynde themselues fully and wholly to stande at the kinges grace, and to put into his mercy their lyues and goodes: The which when the Maior and his brethren conferrynge with sundrye other of the Citizens had well weyed and considered, and also beyng greatly afearde of the kinges wrath agaynst the Citie, for it was bruted that he woulde vtterlye destroy the same by fyre: wherefore in the ende they graunted to all that Sir Roger had moued, and deliuered the aforesayde wrytyng vnto the aforesayde Roger, praiyng him to be a good meane and intercessor for them vnto the king. And the next day the sayd Sir Roger went vnto the Court, and returned againe the sixt day after, and willed the Maior and Aldermen to mete with him again at the foresaid Church. Where he shewed to them, that the king by great instance of their friendes, had receyued their wrytyng, and woulde first for the beginnyng and contentation of his mynde, that all the Chaynes that was in euery streete, and stode at euerye Lanes ende, shoulde be losed from their Postes, and the Post also drawen out of the earth, and all they to be brought vnto the Tower of London: And that done, that the Maior with a certeine of Citizens, to the number of. xl. persons should the day folowynge be at Windsor to confirme the graunt of their wrytyng. And that they should go and come in safe and sure wise, he deliuered vnto them the kinges letter and seale, for the terme of foure dayes, which all was done accordyng to the former deuise, and the Maior with the aforesayde persons were ready on the morow which was Sunday, at Windsor by one of the clocke, and there taried vntill foure of the same day: At which tyme the king commynge from his disport, entered the Castell without countenance or castyng of his eyen vpon the Londoners. And when the king and his people were entered the Castell, the Londoners woulde haue folowed, but they were warned to abide without.

And immediately the king caused a Proclamation to be made, that no man of high or lowe degree, should by worde or deede shewe any displeasure vnto the Londoners. And in the euenyng came vnto them, the aforesayde sir Roger and sir Robert Waleys knightes, and brought them into the Castell, and said that the kings pleasure was not to speake with them that night. And afterwarde the sayde knightes deliuered them vnto the Constable of the Castell, which closed them all in a large Tower, where that night they had small cheere and worste lodgyng.

The next day beyng Monday, towardes night they were taken out of that tower, and deliuered to the Bayly of the sayde Castell, and lodged by his assignement, except .v. persons, that is to say, Thomas fitz Thomas Maior, Highell

The Maior and Aldermen locked by in a tower in the Castell of Windsor.

Highell Tony, Stephen Bukerell, Thomas Pitwellisdon, and John de fleete. The which fine persons the king had geuen to Sir Edward his sonne, at whose commaundement they remayned still in the sayde Tower long after, notwithstanding the kinges safe conduite to them made as befoze is sayde. When tidinges hereof came to the Citie of London, albeit, that for feare many were befoze aduoyded, yet then a great manye mo gate them thence with spede into diuerse countries of England, and very many of them neuer returned.

The first day of Nouember folowynge, the king came to Westminster. And shortly after he gaue vnto diuerse of his household seruautes, more than lx. householdes and houses within the Citie of London, so that the owners were compelled to agree and redeme their houses and householdes, with all goodes that in them were, or else to aduoyde and suffer such persons to enter as the sayde houses were geuen vnto, and not alonely that, but also such lands and Tenements, goodes and Cattelles, as the sayd Citizens had in any other places of England. And at that tyme the king made Custos and Gardian of the Citie, Sir Othon Constable of the Tower of London, which sir Othon chose to be Baylifes vnder him, and to be to him accomptable to the vse of the king, John Adrian, and Walter Henry Citizens of the same Citie.

And after this, the king tooke pledges of the best mennes sonnes of the Citie, that his peace should be surely kept within the same. The which pledges were kept in the Tower of London, and there found at the cost of theyr parentes. And shortly after by great labour and sute made, all the aforesayde persones which were in the keepyng of the Baylyfe of Windsor Castell, foure onely except, that is to say, Richard Bonaventure, Simon de Hardistocke, William de Bent, & William de Gloucester, all the other Londoners. xxxiiij. in number were deliuered and came to London the. xxi. of Nouember folowynge, and the other. ix. were kept still in the Tower of Windsor.

Nowe was dayly sute and labour made vnto the king to haue his gracious fauour, and to know his pleasure what fine he would haue of the Citie for their transgressions. For the which the king demaunded. xl. thousande pounde, and firmly helde him at fiftie thousand markes. But the Citizens alledged for them, that the poze Commoners (wherof many were aduoyded) were the trespassours, and besydes that, the best men of the Citie were spoyled by those riotous persons, and by the Rowers also of the sea, as the Wardynes of the fiue Portes, and other, so that in this troublesome tyme they lost the greatest part of their substaunce. For the which considerations, and many other, that were here to tedious to wyte, the Citizens besought the king of his most gracious clemency and fauour, and to take of them that they might beare.

This matter thus hangyng, the king vpon the sixt day of December departed from Westminster towardes Northampton. And a little befoze his departure, he ordeyned Sir John Linde knight, and maister John Waldren Clerke, to be Gardians of the Citie and Tower of London, the which were named in the kinges wrytyng Seneschalles, or stewardes of the City.

The next day after that the king was ridden as aforesayde, the aforesaymed two Stewardes, sent for. xxxiiij. of the most notable men of the Citie, and warned them to apere the next day folowynge befoze the Counsaile at Westminster:

minister : Where at the tyme of their appearance was shewed vnto them by Sir Roger Leyborne that the kinges minde was, that they should haue the rule of the Citie in his absence, vnder the aforesayde Stewardes : and for to see good rule to be kept within the Citie they should be swozne there, before his counsaile. And there they were swozne, and so commaunded to returne againe into the Citie. But yet ceased not meanes to be made, and continuall labour to the king for his gracious fauour in the leuiyng of a mercifull fine, such as the pooze Citizens might be able to beare. And in Christmasse weeke at the last, the king at the prayer of suche friendes as the Citie made vnto him, graunted the Citie to be released for all maner of transgressions, and to haue their whole liberties restored vnto them againe for .xx. thousand marke, those persons only except which the king had geuen to Sir Edward his sonne, beyng, as is aforesayde, at Wyndsoze. For the payment of which somme at the dayes agreed vpon, Sir Roger Leyborne, and mayster Robert Darien Clerke, were assigned to take sureties for the same. After which assurance by them receyued, and sent vnto the king at Northampton, the king sent immediately after vnto the Citizens a Charter vnder his broade seal, the tenor whereof ensueth.

The liberties of the Citie againe restored for the famine of .xx. thousande marke.

A Pardon graunted to the Citizens of London by the king.

Henry by the grace of God, king of England, Lorde of Ireland, and Duke of Guyan : To all men health. Know ye that for the fine of .xx. thousande marke, the which our Citizens of London to vs made, for the redemption of the transgressions and trespasses to vs, to our Queene, to our noble brother Richard king of Allmaine, and to Edward our first begotten sonne done, we remit and pardon for vs and our heires, to the said Citizens and their heires, as much as in vs is, so that they haue and enjoy all theyr former grauntes and liberties, rentes and profites from the feast of Christmasse last past : And also that the sayde Citizens haue to them, all forfeites of all malefactorz of the Citie, which in the perturbance before made, were endited, or for the same be yet to be endited : Except the goodes and Cattalles of them, of the which we haue geuen the bodie vnto our foresayd sonne Edward, and except the rents and tenementes of all those Citizens, which now be and shall be our eschete, by reason of the aforesaide transgressions. And that all prisoners, which now remaine in prison, be frely deliuered, except those personnes, whose bodyes we haue geuen to Edward our sonne. And that the sayd Citizens be as free, as they were before the sayde transgressions in all partes and coastes of this our landes. In witnesse whereof, we haue made these letters patentes. Witnesse my selfe at Northampton the tenth day of January, the .xliv. yere of our reigne.

¶ After the Citizens had receyued this pardon, then were all the pledges for them, which were in the tower of London deliuered, and also foure of them that were in the Castell of Wyndsoze. Then also were discharged the aforesaid Stewardes, and the Citizens of themselves chose for Mayor, William Fitz Richard, and for Shiriffes, Thomas Delaforde, and Gregory de Rokelley. Then for the leuiyng of this fine, were taxed, aswell couenant seruaunts as also householders, and many refused the liberties of the Citie, to be acquitted of this charge.

While the king lay thus at Northampton, Sir Simond de Mountfozte referred the iudgement of his cause vnto Octobonus the Legate, that before before was come into thys lande to refozme things in the Church of Englande, and also to set vnitie and rest betweene the king and his Lordes. To whose order and iudgement and to the king of Romaines the sayde Sir Symond did bynde himselfe to stande. Upon which promise and band, he was set at libertie, and was at large in the kings court, and did there awhile continue, but at the last, when the king was come to London, he departed suddenly out of the courte, and roade to Winchelsey where he accompanied with the Rowers of the Sea, and (after some prizes taken) departed from them and so sayled into Fraunce, and put himselfe in seruice with Lewes the French king.

And shortly after, the king, besieged the Castell of Kenelwozth with a great power. But Sir Henry Hastings with such as were within it, defended it so strongly, that the king and all his power might not winne it, of a long time, as after shall appere.

Kenelwozth Castell.

It was before declared that the Queene to helpe her Lorde the king against the Barons, before the battaile at Lewes, had caused an host of straungers to be prepared to come into Englande. And the same time also she purchased a curse of the Pope, to accurse the Barons, and all their ayders and helpers, and had commissions directed to certaine Bishops of England to execute the same, as London, Winchester, and Chichester, the which for feare of the Barons denyed the doing thereof. Wherefore the Queene made new labour to the Pope, then Urban the thirde, and had it graunted, that the sayde Bishops for their disobedience should be corrected. And for thys the aforesayde Legate Octobone, this yere at a counsell holden by him at Paules Church in London, suspended the sayde Bishops, and sent them to Rome to be alloyled of Clement the thirde.

And now was the Castell of Kenelwozth yelded by appoyntment, which had bene besieged from the .xxiiij. day of June, vnto the .xx. day of December folowyng, vpon condicion that Sir Henry Hastings and all other that were with him in the sayde Castelle, should haue life and limme, and horse and harnesse, with all thinges within the Castell to them belongyng, and a certeine of leysure to cary away the same.

About this time also, the Wardynes of the five portes were reconciled to the king, by fauour and helpe of Sir Edward the kinges sonne. And notwithstanding the great harme that they had done by roauyng vpon the sea, as well to Englishe merchauntes, as to other, they had to them confirmed all their former priuileges. And mozeouer there was grauted to them, that if any man English or other, would sue for restitution of goodes, by them before taken, or for the death of any of their friendes before slaine : that all such complaintes should be sued and shewed in their Courtes, and there to haue theyr matters determined, and not else where. But what the cause was of this end thus made betweene the king and them, it is not shewed : But the common fame at that day ranne, that the sayde Wardynes of the five Portes, had at this day the dominion of the Sea : wherefore the king was faine to folowe their pleasures.

The Wardens of the .v. portes are reconciled to the King.

In the former yere also, in the begynnyng of the moneth of May, the king helde his Parliament at Northampton : In the which Parliament was confirmed vnto the Citie of London the olde fraunchises and liberties by

by the kinges progenitors graunted to the sayde Citie, with a newe graunt also for the shire of Middlesex. And in this Parliament were manye noble men disenherited, that before tooke part with the Barons. For the which cause they assembled together and robbed in diuerse coastes of the land, and tooke the towne of Lincolne and spoiled it, and after raunfomed many of the riche Burgeses of the towne, and tooke the Isle of Ely, and strengthened it in such wyse, as they helde it a great while after.

This yere fell a great controuersie betweene the rulers of the Citie of London, and the commons of the same, about the chosynge of the Maior. The Rulers named Alyn Souch: But the Commons (specially such as were of the meaner sort) cryed vpon Thomas fitz Thomas, who was then prisoner in the Castell of Windsor. Wherefore the Aldermen were compelled to call for the helpe of sir Roger Leyborne and other, who came to the Gnyld hall, beyng harnessed vnder their gownes, and at the last were enforced to carpe certeyne of the rascalles to the Counters and other Prisons, and then quietly they went to the election of the sayd Alyn Souche.

The Gentlemen of whom ye heard before, that kept the Isle of Ely, did now breake out sundry tymes, and did much hurt in Norffolke and Suffolke and Cambridge shire, and toke the citie of Norwich, and after the spoylyng and sackynge thereof, carped away with them many of the Citizens beyng riche, and raunfomed them at great sommes of money, and lyued there in that Isle lyke vnto Outlawes. By these and other many hurtes in diuerse places of the land were done, and namely by Theues and persons of euill disposition: but what wickednesse so euer was done, the blame thereof was laid to the charge of these gentlemen. And at this time Octobone the Legate laboured vnto the king that the sayd disenherited gentlemen might purchase theyr landes againe of him by fine and raunfome. By whose labour, the king, at the last agreed that they should haue their landes againe by fynes of fyue yere value of their landes. As he that might dispende. xx. pound by the yere should pay an hundred pound in fyue yeres, and of other after that rate, except sir Robert Ferrers Erle of Darby, Sir John de la Ware, and hym that stroke of the fist of the kinges pursuyant, and some other persons that were of small countenance, should be fined by discretion of the kinges counsaile, but this tooke none effect.

About this tyme was made the statute of weightes and measures, that is to say, that a sterlyng penny should weye. xxxij. graynes of wheate drie and round, and taken in the middes of the eare, and. xx. of those pence shoulde make an ounce, and. xij. ounces make a pound Troy: And. viij. pound Troy weight make a gallon of Wine, and. viij. wyne galons to make a London bushell, which is the. viij. part of a quarter. Also thre barley Cornes drye and round should make an ynch, &. xij. ynches a foote, & thre foote a yarde, and fyue yards, halfe a perch, or poll, &. xl. pol in length & thre in bredth an acre of land.

And these standerdes of weight and measures were confirmed in the xv. yere of king Edward the thirde, and also in the tyme of Henry the sixt and of Edward the fourth, and lastly confirmed in the last yere of Henry the seventh. But in the tyme of king Henry the sixt it was ordeyned that the same ounce should be devided into. xxx. pence, and in the tyme of king Edward the fourth, into. xl. pence, and in the tyme of king Henry the eight into. xliij. pence:

pence: But the weight of the ounce Troy, and the measure of the foote continued alwayes one.

And about this tyme, of what occasion I knowe not, Sir Gilbert de Clare Erle of Gloucester gathered out of the Marches of Wales a great and strong power against the king, and with hym also ioynd Sir John Ciuile, and other of the disenherited company, and shortly after Christmasse came with a great host nere vnto London, Octobone the Popes Legate lying then in the Tower of London.

Alsoone as the Maior and Aldermen of the Citie of London had knowledge of the Erles comynge, and that with a great power, and they themselues not knowynge whether he came as the kinges friend or no: they shut the Gates agaynst the foeryders: and at that tyme neyther was the king nor any of his counsaile in the Citie, nor nere thereunto. Wherefore the Maior and Aldermen went to the Legate, and required his counsaile whether they should suffer the Erle to enter the Citie or not? And the Legate answered that he thought they might let him come in, for he knewe well that he was the kinges true subiect and friend.

And immediately after this talke, a messenger came from the Erle to the Maior, willyng to haue licence to passe through the Citie into Southwarke, where he entended to lodge him and his people, which was graunted vnto him: and so the Erle passed through the Citie, and was lodged in Southwarke. To whome came shortly after by Southwarke syde sir John Ciuile with a great companie.

The Maior at that tyme caused the Gate of the brydge to be shut, and caused a certein number of armed men to watch it, as wel by day as by night, and so did he all the Citie through. And sodeinly the Legate and the Erle agreed so well together, that the Erle by his aduice was suffered, with a certeine of his people to be lodged within the Citie of London. By reason whereof he dayly drew more and more of his people into the Citie, so that at the last many thinges were ordered by him, and many of the Commons tooke hys part agaynst the Maior and Aldermen.

And shortly after he gathered vnto him such a courage and auctoritie, that he tooke the keyes of the brydge, and of the Gates, from the officers of the Citie, and deliuered them to such as pleased him, and receyued into the Citie many of the disenherited persons, and gaue to them free libertie to passe the brydge by all houres of the day and night.

The Maior of this sent worde to the king, who then was gatherynge of his power in Norffolke, and made hastie speede towardes London. And in the meane while the Erle with his companie made Bulwarkes and Barbicanes betwene the Tower and the Citie, and cast ditches and trenches in some places of the Citie, and fortifyed it wonderfully.

Then a great number of the sober and graue Citizens feared a newe Insurrection, and therefore aduoyded the Citie as secretly as they might, whose goodes the Erle seized to his owne vse, or suffered his men to spoyle them at their awne pleasure. And now the rude Commons had quite forgotten theyr great and late affliction and punishment: and as men desperate and without the feare of God, or obedience to their Prince, nor yet respectynge nor regardynge any thing: at all their awne weales and states, neyther the weales of their householdes, as their wiues, children, or friendes, toke certeyne of the Aldermen and cast them in prison, and sequestred their goodes, and spoyle a great part thereof. And in this their rage and fury, they ran to the Guildhall, and there did chose for their Maior or Custos of the Citie, Sir Richard Culworth knight, and for Bailifes, Robert Lynnton, and Roger Marshall, and discharged the olde Maior and Shirifes. And after this, then went they vnto Newgate, Ludgate, and Creplegate, and all other prisons within the Citie, where they discharged and set at libertie all that were emprisoned for any matter touchyng the Barons warre before passed.

Nowe, the Legate beholdyng all this businesse, and well consideryng this rebellion and discorde, repented him of his former counsaile geuen to the Maior: and for that he sawe that he could not reforme the Erle of his error, he threathned him with the censures of the Church, and to accurse him as the disenherited were. And forthwith he commaunded the deuine seruice, to be sayde without note, and the Church dozes to be shut in the tyme of the seruice doyng, and that no Bell were rong vnto the sayde seruice: And all because that the disenherited which stood accursed shoulde not enter into the Churches to here the deuine seruice.

And shortly after Easter the king came to him, thre miles from London, and he himselfe was lodged in the Abbey of White Monkes in Stratford: and sone after the Legate came thether vnto him, and was lodged also in the same Abbey, where for streightnesse of lodging, his horse & Mules were set in the Cloyster of the same Abbey. Then the kinges hostes made dayly assaultes, and Gunnes and other ordinaunce were shot into the Citie, which did little or no hurte at all, the towne was so strongly fortifyed.

And in this tyme the Legate on the one part, and the king of Romaynes on the other part, for alliaunce that was betwene him and the Erle of Gloucester, and chiefly for the aduoyding of spillyng and sheddyng of blood, laboured so to the king, that a reformation of peace was spoken of. And during the tyme of the entreatie, the Souldiours that lay in Southwarke, committed many robberyes in Southcrey, and many other places, and roued ouer vnto Westminster, and spoyled there the kinges Palace, and deuoured hys Wine, and brake the Glasse of the Windows, and made a common spoyle of all that belonged to the sayde Palatce, and they did the like also in sundrie places of London. And of that company of Rouers there were foure taken that had the cognisaunce of the Erle of Darby, whose handes the Erle caused to be cut off, and legges to be bound, and them to be put into a sacke, and then to be cast into the Thames and drowned. And about the .xj. day of June next folowynge, a peace betwene the King and the Erle of Gloucester was concluded.

And so soone as the former peace was concluded, the Erle remoued out the Citie, and was lodged againe in Southwarke: and the king entered the Citie the Sondag before Midsummer day. And forthwith the kinges Proclamation was made through the Citie of the peace betwene the king and the Erle. And afterwarde was graunted to the disenherited persons that they shoulde haue .xj. dayes after to shift for themselves, that is to say, eyther to aduoyde vnto such places, where they might be in some suretie, or else to agree to the former composition made by the Legate, and to pay the fift part of the stint of their landes, certeyne persons excepted, as before is reherced. And as touchyng the Erle, and such other as before were not disherited, and also the Citizens of London to be clerely pardoned and forgiven. And forthwith were restored to their offices Alleyn Sowche for Maior, and Thomas Balyng, and Robert de Cornhill for Shyriefes, and the Aldermen that before were deposed, were agayne restored to their wardes and offices.

And on the Wednesday nexte folowynge, the Legate enterdicted all the City of London: which endured from .viij. of the clock in the morning vntill thre of the clock the next day at after none, and then he discharged it, vpon the othe of two commoners which were sworn in the name of all the Citie, that the Citie shoulde stande to the ordynance and iudgement of holy church. But another Chronycle sayth, that this interdiction shoulde haue continued longer, if the stoutnesse of the Londoners had not beene, who helde the Legate so streyte, that they inforced him to withdrawe that sentence vpon the aforesayde condition.

Sone after, were all the Bullwarkes, Rampires and Barbicans that the Erle had made in and aboute the Citie pulled by, and the ditches filled, that no parte of them was sene. Now were the Citizens enforced agayne to sue for a newe pardon, and aunswere was made vnto them, that as yet they had not recompenced the king of Romaynes for the subuersion of his manor of Chisleworth which they bzent, and for the same he demaunded .viij. thousand markes: So that at the last, with great labour and friendship, they agreed to geue vnto hym for amendes a thousande Markes to bee payde in two yeres.

And not long after the king receyued into his fauour Sir John Ciuple, Sir Nicholas de Segraue, Sir William Hermon, Sir Richard Gray, Sir John Fitz John, and Sir Gilbert de Lucye with other. And agreement was also made betwene sir Edward the kings sonne and the aforesayde Erle of Gloucester. And then also were all the fortresses and other defences which were made in Southwarke during the tyme of the lying of the Erle of Gloucesters armie there, and all other places adioyning to the same, pulled downe & destroyed, and the Erle and al other souldiours cleane aduoyded. And after all things were set in order and rest, except such as yet kept the Isle of Ely: the king roade to Shrewesbury where he taried a season, for to comon of matters betwene hym and Lewelyn or Llewellen Prince of Wales.

The king thus being at Shrewesbury, a writ was directed to Sir Alleyn Souche Maior of London, eyght dayes before Michelmas from the king, charging him that the Citizens shoulde not proceede to the election of newe Shyriefes vntill his comyng to London, but to suffer the oide to remaine and stande still in office.

This yere there happened a bariance betwene the companies of Goldsmithes and Taylors of London, which grewe to making of partes. So that with the Goldsmithes the felowship of the Taylers tooke parte, and with the Steyners. And by this occasion much people mightily gathered in the streetes in harnesse. And at length the sayde parties met to the number of fyue hundred, and they ranne together with suche violence, lence, that diuers were slaine, and many wounded, whereupon an outcrie was made, so that the Shrieues with the helpe of other Citizens came vnto the ende of the fray, and tooke diuers of them, and sent them to sundrie prisons: and the morowe after such inquisition and searche was made, that the greatest part of the principalles and causers of this fray were taken, and put in ward. Then shortly after, Sessions were kept at Newgate by the Maior and Laurence de Broke Justice, and other, where at that tyme was arreigned of felony. xxx. of the sayde persons, whereof. xiiij. were condemned and hanged. And for that one Godfray of Beuerley did helpe to arme one of the sayde persons, he was also cast among the other.

Execution.

The Lent next folowynge, the king beyng at Westminster, commaunded the Maior of London to present vnto him sixe persons, such as were able to be Shirifes. Of the which sixe so presented, the king chose two to be Shirifes, that is to say, William de Durham, and Walter Henry, and then caused them to be swozne, that they should gather the profites of the Citie, and to geue a true accompt for the same befoze the Barons of the Exchequer.

The king chooseth the Shirifes of London.

And the. xxviij. day of July, the king discharged Sir Aleyn Solweche of the Mayraltie, and made Stephen Edworth Constable of the Tower, and Custos of the Citie of London. Of these rulers of the Citie, after the yere that Thomas Fitz Thomas was Maior, are diuerse opinions. For after some writers, from that yere, which was the. xlvij. yere of the reigne of king Henry, vntill the. lviij. yere of his reigne, in the which yere John Adrian Draper was Maior, were all Custos and Gardians of the Citie of London.

And at this time, by the mediation of Sir Edward the kinges sonne all suche disinheritid personnes as kept the Isle of Ely, were reconciled to the king, and all fortresses and defences by them there made, were plucked vp and destroyed.

And in the latter ende of this moneth of July, Octobone the Legate, after he had made many rules in the Church, not without great charge of diuines leuyed of the same, tooke his leaue of the king and roade toward the sea syde, with great treasure, and so returned in processe of tyme to Rome. Where after Innocent the fift, in the yere of our Lorde a thousand two hundredeth seuentie sixe, he was chosen and created Pope of Rome, and then named Adrian the fift, and dyed within fiftie dayes after his election.

At this tyme also, because many of the Citizens of London (for the great imposition and charge that they were set at, toward the fine of. xx. thousand marke afozenamed, with other charges) boyded the Citie, with their householdes and goodes, and inhabited themselues in diuerse places of the realme, thinkyng thereby to be acquitted of the sayd cessyng or charge: The other of the sayde Citie which remayned, made instant sute and labour to the King, that all such as had for the sayd cause boyded their goodes out of the Citie, should be distreyned by the Shirife of that Shire where they then dwelled, and forced to paye all suche summes of money, as they befoze were sessed at, which sute they obteyned of the king.

Citizens forced to see the Citie.

The fine Citizens that befoze were imprisoned in Windsoze, were nowe againe deliuered.

And in the Moneth of September folowynge, the afozenamed fine Citizens, which had remayned prisoners in the Tower of Windsoze, as befoze is mentioned in the. xlviii. yere, made at this tyme their ende with Sir Edward the kinges sonne for great summes of money, and so were deliuered.

In this season was a great and an extreme frost, and began at S. Andrewes day, and continued vntill Candlemas folowing, & the Thames was so frozen, that men, horse, and cart went safely ouer betwene London and Westminster. But a little after the breakyng bp of the sayd frost, there fell such an abundance of raine, that the Thames rose so high, that the like thereof had not bene seene by any man then luyng. Whereof ensued much harme about London, for the Sellers by the Water syde were all drowned, and in their great plentie of Marchandise perished and was lost.

A great frost.

And this yere the king gaue to Sir Edward his sonne the rule of the Citie of London, with all reuenues and profites to the same in any wise being longyng. After which gift, the sayd Sir Edward made Sir Hugh the sonne of Othon Constable of the Tower, and Custos of the Citie.

The Citie of London gaue to prince Edward the kinges eldest sonne.

And the. ix. day of Aprill folowynge, Sir Edmond the kinges other sonne (surnamed Crouchbacke) maryed at Westminster the daughter of the Erle of Aumarle: For solemnitie whereof, the king kept in the great Hall there an honourable feast the Sondag folowynge.

Edmonde Crouchbacke the kinges second sonne.

The last day of Aprill folowynge, Sir Edward the kinges sonne, commaunded the Citizens of London to present vnto him sixe persons able to be Shirifes of London. Of the which he admitted to that office, William de Hadistoke, and Anketyll de Aluerne, and swore them to be accomptantes as their predecessors were.

At these dayes a newe custome or toll was vsed to be payed by the Citizens of London vnto the king: which toll Sir Edward had then letten to ferme to a Marchant straunger for. xx. marke a yere. Wherefore the Citizens not willyng to be vnder the rule of a straunger, made great sute vnto the sayd Sir Edward, and lastly agreed with him to buy the same toll fee, for the summe of two hundredeth marke.

A newe toll taxed vpon the Citizens.

And in the ende of this yere, the king had graunted vnto him toward his boyage purposed into the holy land, the twentieth penny of every mannes substance moueable throughtout his land of the lay see: And of the spiritualty thre dimes to be leuyed in thre yeres.

A great sum of money graunted to the king for his boyage toward Ierusalem.

And this yere the king of Romaines concluded a couenaunt with Sir Gilbert de Clare, Erle of Gloucester, for a boyage to be taken into the holpe lande, by the sayde Erle for the king. For the which boyage, the sayde Erle should haue of the king toward his charges, viij. thousand markes, and at the takyng of his shippyng other foure thousand markes, and to be ready by the first day of May next folowing: And if the Erle were not ready at the sea syde at that day with his company to take shippyng, he should then forfeite to the king two thousand markes. For suretie whereof, the sayde Erle should deliuer into the kinges possession his Castell of Henleger standyng vpon the Marches of Wales: But this came after to no purpose, but the cause why is not shewed. But that Journey was afterward performed by Sir Edward the kinges sonne, as after shall appere.

In this meane while, the Citizens of London so well pleased and contented Sir Edward the kinges sonnes minde, that he so laboured vnto the kinges grace for them, that he obteyned of the king their Charter in suche wise newly to be confirmed vnto them, that they should after their auncient liberties chose of themselues a Maior, and two Shirifes, and the sayde

Shirifes to haue the offices thereunto belongyng to farme. After which confirmation thus graunted and passed by the kinges broade seale: The Citizens vpon the. xiiij. day of July next folowynge, assembled themselues at the Guildhall, and there did choose for their Maior John Adrian Draper, and for their Shirifes, Walter Potter, and John Caylor. And within two daies next folowynge Sir Edward beyng present, they presented them to the king at Westminster, where they were admitted and swoyne, and then was Sir Hugh of Othon discharged of the rule of the Citie.

Then the Citizens of their free will gaue vnto the king an hundredth marke, and to Sir Edward five hundredth marke, which gift the king well accepted. And sone after they receyued their Charter of confirmation bearyng date the. xxj. day of July and the. lb. yere of the reigne of the king.

And by reason the former couenant and agreement that was made betwene the king and the Erle of Gloucester tooke none effect, therefore Sir Edward tooke vpon him the kings Crosse: To whom the king gaue all the money that was graunted of the lay fee, as before is shewed, and then he tooke shipping at Douer the. xx. day of August, and so sayled to Burdeaur, with his wife accompanied with many noble personages.

And because Leuois king of Fraunce was gone before Sir Edward came, therefore he taried but a little while at Burdeaur, and after went with his foresayde companie toward the Citie of Thunys, where the French king was. But before he could come thether, the French king was deade, and a peace concluded betwene Philip his sonne, and the king of Thunys. Wherefore Sir Edward entending to greue the enemyes of God, accompanied with some knightes of Fraunce that entended the same, tooke their leaue of the French kyng, and of Sir Charles his hncle then kyng of Sicile, and sayled further into the holy land, and arriued at a Porte of Acrie or Acon. For at that daye there was no mo Cities of the holy lande in the possession of the Christians but the cities of Acon and Tyre, with certeine Castels wherunto the Christians fled often for succour against the Sarazens.

When Sir Edward was come to Acon, the Christian knyghtes receyued him with great honour and gladnesse, & lodged him in theyr best maner: Where he taried by the space of a yere after, as saith the French Chronicle. And it was not long after that he came thether, but that the Souldane of Surrey came thether also (the which had wonne all the Countreies there aboutes) with a great power of Sarazens, and assaulted the Citie strongly and fiercely: But Sir Edward with the ayde of Christen men, bare him so knightly and valyantly, that he defended both the Cities and the Castelles to the same belongyng, and the territories of the same, so that the Souldane for all his great multitude and power gate there little honour: Notwithstanding, he had in his host, as sayth the French Chronicle, aboue an hundredth thousand Sarazens. And the sayd Chronicle affirmeth mozeouer, that Sir Edward in his pollicies, and manfull actes so honourably behaued himselfe, that he neuer did the like act all his lyfe folowynge, although he did afterward many honourable deedes, but yet none comparable to those that he did there: By reason whereof, his name among the Infidelles was had in memozy many yeres after.

Of the honour of this martiall and valiaunt knight, I haue made the lenger reherfall, because I finde the same wytnessed of the Frenchmen, the which I knowe well, there must be some great and notable matter that moueth them when they write any thing in the fauour and commendation of any English Prince, or of any thing done by the nation.

Then this noble Prince being thus in Acon, and daylie putting the Souldane and the Sarazens to shame and great dammages, they seyng that they might not preuaile against hym by strength of battaile, cast howe they might destroy him by treason, and sent vnto him a Sarazen in the name of a Messenger, the which in tellyng of his feyned message, wounded him with a knife enuened, of the which wound he laye long before he were thereof cured and healed. But after confession made by the Sarazens of all hys compassed treason, he was put vnto most cruell death.

About this time, the Steeple of S. Mary Bow Church in Cheape in London fell doونه and slue both men, women, and childzen.

This yere the king helde his Parliament in Nouember at Westminster, in the which the Marchauntes of London and of other partes of the Realme, exhibited a Byll of complaint agaynst the Countesse of Flaundrys, for that shee had taken from them certayne goodes amountyng to a great summe. Upon which complaynt, the king sent vnto her to make restitution: But because she made none, the king therefore commaunded, that all men which were bozne in those parts and now being resident in England, should be arrested, and they and their goodes to be put vnder sure and safe keeping. By occasion whereof she at the length sent ouer Ambassadors, and besought the king that his Merchants might vse their entercourse into Flaundrys, as they before tyme had done, and all suche losses as before tyme they had susteyned, should be recompensed. And shortly after an amitie and friendship betwene the king and hir was concluded.

In the later ende of thys yere dyed Richard king of Almayne and Erle of Cornewall, brother to the king, and was buried at Hailes, an Abbey of white Monkes in Gloucestershire, which before he had builded.

And in thys yere the Monasterie of the Trinitie in the City of Norwiche, was consumed with fyre, by reason of a fray made betwecne the seruantes of the Abbey, and certayne Citizens of the Cytie, which grew to a great skirmish: For the Priour of the same, and others Monkes prouyded souldiours, and helde the Belfraye and the Church by force of armes, & threwe out stones and dartes, and shot many arrowes, by reason whereof, manye of the Cobone were both wounded and slayne: which brought the commons and yong men into such a furie and madnesse, that they fyled the Gates, and after forced the fyre with Reede and drie Wood, that the Church wyth the Bookes and all other ornaments of the same, and all houses of office belonging to the same Abbey, were cleane brent and threbone doونه, so that nothing was preserued, except it were a little Chapell.

When tydings of thys riot came to the kings knowledge, he was therewith greatly displeased and offended, so that he rood thether in hast, and there commaunded questes to be charged, both of knightes and Squires that dwelled in the Countreie aboute, and to endite all such persons as were the occasioners and doers of that deede. By reason of which enquirie, there were condemned and iudged. xxx. yong men of the Towne, the which were after drawne

King Henry the third died

Nowe approached the ende, that all flethe is bozne vnto, which is death, of the which nothing is more certeyne to all persons, though the day and houre is most vncerteine. At this tyme the king sickened, and forced to kepe his bed at Westminster, called before him Sir Gilbert Clare Erle of Gloucester: and caused him to be newly sworne to kepe the peace of the lande, to the behoofe of Edward his sonne, and then dyed the .xxij. day of November, when he had reigned. lvi. yeres, and .xxvij. dayes, leauyng after him Sir Edward before named for his heyre, and Edmond Crouchbacke his sonnes, and is burped at Westminster.

Edward the first of that name, and sonne of king Henry the third, surnamed Longshanke, beyng of the age of .xxxv. yeres, began his reigne ouer Englande the .xxij. day of the moneth of Nouember, and in the yere of oure Lozde. M. CC. lxxij.

This Edward as before is shewed in the lb. yere of his fathers reigne, was in the holpe land when his father dyed, and there did manye notable feates of warre as is aforesayd. And while he was so exercised, tidynge was brought vnto him that his father was dead: wherefore in all hast, he sped him into England, and came to London the seconde day of August, and was crooned at Westminster, with Alianor his wife sister vnto the king of Spaigne, the .xiiij. day of December folowynge of Robert Archebishop of Cauntorbury, which was in the beginnyng of the second yere of his reigne. At his Coronation were present the king of Scottes, and John Erle of Briten, with theyr wyues the kinges sisters which liued short while after. Mathew of Westminster.

The next day after his Coronation, the Scottishe king aforesayde dyd homage vnto him for the realme of Scotland.

In the beginnyng of the reigne of this king Edward the first, the busie Citizens of London attempted to haue made a Maior as they woulde, but they were by the discreter number preuented: Notwithstandyng in the yere folowynge their purpose tooke more effect.

As before is sayde in the moneth of August, the King came to London, where he was ioyfully receyued of the Citizens, and with all honour conueyed ueyed to Westminster, where he kept great obseruaunces for his father a certeyne of tyme after.

Nowe the lewde purpose which the yere passed was in the light Citizens, began to breake forth: For where Phillip le Taylor who before had bene chosen Maior of London, shoulde vpon the day of Simon and Jude haue bene placed in the Chayze of the Gyldhall as the maner is, dyuerse of the Citizens put him besyde the Chayze, and put therein Walter Heruy, that was Maior the yere before. By reason whereof, great rumor and grudge arose among the Citizens: the matter whereof was after brought before the king, who heeryng the reasons of both partes, forsomuche as he could not agree them, he put both the sayd Sir Walter, and the sayd Phillip asyde, and did choose Henry Frowike for Custos of the Citie, and so continued vntill Candelmasse next after. At which time by discrete & wise peaceable meanes, the afozenamed Sir Walter Haruie was set in aucthoritie as Maior, and so continued the whole yere.

At this time Lewlyn, or Lluellen Prince of Wales rebelled, and king Edward after the solempnitie of his Coronation gathered a great power together, and went toward Wales, and subdued the sayd Lewlyn.

The cause of this rebellion (saith Polidore) was for that the same Llewelyn being desyrous to make a styre and businesse in England, and ioyning in amitie with the french king, sent messengers to king Phillip of fraunce to desyre his good will that he might mary Ladie Alianor the daughter of Simon Mountfort Erle of Leycester, which then was a banished woman in fraunce, as was her mother also, and Henry her brother. The which request of his the king graunted, and so sent the Damosell vnto him by her sayd brother Henry. The which Alianor with her brother were both taken by the English fleete, when they were approached nere vnto Wales about Bristow, and were brought vnto king Edward. Nowe when Prince Lluellen vnderstood this, he was so moued with the fact, that he streight wayes armed himselfe, and so makyng a roade into the marches of Englande, wasted and destroyed the Countrie as he went, and slue all that he met with. For repression of the which his outrage and fury, and to relieue his distressed subiects there, the king reysed a puyssaunt armie, and at the length, when the Prince sawe what daunger he was in, and how lyke he was to be discomfited, he submitted and yelded himselfe to his mercy, who vpon the sayd submission pardoned him, and with much ado deliuered him the sayd Ladie that was sent him (her birginitie remaynyng vnsported) whome he shortly after maryed. But Mathew of Westminster sayth, that he gaue the king afoze hand in the name of a fine for his transgression fiftie thousande markes, and bound himselfe to pay yerely in the kinges Exchequer, a thousand markes moze. And sone after he returned and ordeyned certeyne newe lawes for the wealth of the Realme, which are to long here to reherse. Among the which one was that Bakers makyng bread lackyng the weight assigned, after the price of corne, shoulde first be punished by losse of bread, and the second tyme by emprisonment, and lastly by the correction of the Dilloze: And Milners for stealyng of corne, to be punished by the Comberell: And for the execution hereof, he gaue aucthoritie, to all Maiors, Bailiffes, and other officers through England, but specially to the Maior of London. He made a law also the same time against the the excessive taking of Usurie by the Jewes, and that they should weare a certeine cognisaunce vpon their vppermost garment, whereby they should be knowne from Christians.

Parliament.

Lewlyn Prince of Wales again rebelled and was subdued

And this yere the king confirmed the liberties of the Citie of London, and graunted them some newe.

And at this time he helde his great Court of Parliament at Westminster, and summoned Lewlyn Prince of Wales to come to the same, the which presumptuously he denied. Wherefore then shortly after he entered againe into Wales, and so warred vpon the sayd Lewlyn, that he was constrained to submit himselfe to the kinges graces mercie, and obteyned it with great difficultie, as is beforesayd.

After this king Edward builded the Castell of flint, and strengthened the Castell of Rutland and other, with Englishe men, to kepe the Welshmen in due obedience, and so returned to London.

For the which, and for making of assemblies of the Commons that faouered him in his euill dedes, he was deposed of his Aldermanship and counsaile of the Citie for euer, and found suretie of xij. honest persons that he should be of good abearyng for keeping of the kinges peace within the Citie, for terme of his life.

In this tyme the king had in his court one David brother vnto Lewlyn Prince of Wales, which David did vnto the king suche pleasaunt seruice that the king bare him such loue and fauour that he gaue him the Lordship of Froddesham in Cheshire, but afterwarde, it did right well appere, that he was but a Trayterous spie to geue his brother Lewlyn warning and knowledge, of all the kings will and minde.

The coyne soze clipped.

And in thys tyme a Parliament was holden at London, chiefly for the reformation of the kings coyne which then was soze clipped, by reason wherof, the same was much diminished and empayred.

And in the time of thys Parliament, manye of the Jewes in London, and other places of the Realme were taken and put in prison for clipping of Money, and in December following, dyuers enquestes were charged in London to enquire of the sayde Jewes and other that had so blemished the kings coyne. By the which enquestes the Jewes of the Citie, with dyuers Goldsmithes that kept exchange of Siluer were endicted. And shortly after Candlemas, the Mayor and Iustices of the lande, sat at London, where befoze foze them was cast CCxxxvij. persons. Of the which were but three Englishe men, and all the rest were Jewes, and suche as came of Jewes borne in this Realme or else where, who were all at sundrie places & tymes put to execution.

A great execution of Jewes.

And this yere beganne the foundation of the black fryers beside Ludgate and of Baynardes Castell. And the same yere also was the Towne of Boston in Lincolneshire, greatly blemished with fyze.

And at thys tyme the king caused the half peny and farthing to be coyned of Siluer: where befoze, other coyne of mettall went among the people, to their great noyaunce. But the lack of the afozesayde coyne in these oure dayes are a great losse and hinderaunce to the pouertie of thys Realme. And in the winter of thys yere, there fell so great snow, that thereof ensued much harne.

At thys tyme David the brother of Lewlyn Prince of Wales (of whom befoze you haue heard) which dwelled in the kings court, to know the kings Counsaile, and thereof to informe hys brother: when he had that he wanted for, he secretly gate him into Wales to his brother, & prouoked him against the king in all that he might: and caused hym to victuall and man certaine Castelles within Wales, and specially the Castell of Swandon, wherein he much trusted, and gathered vnto him the Welshmen, by giftes and other meanes, so that he was verie strong.

David brother of Lewlyn fled into Wales.

Whereof, when the king was informed, he woulde therevnto geue no credite, vntill he had sent thether, and receyued from thence the certaintie. But for so much as winter was then toward, he might not as then go thether with any power, and therefore he prouyded to sende men and victualles to strengthen the Castels of Flynt and Rutlande, and other holdes which he there had, and made prouision to warre vpon them in the beginning of the next spring.

But the king yet hearing more and more of the vnkedfastnesse of the welshmen, and to keepe them from the anoyeng of his holdes, sent thether the Erles of Northumberlande and Surrey with a lustie Crewe of souldiours, and with them went Sir Roger Clifford, Sir Wylliam Lyndsey, Sir Richard Tanny, and many other knightes and Esquires. The which with great courage entered Wales, and made with the Welshmen manye skirmishes vntill at the last vpon Palme Sunday, David with a great power of Welshmen, met with the sayde Lordes and knightes at a place neere to a Towne called Hauerden, where betwene them was a soze fight, but in the end the losse fell to the Englishe men, for there were slaine Sir Wylliam Lyndsey, Sir Richard Tanny with manye other, and Sir Roger Clifford was taken.

And his brother in that tyme warred and occupped the landes of Sir Edmond Mortimer, and wan the towne called Llanmawer, and threwe the Welshes thereof downe to the ground. This towne also is called Abilwith, or rather Oswitrey. It was not long after or the brute of the ouerthrowe of the Englishe men came vnto the towne, wherefoze he sped him the faster thetherward.

And the thirde day of December next folowynge, was Lewlyn Prince of Wales slaine by sir Edmond Mortimer and his companie, and his head was sent vnto the king then being at Rutland: The which he sent vnto London, charging that it should be set vpon the Tower of London.

The king continuynge still in Wales, prosecuted David the brother of Lewlyn from towne to towne, so that at the last he was taken and brought to the king, about Michsommer, and there kept in ward, vntill the king had sped his businesse. And then had the king the whole countrie at his will, and gaue vnto Englishe Lordes, Townes in the middle of Wales, and deuyded the Countrie into shires, and ordeined there Shirifes & other officers in like maner as then was vsed in England, and as it is there now at this day. At Aberconow he made a strong Castell, where before there was a house of white Monkes: The which he remoued from thence, & prouided for them in another place called afterwarde Vale Royall. He also made then the Castell of Carnaruan, fast by Snowdon hill, and repayred againe the towne Alan Hatreuer aforesayd, which Lewlyn had beaten downe. Also he garnished the Castelles and holdes standynge vpon the sea syde with Englishe men, and made the Englischemen Lordes of the groundes belongynge to the same. And when the king had put the Countrie in good order, and all thinges were quieted, then about Michaelmasse he returned to Shrewesbury, where he helde a Parliament. In the tyme whereof the aforesayde Dauyd, as chiefe styrer & beginner of all this warre, was there demed to be drawn, hanged, and quartered, and so he was shortly after at the sayde towne of Shrewesbury, and his head sent to London, and set by the heade of his brother Lewlyn, or Lluelien.

Execution.

And this yere the king had his first sonne borne at the Castell of Carnaruan, while he was in Wales, and he was named Edward of Carnaruan, and was borne vpon the .xxv. day of Aprill, and was king after him.

In this yere also, there was found one Lawrence Docket a Citizen of London, deade and hanged in Saint Mary Boto Church in Chepe. For the which, enquities were made, and in the ende for that dede were attainted these .vij. persons folowynge, that is to say: Reignold of Lancaster, Robert Pynnot, Paule of Stepinhithe, Thomas Cordwayner, John Talanson, Thomas Russell, & Robert Scot, the which were all for that dede drawne & hanged. And a woman also for the same dede was brent. And Raufe Creppyn, Jourdan Goodchepe, Gilbert Clerke, and Geoffrey Clerke, were also attainted for the same cause: But they were repayed & sent vnto the Tower of London, where they remayned long after, but at the last were deliuered.

Lawrence be-

and the Erle of Lecester.

And in this yere the great Conduit in London, standing against the church called Arres in Chepe was first begon to be made. And in this yere began a strife or vnkindnes to kindle betwene the king, & the Erle of Lecester, or as some some wyte of Gloucester, which after turned to the great trouble of manye townes in Englande, but specially to the Citie of London, as after shall be shewed.

This yere the king seized the liberties of the Citie, and discharged the Maior that then was, who was named Gregoey Rokelley, and appoynted Stephen Sandwich to be Custos and Gardian of the Citie of London, and the same Sandwich continued in the office vntill Candlemas next folowynge, and then was he discharged, and Sir John Breton knight charged for the rest of the yere.

London a-

The cause of the displeasure that the king had against the Citie, as appereth by John Rastell, was that the sayd Gregoey Rokelley tooke certaine bribes of the Bakers, and suffered them to sell bread that lacked sixe or seven ounces in a penny loafe. But this appereth not to be a sufficient cause, for the offence of the Maior beyng but one man, to take away the liberties of the whole Citie who offended not: Wherefore I thinke there was some greater cause.

And in this yere was full finished and ended the newe woerke of the Church of Westminster, to the ende of the Quire, begon as before is shewed in the thirde yere of the thirde Henry: By which accompt, it should appere that the sayd Church was .lxxj. yeres in buildynge. But of the buildynge of this Church are sundrie opinions, as ye may se more at large in Fabian.

This yere the king helde his Parliament at Westminster, wherin were made the statutes called Additamenta Glocestrie, that is to say, additions of statutes ioyned to them which before were made at Gloucester.

Glocestrie.

Also it happened aboute this tyme that a Citizen of London named Thomas Biwelsdon, which in the tyme of the Barons warre before mentioned, had bene a great styrer by of the Commons of the Citie for to main- teine the Barons part against the king, was nowe newly accused, that he with other of euill disposition should make conuenticles and assemblies to the newe grieffe and disturbaunce of the Citie. Whereof report was made vnto the king, who remitted the inquirie thereof vnto Sir Raufe Sandwich then Custos of the Citie.

Then the sayd Thomas with other were put in sure and safe keeping vntill the matter were duely enquired of. After whiche inquisition made and found, report thereof was made vnto the king. Then the king sent downe a writ, and commaunded it to be proclaymed shortly after within the boundes of the Citie, whereof the effect was thus: That the sayde Thomas Biwelsdon, William de Heywood, Richard de Coundrys, Richard le Cofferre, Robert de Darby, Albyn de Darby, William Mayo Mercer, and John Ling Draper, with dyuerse other to the number of fiftie persons, should be banished out of the Citie for ever. And if any of the sayde fiftie persons were at that tyme of the Proclamation boyded the Citie for feare or otherwise, that they should remain & not retorne vnto the Citie vpon paine of losynge his life.

Citizens ban-

And in this tyme also, where of long tyme before the Marchant straungers comming with their Marchaundise were lodged within Citizens of the Citie of London, and solde all their wares by the procurement of hys hoste, for the which his sayde hoste had a certaine of every pounce. But now the sayde Marchauntes had so brought it to passe, that they might hier for themselves, themselves, houses to dwell in, and sellers for stowage of their wares, so that no Citizen had to doe with them: By meane wherof, they used many deceits, both in utteraunce of false wares, and also in weightes which they used in their awne houses, to the great hurte of the whole Realme of Englande. Wherefore, sodainely search was made, and their weightes founde and proved false. And besides that, all suche wares as they shoulde have weyed at the kings Beame, they weighed much thereof at their awne houses, to the hinderaunce of the kinges Custome, for which offences against them proved, to the number of twentieth of the sayde straungers were arrested, and sent to the Tower of London, and their weightes burnt and consumed in West Cheape of London. But in the ende the sayde Marchauntes were delivered by making of fine to the king of a thousande pounde, when of a long season they had suffered harde and vyle imprisonment.

Great summes of money was offered to the king to banish all the Jewes out of England.

King Edward did homage for the Duchie of Guyan.

Thys yere the commons of Englande offered vnto the king the fift part of their moiteables to haue the Jewes cleerly banished the realme of Englande: But the Jewes perceauing the intent of the commons, dyd present them, and gaue to the king great summes of money, but within fewe yeres after they were all exyled.

And in this yere about the beginning of May, the king sayled into France where he was most honorably receyued of Philip the French king, where king Edward did to him homage for the Duchye of Guyan. And after king Edward had remayned there awhile, he returned vnto Burdeaux, whither came vnto him certaine Ambassadors from the king of Spaine, with the which he helde long dalpaunce. Wherefore, of the French king he was suspected that he shoulde alpe himselfe with the king of Spayne agaynst the French king.

And this yere (sayeth Fabian) the Sommer was so hote that men dyed with very heat. And yet Come this yere was so plenteous that wheate was solde for thre shyllings and foure pence a quarter. But sayeth Baskell in hys Chronicle, the next yere followyng, by reason of vnseasonable and intemperate weather, there was a marvellous great dearth of Corne, for (sayth he) wheate was then worth. xvij. pence the Bushell, and after ward yere by yere it increased vntill it came to. xl. shyllings a quarter, which was a great price, because as he sayth, at that time. xx. pence of siluer weighed a full ounce, and it so continued vntill the reigne of king Henry the first, and then. xxx. pence made an ounce of Siluer. And in the tyme of king Edward the fourth. xl. pence made an ounce of siluer, and in the tyme of king Henry the. viij. three shyllinges and eight pence made an ounce of siluer, and now at this tyme being in the tenth yere of the reigne of our souereigne Lady Quene Elizabeth, fyve shyllinges maketh an ounce of siluer, but the standard of the ounce was euer at one stynt, although the baluation of coynes altered, as more plainly may appere in the statute made in the. li. yere of king Henry the thirde.

About this time fell a great variaunce betwene Sir Paine Tiptoft Wardein of certein Castelles in Wales, and a Welthe knight called Sir Rice ap Mordock, or Meridock, so that sundrie skirmishes were foughten betwene them, and men slaine on both sydes, to the great disturbance of all the Countrie.

But in the yere folowing the sayde Rice to be reuenged of the aboue named med Tiptoft, reysed a great multitude of Welshemen, and burnt and wasted diuerse townes in Wales, so that the king then being in Normandie sent vnto the Erie of Cornewall, then being the kings Lieutenant in England, that he should send thither an armie of knightes and good Souldiours to withstand the malice of the Welthe men. The which prepared shortly an armie, and went with them into the Borders of Northwales: where he with hys companie bare him so nobly and knightly, that in the ende the said Sir Rice was taken, and brought vnto Poerke, where he was after drowne, hanged, and quartered.

This yere and in the moneth of August, king Edward returned out of France, and came to the Citie of London, where he was honourably receyued by the Citizens, and conueyed to Westminster, where shortly after were brought vnto him many grieuous complaintes of diuerse of his Justices, as Sir Thomas Weyland, Adam Stretton, and other, whome the king caused to be strictly examined, and in the end they were found guilty of such trespasses and causes as they were accused of. Wherefore some of them were outlawed, and lost such goodes as they had, and the other punished by long imprisonment, and at the last deliuered by payng of great fines.

And in the ende of this yere, Alexander king of Scottes, as he was runnyng his horse, fell horse and man to the grounde and brake his necke, and died immediatly, by reason whereof there ensued great warre and trouble for the enheritance of that land. And at the last by the consent of king Edward, the crowne was geuen to John Bailioll, who after ward to gratifie the English nation, buylded a Colledge in Oxford nowe called Bailioll Colledge. But of this Bailioll, ye shall reade more in the. xxiii. yere of thys kinges reigne.

Also at this time, Sir Gilbert de Clare Erie of Gloucester married dame Johan daughter of king Edward. This was called Johan of Acres or Alcon, for she was borne at Acres or Alcon a Citie in Jewry when king Edward was there, vpon his great iourney. And shortly after, the Duke of Brabandes sonne, maryed Margaret the Sister of the sayde Johan.

This yere dyed Quene Alianor the kinges wife, & was buried at Westminster. This Gentelwoman as before is touched in the. xxxv. yere of king Henry the third, was sister vnto the king of Spaine: by whom king Edward had foure sonnes, that is to say, John, Henry, Alphons, and Edward, which Edward succeeded his father, for that the other thre dyed before their father. Also he had by her fyve daughters. The first Alianor, who was maryed vnto William Barre. The seconde Johan of Acres, or of Alcon, maryed vnto the Erie of Gloucester, the thirde Margaret, maryed to the Duke of Brabandes sonne, the fourth Mary, who was made a Nonne at Ambresbury, and the fift named Elizabeth, who was maryed vnto the Erie of Holland, and after his death she was maryed vnto Humfrey Boherum Erie of Herfort. mother vnto this king Edward, whose heart was buried at the Gray Fryers Church in London, which now is called Chyrlies parische Church, and her bodie at Ambrisbury in the house of Nonnes.

Waldore sayth that the king hauing continuall warres as well in France as also in Wales & Scotland had greatly consumed his treasure, & one Lord Mylliam Marchian, being then highe treasurer of Englande perceyving the great rythes that then were in churches & religious houses, so put the same into the kings head, & they were all brought into the kings treasury: but not without the great grudge and grieffe of the people who thought much that the king would meddle with those holy things as they then called them. Howbeit the king being in neede, dissembled the matter, & yet not so content, did shortly after as shal appere obteyne of the spiritualtie the moytie of one yeres of their spirituall promotions and lyuings. Notwithstanding afterward the king considering their great burdens and entending somewhat to gratefie them againe, promised to graunt them something for to pleasure them if they would aske it at his hands. The bishops after consultation thereof had, did desyre to haue the law set at libertie, touching landes geuen in Normain to religious houses. But the king not minded that way, gaue them aunswere that it lay not in him to breake the lawe without the consent of the bodye of the realme by whome it was made, and so with fayre wordes put them off for that tyme.

And now againe the king helde his high Court of Parliament at London, vnto the which came the king of Scottes and dyuers Lordes of that Prouynce. And after he had remayned there a certayne tyme, he was then conueyed by dyuers Lordes of thys Realme, a great way vpon his iourney toward his awne Countrie.

And here by the way for a note, it happened one called Richarde Bagle an officer of London to arrest a man, and leadyng hys prisoner to the Compter, there came thre men and rescued the sayde prisoner, and tooke him from the officer: The which were pursued and taken, and by iudgement & laboe then vsed, they were brought into west Cheape in London, and there had their right handes stricken of by the wrestles.

About the midst of September following the Erle of Barre a Frenchman married Alianour the kinges daughter in the Towne of Wiltowe.

Now agayne the welshemen begaune to stirre, by the prouocation of one Madock: wherof when the king was informed, he in all haste sped him vnto Westchester, and about the sixt day of December wanne from the sayde Madock the Isle called Anglesey, and buylded netwe the Castle and Citie of Bewmarise, and brought the bustedfast welshmen to a better order and stay: and then he caused the woodes of the Countrie to be helwen downe, wherein before tyme they vsed to hyde them, as a Cony doth in his hole: and he so repayred the Castels and strong holdes, and buylded some netwe, in such wise that he caused the welshmen to be quiet and to go about their awne thrist, against their willes, for by the strength of those Castelles, they were kept from their olde accustomed rauynes and stealings, and put so to execution by the Capitaines of the saide Castels that they fell vnto occupation, and to brenge and sellyng, and gathered treasure together, and began to lyue after the manner of Englishmen, so that moze and moze that Countrey grewe vnto restfulnesse and peace.

And

And this yere the frenchmen with a certaine of Shippes landed at Douer, and spoiled that Towne, and bzent a parte of it. In which skirmishe was slaine one Thomas of Douer.

This yere also as sayeth the french Chronicle, Charles de baloys brother vnto king Philip of Fraunce, was sent by his sayde brother into Gascoyne, with a great hoste. The which Charles layde his siege vnto the Castell of Ryon, wherein were at that tyme, Sir John Seynt John, and John of Briteyn, the which manfully and balauntly defended the aforesayde Castell against the frenchmen all that yere and moze.

Now in the. xiiij. yere of his reigne, for that he had great warres, as well with the french king as else where, he commaunded a newe subtedy to be leuyed vpon all Serplers of wolle goyng out of Englande, with all felles and Hydes in lyke maner. And besides this he required also of the Clergie all the money which they had graunted towarde the defence of the holpe lande, and the rather for that he hearde from the Court of Rome of the Popes maners, and therefore commaunded it to be brought into his treasure. And mozeouer, by a conuocation of the sayde Clergie, he had graunted vnto him towardes his warres, halfe of their spirituall and tempozall lands, beginning at twentie Marke benefice, and so ascending vppward, the which was not payde in one yere but by deuided porcions, it was payde in thre yeres next ensuyng. And of the lay fee or Tempozaltie of Englande, he had graunted vnto him the tenth penny of their moueables, the which was payde in two yeres next ensuyng.

This yere also was hanged drabone and quartered in London for treason done in Fraunce a knight called Sir Thomas Turbeuple.

Also about the time of Easter, when Charles de baloys as ye before haue heard, had lye long at the Castell of Ryon, and had no hope to wyne anye thing vpon the Englishmen but that daylie he lost the best of his knightes, he sent then for moze ayde and succour. At which tyme came vnto hym Sir Raufe dele Constable of Fraunce with a freshe company, and then assaulted it a newe. But when they had lye there a season, and sawe they preyayled nothing against their enemies, they went vnto a holde thereby named Boudency, and assaulted it, because the greatest parte of the souldiours there were Normans: and after viij. dayes, by appointment or otherwise, they gate the sayde holde, so that all the Englishmen had their libertie and goodes, and the Normanes were taken as prisoners, the which they brought after vnto the Castell of Ryon, and there in sight of the Souldiours, hanged all or thomozre parte of the sayde Normans. When the Gascoynes being within the Towne and Castell of Ryons, sawe their cosyns and Countreyemen hanged before their eyen, they cast in their minde, that it was done by treason of Englishmen, and that they woulde at length deale with them in lyke maner. By reason whereof, strife and barpaunce arose, betweene the Englishmen and the Gascoynes, so that eyther of them feared the treason of the other. For the which cause, Sir John Seynt John, and John of Briteyne, Sir Robert Cypstoft, Sir Raufe Canny, Sir Hugh Bardolph, and Sir Adam Cretyng, with dyuers other fled by Sea, & in that maner saved themselves: and soone after the sayde Towne and Castell of Ryons was wonne by the frenchmen, and the inhabitants of the same swozne vnto the french king.

Alexander Kinge of Scottes.

But here a little to returne back, ye haue befoze in the .xxiij. yere of thys king heard, that after the death of Alexander king of Scottes, many questions fell among the same Scottes, who by right of inheritaunce shoulde be king of that lande, considering that the sayde Alexander, had left after hym three daughters the which in the lyfe of their father were married. The first to Sir John Bapliol, the second to Robert le Bruze, and the thirde to one named Hastings. Many of the Lordes of Scotland woulde haue crowned Sir John Bapliol, by reason that he married the eldest daughter: But the friendes of Robert le Bruze withstoode it with all their power: And other there were, that helde with Hastings, so that after long strife and great variance the matter was brought befoze king Edwarde, as chiefe Lorde and Soueraigne of that lande, and all those that made clayme to the Crowne of Scotlande promised to abyde and stande vnto suche determination & iudgement, as king Edward should set therein. Then king Edwarde, to the ende that the Scottes should knowe perfetely, that the king of Englande ought of right to be their chiefe head and soueraigne, shewed vnto them suche olde wytyngs, as he a little befoze had caused to be searched & founde out, in the which it was conteyned by the authoritie of olde Chronickers and wyters, as Marianus the Scot, Wylliam of Walmesburie, Roger of Hunteyngdon and other, that in the yere of our Lorde nine hundred and twentie, king Edward the elder made subiect vnto hym the kings of Combrys and of Scottes. And in the nine hundred .xxi. yere the aforesayde Scottes and Combrys, chose the sayde Edwarde the elder to be their chiefe Lorde and patrone. And in the yere of our Lorde nine hundred. .xxvi. Athelstane then king of England subdued Constantine then king of Scottes with the Northumbres, and receyued of them againe othe and homage. And it is further founde in the sayde Chronicles, that Edgar ouercame Alphunius the sonne of Kyndus king of Scottes, and receyued of hym fealtie and homage, and helde him vnder his oberfaunce, as he had done his father Kyndus befoze tyme. Moreover it is there further witnessed, that Canutus in the .xvi. yere of his reigne subdued Malcolyn then king of Scottes, and receaued of him fealtie and homage. Furthermore, Wylliam Conquerour in the .vi. yere of his reigne subdued Malcolyne king of Scotlande, the which befoze tyme had receyued the sayde kingdome of the gift of Edward king and confessor. And Wylliam Rufus or Wylliam the Red, did in likewise to the sayde Malcolyn, and vnto his two sonnes that reigned in Scotlande the one after the other. And also Dauid king of Scottes did homage vnto Stephen then king of England. And Wylliam king of Scottes did homage vnto Henry the thirde at the time of his coronation, and after came vnto hys father Henry the seconde, when the aforesayde Henry was dead in Normandy and made his homage to him againe. This Henry that was sonne vnto Henry the second, is of many wyters named Henry the thirde, because he was the thirde king that was crowned of that name: But because he dyed befoze his father, his deedes be little spoken of, so that of some wyters he is nothing minded. And it followeth in the storie, how that Alexander king of Scots in the .xxxv. yere of Henry the thirde or sonne of king John, maryed at Porke Margaret the daughter of the sayde Henry, and did vnto him homage for the Realme of Scotlande, and bounde him and hys heyres kings of Scotland by his letters patents to be true vnto the sayde Henry, and vnto his heyres kinges of Englande lyke as befoze Wylliam king of Scottes had bounde himselfe vnto the seconde Henry, as befoze in the .xxi. yere of his reigne is moze manifestly shewed. And moze, there was shewed vnto them the Popes Bulles, the which were sent befoze time into Scotlande, by auctoritie whereof, the kinges of Scotlande were accursed because they woulde not be obedient to their Lordes kinges of Englande.

¶ When all these presentes were scene by the Scottes, a day was assigned of meetyng at Nozham in the marches betwene England and Scotland, whether vnto the king came, & al the nobles and chiefe rulers of Scotland. And there and then also the king helde his high Court of Parliament, where openly in the presence of all the nobilitie of Scotland who were called specially thether, the king himselfe in the Churche of Nozham declared that the right of the Dominion and superioritie of the realme of Scotlande doth iustly apperteigne and belong vnto the Crowne of England, and therefore required of them to acknowledge and confesse the same, protestyng and making his bowe that he would defende the same his right with the aduenture of the losse of his life, and further he required of them that they would enter into bond, not onely to acknowledge him their chiefe and supreme Lorde, but also to abyde his sentence, order and iudgement, in appoyntyng and playng such a person to reigne ouer them, as their king, as should by his iudgement be thought to haue most right therevnto: But the Scottes not willyng to be bound, vnto many excuses, but at the last they consented: Where vpon all the Nobilitie of Scotland, and namely all those that made claime to the crowne, entered into bond, the tenor whereof foloweth, beyng made letters patentes, wherevnto were fixed their severall seales.

¶ All men that shall eyther see or heere these presentes, Florence Erle of Holland, Robert Bruze Lorde of Walley Androw, John Baplioll Lorde of Galloway, John Hastings Lorde of Aberganenny, John Comynes Lorde of Badenagh, Patrike of Dunbarre Erle of March, John Welly deputie for his father, Nicholas of Sules, William of Roos, sendeth gretyng in the Lord: Where as we beleue and thinke that we haue a right and title to the kingdome of Scotland, and our entent and meanyng is to declare, chalenge, and trie the same right and title befoze him which hath the superiour power, iurisdiction and auctoritie to debate and examine the same: And the noble prince Lord Edward by the grace of God king of England hath informed us by good and sufficient reasons, that the same belögeth to him, & that he ought to haue the superiour dominion of the kingdome of Scotlande, and the auctoritie to here, examine, and decyde our right and title. We of our awone proper accorde, not beyng compelled or enforced therevnto, will, and graunt to receyue our ryght and title befoze him as superiour Lorde of the land. Moreover we will and promise to obserue and holde his deede firme and stable: And that he shall haue and enioy the kingdome, to whome the better ryght and title shall befoze him be tryed and iudged. In witness whereof, we vnto these wytynges haue put our Seales, dated at Nozham the thirde day after the Ascension of our Lorde. 1291.

¶ Now after the Lordes of Scotland had acknowledged the superiority of Dominion of Scotland to apperteyne to the king of Englande, and had submitted themselves to receive and abide his determination and judgement: Then the king demanded of them the possession of their Castles, and of the whole realme of Scotland, that he might be peaceably sealed in his right of superiority and dominion mentioned in their former letters, to the intent the same might clerely appere vnto the worlde. And forthwith, they graunted vnto the kunges petition, and therevpon made their letters in French, and signed and sealed the same in maner and forme folowynge.

The letters of seysyn made by the Lordes of Scotlande vnto King Edward.

All men that shall see or heere these presents, Florence Erle of Holland, Robert Bruce Lorde of Wally Androw, John Bailioll Lorde of Gallo-way, John Hastings Lorde of Aberganenny, John Comyns Lorde of Badenagh, Patrike of Dunbarre Erle of March, John Welsy Deputie for his father, Nicholas Sules, and William of Roos sende gretyng in our Lorde: Forasmuch as we of our good will and common assent, without all compulsion haue yeldd and graunted vnto the noble Prince Lorde Edward, by the grace of God king of England, that he as the superior Lorde of the land of Scotlande hath power to heere, examine, and decyde our chalenges and lites which we entende to declare and proue for the receyving of our ryght and title before him as the superior Lord of the land: promisyng moreouer that we will obserue firme and stable whatsoeuer he iudgeth or determineth, and that he shall obteyne the kingdome of Scotland, whose title shall before him be proued and iudged to be most lawfull: But forasmuch as the said king can neyther make nor accomplishe his examination without iudgement, neyther ought iudgement to be without execution, nor can he duely make execution without the possession and seysyn of the sayde lande and Castles of the same: We therefore will, permit, and graunt, that he as the superior Lorde shall haue for the accomplishyng and perfourmance of the premisses, the seysyn of the whole land of Scotlande, and Castles of the same, vntill suche tyme as the matter be determined betwene them, who make claime and challenge the right to be king of Scotland: But yet vpon this condicion, that before the sayde king Edward haue the seysyn, he make good and sufficient assurance vnto the sutors, wardynes and communalte of the kingdome of Scotland, for the restitution and redeliuerie to them of the kingdome, with all the royaltie, dignitie, and dominion, liberties, customes, rightes, lawes, bles, possessions, and all what soeuer therevnto apperteyne, in the same state wherein they were at the tyme of seysyn deliuered to hym: And he shall deliuer it vnto him to whome by right it shall be due, according to his royall iudgement: Sauyng vnto the king of England the homage of him that shall be king. And this restitution shall be made within two monethes after the tyme that this title shall be discussed, ratified and established: The reuenues of the aforesayd land in the meane tyme shall be receyued and layd bp in safe custodie, and shall be well kept by the handes of the treasurer of Scotlande that now is, and his whom herevnto the king of England shall assigne, & this to be done vnder their scales, sauynge a reasonable sustentation of the lande, Castles, and ministers of the kingdome. In witnesse of all the premisses, we haue vnto these writynges put our scales, dated at Porham the Wednesday next ensuyng the Ascension of our Lorde. 1291.

These two aforesaid letters, the king caused sundry copies of them to be made, & sent the same vnder his priuy seale to diuerse Abbeyes in the realme, of England in the .xv. yere of his reigne, that they might there be recorded for perpetuall memory, & to be published by the Monkes in their Chronicles. And forthwith, by the common assent of the nobilitie of Scotlande, the king had the seison and possession of the whole realme of Scotland, and helde the same vntill suche time as he had determined who of right was the next heire to the sayde kingdome.

The same yere the king of Englande, after the feast of the natiuitie of Saint John Baptist went into Scotland, and there receiued the allegations of those that made claime to the kingdome of Scotlande, according to the auctorizy to him committed, and did cause to be elected and chosen. xl. persons that is to say, xx. of England, and xx. of Scotland, which with good aduise-ment should consider vpon their allegations, and to make report vnto him of their sentence and iudgement, before the feast of Saint Michell then next folowynge. And when the sayde feast came, after great and long debatynge, by the consent of them all, king Edward adiudged the kingdome of Scotland of right to apperteyne to John Bailioll, which came of the eldest daughter of Dauid king of Scottes. Robert de Bruce, betwene whome and the aforesayde John the strife did chiefly consist, although he had some colour of title, yet he descended of the second daughter of Dauid, and so his claime tooke no place: Wherefore the aforesayde John Bailioll at the feast of Saint Andrew next folowynge, was with much honour brought vnto the Regall seate, and in the same was placed, and afterward crowned with great solemnitie in a Church of a house of Chanons in Scotland.

King Edward iudged the kingdome of Scotland to John Bailioll.

After his coronation he came vnto the king of England, who then kept his feast of Christmasse at Newe Castell vpon Tyne, and there made his homage with these wordes.

John Bailioll doth homage to King Edward for the kingdome of Scotland.

I John Bailioll king of Scottes do knowlege me to be your liege man for all the kingdome of Scotland, and of all those thinges that in any wyse belong to the same, and that I holde the same kingdome, and of right I ought and claime to holde the same of you, and of your heyres kinges of England with the aduenture of my lyfe and members, and of all earthly honour against all men that can liue and die.

And the kyng receyued his homage in forme aforesayde, addyng a sauynge for his owne and others rightes. And a litle as the king had receyued this homage of John Bailioll aforesayd, he without any delay restored to the said John the whole kingdome of Scotland with all the appurtenances, &c.

And this yere was taken the aforesayde Madock or Meridock, which as ye heard before in the .xxiii. yere of the reigne of this king caused y welsh men to rebell, and he was drawen and hanged at London.

Madock or Meridock taken and hanged.

The king shortly after caused a great quantitie of wheate to be gathered and taken vp in England to the number (as some write) of an hundred thousand quarters, and sent the same into Gascoyne and Guyan. And shortly after he sent thether Sir Edmond hys brother Erle of Lancaster, Sir Henry Lacye Erle of Lyncoln and Sir William Weyseye Baron, with dyuers other Lordes and knightes, to strength such people as he there had ready while he prepared another armie against the Scottes.

Edmond erle of Lancaster.

Ye haue heard in the former yere howe Sir John Bayliell king of Scottes made othe and homage vnto king Edward for the kingdome of Scotlande.

Scotlande . Of the which he repented him shortly after by reason of the counsell of the Abbot of Menros, as sayeth Reynulph, although it shoulde seeme to be as well by the counsell of the French king, as maye appere by wordes that are written in the French Chronicle . But howsoever it was, full vntrely he forsooke his former othe and promise, and repyled warre against the king. Wherfore king Edward sped him thether with a great host, minding to haue made a generall spoyle and destruction of that nation, but that he was partly perswaded and steyed by some that made excuses for Bai-lioll, but chiefly for the people. Notwithstanding the king proceeding forth on his purposed iourney came to Newe Castle vppon Tyne, at the which place he caused John king of Scottes to be sommoned by a publique Edict that he should appeere and answer vnto such things as should be objected against him at a daye and place prefixed: But Bai-lioll appered not nor none for him, and therefore the king determyned to proceede in his pretended purpose, and wyth good speede he passed to Berwick and layde siege vnto the Towne: But the Scottes defended it manfully, and bet the Englishmen backe, and bzent some of the English Shippes. With the which victoery, they were so inflamed with pride, that in derision of the king, they made certaine peeuishe and mocking tymes which I passe ouer.

When king Edward heard of the pride of the Scottes and vnderstoode of their foolishe tymes, he was somewhat moued, and therfore so encouraged his knightes, that they gaue a newe onset on Barwick, and wanne the Dicke of the towne, and after in processe with great labor & daunger wanne the Bulwarkes, so that they came vnto the Gates and made there so strong an assault that in the ende they wanne the towne, and slue of the Scottes (as sayth dyuers writers) aboute the number of. xxv. thousande, and as Hector Boethus the Scot wyrteth in his Chronicle in the. xiiij. Booke and seconde Chapter, the slaughter of people was so great that a Myll might haue bene well dryuen by the space of two dayes, with the streames of bloud that at that tyme ranne of the ground. If you thinke not this to be truth, I will not enforce you, but remember it is the tale of a Scot, who as he is to be suspected in this, so is the truth of his storie to be doubted of in a great number of places mo. And there were taken prisoners Sir Mylliam Douglas, Sir Symon de Frisell, the Erle Patrike and Sir Robert Bruze with diuers other. And in short time after, the wardeyn of the Castell of Berwike, perceyuing that to him was sent no succour, yeelded by the sayde Castell by apointment. And when the king had possessio of the Castell & Towne of Berwike he then strengthened them with Englishmen. And afterwarde wanne the holdes of Tyndall, of Echam, of Myerbyrd and of Lamerstock, with diuers other.

And while that king Edward was thus busied about the wynnning of the aforesayde holdes, he sent Sir Hugh Spencer with Sir Hugh Percere and other noble men, with a parte of his hoste to laye siege vnto the Castell of Patrick of Dunbarre. Where when they had lyen a certaine tyme, an armie of the Scottes came thether to remoue the siege, with whome the Englishmen had a fierce and a cruell battayle, but in the ende, by the help of God, the Englishmen had the victorie, and slue of the Scottes aboute the number of twentie thousande, and lost of the English company a very small number, which as sayeth Carton, Cowper and other, were but. xvij. persons.

And after this victorie the towne and Castell of Dunbarre was wonne, in the which were taken prisoners thre Erles, seauen Barons and. xxvij. knightes with diuers men of the clergie. Then the king went to Edenborough, and shortly after wanne the Towne and Castell: In which were founde the Regalyes of Scotland, that is to saye, the crowne with the scepter and the cloth of estate, the which after, were offered by king Edward at the Shrine of S. Edward in westmyenster the xvij. day of June in the yere next following.

And at this time the king being at Berwike and fortifying the same, the king of Scotlande wyrteth a letter vnto him and in the same resigneth hys homage and fealtie, the Copie of which letter followeth.

The renowned prince and Lozde, Edward by the grace of God king of England: John by the same grace king of Scotland sendeth greeting: where as you and they of your realme by violent power haue openly and very often inferred and done to vs and to the inhabitants of oure realme. greuous, yea rather intollerable iniuries, contemptes, annoyances, and also innumerable losses and dammages, contrarie vnto the liberties of oure realme, and also against God and all iustice, whereof you are not, nor ought not to be ignorant by cityng and sommonyng vs to appere out of our realme, and vnlawfully vering vs, for euery small and light morion of your minde and pleasure, by entring vpon the Castelles, lands and possessions of vs and our subiects which are within our realme, without our demerites or deserts interceptyng our Marchaunts as well by Sea as by lande, by sleying and murthering other the inhabitants of our realme, by violent takyng and carryng our people out of our dominion, and there with you deteyning and imprisonyng of them. For reformation whereof, we haue often times sent our Ambassadors: But they as yet not onely remaine vncorrected, but also from daye to daye more greuous iniuries are by you and on your subiects behalfe exaggerated and heaped by. For you now in cruell maner haue entered our marches with an innumerable multitude of armed men, hauyng gathered together a generall hoste to the entent to disbenefite vs and the inhabitants of our realme, and thenceforth proceeding into our kingdome, haue both by Sea and also by lande committed dyuers tymes murtheres and brenned our Townes, and also haue made assaultes and violent inuasions: We not being able any lenger to susteyne the sayde iniuries, contemptes, griefes, dammages and fierce assaultes, (by reason of our fealtie and homage to you done) to the doyng whereof we were enforced by violence and threatenings) we can neyther defende our selues nor oure kingdome, for the defence whereof we are bounde by othe: we therefore in our owne name, and in the names of all and singular the inhabitants within our kingdome, doe by these presentes yeelde agayne vnto you and resygne all that our fealtie and homage, as well of our selfe as of all other that inhabite within our kingdome, which are bounde to you eyther by force of their awone fealtie done for suche landes as they holde within our kingdome, or else generaly for the homage which we haue done.

The king when he had read thys letter did admit the resignation of the homage, and commaunded hys Chauncelour that the same should be enrolled and recorded for perpetuall memorie, and then passed on his iourney and tooke and ouerthrewe dyuerse townes and Castels, and at the last passed the Scottish Sea, and came to a towne in Scotland called saint Johns by-on the day and feast of Saint John the Baptist, where he solemnly kept the same feast certaine dayes.

And while these things were in doyng, John Bailloll king of Scot-lande sawe that he was forsaken of all men, and that he had no power hable to resist or withstande the power of the king of Englande: wherefore he sent his Ambassadors vnto him praiyng for peace and desiryng mercy. To whom the king being mooued with pittie sent a countermaund that the sayde king John wyth his Nobles should come with his messenger vnto hys Castell of Buthyn within .xx. dayes next following, and there to treat. And the king of England sent at that tyme as his Ambassador, Anthony Bishop of Duresme with a full power & auctoritie, vnto the which place the king of Scots with his Nobles came at the day prefixed, who after much controuersie and debating of sundrie cases, did at the last simply and playnly submit himselfe vnto king Edward, and resigned vnto hym the kingdome of Scotlande to be ordered and gouerned according to his will and pleasure. And for the performance of the sayd submission, the king of Scottes deliuered his sonne in hostage, and caused his letters of submission to be made in frenche in forme following.

Iohn by the grace of God king of Scotlande, to all whosoever shall see or
I here these present letters: knowe ye that for as much as we by euill & false counsaile, and by our foolish simplicitie haue most greenously offended and prouoked our Lorde Edward by the grace of God king of Englande, Lorde of Irelande and Duke of Aquitayn in many things, that is to saye, that in the time that we remayned in his fealtie and homage, we ioyned our selues vnto the french king, who was then his enemy and yet is, onely for the conclusion of a mariage to haue bene procured betwene the daughter of the sayde french king and our sonne. And for the further grieue and offence made vnto our sayde Lorde the king, we ioyned with the sayde french king in armor against the sayde king of Englande to the vttermost of oure power by order of warre and all other wayes of enemie. And furthermore by our peruerse counsaile we defyed our sayd Lorde the king of England, and put our selves out of his fealtie and homage, and sent our men of warre into his lande of Englande burnyng and spoilyng the same, & caryeng from thence sundrie prayes, and committed sundrie murthers and other dammages. And the lande of Scotlande which is of his fee, we mainteyned against him, plantyng and platyng men of warre in sundrie Castels and Townes for the defence of the sayde land against him, purposing to haue remoued him from his sayde fee, for the which trespasse our sayd Lorde the king of England entred into Scotlande with his power, and the same conquered and possessed, notwithstanding any thing that we were hable to doe against hym, as it was right lawfull for him to doe as the Lorde of the fee, because we did resigne vnto hym our homage and rebelled agaynst him: we therefore being agayne restored to our full power, of our free wyll redelyuer vnto him the realme of Scotlande and all the people of the same with all the homages. And in wytnesse hereof, these our letters we haue made patentes, dated at Buthyn the .x. day of Julij in the fourth yere of our reigne.

¶ Shortly after this, king Edward called his Parliament at Berwick and thether came all the nobilitie of Scotlande, and there did vnto him fealtie and homage. And for a perpetuall remembrance thereof, they caused the same to be made by their letters patents sealed with their seuerall seales, the tenour whereof ensueth.

¶ All that shall here or see these letters, John Compnes Lorde of Bar-
denagh and so of every one of the nobles and Lordes, greetyng: for as much as we are come to the fidelitie & pleasure of the most renowned Prince and our dere Lorde Edward by the grace of God king of Englande, Lorde of Irelande and Duke of Aquyteyn, we doe promise for vs and our heyres, vnder paine of our bodie, Castels and all things which we may haue, that we will serue him well and truly against all people which may lyue and dye, and at all tymes when we shall be required and forewarned by our aforesayd Lorde the king of Englande or his heyres: And that we shall not knowe anye damage or harme vnto them, but that we shall withstande the same with our whole might and force, and geue knowledge therof vnto them: And for the performance hereof, we bynde vs and our heyres and all oure goodes. Furthermore, we haue both sworne vpon the holy Euangelistes, and also afterwarde we all and euery of vs by himselfe haue made homage vnto our sayde Lorde the king of Englande in these wordes.

I become your liege man of lyfe and members & earthly honor against all men that may lyue and dye. And the sayde Lorde our king receyued this homage in these wordes.

We receyue the same for the landes of which you are now seased, sauyng our title or the title of other, and exceptyng the landes which John Bailloll in tymes past king of Scotland gaue vnto vs after that we had deliuered to him the kingdome of Scotlande, if peradventure he hath geuen any.

Moreover, we all and euerye of vs by himselfe hath made fealtie and loyaltie vnto our Lorde the king aforesayde in these wordes.

I will be faithfull and loyall, and will obserue my fealtie and loyaltie to uices which doe apperteyne vnto the tenement that I clayme of hym, so God helpe me. &c. In witness of these things, the letters patents are made and sealed with our Seales, dated at Berwick the .xxv. yere of the reigne of our Lorde king Edward of England. &c.

And at this time the king made John Warreyn Erle of Surreyn and paine of their hedgs not to retorne again into Scotland so long as he had waite with fraunce. And sone after he returned into Englad with many prisoners.

But while these traunples were taken in hande in Scotland, the Engliche men susteyned many harde and sharpe showres in Gascoygne and Guyan. Among the which, one is remembred in the french Chronicle, sayng, that Edmond Duke of Lancaster dyed at Bayon, after whose death, while the towne and other strong holdes prepared them to withstand the french men, Robert Erle of Arthoys, which a little before had encountered with sir John Saint John, and had bene of him ouerset, reassembled his companie, and made him another skirmishe. In which he slue vpon an hundreth Engliche men and Gascoynes, and tooke prisoners the afozenamed Sir John Saint John, Sir William Mortimer, and other to the number of. lxx. the which were sent into fraunce into diuerse prisons.

And soone after the king with a puissaunt army, sayled into Flaundrys in the moneth of August, to ayde and helpe Guye then Erle of Flaundrys against the french king, the which at that tyme was sore vexed by the french king, for he had wonne from him the towne of Marquet, and the Countrie thereabout. And for the more trouble and vexation of the sayde Guye, the french king caused Robert Erle of Arthoys to invade the Countrie of Flaundrys towarde Picardie, and encountered with the same Guye nere vnto a towne called Furnes. Where betwene the sayde two Erles was foughten a sharpe battaile, so that many men were slaine vpon both partes. After which fight the Erle of Flaundrys sped him toward Gaunt, where king Edward at that tyme was, and the Erle of Arthoys drewe him toward the french king, the which shortly after was receyued into the towne of Bruges. In the which tyme and season, while the sayde two kinges lay thus at eyther towne, a meane of peace was treated of, and finally a peace was concluded betwene the two kinges, and betweene the french king and Guye Erle of Flaundrys, butill the feast of all Saintes then next ensuyng. And continued from that day vnto the feast of all Saintes then two yeres folowng. After which peace so stablished, king Edward departed from the towne of Gaunt and went vnto Burdeaur: And the french king returned into fraunce, and prisoners were deliuered on both parties.

Now while king Edward was thus occupped in Flaundrys, the Scots by the entremment of the french king, to the extent to make king Edward to kepe home, and that he should not ayde the Erle of Flaundrys, began to make warre vpon the kinges souldiours, which the king had left there in diuerse holdes. And also vpon the borders of Northumberland, and made sharpe warre vpon the inhabitants of that Countrie. And for that Sir John Baplioll their king, was at that tyme prisoner in the Tower of London: Therefore the sayde Scottes made them a Capitaine, whome they named William Walys, a man of vnknown or low birth, to whom they obeyed as vnto their king. Anon as the king heard of the rebellion of the Scots, which to him was no great wonder, considering their great vnstedfastnesse, he wrote his letters vnto sir Henry Percy Erle of Northumberland, to sir William Latimer, and to sir Hugh Cressyngnam then treasurer of England, and to other, that they in all goodly haste should make provision to withstand the Scottes. The which persons after the receipt of the kings letters, sped them all all in speedy maner, so that they entered Scotland shortly after, and compelled the Scottes to retorne backe vnto a towne named Streuclyn, where in a skirmishe foughten betwene the Engliche men and the Scottes, sir Hugh Cressyngnam afozenamed and dyuerse other Engliche men were slaine. But yet the Scottes were holden so streight of the Engliche hoste, that after that skirmishe, they would not of a certeine time come in plaine fielde againe, but kept them within their Castelles and strong holdes.

And about this tyme certeine of London brake by the Tonne in Cornehyll in London, and tooke out certeine prisoners from thence which sir John Briteyn as custos of the Citie had committed thether. By the which it maye appere, that there hath bene a prison in the streete of Cornehyll before tyme, which then was called the Tonne, as nowe we call them the Coumpters. For the which ryot, the sayd persons, that is to say Thomas Romaine, and viij. other, were afterwarde grievously punished, as first by imprisonment, and after by fynes.

This yere king Edward in the moneth of October returned into England, and so to Winchester, where the Citizens of London made such labour vnto his grace, that shortly after they obtained graunt of their liberties, which had bene kept from them by the space of. xij. yeres and more, so that on saint Edwardes day next folowng they chose them a Maior, where by all the tyme aforesayd their Custos or Gardian was put in by the king, or by such as the king would assigne: But it is to be thought that this was not redemed without summes of money, for as some write it cost the Citie thre thousande markes.

This yere also king Edward put out of his protection certeine Aliens that were richly benefited in Englande: The cause was for that the sayde Aliens would not ayde the king with their goodes, as the other of his lande did, but purchased an inhibition of Boniface the. viij. that they & their goodes should be free from all the kinges disnes and takkes. Therefore the king seised the temporalties, and suffered them with their spiritualties, butill they had agreed with the king.

And about this tyme there were a certeine number of persons that fell to diggyng in London in the Church called saint Martynes le graund, for certeine treasure that should be there hidden. But they laboured in vaine, for there was nothing found.

And this yere the king prepared a strong power against Scotland, and went himsele thether. And first appoynted his Lordes with thre companies to mete with him at Forke, whether came a great hoste, the which he himsele led into Scotlande, and brent and spoyled the Countrie as he went, and taried a while at Berwike. And from thence he sped him in winnyng of Castels and townes as he went, vntill he came to a towne called Fankirke, or Fankirke, where the. xxij. day of July met him the power of Scotland, and gaue vnto him a sore battaile: But in the ende the victorie fell vnto the Engliche men, so that of the Scottes were slaine in the fielde as witnesseth sundrye Authours. xxxij. thousand, and of Engliche men but barely. xxvij. persons. After which discomfiture, the Scottes yelded vnto the king the greatest part of their strong holdes and Castelles, that they before had holden against him, and made vnto him a newe othe and promise, and yelded themselves vnto his

And when the king had set that Countre in an order, he then returned into England, and so to London: where by the aduice of certeine of his counsaile, he sodeinly condemned certein coynes of money called Dollards, Crocardes, and Rosaryes, and caused them to be brought to netwe coynage, to his great aduauntage.

The latter ende of this yere there were certeine Ambassadors sent from the Pope to the king of England, earnestly entreatyng the king for the deliuerie out of prison of John Baylioll late Scottishe king, which now was in the Tower of London, and they promised the king in the Popes name, that he should be safe from troubleng eyther of the king or of his realme, and that no perill should come by his deliuerance. And after that the king had conferred with his counsaile, and considered of this the Popes request, he considered there vnto, and made deliuerie of the sayd John Baylioll vnto the Popes messengers, and they conueyed him into Fraunce to his awne landes called Bayliolles landes, and there left him in safe keepyng, vnder the order and gouernement of certeine Prelates.

And yet againe the king heryng that the Scottes were not in quiet, but were as brag and as busie as before they had bene, therefore he made nowe his thirde boyage into Scotland, and did so Princely, and valiauntly, that within short time after his comyng thether, he subdued the greater part of the land. And forward he went to the Castell of Estrinelyn, wherein were many of the great Lordes of Scotland, and he compassed the Castell with a strong siege, but he lay there somewhat long without any great aduauntage or hurt done vnto the Scottes: wherefore, of pollicie he caused to be made two payre of Gallowes in the sight of the Castell, and afterward commaunded proclamation to be made, that if the Scots by a certeine day would yelde that Castell vnto the king, they should haue lyfe and limme: and if not, but that he wanne it by strength, as many as were within the sayd Castell should be hanged vpon those Galowes, no estate nor person to be excepted.

Nowe when the Scottes had aduised themselves well vpon this Proclamation, and considered the strength of their enemies & their awne weaknesse and feblenesse, and lack of succour, they assented to yelde them and their Castell vnto the king, which shortly they did: whereof when king Edward was possessed, he stuffed the same with Englishe knightes, and after tooke a newe othe of the Lordes and Capitaynes, the which he found closed within that Castell, of true and faythfull alleageance, and then suffered them to go where they lyked.

And when William Walys, which as before is sayde pretended the rule and gouernaunce of Scotland, heard tell that the strong Castell of Estrinelyn was yeldd vnto king Edward, and that the Lordes and knightes therein founden (in whome he much trusted) were swozne to the kinges alleageance, he feared sore least the sayde company would betray him, and bring him vnto the king: wherefore he with his adherentes, withdrew them into the Marches, and other such places, where they thought them selues safe from pursuyng of the kinges host.

Then the pooze Commons of the lande presented them selues by great companies, and put them wholly in the kinges grace and mercye, so that the king king then thought that he was in peaceable possession, or at the least in a great suretie of the land. Wherefore, after he had caused to be swozne vnto him the rulers of dyuers Borowghes, Cities and towne, with other officers of the lande, he returned vnto Barwike, and so into Englande, and lastly to Westminster.

And while the king was thus occupied in Scotland, the Queene before mencioned, that is to say, the Lady Margaret sister to the French king, was conueyed from Cauntobury to London, and by the way there met her five hundred Citizens in one Lyuery of red and white, with the cognisaunce of dyuerse misteries brodered vpon their sleues, and receyued hir foure miles without the Citie, and so conueyed her through the Citie, which then was richely hanged, vnto Westminster, and there she lodged.

When the king was returned out of Scotlande, he caused shortly after an inquisition to be made through his lande, which afterwarde was called Troplebalstone. This was made vpon all officers, as Maiors, Shirifes, Baylifes, Archeters, and other officers that misbehaued themselves in their offices, or had vsed any extortion or euill dealing with the kinges people, otherwise then they might lawfully do by vertue of their offices. By reason of which inquisition, many were accused, and redeemed their offices by grievous fynes to the kinges great profite and aduauntage. Other offences and forfeitures were sought out also, as forfeitures agaynst the Crowne, the which brought great summes of money into the kinges Coffers, toward the great charges of his warres that he susteyned in Wales, Fraunce, and Scotland, as before is shewed.

And as sayth Polydore, when king Edward returned out of Scotland into England, because he would not leaue any monument or remembraunce of the former estate of their Kinges, he caused therefore to be brought from thence a stone Chayre, in the which their kinges were wont to be crowned, and the same nowe remaineth in Westminster Church.

And the sayde tyme also the Lorde Chaunceloz and Judges came from Porke, where they had remayned and kept their termes by the space of seven yeres, and now came to London by the kinges commaundement.

It chaunced at this tyme that maister Langton then Bishop of Chester, made a grievous complaint to the king of Sir Edward his eldest sonne, for that he with Piers of Gauestone and other wanton and wilde persons, had broken the Parke of the sayde bishop, and riotously destroyed the game within it. With the which complaint the king was sore agreued against his sonne, and commaunded him to Prison and the other his complices. And afterward when the king was fully and truly informed of the lewde and wanton dispositions of the sayd Piers Gauestone, he therefore banished the sayde Piers out of England for euer. But after the death of king Edward, this banishment continued not, for he was againe restored by his sonne, whereof ensued much harme and trouble, aswell to the king, as also to the Nobles and whole Realme.

And thys yere dyed Edmond Erle of Cornewall the forme of Richarde sometime Erle of that Countre and king of Allmayn without Issue, wherefore that Erldome returned againe to the crowne of Englande.

And also about thys tyme the king gaue vnto Sir Edward his sonne the the principality of Wales, & ioyned therunto the said Erledome of Cornwal.

The writer of the Scottishe Chronicle, namely Hector Boethus setteth forth a great ouerthrowe that the Scottes gaue vnto the Englishmen in this yere, at Rossyng, where sayth he, there was not one Englishe man that escaped alyue, and he sayeth further, that the Englishmen came vpon them with the number of. xxx. thousand men deuyded into thre seuerall battailes, and that the Scottes were in number but eyght thousand men, and yet they gaue the ouerthrow to all the three battailes, beginning with the first whom they banquished, and then came the seconde and set freshe vpon them, whom also they ouerthrowe, and lastly came the thirde battayle lyke wise freshe vpon them, and although the Scottes beyng so small a number, and were sore boeried with the fight and ouerthrow of the two former armies, yet espyeng the thirde to approche, they tooke their stomakes so couragiously vnto them and gaue them so fierce and sharpe an onset, that they ouerthrow them man and mothers sonne. But as sayeth the aforesayde Scot, this victorie lasted not long, for after king Edward heard of thys losse, he returned to Scotland and went thorough the land brennyng and spolyng the same from the North to the South, and compelled all to sweare to him homage and fealtie and herein ye may beleue the Scot as ye thinke good. But this conquest seemeth to be the same that we spake of in the. xxvij. yere of thys kinges reigne. And thys yere the king helde his Parliament at Cauntozbury.

In the. xxxij. yere of his reigne Wylliam Walys was taken in Scotlande at the Towne of S. Dominick, and sent vnto London, and there araigned and the. xxiiij. of August he was drawen, hanged, hedded and quartered, and his hed set vpon London bridge, and his foure quarters sent into Scotland, and there hanged vpon the gates of certayne towne of the land.

And within. xiiij. dayes after, a peace was taken betweene Scotlande and Englande vnto the conclusion whereof, at Whelmas next followyng, the king then holdyng hys Parliament at Westmynster, thether came out of Scotlande, the Bishop of S. Andrewes Robert Bruze, Sir Symond de Frysell Erle of Dunbarre, Sir John of Cambrees Erle of Atleys, and Sir John Comyn with other, the which voluntarily were sworne, in the presence of the king and his Lordes, that they should be true vnto the king of Englande, and keepe the lande of Scotlande to hys vse, agaynst all other persons. And if any rebell or other malicious person disturbed the lande, or brake the kinges peace, they should cause him to be taken and sent vnto the king, with sundy other articles of their allegeaunce which they falsely brake and conspired to the contrarie and that forthwith.

Robert le Bruze aboue mencioned returning into Scotlande, did contrary to his othe assemble the Lordes of that realme, and by the counsell of the Abbot of Stone and other that fauored his vntruth, he sent vnto Clement the fift then Bishop of Rome for a dispensation of hys othe before made vnto king Edward, and surmised to him that king Edward bered and greued the Realme of Scotlande wrongfully: wherevpon the Pope wrote vnto king Edward his Letter, the summe and effect whereof ensueth.

That Pope Boniface being informed and procured by the Scottes, sent his letters vnto the king of England, & therein did first alledge that the kingdome of Scotlande did belong vnto the right of the Church of Rome: And that that the king of Englande did chalenge the subiection thereof against God and right, and to the preiudice and harme of the Sea apostolike, & for prooffe thereof, he allegeth these reasons following.

1 First, that whereas Henry the father of the king that now is, obeyned of Alexander king of Scots an ayde and assistance in his warre against Symon Mountfort. To the entent that the same ayde should not be thought to be required or geuen by the right of any subiection or duetie: the same Henry by his letters patents did confesse and acknowledge that he receyued it not of duetie, but of speciall fauour.

2 Also where as he being called vnto the coronation of the king that now is, by his letters that he as his friend might in so great solemnities exhibite and geue vnto him his friendly presence. And so he came not of duetie, but of speciall fauour.

3 Furthermoze, where as the king of Scotlande came personally vnto the king of Englande to make fealtie vnto him for the landes of Cindale and Pembreth lying within the realme of Englande, he made that fealtie onely for those landes which lye in Englande, and not as king of Scottes, nor for the kingdome of Scotland: for he openly protested in the presence of all the people that he ought not to make any fealtie vnto the king of England for the kingdome of Scotland.

4 Also that the aforesayde king Alexander left behinde him a young mayde his heire called Margaret nece vnto the king of England, the supreme dominion of which kingdome came not vnto her, but vnto certayne peeres of the kingdome of Scotlande elected therfore, and therfore she ought not to doe homage vnto him.

5 Also the Pope reprooued the king, for as much as he after the deceasse of the sayde king Alexander subdued vnto him by force, the Scottes being then without a gouernour, and not hauing the helpe of any guyde to the preiudice and no small greouance of the Church of Rome.

6 Also he affirmed that when the sea of Rome doth commit the office of a Legate to anye man to be executed within the Realme of Englande for the payment of Tithes or for any other lawfull cause, and this Legary doth not by speciall letters and priuileges of the sea apostolike extend vnto the kingdome of Scotlande, that they should resist and withstande the same, as it chaunced evidently in the time of Adrian: for the Legate was not by anye meanes admitted vnto the sayde king of Scotlande, vntill the office of a Legate there was by speciall letters apostolike committed vnto him.

7 Also that the same realme of Scotlande was conuerted vnto the brittle of the Catholique fayth, by the reuerend reliques of Saint Peter the Apostle not without the giftes of heauenly grace.

8 Also that in auncient tyme the Archebishop of Yorke, when a question was moued concerning the right of the Metropolitane against the prelates of Scotlande, coulde not obteyne sentence with him.

These things thus alleged, the Pope admonished the king by his letters to permit and suffer the Bishops, Abbots, Clerkes and all other of the kingdome of Scotlande which he deteyned prisoners, freely to departe, and that he should call home out of the sayde kingdome of Scotlande his officers which he had appointed and set to the preiudice, iniurie and greuous offence of

of the faythfull people and for the oppression of the iust, whereby he should be the more acceptable and beloued with God, and the better obteyne the fauour of the sea apostolike. And if the king of Englande woulde allege that he had right or title to the kingdome of Scotland or to anye parte thereof, that then he should sende his procuratores vnto the sea apostolique and Ambassadors specially appointed with the right lawes and miniments concerning that businesse, and there he should receyue a full perfoymaunce of Justice.

When the king had read and well considered the aforesayde letter, he then called together his parliament at Lyncolne, and shewed the same letter vnto his Lordes, and after long conference had with them, it was agreed that the king should write againe to the Pope in his awne name, concerning the right of his superioritie of Scotlande: But for the latter parte of the same letter, that where the Pope would that the matter should be brought in iudgment before him, that they despyed that they might answer by their letter in their owne names: And soone after the king wrote his letter vnto the Pope as followeth.

Letter to the Pope.

The most highe God knoweth it to be registred in oure records, the style wherof may neuer be blotted out, that our predecessours and progenitors being kings of Englande haue reigned ouer the kingdome of Scotlande and all the kinges therof, and ouer their temporalties and other things therevnto annexed of long and auncient tyme heretofore, by the title of the superioritie and direct dominion, of the same: And haue receyued of the same kinges for the kingdome of Scotlande and of other the Nobles of whome them pleased loyall homage, and due othes of fidelitie. We continuing the possession of our sayde title and dominion, haue likewise taken the same, as well of the king of Scotlande as of the Nobles of the same Realme. And oure progenitors haue had suche prerogatiue of right and dominion ouer the realme of Scotlande and the kinges of the same, that they bestowed the same vpon their faythfull subiectes, remouing thence for iust causes suche as were their kinges. And so ordeyned and set in their place others to reigne: which things are without doubt to be well knowne and apparaunt to all. Althoughe peradventure it hath by false insinuation otherwise bene certified thorough the children of rebellion and enuious of peace vnto your eares, from whose craftie and imagined saynings, that your holynesse would turne your eares we humbly doe beseeche and craue with deuout affectiō your fatherly clemencie and excellencie. And for breuities sake, passing ouer actes done in former tyme, that we may touche some for example. In the time of Hely the high Priest and of Samuell the prophet, there was a certaine noble man named Brute of the Troyan stocke, who possessed thys whole Realme, and named it after his awne name Briteyne, wherein were conteyned that parte which now is called Scotland and one other part that was called Camber, but now it is called Wales. &c. he proceded in his sayde letter and proueth that England and Scotland is but one Monarchy, and so distendeth in hys proues from Prince to Prince vntill he come to king Edward named the elder, who was the sonne of king Alured and so successively vnto Edward the confessor and William the conquerour, and last vnto king Henry the thirde this kings father. And at the length hauing declared that the title of the superior dominion of Scotland was due vnto his father king

Henry

Henry the thirde & so consequently to hym, he concludeth thus, sayeng. Where therfore we doe know our selues in full possession of the same Realme by the title of a full dominion, we neyther can nor ought but repress the insolencie of our subiectes and rebels, and if we finde any, and that in such maner as it shall seeme good by our kingly preheminance. And because by the premisses and other it doth evidently appere and is manifestly knowne, that the sayde kingdome of Scotland, as well by reason of possession as of proprietie doth appertaine vnto vs by full right, nor that we haue done nor prouyded anye thing by worde or deede (as we could not) by which anye thing ought to be withdrawne of the same right and possession aforesayde: we humbly beseech your holynesse, the premisses being with good meditation considered, that you wyll vouchsafe to withdrawe your motion of minde, and not to geue credite in thys behalfe vnto the euill wyllers of the contrarie side, but also that you would if it please you with meere affection comend and set forth oure state together with our kingly rightes aforesayde, and thus. &c.

And immediately the Lordes also did vwrite theyr letter vnto the Pope, the tenor vvhich ensueth.

Our holy mother the Church of Rome, by whose ministerie the Catholike fayth doth with such perfection in her actes procede (as we do firmly beleue and holde) that she will be prejudiciall to none: But will mainteyne and preserue the right and title of euery man inuiolate. In a generall Parliament sommoned at Lincolne by our most excellent and soueraigne Lorde Edward, by the grace of God king of England, he our sayd soueraigne Lorde caused certeine letters Apostolike to be brought forth, and seriously to be expounded to vs, which he had receyued from your fatherhood concernyng certein businesse and affayres touchyng the state & condicion of thys our realme. The which letters beyng heard, and diligently considered, we perceiued therein to be conteyned thinges both merueylous and straunge vnto vs, which before this time was neuer heard of. For we are certeine (most holy father) and in our parties it is well knowen, as also to many others it remaineth not obscure, that euer sithence the first institution of the kingdome of England, the kinges thereof, as well in the tyme of Britons, as of the English men, haue had in their possession the right, title, and dominion of Scotland, or else haue bene the chiefe Lordes in the superioritie both of the right and direct dominion of the sayde kingdome of Scotland at all tymes continually, and that the sayd kingdome in temporal matters hath not at any time perteyned, or by any right now doth apperteyne vnto the Church abovesayde. And moreouer the same kingdome of Scotland hath vnto the progenitors of our sayde king beyng kynnes of Englande, and vnto him also of auncient tyme remayned feodarie: Neither hath the king of Scottes and kingdome of Scotlande bene subiect to any other then to the kinges of England. Neyther haue the kinges of England concernyng the right and title to the kingdome aforesayd, or other the percelles thereof, answered, or were bound to answer before any iudge spirituall or temporall by reason of the preheminance of their estate or kingly dignitie at all times imiolately serued and kept. Wherefore hauing treated and diligently deliberated vpon the contents of your letters, the vniuersal assent and consent of all and euery of vs, hath bene, is, and Godwillyng hereafter most firmly shall be, that our fore said soueraigne Lorde the King shall in no wise answer in iudgement befoze you, concernyng the right and title to the Kingdome of Scotland or other the percellis thereof, nor shall by any meanes submit himselfe to iudgement, nor shall bring his foresayde right and title in doubt, neither shall he send any procuratozs or Ambassadors vnto your presence in this behalfe, especially forasmuch as the premisses would manifestly tend vnto the disherison of the title & right of the crowne of this realme of Englande, and kingly dignity, and to the notozious subuersion of the state therof, and also to the preiudice of the liberties, customes & lawes of our forefathers: vnto the obseruation and defence wherof, we are obliged and bound by our othe, the which also we will defende and mainteyne with our whole might and power, God Willyng. Neither do we permit, or in any wise will permit (as neyther we may nor ought) our foresayde soueraigne Lorde the King, yea, although he were willyng to do, or by any meanes to attempt the premisses, beyng thinges vnaccustomed, vnlawfull, preiudiciall and at no tyme befoze euer heard of. Wherefoze we do reuerently and humbly beseech your holinesse, that you will more benignly suffer and permit our foresayde soueraigne Lord the king (who among other princes of the worlde doth the we himselfe most Catholyke and deuoute vnto the Church of Rome) quietly to enioy and possesse his aforesayde right, title, liberties, customes and lawes inuolably without diminucion or disquiet. And vnto this letter, were fixed of the Nobles and Lordes of the Realme (as sayth my recozde) more than an hundreth of the severall seales of their armes.

¶ And in the ende of this yere, the king keepyng his feast of Christmasse in the North partes, did so sone as the feast was ended prepare an armie against the Scottes: and his sone Edward Prince of Wales likewise folowynge him with a great host of warlike men, and entered Scotland, and passed through a great part of the same, but found not one Scot that resisted.

At this tyme also the French king, whose sister beyng called the Ladie Margaret, which the king of England did shortly after mary as shal appere, sent the Abbot of Compeyn and certeine other Ambassadors vnto the king of England, desyryng him to haue peace with the Scottes callyng them hys friendes, which notwithstanding receyued a short aunswere and so returned in bayne.

King Edward callyng to his remembraunce that the tyme of the truce lately taken betwene him and the French king was almost expired, called his preynt Counsaile vnto him at Westminster sone after the feast of Christmasse, and agreed and sent very noble and honorable Ambassadors vnto the French king, prayng him to declare and shewe his minde whether he had aduisedly determined to haue, truce, warre, or peace: To the which the French King answered, that without the presence of the. xij. peeres he could not deale in so weightie a matter, and also that the same Peeres were then occupied in the prouision of newe warre: But he sayd that within. xij. dayes he looked for their commyng. Which tyme beyng come, and they meetyng together, sayde that they would not meddle in the matter without the aduice of the Scottes. And so soone as the Englyshe Ambassadors heard this, they returned into England.

¶ And shortly after king Edward called his Parliament at Westminster, and there declared the delays and craftie dealyngs of the French king: But in the meane tyme the French king sent his Ambassadors to the king of England. And after a litle conference, it was agreed that both the kinges should mete together in a place conuenient betweene Flaundyze and Picardie, and that then they would intreat and conclude of a friendly and continuall peace: Which meetyng was done with speede, and the sayde peace concluded vpon sondrie conditions, and among other this was one, that king Edward should take vnto wife Margaret, the sister of Philip le Beawe the French king, and with her was deliuered in peaceable maner the Countie of Gascoyne with all rightes and liberties, in as large maner as the king helde the same in the begynnyng of his warres: The which Margaret while the king was in Scotland was brought vnto Douer, and so vnto Cauntorbury, where the king married her in the Month of September, & had by her in proces of tyme two sones, named Thomas and Edmond, and a daughter named Margaret. The first of the sones was named Thomas of Brotherton, and the second Edmond of Woodstocke.

A peace concluded with the French king.

¶ And in the meane while that this matter was thus complayned vnto the Pope, the sayd Robert le Bruce made all the labor he might vnto the Lordes of Scotland to be admitted for king of that Region, so vpon the. viij. day of December, a great assembly of the Lords was made at the Abbey of Stone. And the next day folowynge, by the meanes of the Abbot of that place, many of the sayde Lords assented vnto the will of the sayde Robert, except Sir John Comyn onely. The which in defence of his truth and othe befoze sworne vnto king Edward made many reasons and excuses, but finally sayde that he would not falsifie his othe for no man. And for this cause Robert le Bruce bare vnto Sir John Comyn a great stomacke, and so did many other of the Nobles. But he helde his opinion so firmly and stoutly, that other began to take his part, so that in the counsaile arose such varietie of opinions, that the sayd counsaile was dissolued, and anewe assembled at the Gray friers of Dunfrise, at Candlemasse next folowynge. At which day of assembly, when the cause of their meetyng was by Robert Bruce published and declared, and many of the great Lordes had graunted vnto him their ayde and assistance: But the afozenamed Sir John Comyn and other sate still and sayd nothing. Which Robert le Bruce marked well, and to him sayde: And you Sir John I trust for the defence and weale of this realme, will not be behinde. Wherevnto he answered: Sir I would that you and all my Lordes here present knewe well, that for the weale, defence, and in the right of this land, I will stand with it to the vttermost of my power: But for that I see, ye rather entend the subuersion then the weale thereof, I geue you therefore knowledge I will neyther ayde you with counsaile, nor yet with strength: And some other also were present which allowed very well the graue sayng and aunswere of Sir John Comyn. But Robert le Bruce was so amoued therewithall, that when Sir John Comyn, and Sir Roger his brother was departed from the counsaile, and was come into the Church of the friers, Robert le Bruce folowed him, and wounded him to death with his sword, and when his brother would haue defended him, he slue him also. After which murder little or no resistance was made against the vntreue meanyng and dedes of the sayde Robert le Bruce, so that he at Saint Johns towne was crowned king shortly after.

Assoone as king Edward was admonished of the murther of sir John Comyn, and that he had also well considered the continuall vntrowth of the Scottes, he forthwith made prouision and gathered a great power together to enter into Scotland. And hauyng, and holdyng at that time beyng whith-

And assoone as his feast was ended, he sent with a goodly company of knightes and furniture of warlike men, Sir Aymer de balauice Erle of Pembroke and Sir Henry Percy Erle of Northumberland into Scotland, and shortly after the king himselte folowed with his host.

And it was not long after that the Erle of Pembroke was arryued with his power in Scotlande, but that Robert le Bruce with a great power of the Scottes were gathered together in a place called Methen, euerye of them hauing vpon his harness a whyte chyrte, and there they bade the Erle battayle. And the Erle with his power set manfully and courageously vpon them, so that there perished with the sworde that daye a great number of the Scottes that came with the false king. And the sayde false king was that day thre times beaten downe, but was euer releued by Sir Symon Frisell that valyaunt warryour, and by the craft and help of his whyte chyrte, he fled and escaped out of the battayle. The names of the chiefe prisoners that were taken at this skirmish of the Scottes were these, Thomas the sonne of Raimulph, David of Inkmartyn, John of Someruille knightes, Nicholas Buttynges Marshall, and Hugh the false kinges Chapleyn who that daye was standard bearer and many other whose names were here to long to reherse. And the aforesayd Hugh the priest with dyuers other were shortly after condemned, but the priest was first hanged because he had sayd, that I the priest will beare your banner and lead you this iourney.

And of manye of the Scottes the king was honorably receyued, and many fled from him and hid themselves in woodes and marishes. The king going forth in Scotland with his armie, raunged ouer all the lande and tooke many of the fugitive Scottes, and many he put to death, and also manye he pardoned. But among other that were taken, there were two Bishops and an Abbot which crowned Robert le Bruce the false king, the which were hardly and streightly kept in strong prison so long as the king lyued. There was also taken the aforesayd Symon Frisell in whome rested all the Scottes hope and trust. And there was taken Herebert of Northham, a man of excellent beuotie and stature, farre exceeding all the other Scottes. The aforesayd Symon was shortly after hanged: But Herebert with his Squyre Thomas de boys were behedded. And the head of Symon Frisell for the manifold treasons by him committed was set vpon London bridge nexte vnto the head of William Wallleys who was placed there before.

noble man John Comyn before named, and also to the coronation of the aforesayde Robert Bruce. And in a maner he tooke them all and put them to death. And suche as submitted themselves vnto the kings will and pleasure, he kept in streight and hard prison. And John Seyton and Christofer hys brother which were the Esquiers of Robert Bruce, and consented vnto the shamefull murder of the sayde worthy and noble John Comyn were also taken. Of the which John Seyton at New Castell vpon Tyne, and Christopher at Donfrise were hanged, drawen, and quartered.

And during the time that this iustice was executed vpon the wicked and wretched Scottes, the lewde and vnworthye crowned king Robert Bruce fled into the Mountaynes, hyding hymselfe in suche places as he might best lurck in. And lykewise Sir John of Cambres Erle of Athles practised to flye and escape, but by the prouydence of God he was taken: which tohen the king heard, although he was then troubled with greuous sicknesse, yet he bare the same the better, as one much comforted with these newes.

Robert le

The aforesayd Sir John of Cambres, Erle of Athles, as I finde in an auncient recorde, after he was apprehended, and among other prisoners committed to warde: There were certaine that resorted vnto the king, and shewed him that this Erle was of the blood royall, and therfore they thought it vnseemely that he should be committed among the other comon offenders. To whome the king not respecting his blood and progeny sayde: The higher that he is of degree, the more greuous is his fall: if he among the other murderers did exel in blood, then is it meete that he for his mischiefe should hang higher then any of the other: Take him, saith he, and carie him to London and there let him haue iustice. And shortly after, that is to say the .vij. day of November, next followyng he was arreigned in Westminster Hall and found giltye of treason, and of the murder of Sir John Comyn, and had iudgement of death. And because he came of the blood royall as aforesayde, he was not drawne, but was set vpon an horse, and so brought to the place of execution, and there hanged vpon a payre of Galowes that were fiftie foote high, hauing before his eyes a great fyre burnyng, and before he was halfe dead, he was cut downe and behedded, and his bodye cast into the burnyng fyre, where it consumed vnto Ashes, & his head was set vpon London bridge among the other Traytours and murderers heads, but a great deale higher then the other.

About the ende of februarie a certaine Scot of Galoway named Don-galdus came with thre hundreth men and withstood a great Hauie of Pirates replenished with .vij. C. men of warre that woulde haue landed vpon his ground: But he set so fiercely vpon them, that what with the fight and by drowning in the Sea and haue, and followyng such as had recouered land and fled, they in a maner all perished. And among the principall of these theeces that were slaine in thys skirmish, the sayde Dongallus brought vnto the king of England the head of Malcolyn the Lorde of Kentyr, and two heads of two rulers of Irelande. And he brought with him as prisoners Thomas Bruce knight, and Alexander his brother Dean of Glaskoboe, both brethren Germaines of Robert Bruce the false king of Scotland. And also they presented Keynold of Craunford knight which was soze wounded, and halfe dead. Of which number Thomas Bruce knight was drawen, hanged and heded. And the rest were onely hanged and headed at Carlisle. And the aforesayde yere there came from the Pope vnto the king of Englande a Cardinall and Mayster Peter a Spanyard as Ambassadors, to conclud a mariage betwene Edward the king of Englands sonne Prince of Wales, and the Lady Isabell the daughter of the French king, the which in the yere followyng was fully fynished.

Robert le Bruze escaped by flying.

Robert le Bruze, after this discomfiture and losse of his chiefe friends, and fearing least the Scottes with suche Englishmen as king Edward left there, would arise against hym: did therefore all comfortlesse flie vnto the king of Norwaye, and there abode during the lyfe of king Edward.

When this noble and valiaunt Prince had thus subdued the Scottes, he yeilded thanks vnto almighty God for this victorie. And when he was truly assured of the flying and departing of Robert le Bruze, and also that he had set the lande in a good and quiet order, he returned into England.

The Scottish Lordes beheaded.

And in this meane while, the aforesayde Lordes of Scotland were arreigned at London, and there condemned and put to death, and their heads set vpon London brydge. And shortly after was John Waleys brother to Wylliam Waleys (which for lyke treason was put to death the yere nexte before) taken, hanged and quartered, and some of the Scottes that were taken as prisoners, remayned there a long time before they were hable to pay their fines.

And shortly after the king for diuers causes returned againe into Scotlande, but some say he remayned at Barwike and kept hys Christmas and Easter there, and did not returne to London vntill the Sommer follovyng. And that then in the time of his returne, a sicknesse tooke hym so feruently, that he knewe well he should die. Wherefore he being at Bourgh vpon the sandes beyond Carlisle, called to him Sir Hymer de Walaunce Erle of Denbrooke, Sir Henry Percy Erle of Northumberlande, Sir Henry Lacy Erle of Lyncoln, and Sir Robert Clyfford Baron, and caused them to be sworn before him, that they should crowne Edward his sonne in as conuenient time after his death as they might, and to keepe the lande to his vse vntill he were crowned.

And after his Barons had taken the sayde othe, he then called vnto him his sonne Edward, and charged him with dyuers pointes vpon his blessing: among the which one especiall was, that he should neuer after that daye suffer Diers of Gaueston to returne into Englande, and so shortly after ended his lyfe vpon the vij. daye of Julie, when he had reigned. xxxiii. yeres. vij. Moneths and odde dayes. And after with great solempnity was coneyghed vnto Westmyster, and there buried in the Chapell of S. This noble prince had two wyfes, and had issue by them as may appere before in the twentie yere, and in the. xxvij. yere of this kings reigne, where it is at large set out.

King Edward given a great charge to his sonne.

The issue of this King is set out in the xx. and. xxvij. yere of his reigne.

The description of King Edward the first.

This king was of stature talle, somewhat swarte or black of colour; strong of body, and nothing fat, for by much exercise he did eschewe fatnesse: he was amiable of countenance, hauing black eyes, which when he waxed angry, would seeme to be fyrie: his heare was black and curled, he was very healthy and of a stout courage, that neuer fayled in any daunger, or aduersitie, he

He was verie pregnant and had an excellent boye, and commonly attributed any enterpryse he tooke in hande. He was a great louer and fauourer of religion, but yet a great enemye to the pride and insolencie of Priestes which in his dayes exceeded, and he iudged the same onely to spring of their wealth and riches. And therefore to bridle their wantonnesse he established the lawe for graunting landes in Normayn. Of friendship he was constant, and not easie to be reconciled where he conceived a displeasure. And in vacant times he gaue himself much to huntynge. Thus much Holioore.

Edwarde the seconde.

Edwarde the seconde of that name, and sonne of Edward the first, borne at Carnaruan beyng a towne of Wales, began his reigne ouer this realme of England the viij. daye of Julie in the yere of our Lord. 1307. and was crowned king at Westminster the. xxiiij. daye of February in the yere aforesayd.

King Edward the seconde.

This king was fayre of body, but bstedfast of maners and disposed to lightnesse. He refused the company of his Lordes and men of honoꝝ, and haunted among villeynges and vile personages. He gaue himselfe also to overmuche drinking, and lightly he would disclose things of great counsaile: and besides that, he was geuen to these vices by nature, he was made much worse by the counsaile and familiaritie of certein euill disposed persons, as Diers of Gaueston, Hugh Spencer the father, and the sonne, and other, whose wanton company and counsaile prouoked him to the appetyte and pleasure of the bodie, nothyng orderyng hys common weale by sadnesse, discretion and iustice, which thing caused great variance betwene him and his Lords, so that shortly he became to them hatefull, and in the ende was deprived of his kingdom.

The description of King Edward the second.

Diers of Gaueston.

But Holioore sayth, that immediatly after the death of his father he being then in Scotland at Dunfrieze, calling his counsaile together, did first of all cause the Lordes and rulers of Scotland to sweare vnto him homage and fealtie, the which euery one, except certein that leaned to the part of Robert le Bruze did willyngly offer. And then leauyng sufficient furniture for defence in Scotland, he returned into England, and so to London.

So soone as his father was buryed, and the Exequies scantly finished, he forgettyng the high and chargeable commaundement of his sayde father, sent in all hast for his olde compire Diers Gaueston, the which he receyued with all ioy and gladnesse, and aduanced him to much honour.

And shortly after, that is to say in December next follovyng, he sayled into to Fraunce, and the .xv. day of January solotoyng, he maryed at Boleyn Isabel the daughter of Philip the French king, which, as saith Froisart was one of the goodlyest Ladyes in the worlde. And shortly after he returned wyth her vnto London, where they were honourably receyued of the Citizens, and so conueyed to Westmynstre where as it is before reherfed they were both solemnly crowned the .xxiii. day of February. At the which coronation was such ptease that a knight called Sir John Bakewell was thrested to death.

And shortly after, the king gaue vnto Piers of Gaueston the Erlidome of Cornewall, & the Lordship of Walyngford, and was ruled all by his wanton counsaile, and folowed the appetyte and pleasure of his body, to the great offence of the nobilitie, and no lesse perill of his awne destruction.

Nowe shortly after, the king calling to hys remembraunce the great displeasure done vnto him and to his familier Piers of Gaueston by the Bishop of Chester, mencioned before in the .xxviii. yere of the reigne of king Edward the first, commaunded him vnto the Tower of London, where he was streightly kept many dayes after.

Then the Lordes of the land, and specially Sir Henry Lacy, Sir Guy and Sir Pymer de Walance Erle of Lyncolne of Warwike & of Penbrooke, to whom the noble Prince Edward the first, had geuen so great charge, that Piers Gaueston should no more come into Englande, sawe the rule of the lande, and howe that the kings tresorie by meane of the sayde Piers was wasted, assembled them in counsell & of one assent, wyth ayde of other Lordes of the realme, so spake to the king, that contrarie to his pleasure, he was aduoyded the land, and banished into Ireland for that yere. But the king sent vnto him often tymes diuerse secreete messengers, and comforted him wyth many rich giftes, and made him his chiefe ruler of that countrie.

And afterward, diuerse and sondry grudges happened betwene the king and his Lordes for the banishment of the sayd Piers Gaueston: wherefore to continue amitie betwene him and them, the sayd Piers was fet home againe, and so continued to the more vnquietnes and mischiefe of the realme.

About this tyme (as sayth the Authoz of Chronica chronicarum and other) the knightes of the order of saint John Baptist, called Saint Johns of Ierusalem, by knightly Manhoode, put out of the Isle of Rhodes the Turkes and infidels which to that day had kept and occupied the same Isle: and after that they wanne dayly and verely vpon the sayd Turkes, so that they had in their possession much of the landes of the Turkes. This Religion of Saint Johns, was greatly preferred, by the fall and suppression of the Templers, whose possessions, landes and goodes were geuen to them.

The aforesayde Piers of Gaueston, more and more encreasynge in the kinges fauour, had at the last the gudyng of all the kinges Jewelles and treasure. And at a certeyne tyme he went to Westmynstre, and there out of the kinges Jewell house he tooke a Table and a payre of Treselles of gold, and conueied them wyth other Jewelles out of the land, to the great empoueryng of the same. And moreouer, he brought the king by meane of hys wanton condicions to manifold vices, as adulterie, and other. Wherefore the aforesayd Lordes, seyng the mischiefe that dayly encreased by occasion of this unhappie man, tooke their counsaile together at Lincolne, and there concluded to aduoyde him againe out of Englande: so that shortly after he was exiled led in to Flaunders, to the kinges great displeasure.

This yere dyed Philip le Beau French king, commonly called Philip the fayre.

In this yere was borne at Windsor the kinges eldest sonne named Edward, which after the death of his father was king of this realme, by the name of king Edward the third, & he was borne the .xiiij. day of Nouember.

And this yere also was the aforesayd Gaueston called home againe out of Flaunders, which after his returne, did worffe then euer he did before: In so much that he disdeyned the Lordes of England, flouted, scorned, and rudely taunted them. Wherefore the Lordes assented and agreed to put him to death: And soone after assembling theyr powers, they besieged him in the Castell of Scarborough, and in short tyme wanne the Castell, and tooke him and brought him vnto Gauesede besyde Warwike, and there the .xix. daye of June smote off his heade. But when the king was informed thereof, he thewed hymselfe to be most greiuously displeased wyth the sayd Lordes, and made a solenne vowe that his death should be reuenged, as afterwarde it was, as shall appere.

Nowe by this occasion, the rancour and Malice that before was kindled betwene the king and his Lordes, was againe so encreased and inflamed, that it burst out to the vnderstanding of the whole realme: For after this day the king neither studied nor endeouored hymselfe to any thing so much, as to seeke some cause agaynst his Lordes, that by some one meane or other, hee might attaine to an occasion of reuengement, for the death of the afozenamed Gaueston. In this meane tyme dyed Sir Henry Lacy Erle of Lincolne, the which lyng vpon his death bed charged Sir Thomas Erle of Lancaster that had maryed his daughter, that he should stand with the other Lordes in the defence for the weale of England, the which request the said Erle graunted, and so did firmly obserue and kepe it, which was the occasion of the losse both of his awne life, and of many others also, as after shall appere.

At this tyme the king helde his high Court of Parliament at London, where by the aduice of his Lordes, he made many good ordinaunces and statutes for the suppression of riots and other mischiefes that then reigned: And in the ende, the king was sworne to keepe them, and so were all his Lordes.

And shortly after, worde was brought vnto the king that Robert le Bruce was returned into Scotlande, and had caused the Scottes to rebell of newe. Before in the .xxviii. yeere of king Edward the first ye haue heard how the sayde Edward chased the afozenamed Robert le Bruce out of Scotland into Normandy. But as it may be well coniectured, nowe when he vnderstoode of the misgouernance of the realme of Englande, and specially of the deuision betwene the king and his Lordes, he was encouraged wyth a small ayde of the Normans to returne againe into Scotland, where he behaued hymselfe in such wise to the Lordes of Scotland, that soone after they agayne made him king of the Realme, and then warred he soze vpon England, and wanne many Castels and strong holdes, and did to the Englishmen great harme and dammage, and (as sayth Sir John Froisart) the Scottes came brennyng and scoolyng this Realme, so farre, that they were foure or five dayes iourney within the Realme of Englande.

Nowe when the king was truly certeyned of thys great rage of the Scottes,

R. iii. Scottes,

Scottes, he with all conuenient speede made prouision to resist them, and gathering together a great power did passe by water and entred into Scotland and bzent and destroyed suche Villages and Townes as lay in his way without all mercye. Whereof, when Robert le Bruce had knowledge, he with the whole power of Scotland coasted toward the Englishmen, and by on Mydsomer day, mette with king Edward and his hoast at a place called Streuelyn, neere vnto a freshe ryuer that then was called Bannokelborne, where betweene the Englishmen and the Scottes was that daye foughten a most terrible and bloudie battayle: But the victorie fell to the Scottes, and the Englishmen speng, were chased of the Scottes so egerly, that many of them were drowned in the afozenamed ryuer, and many a noble man of Englande was that day slayne in that battayle, as Sir Gilbert de Clare Erie of Gloucester, Sir Robert Clifford, Sir Edmond of Hauile the kinges Steward, with other Lozdes and Barons to the number (as sayth Guido de Columna) of .xliij. and of knightes and Baronets to the number of .lxxij. beside .xxij. men of name, which that day of the Scottes were taken prisoners. And the king himselfe scaped with great daunger from that battayle, and both a fewe horse and small company came to Berwik, where he rested for a time. But Hector Boethus the Scot, whose nature is so shamefully and monstrously to lye, (that all the worlde may perceiue it) wyrteth that at this battayle were slaine fiftie thousand Englishmen with the Duke of Gloucester and two hundreth knightes. But belene him as it pleaseth you. And after the Scottes had obteyned this victorie, they being enflamed with pride, published in the derision and mockage of Englishmen manye fond and foolish rymes, the which I thinke meete to omit.

And after that king Edward had set the Towne of Barwik in as good order and suretie as he then might, he returned into England, and with small honour and lesse courage came to Westminster the .xix. day of August.

And not long after a Wileyne called John Doydras a tanners sonne of Ercester went about in diuers places of Englande and named himselfe to be the sonne of king Edward the first: a sayde that by meane of a false Nozice, he was stollen out of his Cradell, and Edward which was a Carters sonne was layde in the same Cradell in his place, and he himselfe was afterwarde hardely fostered and brought bp in the North parte of Wales. But when this Wileyn was layde for to be taken, for feare he fled to the Church of the whyte fryers in Oxford: where he thinking to haue beene safe and sure, because king Edward the first was founder of that Church, and there he rehearsed agayne the former sayeng, addyng moze therevnto, that it appeared well that the king was a Carters sonne, for hys conditions were accordyng to the same, as hys maners daylie bled did manifestly expresse and shew.

When thys Wileyn had thus continued a whyle, not without some rumour in the lande, lastly he was taken out of that place and carped as a felon vnto Northampton, and there was arreigned and iudged for his falsenesse, and so drawen and hanged. The which at the houre of his death confessed that he had a fende in his house in the similitude of a Cat, the which among other promyses to him made, he assured him that he should be king of Englande. And Fabian sayth that he confessed that he had serued the sayde fende thre yeres before, to bying his purpose about.

Thus

Thus king Edward beset with manye aduersities kept a counsaile at Porke sayth Holidore, for preparation of warre with Scotlande, and other things meete to be done for the weale of the realme of England. And shortly after Sir Peter Spaldyng knight was sent to Barwik with a crewe of Souldiours to fortifie that Towne, because the king had a certaine vnderstanding, that Robert le Bruce intended hastily to lay siege to that Towne.

And not long after the sayde Castell and Towne of Barwik was yeelded or lost, by treason of the atoresayde Sir Peter Spaldyng (as the common fame went) vnto Robert le Bruce king of Scottes. Also in this tyme was great misery in England by dearth of Corne, scarcetie of victualles and Moxeyn and death of Cattell. Moreover, in this time was sent into Englande two Cardinalles from Clement the fift Bishop of Rome to set an vniuersal peace betweene the Kinges of England and Scotland, and as they were rydyng into Scotland they were met withall vpon the Moore of Wiggildon in Yorkshire, and there robbed of suche stuffe and treasure as they brought with them. After which robbery, great inquirie was made, and at the last two knightes named Sir Gilbert Wyddleton and Sir Walter Selby with .vij. hundred men were accused to be the doers of the same, and were committed to prison for that felony, and after were at London condemned, drawen and hanged for the same, and their heades set vpon London Bridge: But the Cardynalles receyued of the king double the value of their harnes.

About this time also, Sir Goslyn Depnuile and his brother (as sayth John Hardyng) hauyng in his companye two hundreth persons clothed in fryers woedes, passed thorough the Countries as Outlawes and banished men, and robbed and spoyled all that they coulde meete with, and namely, they robbed and spoyled the Byshop of Durhams house and left nothing therein but bare walles, but at the last they were taken and hanged at Porke.

And in the ende of this yere fell suche aboundaunce of rayne and vnseasonable weather, that they could not carie in that little corne that they had on the grounde, by reason whereof followed great scarcetie, dearth, pestilence and death both of men and beastes.

Now againe the Scottes entred into Northumberland, and robbed and bzent the Countrie most cruelly, and spared neither man, woman, nor childe, and did so great harme, that the Countrie was thereby greatly impouerished. To this mischiefe also was ioyned another misery: for as it is rehearsed before, victuall by reason of the Moxeyn was waxed so scant and dere, that people were forced to eate Dogges, and other vnleane and filthie beastes, as Fabian and other do recite. And the dearth of graine was so great this yere that wheat was solde for foure marke a quarter, which if you conferre with the value of an ounce of siluer then currant, as is before expressed in the .xv. yere of king Edward the first, which was .xx. pence, with y time now which is the tenth yere of the reigne of our soueraigne Ladye Queene Elizabeth in the which an ounce of siluer is currant for fife shillinges, then after that rate, foure marke a quarter of that money, is of the money that is now currant with .viii. pound, and that is .xx. shillinges a bushell, which may well be called both a great price, and a great dearth: and by reason of this dearth of graine, and scarcetie of victuall, and of the warres with the Scottes, the people dyed and perished both by hunger and pestilence, so that the land was greatly greatly wasted and almost desolate of people, for the people living were scant to many in number as were able to bury the dead.

Yet the king assembled againe as great a power as he could get in thys realme of England, and went into Northumberland to resist the malice of the Scottes, which dayly made assautes vpon the Borders, and entered far within the realme of England, robbing, breunnyng and spoylyng the same. Wherefore, for great lacke and distresse of men, the king had manye people out of the South and East partes of England. And among other, the Citie of London, contrary to their liberties, were constreyned to find at their costes and charges two hundred men, and so sent them to Yorke.

When the king then beyng at Yorke had receyued his people from sundry Countreies and good townes of England, he with a conuenient number road toward Barwicke, and so sped his iourney, that at the length he came nere vnto Barwicke, and layde his siege about the same.

But while the king was busied in the assault of the towne, the Scottes brake ouer the water of Swale in great number, and leauing the coast where the kinges people lay, in secret wise came downe into the marches of Yorke-shire, and there slue the people and robbed them in most cruell wise. Wherefore the Archebishop of Yorke constreyned of pure necessitie to defende that Countreie, gathered vnto him an hundred and dispurueyed host for the warre, as Priors, Clerkes, Chanons, and other ministers of the Church, with husband men and other bmmete people: and so with a great number of men, and fewe warlye or discrete Capitaines, he went against the Scottes, and encountered them at a place called Whetton vpon Swale, the .xij. day of the moneth of October: But for lacke of wise and warly prouision, the Englishe men were beset of their enemies vpon euery syde, so that of them were slaine a great multitude, and the remnant put to shameful flight, by the which flight the sayde Archebishop, with the Abbot of Selby and other were preserued. And because in this Battayle there were slaine so many spirituall men, therefore it was after called of many wyrters the white battaile.

When the king was informed of this ouerthrow of the Northren men, and also that it drew so nere wynter, he therefore brake vp his siege and returned vnto Yorke, and shortly after went further into England.

At this tyme there was nothing done that concerned the order and gouernment of the realme, without the aduice and counsailes of Sir Hugh the Spencers, the father and the sonne, by whose procurement many thinges were done in England to the great grudge, as well of the noble men of the realme, as of the commons of the same, so that they were had in as great hatred and indignation, as before tymes was Piers Gauestone. And many euill reportes and great exorcions were tolde of them, as commonly it happeneth to all thale that are out of fauour with the common people.

This yere the king helde his counsaile or Parliament at Yorke, where contrary to the munde of the Lordes Sir Hugh Spencer the sonne was made high Chamberlaine of England: By reason whereof he waxed so haughty and proude, that no Lorde of this land durst displease him at any tyme, whereof grewe the occasion of the Barons warre, as after shall appere.

Before ye heard of two Cardinalles that came to trauaile to make a peace betwene the two kinges, but it would not be, wherefore the king purchased chased a curse of John the .xxij. Bishop of Rome, to accusse the Scottishe king and all that helde with him, or mainteyned him. But it auayled nothing, but put the king to great costes and charges, for the Scottes ceased not for all their cursynges, and the pooze commons were so vexed and that with so many troubles, as losse of their moueable goodes, of their possessions, and of all that euer they had, not onely by the foreyne enemye, but euen here among our awne people, by reason of the misgouernance of the king, as also by the trouble and variaunce that was betwene him and his Lordes: so that many were bitterly vndone, & a fewe singuler disordered persons aduanced.

Now when the greatest part of the Barony of England behelde this miserie of the people, how they were punished by the hand of God, and also by the ignorance of the king, they in secret maner assembled themselues together at a towne called Sherborne, and there concluded a reformation for this mischiese, which was, to remoue from the king the sayd Spencers, both the father and the sonne. And that this might take effect, Sir Thomas Erle of Lancaster, Sir Humfrey Bohun Erle of Hereford, Sir John Mowbray Baron, Sir Roger Clifford Baron, Sir Goslyn Daniell Baron, Sir Roger Toket, Roger Benefield, Sir Roger Mortimer, Sir William Suland, Sir William Elmbridge, Sir John Gifford, and Sir John Cyers, Barons and knightes with diuers other, swaere eche of them to stand by other vntill they had amended the state of the realme.

And shortly after, by their aduice and agreement, Sir John Mowbray, Sir Roger Clifford, and Sir Goslyne Danyell, with a strong company entered vpon the Manours, and Castelles of the sayde Spencers, standyng in the Marches of Wales, and spoyled and destroyed them. Of the which ryot the Spencers complayned to the king. And for an order of due punishment for these to be taken, the king called vnto him dyuers of his counsell at Wyndesore, and there it was determined that the sayde Sir John Mowbray, Sir Roger Clifford and Sir Goslyne Danyell should appere before the kinges counsell shortly after, and there to make answer vpon that ryot. And if they refused that to doe, that then they should aduoyde the lande shortly after as banished men. But no day of apparaunce was kept by them. Wherefore proclamations was made in dyuers places of the realme and at London the .xviij. day of Marche, that the sayde Sir John Mowbray, Sir Roger Clifford and Sir Goslyne Daniell, should aduoyde the lande within .x. dayes following vpon paine of death. Whereof heiring the Lords and Barons before named, reassembled them a more strong power, and vpon that sent a messenger vnto the king, beseeching hym humbly, to exclude and remoue from him the counsell of the Spencers, which daylie did vnto him great dishonour, and to the common weale of the realme great hinderance. The king heering this humble request, was with it nothing content, but yet fearyng greatly the destruction of his awne person, assembled his counsaile for the reformation of thys matter: where it was concluded, that the king shoulde call a Parliament at London. And forthwith the king wrote his letters and sent the same vnto the sayde Barons, commaundyng them at a daye prefixed to bee at the sayde Parliament, who at the day appointed, made their apperaunce at London, bringyng with them a great hoste of men of armes in a sute of Jarquets or Cotes parted, yelow and greene, with a band of white cast cast overthwart. And for this cause, that Parliament long after was of the common people called the Parliament of whyte bandes.

At this tyme the Maiour of the Citie of London for the preservation of the sayd Citie, & for the fire keeping of the kings peace, caused daylie a thousand men being weil armed, to warde the Gates and water sydes of the sayd Citie, and the same warders or watchemen to begimne their watche at foure of the clock in the morning, and so continued vntill .vij. of the clock at night. At which tyme, as manye were ordeyned for to take the charge of the night watch, and so to continue vntill the houre of fyve of the clock in the morning. And because the night watch should be the moze duely kept, therefore there was assigned nightly two Aldermen to ryde about the Citie with certayne officers of the Towne to see the watchmen weil and discretely ordred and guided. And the gates were shut at .ix. of the clock, and opened againe at .vij. in the morning, and euery Citizen was warned to haue his harnes by him, that he might be readie with short warnyng whensoever he were called.

Thus durynge the tyme of the Parliament which was holden at Westminster, the watch, as aforesayde, was holden and kept in London. And among other things it was ordeyned in that Parliament for the weale of the lande that Sir Hugh Spencer the father, and Sir Hugh the sonne, should be banished out of the realme of Englande for terme of lite. And shortly after that banishment was put in execution, so that they both were brought vnto Douer, there to take shyping. Where Hugh the father made great mone when he should take his shyp, and cursed his sonne in the heryng of those that had the guyding of them, sayeng: that by his meanes he was banished from the flowre of all the landes christened.

Then the king dissolued the Parliament, and euerye man returned to his abone. But it was not long after but that worde was brought to the king, that Sir Hugh Spencer the sonne houed vpon the coaste of England, and tooke prayes of all Marchaunts that passed by his course: But the king made as though he vnderstood no suche thing, and suffred that and many moe euill deedes to go unpunished, the which at length he repented full soze, and toke therof great remorse of conscience as appereth in the ende of his reigne.

The king being bewitched with the loue of the aforesayde Spencers did now agayne reuoke the actes and ordynances made in the last Parliament, and called agayne into Englande the aforesayde Spencers to theirs and his callinge awaye, as after it shall appeere, and set them agayne in auctoritie as high as euer they were, malogre the heart and minde of all his Barons, and to the great vniquietnesse of all the realme. And shortly after beganne quarell piking, and the king beganne claympng a title by the Queene of the Castell of Ledes in Kent, which belonged to sir Barthen Bladefmore knight then being on the Barons party, and the king besieged the sayde Castell, and by the helpe of the Citizens of London did at the last by strength wyne the same, and spoyled the moueables thereof, which were of a great value.

Nowe when the king had thus called home the Spencers, and things were ruled and gouerned after their sensuall appetites and pleasures, without having any respect or regard to the common weale of the realme of England. The Barons also well pondering and considering among themselves that this lewde kinde of gouernment vsed by the Spencers must of necessity at at the last bring the lande to great ruyne, and the king to great dishonour: they entending to preuent the mischiefe that might ensue thereof, gathered vnto them a great power. And in the meane tyme that Sir Thomas Erle of Lancaster was gathering of his people, the two Mortymers, that is to say, Sir Roger Mortymer of warke, and Sir Roger of Wypgmoze with other, went vnto the Marches of Wales, and tooke by strength certayne Cities and Townes belongyng to the Spencers, and pursued also some of the kinges seruantes. Wherefore the king heyring of the rebellion of hys Lords, made hastie speede, and with a great hoste came about by Shrewesbury, and was neere vnto them befoze they were ware of hym, so that for feare, the sayde Mortymers yelded themselves vnto the kings grace and mercy, the which forthwith were conueyed as prisoners vnto the Tower of London.

When the king had set all thinges in order about the marches of Wales, he then gathered moze strength about him, and therefore about the begynnyng of March, he set forward and came to Glocester, where the Spencers with all their people met with him. And from thence they went to Lichefield, at which tyme the Erles of Lancaster and of Herefford with their host were at Burton vpon Trent, and forstefied the bridge, that the king might not come ouer the sayde Riuer. Then the king was brought vnto a foorde, and began to set ouer his knightes, whereof heeryng the sayde Erles, they forsooke the towne and fled. But befoze they could passe farre vpon their iourney, they were encountered of Sir Aymer de Walaunce Erle of Pembrooke, with the Spencers and other of the kinges host vpon the .xij. of March, and them did ouerset, and caused them to fle, who at the last came to Dornfret. In thys meane tyme, the Erle Thomas had sent a knight of his named Robert Holland, into Lancashire for to arrere his tenantes. But when the sayde Sir Robert heard of the sayde skirmishe, and howe his maister was fled, he then drewe to the king, and presented him with such company as he then brought. And thus the kinges power daylye encreased, and the Barons discreased. Then the Barons heeryng of the goyng of Sir Robert Holland vnto the kinges partie, were therewithall astoned, and tooke their counsaile in the Priours of Dornfret, where after sondrie reasons and argumentes, they concluded that they would go vnto the Castell of Dunstanborough, and there to remaine vntill such tyme as they might purchase the kinges mercie. And as they set forward vpon their purposed iourney, takyng with them such people as they had, at the last they came to a towne called Burghbridge, where they were encountered of Sir Andrew of Harkley knight, with other that were come out of the North with a strong company: Who gaue there an onset vpon the Barons, and in the ende discomfited them, and chased their people. In the which fight was slaine the Erle of Herefford, sir Roger Benefielde, and sir William Sulland, and other: and there was taken the Erle of Lancaster, sir Roger Clifford, sir John Mowbray, sir Roger Tuckettes, sir William Fitz William, with dyuerse other, and they were led to Poike. And this fielde was faughten the .xv. day of March. 1320.

It was not long after that Sir Hugh Daniell, and Sir Barthelw de Bladifmore were taken. And sir Thomas Erle of Lancaster was brought againe to his abone towne of Dornfret, where he was brought in iudgement befoze sir Aymer de Walaunce Erle of Pembrooke, sir John Briteyn Erle of Richmond, Thomas Erle of Lancaster beheaded.

From this tyme forward for the space of foure yeres, the Spencers encreased meruellously in fauour and aucthoritie with the king, and as fast decayed the fauour of the king towards the Queene, vntill such tyme as shee was relieved by her brother the french king, as after shall be shewed.

But nowe to retorne wher we left. The same same day that the aforesayde Erle of Lancaster was put in execution, Sir Roger Tuckettes, Sir William Fitz William, sir Waren of Isele or Iell, sir Henry of Bradborne, and sir William Chepny Barons and knightes, were also drawen and hanged, and their heades smitten off and sent to London, which were all put to death at Pomfret aforesayde, with an Esquier called John Page. And at Porke soone after was drawne and headed Sir Roger Clifford, Sir John Howbray, and sir Goselyn Daniell, Barons. And at Bristow, sir Henry Womington, and sir Henry Mountford Banerettes: And at Gloucester sir John Gifford, and sir William Clunbridge knightes: And at London sir John Cyers Baron: And at Wyndchelsey, sir Thomas Culpeper knight, and at Windsoze, sir fraunces Waldenham Baron, and at Cauntorbury, sir Bathew Gladysinoore, and sir Bartholl de Alborneham Barons, and at Cardiffe in Wales, sir William Flemynge knight.

After that the king had thus executed and subdued his Barons, he sommoned a Parliament at Porke about whitfontide next folowing, in the which Parliament Edward the kinges sonne was first made Prince of Wales and Duke of Aquitaine, Sir Hugh Spencer the father was made Erle of Winchester, and sir Andrew of Harkelay, Erle of Carleyle, and in the same were disherited all suche as befoze tooke partes, or had holden with the Erles of Lancaster, and Herford, except sir Hugh Daniell and fewe other, the which sir Hugh was receyued to grace, because he had maryed a kinneswoman of the kinges.

Sir Hugh Spencer the father made Erle of Winchester.

Shortly after Maister Robert Baldock, a man of euill fame and name, was by the king made Chauncelour of England. And he helped forward that good store of forfeites and fines were gathered into the kinges treasury, without sparyng of privileged places or other: so that whatsoeuer could be found, the same was seased for the king: By reason whereof, much treasure was brought vnto the kinges Coffers, besides great thinges that were byrbed and spoyled by the Officers of diuers shires.

This yere sayth Fabian, the king gathered the sixt penny of all tempo- rall mennes goodes within England, Ireland, & Wales, which was graun- ted vnto him in the aforesayd Parliament for the defence of Scotland: which money was not payed without great murmure and grudge, considering the manifold miseries that the common people at those dayes were wrapped in. And this yere also (as Fabian sayth) the Sunne appered to mannes sight as red as blood, and so continued by the space of sixe houres, and it was vpon the last day of October.

About this tyme the Scottes entending to do a feate in Ireland, and to subdue that countrie to their obeyssaunce, entered it with a strong host vnder their their Capitaine, Edward le Bruce, brother to the Scottish king. But the Irish men bare them so manfully, that they banquished the Scottes, and chased them out of that countrie. In which chase and fight the sayd Edward le Bruce and many other noble men of Scotland were slaine.

Edward le Bruce the brother of the king of Scots slaine.

Nowe againe the king made great prouision for to haue entred vpon Scotland, so that he was entring the lande about the beginning of August. But the Scottes hauyng knowledge of the greatnesse and strength of hys armie, withdrew themselves into Mountaynes, Marishes and other suche places, as the English army could not come at them: And this was done by the Scottes of purpose to werye and tyer the English army. And shortly after among the hoste entered sundrie diseases and sickneses, so that many of them dyed, and were cast away in that iourney, aswell for lack of victuall, as by other infirmities, so that the king for these causes & other, was constrained to retorne againe into England without doyng any notable act: Wherof when the Scottes were informed, sir John Douglas, and other Capiteines folowed and costed the king in such wise, that they had almost taken the king at dinner, at an Abbey called Bellaunde. Then the king of pure constraint defended himselfe, and withstood the Scottes so well as he might. But after a small and weake fight, the king was compelled to fle, and by that meane to saue him selfe.

The king againe entred Scotland but returneth home without any victory.

In the aforesayde skirmishe was taken Sir John Britayne Erle of Richemonde, and the kinges treasour was there spoyled and caried awaye, and the ordynaunce belongyng to the hoste, a great parte of it, was by the Scottes carped into Scotlande.

Then the Scottes in their retorne homeward, wanne the Castell of Roxham, and robbed the Towne of Northallerton, and other. For this losse and harmes Sir Andrew of Harkelay Erle of Carleyle was much blamed and charged by misleadynge of the kinges hoste.

This yere it was ordeyned, that when anye theese or other trespasser should be hanged, that from thenceforth, the same should forthwith be cut downe and buried, where befoze they were wont to hang still vntill they were consumed.

These being dead was appoynted to be buried.

The king now being informed that the great dishonour and losse befoze mentioned by the Scottes, happened by the vnturth, and treason of the aforesayde Sir Andrew of Harkelay Erle of Carleyle, caused a knight named Sir Anthony Lucy to arest the sayde Sir Andrew Erle of Carleyle, and to bring him safely vnto hys presence. And the sayde Sir Anthony made suche speede herein that the second day of Marche followyng the sayde Erle was taken, & so kept in prison vntill October next followyng, at which tyme the sayde Sir Andrew was arreigned and condemned for that he had taken money of the Scottes to betray the king his naturall Lozde. For the which treason he was at Westchester or at Shrewesbury drawen and hanged, and his head sent after to London, and set vpon the Bridge.

At this time also, the warre began to quicken in Guyan betweene the Englishmen and Frenchmen, whereof the occasion was (sayth the french Chronicle) for a Bastile or Fortresse buylded by the Lozde Mount Desart, a Lozde of Gascoyne, vpon the french kinges ground, as the Frenchmen sayde: But the Gascoynes and Englishmen iustified it to be within the territoꝝ of Guyan. For this, first began great words, and after many threates, but in the ende, mortall warre. So that the Gascoynes, with the ayde of the kings Steward of Englande slue many of the Frenchemen that came to ouerthrowe the sayde Bastle.

When Charles the French king heard of the ouerthrow of the Frenchmen, and howe the Gascoynes fortified the sayde Bastle within his sayde Seignory as he was informed, he sent with all speede his Uncle Charles de Valoys with a great hoste, who made sharpe and cruell warre agaynst the Gascoynes, and wanne from them the Towne of Angeob and Amyas with dyuers other, and at the last came vnto the Townes or Citie of Ryoll, and layed siege vnto the same: But the Englishmen with the Gascoynes issued out of the towne and gaue battaile vnto the Frenchemen, and put them to the worse, and slue. xiiij. C. of them. Among the which a Lorde, called the Lord of Saint Florentine, with other noble men of Fraunce were slayne, and the other enforced to lye further from the Towne. Howbeit in the ende, the sayd Towne by appoyntment was yelden to the Frenchmen vpon condition, that all suche Englishmen as were within the Towne should go freely with their goodes to Burdeaux, or if they would remaine there still, then to be swoꝛne vnto the French king, and to remaine there as Frenchmen.

After which Towne yeelded as aforesayde, Sir Edmond of Woodstock the kinges brother, then beyng at Burdeaux as the kinges Deputie, made suche resistance agaynst the sayde Charles de Valoys, that a truce was taken for that yere.

And about Mydent next folowynge, the king hauing knowledge of this warre in Guyan, and howe the French king extended to seale all Gascoyne and Guyan, for breaking of couenantes betweene them made, and not by king Edward perfoꝛmed, sent ouer the Queene his wife the French kinges sister to entreate an agreement and peace betweene them, as sayth Fabian. But Sir John froissart in his historie, sheweth the cause of her goynge to be otherwise, and wyrteth as followeth.

When the Queene (sayth he) perceyued the pride of the Spencers and howe they preuayled with the king, and had caused him to put to death the greatest parte of the nobles of his realme of Englande, and also that they bare towarde hir a sower countenance, and she fearing least they should haue put something into the kinges head, that might haue bene to the perill of her lyfe, was therefore desyꝛous to be out of this feare, and pityng also the miserable gouernement daylie practised and vsed agaynst the whole state and communalte of the Realme in all kinde of tyrannies and cruelties, by the aforesayde Spencers. The Queene therefore purposed nowe to fflye the Realme and to go into Fraunce, and therefore did feyne her selfe that shee would go on pilgrimage to Saint Thomas of Cauntorbury, from whence shee tooke hir way to Winchelsey, and in the night entred into a ship which before was prepared for her, and had with her, her eldest sonne Edward, and the Erle of Cane, and Sir Roger Mortymer, who a little before brake out of the Tower of London, as after shall be shewed. And in another Ship they had placed their necessarie provision and furnytur & then hauynge wind at will, they arriued shortly at the haven of Boleyn in Fraunce, where shee was most ioyfully receyued of the Capiteyne of the Towne, and also of the Abbot there, who conueyed her and all her company into the Abbey, where they were feasted and cheered. And after the Queene had remainyd there two dayes, she then daylie iourneyed so farre, that at the last shee came to Paris. But the French king her brother, hauing before knowledge of her comming, had sent to meete her dyuers of the greatest Lordes of his realme, as the Lorde, sir Robert de Artoys, the Lorde of Cracy, the Lord of Sully, the Lorde of Roy and dyuers other, who honorably did receaue her and brought her into the Citie of Paris, vnto the king hir brother. And when the king sawe his sister, whome he had not sene long before: as she should haue entred into his Chamber he met her, and tooke her in his armes and kissed her and sayd: ye be welcome sayre sister, with my sayre Nephew your sonne and tooke them by the handes and led them forth. The Queene who had no great ioye at her heart, but that she was so neere to the king her brother, she would haue kneeled downe two or thre times at the feete of the king: But the king would not suffer her, but helde her still by the right hande, demaundayng right gently of her estate and businesse. And she answered him right sagely, and recounted to him all the vilanyes and iniuries done to her by Sir Hugh Spencer, and prayed of him his ayde and comfort.

When the Noble king Charles of Fraunce had heard his sisters lamentation, who with teares had expressed her heauie case, he most comfortably spake vnto her and sayd: sayre sister quiet your selfe, for by the sayth I owe to God and Saint Denise, I shall right well prouyde for you some remedy. The Queene then kneeled downe whether the king would or not, and sayd: My right deere Lord and sayre brother, I pray God rewarde you. The king then tooke hir by in his armes, and led hir into another chamber, the which was appareled for hir, and for the yong Prince Edward her sonne, and so for that time departed from her, and caused all thinges that was behouefull and meete for her and her sonne to be deliuered vnto them at hys costes and charges.

And not long after, the sayde Charles, French king, for thys cause chiefly assembled together a great number of the greatest Lordes and Barons of his realme, to haue their counsaile and good aduise, howe he might best prouyde to remedy and help the distresse of his sister the Queene of Englande. And it was thought best to them, that the French king should suffer hys sister to make the best friendes shee could, in Fraunce or any other where and that the king should not take anye knowledge thereof: for sayde they, the king to minister an occasion of warre with Englande, and so bring hys aboue realme in trouble, is neyther honorable for hymselfe nor profitable for his realme. And they concluded, & the king might conueniently ayde her with Golde and Syluer, which is the Metall that purchaseth both the loue of the Gentleman and also of the souldyours. And to thys counsell and aduyce the king agreed: and caused thys determination to be shewed to the Queene priuely by Sir Robert de Artoys, who at that time was one of the greatest Lordes in all Fraunce.

Howe the Barons of Englande that were leftte, considering that the Spencers had so drawne the king to doe and consent to whatsoeuer they required: and considering also howe they had not onely made awaye the greatest parte of the Barony of Englande, but also kept those that remainyd in such feare and awe that they could beare no rule, nor be heard with the King by reason of their auzhoritie. Therefore the sayde Barons which were left, assembled themselves together, and with one accord, wroze ouer into France to the Queene of England, certefying her that if she could finde the meanes to haue any company of men of armes (if it were but to þ number of a thousand) and to bring hir sonne and heyre with her into England: that then they would all draue to her, and obey vnto her and her sonne Edward, and ayde them with all their power, as they were bounde to doe of duetie.

The aforesayde letters beyng secretly sent vnto her out of Englande, she shewed them vnto king Charles her brother: who answered her and sayd, Good sister, if God be your ayde, your businesse shall preuail the better. Take of my men and subiectes, to the number of that your friendes haue written vnto you for, and I consent well to this boyage: I will cause to be deliuered vnto you, golde, and siluer so muche as shall suffice you. And herein the Queene had so traueyled, what with her prayer, gistes and promises, that many great Lordes and pong knightes agreed to bring her againe into England. Then the Queene as secretly as she coude, prepared for her boyage, and made her prouision: But she could not do it so secretly, but that sir Hugh Spencer had knowledge thereof. Wherefore he thought to get the good will of the French king her brother from her, by gistes: And secretly he sent messengers into France, with great plentie of golde, syluer and riche Jewels, and specially to the king, and to his prync counsaile: The which gistes tooke such effect, that in a short space, the French king and all his prync counsaile were as colde and as straunge to helpe the Queene forwarde in her boyage as though they had neuer talked of the matter. And the French king brake that boyage, and made proclamation, commaundryng all his subiectes vpon paine of banishment, that none should be so hardie, as to go with the Queene to bring her againe into England. And besides this, the sayd sir Hugh Spencer practised more malice, and compassed and deuised with himselfe a further mischief, which was, howe he might bring to passe to get againe the Queene into England, to be vnder the kinges daunger and his. And to bring this about, the sayde sir Hugh caused the king to wyte vnto the Pope, effectually despyng him that he would sende and wyte to the French king, that he should send the Queene his wyfe againe into England. For he tooke God to record that it was not through his faulte or occasion that she departed from him, for he entended nothing towardes her, but loue and good fayth, as belongeth vnto matrimonye. And he caused also like letters to be made to diuerse of the Cardinales, wherin were practised many subtile deuises, which were to long here to be reherced. And to suche as were most neresst and about the Pope, he sent great plentie of golde and siluer: insonuch, that they so traueyled and preynted with the Pope, that they caused him to write vnto the French king, that vpon payne of curslyng, he should send his sister Isabel into England to the king her husband. These letters were brought vnto the French king by the Byshop of Kayntes, whome the Pope had sent in that legation. And when the king had red the letters, he caused them to be shewed to the Queene his sister, whome he had not seene of a long space before, and now he comaunded her forthwith to aduouide his realme, or else he would cause her to aduouide with shame.

When

When this tidings was brought to the Queene, she was at her wiffes ende, and knewe not what to do, or what aduise to take, for as then, all the Barons of France had forsaken her by the commaundement of the French king, and so she was left all comfortlesse, sayng that her dere Cosyn the Erle of Arthoys did secretly counsaile and comfort her as muche as he might, for otherwise he durst not, because the king had forbidden him: But he was fully perswaded that the Queene was wrongfully bered and troubled. Thus was sir Robert of Arthoys at the Queenes commaundement, but he durst not speake nor be acknowen thereof. For he heard the king say and swear, that whosoener spake to him for the Queene his sister, should lose his landes and be banished the realme. And he knewe secretly howe the king was in minde and will, to cause his sister to be taken, and Edward her sonne, and the Erle of Cane, and sir Roger Mortimer, and to put them al in the handes of the king, and of sir Hugh Spencer. Wherefore he came on a night and declared all this to the Queene, and aduised her of the perill that she was in. Then the Queene was greatly abashed, and besought him with weeping eyes to geue her his best counsaile. Then he sayd, Madame I counsaile you that you departe and go into the Empire, where as there bee manye great Lordes, who may right well ayde you, and specially the Erle Guillam of Henault, and sir John of Henault his brother. These two are great Lordes and wise men, true, dread, and redoubted of their enemies. Then the Queene caused to be made redy all her prouision, and payde for euerything as secretly as she might, and so she and her sonne, and the Erle of Cane, and all her company departed from Paris and rode towarde Henault, and so long they roade vntill at the last she came to Cambresey. And when she knewe that she was in the Empire, then she thought her selfe in some better assurance than she was in before: And so passed through Cambresey, & entered into Ostrenant in Henault, and lodged at Ambreticourt in a knightes house, who was called sir Dambrecourt, who receyued her right ioyously in the best maner to his power. In so much that afterward the Queene of England and her sonne had the same knight and his wife and children with them into Englande and aduanced them in diuerse maners.

And in this meane tyme (sayth Polydore) Water Stapleton Bishop of Exeter, which hether to had bene with the Queene and was of her counsaile in France, did priuely flie from her into England vnto the king, and reueled vnto him all Queene Isabels counsailes and ententes, the which his doings was the begynnyng of his mischief, as shall be shewed.

Some after the comynng of the Queene of England and her sonne into Henault, the same was well knownen in the house of the good Erle of Henault, who then was at Valenciens. And sir John of Henault was certified of the tyme when the Queene came to the house of sir Dambrecourt, the which sayde John was brother to the sayde Erle Guylam. And the sayd sir John as one all pong and lustie and despyous of honoz, mounted on his horse backe and departed with a small companie from Valenciens, and came the same night to Ambreticourt, and did to the Queene all the honour and reuerence that he could deuise.

The Queene, who was right sorowfull, declared (complaynyng most piteously) vnto him with weeping eyes her miserable case, whereof the sayde

Sir John had great pittie, so that the water ran out of his eyes, and sayd, sayre Lady, beholde me here your abone knight, who will not sayle to dye for you in the quarrell, I will do the best of my power to conduct you and my Lorde your sonne, and helpe to bring you into your estates in England by the grace of God, and with the helpe of your friendes in those parties. And I and such other as I can desyre, will put our liues and goodes in aduenture for your sake, and we will get men of warre sufficient (if God be pleased) without the daunger of the french king your brother.

Then the Queene would haue kneeled doctone for great ioy that shee had, and to haue yelded thankes for the good will that he had offred vnto her: But this noble knight tooke her by quickly in his armes, and sayde: By the grace of God, the noble Queene of Englande shall not kneele to me. But Madaine, recomfort your selfe and all your companie, for I will keepe you faythfull promise, and ye shall go see the Erle my brother, and the Countesse his wife, and all their fayre children, who will receyue you with great ioy, for so I hearde them say they would do.

Then the Queene sayde, sir I finde in you more loue and comfort then in all the worlde. And for this that you haue sayde and affirmed vnto me, I thanke you a thousand times: and if you will do this that you haue promised, in all curtesie and honour I and my sonne shall be to you for euer bound, and the whole realme of Englande shall consider your great curtesie and gentleness, and it is right that it should so be.

And after these wordes, when they were thus agreed, sir John of Henault took his leaue of the Queene for that night, and went to Douaingue, and lay in the Abbey. And in the morning he tooke his horse, and came againe vnto the Queene, who receiued him with great ioy: And before he came, the Queene had dyed, and was ready to mount on her horse, and to go wpyth him: And forthwith the Queene departed from the Castell of Dambrecourt, taking her leaue of the knight, and of the Lady, and thanked them for their gentle enterpymment, and sayde, that shee trusted once that she or her sonne should remember well their curtesie.

The Queene bled to death of her weightie affayres.

Thus departed the Queene in the company of Sir John Henault, Lorde Beaumont: who right ioyously did conduct her to Valenciens: and to salute and welcome her, there came many of the Burgesses of the Towne, and receiued hir right honorably. And so was shee brought before the Erle Guyllam of Henault, who receiued her with great ioye, and in like maner did the Countesse his wyfe, and feasted her right nobly. And at the same tyme the sayde Erle had foure fayre daughters, Margaret, Philip, Jane, and Isabell. Among whome the young Prince Edward set most his loue, and had to his company Philip, and also that young Lady was in all honor more conuersant with hym, then was any of his sisters. Thus the Queene of England aboade at Valenciens by the space of. viij. dayes wpyth the good Erle, and wpyth the Countesse his wyfe, whose name was Jane de Walops.

In the meane season, the Queene prepared and called on for the setting forward of her businesse: and the aforesayde Sir John wrote letters betwix effectuously vnto knightes, and suche companions as he trusted best in all Henault, in Brabant, and in Behaigne, and prayed them of all loues and friendships that was betwene them, that they would go with him in this enterpryce terpryce into Englande, and there came great numbers, what of one Countrie and other, that were content to go with him for his loue. But this sayde Sir John Henault was greatly discouraged, and counsayled to the contrary both of the Erle hys brother, and of the chiefe of the counsell of the countrie, because it seemed to them that the enterpryce was right highe and perillous, considering the great disorde and hatredes that then were in Englande amongst the Barons themselues. And also considering that the Englishmen most commonly haue enuye at straungers. Therefore they doubted that the sayde Sir John of Henault, and his company should not returne agayne with honour. But howsoeuer they blamed or counsayled him, the gentle knight would neuer chaunge his purpose, but sayd that he had but one death to dye, the which should be when and howe as God would, and sayde mozeouer, that all knightes ought to ayde, to their powers, all Ladyes and damoselles, chased out of their awne Countries, being bothe without counsayle and comfort.

Sir John of Henault is aduised not to take this enterpryce in hand, but his courage would forward, who euer said nay.

Now thys courageous and lusty knight assembled his people, and appointed at a daye, the Henaultes to be readie at Hale, the Brabanders at Bredas, and the Hollanders at Durdright. Then the Queene of Englande tooke her leaue of the Erle of Henault, and of the Countesse, and thanked them greatly for their honorable feasting and great cheere that they had made her, and kissed them at her departure. Thus the Queene with her sonne and all the rest of her company came forward with Sir John of Henault, who with muche adoe gate leaue to depart from his brother the Erle, sayeng vnto him: my Lorde and brother, I am young, and I thinke that God hath prouyded for me this enterpryce for mine aduancement. I beleue verily that wrongfully and synfully this Lady hath bene chased out of England, and also her sonne. It is almoste and glorie to God, and to the worlde to comforte and helpe them that are comfortlesse, and specially so highe and noble a Lady as thys is, who is daughter to a king, and descended of a royall king: we be of her bloud, and she is of oures. I had rather renounce and forsake all that euer I haue, & go serue God ouer the sea, and neuer to returne into this countrey, rather then thys good Lady should haue departed from vs without our comfort and helpe. Therefore deere brother, suffer me to go with your good will, wherein ye shall doe nobly, and I will geue you most humble thankes for the same, and my boyage shall be the moze prosperous. And when the good Erle of Henault had well heard his brother, and perceiued the great desyre he had to this enterpryce, and sawe well it might turne hym and hys heyres to great honour hereafter, sayde to him. My dere brother, God forbid that your good purpose should bee broken or let: therefore in the name of God I geue you leaue, and kyssed hym, streynyng hym by the hande, in token of great loue.

The Queene departeth frō the Erle of Henault yelding great thankes for her honorable entertainment.

Howe Sir John of Henault receiued his leaue of his brother the Erle

Thus he departed, and roade the same night to Mounce in Henault with the Queene of England. What should I make long processe, they made so speedie iourneys, that shortly they came to Durdright in Holland, where they made their speciall assembly. And there they prouyded for shippes great and small, such as they could get, and shipped their horses and harneys and other prouision, and committed themselues into the handes and defence of almighty God, and so tooke shyping, and set forward on their passage by Sea.

How the Lordes came to the aide of the Queene.

Sea. In thys company there were of knightes and Lordes : first, Sir John Helynault Lozde Beamond, Sir Henry Dautonig, Sir Mighell de Wyne, the Lozde of Gomegnes, Sir Perciuall de Semeries, Sir Robert de Bailleull, Sir Sampes de Boslopt, the Lozde of Vertoigne, the Lozde of Bocelles, the Lozde Willers, the Lozde of Heyn, the Lozde of Sars, the Lozde of Boylers, the Lozde of Dambreticourt, the Lozde of Sarmuell, and Sir Sulpharte of Guffell, and dyuers other knightes and esquyers, all in great desyre to serue their mayster. And when they were all departed from the haven of Durdright, they were for their quantitie a very fayre fleete and well ordered, and the weather was fayre, cleere and temperate, and at their departing with the first flood they came befoze the dignesse of Holland. And the next daye, they hoysed by their sayles and tooke their waye in coasting Feland, & their entents were to haue taken land at Dongport, but they could not, for a tempest toke them in the sea, that put them so farre out of their course, & they wist not of two dayes where they were, wherin God wrought mercifully for them, for if they had landed where they purposed to haue laded, they had bene all lost, for they had fallen into the handes of their enemies, who knew wel of their coming, & abode them there to haue put them al to death.

And it came so to passe that by the ende of two dayes, the tempest ceased, and the maryners discried lande in England, and thereunto drewe right ioyfully, & there landed on the sandes without any haven or port, nere unto Harwich in Suffolk, as the English chronicle sayth, the .xxiiij. day of September 1327. and so taried on the sands thre daies with smal prouision of victual, in which time they vnshipped their horse & harneys, not knowing in what part of England they were, whether among their friends, or in the daunger of their enemies. The fourth day they set forwarde in this aduenture, desyryng God to be their guyde, and as people that had suffred cold and tempests, with hunger also and feare went weakely outward as well as they might. And thus they kept their course by hilles and dales on the one side & on the other, untill at the last, they found Villages, & a great Abbay of black Monkes, the which was called S. Hamon, where as they thre dayes refreshed themselves wel. And then newes was spread abroad thorough the realme, of the landyng of the Queene and of her sonne, so that at the last it came to the knowledg of the Barons, by whom the Queene was called again into England, and they appareled themselves in all haste to come to Edward her sonne, whome they would haue to their souereigne Lord. And the first that came and gaue them most comfort was Henry Erle of Lancaster with this wyre neck, called Cort coll, who was brother to Thomas Erle of Lancaster & was beheaded, as ye haue heard befoze, who was a right vertuous & good knight as after ye shal here.

This Erle Henry came vnto the Queene with a great company of men of warre. And after him came from one part & other, Erles, Barons, knightes, and Esquyers, with so many people that they thought themselves out of all perilles, and their power still encreased as they went.

So sone as king Edward had knowledg of the landyng of the Queene his wife, and of his sonne Prince Edward, and heeryng also howe the Barons and Nobles of the realme resorted vnto her with great powers from all partes : The king beyng then at London, left the sayde Citie vnder the gouernment and order of Maister Walter Stapleton, Bishop of Exeter, who was was nowe high treasurer of England, and the king himselfe accompanied with the Spencers, and a few other, taketh his way into Wales : But when he came to Bristowe, he caused that towne to be fortesfyed, and committed the charge and custodie thereof vnto sir Hugh Spencer the elder, and the Erle of Arondell: and he himselfe with sir Hugh Spencer the yonger, entered into the Castell, and fortesfyed the same.

The Queene heeryng of the kinges departyng from London, did forthwith send her letter to the Maioz and comunaltie of the sayde Citie requyryng of them aide to subdue the oppressors of the comon wealthe of the realme, and that they would see that the Citie of London & the Tower might be kept to the vse of the Prince her sonne : and sondrie other thinges were conteyned in the sayd letter, but for that the Copie that came to my hande seemed to conteyne diuerse repugnances, I haue therefore omitted the reherfall thereof. After the receipt of this letter, Fabian sayth, that Walter Stapleton, Bishop of Excester, to whome the custodie and gouernement of the Citie was committed, as aforesaide, sent to the Maioz of London to haue the keyes of the Gates of the Citie by vertue of his commission, which the Maioz, whose name was Hamond Chickwell, denyed. But the Bishop bled suche stoute woordes in the kings name, to the Maioz and Citizens, who had an euill opinion of him, for bearyng with the Spencers, whom the people hated as euill as the Deuill, and also for betrayng of the Queene and Prince as is aforesayde, that the sayde Citizens in a rage and fury tooke the sayde Bishop the .xiiij. day of October, and him with two of his household seruantes beheaded at the Standard in Chepe in London, of the which two one was his brother, as appereth by a monument in the Cathedral Church of Excester. And the same day, sayth Fabian, was taken for a spie a Citezen called John Marshall, which fauored the Spencers partie and was beheaded in the same place. And the dead corps of the said Bishop and his two seruants, & of Marshall were haryed vnto the Chamys syde, where the sayd bishop had begon to buylde a tower, and there in the rubbish or sand of the same, they buryed the foure bodies aforesaide. And Polidore sayth that after the Citizens had thys done with the Bishop, that then they went vnto the Tower and possessed the same, and there killed and spoyled all the kinges officers, and put in new officers geuyng them charge to keepe the same for the Queene and her sonne the Princes vse. And when these thinges were done, the Maioz sente vnto the Queene and her sonne thre graue personages, and certefied them of all that the Citezens had done, with promise that they would obey whatsoever shoulde please the Queene and her sonne to commaund them, and that the Citie was quiet and at their commaundement : The which message the Queene and her sonne accepted very thankfully, and suffered not the Messengers to depart unrewarded.

The Queene and her Lordes beyng thus assembled, as aforesayd, consulted and agreed among themselves to go the streight way to Bristowe, where as the king was, who had with him the Spencers. The which was a good towne and a strong, and well closed, standyng on a good port of the sea, and a strong Castell, the sea beatyng round about it. And therein was the king, and sir Hugh Spencer the elder, who was aboue ninetie yeres of age, and sir Hugh Spencer his sonne, who was the chiefe gouernour of the king, and and coufayled him in all his euill dedes. Also there was the Erle of Arondell, who had maryed the daughter of sir Hugh Spencer, & diuers other knightes and Esquiers attendyng and waytyng on the kinges Court.

Then the Queene and all her companie, the Lordes of Helynault Erles and Barons, and all other Englishe men, tooke the right way to the towne of Bristowe, and in euery towne where they entered, they were receyued with great feast and honour, and alwayes their people encreased, and so long they roade by their iourneyes, that at the last they came to Bristow, and besieged the towne round about as nere as they might. But the king and Sir Hugh Spencer the yonger helde them in the Castell, and the olde sir Hugh, and the Erle of Arondell abode in the towne.

And when the people of the towne sawe and considered what a powert the Queene had, (for the greatest part of the wholde power of England came with her,) and also perceued what perill and daunger they themselues were presently in: They tooke counsaile among themselues, and determined to yelde by the towne to the Queene, so that their hyes and goodes might be saued. And forthwith they sent to treat with the Queene and her counsaile in this matter: But the Queene nor her Counsaile would not agree thereunto, without she might do with sir Hugh Spencer, and with the Erle of Arondell, what her pleasure was.

When the people of the towne sawe they could haue no peace otherwise, neyther saue the towne, their goodes, nor their hyes, beyng in that distresse they agreed to the Queene, and opened the Gates, so that sir John of Helynault, and all her Barons, knightes, and Esquiers, entered into the towne, and tooke their lodgyngs within as many as might, and the rest without.

Then sir Hugh Spencer, and the Erle of Arondell were taken, and brought before the Queene, to do her pleasure with them. Then also was brought to the Queene her awne children, John her sonne, & her two daughters, which had beene in the keepyng of the sayd Sir Hugh Spencer: At the sight of whome the Queene much ioyed, because she had not seene them long before. And at this tyme, it may well be coniectured, that the king and Sir Hugh Spencer the yonger, had great sorow and care, to see that they themselues were fast enclosed, and that the greatest part of the realme turned to the ayde and succour of the Queene, and to Edward her eldest sonne.

Nowe when the Queene and her Barons, and all the companie that came with her, were lodged at their ease, then they besieged the Castell as nere as they might. And the Queene caused sir Hugh Spencer the elder, & the Erle of Arondell to be brought forth before her, and her sonne, & before all the Barons that were present: and sayd, that she and her sonne would take right and lawe vpon them accordyng to their desertes. Then sir Hugh Spencer said, Madame, God be to you a good iudge, and graunt vnto you good iudgement: and if we cannot haue it in this worlde, I pray God we may haue it in another. Then stood forth a good knight called sir Thomas Mace which was Marshall of the Queenes hoste, and there openly he red and reherfed their dedes in wyptyng: and turned him vnto another auncient knight, that he should proue him guiltie, and to shewe his opinion what was to be done with those persons, and what iudgement they should haue for such offences. Then the sayd knight counsayled with others, that is to say, with the Barons rons and Erles, and knightes there present, and then he reported their opinions and iudgements. The which was, that they had well deserued death for their diuerse and horrible dedes that they had committed, and so haue iudgement thre maner of wayes. First to be drawne, and after to be headed, and then their bodyes to be hanged on a Gibbet. And as this iudgement was geuen, so was it executed before the Castell gate of Bristow, in the sight of the king, and of sir Hugh Spencer the yonger. 1325.

And after thys execution, the king and the yong Spencer seyng themselves thus trapped and besieged, and beyng wythout hope of any comfort: In a moornyng betymes, they two with a small companie entred into a little Wessell behinde the Castell, thinking to haue fled into the Countrie of Wales. And they were .xj. dayes in the ship, and enforced it to sayle as much as they might: But whatsoeuer they did, the winde was so contrary vnto them (for it seemed that God would so haue it) that euery daye once or twise they were brought againe within a quarter of a myle of the sayde Castell. At the last it happened Sir Henry Beaumont, some to the Vicount Beaumont in England (espyng the sayd small Wessell so often to come before the Castell) to enter into a Barge and certaine companie with hym, and rowed after this Wessell so long, that the ship wherin the king was, could not make any great way before them, but at the last they were ouer taken, & so brought agayne to the Towne of Bristowe, and delyuered to the Queene and her sonne as prisoners.

Thus it befell of this high and hardy enterpryce of syr John of Helynault and his company. For when they came out of their countrie and entred into their shippes at Durdright, they were but thre hundred men of armes. And thus by their helpe and the Lordes of England, Queene Isabell conquered agayne all her estate and dignitie, and put vnto execution her great enemies, to the great comfort and reioysing of the greatest parte of the realme.

And when the king and Sir Hugh Spencer were brought to Bristow by the aforesayde Sir Henry Beaumont. Then the king by the counsaile of all the Barons and knightes was sent vnto the strong Castell of Barkeley, and put in good and honest keeping. for there were ordeyned people of estate about him and such as knewe right well what they ought to doe: But they were streightly commaunded, that they should in no wise suffer him to passe out of the Castell. Then Sir Hugh Spencer the sonne was delyuered to Sir Thomas Mace Marshall of the hoste.

These things done, the Queene set forward towards London, the chiefe Citie in Englande, and her grace and her sonne with all her hoste and company, tooke so their iourneyes, that at the last they came to the City of Harfford. And in all the waye, Sir Thomas Mace had caused syr Hugh Spencer to be bounde and to be set vpon a lewde Jade, and was lead after the Queene, and he had put vpon him a Tabarte, such as Traytors & theenes were wont to weare, & thus he passed thorough the townes with Trumpe & Pipes of Keeedes blowne before him, to do him the more scorne & despight.

And when the Queene was come to Herfford, the Citizens receaued her very honorably with great solempnitie. And there she and all her company remayned & kept the feast of all Saintes very royally, and the more bountifullly and honorably it was done, because of her sonne and the straungers that were were present.

Nowe when this feast was done: then Sir Hugh Spencer the sonne who was nothing beloued, was brought forth before the Queene and all the Lordes and knightes. And before him in wytyng was reherled all hys deedes, vnto the which he would make no maner of aunswere. And so was he then iudged by playne sentence. First, to be drawen on a hardell wyth Trompes and Trumpettes throughout all the Citie of Herfford, and after to be brought into the market place, where as all the people were assembled, and there to be tyed vpon an high ladder that euery man might see hym: & in the same place a great fyre to be made, and there hys priuie members to be cut from hym, and to be bzent in the fyre before his face. And then his harte to be drawen out of his body and cast into the fyre because he had conspired treason and was a false traytour in his heart, and that by his Trayterous counsell and extorcion the king had shamed his realme and brought the people thereof to a great michiefe, for he had caused to be behedded the greatest Lordes of his realme, by whome this Realme ought to haue bene gouerned and defended. And he had so enduced the king, that he would not see the Queene his wyfe, nor Edward his eldest sonne, and caused hym to chafe them out of the realme for feare of their lyues. And then his head was stryken off and sent to London, and so according to his iudgement he was executed.

After this execution the Queene and all her Lordes tooke their waye to London, wherof the Citizens both she and her sonne, were very honorably and ioyfully receaued. Now after the straungers had bene there feasted. xv. dayes, they, namely Sir John of Helynault and all his company, had great desyre to returne agayne into their awne countries, for they thought they had well done their deuoyze and atcheued great honor: and therefore tooke their leaue of the Queene and of the Lordes of the realme. But the Queene and the Lordes entreated them earnestly to tary lenger, and chiefly that they shoulde see what should be done with the king before they went. But the straungers had such minde home, that they would not be entreated to tarye any lenger. And when the Queene and her counsaile sawe that, then yet she intreated Sir John of Helynault to tarye vntill it was past Christmas, and to reteinne with him such of his company as pleased him best. And he lyke a gentle knight would not leaue to performe his service, but curteously graunted the Queene to tarye as long as it should please her, and he caused of hys company such to tarye as he could entreat, which was but a fewe, for the rest would needes awaye, with the which he was displeasid.

When the Queene and her counsaile sawe that no intreatie could cause them to tarye any lenger: Then she made vnto them great chere and feastes. And the Queene caused to be geuen vnto them plentie of Golde and Syluer for their costes and seruices, and also rewarded euerye of them wyth riche and goodly Jewelles, according to their estates and degrees, so as they all helde themselves right well pleased and contented. And besides this, they had money for their horses, such as they would leaue behinde them at their awne price, without any grudging.

And thus Sir John of Helynault abode still in Englande wyth a small company, but he was so beloued, chered, and feasted of the Englishe men

And in lyke maner he was welcomed to the Ladies and Damofels: for at that tyme there was with the Queene many Ladies and Countesses, which came specially to accompany the Queene.

Nowe after that the most part of the companie of Helynault were departed, and Sir John of Helynault Lorde of Beaumont taryed: The Queene discharged her armie, and gaue them leaue to returne home euery man to his Countrie and place, sayng certeine noble men, which she still kept about her and her sonne as their counsaillers, and all the other knightes and gentlemen she commaunded to returne agayne at Christmasse, at which tyme she promised to keepe open household, and so she did. And immediately after the dispatche of these people, the Queene with her sonne, by the aduice of her counsaile sommoned her high Court of Parliament at Westminster, which began the xviij. day of January. And in this assembly it was declared that this Realme could not continue without a heade and gouernour: And therefore first they agreed to drawe into articles the misgouernement of the king that was in prison, and all his euill doynges, which he had done by euill and naughtie counsaile: And when the sayd articles were read and made knowen to all the Lordes, Nobles, and Commons of the realme, then they consulted howe the realme should be gouerned thenceforth: and after good deliberation and consideration of the aforesaid articles of the kinges euill gouernement, they concluded, that such a man was not worthe to be a king, nor to weare a crowne royall. And therefore they all agreed that Edward his eldest sonne, who was there present, and was rightfull heire, should be crowned king in steed of his father, so that he would take about him, sage, true, and good counsaile, and that from thenceforth the Realme might be better gouerned, then before it had bene. And it was also agreed, that the olde king his father should be well and honestly kept as long as he lyued, according to his estate.

And so sone as all things were concluded, as aforesayd, it was then further ordered & agreed, that during the Parliament time, a solemne message should be sent vnto the king to Kenelworth Castell, to declare vnto him not onely the determination of the thre estates concerning his depoying from the Kingdome, but also to resigne vnto him in the name of the whole realme, all theyr homages that before tyme they had done vnto him. And to do this message there was assigned thre Bishops, thre Cleres, two Abbots, two Barons, and two Iustices, with the speaker of the Parliament, whose name was Sir William Trussell. And when these Messengers were come into the kinges presence at Kenelworth aforesayde, the aforesaid Sir William Trussell the xviij. day of January by the auctoritie of his office in the heering of the aforesaid Lordes, vsed vnto the king these wordes folowynge.

I William Trussell in the name of all men of this land of England, and speaker of the Parliament, resigne to thee Edward, the homage that sometime was made vnto thee, and from this time forth deprive thee of all kingly power, and I shall neuer be attendant vnto thee as king, after this time.

at .xx. pence the ounce, and our money is now valued at fiue shyllynges the Esquier and Counsaillour, with one hundreth markes of yerely rent, to be payde at the aforesayde place. And also she deliuered vnto them great sum-mes of money to pay for their costes and charges, when they were ouer the sea, besyde many riche and massy Cheynes, and costly Jewelles, that she rewarded all the Gentlemen withall that came with him. And when this noble knight was readie to depart, the Queene caused him to be conducted wyth many noble knightes and Gentlemen to Douer, and there deliuered him and all his passage free. And to the Ladyes that were come into England wyth the Queene, and namely to the Countesse of Garennes, who was sister to

And first he confirmed the liberties and fraunchises of the Citie of Lon-

About the Moneth of Aprill, many great and sundrie sutes were made for the releasynge of king Edward that was in prison. But among all other, the freer preachers, commonly called the Black Fryers, laboured most earnestly for him, and practised sundry deuises both by night and day which way to get him out of prison. And among the companye that the Fryers had priuely procured & brought, there was one Fryer called Dunhed, which should haue bene the chiefe Capitaine and woorker of their enterprize, but he was betrayed and taken, and then put into the Castell of Pomfret, and there he dyed in prison.

Shortly after, sir Henry Erle of Lancaster that had Edward the kinges father in keepyng, did by the commaundment of the king deliuer the sayde Edward by Indenture to Sir Horice of Barkeley. And then Sir John Matreuers and the sayde Sir Horice led him to the Castell of Barkeley, and kept him there safely. And often tymes while the king was there unpri-soned, he would say vnto his keepers. What haue I trespassed Isabell my my wife or Edward my sonne which nowe is made king, that none of them will come and visit me? And then his keepers answered, my worthy Lorde be not offended that I tell you a truth: the cause is, for that they are certefi-ed, in thys wise, that if the Quene your wyfe came any thing nere you, that ye would strangle and kyl her. And that ye would doe lyke wise to the king your sonne. Then answered he with heauie chere: alas, alas, am not I here in prison, & at your awne will? and God I take to witnesse I neuer thought it: But I would to God I were deade, for then were I past all my trouble.

graunted the keepyng and garde of Sir Edward his father vnto Sir Tho-sealed, and cleerly discharged the aforesayde Sir Horice of the keepyng of him. And then they toke and led the king vnto the Castell of Corfe, the which Castell the king hated to the death: But other writers saye, that

Byng. And then the aforesayde Sir Roger sent a letter vnto them, signifying howe and in what wise he should be put to death. And anone after that the aforesayde Thomas and John had receyued the letter, and considered the contents therof, they made the king good cheere and good countenaunce at his supper, when he thought least of the purposed treason. And when bed tyme came, the king went to his bed and laye and slept soundely. And he being in his sound sleepe, these traytours and false forsworne persons agaynst their homage and fealtie, came priuely into his Chamber, and their company with them, and layde a great Table vpon his belly, and with strength of men at all the foure corners pressed it downe vpon his body, wherewith the king awooke and being sore afrayde of death, turned hys bodye, so that then he laye grouelyng. Then these murderers tooke a horne and thrust it vp into his fundement as farre as they might, and then tooke a hote burnyng Spit, and put it thozough the horne into his body, and in the ende kylled and vilye murdered him: but yet in suche wise, that after his death it could not be perceyued howe he came by his death, but being dead he was after buryed at Gloucester.

Now, sayth Froissart, after the departure of Sir John of Heynault, the yong king of England, and the Queene his mother gouerned the realme by the counsaile of the Erle of Kent Uncle vnto the king, and by the counsaile of Sir Roger Mortimer, of whome mencion is made before in the. xviij. yere of King Edward the second, the which Mortimer was taken when the Barons and Lords were taken, as aforesayd, and he was no smal doer among them, and therefore was committed to the tower of London, where in the begynnyng of August next folowynge, by the meane of a sleapyng popson or drinke that he gaue to his keepers (as the common fame went) he escaped, and went with the Queene into Fraunce, and returned againe with her, as before you haue heard. And besydes these counsaylors, the king vsed much counsaile of Sir Thomas Wage, who was accomted for a very sage and graue counsaylour, but these counsaylours were not without some enemies, as fewe counsaylours are (as sayth Froissart) the which commonly happeneth, not onely in England, but also in all other countries.

About this tyme, Robert le Bruze King of Scottes, who had bene hardie and suffered much trauaile against Englishe men, and oftentimes in the life of King Edward the first, Graundfather to this yong King Edward the thirde, he had bene chased and discomfited, and was now become very aged, and sicke (as it was sayde) of the great euill and maladie: He now heeryng of the troubles of late happened in England, and of the deposyng of the olde King, and also of the puttyng to death of certeine of his counsaylors (as before you haue heard) thought a meete tyme for him to enter this realme, and to inuade the same, and the rather because King Edward the thirde was yong. And therefore about Easter in the yere of our Lozde. 1327. he sent his letters of defiance vnto the aforesayd yong King, sendyng him worde how that he would enter into the realme of England, and byenne before him as he had done before tyme, at suche season as the discomfiture was at the Castell of Estrenelyn, where the Englishe men receyued great damage.

When the King of England and his counsaile perceyued that they were defied, they caused it to be knowen ouer all the realme, and commaunded that the the Nobles, and all the other should be in a redinesse, euery man after his estate by Ascencion day next after, at the Citie of Porke. The King sent much people before to kepe the frontiers against Scotland, and with much speede he sent a great Ambassade to Sir John of Heynault, praying him right effectuously that he would ayde him, and accompanie him in this voyage agaynst the Scottes, and that he would be with him at Porke the day before appoynted, with such companie as he might get of men of warre in those partes.

When Sir John of Heynault Lord of Beaumont hearde the Kinges desire, he sent streight his letters, and his messengers into euery place where as he thought to recouer or attayne any company of men of warre. And shortly to tell, the sayde Sir John Heynault made such speede that he landed at Dover, accompanied with a great number of baliuant knightes, to the number of fife hundred men of armes, whose names for tediousnesse I ouerpasse, and within thre dayes of Whitsunday, he with all his Lordes and knightes came to Porke, where the King and his mother then were, being accompanied with all their Nobles, and a great hoste tariyng the compyng of Sir John of Heynault: But the King had sente many of his Lordes and men of armes and conunon people before, and lodged them fife or sixe mile before him. And when Sir John of Heynault was come to the King and Queene, he and hys Lordes and knightes were most ioyously receyued, and heartely welcomed. And such as came with Sir John of Heynault, were lodged in the Suburbes of the Citie of Porke, and Sir John Heynault himselfe was lodged in an Abbey of white Monkes, where he and his household remayned.

And the King of England the better to feast and enterteyne the straunge Lordes and knightes, helde a great feast on Trinitie Sunday in the friers, where he and the Queene his mother were lodged, keepyng their house eche of them apart. At this feast the King had there besyde his Nobles, fife hundred knightes that gaue their attendaunce vpon the straungers, and lyke wise had the Queene aboute. It. Ladyes and Damoselles, and all to chere Sir John Heynault and the straungers.

There might haue bene scene much noblenesse: And there were Ladies and Damosels freshly apparelled ready to haue daunced if they might haue had leaue. But such was the vnhappy chaunce, & incontinent after diner there began a great fray betwene some of the gromes and pages of the straungers, and of the Archers of England, which were lodged among them in the sayd suburbes: And anone all the Archers assembled them together with their Bowes, and droue the straungers home to their lodgings. And the most parte of the knights and Masters of them were as then in the Kings Court: But allone as they heard tydings of the fray, eche of them drew to their lodgyngs in great haste, so many as might enter, & such as could not get in, were in great perill. For the Archers who were to the number of thre thousand shot fiercely, sparyng neyther masters nor barlets. And it was thought and supposed that this fray was begonne by some of the friendes of the Spencers and of the Erle of Arondels, who were put to death before by the ayde and counsaile of Sir John of Heynault, as is aforesayde, and as then thought to be somewhat reuenged by setting of discord in the hoste. And the Englishe men that were Hosts to these straungers, shut fast their doores & Wyndowes, and would not suffer them to enter into their lodgings: Howbeit some gate in on the backside and quicklie armed themselves, but they durst not issue out into the streete for feare of arrowes: Then the straungers breakyng out on the backsydes, brake downe pales and hedges of Gardyns and drew them into a certaine playne place, and there taried for their company, till at the last they were an hundreth men of armes and mo, and as manye mo unharnessed, which could not get into their lodgings. And when they were assembled together, they made speede to succour and releue their companions who defended their lodgings in the great strete. And as they went forth, they passed by the lodging of the Lorde of Bengehven, where as there was greates gates both befoze and behynde opening into the streete, and the Archers of Englande shot fiercely at that house, and there were many of the Henardes hurt. But finally the Archers that were at that fray were discomfited and put to chase, and there were of them dead in that place about the number of three hundred, & as the report was, they were all Lincolnshiremen. But continually after thys fray the straungers were in great feare. And the king was greatly offended therewith, but the numbers were so great, and the tales so diverse of the begynnynge of this fray, that no certaintie was had, neyther might the king as then go about the examination thereof. And after thys fray they sojourned and remayned in the same place the space of thre weekes, but the straungers beyng afraid of the Englishmen, did in the meane time make many good deuises and ordynaunces for their awne sauegarde. And at the ende of thre weekes, knowledge came from the king to the Marshalls of the hoste, that the next weeke every man should prouyde for Cartes and Charriots with Centes and Pavillions to lye in the field, & for all other necessities thereunto belonging, to the entent to draw into Scotland. And when the time came, the king of England and his hoste heard of the fyres that the Scottes made daylie in England, for the Scottes unbeknowne to the kings armie were gotten ouer the ryuer of Tyne and were entred into Englande: But the king with all his power in all possible hast folowed them, and hunted them from towne to towne, and from mountayne to mountayne, and from place to place, from day to day, and weeke to weeke, by the space of 6. weekes and when the king thought himselfe most sure of them and had hedged them in, they escaped at Mydnight and were gone where the king could not folloze them, for his people, were tyred, and the wayes were ouer such mountaynes and thorough marshes and such comberfome places that he lost both manye of his people and also of hys carryages. And so this puyssaunt armye, which was deuided into thre battalles, wherein were .xxx. thousand armed men, and .cciii. thousand Archers, beside two wynges, wherein were five hundred goodmen of armes, returned home agayne with euill luck, and did nothing at all worthy the wyting. But surely it was a very chargeable armye vnto the king and the realme, for besides the prouision of all the Englishmen and their munition, the very charges of Sir John Henault and the straungers that came with him were so great, that the king lacked money presentlye to pay them, and Sir John of Henault tooke vpon hym to promise the payment therof, which, as Froissart sayth, was payd within one yere following, every man accordyng to his awne askyng. But the euill hap of this iourney, was imputed to Sir Roger Mortimer who afterwarde was charged therewith as ye shall here.

The straungers were in great feare of the Englishmen.

The king with his armye went forward into Scotland.

The Scottes came ouer the ryuer of Tyne, and so entred into England, and our armye followed them.

The king of England returned without doing any thing in Scotland.

Now

Now after the returne of the king out of Scotland, and breakyng by of the sayd warre, the gentle knight Sir John of Henault tooke his leaue of the king and Queene, and departed with all his men of armes into their coutric. And shortly after, the king and the Queene his mother, the Erle of Kent his Uncle, the Erle of Lancaster, and Sir Roger Mortimer, who then bare the chiefe rule of this realme vnder the king, and all the Barons of England with the aduice and consent of the kinges Counsaile, sent a Bishop and two knyghtes Banerettes, with two notable Clerkes, to Sir John of Henault, prayng him to be a meane that theyr Lorde the yong king of England might haue in mariage the yongest daughter of the Erle of Henault his brother, named Philip: for the king and all the Nobles of the Realme desyred rather to haue her then any other Ladye, chiefly for the loue they bare vnto the said Sir John of Henault. And when the Ambassadors were come to Sir John of Henault (who right gently and honourably enterteyned them) and that they had shewed their message and ambassade vnto him. He then (after that he had feasted them and made vnto them great cheere) brought them to Valenciens to the Erle his brother, who also right honourably receyued them, and made vnto them merueylous great and costly cheere, which were to long here to reherse. But when they had exprest and shewed the content of the message or ambassade vnto the Erle. The Erle sayd, Sirs I thanke greatly and most hartely the king your Prince, and the Queene his mother, and all the Lordes of England, for that they haue sent such sufficient persons as you be, to do me suche honour as to treat for the mariage, to the which request I do right well agree, if our holy father the Pope will consent therevnto. With the which aunswere the Ambassadors were right well content, and forthwith they sent two knyghtes, and two Clerkes to the Pope to Auignion to purchase a dispensation for this mariage. For without licence they might not mary, because they were of kinne in the thirde degree, for their two mothers were cosyn Germaynes, and issued of two brethren. And to be short, the licence was graunted, and the Messengers returned and brought the same from the Pope, vnto Valenciens, and then was this mariage concluded on both partes. And the mariage was forthwith made, and solemnized by procuracion from the king of England. And after the solemnitie thereof, and the feastes ended: this yong Queene came onward of her iourney, and tooke shippyng at Wisant, and safely arriued with all her companie at Douer. And Sir John of Henault her Uncle did conduct her to the Citie of London, where she was most honourably and triumphantly receyued, Froissart. But Fabian sayth, this maryage was solemnized in Porke.

Sir John of Henault took his leaue of the king.

An Ambassade sent vnto Sir John Henault for a marriage to be concluded for King Edward with his brother the Erle of Henaults daughter named Philip.

Nowe when all thinges were finished that belonged to the receyuyng of the yong Quene, then Sir John of Henault Uncle to the Queene, tooke hys leaue of the king and the yong Queene, and also of the olde Queene, and of all the Lordes and Barons of England, and so departed towarde his coutric, beyng conducted to the See with the companie of diuers and sundrye Lordes.

Soone after his departure, the king at whitfontide solobyng called his high Court of Parliament at Northampton. At the which Parliament (as sayth Fabian) by the euill counsaile of Sir Roger Mortimer, & the old Quene, (as the common fame and report was) the king made with the Scottes an vnprofitable

vnprofitable

A dishonourable peace made with the Scottes.

Ragman.

Unprofitable and a dishonourable peace, to endure thre yeres. For first, he released vnto them their fealtie and homage, and he deliuered vnto them the olde and auncient writyngs, sealed with the Seales of the kinges of Scots, and of diuerse Lordes of the land, both spirituall & tempozal, with many other Charters and Patentes, namely one called Ragman, by the which the King of Scottes bound himselfe and them to be feodaries to the Crowne of England. At the which tyme also were delyuered certeine Jewelles, which befoze tymes had bene wonne from the Scottes by kinges of England, and among other, the blacke crosse of Scotland is chiefly named. And not onely the king by thys doying lost the right and title that he had to the realme of Scotland, so farre as he could passe from it, but also all the Lordes and Barons, and all other men of Englande that had any landes or rentes within Scotland, lost their right in lyke maner, except they would dwell vpon the sayde landes, and become the king of Scottes liege men. And shortly after was concluded a marriage, betwene Dauid le Bruze, sonne of Robert le Bruze, and Jane the kinges sister, which of diuers writers is surnamed Johan of Cowres.

Shortly after, there was another Parliament holden at Salisbury, or rather Sarisoury, at the which Parliament sir Roger Mortimer was made Erle of Marche against the minde and will of all the Barons, and sir John of Eltham the kinges brother, was made Erle of Cornewall: To the which Parliament, Henry Erle of Lancaster would not come. Wherefore the king was brought in beliefe, that he ment euill towardes him, and that he purposed the destruction of his person. For the which, the king by the meane of sir Roger Mortimer, caused to be assembled a great hoite, and made towardes Bedford, where Erle Henry lay with his company. Then the Erle Marshal, and the Erle of Kent, made a peace betwene the king and the Erle of Lancaster: on whose part was sir Henry Lord Beaumont, sir Fouke Fitzwayn, sir Thomas Rocelyn, sir William Trussell, sir Thomas Wyther, and about an hundred knights, who all were exiled and banished Englande, by the counsaile of Quene Isabell, and the Erle Mortimer. For the sayd Mortimer was couetous, and thought to haue obteyned all their landes.

This yere Robert le Bruze the false king of Scottes dyed of a leprozy, leauyng behinde him his sonne Dauid of the age of. viij. yeres, whome the Scottes receyued willyngly for their king.

Also about this tyme (as sayth Fabian) sir Edmond of Woodstock Erle of Kent, supposyng that his brother king Edward the second had beene aliue, (for so he was informed,) and myndyng a reformation of the misorder of the realme, wrote certeine letters vnto him, conteynyng deuyces for his deliuey, and sent them vnto him: Of the which doying he was shortly after accused, by the procurement of sir Roger Mortimer, who ought him malice. And by authoritie of parliament holden at Winchester, about Whitson tide folowynge, he for that dede was adiudged to haue his heade smitten off, which execution was done in the sayd Citie of Winchester the. xij. day of May folowynge.

But Froissart sayth, he was beheaded the. x. daye of October. And not long after sayth he (it was openly reported) that Isabell the kinges mother was with childe by Mortimer: and howe that the sayde Mortimer had caused the king to put to death his Uncle without reasonable or iust cause, for all the realme accompted him for a noble and good man,

The. xij. daye of June was borne the kinges first sonne at Woodstock, and was named Edward, which in processe of tyme did grow to a noble and famous man, and was in his dayes accompted the flower of all Chyualrye throughout all the worlde, and also some writers name him the blacke prince.

In this tyme the king helde his high Court of Parliament at London (as sayth Fabian) durynge which tyme the king caused Sir Roger Mortimer Erle of Marche to be apprehended at Nottyngham, and brought to London. And befoze the Lordes and nobles were expressed and declared in writyng, the wickednesse and offences of the sayde Mortimer. Then the king demaunded of his counsaile what should be done with him: And all the Lords by one assent gaue iudgement and sayd, he hath deserued to die the same death that Sir Hugh Spencer the sonne dyed. And after thys iudgement there was no sparyng, respite or delaye could be graunted: but incontinent, he was drawn on a hardell thorough London, and then set on a Ladder, and hys members cut from him, and cast into the fyre, and hys heart also, because he had conspired treason, and then quartered, and his quarters sent to foure of the best Citie of the realme, and his head set vpon London Bridge. Thus farre Froissart.

But Fabian sayth, he was charged and condemned for sundry articles, whereof he maketh mencion of fyue especiall, which follow.

1 First, that Sir Edward of Carnaruan, which was King Edward the second, was by his meanes, by most tyrannous death murdered in the Castell of Barkeley.

2 The second, that to the kings great dishonour and dammage, the Scots by his meanes and treason, escaped from the king at the Parke on Stanhope, which then should haue fallen in the kings daunger, if the sayd Roger had not fauoured them.

3 The thirde, that he for the execution of the sayde Treason, receaued of the Capitaine of the sayde Scottes, named Sir James Douglas, great summes of money: but another writer sayth, he receaued. xx. thousand pound and also that he had for lyke meede, to the great dishonour of the king, and hurt of this realme, concluded a peace betwene the king and the Scottes, and caused to be delyuered vnto them, the Chartre or Indenture called Ragman, with many other things, to the Scottes great advantage, and to the great dishonour of the imperiall state of this realme of England.

4 The fourth, he was charged, that by sinister and vnlawfull meanes, contrary to the kings pleasure and will, or assent of the Lordes of the kings counsaile, he had gotten into his possession much of the kings treasure, and that he had prodigally and vnskillfully wasted and spent the same. By reason wherof, the king was in necessity and driuen perforce to assay his friends.

5 The fift, that he had impropered vnto him diuers wards, belonging vnto the king, to his great gayne, and the kinges great hurte: and that he was more secret with Quene Isabell the kings mother, then was to Gods pleasure or the kings honour.

Some after this, the king by the aduise of his counsell, commaunded that the Quene his mother should be kept close in a Castell, and to haue appointed to attende vpon her certeine Ladies and damozelles, and knightes and Esquires according to her estate, and certeine landes were assigned wherewith with to maintayne her noble estate during her lyfe : But speciall comission was given, that she should not departe out of the Castell, onlesse it were to see such sportes as sometime were shewed befoze the Castell gate for her recreation. Thus this Lady led there her lyfe meekely, and once or twice a yere the king her sonne came to visite and see her.

In this yere, sayth Polidore, John Archbishop of Cauntozbury assembled hys clergie together at a Synode holden at London, in the which utter dyuers abuses remoued, and other good things restored in their places, he then and there among other things, by the consent of the saide Synode, excommunicated all those, whatsoeuer they were, generally, that were guiltie of the death of Walter Stapleton Bishop of Excester, or did procure or consent to the same, or layde any handes vpon him. The which maner of doyng seemeth somewhat straunge to mee, for the sayde Stapleton as befoze ye haue heard was put to death by the Citezens as an enimie to the Quene, and was also the same yere and in the first Parliament that king Edwarde the thirde helde, attaynted of high treason by name, with the two Spencers afore mentioned, but I leaue this to the consideration and iudgement of the reader.

And Polidore sayth mozeouer, that the sayde Stapleton Bishop of Excester paradventure did foresee that he could not long continue in the seruice of princes with the sauetie of his lyfe, and therefore (when he had time) he builded at Oxford two notable houses, that should endure many hundreds of yeres, whereof the one to this day is called Excester Colledge, and the other is called Hartes hall, in the which he placed a number of scholers, with right worthy and good maintenance.

Now after that the king had caused to be done the aforesayd executions, he chose vnto hym newe counsaillours of the noblest and sagest persons of his realme. And towarde the ende of thys yere Philip Valoys, beyng newly crowned king of fraunce, all the Barons of hys realme came to him to doe their homage and fealtie, and likewise did all other noble personages that helde of him, except the king of England, who had not done his homage for the Duchy of Guyan, neyther was he summoned thereunto. Wherefoze, the french king by the aduise of his counsaile, sent as an Ambassade into Englande, the Lorde Auprenes, the Lorde Beaufalt, and two noble Clarkes Maysters of the Parliament of Paris, whose names were, Mayster Peter of Orlyuance and Mayster Peter of Masiers. These foure departed from Paris, and came into Englande to the king then beyng at Wyndsoze. The king of Englande for the honour of the french king his Cosyn, caused them to come into his presence, and receaued them honorably, and then they published their message vnto the king. And the king answered that as then the nobles of his realme was not about him, neyther was his counsell then present, wherfoze he prayed them to resort to the Citie of London, and there to stay awhile, and they should haue answer to their contentation. And so they dynd in the kinges Chamber, and after departed, and laye the same night at Colbroke, and the next day at London.

And shortly after, the king came to his palace at Westminster where he assembled all his counsaile: And thether came the french Ambassadors, and there agayne declared the occasion of their comming, and deliuered their letters. Then the king and his counsell went aside into the counsell Chamber, and and counsailed what was to be done. And they agreed that the Ambassadors should be answered by the ordynance and stile of his predecessors, by the Bishop of London. Then were the frenchmen called into the counsaile Chamber.

The Bishop of London then sayde, ye Lordes that are here assembled for the king of fraunce. The kings grace my soueraigne Lorde hath heard your wordes and read the tenour of your letters. And for answer, we say vnto you, that we will counsell the king our soueraigne Lorde here present, that he go into fraunce to see your master his deare Cosyn, who right longingly hath sent for him. And as touching his faith and homage, he will doe his deuoyze in euery thing that of right he ought to doe. And ye may shewe vnto the king your master, that wthin short space that the king of England our master will arryue in fraunce, and there to doe all that reason shall require.

Then these Messengers, after they had bene feasted, and that the king had rewarded them with great giftes, and riche Jewelles, they tooke theyr leaue, and at the last came to Parys to king Philip, to whome they declared their answer and message: Whereof the french king was right glad and ioyfull, when he vnderstood of the kinges comming, for he was very desyrous to see him, because he neuer sawe him, and yet was hys nere Cosyn and kinsman. Then the french king caused this to be spread abroad throughout all fraunce. Then Dukes, Erles, and other Lordes apparelled and appoynted themselves in their best maner. And the french king wrote his letters to king Charles of Behaigne his Cosyn, and to the king of Nauerre, certefiing them of the day and time when the king of England would be in fraunce, desyryng them to be with him at the same day and tyme, and so they came with a great aray. Then was it counsailed the french king, that he should receyue the king of England at the Citie of Amys, and there to make prouision for his comming: There were Halles, Chambers, Hosteries, and lodgynges made redy, and apparelled to receaue them all and their companie. And also for the Duke of Burgoyne, the Duke of Burbon, the Duke of Loreyn, and Sir John of Arthoys. There was prouision made for a thousand horse, and for sixe hundred horse that should come wyth the king of England.

The yong king forgate not his boyage into fraunce, and beyng furnished of all thing mete for him and his trayne, he departed out of England, accompanied with thre Bishoppes, foure Erles whose names were, Henry Erle of Darby, the Erle of Salisbury, the Erle of Warwike, and the Erle of Herford, and sixe Barons, the Lorde Reignold Cobham, the Lorde Thomas Wage Marshall of England, the Lorde Bercey, the Lorde Manney, and the Lorde Mowbray, and mo then xl. knightes, so that the king and hys companie were aboue a thousand horse, and the king was two dayes in passing betwoene Douer and Wyfant.

Then the king and his company roade to Boleyn, and there tarped one day, and this was about the middelt of August. And anone tidynges came to king Philip of fraunce, howe the king of England was at Boleyn. Then the french king sent his Constable with a great number of knightes to mete the king of Englande, who then was come to Mowntrell, and there were great embracynges and shewynges of frendship on both sydes, from thence the king of England, now being accompanied with the Constable of France and other French Lordes, and his awne Lordes, road forwarde so long vntill they came to the Citie of Amyns, where the French king, and the king of Bohaingne, the king of Mailozgues, and the king of Nauerre, being well appoynted, were ready to receyue him, with many other Dukes, Erles, and Barons. For there were all the .xij. Peeres of Fraunce, ready to feast, and to cheere the king of England and his Nobles, and also to be there in peaceable maner to beare witness of the king of Englandes homage.

And thus the king of England being nobly and honourably receyued, tarped and was feasted with these kinges, and other Princes in Amyns. .xv. dayes. And in that meane tyme, there were sondrie wayes deuysed howe the king should do his homage, but so farre (sayth Froissart) as I could learne, the king of England made his homage vnto the French king, onely by word and not by puttyng of his handes betwene the French kinges handes, nor none other Prince nor Prelate limited nor appoynted to do it for him, neyther would the king of England do his homage any otherwise, but was determined rather to returne againe into England. And there was red openly the priuileges that of auncient tyme were graunted, the which declared howe and in what maner the king should do his homage to the French king, and what seruice he should do him. Then sayd the French king: Colyn, we will not at this tyme any further trouble you, for that ye haue nowe done, contenteth vs well, vntill ye be returned home againe into your realme, and that ye haue soene vnder the scales of your predecessors, howe and in what wise ye should do your homage.

And shortly after, the king of England toke his leaue of the French king, and of all the other Princes that were there, and departed very louingly, the one embracyng the other. Then the King made hast homeward, and both good speede returned into England, and so to Windsor, where of the Quene he was receyued right ioyfully. Then she demaunded howe her Uncle the French King did, and her kinsfolkes that were about him. The King answered her all that he knew, and of the great cheere & honor that he had there, and sayde that in hys opinion, there was no Realme to be compared to the Realme of France.

It was not long after, but that the French King sent a newe Ambassade to the King of Englande, who were certeine of his prouie counsaile, as the Bishop of Charters, the Bishop of Beauuoy, the Lorde Lewes of Cleremount, the Duke of Burbon, the Erle of Herculourt, and the Erle of Tankerville, with diuerse other Knightes and Clerkes, who, as aforesayd, were sent to the King, and to the Counsaile of England, which was then holden and kept at London, about the performance of the kinges homage, whereof ye heard before.

Now when the King of England and his counsaile had well considered the maner of his predecessors in doyng their homage for the Duchie of Aquitaine (although there were many in England that murmured and sayde, that the King theyr Lorde was nerer by succession vnto the crowne of France, then Philip of Valoys that was nowe French King) yet the King nor hys counsaile would not knowe it at this time, nor speake a worde thereof, but the counsaile and assembly aforesaid had much ado about this homage. And they were were so long in the matter, that the Ambassadors were enforced to tary here all the Winter vntill May folowynge, before they had any aunswere definitive. But finally the King with the aduice of his counsaile, vpon the sight of former presidentes, to the which they gaue great credite, did determine to write letters in the maner of patentes, sealed with his great seale, knowledgyng therein the homage that he ought to do to the French king, as in Froissard ye may read moze at large.

The King of Englande was now enforced that King Dauid of Scotlande, who had married his sister, was seased of the towne of Barwikke, the which ought to apperteine to the realme of Englande, for King Edward the first, his Grandfather, had it in his peaceable possession. Also the King was enforced that the realme of Scotland should holde in chiefe of the Crowne of England: and howe the young king of Scottes had not as then done his homage. Wherefore the King of England sent his Ambassade to the King of Scottes, desyryng him to make deliuerance of the towne of Barwikke, for it perteyned to his heritage. And also that they should sommon the sayd King of Scottes to come vnto the King of Englande, and to do his homage for the realme of Scotland.

Then the King of Scottes tooke counsaile howe to aunswere this matter. And at the last, he aunswered the Ambassadors and sayd, sirs, both I and all the Nobles of my realme meruayle greatly of that ye haue required vs to do, for we finde no auncient recorde that the realme of Scotlande should be subiect to the realme of England, neyther by homage, nor other wayes: neyther did the noble King our father any homage vnto the Kinges of England, for any warre that was made vnto him by anye of them, and no moze doe I purpose to do. And as for the towne of Barwikke, our father conquered it by force of armes against King Edward your Kinges father, and by right helde it all the dayes of his life, as his good heritage, and we purpose to the best of our power to do lykewise. Notwithstanding, we require you Lordes to be meanes to the King your Maister, whose sister we haue maryed, that he will suffer vs peaceably to enioy our franchises and rightes, as his auncetours haue done here before.

Then the Ambassadors aunswered and sayde, sir we haue well vnderstand your aunswere, and we will declare it vnto the King our Lorde. And so tooke their leaue and returned into England to the King, and declared their aunswere, wherewithall the King was nothing contented.

Then the King sommoned a Parliament to be holden at Westmynster, where all the nobles and wise men of this realme were assembled, to determine what was meetest to be done in this matter. And they concluded, that it was not for the kinges honour to beare those iniuries and wronges that the Scottes did daylie vnto him, and they besought him to prouyde his force and strength of men of warre, to attayne thereby the Towne of Barwikke, and to enter into the realme of Scotland with such force, that he should constrain the king of Scottes to be glad to come and doe his homage. And all the nobles and commons of the Realme of England sayd, they would gladly and wyllingly go with him in that iourney. And for their good willes the King thanked them and prayed them to be in a readynesse, & at a day assigned to be together at New Castell vpon Tyne. And then euery man went home and prepared for that iourney.

Then the king sent other Ambassadors to the king of Scottes sufficiently to summon him: and that if he would not be otherwise advised, then the king gaue them full aucthoritie to desye him.

Some after the day of the assembly of the kinges hoste drew on, at the which day the king with all his armie arriued at New Castell vpon Tyne, and there taried three dayes for some of the armie that were not come. And the fourth day he departed with all hys power toward Scotland, and passed thorough the landes of the Lorde Percy, and of the Lorde Neuell, who marched on the Scottes, and so did the Lorde Rosse, and the Lorde Ligye, and the Lord Howbray.

Then the king with his armie drew nere to Barwike, for the king of Scots made none other answer then he did at the first, wherfore they summoned him, & then openly desyed him. And so the king of England taried not at Barwike, but went forward into Scotlande and burned the Countrey as he went. In the which iourney he wasted & destroyed all the plaine countrey of Scotland, & bent and destroyed many townes and billages & toke the strong Castell of Eynborough and set therein a garison. And then he passed ouer the second ryuer in Scotland, & ran ouer all the countrey thereabout to Scone, and destroyed the good towne of Donfremlyn, Wond, & Dombilayne, and many other, for there were no Scottes that would appere before the Englishmen, for they were fled into the forest of Eedwooth with all their goodes and they cared not much for that they left behinde. And it was no great marvel though they were thus driven, for the king of Scottes was but. xv. yeres of age, and the Erle of Morrey was but yong, and the Nephewe of William Dowglas, that was slaine in Spayne, was also of the same age. So as at that time the realme of Scotland was vnyrounded of Capitaines.

Now when the king had runne ouer all the playne Countrey of Scotlande, and had taried there the space of. vij. Moneths, and sawe that none would appere against him: Then he strengthened and furnished certayne Castels that he had wonne, thinking by them to make warre to all the other. And afterwarde he withdrew himselfe saye and easily toward Barwike, where the king layed his siege round about, and sayde he would neuer departe thence until he had wonne it. But after manye assautes and sharpe skirmishes had with the Scottes for suche as kept the Towne defended the same manfully, yet at the last they yeelded the Towne to the king conditionally that they might haue their lyues and goodes saued, and that the soldiours might departe into their Countrey without any damage. And then the king entred into the Towne with great solemnitie, and taried there. iij. dayes, & made Capitain there Syr Edward Bailliol, whom also he made king of the Scots, and betooke the gouernement of the whole realme vnto him.

And when the king had thus set all thinges in good order, he returned to London, where he was right ioyfully receaued and saluted of all hys people. And thus at thys tyme the king wanne the greatest parte of Scotlande, as sayth Froysart.

In the meane while that the king prepared the aforesayde boyage and army into Scotland, it chanced Sir Robert de Arthoys, who was one of the noblest men in Fraunce, vpon displeasure had betwene him and the French king king, to fle out of Fraunce and came into England to the king disguised in a Marchants apparell. This Sir Robert was he, of whom before ye haue heard, that in the great distresse of the Quene and her sonne, beyng in France with her brother the French king, he found him an especiall friend and helper vnto her, and it was his counsell that she passed into Henault, where shee was releued and by the good helpe of the gentle knight Sir John of Henault was restored to the quiet state and possession of the crowne of England. And at the coming of the sayde Sir Robert, the king receyued him right ioyfully, and retained him as one of his counsell and to him assigned the Erledome of Richemond. This knight hauyng a sentence passed agaynst him of the Erledome of Artoys, and the same given from him to Jone Countesse of Artoys by the French king and his nobles, was with that sentence so sore displeased, that he sayde openly against the French king: By me he was made a king and by me he shal be dismissed againe. For the which words when they came to the kinges vnderstanding, he caused the sayde Sir Robert to be proclaymed an enimie vnto the Crowne of Fraunce, whereupon he fled, as is aforesayde.

Duryng the time of the aforesayde boyage into Scotlande, and the king hauyng with him the aforesayde Sir Robert, who went with him all that iourney, the sayde Sir Robert was often tymes in hande with the king (espying the Countrey of Scotland to be bareyne and beggerly) to leaue his warres in that countrey, and to clayme his right and lawfull inheritaunce of the crowne of Fraunce, and the whole realme of the same, which iustly and rightly did belong and apperteigne vnto hym, but the king gaue no eare therevnto.

The king this yere in Wynter, in the month of Nouember went againe toward Scotlande, and kept his Christmas at Yorke. And after that feast, he went into Scotlande, where he layde siege to the Castell of Kylbrydge, and at the last wanne it by strength and then he set the countrey in some quietness, and after he returned to New Castell vpon Tyne, and taried there a certaine of time, and kept there his whitsontyde with great royaltie. And within short space after, thether came Sir Edward Bailliol king of Scots, and the. xii. day of June made his homage vnto king Edward for the kingdom of Scotland, in the presence of many of the nobles of both the realmes, and swore vnto him fealty and fidelity. And that being done, he returned into Scotland, and king Edward went vnto Yorke and so to Wynter. Then were all suche Lordes of Englande as before tyme in King Edward the secondes dayes, diseased of suche landes as they held in Scotland, restored agayne to their possessions, and for them made their homage vnto y king of Scots, sayyng their allegeaunce vnto their soueraigne Lorde. Fabian.

Now shortly after, certaine Ambassadors were sent from the French king, as the Byschop of Chiroyne and the Lorde of Ferrey, and Bernguy for to conclude certaine articles of variaunce, betwene their Lorde and the king of England. But this purpose toke none effect, sayyng that the king granted to send vnto the French king shortly after, certayne of hys Lords to haue further communication with him touching the sayde articles.

And this yere the king kept his Christmas in the Castell of Rokeborough in Scotlande, which Castell he caused to be newly repayped. And to passe the time with them, that they suppsed that it was not the kings pleasure to speake with them.

By meane of which wordes, they were shortly after brought vnto the kinges presence, of whome they were receyued with ioyous countenance, and so continued a certeine tyme in furtheryng of their Ambassade, so that at the last, a conclusion of peace betwene England and Fraunce was agreed vpon, so farre foorth as the same should haue bene published the next day in Parrys by proclamation. But howe the French kinges minde altered, the Englishe Ambassadors were scantly returned vnto their lodgynges, but they were sent for agayne, and further enformed, that the French kinges pleasure and minde was, to haue Dauid late king of Scottes to be included within the same peace, and that he should agayne be restored vnto his Kingdome.
Whereto it was answered by the Englishe Ambassadors, that their commission stretched not so farre, neyther that their Prince had geuen them any such auctoritie. Wherfore all the former communication was reuoked and adnulled, and they returned into England without making any conclusion.

I finde written in an olde Englishe Chronicle, which beareth the name of one Robert of Auesbury, that this King Edward the thirde, did aboute this tyme chaunge and aduance his coyne, that is to say, from .xx. pence the ounce sterlyng, vnto .xxv. pence the ounce, which maketh of currant money the pound weight of siluer .xxv. shillynges, and befoze it was currant for .xx.
shillynges.

Nowe for somuch as no conclusion of peace might be had betweene the French king and the king of Englande, warre was proclaymed vpon both partes, the which warre was greatly procured by sir Robert of Arthoys, for as saith Froissart, he was euer nere about king Edward, and alwayes counsaillyng him to defie the French king, who kept his heritage from him wrogfully. Of the which matter the king oftentimes conferred with his priue counsaile, for gladly he desired to haue obteyned his right, but the meane to come by it was very difficult and chargeable. And he also considered wyth himselife, that to make a clayme to the Crowne of Fraunce, and not to go through with his claime, it should be better for him to say little, and to be still, rather then to make a great sturre, and then nothyng should followe nor come of it that should be to any purpose: And therefore after certaine meetyngs and conference vpon this matter, his counsailours answered him say-yng: Sir the matter is so weightie, and of so highe an enterprize, that we dare not speake therein, neyther to geue you any counsaile. But sir, if it may please you, we thinke it were meete that you sent sufficient Messengers well enformed of your meanyng to the Erle of Henault (whose daughter ye haue marryed) and to sir John of Henault his brother, who hath balliantly serued
you

you at all tymes: And to desyre them in the way of amitie and friendship, to geue you their counsaile in this matter, for they knowe better what is meete for such an enterprize than we do: And sir, if they agree to your entent, then will they counsaile you what way you shall worke, and what friendes you were best to make.

The king when he had heard the aduise of his counsailours, and had well considered the same, he thought well of it, and iudged it to be a good way of entraunce vnto his enterprize: and forthwith the king appoynted the Bishop of Lincolne, and with him two Banerettes, and two Doctozs to do this message. And they made them readie and tooke shippyng, and arryued at Dunkerke, and roade through Flaunders, vntill they came to Valenciens, where they found the Erle lyng in his bed sicke of the Goute, and with him sir John his brother. And after the Erle vnderstoode their message, he answered and sayde. As helpe me God, if the king might attaine his desire, I would be right glad thereof, for I had rather the welth of him that hath marryed my daughter, then of him that neuer did any thing for me: Though I haue marryed his sister. And to say truth, I haue no cause to do for him, for he letted the maryage of the yong Duke of Brabant, which should haue married one of my daughters, wherfore I will not faile to ayde my dere and welbe-loued sonne the King of England, and counsaile him to the best of my power, and so shall John my brother do, who hath serued him or this. Hobobit, he must haue moze helpe then ours. For Henault is but a small cuntrye in respect of the realme of Fraunce, and England is farre off to ayde vs.

Then sayd the Bishop, we thanke you on our maysters behalfe, for the comfort that ye haue geuen vs: Nowe we hartely desyre you to geue our maister counsaile what friendes he were best to labour vnto for his ayde.
Surely sayde the Erle, I cannot deuise a moze puyssaunt Prince to assist him then the Duke of Brabant, who is his Colin Germaine: and the Bishop of Liege, the Duke of Guerles, who hath married his sister. The Archebishop of Coleyn: the Marques of Juliers, Sir Arnolde de Baquehen, and the Lorde of Falkemount. These Lordes are they that may make most men of warre, in thortest space of any that I know: they are good men of warre and they may well make ten thousand men, so that they haue wages thereafter.

After that the Erle had thus declared his mind of the best wayes to enter into the sayd enterprize, the aforesayd Ambassadors returned into England, and so to the king, and shewed him all that the Erle had sayd, & counsayled.
At the which message the king did greatly reioyce, and tooke much comfort.
And shortly after, the king appoynted ten Banerettes, and .xl. other knigh-tes, and sent them in Ambassade to Valenciens, and with them went the bishop of Lincolne to treat with the Lordes of the Empire, such as the Erle of Henault had named. And when these Ambassadors were come to Valen-ciens, eche of them kept a great estate and port, and spared no cost, no moze then if the king of England had bene there in proper person, wherby they did get great renobone and prayse.

Now while these thinges were thus in compassyng at Valenciens: The French king sent a crewe of Souldiours into Scotland to ayde the Scottes against the Englishe men: By reason wherof the Scottes made warpe warre vpon the king of Englandes subiectes and friendes, and put the lande to great beration and trouble, inſomuch that the king was inforced to aſſemble his power, and to ſpede him againe thether.

About Wydsomer the king entred Scotland by Sea and warred vpon the Scottes and French men, at which tyme the king ſubdued his enimies and had the victozy and tooke dyuers prifoners. Among the which one called the Erle of Hozet a Frenchman, was chiefe, which afterwarde was deliuered in exchaunge for the Erle of Hamur, another French Lord.

When King Edward had now againe pacified the Scottes, and had taken homage of ſuch as befoze rebelled, he then ſtabliſhed agayne the aforenamed Edward Baylioll as king of Scottes, and committed the rule of the lande vnto him as befoze times he had done. Then the King of Scottes and the nobles for the great kindneſſe they had founde in the King, and partly in recompence of the great charges which he fundrie times had beene at, in the defending and order yng of that realme, graunted and bound themſelues vnto him and to his heyres, kings of England, that they would ayde and aſſiſt him agaynſt all princes. And whenſoever he or any king of Englande had warre, eyther within his awne lande or with any other prince: The Scots of their proper expences and charges ſhould finde him three hundred horſemen well armed, and a thouſande footemen well and ſubſtancially furniſhed for the warre, the which. xiiij. hundred men the Scottes ſhould wage for a whole yere. And if the king of Englande ended not his warre within the yere, then he to hyze and wage the ſayde Scottes as he did his other ſouldyours. And ſone after that theſe grauntes and agreements were made, the king returned into England.

About thys tyme the French king, hauing purpoſed a iourney into the holy lande againſt the Turck, and for the furniture of that iourney hauing made ſuch prouiſion as neuer chriſtian prince had done the lyke befoze, and vnto the ſame iourney requeſting the company and ayde of the king of Englande, who, as aforeſayd, was otherwiſe minded and occupied: and hauing alſo prepared for his ſayde bo yage at ſundry portes, as Marſeille, Aquis Moztuis, Narbone and Mountpillier ſuche a number of Veſſels, Ships, Carrikes and Galeys, as were ſufficient to paſſe ouer three hundred thouſand men of armes, which ſhips alſo were moſt plentifully furniſhed with Biſket, Wyne, freſhe Water, ſalt fiſhe and all other victualles neceſſary for the aforeſayde number of men of warre for the ſpace of three yeres. And moreover, hauyng obtained by his Ambaſſadors of the king of Hungary (who not a little reioyced at that meſſage) that he would be in a readynelle, and open the paſſages and ſtreytes of his Countrey, that the kinges ſouldyours and armie (whom he called the Pilgrimes of God) might quietly paſſe through. And in lyke maner ſendyng to the King of Cypres, to the King of Sicille, to the Venecians, to the Genowayes and to all the Cities that were ſituate vpon the ryuer of Geane, and hauing aunſwere of them all, that they were readie to obey. And the ſayde French King being aunſwered by the great Priour of Fraunce, whom he had ſent to the Ile of Rhodes, and alſo to the Venecians to prouide in the Ile of Crete which was vnder their ſeigniozy, for the recepying of him, his aſſociates and armie, that all things were prepared and in a readynelle.

About this tyme, I ſay, newes came vnto him of all the King of Englands lands entent and purpoſe agaynſt the realme of Fraunce, and of the aſſembly of king Edwardes Ambaſſadors, who at that tyme were with the Erle of Henault, and of all their counſailles and deuifes. Wherevpon this bo yage to the Turkes was vtterly daſhed and all the former trauailes and prouiſions came to nothing, neyther coulde he abide to here of them, but bent himſelfe wholly to make defence againſt the King of Englande, who purpoſed the inuaſion of his realme, and to make clayme ther vnto as right inheritor to the ſame, as after moze at large ſhall appere.

In this meane time the Kinges Ambaſſadors which were ſent into Henault as aforeſayd, ſo applyed their Ambaſſade, y they had obteyned the good will and fauour of all, or the greateſt parte of thoſe perſons whom the Erle of Henault thought meete to be labored vnto for the ayde of the king in thys enterpriſe. And to bring the ſame to a full concludion and effect, King Edward himſelfe went ouer into Flaundyrs and there allyed himſelfe with Jacques Dartuell gouernour of all Flaundyrs, and then came to Andwarp in Brabant, where he kept a moſt honozable eſtate and royall houſhold, and thether came vnto him people from all partes, to ſee him and to beholde the great eſtate that he kept. And dur yng the tyme of his abode there, he ſent for his Coſyn the Duke of Brabant, and the Duke of Guerles, the Marques of Fullers, the Lorde John of Henault, and all ſuche as he truſted to haue any comfort of, and they all came vnto him betwene Whitſontyde and Wydsomer. And when the king had well-feaſted them, he deſyred to knowe their good willes towardes him, and when they would be in a readynelle: for ſaide he, I am vpon the promiſe of your good willes come hether my ſelfe, & not only remaine here at great expences, but alſo the ſeaſon and conuenient tyme of the yere paſſeth away, therefore I pray you to let me knowe your mindes. They altogether aunſwered, that they were at that time come onely to ſee his grace, and not to determine any thing: but they would returne home and ſpeake with their ſeueral counſayles, and within three weekes next followyng to make direct aunſwer what and when they would attend vpon his enterpriſe. And about the tyme of their appoyntment, they ſent aunſwere vnto the King that they and all their men which they had promiſed were in a readynelle, ſo that the Duke of Brabant would be ready for his parte: So that the King was enforced once againe to talke with the Duke of Brabant, who for that he had befoze made promiſe to the French king, that though the king of Englande were in his Countrey, whome he might not denie, becauſe he was his Coſyn Germaine, yet he would in no wiſe conclud any amitie or friendſhip with him agaynſt the ſayd French King, with much ado at the laſt agreed to ayde the king of England, but firſt he deſyred that he might once again ſpeake with the aforeſayd Lordes: and he ſent for them & after long communication, they agreed and made vnto the King of England this aunſwere: we haue (ſayde they) aſſembled and conferred together, and we cannot conſyder any lawfull cauſe that we maye deſyre the French King: But if your grace can obtaine the fauour and good will of the Emperour, who may commaunde vs, then we wyll be readie: And the Emperour can no leſſe do, conſydering how that many yeres paſt, there was a couenaunt ſwozne and ſealed, that it ſhould not be lawfull for the French King to make warre, or by any meanes to apprehend or take into his poſſeſſion any thing appertayning to the Empire : and it is euidently sene and knowone that Philip now French king hath taken the Castell of Creueure in Cambrey, and the Castell of Alues in Wallicull, & also the Citie of Cambrey, and therfore the Emperour hath good cause to defie hym, and then will we be readie. The king then considering with himselfe how farre he had enterprised, and seing now his purpose would come to none effect, onelesse he followed the determination and deuyses of the sayde Lordes, did therfore with all speede send his Ambassadors vnto the Emperour, with whome the sayde Lordes, for that they did beare vnto the king right true and hartly good wyll, sent also Ambassadors of their owne, the which might more certainly declare their good meanings towards the king of England, if it might please the Emperours Maiestie to licence them therevnto, and so much was done therein, and chiefly by the labour of the Lady Margaret of Henault, whom Sir Lewes of Bauger beyng Emperour had then marped, that the Emperour graunted a commission vnto foure right honorable personages, and vnto two Doctors which were of his prerie counsaile, to auctorise and make king Edward of Englande his Vicare generall throughout all the Empire, and of the same the Lordes abouenamed had instrumentes and Seales sufficiently authorised by the Emperour.

King Edward was made Vicare generall of all the Empire.

In this meane while, king Edwarde considering his great charge of warres that he had continually with Scotland: But chiefly and most specially for seeing the great and inestimable charges that must folowe of this his enterprize in Fraunce, did gather in England by diuers and sundrie meanes great and inestimable summes of money, so that for lacke of money in this realme of England (as sayth Fabian) victuall came to such reasonable cheapnesse and price, that at London a quarter of wheate was solde for two shillinges, and a fat Dre for .viij. penne, a fat sheepe for .viij. penne, and .viij. Pigeons for a pennie, a fat Goose for two pence, a fat Pigge for a pennie, and so all other victuall after the same rate.

Lacke of money caused plenty & good cheape of victuall.

And in this .vij. yere of his reigne, he helde his Parliament in England at Westminster, wherein great summes of money were graunted vnto him for the maintenance of his warres. And so soone as the same Parliament was finished, and that he had put the realme of Englande in good order, he then returned againe into Flaundrys, and at the last stayed at Louayne Castell in Brabant, where he attended his aunswere from the Emperour, and also expected the commyng of the former Lordes. And king Edward beyng in the Castell aforesayde, kept there an honourable and Princely house, and sent into England for the Queene, for that he purposed not to returne into England buttill he had done some notable acte in Fraunce.

And in the aforesayd Parliament there was made an acte for the reformation of apparell, and good cause there was that it should so be, for the people did excede merrellously, not so much in costly and chargeable apparell, as in fond and foolish apparrell, for, as sayth Carton in his Chronicle, called the fruite of tyme, The Engliche men (sayth he) so much folowed and counterfeited the madnesse and the folly of the straungers, that from the first commyng in of the Henaultes, they dayly chaunged their apparel, sometime long and wide, and at another tyme, cutted, short and streight, and altogether vnseemely and vn honest. And the apparel of the women was more fond then the men.

men. For their clothes were made so streyt to their bodies, that they were faine to sowe fore tayles vnder their clothes, for to set forth and hyde their buttockes, the which foolish pride the Scottes derided, and made foolish rimes and iastes of them.

In the moneth of Nouember next folowng, the king sent first to the Duke of Brabant, and then to all the other Lordes that were allied vnto him, desyng to know of them where their place of meeting and Parliament should be kept and holden: And the Duke of Brabant aunswere, it was best to kepe it at Arques in the Countie of Loz. And then the king sent thether, and caused the great hall of the towne to be apparelled and appoynted in as rich maner as if it had bene the Kinges Chamber. And there the king late crowned with a crowne of Golde, five foote higher then any other, and there was read openly the letters of the Emperour, by the which the king was made Vicare generall, & Lieutenant for the Emperour, and had power geuen him to make lawes, and to minister iustice to euery person in the Emperours name, and to coyne money of Golde and Siluer. And it was further ordered and commaunded by the Emperour, that all persons of his Empire, and all other his subiectes should obey to the King of England his Vicare, as to himselfe, and to do him homage. And forthwith there was claime and aunswere made betweene parties as before the Emperour, and order and iudgement geuen. And when all these thinges were done, the Lordes tooke a day that they all would appere at Cambray (which towne was then french) three weekes after Midsummer next folowng, and then euery man departed to his abone. King Edward as Vicare of the Empire, went then to the Castell of Louayne to the Queene his wyfe, who was newly come thether out of England with great noblenesse, and well accompanied with beutifull Ladyes, and goodly Damozelles of England. And there the king and the Queene kept their house right honourably all that winter, and caused great sommes of money, both of Golde and Syluer to be coynd at Andwarpe.

Letters patents graunted by the Emperour vnto king Edward the thirde openly read to the Lordes of the Empire.

The frenche king beyng nowe credibly informed that king Edward would enter the realme of Fraunce to make warre vpon the same, did therfore make great prouision to resist him: For the common fame was then in Fraunce, that king Edward entended not onely to claime Gascoyn and Guien, but also all Fraunce as his proper and rightfull inheritance, as in the right of his mother. Wherefore the french king assembled an hounge hoste, and committed the gouernement thereof vnto the king of Nauerne, and to the Erle of Alanson, brother vnto the sayde french king: The which sayde Capitaynes with their people awayed dayly the king of Englandes commyng, who disappoynted them for that yere.

King Edward coynd both Golde and Siluer at Andwarpe.

And this yere it is noted that the king graunted, that the Officers of the Maior and Shirifes of London, should from that tyme forth vse Waxes of Siluer and percell gilt.

Now when the winter was passed, and the Sommer come, Midsummer which was the tyme appoynted drew nere. And the Lordes of Almain that were allyed with king Edward, began to set forth themselves to accomplish their promise. And in like maner the french king, who vnderstood most of king Edwardes doynges, made maruylous great prouision to meet him, and

and to withstand him. But King Edward caused first his provision for men of warre that came out of England to passe by Sea, and they were with him anone after Midsummer, and he himselfe lodged at Willenort, and there caused as many of his people as he might, to be lodged in the towne, and the rest lay along on the ryuer syde in Tentes and Pauillions, and there he tarped from the middelt of July vntill the. viij. day of September, euer lookyng for the Lordes of the Empire, specially for the Duke of Brabant, on whose comyng all the other wayted. And when the King of England sawe that they came not, he sent great and honourable Messengers to every of them, somonyng them to come as they before had promised, & to meete him at Machlyn at a day appoynted, and then to shewe him for what occasion they tarped so long. Thus king Edward lay at Willenort, and kept dayly at his cost and charge, viij. hundred men of armes, and. x. thousand Archers that came ouer the Sea, besyde all other provisions, and beside the great rewardes that he had geuen to the Lordes, and besyde the great Armyes that he had vppon the Sea.

The french king on his part, had set Scots, Genowayes, Normanes, Britons, Picardes, and Spanyardes to be ready on the Sea, to enter into England as soone as the warre was opened.

In the ende, the aforesayd Lordes at the sommons of the king of England came vnto him to Machlyn, as he had appoynted them, but not without much busynesse: But at the last they agreed, that the king of England might well set forward within. xv. dayes next after. And to the entent their warre should be the more laudable, they agreed to sende every of their defiaunces to the french king: that is to say. first the king of England, then the Duke of Guerles, the Marques of Jullers, Sir Robert de Arthoys, Sir John of Heynault, the Marques of Hulle, the Marques of Blanquebource, the Lord of Falquemount, Sir Arnolde of Waquehen, the Archebishop of Colyn, Sir Galeas his brother, and all other Lordes of the Empire. These defiaunces were written and sealed by all the Lordes (except the Duke of Brabant) who sayde he would do his dede himselfe at tyme conuenient. To carie these defiaunces into fraunce, was appoynted the Bishop of Lincolne, who caried them to Paris, and there did his message in such sort, that he was much commended, and had his safe conduit to returne safely vnto the king of England to Machlyn.

In this meane tyme Queene Philip the wife of king Edward, lying at Andwarpe, was brought a bed and deliuered of a man childe, which afterward was named Lionell.

Immediately after the defiaunces were made and sent, as aforesayde, the french king sturred not a little, but gathered vnto him an innumerable number of people, and tarped with them at Amias, from the ende of August vnto the beginning of October. And when he sawe that king Edward came not, he deuided his great hoste, and sent many of them home to their abone houses, and the other he placed in diuers Castels, and Fortes thereaboutes, to let the passage of king Edward into fraunce. And in this tyme also the french king had sent diuers Ships vnto the Sea with men of warre for to take the English Marchauntes, and other that came in their course. And it so chaunced, that they encountered with two great Shippes of England called led the Edward and the Christopher, the which (as sayth the french Chronicle) were freight with great richesse, and also well manned. Allone as eyther of them was ware of the other, Connes went off, and Bowes and Arblasters shot, so that betwene them was a mortall and cruell fight, but not egall. For of the frenchmen were. xiiij. sayles great & small, and of the English men but fiue, that is to say, these two great shippes, two Barkes and a Caruell, and the thre small shippes escaped by swiftnesse of saylyng, but the two great abode, and fought more then. ix. houres, insomuch as there were slaine vpon both partes aboue. vij. hundred men: But in the ende the sayde two shippes were taken, and brought into the french kinges streames, and many of the English men that were wounded, were cast into the Sea. And soe after the sayde french nauie landed at Southhamton, and bent and spoiled the towne, and so departed.

Allone as king Edward had brought all things into a readynesse, he set forward towarde his purposed iourney into fraunce, and first passed from Archon vnto Bruxelles, and all his people passed by the Towne, and thence came to king Edward. xv. thousand Almaynes. And then the king sent our agayne to the Duke of Brabant, to know whether he mynded to go to Cambrey, or whether he thought it good to leaue it. And the Duke answered, it was best to go to Cambrey, and that allone as he heard that he had besieged the Towne, he would come thether with twelue hundred speares of good men of warre. Then the king passed forward, and the first night came to Nyuell, and there laye one night, and the next daye remoued to Ghons in Henault, and there he found the pong Erle of Heynault, who receaued him right ioyfully, and remayned with him two dayes, and from thence remoued to Valenianes, and he and only. xij. with him entered the Towne, and no moe persons, and thether was come the Erle of Henault and Sir John of Heynault his Uncle, and the Lorde of Fagynelles, the Lorde of Verchen, the Lorde of Haurerth, and diuers other who were about the Erle their Lorde. And the king and the Erle went hand in hand to the great Hall of the Towne, which was appointed and appareled meete for them. And as they went vp the steyres of the Hall: The Bishop of Lyncolne who was there present, spake out a lowde and sayde: Wylliam Bishop of Cambrey, I admonish you as procurer to the king of England, Vicare of the Empire of Rome, that ye open the gates of the Citie of Cambrey, and if ye doe not, then shall ye forsayt your lands, and we will enter by force. There was none that answered to that matter, for the Bishop was not there present. Then the Bishop of Lyncolne sayde agayne, Erle of Heynault, we admonish you in the name of the Emperour, that ye come and serue the king of Englande hys Vicare before the Citie of Cambrey, with suche number as ye ought to doe. The Erle who was there present, sayde, with a right good will I am ready. And then they entered into the Hall, and the Erle brought the king into his Chamber, and anone Supper was readie. The next day the king departed and went to Asper and there taried two dayes, and suffered all hys people to passe forward. And then they came to Cambrey and lodged at Wyses, and besieged the Citie of Cambrey rounde about, and daylie hys power encreased. Thetger came the young Erle of Henault in great aray, and Sir John hys Uncle, and they lodged nere to the king, and so did the Duke of Guerles and his his company the Marques of Hulle, the Erle of Houns, the Erle of Saunnes, the Lorde of Falquemount, Sir Arnold of Bouquehen, with all the other Lordes of the Empire, suche as were alyed with the king of England. And within. vij. dayes next after the siege was layed to the Citie of Cambrey, the Duke of Brabant came thether with. ix. C. speares, beside other souldyours. And as sone as he was come, he sent to defy the french king, who was then at Compeigne. The siege aforesayde thus continuyng, darlie assaultes and skirmishes were made, and many good feates of armes done: But in the ende the souldyours of Cambrey so valiantly defended the Citie that it was thought but time lost to continue the siege any lenger, & namely they perceaued wynter to approche, and that as yet they had done nothing, but had lyen at great expences and charges, wherefore the king determined to breake by the siege, and to enter into Fraunce, and so caused the Lordes to dislodge and trusse by their Tents and Hauillions, and all maner of armor, and so departed toward Mount S. Martyn, the which was at the entrie of Fraunce, and thus they roade foorth in good order, and passed the ryuer of Lescault at their ease. And when the Erle of Hynault had accompanied the king vnto the departyng out of the Empire, and that he should passe the river and enter into the realme of Fraunce: Then he tooke his leave of the king and sayde he would ryde no farther with him at that tyme, because king Philip the french king was his Uncle, and that he would not have his euill wil, and therefore he did say that he would now go and serue the french king in Fraunce, as he before had serued the king of England in the Empire: And thus the Erle of Hynault and the Erle of Namure forsooke the king and departed from him and all their people with them, ready to serue the french king, as aforesayde, agaynst king Edward.

But king Edward with those that remayned with him passed forward into Fraunce, wastyng, spoylyng and brennyng the Countrie as they went, and at the last came so nere the french armie, that they were within two leagues the one armie of the other. And the french king hauing. lx. thousand men and mo in his armie, and comyng to a place called Wyronfelle (and knowyng the king of England to be at hande as aforesayde) sayde that he would not go thence vntill he had fought with the king of England and with his alyes. The king of England vnderstanding the minde of the french king, demaunded of his Lords what he should doe, (his honour saved): for he sayde that he minded to geue the french king battayle. Then the Lordes beheld eche other, and they desyred the Duke of Brabant to saye first his minde. The Duke sayde that he was of that minde to geue battayle, for else sayde he, they coulde not saue their honours: And therefore he counsayled that Herauldes should be sent to the french king to demaunde a daye of battayle. The which request the french king graunted and named the daye, which was within two dayes after. And when knowledge thereof came to the Lordes of both the hostes, they much reioyced, and the next day folowyng they prepared all thing in readinesse. And when the day came, both the hostes appareled and appointed themselues to fight, in order folowyng: And first we will speake of the Englishmen, they drew them into the field, and made three battayles on foote, and did put all their horses and baggages into a litle wood behinde them, and fortified it. The first battayle was led by the Duke of Guerles, the Marques of Hulle, the Marques of Blanquebource, Sir John of Hynault, the Erle of Houns, the Erle of Saunnes, the Lorde of Falquemount, Sir Guillam du fort, Sir Arnold of Waquehen and the Almaynes, and among them was. xxij. Banners and. lx. Pennons, and in the whole. viij. thousand men.

The second battayle had the Duke of Brabant, and the Lordes and knightes of his countrey. First the Lorde Hulle, the Lorde Bergues, the Lorde of Bredangh, the Lorde of Rodes, the Lorde of Waurelare, the Lord of Borguynall, the Lorde of Stone. port, the Lorde of Wyten, the Lorde of Elka, the Lorde of Cassebegne, the Lorde of Duffle, Sir Thyrre of Walcourte, Sir Raufe of the Grees, Sir John of Cassebegne, Sir John Filite, Sir Giles of Cotereby, Sir Water of Hotebergue, the three brethren of Harleberque, Sir Henry of Flaundyrs, and diuers other Barons & knightes of Flaundyrs, who were all vnder the Duke of Brabants Baner, as the Lorde of Hallen, the Lorde of Gypen, Sir Hector Willaynes, Sir John of Rodes, Sir Walfart of Gypstell, Sir Wylliam of Strates, Sir Gofwyn de la Hule and many other. The Duke of Brabant had. xxiiij. Banners and. lxxx. Pennons, and in all. vij. thousand men.

The third battaile, and the greatest had king Edward, & with him his cōsyn the Erle of Darby, the bishop of Lincoln, the bishop of Durham, the Erle of Salisbury, the Erle of Northampton, & of Gloucester the Erle of Suffolke, sir Robert de Arthoys who was then Erle of Richemond, the Lorde Reynold Cobham, the Lord Percey, the Lord Roose, the Lord Howbray, sir Lewes, and sir John Beauchamp, the Lord Delaware, the Lord of Laucome, the Lord Wasset, the Lord Fitzwater, sir Water Manny, Sir Hugh Hastynges, sir John Lille, and diuers other that I can not name, and among other was sir John Chandos, of whome much honour was spoken. The king had with him. xxviiij. Banners, and. xc. Pennons, and in his battaile. vij. thousand men of armes, and. vij. thousand Archers. And he had set another battaile as in a wyng, wherof the Erle of Warwike, the Erle of Pembroke, the Lorde Berkeley, the Lorde Hulton, and diuers other were chiefe, and they were on horsebacke. Thus when euery Lorde was vnder his Baner as it was commaunded by the Marshalles: The king of England mounted on a Halkrey, beyng accompanied onely with sir Robert de Arthoys, sir Reynold Cobham, and sir Water of Manny, roade along before all the battailes, and right gently and earnestly desyred all his Lordes and others, that they would that day defend his honour, and the honour of England, and they all willyngly promised him so to do. Then he returned vnto his awne battaile, and set euery thing in good order, and commaunded that none should go before the Marshals Banners. Now let vs speake of the Lordes of Fraunce, what they did.

In the armie of the french king, were. CCx. Banners, foure kings, five Dukes, xxvij. Erles, and mo then foure thousand knightes, and of the Commons of Fraunce, mo then. lx. thousand. The Kinges that were there with the french king, were the king of Behayne, the king of Nauarre, and the king of Scotland. The Duke of Normandie, the Duke of Britayne, the Duke of Burbone, the Duke of Loreyne, and the Duke of Athenes. Of Erles, the Erle of Alanton brother to the french king, the Erle of Flaun-duys, the Erle of Henault, the Erle of Bloys, the Erle of Barre, the Erle of Forestes, the Erle of Foy, the Erle of Armanack, the Erle Dolphyn of Auvergne, the Erle of Longuile, the Erle of Stampes, the Erle of Wandosme, the Erle of Harecourt, the Erle of Saint Paule, y Erle of Guines, the Erle of Bouloigne, the Erle of Kouffy, the Erle of Dampmartyn, the Erle of Valentynops, the Erle of Aucer, the Erle of Saucer, the Erle of Genie, the Erle of Dreux, and of Gascoigne, and of Languedocke, and so many other Erles and Vicountes, as were to long to rehearse. It was a beautifull sight to beholde the Banners and Standerds wauyng in the winde, and horses richely barded, and knightes and Esquiers richely armed. The frenche men ordeyned thre battayles, and in euery Battaile. xv. thousand men of armes, and. xx. thousand footmen.

Now when both the armies aforesayd were thus in a redinesse to geue battaile, and eche of them within sight of other, it was meruelous straunge that they both departed without any stroke striken. But the frenche men were not all of one mynde. Some sayde it were a great shame if they fought not. Feynng their enemies were so nere them in their awne Countrie, & raunged in field: And some other sayd, it should be a great folly to fight, for it was heard to knowe euery mannes minde and ieopardie of treason, for they sayd, if fortune were contrary to their King, as to leese the field, he then should put all his whole realme in a ieopardie to be lost. And though he did discomfite his enemies, yet for al that, he should be neuer the nere of the realme of England, nor of the landes apperteynyng to any of the Lordes that were alyed with him. Thus contendyng among themselves, the day passed untill noone, and then sodainely they started a Hare in the frenche armie, and such as saw her, made a great shoute and crie, by reason whereof, they that were behind, thought that they that were before were a fightyng, and therefore put on their Helmettes, and tooke their speares in hand: And forthwith were made diuerse newe knightes, and specially the Erle of Henault made. xiiij. who were euer after called knightes of the Hare. And thus the battaile stood still all that day, and at night, the frenche King dislodged his armie, and departed into Fraunce. And in like maner king Edward brake by his armie, and departed into Brabant, and so this iourney ended.

Now when king Edward was returned into Brabant, he went streight vnto Brusselles, where the Duke of Guerles, the Duke of Fulers, the Marques of Blaquebourte, the Erle of Houns, Sir John of Henault, the Lorde of Falquemount, and all the Lordes of the Empire, suche as had bene in the former iourney, did there take aduice and counsaile what should be more done in the matter that they had begon. And for the more expedition to be had in the cause, they ordeyned a Parliament to be holden at Brussels, and to come thether was desyred Jaques Dartuell of Gaunt, who came thether with a great company, and all the Counsailes of the good townes of Flaundyrs. In the which Parliament king Edward was greatly entreated and desyred of all his alyes of the Empire, that he would require them of Flaundyrs, to ayde and mainteyne his warre, and to defie the frenche king, and to go with him where as he would haue them: and in their so doynge, he to promise them to recouer the Isle Doway, and Bethayne. This request was well heard of the Flemynge, and therevpon they desyred to take counsaile saile among themselves, and so they did, and then after said to king Edward. Sir where ye haue made a request vnto vs to ayde you, truly it we might do it sauyng your honour and our selues, we would gladly do it: But Sir, we are bound by fayth and othe, and in the summe of two Myllyons of Floreins in the Popes Chamber, that we may make nor moue no warre against the king of fraunce, who soeuer it be, vpon payne to forfeit and lose the sayd summe, and besydes that, to incurre the sentence of cursyng. But sir, if you will take on you the armes of fraunce, and quarter them with the armes of Englarde, and call your selfe king of fraunce, as of right ye ought to doe: Then we will take you for rightfull king of fraunce, and demaund of you quittance of our bandes, and so you to geue vs pardon thereof as King of fraunce, and by this meanes we shall be assured and dispenced withall, and then will we go with you whether soeuer you will haue vs.

The first occasion of the quartering of the armes of France with the armes of England.

Then king Edward tooke counsaile, for he thought that it was a sore matter to take on him the armes of fraunce and the name, and as then had conquered no peece thereof, neyther could tell what might come of that enterprize: And on the other syde he was very loth to refuse the offer of the aide made vnto him by the Flemynge, who might ayde him more then any of the other. After that the king had taken counsaile of the Lordes of the Empire, and of the Lorde Robert de Arthoys, and other of his speciall friendes: He then aunswered the Flemynge, that if they would sweare, and seale to this accorde and promise to mainteyne his warre, he would with a good will do all that they requyred, and promised also to get them againe, Leye, Doway, and Bethayne: And all they with one voyce aunswered that they were content. Then there was a day assigned to meete at Gaunt, at which day the king was there and the most part of the aforesayd Lordes, and all the Counsailes generally in Flaundyrs, where all the aforesayd matters were rehearsed, sworn and sealed. And then the king quartered the armes of fraunce with the armes of England: And from thenceforth tooke on him the name of the king of fraunce, and so continued still untill he left it by composition, as after shall be shewed.

A daye of meeting at Gaunt.

The armes of England quartered with the armes of France.

And at this counsell they determyned agaynst the next sommer folowynge to prouide to make great warre vpon fraunce, promysing to besiege the Citie of Corney, whereof the Flemynge were ioyfull, for they thought themselves strong inough to get it. And thus the parliament ended, and euery man departed home: The king of England went to Andwarp, and the Queene abode still at Gaunt, and was oftentimes visited by Jaques Dartuell, and by other Lordes, Ladyes, and Damofelles of Gaunt. And when the kinges Shippes were readie, he tooke the See, and then sayled into England, and so came to London, where he was honorably receaued. And shortly after he had many complaintes made vnto him, howe the frenchemen had brent and destroyed the Towne of Southampton, and had done sundrie other hurtes in England, namely vpon the Sea coastes. And the king aunswered that he trusted before it were a yere lenger, it should be well reuenged.

And soone after the returne of the king into Englarde, he called hys high Court of Parliament at Westmynster, in the which was graunted vnto him toward the recouery of his right in fraunce the. v. parte of the mouenable goodes of euery inhabitant within the Realme, and the Custome of Wolles payde two yeres before hande, and the ix. sheafe of every mames coine: But before the same were all gathered and payde, the prayer of the people turned into cursyng, and their loue turned into hatred. And for that the king was forced to occupie money before these payments could be made, he was therefore compelled to borow of sundrie persons great somes of money, namely of the Citie of London, of whome he borowed twentie thousande Marke, which was leuyed upon sundrie wardes in London, as appeareth in Fabian.

The first Coyne of Gold wherin the French armes were mixed.

Also in this yere the king caused a new coine of Gold to be coined, called the Noble, of the value of vii. shillings. viii. pence or. ix. pence. &c. Wherewith was mixed and quartered the armes of Fraunce and England, and also the wytyng and inscription of the same was, Edward by the grace of God king of Englande and of Fraunce. &c.

When king Edward had set all his lande in good order, and when also he had prepared all things in a readynesse for the warres of Fraunce, he toke Shypping and sayled toward Flaundyrs, and had with him two hundred sayle of good Shyppes well furnished with men of warre, and the king kept his course to Sluce, and betweene Sluce and Blanqueberque on the See, there was Sir Hugh Kyryell, Sir Peter Bahuchet and Barbanoyr and above. Cxx. great Vessels beside other, and in them were of Normans, Genowes and Picardes above the number of. xl. thousande. And there they were purposely layde to resist and withstande the landyng of king Edward when he should come to Sluce. And when the king drew somewhat neere them and espied such a number of shippes, whose Mastes a farre off seemed as it had bene a great forest or Wood: The king demaunded of the Master of his Ship what people he thought they were. And he answered: I thinke they be Normans, layde here by the french king to let your passage, and I thinke they be even the same that burned Southampton, and that tooke your great Ship called the Christopher. A quoth the king, I have long desired to fight with the french men, and now by the grace of God I shall meete wyth some of them, for they have done me many displeasures. Then the king caused all his shippes to be set in order, the greatest before, well furnished wyth Archers, and ever betweene two shippes of Archers he placed one ship wyth men of armes: And then he made another battaile to lye aloofe, with Archers to comfort them that were most wearie if neede were. And in the sayde ships were a great number of Countesses, Ladyes, knightes wyves and other Damofelles that were goyng to see the Quene at Gaunt: These Ladyes the king caused to be well kept with thre hundred men of armes, and syue hundred Archers.

A great flect of French Shippes.

The battell at Sluce upon the sea.

Alsoone as the king and his Marchalles had ordered hys battaile, he drew by the sayles and came with a quarter winde to have the bauntage of the sonne. And so at the last they turned a little, to have the winde at wyll. But when the Normans sawe them recule back, they had marvell why they did so. And some sayde they are afrayde to medle wyth vs, and therefore they go backe.

Then the french men beganne to set themselves in order. for they were good men of warre on the Sea, and they did set the Christopher, which before they had won, as aforesayde, for most furnished with many Trumpets & Instruments

Instruments and to gaue the onset upon their enimies. And then began a fore battaile upon both partes: Archers and Crosbowes beganne to shoote, and men of armes approched and fought hande to hande: and the better to come together, they had great hookes and grappelers of Iron to cast out of one Ship into another, and so tyed them fast together. There were manye worthy deedes of armes done in taking and rescuyng againe. And at the last the great Christopher was first wonne by the Englishmen, and all that were within it drowned or slaine. Then was there great crye and pitifull noyse, and the Englishmen fortified the Christopher with archers, and caused him to passe before to meete with the Genowayes. This battaile was right fierce and terrible, for the battayles on the Sea are more fierce and more dangerous, then are the battayles by lande. For on the Sea there is no reculyng or flyeng, there is no remedy but to fight and to abide fortune, and every man to shew his prowesse.

And in this fight Sir Hugh Kyryell and Syr Bahuchet and Barbenoyr which were the Admirals to the french flete, shewed themselves to be right good and expert men of warre. This battaile continued from the morning untill it was noone, & the Englishmen (sayth Froysart) endured great paine, for their enimies were foure agaynst one, and all good men on the sea.

And in this fight the king of Englande shewed himselfe a noble and valyaunt Prince of his awne handes, for he was then in the chiefe flowres of his youth. And in lyke maner did the Erle of Darby, Pembroke, Herford, Hentyngdon, Northampton and Gloucester: Sir Raynold Cobham, Sir Richard Stafford, the Lorde Percy, Sir Walter of Manny, Sir Henry of Flaundyrs, Sir John Beauchamp, the Lord Felton, the Lord Brasseletton, Sir Chandos, the Lord Delaware, the Lord of Hulton, Sir Robert de Artoys called the Erle of Richmond, and dyuers other Lords & knightes, who shewed themselves so valyauntly that they obtayned the victorie: So that the frenchmen, Normans and other were discomfited, slayne and drowned, and there was not one that escaped.

A great victorie that King Edward had of the french men.

After this victorie thus atcheued, the king all that night abode in hys ship before Sluce with great noyse of Trompets and other Instruments. And thether came to see the king dyuers of Flaundyrs, suche as had heard of the kinges coming: and then the king demaunded of the Burgeses of Bridges how Jaques Darnell did: and they answered that he was gone to the Erle of Henault against the Duke of Normandy with thre score thousande Flemynge.

And on the next day after this battaile, which was Midsummer day, the King and all his tooke land, and the king went in Pilgrimage a foote to the Lady of Ardenborough, now called Odenborough, and there dynd, and then tooke his horse and roade to Gaunt, where the Quene receyued him wyth great ioy, and all his cariage came after him by little and little.

Shortly after, the king wrote to the Erle Henault, and to them that were within the Castell of Chyne, certefiying them of his arriual and victorie. And alsoone as the Erle knewe thereof, and that he had discomfited the french armie upon the Sea, he dislodged, and gaue leaue to all the Soldiours to depart, and tooke with him all the great Lordes to Valenciens, and there feasted them honourably, and specially the Duke of Brabant, and Jaques Dartucll. And there Jaques Dartucll openly in the Market place in the presence of all the Lordes, and of all such as would here him, declared what right the king of Englande had to the Crowne of Fraunce: And also what puyssaunce the thre Countries were of, Flaundyrs, Heynault, and Brabant, and howe they were surely ioyned in one allyaunce. And he did utter it so grauely, and so eloquently, that all the people that heard him, prayesed him much, and sayd he had nobly spoken, and as a man of great experience. And then the Lordes departed, and promised within. viij. dayes to meete at Gaunt to visite the King of Englande, and so they did, and the king feasted them right honorably, and so did the Queene who then was newly churched of a sonne called John of Gaunt, who was after Duke of Lancaster by hys wife, which was daughter to Henry Duke of Lancaster. And shortly after king Edward held a counsaile at Willenort, at a day limited.

of Lancaster.

When the French king heard howe his armie on the sea was discomfited, he dislodged and drewe to Arras, and gaue leaue to his men to depart vntill he heard other tydynges. And he sent Sir Godmer du foye to Courney, to see that there lacked nothyng, for he feared more the Flemynge then any other. And he sent the Lorde of Beauieuwe to Mortayne, to kepe the frontiers agaynst Heynault: And he sent also many men to Saint Omers, to Arre and to Saint Venaunt, and prouided sufficiently for all the fortresses frontying on Flaundyrs.

Robert king of Cicille.

In this season there reigned a king in Cicille called Robert, who was reported to be a great Astronomer, and he alwayes fauourpung and loupung the French king, did counsaile and warne him in no wise to deale, nor haue to do with the king of England, for sayd he, it is geuen to the king of England to be right luckie and fortunate in all his enterprices. This king Robert would gladly haue set these two Kinges at a good accorde, for he bare suche loue and affection vnto the crowne of Fraunce, that he was right soyr to see or thinke of the desolation thereof. And in lyke wise the sayd King Robert labored to the Pope to be a meane to appease these two Kinges, but all theyr labor tooke none effect.

Ye haue heard a little befoze, that a day of counsaile was appoynted to be holden at Willenort, which day was now come. And at this counsaile were present, the King of England, the Duke of Brabant, the Erle of Heynault, Sir John his Uncle, the Duke of Guerles, the Erle of Fulers, the Marques of Falquebource, the Marques of Hulle, the Erle of Houns, Sir Robert de Arthoys, the Lorde of Falquemount, Sir William du Nozt, the Erle of Namure, Jaques Dartucll and many other great Lordes, and of euery good towne of Flaundyrs thre or foure personages, as counsaillors.

Willenort.

And in this counsaile was made a league betwene the thre countries, namely, Flaundyrs, Brabant, and Heynault, that from thence forth eche of them should ayde and comfort other in all cases. And further they concluded, that if any of them had to do with any countrie, the other two should geue them ayde. And also that if hereafter it should fortune any of them to be at discorde one with another, that then the thirde should set an agreement betwene them. And if he were not able so to do, that then they should abyde the order of the king of England, vnto whose handes they did willyngly commit the same, and tooke their othes to stand, abyde, and obey his iudgement. And for further and better confirmation of this loue and amitie, they ordeined this agreement to be made a lawe, and to be published thozroughout those thre countries, and the same afterward was called the lawe of the Companions or Allyes. And in the same counsaile it was also determined that the king of England should in the moneth of July next folowpung, beyng accompanied with the ayde of the aforesaid Lordes, and the powers of all the good townes lay siege to Courney. And so the Counsaile brake vp, and euery man departed home to make prouision agaynst the tyme appoynted.

for

The French king after the departure of these Lordes from the aforesayde counsaile, was informed of the most part of theyr determination, and therefore forthwith sent to Courney the chiefe men of warre that he had in all fraunce, as the Erle of Ewe, the yong Erle of Guynes his sonne, Constable of Fraunce, the Erle of Foyz and his brethren, the Erle Amery of Harbon, Sir Tymor of Boyters, Sir Geoffrey of Charney, Sir Garard of Mountaicon, the two Marthalles, Sir Robert Bertrand, and Sir Mathewe de Troy, the Lord of Cayeur, the Seneschall of Poiteau, the Lord of Chastelayne, and Sir John of Landas, and these also had with them many other valiaunt knightes, and Esquiers, and came to Courney, and founde there Sir Godmer du foy, who was placed there, as befoze you haue heard. And so soone as they were come thether, they diligently considered the state of the towne, first for furniture of all necessary victualles, and after for men, munition, and armoz.

And nowe approached the time that king Edward and his Allyes should mete befoze Courney, for then the Corne began to rype, which was the. xxiiij. day of July, and the king departed from Gaunt, accompanied with. liij. Erles of England. viij. Bishoppes, xxiiij. Baronettes. CC. knightes, foure thousand men of armes, and. ix. thousand Archers, besyde men of foote, and all out of Englande: And all his hoste passed thozrough the Towne of Andwarpe, and so passed the ruer of Lescault, & lodged befoze Courney, at the gate of Saint Martyn, which was the way toward Lille and Doway. And shortly after came the Duke of Brabant, with mo then. xx. thousand men, knightes, Esquiers, and Commons, and he lodged at the bridge of Arres, by the riner of Lescault, betwene the Abbey of Saint Nicholas, and the gate of Walentenoy. And not long after, came the Erle of Heynault with a goodly company of his Countrie, with many of Holland, and Feland, and he was lodged betwene the King, and the Duke of Brabant. Then came Jaques Dartucll with mo then. l. thousand Flemynge, besyde them of Ipze, Poppinguy, Castell, and Bergues, and they were sent to the other syde. The sayde Jaques Dartucll lodged at the gate called Saint fountayne. And the Duke of Guerles, the Erle of Fulers, the Marques of Blanquebource, the Marques of Hulle, the Erle of Houns, the Erle of Sauiues, the Lord of Faulquemount, Sir Arnold of Baquehen, and all the Almaynes were lodged on the other syde toward Heynault. And thus the Citie of Courney was enuyroned round about, and euery host might resozt eche to other, so that none could issue out without espiyng.

Durpung the tyme of the siege, although they were so great a number, yet were they well prouyded and furnished of freshe victualles, and at reasonable price, for the people came from all partes to victual them. And while this this siege continued, there were daylie outrodes, and dyuers prayes and booties taken, and many Villages bzent, and the Countries thereabouts greatly annoyed and hurt. And many and sundrie times there were sundrie skirmishes and many feates of armes done. But this siege continued long, for that the Souldyours of Cozney defended the same very balauntly, yet at the last, victualles within the Cobone warpyng very scant, they were forced to put out all their needie and pooze people, which passed thorough the Duke of Brabant's hoste, who caused them to be conducted to the french kinges Campe, who lay then at Arras, accompanied with a great & honge hoste, to whome the pooze people made a most lamentable and pittifull repozte of the state of Cozney.

All the time that this siege continued, which was by the space of ten weekes and more, the Lady Jane of Valoys, sister to the french king, and mother to the Queene of England, and to the Erle of Heynault, traupled greatly, as well on the one parte as on the other to haue a truce and a respite betweene the french king and the king of England and his Allyes for a season, that they might depart without battayle. And dyuers times she kneeled at the feete of the french king in that behalfe. And in lyke maner made great labour to the Lordes of the Empire, and specially to the Duke of Brabant and to the Duke of Fullers, who had her daughter in mariage, and also to Sir John of Heynault. Insomuch that the good Lady procured, with the ayde and counsaile of Lewes Daugymount, who was welbeloued with both parties, that at the last it was graunted that ech partie should send foure sufficient persons to treat by the space of thre dayes of some good wayes for the agreement of a truce. The persons that should be appointed shoulde meete in a little Chapell standyng in the fieldes called Esplotyn. And at the daye appointed these persons met, and the good Ladye with them. Of the frenche parte, there was Charles king of Behayne, Charles Erle of Da-lanlon brother to the french king, the Bishop of Liege, the Erle of Flaun-dyrs, and the Erle of Armanack. Of the Englishe parte there was the Duke of Brabant, the Bishop of Lyncolne, the Duke of Guerles, the Duke of Fullers, and Sir John of Heynault.

And when they were all met, they made eche vnto other louyng saluta-tions and great cheere, and then entred into their treatie, and all that daye they comuned of dyuers wayes of accorde: And alwayes the good Lady of Valoys was among them, effecteously entreatyng them on both sydes that they would doe their endeuour to make a peace: howbeit that daye passed without anye thing done, and so they returned and agreed to meete there a-gayne the next day, the which day they met, and streight waye entered to the matter of their treatie: and at the last agreed vpon certaine pointes: but it was then so late that they coulde not finishe in good order, that which they had agreed vpon. The thirde day they met agayne, and finally agreed on a truce to remayne for one yere next to come betweene all parties and all their men, and also betweene them that were in Scotlande, and all suche as made warre in Gascoyn, Boyteau, and Samton, and the same truce to beginne .xl. dayes next ensuyng: and within that space euery person to geue knowledge vnto his men without male engyne: and if suche companies will not keepe the peace, let them be at their choise. But as for ffrance, Picardy, Burgoin, Britayne Embassadors appointed to conuene and determine a peace betwene the King of England & the frenche King.

A truce agreed and concluded betwene the King of England and the frenche King for one yere.

Britayne and Normandy to be bounde to this peace without any exception: and this peace to beginne incontinent betwene the hostes of the two kinges, namely of England and of ffrance. And it was further determyned that eyther of the sayde kinges should send foure or fiue personages as their Am-bassadors, and to meete at Arras: and the Pope in lyke maner to send the-ther foure, and there to make a full confirmation without any meane. Also by this truce it was ordered, that euery partie should enioye and possesse eue-rie thing that they were then in possession of. This truce was forthwith proclaymed in both the hostes: whereof the Brabanters were right glad, for they were sore weryed with the lyeng so long at the siege, so that the nexte day, as sone as it was daye light, ye should haue sene such pulling downe of Centes and Paullions, such charging and lading of Waggones, such casting and throwing of their armour, such shooting off of ordynance, both great and small, and the people remouing so thicke, that to such as sawe it, it might haue appered to haue bene a new worlde.

Thus the king of Englande departed from Cozney, sore against hys minde, if he could haue done otherwise, but he was fayne to yeelde to the other Lordes, and to folow their counsailes, and then he came to Gaunt to the Queene his wife, and shortly after returned into Englande with all his people, except such as were left behind to attend vpon the assembly at Arras, as afore sayde, and vnto this assembly or counsaile of Arras, there came first from the Pope as Legates, the Cardinall of Naples, the Cardinall of Cleremount, who first came to Paris where the french king receaued them with great honor and after conueyed them to Arras. For the french king thether came, the Erle of Alanson the brother of the french king, the Duke of Bourbon, the Erle of Flaundyrs, the Erle of Bloys, the Archebithop of Senes, the Bishop of Beawayes, and the Bishop of Aucerre. For the king of Englande, came the Bishop of Lyncolne, the Bishop of Durham, the Erle of Warwike, Sir Robert de Arthoys which was Erle of Richemond, Sir John of Heynault, and Sir Henry of Flaundyrs. In the which treaty many matters were comuned of, and they continued .xv. dayes, but agreed to no one point of effect, for euer the Englishmen demaunded, and the french men would nothing graunt, but onely to render the Countie of Boyteau, the which was geuen to Quene Isabel in mariage with king Edward the secod. So this assembly brake vp, and nothing done, but that the truce was yet pro-longed two yeres more, & that was al that the Cardinals could get graunted vnto them. And thus euery man departed, & the two Cardynals went thro-rough Henault at the desire of the Erle, who feasted them right nobly. Froissart.

After king Edward was returned out of ffrance into England, in the which voyage and passage of the Sea, he had an exceeding and most horri-ble tempest, and escaped with great daunger, which tempest after the opynion of sundrie wyrters was rered and sturred by by the Necromancers of the french king to the intent to haue destroyed the king, or else to haue abated his courage for attemptyng the Sea any more.

In the time that the king lay at the siege of Cozney, as afore sayde, the Scottes had agayne recovered the greatest parte of their lande, & all their fortes except thre, wherefore the king was now counsayled to make a voy-age into Scotland and so he did, and roade thetherward betweene Nighel-mas

mas and Galontyde, commaundyng certaine Capteynes to gather their men together and to folow him to Warwike, & so euery man began to styre, and came thither as they were commaunded. The king at the last came to Porke and there tarped for his people. The Lordes of Scotland were enformed of the comming of the king of Englande, wherefore they gaue most soze and fierce assaultes to the Castell of Estreuelne, which befoze they had long be- sieged, and so constrayned those that kept it, with engynes and Canons, that they were fayne to yeelde by the Castell, sauynge their lyues and mem- bers: but nothing should they carie awaye.

These tydings came to the King of Englande where as he was, and then he departed and drewe towarde Estreuelyn, and came to New Castell vpon Tyne, where he taried more then a Moneth, abyding prouision for hys armie, the which was shipped to come by sea, betwene Alhalontyde and the last of Nouember, but many of the shippes were cast awaye vpon the Sea, so that it was a small prouision of victuall that came thether. And some of the shippes were driuen into Holland and into Friseland, by reason whereof the English armie had great lack of victualles, and euery thing waxed vnreaso- nably deare, and Winter was at hand, so that they knewe not where to haue forage, and in Scotland the Scottes had put all their goods into fortresses, and the king of England had there mo then. vij. thousand horsemen and. xl. thousand footemen.

The Lordes of Scotland after theyr winnyng of Estreuelne, drewe themselves into the Forrestes of Gedeours, and they vnderstood well howe that the king of England lay at newe Castell with a great number to brenne and spoyle Scotland. Then they tooke counsaile what they should do, they thought themselves to weake and to small a company to maintein the warre, and the rather for that they had continued the warres almost seuen yeres without head or Capitaine, neyther as then they could not perceyue any suc- cour to come from their awne king, and therefore they determined to send to the King of England, a Bishop and an Abbot to desyre a truce. The which Messengers departed from Scotland and came to Newcastell, where they found the king.

These Messengers shewed to the King and his counsaile the cause of their comming: and at the last a truce was concluded for foure monethes, on this condicion, that they of Scotland should sende sufficient Ambassadors into Fraunce to king Dauid, sayng, that if he came not befoze the ende of the moneth of May nexte folowynge with puyssaunce and force sufficient to de- fende his realme, that then they would yelde themselves to the king of Eng- land, and neuer after to take Dauid for their king. So thus these two pre- lates returned againe into Scotland, and incontinent they ordeyned to send into Fraunce, Sir Robert Uersay, and Sir Robert Percy, and Sir Si- mon Frysell and two other knightes to shew to the king their appoyntment.

The king of England agreed the sooner to this truce, because his hoste lacked victuall, and so he came backe againe, and sent euery man home. The Scottishe Messengers went toward Fraunce, and toke shipping at Douer.

Nowe King Dauid of Scotland, who had beene. vij. yere in Fraunce, and knewe well that his realme was soze distressed, tooke his leaue of the French king, to the entent to come home to comfort his awne people: and so he

he tooke shipping with his wyfe and such small company as he had, and put himselfe vnder the guidyng of a Mariner called Richard Flamont, and so ar- rived in Scotlande at a port called Moroyse, or euer that any in Scotlande knewe thereof: Neyther knewe he any thing of the Messengers that were gone into Fraunce to speake with him, nor they knewe not of his retur- nyng home.

So sone as the commyng of king Dauid was knowen to the Scottes, they came about him with great ioy, and solempnitie, and brought him to the towne of Saint Johns, and thether came to him people from all partes of his countrey, greatly complaynyng and cryng out of the damnages and great hurtes that they had susteyned in his absence by the Englishmen: To whom he answered that he trusted right shortly to be reuenged vpon them, or else it should cost him both his life and his realme.

Then he sent Messengers to all partes of his Countrie, both farre and nere, requyryng euery of them to helpe him forwarde in his enterprize. And shortly after came vnto him the Erle of Orkeney, a great Prince and a puyssant, he had maryed the kinges syster, and with him came a great num- ber of men of warre, and diuers other Lordes and knightes of Souegne, of Arbegne, and of Denmarch, some for loue and some for wages, so that when they were all together, they were. lx. thousand footmen, and three thousand horsemen armed after their maner: and when they were all ready, they remoued setting forward toward England, and to do therein as much hurt as they might, for the truce was as then expired, or else to fight with the king of England, who had so much greued and annoyed them.

Thus the Scots departed from S. Johns towne, & went to Donfreme- lyn, & the next day there they passed a little arme of the Sea: Then they went with great diligence, and passed by Edenbourgh, & after by Rousbourgh, the which was as then English, but they made there no tariance, for they purpo- sed to do a great feat, befoze they returned againe into Scotland. And so they passed forward and went not farre from Warwike, and passyng it also with- out any assault geuyng, they entered into the Countrie of Northumberland, and came to the ryuer of Tyne, brennyng all the countrie round about them, and at the last came to New Castell vpon Tyne, and there the king of Scots and all his people lay about that towne all night.

In the mornyng a certeine number of Gentlemen that were within the towne issued out to the number of two hundreth Speares, to make a skyre in the Scottes hoste. They dashed in so sodeynely vpon the Scottes, and namely vpon the Erle of Mores tentes, who bare in his armor Syluer, thre Dreylls Goules, and there they toke him in his bed, and slue many, be- fore the host was moued, and wanne great pillage.

Then they returned into the Towne ballauntly, and with great ioye, and delyuered the Erle Mores as prisoner to the Capitaine of the Castell, which then was the Lorde John Renell.

When the Scottes were by, they armed them, and ranne lyke mad men to the Barrers of the towne, and gaue a great assault ther vnto, the which endured long, but little it auayled them, and the Scots lost there many men, for there were very many good men of warre within the towne, the which defended the same so manfully and wisely, that the Scots to their great losse were were fayne and glad to withdraue their siege.

Now when the Scottishe king sawe that their tariyng at New Castell was daingerous, and that he had there neyther hope of gayne nor honour, then he departed and entred the Countrey of the Bishoprick of Durham, and there bzent and wasted all that was befoze him, and at the last came to the Citie of Durham, and besieged it rounde about, and made many terrible and desperate assaultes lyke mad men, because they had lost the Erle of Moxet, and also they knewe well that there was much ryches in that towne, for all the countrey there about was fled thether.

The Scots made Engines and Instruments to come to the walles to make the fiercer assault. But when the Scots were gone from New Castell as you heard befoze, then syr John Neuell Captaine there, mounted on a good horse, and tooke away farre of from the Scottes, and made such good speede that within fyve dayes he came to Chyrtsey, where as king Edward lay then, and there declared vnto him the doyngs and enterpryses of the Scots.

Then king Edward sent forth Messengers into euerye parte of his realme, commaundyng euery man betwene the age of .xv. and .lx. all excuses set aparte, to drawe Northward, and to meete him in that Countrey, for the ayde and defence of England, which the Scottes attempted to destroy, and forthwith the king departed and taried for no man, and suffred euery man to come after as well as they might.

Then the Lordes, knightes, Esquiers, and gentlemen drew together, euery one bringing with them as many men as they coulde make, and drew toward the North, folowyng the king.

In this meane tyme the Scottes gaue a most cruell assault vnto the towne of Durham, and folowed the same so fiercely with Engines and Instruments, that they that were within were not hable to make any lenger defence, but that the Scottes entered the towne by force, and robbed and spoyled the same, and then set it on fyre, and destroyed all the people that were therein, men, women, children, Monke, Fryer, Nonne, Chanon, and suffred not one person to escape on lyue, and then set a fyre the Churches, Chapels and all that euer was there, sparyng nothing that myght be spoyled or bzent.

And when the Scottishe king had finished this hys tyranny vpon the towne of Durham, he was then aduised to drawe back agayne along the ryuer of Tyne, and to come to Carleyle, and as he and his armie passed that way, he lodged beside a Castell of the Erle of Salisburies, the which was well furnished and kept with men of warre, and syr William Mountageu sonne to the Erle of Salisburies sister was Captaine thereof. The next day the Scottes dislodged and went toward Carleyle (they had much carpage with them of suche pillage as they had at Durham) and when Sir William Mountageu sawe howe the Scottes passed by without resting, then he with .xl. with him mounted on horseback, and issued out of the Castell, and folowed couertly the hinder trayne of the Scottes, who had horses so charged with baggage, that they might scant go any great pace. And he overtoke them at the entring into a wood, and set vpon them, and there slue and hurt of the Scottes mo then .ccc. and tooke mo then .cxx. horses laden with pillage, and so ledde them towarde the Castell, the crye and brute of the flight came to the hearing of syr William Drogglas who had the charge of the reeward, ward, and as then he was past the wood. when he sawe the Scottes came flyeng ouer the dales and mountaines, he had great maruell, and then he and all his company ranne forth and rested not vntill they came to the foote of the Castell, and mounted the hill in hast. But or he came to the Bayles the Englishmen were entred, and had closed the Barrers, and put the pray in safetie. Then the Scottes beganne to assaile fiercely, and they within defended manfully. There these two Wylliams did what they might eche to greue other. This assault dured so long, that at the last the king and all the hoste came back agayne and layde siege to the Castle.

When the Scottishe King and his counsaile sawe howe his men were slaine, lying in the field, and the Assaylautes sore hurt, without winnyng of any thing, then he commaunded to ceasse the assault and to lodge. Then euery man began to seeke for his lodgyng, and to gather together the dead men, and to dresse them that were hurt. The next day the king commaunded that euery man should be ready to assaile, and they within were as redy to defend. There was a sore assault and a perillous: But there might haue bene seene that day many a noble feate and deede of armes. There was within the Castell, the noble Countesse of Salisbury, who was as then reputed and taken for the sagest and fayrest Lady that was in all England, whose husband was taken prisoner with the Erle of Suffolke befoze Lille in flaundrys. The King of England gaue the sayde Castell to the sayde Erle, when he maryed first the sayd Lady, for the prowes and good seruire that he had done befoze, when he was called but sir William Mountageu. This noble Lady comforted them greatly which were within, for by her sweete countenaunce and gentle speche, she made euery man worth twaine. This assault dured long, and the Scottes lost many of their men, for they aduentured themselues beery hardly, and caried wood and tymber to haue filled the ditches, to the entent to bring their engines to the walles, but they within defended them so valiantly, that the assaylautes were faine to drawe back. Then the king of Scottes commaunded the Engines to be well kept that night, and the next day to enforce the assault, and then euery man drewe backe to his lodgyng. Some wept and bewailed their friendes that were slaine, another sort comforted them that were hurt: and they of the Castell sawe well that if king Dauid continued his siege, that they should haue much ado to defende their Castell, and therefore they tooke counsaile among themselues to sende to King Edward, who then lay at Porke, as it was shewed them by such prisoners as they had taken of the Scottes. Then one of them behelde another, as who should say, who is he that dare go forth to cary this message, and not one of them would offer him selfe, which thing sir William Mountageu perceyuyng, stepped forth and sayd, sirs I will put my body in aduenture to do this message, for I haue such trust in you, that you will right well defende thys Castell vntill my returne: and on the other side I haue such trust in the king, that I shall shortly bring you succours, which will cause you to be ioyful, and I trust the king will so reward you, that ye shall be content: And when night came, the sayde sir William made him readie as priuely as he myght, and it happened well for him, for it rayned all night, so that the Scottes kept still within their lodgynges. At midnyght sir William passed through the hoste of the Scottes, and was not seene, and so roade forth vntill it was day, and then he met with two Scots a mile from the hoste, driving befoze them two Oxen, and a Cowe towarde the hoste. Sir William knewe well that they were Scottes, and therefore set vpon them, and wounded them both, and slue the Cattaille, to the entent that they of the host should take no profite by them, and then sayde vnto the two hurt Scottes, go your wayes, and say to your king, that William of Mountagew hath thus passed through his hoste, and is goyng to fetch ayde of the king of England, and so departed.

In the mornynge the king of Scottes made a fierse assault, but yet he preuayled nothing, and dayly they assaulted it, but all in vaine. Then the king of Scottes and his counsaile, considerynge that there they did but lose theyr men, and that the king of England might wel come thether befoze the Castell were wonne, and therefore by one assent they sayd vnto the king, that theyr abydyng there, was neyther for his profite, nor yet for his honour. And further they sayd, Sir ye haue right honourably atchieued your enterprize, and haue done great despyte to the Englishe men, in that you haue bene nowe in this Countrey of England. xij. dayes, and taken and destroyed the Citie of Durham. Wherefoze sir all thinges considered, it were good now that you returned, and to take with you the pillage that ye haue wonne, and another time ye may retorne againe when it pleaseth you. The king who would not do against the opinions of all his counsaile, agreed to them soze against hys minde, and the next mornynge he dislodged, and tooke the way streight to the great Forrest of Cedours, there to tary at their ease, and to vnderstand what the king of England purposed further to do, eyther to go backe againe, or else to go further into Scotland.

The same day that the Scots departed from the sayd Castell, King Edward came thether with all his hoste aboute Noone, and came to the same place where as the Scottes had lodged, and he was soze displeased that he found not the Scottes there, for he came thether in such haste, that hys horse and men were soze traueyled. Then he commaunded to lodge there all that night, and sayd that he would go see the Castell and the noble Lady therein, for he had not sene her sith she was maryed befoze, then euery man tooke his lodgyng as he lust.

And assoone as the King was bwarmed, he tooke .x. or .xij. Knightes with him, and went by to the Castell to salute the Countesse of Sarisbury, and to see the maner of the assaultes of the Scottes, and the defence that was made against them. Assoone as the Lady knewe of the Kinges commynge, she set open the Gates, and came out so richely besene, that euery man marvelled at her beutie, and could not ceasse to regarde her noblenesse, and the pleasant wordes and gracious countenance that she had. And when she came to the King, she kneeled downe on the earth, thanking him of his succours, and so led him into the Castell, where she made him honourable chere, as she was one that could right well do it. The King beyng in the Castell went into a window, and leaned on his elbow as one beyng in a great studie: The Ladie went about to make cheere to the Lordes and knightes that were there, and commaunded the Hall to be dressed for dinner. And when she had made all thinges in a readinesse, then she came to the King with a mery cheere, who was in a great studie, and she sayde: dere Sir, what meaneth your grace so to studie without cause, it doth not apperteyne vnto you you sit so to do, but rather ye should make good chere and be ioyfull, chieflie for that you haue chased away your enemies, who durst not abyde your commynge, and let other men studie for the remnaunt. Then the king sayd, Al dere Lady, know for a truth, that sith my entrance into this Castell, there is such a matter entered into my minde, that I can not choose but muse, neyther can I tell what may fall thereof, for put it out of my heart I cannot. Sir quoth the Lady, ye ought alwayes to make good cheere to comfort therewith your people, and chieflie ye haue cause to reioyre in God, for that he hath ayded and supported you in all your great affayres and enterprises, and hath made you the most renoumed and famous Prince in all Christendome: And if the Scottishe king haue done you any dispite or damage, ye may well reuenge it when it shall please you. Wherefoze sir, I pray you leaue your musyng, and come into the Hall (if it please you) for your dinner is all ready. A fayre Lady quoth the king, other thinges lie in my heart that ye know not off, but surely the swete and gentle behauiour of you, the great wisdom, noblenesse, and excellent beautie which I beholde in you, hath sofoze surprized my heart, that I can not but loue you, and without your loue I am but dead. Then answered the Lady sayng: A right noble Prince, for Goddes sake mocke not, nor tempt me not, I can not beleue that it is true that ye say, neyther that so noble a Prince as ye are, could haue so euill a thought, as to disonour me and my Lord my husband, who is so valiant a knight, and hath done your grace such good seruire, and as yet remayneth prisoner in France for your cause and quarell: Certainly sir, ye should in this case haue but a final praise, and nothing the better thereby: I geue almighty God thanks, that hether to I had neuer such a thought in my heart, nor I trust in God shall haue at the request or perswasion of any man: And if I had any such lewde intencion, your grace ought not onely to blame me, but also to punish my bodie, and by true iustice to be dismembred: and therewith the Ladie sodenly departed from the King, and went into the Hall to hast forward the dinner, and then she came againe and brought some of his knightes with her, and sayd: sir, if it please you to come into the Hall, your knightes abide th for you to washe, ye haue bene to long fastyng. Then the King went into the Hall and walked, and late downe among his Lordes and knightes, and the Lady also. The King did eate very little, but late still musyng, and euer as he durst, he cast his eyne vpon the Lady. Of his sadnesse the knightes had much maruell, for he was not accustomed so to be: Some thought it was because the Scottes were escaped from him. But to be short, although the King fared right honourably, yet could he not by any meanes be made mery, so that after dinner done, yet remayned he there all that day. And beyng wrapt in the snares and bondes of loue, he had sundrie imaginations: Sometime he imagined that honour and truth forbade him to set his heart in such a case, to disonour such a Lady, and so true a knight as her husband was, who had alwayes serued him so truely and balauntly: On the other part, loue so constrained him, that the power thereof, surmounted both honour and truth: And thus was the King troubled in himselfe all that day and night. In the mornynge the King arose and dislodged all his hoste, and drewe after the Scottes to chase them out of his realme. And at his departure he tooke his leaue of the Lady, and sayd, my dere Lady, to God I commend you vntill I retorne againe, requiring you to aduise you otherwise then you haue sayde to me. Noble Prince quoth the Lady, God the father most glorious be your guide and conduct, and remoue from you all vilcyne thoughts: & sir, I am and euer shall be redy to do your grace such seruice, as may be to your honour and mine, & therewith the King departed, altogether abashed.

Then the king folowed the Scottes vntill he came to Berwick, & went still forward, vntill he came within foure leagues of the Forest of Sedours, where as king Dauid and all his company was entred, in trust of the great wildernesse. The king of Englande tarped there thre dayes, to see if the Scottes would issue out to fight with him, in the which tyme there were sundrie skirmishes on both partes, and dyuers of the Scottes taken, slayne and sore hurt. Sir William Dowglas was he that did most hurt to the Englishmen, he bare Azure a Comble siluer, and thre starres Goules.

In this tyme that king Edward laye there, there were certayne noble men vpon both partes that treated for a peace to be had betweene these two kinges: And the same treatie tooke suche effect, that a truce was agreed to endure for two yere, if the french king would thereto agree. For the king of Scottes was so allyed to the french king, that he might take no peace with the king of Englande without the consent of the french king. And therfore it was then agreed, that if the french king would not agree to the peace, then the truce to endure vntill the first day of May next folowynge. And it was also agreed that the Erle of Hozer which was prisoner in Newcastel, should be deliuered of his imprisonment, if the king of Scottes could doe so muche with the french king as to purchace that the Erle of Salzburie might lykewise be quyte out of prison in Fraunce, and the same to be done before the feast of saint John Baptist next after.

King Edward agreed the rather to this truce, for that at this instant he had warre in Fraunce, in Gascoyn, in Poiteau, in Fynton, in Britayne and almost in euerye place he had men in wages to hys maruellous great costes and charges: And when all thinges were concluded, as aforesayde, then the king returned into Englande.

And sone after, the king of Scottes sent great messengers to the french king to agree vnto this truce: The french king was content at the desyre of the king of Scottes, and then was the Erle of Salzburie, who had bene long prisoner in Fraunce, sent home into Englande. And the king of Englande sent incontynent the Erle Hozer into Scotland.

And in the ende of this yere the Ducene was deliuered of a man childe at the Towne of Langley, the which after was named Edmond, and surnamed Edmond of Langley.

A little before ye haue heard how the king was stricken in loue with the Countesse of Salzbury. And now it happered, that for the loue of the sayde Lady, who yet was not out of his minde, he caused a great feast to be published abroad, and a Justes to be holden in the Citie of London (in the place now called west Smithfield) in the middes of August next folowynge, the which was also proclaymed in Flaundyrs, in Henault, in Brabant, and in Fraunce, graunting to all commers out of euery Countrie safe conduyte to come and go. And also he gaue speciall commaundement thorough his awne Realme, that all Lords, Knights, Esquyers, Ladyes and Damosels should be

be there without any excuse, and commaunded expressly the Erle of Salzbury, that the Lady his wyfe should be there, and to bring with her all the Ladyes and Damoselles of that Countrie. The Erle graunted the king, as he that thought none euill. The good Ladye durst not saye nay, although shee knewe right well what was ment thereby: But yet shee durst not discover the matter to her husband, notwithstanding she thought both in her selfe that she would order the matter well ynough.

This was a royall feast, and at the same was the Erle William of Herynault, and syr John of Herynault his Uncle, and a great number of Lordes and knightes of high lynage. There was great triumphynge and iustynge the space of .xv. dayes. And running at the same iustes was slaine the Lorde John, eldest sonne to the Wycount of Beaumont of England. And at this triumph all the Ladyes and Damoselles of England were freshly trimmed and attyzed, according to their degrees, except the Lady Alice Countesse of Salzbury, for she went as simply as she might, to thentent that the king should not phansie her, for she was fully determyned that she would doe nothing that should dishonour her husband and her selfe. At this feast were syr Henry with the wyre neck Erle of Lancaster, and syr Henry his sonne Erle of Darby, syr Robert de Artoys Erle of Richemond, the Erles of Northampton, of Gloucester, of Warwike, of Salzburie, of Pembroke, of Hereford, of Arondell, of Cornewall, of Orenford, and of Suffolke, and the Baron of Staunforde and dyuers other Lordes and knightes of England.

And before this great triumph was altogether ended, and the noble men departed, king Edward receaued sundrie and dyuers Letters out of sundrie Countries, as Gascoyn, Bayon, Flaundyrs from Jaques Dartuell, and out of Scotland from the Lorde Rose, and the Lorde Percy, and from syr Edward Baileoll Captaine of Warwike, who certefied the king, that the Scottes held but simply the truce concluded the last yere, for they newly assembled together much people, but for what entent they could not tell. Also the Capitaines in Poiteau, Fanton, Rochell and Burdeloys, wrote to the king how the frenchmen made great preparations for the warre, because the peace that was made at Arras was almost expired, which caused the king to haiten the ende of his feasting. And so sone as the straungers were departed: The king by the aduise of his counsaile did answer the former letters.

After the former feast ended, the king called his Court of Parliament, who assembled together at Westmynster shortly after Easter, then next folowynge. And in the time of the sayde Parliament, the king created Edward his first begotten sonne (who was borne in the thirde yere of his reigne) Prince of Wales, and he pzooued the most royall Prince in Chivalrie that was in all Chyristendome. And in the sayde Parliament was graunted vnto the king toward the finishynge and ending of his warres with Fraunce of the commons and of the Tobones and Cities of the Realme of Englande, foure fiftenes to be paid in two yeres next folowynge. And likewise the Clergy graunted vnto him thre fiftenes to be payde in thre yeres, but both the commons and the clergie had graunted vnto them by the king suche liberties as ye may read in the statute made in the sayd. xviii. yere, as counterueyled their gift. And these fiftenes were also graunted with these condicions, that all such somes of money as should be leuied of the aforesayde grauntes, should be onely and wholy employed upon the exployte and expedition of the full fynishing and ending of the warres with Fraunce, and the same to be disposed by the aduice of certayne Lordes and other great men that were specialle nominated and appointed therunto by the Parliament house. And also, that the king should not for any friend, letter or letters, entreatie or entreaties, nor for any fayre promises, withdraw his enterprize in the expence of this money in his warres of Fraunce until he had fully ended and fynished the same eyther by conquest, or else by the conclusion of a finall peace. And hereupon the Lordes of the realme graunted to go with the king, and to aduenture their lyues with him in the same.

And at this time also the king made a newe coyne of Golde and named it the Flozeyn, that is to saye, the penny of the value of. vii. Shyllings. iiij. pence, the halfe penny of the value of thre Shyllings, foure pence, and the farthing of the value of twentie pence, the which Coyne was specialle ordeyned for his warres in Fraunce: For the Golde thereof was not so fyne as was the Noble, which as befoze in the. xiiij. yere of hys reigne he caused to be coynd.

Nowe after the aforesayde Parliament ended, king Edward woulde needes ayde the Countesse of Mountforde agaynst the Lorde Charles of Bloys. And for her reliefe he sent Sir Robert de Arthoys, Erle of Richemond accompanied with a certayne number of good men of warre, and Archers, the which Sir Robert by reason of tempestes on the Sea, was long befoze he came thether: But for the time he remayned there, he did very valiantly, notwithstanding at the last he was sore wounded, and returned into England and dyed in London and was buried in the Quiere, or upper parte of Paules Church, whome king Edward caused to be buried with as solemne an obsequy, and as nobly was it done, as if it had bene for his abone Cosyn Germaine the Erle of Darby.

King Edward being greatly offended with the death of Sir Robert de Arthoys, sware a great othe that he would neuer rest till he woulde reuenge his death, wherefore incontinently he sent out letters thorough out all the Realme, commaunding every noble man and other to attend upon hym within one Moneth next after. And in the meane tyme he prepared a great number of shippes, and at the ende of the Moneth he tooke the Seas and landed in Britayne not farre from Vannes, where Sir Robert de Arthoys arrayed befoze: he was thre dayes in landyng of all his prouision, and the fourth day he went toward Vannes. And all this meane tyme the Erle of Salbury and the Erle of Pembroke lay at the siege of Renes. And shortly after, the king besieged Vannes, and did many noble feates of warre, and at the last the Duke of Normandy came with a mightye power to breake by the siege: But in the ende, by the meanes and labour of two Cardynalles, a truce for thre yeres was agreed upon, and so the warres brake by, and the king returned againe into England about Christmas.

After the king was thus returned, he went to his Castell of Windsore, the which was first builded by king Arthure (as sayth sir John Froissard) and nowe newly reedified by king Edward, wherein he tooke great pleasure. And the sayde sir John Froissard sayth, that in this Castell king Arthure did first begin the order of the round table, whereby sprang the fame of so many noble knightes throughout all the worlde, But other write that the same was ordeyned first at Winchester, for there is yet the table that is called king Arthures round table. And nowe king Edward purposyng a lyke encouragement of noble and worthie knightes, beyng at Windsore as aforesayde, did ordeyne and establishe in the same Castell the most honourable order of knighthood of the blewe Garter, and a solemne feast to be kept for the same yere upon Saint Georges day. And to begin this noble order, the king caused to be assembled together all the Erles, Lordes, and knightes of his realme, and expressed unto them his purposed deuice, wherein they toke great pleasure, because they sawe it was that which tended to great honour, and that by the same, great amitie, friendship, & loue might growe among the nobles of this realme. And then were there chosen out a certeine number of the most valiauntest men in y realme, and they right gladly swoze and were content to seale, to mainteine those ordinaunces that then were deuised for the sayde order.

And then also the King builded a Chappell of Saint George within the sayde Castell of Windsore, and stablished therein certein Chanons, and other Ministers for the sayng of deuine and dayly seruiue, and endued them with right good liuynges and possessions.

Then the King sent to publish this his royall feast by his Heraults, into Fraunce, Scotland, Burgoyne, Henault, Flaundyngs, Brabant, and into the Empire of Almaine, geuyng and promisyng euery knight and Esquier that would come to the sayd feast. xv. dayes of safe conduit, befoze the feast, and xv. dayes after the feast, the same feast to begyn on the day of Saint George next folowyng, which was in the yere of our Lorde. 1344. and the Queene to be there, accompanied with thre hundred Ladyes and Damoselles, all of noble linage, and apparelled accordyngly.

When the day of this royall feast drew nere, thether came a noble company of Erles, Barons, Ladyes and Damoselles, knightes and Esquiers. And also diuerse Lordes and knightes of straunge Countries came thether out of diuerse places, as out of Flaundyngs, Henault, and Brabant, but out of Fraunce came none.

A royall feast.

Duryng the time of this feast, newes came to the king out of diuerse Countries: Thether came knightes out of Gascoyne, as the Lorde of Lespape, the Lorde of Chawmount, the Lord of Muisident, who were sent from the other Lordes of the Countrie, such as were Englishe: as the Lorde de Labreth, the Lord of Duniers, the Lord of Moutteraunt, y Lord of Duras, the Lorde of Carton, the Lorde of Grayly, and diuers other. And in like manner came sundrie Messengers from sundrie other places, and all aduised the king to send unto them succours in due season, for they were in great feare of their enemy the French King, who made great prouision to annoy them.

These troubleous newes caused the king the soner to shorten his feast and triumph. And when the same was ended, and all the straungers departed, and the Ladyes and Damoselles, then the king went to counsaile with his Lordes what was best to be done. And shortly they agreed that it were meete some chiefe Capitaine and succours were sent unto Burdeaux, for the defence thereof, and for the rest of Gascoyne. Then the king agreed to sende ouer the Erle of Darby his Cosyn Germaine as Cheuetaine, who with all possible possible speede prepared himselfe, and he was accompanied with the Erle of Pembrooke, the Erle of Norfolke, the Baron of Stafford, Sir Gualtier of Manny, Sir Richard Haydon, the Lorde Franque de la hall, the Lieure de Brabant, Sir Hugh Hastinges, Sir Stephen de Combey, the Lorde of Manny, the Lord Poymant of Synetroyde, Sir Robert of Lerne, Sir John Norwich, Sir Richard Rockclese, Sir Robert of Quenton, and diuers other, to the number of .v. C. Knightes and Esquiers, and two thousand Archers. And the King sayd to his Colyn the Erle of Darby, take with you Gold and Siluer ynough, ye shall not lacke, and depart largely thereof vnto your men of warre, whereby ye shall get their loue and fauor, and thus the Erle of Darby departed vnto Burdeaux, who after his comming thether did many noble and valiaunt deedes of armes, aswell in assaultyng of diuerse towne, as also in conquering & recovering from y French men many rich Cities & townes.

In this time (as before you haue heard) reigned in Flaundyys in great prosperitie and puyssaunce, Jaques Dartuell of Gaunt, who was a speciall friend and louer of King Edward. And the same Jaques had promised the King that he would make him Lorde and inheritour of Flaundyys, and to endue his sonne the Prince of Wales therewith. For the which cause, aboute the feast of Saint John Baptist, King Edward went ouer vnto Sluce with many of his Lordes and knightes, and brought thether with him the young Prince his sonne, vpon the worde and promise of Jaques Dartuell. The King with all his nauie laye in the Hauen of Sluce, and there he kept hys house, and thether came to visite him his friendes of Flaundyys. There were great counsailes betwene the King and Jaques Dartuell on the one parte, and the Counsailes of the good townes of the other part. So that they of the Countrie were not of the agreement with the King, neyther with Jaques Dartuell, who went aboute to perswade them to disinherit the Erle Loys their awne naturall Lorde, and also his yong sonne Loys, and to inherit the sonne of the King of Englande, to the which they sayde they would neuer agree vnto. And so the last day of their Counsaile, which was kept in the Hauen at Sluce in the Kinges great ship called the Katheryn: They with one minde and voyce gaue a determinate aunswere and sayd: Sir, ye haue desired vs to a thing that is great and weightie, the which hereafter may sore touche the Countrie of Flaundyys and our heyres: Cruely we knowe none at thys day whose preferment and honour we would be more glad to aduance then yours: But Sir, this thing we can not do alone, we must haue herevnto the whole commonaltie of Flaundyys. Therefore for this present we will go home, and every man to speake with his friendes generally within every towne, and as we finde the most part to agree, so will we be right well content: and within a moneth we will be here againe with you, and geue you such aunswere as we trust ye will be content. The King neyther Jaques Dartuell could haue none other aunswere at that time: Howbeit they requirred a shorter day, but that would not be.

So thus departed that Counsaile, and every man went home to theyr awne townes: But Jaques Dartuell tarped a little with the King, and still he promised the King that he would bring them vnto his entent, but he was foule decepued as after will appere.

Jaques Dartuell tooke his leaue of the King and went first to Bruges and and perswaded with the Lords there, and lykewise with the rulers of Fyze, and in the ende they graunted vnto him, so that Jaques made a full accompt that he had obteyned and ended this matter, for he assured himselfe of the towne of Gaunt, whom as he thought he might rule as he lust, but he found it otherwise. When he had ended at Bruges he returned to Gaunt, not suspecting any thing, but that they were his berie friends: and before he came to the towne, it was tolde to the inhabitants that Jaques Dartuell went about to disinherit the right Erle of Flaundyys and his sonne, and to geue the inheritauce vnto the sonne of King Edward of England, a straunger, at the hering wherof they assembled themselves in the Market place, and were in a great furie agaynst Jaques Dartuell, but at the last they departed from the Market place, and every man went home to his awne house. Shortly after about noone, came Jaques Dartuell into Gaunt, not knowyng anye thing of the former doing of the men of the towne, but they knewe well of his comming, and therefore walked in the streetes in heapes, euen where he should passe. And when they sawe him, they begonne to murmur, and began to whisper together and to fall to secret talke, and at the last they spake out aloude one to another and sayde. Beholde, yonder cometh the great master that will rule all Flaundyys as he lust, and geue the inheritauce therof where he thinketh meete. Also there was a brute blouen abroad among the inhabitants of the Towne, that Jaques Dartuell for the space of .ii. yeres past had in his handes all the reuenues of Flaundyys, and neuer did accompt for the same. And farther, that he had sent great ryches and treasure vnto the King of England: These tales set them of Gaunt on a fyze. And as Jaques Dartuell roade through the streete, he perceaued that there was some matter in framing agaynst him, for he saw, as he came by, such as were wont to doe reuerence vnto him, turne their faces from him, and went into their houses. Then he began to doubt, and as sone as he was alighted in his lodging, he closed fast his gates, doores and wyndowes. This was scant done, but all the streete was full of men, and specially of them of meanest occupations, then they beset his house both behinde and before and round about, and began to breake by the house: But he and his defended themselves within the house along space, and slue and hurt many without. But finally he could not endure, for thre partes of the men of that towne were at that assault. When Jaques sawe that he was so sore oppressed, he came to a wyndow with great humilitie bareheded and spake in gentle maner and sayde: Good people, what ayleth you, why are you so sore offended at me? Wherein haue I displeased you, let me vnderstande it, and I will gladly make suche amends as I trust shall content you. Then such as heard him, answered all with one voyce, we will haue accompt made of the great treasure of Flaundyys, that you haue sent out of the waye without any title or reason. Then Jaques meekely answered and sayde: Certainly Sirs, of the treasure of Flaundyys I neuer tooke any thing. I pray you withdraw your selues patiently into your houses, and come againe to morow in the morning, and I will make you so good an accompt, that ye shall be well pleased and contented withall. Then they all cryed and sayde, nay, we will haue an accompt incontynent, thou shalt not scape oure handes so: we knowe for truth that thou hast sent great riches into England without our knowledg, and therefore thou thou shalt die. When Jaques heard that worde, he ioyned his handes together and soze weeping sayde: Sirs, such as I am ye haue made me: and ye haue swozne to me oz this to defende me agaynst all persons. And will you now slay me agaynst all reason, and no cause heard nor examined? ye maye doe it if ye will, for I am but one man amongst you all, but yet for Gods sake take better aduise, and remember the tyme past, and consyder the great graces and friendship that I haue shewed and done vnto you: and then I truit ye will not so bngently reward me, and chiefly for the great goodnesse that I haue shewed vnto your towne. Ye know right well that the trade of marchaundise was cleerely decayed in this towne, and countrey, and by my meanes ye haue recouered it. Also I haue gouerned you in great peace and rest, for in the tyme of my gouernement ye haue had all things as your hartes desyred, come and all other marchaundise.

Then the people cryed all with one voyce, come dovne to vs & preach not so high, and geue vs accompt of the great treasure of Flaundyrs which ye haue gouerned so long without compt making, which becommeth no officer so to doe, to receaue the goodes of hys Lozde, oz of hys Countrie, and make none accompt.

When Jaques sawe that he could not appease them: he drewe in his head and closed in his wyndow, and thought to haue stollen out on the backside into the Church that ioyned to his house: But his house was so broken that foure hundred persons were entred into it, and finally, there he was taken and slaine without any pitie oz mercie, and one Thomas Wenyre gaue him his deathes stroke. And thus ended Jaques Dartuell.

When king Edward, who lay all this while at Sluce, abyding the aunswere of the flemynge, heard how they of Gaunt had slaine Jaques Dartuell his great friend, he was soze displeased. Wherefore incontinent he departed from Sluce, and entred into the Sea, soze threating the fleminges and the countrie of flaundyrs, and sayde, how his death should be reuenged.

Then the Counsaillours of the good townes of Flaundyrs thought no lesse but that the king of England would take the death of Jaques Dartuell greuously, wherefore they determined to go to the king and excuse themselues, and specially they of Bruges, Courtray, Iper, Andwarp & Franke:
They sent into Englande to the king for a safe conduyt that they might come to their excuse. The king then being somewhat cooled of his great furie, graunted their desire. And then there came into England men of estate out of the good Townes of Flaundyrs, except out of Gaunt there came none.
This was aboute Michelmass, and the same tyme the King laye at Westminster besides London.

When they were come vnto the kinges presence, they in most loboly maner humbled themselues before the king, and clerely excused themselues of the death of Jaques Dartuell, and sware solemply that they knewe nothing thereof untill it was done. And if they had, he was the man that they would haue defended to the best of their powers, and sayde that they were ryght so-rie of his death, for he had gouerned the Countrie right politikely and wisely. And also they sayde, that though they of Gaunt had done that dede, yet should they make a sufficient amendes. And further they sayd vnto the king and his counsaile, that though he be deede, yet the king of England was neuer the further off from the loue & fauour of them in Flaundyrs in all things, except the enheritance of Flaundyrs, which by no meane nor way they will put from the right heyses. And sayng also further vnto the king: Sir you haue a yong daughter, and we haue a yong Lozde, who is the enheritour of Flaundyrs, we haue him in our keepng, may it please you to consent to a maryage to be made betweene them two, and by that meanes the Countie of Flaundyrs may for euer be in the issue of your Childe. These wordes and many such like did greatly pacifie the king, and finally the king was content with the flemynge, and they with him, and so by little and little the death of Jaques Dartuell was quite forgotten.

And shortly after the death of Jaques Dartuell, dyed also William Erle of Henault, the kinges great louer and friend, and not long after sir John of Heynault the kinges most chiefe and speciall friende (who from the first begynnyng and entraunce of the king into the Realme and Kingdome of England, assisted and defended him) did now refuse the king of England and became french, because as some write, that the king of Englande, refused to pay him his pencion that he graunted vnto him. And thus was king Edward destitute of a great many of his chiefe and speciall friendes, euen vpon a sodeyne.

About this tyme the King heard howe his men were in soze distresse at the siege of the Castell of Aguilon in Gascoyne, and therefore prepared him selfe with a great and puissaunt army to go ouer for their reskue. And in this meane tyme, the Lord Godfrey of Harecourt, beyng banished out of fraunce came into England, and was well receyued with the king, and he retayned him to remaine and continue about him, and assigned him landes in England to mainteine his degree.

Then the king caused a great nauy of shippes to be readie in the Hauen of Southhampton, and caused all maner of men of warre to be there at the feast of Saint John Baptist. 1345. And at that tyme the king departed from the Queene, and left her in the guiding of the Erle of Cane his Cosyn. And he ordeyned and appoynted the Lozde Percey, and the Lozde Deuell to be Wardynes of his realme, with the Archbishop of Yorke, the Bishop of Lin-colne, and the Bishop of Durham: For the king at no tyme departed out of this realme, but that he left sufficient behind him to defend the realme if nede were. Then the king roade to Hampton, and taried there for winde: And at the last he entered into Ship, and the Prince of Wales with him, and the Lozde Godfray of Harecourt, and all other Erles, Barons, Lozdes, and Knights, with all their companies. They were in number foure thousand men of armes, and ten thousand Archers, beside Irishemen and Welshmen that folowed the host on foote, and xij. C. sayle of shippes, as some write.

And here I thinke it not amisse to name vnto you all the Lozdes that went in this iourney with the king. First Edward his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, who as then was of the age of xviij. yeres, oz there aboutes, the Erles of Hereford, Northampton, Arondell, Cornewall, Warwike, Huntingdon, Suffolke, and Drenford. And of Barons, the Lozde Mortimer, who was after Erle of Marche, the Lozdes, John, Lewes, and Roger of Beauchamp, and the Lozde Reynold Cobham. Of Lozdes, the Lord of How-let, & Willoughby, and diuers other Lordes. And of Bachelers, there were John Chandoy, Fitzwaren, Peter and James Audeley, Roger of Wertuall, Bartholomew of Byres, Richard of Pembryges, with diuers other that I can not name.

Thus they sayled forth that day in the name of God, and they were well onward on their way toward Gascoyn: But on the thirde day, there arose a contrary wynde, and draue them on the Marches of Cornewall, and there they lay at anker. vij. dayes. In that space the king had other Counsaile by the meanes of Sir Godfrey Harecourt: he counsailed the king not to go into Gascoyn, but rather to set a land in Normandie, and he sayde to the king, Sir the Countrie of Normandie is one of the most plenteous Countries of the Worlde. And Sir, on ieopardie on my head, if ye will land there, there is none that will resist you: The people of Normandie haue not bene bled to warre, and all the knightes and Esquiers of the Countrie are now at the siege before Aguilon with the Duke. And Sir, there ye shall finde great Townes that be not walled, whereby your men shall haue such wynnynge that they shall be the better therby. xx. yere after: & ye may follow with your armie untill ye come to Cane in Normandy. And Sir, I pray you beleue me, and take this boyage. The king who was as then but in the flower of hys youth, for he passed not. xxxv. yerres of age, and desirynge nothing so much as to haue deedes of Armes, enclined greatly to the sayng of the Lorde Harecourt, whome he called Cousin. Then the king commaunded the Mariners to set their course to Normandie: And he tooke into his ship the Baner or Badge of the Admirall the Erle of Warwike, and sayde howe he would be Admirall in that boyage, and so sayled on before, as governour of the nauie. And they had wind at wil: Then the king arriued in the Isle of Constantine, at a port called Hoggue Saint Waste.

Cydings anone spreade abroad, howe the Englishmen were landed: The townes of Constantyne sent dobone woord to Darys to king Philip. And he had heard before how that king Edward was on the sea with a great armie, but he vnderstood not what waye he would take, whether into Normandy, Gascoyne, or Briteyn.

Alloone as he knewe that the king of Englande was landed in Normandy, he sent his Conestable the Erle of Guynes, and the Erle of Tankerville, who were but newly come to him from his sonne from the siege of Aguilon, to the towne of Cane, commaunding them to keepe that towne agaynst the Englishmen: They sayde they would doe their best, and so departed from Darys with a good number of men of warre, and daylie there came mo vnto them by the waye. And so at the last came to the towne of Cane, where the men and people of that towne receyued them with great ioy. And alloone as these Lordes were come, they busily prouyded for the good defence of the sayde Towne, and set all things in good order.

The king of England, as aforesayd, was arriued at the Porte Hoggue Saint Waste, neere to Saint Sauour the vicount, which was the right heritage to the Lord Godfray of Harecourt, who as then was there with the king of England. Alloone as the king was arriued in the aforesayde porte, as he lept out of his ship, the first foote that he stepped on the grounde he fell so vntowardly, that the blood brast out of his nose. The knightes that were about him, tooke him by and sayde, sye for Gods sake enter againe into your Ship, and come not a lande this daye, for this is but an euill signe for vs. Then the king answered quickly and sayd, wherfore? this is a good token for mee, for the lande desyret to haue mee. Of the which answers all his men were ioyfull: So that day and night the king lodged on the sandes. And in the meane time discharged the ships of their horses and other baggages. There the king made two Marchalles of his hoste, the one, Lorde Godfray of Harecourt, and the other the Erle of Warwike, and the Erle of Arondell Constable. And he ordeyned that the Erle of Huntingdon should keepe the flete of shippes with an hundreth men of armes and foure hundred Archers. And also he ordeyned thre battayles, one to go on his right hande close to the sea side, and the other on his left hande, and the king himselfe in the middes, and every night to lodge all in one field.

Thus they set forth as they were ordeyned, and they that went by the Sea tooke all the shippes that came in their wayes, and so long they went forth what by sea, and what by lande, that at the last they came to a good porte, & to a good towne called Harflew, the which incontinent was wonne: For they within gaue by for feare of death. And albeit the sayde towne was robbed and spoyled, and much Golde, Siluer, and riche Jewels taken out of the same, yet there remayned so much riches that the boyes and villaynes of the hoste set nothing by good furred Bownes. And before they entred into the rifelyng of the towne, they caused all the inhabitants of the towne to come forth and go into their shippes, because they would not suffer them to be behinde them for feare of rebelyng againe. And thus was the towne of Harflew taken and spoyled without brenning.

Then the armie spreade abroad in the Countrie, and did what they lust, for there was none to resist them. And at the last they came to a great and riche towne called Chierbourgh. The towne they wanne and spoyled and brent parte of it: But into the Castell they coulde not come, it was so strong and well furnished with men of warre. Then they passed forth & came to Mountbourgh, and tooke and spoyled it and brent it cleane. In thys manner they spoyled and brent many other townes in that countrey, and wanne so much ryches that it was incredible. Then they came to a great towne called Quarentyne, where there was also a strong Castell, and many souldyours within to keepe it. Then the Lordes came out of their shippes and made a fierce assault: The Burgesses of the towne were in great feare of their lyues, wyues and children. And they gladly suffered the Englishmen to enter into the towne against the minde and will of all the souldyours there: They put all their goodes vnto the Englishmens pleasures, because they thought they should so the better obtaine their fauour, and mitigate their rygour. When the French souldyours sawe the Englishmen enter into the towne, then they fled, and went into the Castell. And the Englishmen kept the towne two dayes, and therein made soze assaults vnto the Castell, and at the last the Frenchmen seing no remedy, did geue it ouer. And thus were the Englishmen possessed both of that good towne and Castell. And when they sawe they might not maintaine nor keepe it, they set it on fyre, and brent both towne and Castell. And while they were thus spoiling of the towne, they made all the Burgesses and people of the towne to go into their shippes as before they had done with them of Harflew, Chierbourgh & Mountbourgh and other townes that they had wonne on the Sea side. All this was done by the battayle that went on the Sea side, and by them on the sea together.

Now let vs speake of the kinges battayle, when he had sent his first battaile along by the sea side, as ye haue heard before, whereof the Erle of Warwyke was Capitaine and the Lorde Cobham with him. Then he made his other Marshall to leade his hoste on the left hande, for he knewe the issues and entres of Normandy better then any other did. The Lorde Godfray as Marshall roade forth with five hundred men of armes, and roade of from the kings battayle sixe or seauen leagues, in brennyng and spoylyng the Countrey, the which Countrey was plentiful in euery thing. The Granges were full of Corne, the houses full of all ryches, riche Burgesses and Citezens, Horse, Swine, Sheepe and other beastes and Cattell great plenty: They tooke what pleased them, and brought into the kinges hoste. But the souldyours made none accompt to the king nor to none other of his officers of the Golde, Siluer, and Jewels that they did get, for that they kept to themselves.

Thus Sir Godfray of Harecourt road euery day from the kings host, and yet for the most parte euery night he resorted into the kings fielde.

The king tooke his way to Saint Clowe in Constantine, but before he came there, he lodged by a ryuer, abyding for his men that went along the Sea side. And when they were come, they set forth their cariage: And the Erle of Warwyke and the Erle of Suffolke, Syr Thomas Holland and Syr Raynold Cobham, and their company road out on the one side & wasted and spoyled the countrey as the Lorde of Harecourt had done. And the king euer roade betwene these battayles, and euery night they lodged together.

In this meane time the French king sent for Sir John of Heynault, who came to him with a great number of men. And in like maner the sayde king sent for other men of armes, Dukes, Erles, Barons, Knightes, and Esquiers, and assembled together such a great number of people as had not bene sene in an hundreth yeres before. He sent also for men into so farre Countries, that it was long before they came, so that the king of Englande did what him lyst in the meane season. The French king knew well ynough what he did, and swore that he shoulde neuer returne out of his Realme but fought withall, and that such hurtes and dammages as they had done, should be deereley reuenged.

King Edward hauing in his battaile three thousand men of armes, and vij. thousand Archers, and ten thousand footemen, besydes them that roade with the Marshals, left the Citie of Constance, and went to the great towne called Saint Clowe, which was a rich towne of Drapery, and many riche Burgesses therein. When the king came thether, he tooke his lodging without the towne, for he would neuer lodge within any towne for feare of fire: But he sent his men before, and the towne was immediately taken and spoyled. The ryches of that towne was very great, namely in Canuas. Then the king went towarde Cane, the which was a greater towne, and full of Drapery of Lymen and Wollen cloth, and other riche Marchandise, and the inhabitautes of the towne were very riche men, noble Ladies, beutifull Damoselles, goodly and riche Churches, and two great riche Abbeyes, one of

of the Trinitie, another of Saint Stephen. And on the one syde of the towne one of the fayrest Castels in all Normandy, of the which sir Robert of Blarginy was Capitaine, with three hundreth Genowayes, and in the Towne was the Erle of Ewe, and of Guynes Constable of Fraunce, and the Erle of Tankerulle with a good number of men of warre.

The king of England roade all that day in good order, and lodged all his battayles together that night, about two leagues from Cane, in a towne with a little haven called Hautreham: and thether came also all his nauie of ships with the Erle of Huintyngdon, who was gouernour of them.

The Constable and other Lordes of Fraunce that night watched well the towne of Cane, and in the moornyng armed themselves, and all the fighting people in the Towne. And then the Constable tooke order that none should issue out of the Towne, but kepe their defences on the Walles, Gate, Bridge, and Riuer, and left the suburbes voyde, because they were not closed: for they thought they should haue ynough to do to defende the towne, because it was not closed, but with the riuer. But they of the towne sayd they would issue out, for they were strong ynough to fight with the king of England. When the Constable sawe them so bent, he sayde, in the name of God be it, ye shall not fight without me. Then they issued out in good order, and made good face and shewe to fight with the Englishe men, and to put theyr liues in aduenture.

The Englishe men roase earely in the moornyng, and made themselves ready to go to Cane. The king heard noyse before the sonne rising, & therefore he and the Prince his sonne tooke their horse, and sir Godfrey of Harecourt, Marshall and leader of the host, whose counsaile the king much followed. And the kinges army went forward in good array, and approached nere to the good towne of Cane.

When they of the Towne, who then were ready in the field, sawe these thre battayles comming in good array, with their Banners and Standards wauiyng with the winde, and the Archers which they had not bene accustomed to see: they were so sore afrayde that they fled towarde the towne, without any order or good array, and the Constable could not stay them: But the Englishe men pursued them egerly.

When the Constable and the Erle of Tankeruyll sawe that, they tooke a Gate at the entrie and saued themselves and certeine with them, for the English men were entred into the towne as sone as they. And suche of the French as knewe the way to the Castell, went thether, and the Capitaine thereof receyued them all, for the Castell was large. The Englishe men in the chace slue many, for they tooke none to mercy.

Then the Constable and the Erle of Tankeruyll beyng in the little towne at the Bridge foote, looked along the strete, and sawe their men slaine without mercy, they doubted to fall in their handes. At the last they sawe an English knight with one eye called Sir Thomas Holland, and five or sixe other knightes with him, they knewe them, for they had sene them before in Duice, in Granada, and in other voyages. Then they called to sir Thomas and sayde, howe they would yelde themselves prisoners. Then sir Thomas came thether with his companie, and went by into the Gate, and there found the sayd Lordes, and, xxb. knightes with them, who yelded them all unto sir

Thomas, and he tooke them for his prisoners, and left companie to keepe them. And then he tooke his horse againe and roade into the stretes, and saved the lynes of many Ladies and Damoselles, and Cloysterers from despoiling, for the Souldiours were without all compassion and mercie. And it chanced so happely the same time for the Englishmen, that the river which was well able to beate shippes, at that tyme was so lowe, that men went in and out beside the bridge. And such of the towne as were entred into their houses, cast downe into the streete, stones, timber, and yron, and slue a hurt mo then five hundred English men, with the which doing the King was sore displeased. And at night when he heard thereof, he commaunded that the next day that all should be put to the sword, and the towne to be bzent. But then sir Godfray of Harecourt sayd: dere sir, for Goddes sake asswage somewhat your courage, and let it suffice you that ye haue done, ye haue a great exploit to do before ye come to Calice, whether ye purpose to go: And Sir, in thys towne there are much people that will defende their houses, and it will cost many of your mennes liues, before that ye haue all your will, and by that meane ye may fortune to be disapoynted of your boyage to Calice, the which would turne to your great griefe: Wherefore sir, saue your people, for ye may chauce to haue nede of them before this moneth passe, for I thinke verely that your aduersarie King Phillip will meete with you to fight, and ye shall find many streight passages and reencountries. Wherefore your men, and ye had mo shall stande you in good steepe, and Sir without any further sleayng, ye shall be Lorde of this towne, men and women will put themselves and all that euer they haue vnto your pleasure.

Then the King sayd, Sir Godfray, you are our Marshall, order euery thing as best shall seeme vnto you. Then sir Godfray with his Banner roade from streete to streete, and commaunded in the kinges name, none to be so hardy as to put fire in any house, to sleay any person, or to violate any woman.

When they of the towne heard that crie, they receyued the Englishmen into their houses, and made them good cheere. And some opened their Coffers, and bad them take what they would, so that they might be assured of their lynes: Howbeit at that time there were many murders, robberyes and euill deedes done in that towne.

Thus the Englishmen were Lordes of the towne of Cane three dayes, & hadde great ryches, the which they sent awaye by Barkes and Barges by the ryuer of Austrechen vnto their Hauie with two hundred men of Armes and foure hundred Archers, and so the Hauie departed into Englande wyth great riches and many riche prisoners. And the king bought of syr Thomas Holland two of his prisoners, which was the Constable of Fraunce, and the Erle of Tankeruyll, & gaue him for them ten thousand Marks in old nobles.

Then the king departed from Cane, and roade in the order that he did before, brennyng and spoylyng the Countrie, and tooke the way to Couzeng, and so past by it. And from thence they road to a great towne called Louyers, it was the chiefe towne of all Normandy of Drapery, ryche and full of all Marchandise: The Englishmen soone entred into it, for as then it was not closed, and it was ouer runne, ransacked and spoyled without all mercie, and there was wonne great rycheffe.

Then they entered into the Countrie of Curcur, and bzent and spoyled the the Countrie, except the walled townes and Castells, to the which the king made none assaillt for sparyng of his people and his artillery.

On the ryuer of Seyn nere vnto Roane, there was the Erle of Harecourt brother to Sir Godfray of Harecourt, but he was on the french partie, and the Erle of Dreux with him, with a good number of men of warre. But the Englishmen left Roane and went to Gysours, where was a strong Castell, they bzent the towne, and after bzent Vernon and all the Countrie about Roan and Mount de Larche, and came to Hautes and to Heulenc: and wasted all the Countrie about, and passed by the strong Castell of Kobboys, and in euery place along the ryuer of Seyne they founde the bridges broken. At the last they came to Doylley and found the bridge broken, but the Arches and Joystes laye in the ryuer. The king laye there five dayes, and in the meane time the bridge was made to passe the hoste without perill. The Englishe Marshalles ranne abroade euen iust to Parys, and bzent Saint Germain in Lay, and Mountioye and S. Clowde, and pety Boleyn by Parys, and the Quenes Bourgh. They of Parys were not well assured of themselves, for it was not as then walled nor closed.

The french king vnderstanding the king of Englande to be so nere, remoued from Paris to Saint Dionys which is nere vnto Paris: and before he went, he caused all the Penthehouses of the Towne of Parys to be pulled downe. And vnto Saint Denys there were al ready come to the aide of the french king, the king of Behayne, the Lorde John of Hesnault, the Duke of Loreyne, the Erle of Flaundyrs, the Erle of Bloys and many other great Lordes and knightes.

When the people of Paris saw their king depart, they came to him and kneeled downe and sayde: Al syr, and right Noble king, what will you doe? will ye nowe departe and leaue both vs and this noble Citie as a spoyle to your enimies? The king answered them and sayde, be not afrayde good people, for the Englishmen will come no nere you then they are. Why so syr quoth they, for they be within these two leagues: And allone as they knowe of your departure they will come and assaile vs, and we be not able to defende them, wherefore good syr, for Gods sake tarie here still and helpe to defende your noble Citie of Paris. Speake no more to me quoth the king, for I will go to Saint Dionys to my men of warre, and I will encounter the Englishmen and fight with them, whatsoeuer fall therof.

At this time the king of Englande being at Doylly, lay at the Monery there, and kept there the feast of our Ladye the Assumption, and sate in his robes of Scarlet furred with Ermins, and that feast being ended, he then went forth in the same order that he did before.

The Lorde Godfrey of Harecourt road out on the syde with .v. C. men of Armes and .xiiij. C. Archers: And by aduenture he encountred a great number of the Burgeses of Ampens on horseback, who were ryding by the kinges commaundement to Paris. The Englishmen quickly gaue them the onfet, and they valiantly defended themselves, for they were a great number and well armed, and had to their Capitaines foure knights of Ampens. This skirmish dured long, at the first meeting many were ouerthobone of both partes: But finally the Burgeses were taken and almost all slaine, and the Englishmen tooke all their caryages and harnesse: Of this number there were slaine. xij. hundred that lay in the field.

Then the king of England entred into Beauuosyn brennyng and spoyling the plaine countrie, and lodged at a fayre Abbey and a riche, called saint Messene, nere to Beaways, and there the king taried one night, and in the morning departed. And when he was on his way, he looked back and saw the Abbey on fyre, and he caused incontinent. xx. of them to be hanged that set it on fyre, for he had commaunded befoze vpon paine of death none to spoyle any Church, nor to brenne any Abbey or Monastery.

Then the king passed by the Citie of Beaways wythout any assault geuing, because he would not trouble his people nor wast his artillery. And so that daye he tooke his lodging betimes in a little towne called Hully. The two Marshalles came so nere to Beaways, that they made a skirmishe at the Barryers in thre places, the which assault dured a long space: But the Towne within was so well defended by the meane of the Bysshop, who at that tyme was within the towne, that finally the Englishmen departed and bzent cleane heard to the gates all the suburbes of the same. And at night they came into the kinges field.

The next day the king departed, brennyng and spoyling all befoze him, and at night lodged in a good village called Gracuelure. And the next daye the king passed by Argies, and there was none to defend the Castell, wherefoze it was soone taken and bzent. Then they went forth, destroyeng the Countrie all about, and so came to the Castell of Boys, where there was a good towne and two Castels. There was no body in them, but two fayre Damoselles daughters to the Lorde of Boys, and they were soone taken, and had bene violated if two Englishe knightes had not beene, Syr John Chandos and Sir Basset: They defended them and brought them to the king, who for his honour made them good cheere, and demaunded of them whether they woulde faynest go, and they sayde to Corbe, and the king caused them to be brought thether without any perill. That night the king lodged in the Towne of Boys. And they of the towne and of the Castels spake that night with the two Marshalls of the host, to saue them and their towne from brennyng, and they to paye a certaine some of Floreyngs, and the same was graunted vnto them. The next daye the king departed in the morning with all his hoste, except certayne that were left there to receaue the money which the towne had promised to paye. When they of the towne sawe the hoste departed and gone, and that there were few left behinde: then they sayde, that they would pay neuer a penny, and so ranne vpon the Englishmen, who defended themselves as well as they might, and sent after the host for succour.

When Sir Thomas Holland, and Sir Reignold Cobham, who had the rule of the reregarde, heard therof, they returned & cried treason, treason and so came againe to Boys ward, & found their Companions fighting syll with them of the towne. Then amone they of the towne were nighe all slaine, and the towne bzent, and the two Castelles beaten dozne. Then they returned to the kinges Hoste, who was as then at Araynes, and there lodged, and commaunded all maner of men vpon paine of death to do no hurt to no towne of Arsyn, for there the king was minded to lie a day or two to take aduise howe he might passe the riuer of Some: For it was necessary for him to passe the riuer, as after ye shall here.

The frenche king was nowe in great readinesse to folowe the king of England, and was so farre forward, that he with a merueylous great armie of the number of a hundreth thousande men and mo., were come as farre as Araynes, and thought to haue enclosed the king of England with the water of Some, for he had caused all the Bridges to be broken, and those that remayned to be so garded and kept, that there was no way left for the King of England to escape.

The king of England beyng thus enclosed, first caused his two Marshalles with a thousand men of armes and two thousand archers to go along the ryuer to seeke out some passage. And as they went, they entered into a towne called Founteynes, that standeth on the riuer of Some, and by reason it was not closed, they soone conquered, spoyled, and bzent it. And from thence they went to sundrie passages, but all were so well defended, that there was no way for the king of England to passe the riuer of Some.

The king of England beyng verye pensife, did the next morning rise verye earlye and dislodged, and euery man folowed the Marshalls Bannerz, and so roade into the Countrie of Vimeu, approchyng to the good towne of Abbeuile, and found a towne thereby whereunto was come many people of the Countrie, in trust of a little defence that was ther: But the English men shortly wanne it, and all that were within were slaine, and many taken of the towne and of the Countrie. The king tooke his lodgyng in a great Hospitall that was there. And the same day that the king departed from Araynes, the frenche king the next day came thether with all his armie into the same lodgyng where the king was, and found there a great deale of the prouision of the king of England, which for hast he was faine to leaue behinde him.

That night the king of Englande was lodged at a towne called Dysement, And at night when his two Marshalles were returned, who had that day ouerrunne the Countrie to the Gates of Abbeuile, and to Saint Valery, where they had made a great skirmishe, who brought him worde that they could find no passage: wherefoze the king caused to be called befoze him all the prisoners that he had taken in the Countries of Ponthieu, and Vimeu, and gently demaunded of them, that if there were any among them that knewe any passage bench Abbeuile, that he and his host might passe the ryuer of Some, if any of them would shewe him thereof, he should be acquitted of his ransome, and twentie of his companie for his loue. There was at that time among the Prisoners, a berlet called Gobyn a Grace, who hering the kinges request, stepped forth and sayd to the king. Sir, I promise you on the teopardie of my head, that I will bring you to such a place, where as you and all your host shall passe the ryuer of Some without perill. There are certeyne places in the passage that ye shall passe. xij. men on front two times in a day and night, & that ye shall not go in the water aboue the knees: but when the flood commeth, then the riuer encreaseith so great, that no man can passe, but when the flood is gone, it is so low, y it may be passed without all danger, both on horsebacke and on foote, and the passage is hard in the bottome, so that all your caryage may go safely through, and therefore the passage is called Blanchtaque, and if you make readie to depart betymes, ye may be there befoze the sonne risynge or soone after. The king beyng somewhat comforted with this tale, answered and sayde: if this be true that thou hast sayde, I will quite the thy raunsome and all thy company, and mozeouer I will geue thee an hundreth nobles in thy purse. Then the king commaunded euery man to be readie at the sound of the Trompet, and to depart.

At the breaking of the day, the king with all his hoste departed from Oylement, and roade after the guidyng of Gobyn of Grace, so that they came by the some rishyng to Blanche taque: but as then the flood was by, so that they might not passe, wherefore the king taried the ebbe.

The frenche king had his currours in the Countrie, who brought him worde of the demeanoz of the Englishe men, then he thought verily to haue closed the king of England in betweene Abuille and the riuer of Some, and then to haue fought with him at his pleasure. And while the frenche king was at Amieuce, he appoynted a great Baron of Normandy, called Sir Godmar du Foy, to go and keepe the passage of Blanche taque, where the Englishe men must passe, or else in none other place: he had with him a thousand men of armes, and sixe thousand a foote with the Genowayes. And also he had with him a great number of the men of that Countrey, and also a great number of them of Nutterell, so that they were a. xij. thousande men one and other.

When the Englishe hoste was come thether, Sir Godmar du Foy arraigned all his companie to defende the passage. The king of Englande stayed not for all that, but when the Tyde serued, entered into the water, & so did they on the other syde, and many a man drowned. There were some of the frenche men of Arthoys in Picardie, that were as glad to iust on the water as on the drie land. The frenche men defended so well the passage at the issuing out of the water, that the Englishe men had much ado to recover the land, the Genowayes did them great trouble with their Crosbowes: And on the other syde the Archers of England shot so wholly together, that the frenche men were faine to geue place to the Englishe men. There was a fore Battaille, and many a noble feate of armes done on both sides: finally, the Englishe men passed ouer, and assembled themselves together in the field, and the king and the Prince passed, and all the Lordes, and then the frenche men kept none aray. When Sir Godmar saw this discourfiture, he fled and saued himselfe. Some fled to Abuille, and some to Saint Reiguyer: but those frenche men that were there on foote could not flee, so that there were slaine a great number of them, & the chase endured moze then a great league. And as yet all the Englishe men were not passed the riuer, and certeine currours of the king of Behayne, and of Sir John of Heynaultes, came vpon them that were behinde, and tooke hozles and cariages, and slue dyuerse befoze they could take passage.

The frenche king the same morning was departed from Arcines, trusting to haue found the Englishe men betwene him and the riuer of Some: But when he heard how that Sir Godmar du Foy and his company were discourfited, he taried in the field, & demaunded of his Marshals what was best to do: and they sayde, Sir ye can not passe the ryuer but at the Bridge of Abuille, for the flood is come in at Blanche taque, wherefore he returned and lodged at Abbeuyle.

The King of England, when he was past the riuer, thanked God, and so roade foorth in like maner as he did befoze. Then the king called vnto him him Gobyn a Grace, and did quite him his raunsome, and all his companie, and gaue him an hundreth nobles, and a good hozse. And so the king roade foorth fayre and easily, and thought to haue lodged in a great towne called Nozell: But when he knewe that the towne did apperteyne to the Countesse of Danmerle, sister to the Lorde Robert of Arthoys, the king assured the towne and Countrie, as much as apperteyned to her, and so went foorth, and his Marshalles roade to Crotoy on the See syde, and brent the towne, and found in the Hauen many Shippes laden with wyne of Ponthieu belonging to the Marchauntes of Faynton, and of Rochell: They brought the best thereof to the kinges hoste.

Then one of the Marshalles road to the gates of Abbeuyle, and from thence to Saint Reiguyer, and after to the towne of Rue Saint Espirite. And this was on a Friday, and both the Marshalles battayles returned to the kinges hoste about noone, and so lodged all together neere vnto Cressy in Ponthieu.

The king of Englande was well inforuned howe the frenche king followed after him to fight. And therefore he sayde vnto his company, let vs take here some place of grounde, for we will go no farther vntill we haue seene our enimies: I haue good cause here to abyde them, for I am on the right heritage of the Quene my mother, the which land was geuen her at her marriage: I will challenge it of mine aduersarie Philip of Waloys. And because he had not the eight man that the frenche king had, therfore he commaunded his Marshalles to chole out a plot of ground, somewhat for his aduantage, and so they did, and thether the king and his hoste went. And then he sent his Currours vnto Abbeuyle to see if the frenche king drew that daye into the field or not. They went foorth and returned agayne, and sayde they sawe none apparence of his comming. Then euery man tooke their lodging for that day, and to be readie in the Morning at the sounde of the Trompet in the same place.

Thus all the Fridaye the frenche king taried still in Abbeuyle, abiding for his company, and sent his two Marshalles to ryde out to see the dealing of the Englishe men: And at night they returned and sayde, howe that the Englishe men were lodged in the fieldes.

And that night the frenche king made a Supper to all the chiefe Lords that were there with him, and after Supper, the king despyred them to be friends eche with other: The frenche king looked for the Erle of Sauoye who promised to haue come vnto him with a thousand Speares, for he had receaued wages for three Monethes of them at Troy in Champaigne.

The. xxvi. of August in the morning very early, being Saturday, the king of Englande arose and set forward his armie, commaunding euery man to draue to the field to the same place befoze appointed. And then the king caused a Parke to be made by the Wood syde behynde his hoste: and there was set all Cartes and cariages: and within the Parke were all their hozles, for euery man was on foote. And into this Parke there was but one entrie. And then he ordeyned three battailles.

In the first was the pong Prince of Wales, with him the Erle of Marwike and Canford, the Lorde Godfrey of Harecourt, Sir Reignald Cobham, Sir Thomas Holland, the Lorde Stafford, the Lorde Manny, the Lorde

The order of King Edwards battayles.

Lozde de la ware, Sir John Chandos, Sir Bartholomew de Bories, Sir Robert Neuyll, the Lozde Thomas Clyfford, the Lozde Bourchier, the Lozde de la Tumer and dyuers other knightes and squires that I cannot name: They were eight hundred men of armes and two thousand Archers, and a thousand of other with the Welshmen, every Lozde dytwe to the field appointed, vnder his awne pence and Banner.

In the second battayle was the Erle of Northampton, the Erle of Arondell, the Lozde Rosse, the Lozde Lygo, The Lozde Willoughby, the Lozde Bassett, the Lozde of Saint Aubrue, Sir Lewes Cueton, the Lozde of Myleton, the Lozde de la Sell and dyuers other, they had eyght hundred men of armes and. xij. hundred Archers.

The thirde battayle had the king: he had. vij. hundred men of armes and two thousand Archers, beside Lords and knights that I cannot name. When all these battayles were set in an order, then the king lept on a Hobby with a whyte rodde in his hande, one of his Marchalles on the one hande, and another on the other hande, and he roade from ranke to ranke, desyring every man to take heed that day to his right and honour. And he spake it so gently and with so good a countenance, that all suche as heard him tooke great courage and comfort by him.

And when he had thus ordered and visited all his battailes, it was then ix. of the clock in the forenoone. And then he caused every man to eate and drinke a little, and so they did at their leasure. And afterward they ordered againe their battayles, and then every man layde him downe on the grounde and his Salet and Bowe by hym, to be the more freshe when the enemies shoulde come.

This Saturday also early in the morning the French king came forward, and when he was come about two leagues from Abbeuyle, some of his Lordes sayd vnto him: Sir, it were good that ye ordered your battailes, and let your footemen passe on somewhat before, that they be not troubled with the horsemen. Then the king sent foure knightes, the Horne Bastell, the Lozde of Moyers, the Lozde of Beauieue and the Lozde Rambegny to ryde to vewe the Englishe hoste: And they crade so nere, that they might well see parte of their dealing. For the Englichmen sawe them well, and knewe that they were come thether to betwe them, and they let them alone, and made no countenance toward them, but suffered them to go as they came. And when the French king sawe these foure knightes returne, he faried vntill they came vnto him, and sayde, Sirs what tydings? These foure knightes eche of them looked on other, for there was none that offered to speake: finally, the king sayde to Horne which belonged to the king of Behayn, and had done in his dayes suche good seruice, that he was reputed one of the balvauntest knightes in the woerde. And the French king vade hym speake. And he sayde, Sir we haue ridden and scene the behauing of your enemies, and knowe ye for a truth that they are rested in three battailes abiding for you. Sir, I would counsaile you for my part, sauing your displeasure, that you and all your company woulde rest here and lodge this night. For or they that be behinde of your company come hether, and or your battayles can be set in good order, it will be very late, and your people be werie and out of aray, and ye shall finde your enemies freshe and readie to receaue you:

you: Carely in the morning ye may order your battayles at more leasure, and aduise vpon your enemies with better deliberation, and to consider well what waye ye will assaile them: for Sir surly, they will abide you. Then the king commaunded it should be so done. Then his two Marchalles, one roade before and another behinde, sayeng to every Banner: farie and abide here in the name of God and Saint Dionyce. They that were foremost stayed a little, but they that were behinde, would not stave vntill they were come as farre as the foremost. And when they before sawe them come on behinde, then they roade forward agayne, so that the king nor his Marchalles could not rule them: And so they roade without order or good array, vntill they came within the sight of their enemies. And aslone as the foremost sawe them, then they reculed back without all order: whereof they that were behinde had great maruaile and were amased at the matter, and thought that the foremost company had bene fighting, and that then they might haue had leasure to haue gone forward if that they would. Some went forth and some aboade still. The common people, of whome all the high wayes betweene Abbeuile and Cressy, stood full. When they sawe that they were nere to their enemies, they drew out their swordes and cryed out, downe with them, let vs slay them all. There was no man though he were present at this battayle that was hable to imagine or declare the euill order that was among the French partie, and yet they were a maruellous great number: That I write in this thing (sayth Sir John Froissart) I learned it specially of the Englichmen, who well behelde their dealing, and also of certaine knightes of Syr John of Heynaultes, who was alwayes about king Philip, and they shewed me as they knewe.

The Englichmen lyeng on the ground to rest them, aslone as they sawe the Frenchmen approche, they roase sayre and easely, and stood vpon their feete and aranged in their battayles. The first which was the Princes battaile, the Archers therein stood in maner of a herse and the men of armes in the bottome of the battayle. The Erle of Northampton and the Erle of Arondell, with the second battayle were on a wyng in very good order, ready to comfort the Princes battayle if neede were.

The Lordes and knightes of Fraunce came not to the assemble in good order, for some came before, & some came after, in such hast that one of them troubled another. When the French king sawe the Englichmen, his countenance chaunged, and he sayde to his Marchalles, make the Genowayes go on before and begin the battaile in the name of God and saint Dionice. There were of the Genowayes Crosbowes about. xv. thousand: But they were so wery in goyng on foote that day a sixe leagues armed with their Crosbowes, that they sayde to their Constables, we be not well ordered to fight this day, for we be not in case to do any deedes of armes, we haue more neede of rest. These wordes came to the Erle of Allanson, who sayde, a man is well at ease to be charged with such a sort of Kascalles to be faint and faile nowe at most neede. And the same season there fell a great raine and a cliffe, with a terrible thunder: and before the raine there came fleyng ouer both the battayles a great number of Crows, for feare of the tempest commyng. Then anone the ayre began to waxe cleare, and the sonne to shine sayre and bright, the which was right in the French mennes eyes. When the Genowayes wayes were set in order and began to appoche they made a great leape and crie to haue abashed the English men: but they stood still and stirred not one foote. Then the Genowayes againe the seconde time made another leape and a foule crie, and stepped forwarde a little, and the English men remo-ued not one foote: Thirdeley, againe they lept and cryed vnrasonably, and so went forth vntill they came within shot, and then shot off fiercely with their Crosbowes. Then the English Archers stepped forwarde, and let flie their arrowes, so wholly and so thicke, that it seemed Snowe. When the Genowayes felt the Arrowes pearcyng thozough their heades, armes & bzeastes, many of them cast downe their Crosbowes, and cut their stringes, and returned discomfited. When the french king sawe them flie away, he sayd, slay these Raskalles, for they will let and trouble vs without all reason. Then ye should haue scene the men of armes haue dashed in among them, and killed a great number of them. And euer still the English men shot where as they sawe thickest pzeasse: The sharpe arrowes pearced the men of armes and their horkes, and many fell horse and men among the Genowayes, and when they were dobone, they could not releue againe, the pzeasse was so thicke that one overthrew another. And also among the English men there were certaine Raskalles that went a foote with great knives, and they went in among the men of armes and slue and murdered many of them as they lay on the ground, both Erles, Barons, knightes and Esquiers, wherewith the king of England was afterward soze displeased, for he had rather they had bene taken prisoners.

The valiant king of Behaine, called Charles Luzenbourgh, somme to the noble Emperoz Henry of Luzenbourgh, for al that he was nere blind. When he vnderstood the order of the battaile, he sayde to them about him, where is the Lorde Charles my sonne? And his men aunswered, sir we can not tell, we thinke he be fightyng. Then he sayd, sirs ye are my men, my companions and my friendes in this iourney. I require you bring me so farre forwarde, that I may strike one stroke with my sworde, they sayde they would do his commaundement. And to the entent y they should not leese him in the pzeasse, they tyed all the reynes of their Bridels eche to other, and set the king before to accomplishe his desyre, and so they went on their enemyes. The Lorde Charles of Behayne his sonne, who wrote himselfe king of Behayne and bare the Armes, he came in good order to the battaile: But when he sawe the matter went awrye on their partie, he departed, I can not tell you which way. The king his father was so farre forwarde, that he strake a stroke with his sworde, ye and more then foure, and fought valiauntly.

The french king would faine haue come thether when he sawe their Banners, but there was a great hedge of Archers before him. The same day the french king had geuen a great blacke Courser to Sir John of Heynault, and he made the Lorde John of Fusselles to ryde on him, and to beare his Banner. The same horse tooke the Bydle in the teeth, and brought him through all the Curroues of the English men: and as he would haue returned againe, he fell into a great ditch and was soze hurt, and there had dyed if his Page had not bene.

This Battaille betweene Broye and Cressye was right cruell and soze foughten, and many a feate of armes there done that came not to my knowledge.

ledge. And when night came, diuers knightes and Esquiers lost their masters, and sometime or they knew, they came vpon the English men, who receyued them in such wise that they were slaine downe right, for there was no taking to mercie nor raunsome, for so the English men were determined in the moornyng. At one tyme duryng this battaile, it chaunced certeine french men and Almaynes to geue such a charge and onfet of the English hoste, that perforce they opened the Archers of the Princes battaile, and came & fought hand to hand with the men of armes. Then the second battaile of the English men came to succour the Princes battaile, the which was tyme: For they had as then much ado. And they that were with the Prince, sent a Messenger to the king, who was on a little windemill hill heard by, and sayde vnto him, Sir, the Erle of Warwike, the Erle of Camfort, and sir Reignold Cobham, and other such as are aboute the Prince your sonne, are now fiercely fought withall, and are soze handeled: Wherefore they desyre that you and your battaile will come and ayde them. Then the king sayde, is my sonne dead or hurt, or felled to the ground? No Sir quoth the knight, but he is hardly matched, and therefore hath neede of your ayde. Well sayd the King returne againe to him and them that sent you hether, and bid them that they send no moze to me for any aduenture that falleth, as long as my sonne is a-liue: and say also to them that they suffer him this day to winne his spurres: For if God be pleased I will this iourney to be his, and the honour thereof, and to them that are about him.

Then the knight returned againe, and shewed the kinges wordes, the which greatly encouraged them, and then they repented that they did send to the king as they did.

Sir Godfrey of Harecourt, would gladly that the Erle of Harecourt his brother might haue bene saued, for he heard say by them that sawe his Banner, how that he was there in the fielde on the french partie: But syz Godfrey could not come to him betimes, for he was slaine before he coude come at him, and so was also the Erle of Aumerle his Nephew. In another place the Erle of Alanson and the Erle of Flaundyrs fought valiauntly, euery Lorde vnder his awne Banner, but finally they could not resist against the puzsaunce of the Englishmen, and so there they were also slaine and dyers other knightes and squires. Also the Erle Lewes of Bloys Nephewe vnto the french king, and the Duke of Loreyn fought vnder their Banners, but at the last they were closed in with Englishmen and Welshmen, and there were slaine for all their pzewes. Also there was slaine the Erle of Auster, the Erle of S. Paule and many other. And in the euening the french king, who had as then left about him a. lx. persons one and other, whereof Sir John of Heynault was one, who had remounted once agayne, for his horse was slaine with an arrow. Then he sayde to the king, Sir departe hence, for it is time, leese not your selfe wilfully, if ye haue losse at this time, ye shall recouer it agayne at another season. And so he tooke the kinges horse by the bridle, and led him away, in maner perforce. Then the king roade, vntill he came to the Castell of Broy, the gate was closed, because it was at that time darke. Then the king called the Capitaine, who came to the walles & sayde: who is it that calleth there at this time of night? Then the king sayde, open your gate quickly, for thys is the fortune of France. The Capitaine knewe then that it was the king, and opened the gate and let downe the bridge, and then the king entred in, and had with him but five Barones, Sir John of Heynault, Sir Charles of Homozency, the Lorde of Beancieuwe, the Lorde Dabegny and the Lorde of Mountford. The king woulde not tarie there, but dranke and departed thence about Midnight and so roade to Ampence and there rested. And the Englishmen kept the fielde all this Saturday at night.

The victory of the English men at the battaile of Cressie.

And as soon as night was come, and the Englishmen perceauing that no more Frenchmen approached, then they accompted among themselves that the victorie was theirs, for the Frenchmen were discomfited, slayne or runne away. Then they made great fyres and lighted by Torches and Caudels, for it was very darke. Then the king came downe from the little hill where as he had stande all the day long, and his Helmet neuer came of his head.

Then he went with all his battaile to his sonne the Prince, and embraced him in his armes and kissed him and sayde, good sonne, God geue you good perseuerance, you are my good sonne, and you haue done very nobly, ye are worthie to keepe a realme. The Prince bowed himselfe to the earth honouring the king his father. This night they thanked God for their good aduenture, and did neither craike nor boast therof, but wholly gaue the prayse and thankes vnto almighty God the geuer of victorie.

The next daye in the morning, which was Sunday there was suche a Mist, that a man coulde not see the bread, of an Acre of lande from him. And then the king commaunded his Marshalles to go abread, and to vie whether any Frenchmen gathered agayne together in any place, and they had with them five hundred Speares and to thousande Archers. And the same morning out of Abbeuile and Saint Reignyer in Ponthew, the commons of Roane and of Beauuoy fled out of their towne, not knowing of the discomfiture the day before; and sodainely met with the English Marshalles, wenyng to them they had bene Frenchmen.

And when the Englishmen sawe them, they set on them freshly: and there was a sore fight, but at the last the Frenchmen brake their aray and fled, and there were slayne in the wayes, and in the hedges and bushes more then vij. thousand. And if the day had bene clere, there had not escaped a man.

And anon after, another compaignie of Frenchmen were met by the Englishmen. The Archbishop of Roane, and the great Priour of France, who also knewe nothing of the discomfiture the day before, for they were enformed that the French king should haue fought the same Sunday, and they were going thitherwarde. But when they met with the Englishmen there was a great battaile, for they were a great number, but they coulde not endure against the Englishmen, for they were nigh all slayne, few escaped, the two Lordes were slayne. And this morning also the Englishmen met with diuers companies that had lost their way on the Saturday, and had ben all night in the fieldes, and wist not where the king was, nor their Captaines: and the Englishmen slue them all as many as they met. And it was shewed me (sayth Froyssart) that of the commons and men on foote of the Citie and good Townes of France, there were slayne foure times as many on the Sunday, as there were slain on the Saturday at the great battaile. And after these sundrie great and wonderfull victories, the Mar-shalles of the Englishmen with their men returned to the kinges battaile, and sayde vnto the king, Sir, we thinke surely that there is now no more apparence of your enemies.

And then the king commaunded Sir Reignold Cobham and syr Richard Stafford with thre Heraldes, to serche the field and countrie for the number of them that were slayne, and they roade in the fieldes all that daye, and made a diligent beue, and returned agayne about Supper time, and made reporte to the king and sayde, howe there were in the field dead. xi. great Princes. lxxx. Banners, twelue hundred knightes and more then. xxx. thousand other. The Englishmen kept still their fielde all that night, and on the Monday in the morning the king prepared to departe. But before hys departure he caused proclamation in the Countrie to be made, and graunted a truce for thre dayes to the entent they should come and bury the dead. And all the great Lordes he caused to be brought with him and caryed them to Mouterell, and there were buried, and his Marshalles went toward Hedyn, and hent Wambam and Seram, but they did nothing to the Castell, it was so strong and so well kept. They lodged that night on the riuer of Hedyn towardes Blangye. The next day, they roade towardes Boleyn, and came to the towne of Unfame: There the king and the Prince lodged and taried a daye to refrefhe his men. And on the Wednesday, the king came before the strong towne of Calice.

At the same time in the towne of Calice was a knight called Sir John Vien chiefe Capitaine thereof, and with him also was syr Andrew Danzehen, syr John de Sury, syr Barton de Belborne, syr Godfrey de lament, syr Depyn de Wmew, and diuers other knightes and squiers.

When king Edward was come before Calice, he layde his siege there vnto, the thirde day of September, and ordeyned Bastides betwene the towne and the hauen. And he caused Carpenters to make houses and lodgynges of great timber, and set the houses like streetes, and couered them with Keede and Broome: so that it was like a little towne, & there was euery thing to sell, and a Market place, and Market kept euery Tuesday, and euery Saturday, for fleshe and fishe, for Mercery ware, houses for cloth both linnen and wollen: Also there was bread, wine, and all other necessary thinges, which came out of England, and out of Flaundyys, and there they might buy what they lust.

sieged.

The king would not assaile the towne of Calice, for he thought it but a lost labour, and therefore he spared his people and artillarie, and sayde he would famiche them within the towne with long siege, without the French king came to rayse his siege perforce.

When the Capitaine of Calice sawe the maner and order of the Englishmen, then he constreyned all meane and poore people to issue out of the towne. And on a Wednesday there issued out of the towne, of men, women, and children, more than. xviij. hundred. And as they passed through the hoste, they were demaunded why they departed, and they answered and sayde, because they had nothing to liue vpon. Then the king of his mere pity and mercye suffered them to passe through his hoste without daunger, and gaue them meate and drinke to dyner, and vnto euery person two pence sterlyng in alms, for the which diuerse of them prayed for the kinges prosperitie.

The Scots
rteLL

In this meane while that the King lay at the siege of Calice, David king of Scotland by the styrzng of the French king, made his sommons to his people to mete him at Saint Johns Towne, vpon the riuer of Tape in Scotland. Thether came Erles, Barons, and Prelates of Scotland, and there agreed that in all haste possible they should enter into England, and to ayde them in that iourney, John of the Isles, who ruled the wilde Scottes should go with them. The same John came with a thzee thousand of the most outrageous people in the wohole worlde. When all the Scottes were assembled, they were one and other fittie thousand fightyng men.

A great army of the Scotts.

The Scots could not make their assembly so secret, but that the Quene had knowledge thereof, beyng at that tyme at Porke. Then she sent all about for men, and then with as much speede as might be, the people came to the Queene from all places. But the Scottes were fully perswaded that there were no men left in England, for they were epyther with the king at the siege of Calice, or else in Gascoyne and Breteyne defendyng of the French king.

In this meane time the king of Scottes departed from Saint Johns towne, and went to Domesfrentlyne the first day, and the next day they passed a little arme of the Sea, and so came to Estreuelyne, & then to Edenbourgh. And there they numbred their people, and they were a thzee thousand men of armes, knightes and Esquiers, and a. xxx. thousand of other vpon small Paquencyes, besyde foote men. Then they came to Rousbourgh the first fortreffe Englishe on that part, whereof Sir William Mountagebo was Capitaine. The Scottes passed by without offeryng of any assault, and so went forth brennyng and destroyng the Countrie of Northumberland, and their Currours ran to Porke, and bzent as much as was without the walles, and returned againe vnto their host, which then was within a myle of newe Castell vpon Tyne.

The Queene of England who desyred to defend her Countrie, came to newe Castell vpon Tyne, and there taried for her men, who came dayly from all the partes of the Realme.

The Quene
of England gathered a great power agaynst the Scottes, and gaue them
bataille.

When the Scottes knewe that the Englishmen were assembled at newe Castell, they drewe thetherward, and their Currours came rummyng before the towne: and at their returnyng they bzent certeine small Hamlets thereabouts, so that the smoke therof came into the towne of newe Castell. Some of the Englishe men would haue issued out, to haue fought with them that made the fyre: But the Capitaynes would not suffer them to go out.

The next day, the King of Scottes with .xl. thousand men one and other came and lodged within thzee English myles of the towne of newe Castell, in the land of the Lorde Neuyl: and the king sent to them within the towne, that if they would issue out into the fielde, he would fight with them gladly, and they had answere, that they would come out & fight with him in the field. Then the Lordes and Prelates of England sayde vnto the Queene, we are content to aduenture our lynes with the right and heritage of the king of England our Maister. And then they all issued out of the Towne, and were in number. xij. hundzeth men of armes, thzee thousande Archers, and. vij. thousand of other with the Welshemen.

Then the Scottes came and lodged agaynst them nere together: and every man was set in order of battaile. And then the Queene came among her her men, and her battayles were thus ordered.

There was ordeyned foure battayles, one to ayde another. The first was in the gouernaunce of the Bishop of Durham, and the Lorde Percy: The seconde, the Archebishop of Porke, and the Lorde Neuyl: The thirde, the Bishop of Lincolne, & the Lord Howebray: The fourth, the Lorde Edward Bailioll Capitaine of Barwike, and the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, and the Lord Rolfe, euery battaile had like number after their quantity: and the Quene went from battaile to battaile, prayng them to do their deuoyre for the defence of the honour of their Lord and maister the king of England, and in the name of God euery man to be of good heart and courage, promysyng them that to her power, she would remember them as well and better, as though the king her Lorde were there personally. And so the Quene departed from them, recommendyng them to God.

The order of
battalles.

And anone after, the battayles of the Scottes began to set forward: and in likewise, so did the Englishmen. Then the Archers beganne to shote on both parties: howbeit the shot of the Scottes endured but a short space: But the shot of the Englishmen was long and fierce. So that when the battayles approched, the battaile was cruell and daungercous. They began at nyne of the clock in the morning, fought vntill it was noone. The Scottes had great Ares heard and sharpe, and gaue with them many sore and cruell strokes: howbeit in the ende the Englishmen obteyned the victorie of the fielde, but they lost many of their men.

battaile.

There were slaine of the Scots, the Erle of Sys, the Erle of Ostre, the Erle of Patrys, the Erle of Surlant, the Erle of Dastre dare, the Erle Mare, the Erle John Doboglas and the Lorde Alexander Ramsay, who bare the kings Banner, and diuers other knightes and squiers. And there the Scottishe king was taken, who had fought valiantly and was sore hurt: A squire of Northumberland tooke him called John Copland. And asone as he had taken the king, he went with him out of the field with an eyght of his seruaunts with him, and roade all that daye vntill he was .xv. leagues from the place of the battaile, and at night he came to a Castell called Orgulus. And then he sayd that he would not deliuer the king of Scots to no man nor woman luyng, but onely to the king of England his Lorde. The same day there was also taken in the fielde the Erle Morct, the Erle of Marche, the Lord Wylliam Doboglas, the Lorde Robert Uely, the Bishop of Dadudaine, the Byschop of Saint Andrews & diuers other knightes and Barones. And there were slaine of one and other .xv. thousand, and the other saued them selues as well as they might. This battaile was foughten besides New Castell vpon Tyne in the yere of our Lorde. 1346.

Now when the Quene of Englande being at New Castell vnderstood of the victorie: she then tooke her horse and roade to the place where the battaile had bene. And there it was shewed her how the king of Scottes was taken by a squire called John Copland, and he had carryed him away, no man knew whether. Then the Quene wrote to the squire, commaunding him to bring his prisoner the king of Scottes vnto her, and that he had not well done to depart with him without leaue. All that day the Englishmen taried in that place, and the Quene with them. And the next day they returned to New Castell.

The answer of John Copland.

When the Quenes letter was brought to John Copland, he answered and sayde: That as for the king of Scottes his prisoner, he would not deliuer him to no man nor woman lyving but onely to the king of England his soueraigne Lorde. As for the king of Scottes he sayde should be safely kept, and he would geue accompt for him. Then the Queene sent letters to the king to Calice, wherby the king was informed of the state of his realme. Then the king sent incontinent to John Copland, commanding him forthwith to come ouer the sea to him to Calice. Then the sayde John did put his sayde prisoner in a strong Castell in safe keeping, and so roade thoro England until he came to Douer, and there toke the sea & arriued before Calice.

When the king of England sawe the squire, he tooke him by the hande and sayde, welcome my squire, which by your valiauntnesse haue taken mine aduersarie the king of Scottes. The squire kneeled downe and sayde: syr, if God by his grace haue suffered me to take the king of Scottes by true conquest of armes, I thinke no man ought to haue any enuie thereat: For as well God maye sende by his grace suche a fortune to a poore Squire, as to a great Lorde. And Sir, I require your grace not to be discontent with me, though I did not deliuer the king of Scottes to the Queene at her commaundement. For syr I holde of you as mine othe is to you, and not of her, but in all good maner.

The king sayde to him, John, the good seruite that ye haue done and your valiauntnes is so much worth, that it must counteruayle your trespass, and to be taken for excuse, and blame haue they that beare you any euill will. Therefore ye shall returne againe home to your house, and then my will and pleasure is, that ye deliuer your prisoner the king of Scottes to the Quene my wyfe. And in rewarde, I assigne you nere to your house, where as ye thinke best your selfe fife hundred pound sterling of yerely rent to you and to your heires for euer: and here I make you squire for my body.

Then the thirde daye he departed into Englande, and when he came home to his abone house, he assembled together his friendes and kinsmen, and so they tooke the King of Scottes and roade with him to the Citie of Yorke, and there from the King of England he presented to the Queene the King of Scottes, and excused himselfe so discretely as the Queene and the counsaile were content.

Then the Quene made good prouision for the Citie of Yorke, the Castell of Rokebourgh, the Citie of Dureham, the towne of New Castell by on Tyne, and in all other garrisons on the marches of Scotlande: And left in those Marches the Lorde Percy and the Lorde Newyll as Gouvernours there, and then the Quene departed from Yorke to London.

Then she placed the King of Scottes in the strong tower of London, and the Erle Muret and all the other prisoners with him, and set good keeping ouer them. Then she went to Douer and there tooke the Sea, and had so good winde, that within a short space she arriued before Calice, three dayes before the feast of all Saintes: For whose comming the king made a great feast and dinner to all the Lordes and Ladies that were there. The Quene brought many Ladies and Damoselles with her, as well to accompany her, as also to see their husbandes, fathers, brythren and other friendes that laye at that siege.

The

The frenche king vnderstanding well that his men in Calyce were charged sore, sent forth his commaundement throughout France, that euery man should be with him at the towne of Amiens at Whitsontyde next following, and there was none that durst say naye. And when Whitsontyde came, the frenche king kept there a great feast, and thether came vnto him the Duke of Odes and of Burgoyne, and the Duke of Normandy his eldest sonne, and the Duke of Orleans his youngest sonne, the Duke of Burbon, the Erle of Foitz, the Lorde Lewes of Sauoy, Sir John of Herynault, the Erle of Armanack, the Erle of Forestes, the Erle of Valentenoys, and dyuers other Erles, Barons, Lordes, and knights.

When they were all at Amiens, they counsailed together, howe they might best enter towarde Calice, to rayse the siege. And some counsailed the frenche king to make meanes to the Fleminges to haue the passages of Flaundyrs open, and then might he come in by Grauelynge, and not only raise the siege, but also on that syde he might easely geue them battaile. And soone after the frenche king sent great Ambassadors into Flaundyrs, to treat in the aforesayde matter. But the king of England had made there suche fast friendship, that they would not agree to that request: And then the frenche king sayde that he would enter on the syde towarde Burgoyne.

In this meane time the king of England sawe that he could not get Calice, but by famine, and therefore he made a strong Castell, and a highe, to close by the passage by the sea: And this Castell was set betwene the towne and the sea, & was well fortified with Springaldes, Bombardes, Bobes, and other Artillery. And in this Castell were lx. men of armes, and two hundred Archers, and they kept the Hauen in suche wise, that nothing coulde come in nor out, but by their licence.

And in this time also the king of Englande had so laboured and solicited the Counsaile of Flaundyrs, that they came out of Flaundyrs with an hundred thousand men, and went and layd siege to the towne of Aye, and bent the Countrie round about, as Meryuell la Gorge, Estelles Le Ventre, and a Marche called la Loe, and to the Gates of Turwyn, and Saint Omere. Then the frenche king went to the towne of Arras, & sent many men of warre to the Garrison of Arrhoys, and specially he sent his Constable, Sir Charles of Spaine to S. Omers: For the Erle of Cleve, and of Guynes, who was Constable of France, was then prisoner in England, as before it is shewed.

The Fleminges did the frenche men great trouble before they departed. And when the Fleminges were returned, then the frenche king and his companie departed from Arras, and went to Hedyn. His host with their cariages helde well in length three Leagues of that Countrie, and there he tarried one day, and the next day he went to Blangy: And there he rested to take aduice what waye to go forth: Then he was counsailed to go throughe the Countrie called la Belme: and that way he toke, and with him two hundred thousand one and other, and so passed by the County of Franquebergh, and so came streight to the hill of Sangates, betwene Calice and Wyssant. They came thether in goodly order, they Banners displayed, that it was greaue bentie to beholde theyr pyssant array. They of Calice, when they sawe them lodge, it seemed to them to be a newe siege.

When the king of Englande knewe and sawe the frenche king come with with such a power to raise the siege. Then he had made so good provision for the stoppage of the passages, that he was sure that the French king could not with his armie come nere to Calice, except it were in two places, the one was by the downes by the sea syde, or else about by the high way: and there were many ditches, rockes, and marishes, and but one way to passe over a Bridge called Newland Bridge. And all alongest the Downes, the king of England caused all his nauye to lie, and euery ship wel furnished with Bombarbes, Crosbowes, Archers, Springalles, and other artillary, whereby the French hoste might not passe that way.

And the king caused the Erle of Darby to go and keepe Newland Bridge with a great number of men of armes, & Archers, so that the French men could not passe no way, without they would haue gone through the Marshes, the which was a thing impossible.

On the other syde toward Calice, there was a high Tower kept with xxx. Archers, and they kept the passage of the Downes from the French men, the which was well fortified with great and double Ditches.

When the French men were thus lodged on the hill of Sangate: The Commons of Courney who were. xv. C. came to the Tower last aboute named, and they within shot at them: But they passed the ditches, and came to the foote of the wall with Dikes and Hookes, and there was a sore assault, and many of them of Courney hurt: But at the last they wanne the Tower, and slew all that were therein, and the Tower beaten downe.

The French king sent his Marchalles to aduise what way hee might approche to fight with the English men: and so they went forth, and when they had well aduised the passages and streytes, they returned to the king and sayde, that by no meanes he could not come at the English men without he would leese his people. So the matter rested all that day and night. The next day the French king sent to the King of England, the Lorde Godfrey of Charney, the Lorde Eustace of Rybamount, Guy of Pele, and the Lorde of Beauuue: and as they roade that strong way, they sawe well that it was harde to passe that way. They prayed much the order that the Erle of Darby kept at Newland bridge, by the which way they passed. Then they road forth until they came to the king of England, who was well accompanied with Noble men about him.

Then they foure alighted, and came to the king, and did their reuerence vnto him: Then the Lorde Eustace of Rybamount sayde, Sir, the king my Maister sendeth you worde by vs, that he is come to the hill of Sangate to do battaile with you, but he can finde no way to come at you: And therefore sir he would that ye should apoynt certeyne of your counsaile, and he will do likewise of his, and they betwene them to deuise a place for the Battaille.

The king of Englande was readie to answer and sayde, Sirs, I haue well vnderstand that ye desire me on the behalfe of mine aduersary, who kepeth wrongfully from me mine heritage: Wherefore I am sorry. Say vnto him from me if ye list, that I am here, and so haue bene nere a whole yere: and all this he knewe right well: he might haue come hether sooner if he had would, but he hath suffered me to abide here so long, the which hath bene greatly to my costes and charges. And I now could do so much if I would, soone to be Lorde of Calice. And therefore I am not determined to folowe your your maisters aduice, nor to depart from that which I am at a poynt to win. Wherefore if he nor his men can passe this way, let them seeke some other passage if they thinke to come hether, for I entende not to styre my siege to come to them.

Then these Lordes departed, and were conueyed until they were past Newland Bridge: And then they shewed the French king, the King of Englandes answer.

And in this tyme, while the French king studied howe to fight with the king of England, there came into his host two Cardinales from Pope Clement in message, who tooke great paine to ryde by and downe betwene the two hostes, and they laboured and endeouered themselves so much, that they obtayned a graunt for an entreatie of an accorde and peace, and a respit betwene the two kings, being the one at the siege, & the other in the field onely. And so there were foure Lordes appoynted on eyther party to counsaile together for a peace. For the French king, there was the Duke of Burgoyne, and the Duke of Bourbon, Sir Lewes of Sauoy, and Sir John of Helynault. And for the English partie, the Erle of Darby, the Erle of Northampton, the Lorde Reignald Cobham, and the Lorde Gualtier of Hamy, and the two Cardinals were as indifferent meanes betwene both parties.

These Lordes met three dayes, and many deuises put forth, but none tooke effect: And in the meane season the king of Englande alwayes fortified his hoste and fielde and made ditches on the downes, that the French men should not come sodainely vpon him. These three dayes passed without any agreement, and then the two Cardinales returned to Saint Omers. And when the French king sawe that he could doe nothing, the next daye he dislodged betymes and tooke hys waye to Amyns and gaue euery manne leaue to departe.

When they within Calyce sawe their king departe, they made great sorowe. Some of the Englishmen folowed the tayle of the French armie, and wanne Sommers, Cartes and cariages, horse, wine and other things, and tooke dyuers prisoners and brought them to Calyce.

After the departure of the French king from Sandgate, then they within the towne perceiving they were utterly without reliefe and succour, cryed vpon their Capitaine syr John of Wyen that he would entreate the king of Englande for mercie. And at the last the Capitaine graunted so to doe, and went to the walles, and made a signe to speake with some of the hoste: whereof knowledge was immediatly brought to the king. And when the king heard thereof, he sent thither syr Gualtier of Hamy and syr Basset. Then syr John of Wyen sayde vnto them: Sirs, ye be right valiant knights in deedes of armes, and you knowe well how that the king my master hath sent me and other vnto this towne, and commaunded vs to keepe it to his behoofe, in such wise as we take no blame nor yet be to him any damage, and we haue done all that lyeth in our power to doe: And now our succours hath fayled vs, and we be so sore streyned, that we haue not to lyue withall, but that we must all die or perishe by famine: except the noble & gentle King of yours will take vs to mercy, the which thing to doe we praye you to be a meane of entreatie for vs, that it would please him to take pitie of vs, and to let vs go and departe as we be, and let him take the towne and the Castell and all the goodes that be therein, the which is a great abundaunce.

Then sayz Gualtier of Manny sayde, Sir we knowe partly the kinges minde, for he hath shewed it vnto vs. And therefore know you for a truth, it is not his minde that you nor they that are within the towne should departe so: for it is his will that ye all shall yeelde your selues simply to hys will and pleasure, to raunsome or put to death whom he please. Then sayd the Capitaine, this is to heard a matter to vs, we are in thys towne a small sorte of knightes and squiers, who haue as truely serued the king our master, as you haue serued yours, and in lyke maner we haue endured great vexation and paine, and we will endure as much paine as euer knightes did rather then to consent that the worst lad in the towne that should susteyne any more euill then the greatest or best of vs all, therfore sayz we pray you of your humanitie and gentleness that ye will go and speake with the king of England and desire him to haue pittie vpon vs, for we trust so much in his gracious goodnesse that his minde will chaunge, and that he will take pittie and compassion vpon vs.

Sir Gualtier of Manny and sayz Basset returned to the king, and declared to him all that had bene sayde. The king being in a great furie, sayde that he would none otherwise but that they should yelde themselves by simply to his will and pleasure. And then sayz Gualtyer sayde, sayz sayng your displeasure, in this ye may be in the wrong: for ye shall geue by this an euill ensample, if ye sende any of vs your seruauntes into any fortreffe, we will not be very glad to go, if ye put any of the towne to death after they be yeilded, for in lyke case they will deale with vs, if the case fall lyke, the which sayeng diuers other Lords that were there susteyned and mainteyned. Then the king sayde: Sirs, I will not be alone against you all, therefore sayz Gualtier of Manny, ye shall go agayne to the Capitaine and saye, that all the grace that ye nowe can finde at oure handes is, that they let. vij. of the chiefe Burgeses of the Towne come out barehedded, barefooted and barelegged, and in their shertes with halters about their neckes, with the keyes of the Castell and towne in their handes: and let them. vij. yelde themselves simply to my will, and the residue I will take to mercy.

Then Sir Gualtier returned and found Sir John of Wyen still on the wall, abyding for an answer: Then sir Gualtier shewed him all the grace that he could get of the king: well sayde sayz John, I require you to tarie here a certaine space till I go into the towne, and shewe this vnto the commons who sent me hether.

Then sayz John went into the market place, and there tolled the common Bell, and then incontinent men and women assembled there.

Then the Capitaine made report of all that he had done, and sayde, Sirs, it will be none otherwise, and therefore nowe take aduise and make a short answer. Then all the people beganne to weepe and to make suche sorow and lamentation that there was not so heard a hart, if they had scene them but would haue had pittie vpon them. The Capitaine himselfe wept also and that pittifully. At the last the most riche Burgesse of all the towne called Eustace of Saint Peters, rose by and sayd openly: Sirs, both great and small, a most pittifull and horrible thing were it, to suffer such a number of people to dye as are in this Towne, eyther by famine or otherwise, so long long as there is any meane to saue them: I thinke he or they shoulde haue great merite of our Lorde God that would deliuer them from such mischief as for my parte I haue so good a trust in our Lorde God, that if I dye in the quarell to saue the residue, that God wyll pardon mee, wherefore to saue them I will be the first to put my lyfe in icopardie. When he had thus sayde, euery man worshipped him, and diuers kneeled downe at his fecte, weeping and bringing their hands most greuouly. Then another honest Burgesse stood out and sayde, I will keepe company with my Gossyp Eustace, his name was John Dayre, then came Jaques of Wyssaunt who was riche both in goodes and heritage, he sayde also that he would keepe company with his two Cosyns, and so sayde Peter of Wyssaunt his brother, and after came two other and sayde they would doe the same, and then they went and appareled them as the king desired. Then the Capitaine went with them to the gate, there was great moene and lamentation made at their departyng both of men, women and children. Then the gate was opened, and the Capitaine issued out with the. vij. Burgeses, and closed the gate agayne: So that they were betweene the gate and the barryers. Then he sayde to sayz Gualtier of Manny: Sir, I deliuer here to you as Capitaine of Calice, by the whole consent of the people of the towne these. vij. Burgeses, and I sweare to you truely that they be and were to day the most notable, riche and worthyest Burgeses of all the towne of Calice: wherefore, gentle knight I requyre you to pray the king to haue mercy vpon them that they die not. Then sayde sayz Gualtier, I cannot tell, neyther can I say what the king will doe, but I will doe for them the best I can. Then the Barryers were opened and the. vij. Burgeses went towardes the king, and the Capitaine entered agayne into the Towne.

When Sir Gualtier presented those Burgeses vnto the king, they kneeled downe and helde by their handes, and sayde: Gentle king, beholde here vs six who were Burgeses of Calice, and great merchauntes, we haue brought to you the keyes of the towne and Castell of Calice, and we submit our selues wholly vnto your will and pleasure, onely for the safetie of the rest of the people of Calice, who haue suffered great paine and miserie: Sir we besech your grace to haue mercie and pitie vpon vs through your high noblenesse. Then all the Erles and Barons, and other that were there, wept for pitie. The king looked felly and cruelly vpon them, for greatly he hated the people of Calice, because of the great damnages and displeasures that they had done him on the Sea before. Then the king commaunded their heades to be stryken off: Then euery man cryed and besought the king to haue mercie, but he would here no man in that behalfe. Then Sir Gualter of Manny said, A noble king, for Gods sake refraine your courage, ye haue the name of soueraigne noblenesse, therefore nowe do not a thing that should blemishe your renoune, neither geue occasion for any to speake vilanie of you: for euery man will say it is a great tyranny to put to death suche honest perfonnes, who of themselves haue willingly put themselves into the handes of your grace, for the safetie of their companie. Then the king turned from him, and commaunded him to send for the Hangman, and sayd: They of Calice haue caused a great number of my men to be slaine, and therefore these also shall die likewise. Then the Queene beyng great with childe, kneeled downe, and

O gracious king, sithe I passed the sea in great perill, I haue desired nothyng of you: Therefore now I humbly require you in the honour of the birgin Mary, and for the loue of me, that ye will take mercy of these sixe Burgeses. The king behelde the Queene and stood still in a study a little while, and then sayde, A Dame, I would ye had bene as now in some other place, for I am not able to denie your request: Wherfore I geue them to you, to do your pleasure with them. Then the Queene caused them to be carryed to her Chamber, and made the halters to be taken from their neckes, and caused them to be new apparayled, and gaue them their dinner at theyr leysure. And then she gaue eche of them sixe Nobles in his pursse, and made them to be brought out of the hoste in safegard, and set at their libertie.

Thus was Calice yelded and geuen vp to the king in the latter ende of September, so that he had laide siege therebnto one whole yere and moze. And then the king called vnto him Sir Gualtier of Hamy, and his two Marchalles, the Erle of Warwike, and the Erle of Stafforde, and sayde to them, Sirs take ye here the keyes of the Castell, and towne of Calice. Go and take possession thereof, and put in prison all the knightes that be there: And all other Souldiours that came simplie to winne their liuyng, cause them to aduoyde the towne. And in like maner aduoyde the towne of all o- ther men, women, and children, for I will repeople the towne againe wyth mere Englishe men.

So these three Lordes with an hundreth with them, went and tooke possession of Calice, and first did put in prison, Sir John de Uien, sir John of Surrey, Sir John of Belborne and other: Then they caused all the soul- diours to bring all their harnesse into a place appointed, and layde it all on an heape in the hall of Calice. Then they caused all maner of people to boide, and kept there no mo persons but one priest, and two other auncient perso- nages, such as knewe the customes, lawes and ordinaunces of the towne, and to signe out the heritages howe they were deuided. Then they prepared the Castell to lodge the king and Queene in, and prepared other houses for the kinges companie.

Then the king mounted on his horffe, and entered into the towne, with Trumyettes, Drommes, and other Instrumentes of Musicke, and there the king laye vntill the Queene was brought in bed and deliuered of a faire Ladye named Margaret. The king gaue to Sir Gualtier of Hamy dy- uerse fayre houses within the towne, and to the Lorde of Stafford, to the Lord of Bethene, to sir Bartholomew of Bomes, & to dyuerse other Lordes and knightes, to repeople the towne againe. The kinges minde was when he came into England, to sende out of London. xxxvj. good Citezens to Ca- lice to dwell there, and by that meanes to people the towne with pure Eng- lishe men, the which the king afterward performed.

Then the newe towne and Bastide that was made without the towne was pulled downe, and the Castell that stood on the Hauen, was likewylle pulled downe, and the great timber and stones brought into the towne. Then the king ordeyned men to kepe the Gates, walles and Barriers, and amen- ded all thinges within the towne. And sir John de Uien, and his companie were sent into England, and were halfe a yere at London before they were put to ransome.

Certaine Lordes are sent to take possession of Calice.

The king en- tereth into Calice tri- umphantly.

A pitifull sight was it when the Burgeses and other men of the towne of Calice, and women, and children, were put out of the Towne, and faine to forsake houses, heritages and goodes, and to take nothing with them: Ney- ther had they any restitution of the French king, for whose sake they lost all. The most part of that people went to Saint Omers.

At this tyme the Cardinall called Guy de Boloyne as a Legate from Clement the sixt, came vnto the French king his Cosyn in the Citie of Ami- ens. And he applyed the matter so, betwene the king of England & the French king, that a truce was concluded and taken to endure for two yeres. To thys truce all parties were agreed: But Britaine was clerely excepted, for the two Ladyes made still warre one against another.

Then the king of Englande, and the Queene returned into England: And the king made capitaine of Calice, Sir Amery of Dauy a Lombard borne, who the king had greatly aduanced. Then the king sent from Lon- don. xxxvj. Citezens to Calice, who were riche and sage, and their wyues, and children, and dayly the number encreased: For the king graunted there such liberties and franchisees, that men were glad to go and dwell there.

The same time was brought to London Sir Charles de Bloys, who called himselfe Duke of Britaine, who was taken in Britaine by the kinges people, durynge the tyme of the siege of Calice, and was nowe committed in- to Curtoyse prison in the Tower of London, with the king of Scottes, and the Erle Nozette: But he had not bene there long, but at the request of the Queene of England, Sir Charles, who was her Cosyn Germaine was re- ceuyed on his fayth and truth, and rood round about London at his pleasure: But he might not lye past one night out of London, without it were in the Court where the king and Queene lay: Also the same tyme there was pri- soner in England the Erle of Ewe, and Guynes, which was Constable of Fraunce, a right gentle knight, and his behauiour was suche, that he was welcome wheresoeuer he came, both with the king, Queene, Lordes, La- dyes, and Damofelles.

At this time in the towne of Saint Omers was the Lorde Geoffrey of Charney Capitaine, and he kept the frontiers there, and bled and ordered euery thing concerning the warre as king. This Lord Geoffrey calling to his minde, which way he might compasse or deuise how he might practise to get agayne the Towne of Calice, and considered with himselfe that Lom- bardes are couetous, he thought he would practise with syr Amery the Cap- taine of Calice, and he knewe he might the better do it without all suspicion because at that time they might by reason of the truce the one frankly re- sorte vnto the other. Then syr Geoffrey espyeng a conuenient time, fell secretly in communication with syr Amery for the towne of Calice. And in the ende syr Amery promised for the some of twentie thousand crownes to deliuer Sir Geoffrey the towne of Calice.

This compact was not so secretly made, but it came to the knowledge and vnderstanding of the king of Englande: wherfore the king sent for Sir Americ de Dauie to come vnto him into England to speake with hym, and so he came, and when the king sawe hym, he toke him a parte and sayd: Thou knowest well that I haue geuen thee in keeping the thing that in this worlde I loue best, next my wyfe and children, that is to saye, the Towne and Castell of Calyce, and thou hast solde it to the Frenchmen, and therefore thou hast well deserued to die. Then the Lombard kneeled doونه (and sayde) A noble king, I crye you mercy, it is true that ye haue sayde: But syz, the bargayne maye well be broken, for as yet I haue receyued neuer a penny. The king loued well the Lombard and sayde, Amery, I will that thou go forward on thy bargayn and the day and time that thou appointest to deliuer the towne let me haue true knowledg the of before: And on this condition I will forgiue thee thy trespassse. And so the Lombard returned agayne to Calice and kept his matter secret.

Then syz Geoffrey of Charney thought well to haue Calice, and assembled a certain number secretly, about a fivie hundred speares, and there were but a fewe that knewe what he purposed: And it was to be thought that he neuer made the French king a counsaile thereof, for if he had, it was not lykely that he would haue consented therevnto for breaking of the treue.

This Lombard had appointed to haue deliuered the towne and Castell of Calyce the last day of December at night, and he sent worde thereof by a brother of his vnto the king of Englande.

When the king knewe the certaine day appointed, he departed out of Englande with three hundred men of armes, and tooke shipping at Douer, and in the euening arriued at Calice, so secretly that no man knewe thereof, and went and layde his men in bushmentes in the Chambers and Towres within the Castell.

Then the king sayde to syz Gualtier Hamy, I will that ye be chiefe of this enterpryse, for I and my sonne the Prince wil fight vnder your banner.

The Lorde Geoffrey Charney, the last daye of December at night departed with all his company from Arras, and came nere to Calice about the houre of midnight, and there taried awhile abyding for his company, and in the meane tyme he sent two squires to the posterne gate of the Castell of Calice, and there they founde Sir Amery ready. Then they demaunded of him if it were time that the Lorde Geoffrey should come, and the Lombard sayde yea. Then they returned to their master and shewed him as the Lombard had sayde: Then he made his men to passe Newland Bridge in good order of battayle. Then he sent .xij. knightes with an hundreth men of armes to go and take possession of the Castell of Calice: for he thought if he might haue the Castell, he should soone get the Towne. And he deliuered to the Lorde Edward of Keny twentie thousand Crownes to pay the Lombard. And syz Geoffrey houed still in the fieldes priuely with his Banner before him. His intent was to enter into the towne by the gate, or else not, and the Lombard had let doونه the brydge of the posterne, and suffred the hundred men of armes to passe peaceably: and syz Edward at the posterne deliuered twentie thousand Crownes in a bagge to the Lombard, who sayde, I trust here be all, for I haue no leasure now to tell them, and it will be day anone. Then he cast the bagge with the Crownes into a Coffer, and sayde to the Frenchmen: come on Sirs, ye shal enter into the Dungeon, for then shall ye be sure to be Lordes of the Castell, and they went thether, and he drewe apart the barre, and the gate opened.

Within this Castell was the King of Englande wyth two hundreth speares, who issued out with their swordes and axes in their handes, cryeng Hamy,

The French men conueged into a Dungeon.

Hamy, Hamy, to the reskewe, what? weneth the Frenchmen with so fewe men to wyne the Castell of Calice? Then the Frenchmen seyng well that defence coulde not auayle them: Then they yeelded themselues prisoners, and so there were but a fewe hurte, and the rest were closed vp in the same Towre in prison.

And the English men issued out of the Castell into the towne, and mounted on their horses, for they had all the French prisoners horses. Then the Archers roade to Boleyn gate where syz Geoffrey was with his Banner before him of Goules, three skotcheons of Siluer. He had a great desyre to be the first that should enter into the towne: he sayde to the knightes that were about him: without this Lombard open the gate shortly, we are lyke to dye here for colde. In the name of God sayde Sir Depy dewere, Lombards are malicious people and subtile, he is now looking on your crownes, whether all be good or not, and to recken if he haue his whole some or no.

Therewith the king of Englande and the Prince his sonne was readie at the gate vnder the Banner of Sir Gualtier of Hamy, with dyuers other Banners, as the Erle of Stafford, the Erle of Suffolke, the Lorde John Mountagew, brother to the Erle of Salisbury, the Lorde Beauchampe, the Lorde Barkeley, and the Lord delaware: All these were Lordes and had Banners, there were no mo in that iourney.

Then the great gate was set open, and all they issued out: when the Frenchmen sawe them issue, and heard them crye Hamy to the reskewe, they knewe well they were betrayed. Then Sir Geoffrey sayde to his company, Sirs if we flie we are cleane lost: yet were we better to fight with a good courage, in hope the iourney shall be oures.

The English men heard these wordes and sayde, by saint George ye say truly, shame haue he that flieth. The Frenchmen alighted on foote, and put their horses from them, and ordered themselues in good aray of battaile.

When the king sawe that, he stood still (and sayde) let vs put our selues in order to fight, for our enimies will abyde vs. The king sent parte of hys company to Newlande Bridge, for he heard saye, that there were a great number of Frenchmen. Then thether went a .viij. Banners, and three hundred Archers, and there they founde the Lorde Honau of Frenes, and the Lorde of Creques keeping the Bridge. And betwene the Bridge and Calice there were manye Crosbowes of Saint Omers and Aye: So there was a fore fraye, and there were slaine and drowned mo then .viij. hundreth Frenchmen, for they were sone discomfited and chaced into the water. This was early in the morning, and incontinent it was day. The French men kept their ground awhile, and manye feates of armes were there done on both parties: But the Englishmen euer encreased by comming out of Calyce, and the Frenchmen discreased. Then the Frenchmen sawe well that they could not long kepe the Bridge, wherfore they that had their horses by them mounted vpon them, and shewed their horse heeles, and the Englishmen followed them in chace. There was many a man ouerthrowne, and many were taken of their owne courage, which might haue scaped if they had list.

When it was sayre day, that euery man might knowe other: Then some of the French knightes and Esquiers assembled together againe, and turned and fought manfully with the English men: So that there were some selfe against the French men.

Nowe let vs speake of the king of England, who was there unknowne to his enemies, vnder the Banner of Sir Gualter of Manny, and was on foote among his men to seeke his enemyes, who stood close together woth their speares a fure foote long. At the first meetyng, there was a sore reencountre: and the King chaunced to light vpon the Lorde Eustace of Rybamount, who was a strong and valiaunt knight, and there was a long fight betwene the King and him, that it was ioy to behold them, but at the last they were put asunder, for a great company of both partes came the same waye, and fought there fiercely together.

The frenche men did there right valiauntly: But specially the Lorde Eustace of Rybamount, who strake the king the same day two tymes on his knees: But finally the King himselfe tooke him prisoner: and so he yelded his sword to the king, and sayd, Sir knight I yeelde me vnto you as your prisoner, he knew not at that time that it was the King. And so this iourney was for the king of England: and all that were there with Sir Geoffrey, were eyther slaine or taken, for very fewe escaped. There was slaine Sir Henry of Boys, and Sir Depyn de Labarre, and Sir Geoffrey taken. Thus this iourney was achieued besyde Calice, the yere of our Lorde. 1348. the last day of the moneth of December, and in the beginnyng of the. xxij. yere of the reigne of king Edward.

When this battaile was done, the king returned againe to the Castell of Calice, and caused all the prisoners to be brought thether. Then the french men knew well that the king of England had bene there personally himselfe, vnder the Banner of Sir Gualter of Manny. The king sayde he would geue them all a Supper that night in the Castell of Calice: And when the houre of Supper was come, and the tables couered: The king and hys knightes were there every man in newe apparell: And the french men also were there, and made good cheere, though they were prisoners.

The king sate downe and the Lordes and knights about him right honourably. The Prince, Lordes and knightes of England, serued the king at the first messe. And at the second they sate downe at another table: they were all well serued and at great leasure.

Then when supper was done, and the Tables taken away: The king tarped still in the Hall with his knightes and with the frenche men, and he was bare headed, sayng a Chapelet of fine Perles that he ware on his hed. Then the king went from one to another of the french men: And when he came to Sir Geoffrey of Charney, a little he chaunged his countenance, and looked vpon him, and sayd, Sir Geoffrey ye haue geuen me occasion to loue you but a little, when ye would steale by night that thing from me which I haue so deuely bought: But yet this pleaseth me best, that I haue taken you with the maner. Ye would haue come to a better market then I came vnto, when you thought to haue had Calice for. xx. thousand Crownes: But God hath holpen me, and ye haue fayled of your purpose, and therewith the king went from him, and he gaue him neuer a worde to aunswere.

Then the king came to Sir Eustace of Rybamount, and ioyously to him he said, Sir Eustace ye are the knight that among all other are the most valiauntest liauntest that I haue seene, as well in the assaylyng of your enemye as in the defendyng of your selfe, neyther was it my chaunce to mete with any knight that euer put me to aunswere, and defende my selfe body to body as ye haue done this day, wherefore I geue you the price aboute all the knightes of my Court, by right sentence. Then the king tooke the Chapelet that was vpon his head, beyng both fayre, goodly, and riche, and sayd, Sir Eustace I geue you this Chapelet for the best doct in armes in this iourney past on cyther partie, and I desyre you to beare it this yere for the loue of me. I know wel ye be freche and amorous, and often tymes ye are among Ladyes, and Damoselles: Say wheresoeuer ye come, that I did geue it you, and I requite and discharge you of your imprisonment and raunsome, and ye shall depart to morowe if it please you.

And in the end of this yere, the plague of Pestilence reigned sore in England, but chiefly in the Citie of London, that besyde the bodies that were buryed in sundrie Churches and Churchyardes in London, there were also buryed in the Charterhouse Churchyard fiftie thousand persons and aboue.

plague and

This yere and the. xxij. day of August, dyed Philip the french king at Nogent, and was buryed in Marys: And the. xxvi. day of September folowynge, John eldest sonne to king Philip was crowned french king at Reynes, and the same day also the Queene his wife was crowned with him, and at the same tyme, the king made also manye knightes, and created Erles Marqueses, and Dukes.

This yere about the latter ende of August, a noble man of Spaine called Sir Charles, to whome King John of Fraunce had newly geuen the Erledome of Angolesme, entendyng to winne some honour vpon the English men, with a strong nauie of Spanyardes entered the English streames, and did much harme vnto king Edwardes friendes. So that the king about the tyme abouesayde met with the sayde nauie vpon the coast of Winchelsey, where betwene the king and them was a long and cruell fight, to the great losse of many people vpon both partes: But in the ende God sent vnto the king the victoery, so that he chased his enemyes, and wanne from them. xxij. of their Shippes, with many prisoners. In the ende of this yere, there were solempne Messengers sent in Ambassade to Rome, for to conclude a perfite peare betwene the two Kinges of England and of Fraunce, so that King Edward should resigne and geue vp all his title and claime that he made vnto the Crowne of Fraunce: And the french king should clerely geue vnto him all the Duchy of Guyan, with all such landes as at any time before, were taken by any of his progenitors from it. And that king Edward and his heyres kinges, should freely holde and occupie the sayde Duchie, without doynge of any homage to any french king after that day. But the conclusion of this matter was so prolonged and deferred by the Pope, that the Erle of Darby, and other which were appoynted for the King of England, returned without spending of their cause. Wherefore king Edward made newe prouision to warre vpon king John of Fraunce.

In the. xxvi. yere of the reigne of this king, the Castell of Guynes nere vnto Calice was yelden vnto the Engliche men, by the treason of a french man called Guyllam de Beauconry, for the which treason the sayde Guyllam was shortly after put to execution by the french king in the towne of Amiens.

And the same yere Sir Guy of Neale then Marshall of Fraunce with a strong companie gaue battaile vnto the Englishe men then beyng in Briteyn, in the which the sayde Sir Guy, with the Lorde of Briket, and the Chasteleyn of Beauueyes, with manie other noble men were slaine, and many taken prisoners.

The daye of here Somer.

And at this tyme was builded Trinitye hall in Cambzidge, by William Bateman, Bishop of Rozeuiche.

At this time happened throughout Englande so hote a Sommer, that many yeres after it was called the drie Sommer, for from the later ende of Marche vntill the later ende of July, then next followyng there fell little or no rayne, by reason whereof, many great inconueniences followed. And chieflye the price of Corne this yere beganne greatly to be aduanced, and the yere folowyng it was moze dere, and so lyke wise were Befes and Mottons greatly aduanced by reason of the lack of pasture and feeding, which thing happened in Fraunce as well as in Englande.

Parliament at Westminster.

The Erle of Darby was appealed befoze the French king by the Duke of Brunswike.

This yere the king called his high Court of Parliament at Westminster, and about Whitsontyde folowyng the king created the Erle of Darby, Duke of Lancaster, and Syr Raufe Stafford, Erle of Stafford. Then thys Duke of Lancaster was sent agayne ouer the Sea, where in the ende of of this yere (as sayth froyssart) he was appealed of the Duke of Brunswike, a Duke of the Countrie of Almayne, of certaine wordes that were agaynst his honour: for the which he offered to wage his battayle with the sayde Duke in the court of the french king.

Then thys Henry, which some call Henry of Bolynbroke Duke of Lancaster, purchaced his safeconduite of the french king, and kept his daye apointed for that battaile in a field called in the french, La preux Clers, where was for them ordeyned a place listid and closed in goodly wise: king John beyng there present with the greatest parte of the Nobles of Fraunce.

And there came in first into that field the afozenamed Duke of Brunswike appellaunt, and after him came the noble Duke of Lancaster, to the great honour of all Englande. And soone after (dyuers obseruances according to the lawe of armes done) and solempne othes taken, eyther of them set hys speare in the rest to haue runne the first course. But then king John of his speciall grace ceassed the matter, and tooke the quarell into his awne hands, so that eyther of them departed the field without any stroke striking: and then the french king pacified the appeale to the honour of the Duke of Lancaster although he was the french kings enemye.

And shortly after this, the sayde Duke of Lancaster, with other nobles assigned vnto hym by the king of Englande, went vnto Auinion with the Archebishop of Rone then Chauncelour of the Realme of Fraunce, and also the Duke of Burbone, and other that were apointed for the king of Fraunce to conclude a peace betweene their two princes aforesayde, who were at the Citie aforesayd and there heard at length of the election of a new Pope, then called Innocent the. vij. which also lyke vnto his predecessor was a french man bozne. In conclusion after many and great arguments made on both sides, it was there agreed that the peace betweene the two sayde kings should be kept and holden inuiolable vntill Mydsomer then next followyng.

Now for as much as the towne of Flaundyze did refuse to keepe the bandes bandes of amity that befoze time had beene made betweene the king of Englande and them, in the tyme and lyfe of Jaques Dartuell afoze mencioned: But that now they beganne to fauour the french king, therefore the king withdrew from them the Martes or Markets and staples of wolles which to their great aduantage by the procurement of the sayde Jaques de Artuell was in sundrie of their towne bled and kept. And the king caused the same to be kept in sundrie good towne of England, as Westminster, Chichester, Lyncolne, Bristow, and Cauntozburie.

Staple of Wolles kept in England.

And shortly after Easter the french king sent his eldest sonne Charles Dolphyn of Wyenne into Normandy for to take the rule of that country, and specially for to cease certaine lands and Castels, which at that day belonged vnto the king of Nauarre, which then was out of the french kings fauor for the death of Syr Charles of Spayne late Constable of Fraunce which by his meanes was murdered in a towne called Aigle in Normady. ij. yeres befoze.

And while the Dolphyn was thus bused in Normandy, he made such meane to the rulers thereof, that they graunted him ayde of thre thousand men for thre monethes at their proper costes and charges.

Of this sone after sprang such tydings, that the king of England was informed that the french king had geuen to his sonne Charles the Duchy of Normandy, with all Gascoyne and Guyan: and how the Normans had graunted to the sayde Charles thre thousande men for thre monethes to warre at their costes on the Englishmen, which (as the french boke sayth) was graunted him onely to defende the king of Nauarre, which came to Constantyne shortly after, to repossesse suche landes as the Dolphyn had leased there of his, and therefore he made warre vpon the Dolphyn.

But howsoeuer it were, in October next followyng the Prince of Wales with a great hoste entred into Gascoyne, and passed by Tholous and the ryuer of Geround and so by Carcassion, and brent the Bulwarks of that Citie, and from thence to Narbon in brennyng and spolyng all as he went.

The Prince of Wales entred into Gascoyne.

And in the same yere king Edward with his power landed at his towne of Calice, where he rested hym all the winter followyng.

Ye haue heard in the last yere that the Prince of Wales with an army of men went ouer into Gascoigne, where he did many a noble dede and feate of armes, and tooke many towne and Castels and subdued his enemies with great courage. At the last the french king made suche great prouision to encounter with hym, that there was no remedy but he must fight with hym. Wherefore he made all the prouision he could, and sayde courageously for the comfortyng of his men beyng God wote but a handefull in comparison to the french armie, well syz sayth he, although we be but fewe in regarde to the multitude of our enemies: Let vs not be abashed therefore, for the victorie lyeth not in the multitude of the people, but where it pleaseth almighty God to geue it. If it fortune that the iourney be oures, we shall be honoured thorough the whole worlde: And if we die in a right and good quarell, I haue a king to my father and I haue brethren, and you haue good friends and kinsmen that will reuenge our deatnes. Therefore Syz, for Gods sake take the good heartes of Englishmen vnto you this daye, for if God will, this daye shall ye see me doe the parte of a good knight. These wordes and suche other that the Prince spake, did greatly encourage his people. The Prince Edwards comonly called the black Prince was of great courage.

Prince

Prince had placed himselfe with his armie among the Wyndes and had closed in the weakest parte thereof with the carriages.

Now that the time of battaile approached, the Prince hauyng by hym the Lorde Sir John Chandos and the Lord James Audelay, who assisted him and neuer went from him all the time of the battaile. But the Lorde Audelay kneeled downe (and sayde vnto the Prince) Sir I haue serued alwayes truely my Lorde your father and you also, and will doe as long as I lyue. I saye this because I made once a vowe that the first battaile that epyther the king your father or any of his children should be at, heu that I would be one of the first setters on, or else to die in the trauaile: Therefore I beseeche your grace as in rewarde for anye seruire that euer I did to the king your father or to you, that you will giue me licence to depart from you, and to set my selfe there as I may accomplishe my vowe.

The Prince agreed to his desyre, and sayde, Sir James, God ayde you so this day, that ye may proue the best knight of all other, and so tooke hym by the hande. And the knight departed from the Prince, and went to the foremost front of all the battayles, beyng only accompanied with foure Esquiers in whom he put great trust & confidence, and they promised not to fayle him.

This Lorde James was a right sage and Vertuous knight, and by him was much of the hoste ordered and gouerned. Thus Sir James was ready to fight in the front of the Battaile, against the battayles of the Marshalles of Fraunce. Then the battaile began of all partes, and the battayles of the Marshalles of Fraunce approached, and they set forth that were appointed to breake the array of the Archers: They entred on horsebacke into the way where the great hedges were on both sydes set full of Archers: Als soone as the men of armes entered, the Archers beganne to shoote on both sydes, and did slay and hurt knightes and horses a great number. So that the horses when they felt the sharpe Arrowes, they would in no wise go forward, but dyue backe and flang, and tooke on so fiercely, that many of them fell vpon their maisters: So that for preece they could neuer rise againe. In so much, that the Marshalles battaile could neuer come at the Prince: But yet certein knightes and Esquiers that were well horsed, passed through the Archers, and thought to haue approached to the Prince, but they could not. The Lord Audely with his foure Esquiers was in the front of that battaile, and there did maruelles in Armes, and by great prowes he came & fought with Sir Arnold Dandrehen, vnder his aboue Banner, and there they fought long together, and Sir Arnold was there soze handled. The battaile of the Marshalles began to disorder, by reason of the shotte of the Archers, with the ayde of the men of armes, who came in among them, and slue of them, and did what they lust. And there was the Lorde Arnold Dandrehen taken prisoner by other men, and not by the Lorde Audelay, for that day he neuer tooke prisoner, but alwayes fought and went on his enemies. Also on the French part the Lorde John Cleremount fought vnder his aboue Banner as long as he could endure, but there he was beaten downe, and coude not be relieued nor ransomed, but was slaine without mercie. So within a short space the Marshalles battayles were discomfited, for they fell one vpon another, and could not go forward. And the Frenchmen that were behinde, and could not come forward, reculed backe, and came on the battaile of the Duke

The Lorde James Audley his vowe to the Prince.

A fore and cruell battaile called the battaile of Porters.

Duke of Normandy, the which was great and thicke, and were on foote, but anone they began to open behynde. For when they knewe that the Marshalles battail was discomfited, they tooke their horses and departed he that might best make way to be gone: Also they sawe a rowte of Englishe men comyng downe a little hill on horseback, and many Archers with them, who brake in on the one syde of the Dukes battaile. To say the truth, the Archers did their company that day great seruice, for they shot so thicke, that the French men wist not on what syde to take hede, and little and little the English men wanne ground on them. And when the men of Armes of England saw that the Marshalles battaile was discomfited, and that the Dukes battaile began to disorder & open, they lept then on their horses, the which they had redy by them. Then they assembled together, & cryed Saint George. And the Lorde Chandos sayde to the Prince: Sir, take your horse and ryde forth, thys iourney is yours: God is this day with you, and fighteth for you, and let vs go vnto the French Kinges battaile, for there lyeth all the soze of this matter. I thinke verely by his valyannesse that he will not flie, I trust by the helpe of God and Saint George we shall haue him, if he be well fought withall: And Sir in the begynnyng of the battaile I heard you say, that this day I should see you a good knight, nowe is the tyme therefore, folowe it. The Prince sayd, let vs go forth, ye shall not see me this day returne backe, and then sayd the Prince, aduance forth your Banner in the name of God and Saint George: The knight that bare it, did his commaundement. There was then a soze battaile and a dangerous, and many a man ouerthrowne, and he that was once downe could not be relieued againe without great succour & ayde. Then the Prince and his company gaue the onset of the battaile of the Duke of Athens Constable of Fraunce, and there was many a man slaine and cast to the earth. And as the French men fought in companies they cryed (Moune ioye Saint Dionice) and the Englishe men, Saint George. Anone the Prince with his companie met with the battaile of the Almaynes, whereof the Erle of Salesbruce, the Erle of Mosco, and the Erle Meydo were Capitaines: But in a short space they were put to flight. The Archers shot so wholly together, that none durst come in their dangers, they slue many a man that could not come to ransome, and the aforesayde thre Erles were slaine, and diuerse other knightes and Esquiers of their company. Then the Kinges battaile came on the Englishe men, there was a soze fight, and many a harde stroke both geuen and receyued: The French king and his yongest sonne mette with the battaile of the Englishe Marshalles, the Erle of Warwike, and the Erle of Suffolke, and with them of Gascoynes, the Captall of Buz, the Lorde of Pompyers, the Lorde Amery of Charre, the Lorde of Mucident, the Lorde of Langram, and the Lorde de la Strade. To the French partie there came time ynough, the Lorde John of Landas, and the Lorde of Woodney, they alighted on foote, and wente into the kinges battaile. And a little besyde fought the Duke of Athens, constable of Fraunce, and a little aboute him the Duke of Burbon, and many good knightes of Burbonys, and of Picardie with him. And a little on the other syde, there were the Doytynnes, the Lorde de Pons, the Lorde of Hartney, the Lorde of Dampmar, the Lorde of Montabatton, the Lorde of Suggers, the Lorde John Sayntre, the Lorde Argenton, the

In another part there was the Erle of Wantadowze, and of Mountpencer, the Lozde James of Burbone, the Lozde John de Arthoys, and also the Lord James his brother, the Lord Arnold of Cernolle called the Archepriest, armed for the yong Erle of Manson. And of Auvergne, there was the Lord Marcuell, the Lord de la Towze, the Lozde of Chalenton, the Lozde of Mountagetw, the Lozde of Rocheford, the Lozde de la Chayze, the Lozde Dacheone. And of Limosin, there was the Lozde Delmall, the Lozde of Nozwell, and the Lord of Piers Buffier. And of Picardie, there was the Lozde William of Nerle, the Lord Arnold of Reinewall, the Lozde Geoffrey of Saint Digier, the Lozde of Chamy, the Lozde of Heley, the Lozde of Mounsaunt, the Lord of Hangies, and diuers other. And also in the kinges battaile was the Erle Douglas of Scotland, who fought a season right valiantly : But when he sawe the discomfiture, he departed and saued himselfe, for in no wise he would be taken of the English men, he had rather haue bene slaine.

On the English part the Lord James Budeley with the ayde of his foure squiers, fought alwayes in the chiefe of the battaile : he was sore hurt in the bodye and in the visage, but yet as long as his breth serued him, he fought. At the last towarde the ende of the battaile, hys foure squiers tooke and brought him out of the field, and layed him vnder a hedge side for to refresh he hym : and they bndarmed him, and bounde by his woundes as well as they coude.

On the french part, King John was that day a full right good knight, if the fourth parte of his men had done their deuoyzes as well as he did, the iourney had bene his by all lykelyhood : howbeit they were all slaine and taken that were there, except a very fewe that were with the king, which saued themselves by flyng.

There were slaine the Duke Peter of Burbone, the Lozde Guysshard of Beauieuwe, the Lozde of Landas, and the Duke of Athens Constable of Fraunce, the Bishop of Chalons in Champeyne, the Lozde William of Pece, the Lozde Eustace of Rybamount, the Lozde de la Towze, the Lozde William of Mountagetw, s<sup>r</sup> Guyuenton of Chambley, s<sup>r</sup> Baudryn de la house and many other as they fought by companies. And there were taken prisoners, the Lozde of Woodney, the Lozde of Dompadoz, and the Archepriest sore hurt, the Erle of Vandos, s<sup>r</sup> Loys of Melwall, the Lord Piers Buffier and the Lord of Senetache : There were at that bzont slaine and taken mo then two hundzeth knightes.

This battaile was fought nere vnto Poytiers in the fields of Beaumont and Halpertnes, the which was great and perillous, and manye worthie deedes of armes were there done that came not at all to my knowledge, sayth Froissart. The fighters on both partes endured muche traualle and paine : King John with his owne hands did that day like a valiant Prince, he had an Acre in his hande, wherewith he fought in the breaking of p<sup>r</sup>ease to haue come to the Prince, very courageously and manfully. And nere vnto the french king was taken the Erle of Tankeruyll, Sir James of Burkon Erle of Ponthieu, and the Lozde John of Arthoys Erle of Ewe, Ewe. And a little aboue that vnder the Banner of y<sup>e</sup> Capitol of Buz was taken s<sup>r</sup> Charles of Arthoys, & diuers other knightes and squires. The chace endured to the gates of Poytiers : There were manye slaine and beaten downe horse and man, for they of Poytiers had closed their gates, & would suffer none to enter : wherefore in the streete before the gate, was a great & horrible murder, and many men hurt and beaten downe : The frenchmen yelded themselves as farre off as they might know an Englishman. There were diuers English Archers that had foure, fiue, or sixe prisoners, the Lozde of Pons a great Baron of Poyton was there slayne, and many other knightes and squires. And there was taken the Erle of Rocheuart, the Lord of Damnaement, the Lozde of Bertney and of Faynton, the Lord of Motendze and the Lord Saint John: But he was so sore hurt that he neuer had helth after, he was accompted for one of the best knightes in fraunce. And there was lefte for deade among other deade men, the Lozde Richard Dangle, who fought that daye by the king right valiantly, and so did the Lord Charney, on whom was great prayse, because he bare the souereign Banner of the kinges : his awne Banner was also in the fiede, the which was Coules three Scotcheons Silver.

So manye Englishmen and Gascoynes came to that parte, that perforce they opened the kings battaile, so that the french men were so mingled among their enemies, that some time there was fiue men vpon one Gentleman. There was taken the Lord of Dompadour, and the Lord Bartholomew de Brunnes : and there was slaine Sir Geoffrey of Charney with the kinges Banner in his handes. Also the Lozde Reynould Cobham slue the Erle of Dammarcyn. Then was there great p<sup>r</sup>eailling to take the king, and suche as knewe him cryed vnto him and sayde, Sir, yeelde you, or else ye are but dead. At that tyme there was a knight of Saint Omers retayned in wages with the king of Englande called s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Morbeck, who had serued the king of Englande, fiue yere before, because in his youth he had forseyted the Realme of Fraunce for a murder that he did at Saint Omers. It happened so well for this knight, that he was next to the king when they were about to take him, and he stepped forth into the p<sup>r</sup>ease, and by strength he came to the french king and sayde vnto him in good french (Sir yeelde you) the king behelde the knight and sayde vnto him, to whom shall I yeelde me? where is my Cosyn the Prince of Wales, if I myght see him I would speake with him, Sir Denyce answered and sayde, Sir he is not here, but yeelde you to me, and I will bring you to him : who be you quoth the king? Sir sayth he, I am Denyce of Morbeck, a knight of Arthoys : But I serue the king of England, because I am banished the realme of Fraunce, and I haue forsayted all that I had there : Then the king gaue him his right Gauntlet, sayeng I yeelde me vnto you. There was a great p<sup>r</sup>ease about the king, for euerye man cryed that he had taken the king, so that the king coude not go forwarde wyth hys young sonne Phillip wyth him for the p<sup>r</sup>ease.

The prince of Wales, who was courageous and cruell as a Lyon, toke that day great pleasure to fight and chase his enemies : The Lozde John Chandoz, who was with him of all that daye and neuer left him, nor neuer tooke heede of taking anye prisoner, at the ende of the battaile sayde to the the Prince, Sir, it were good that you rested here, and set your Banner a high in this Bushe, that your people maye draw hether, for they be soze scattered abroad, neyther can I see any mo Banners or Pennons on the French partie: wherefore sye, rest and refrethe you, for ye are soze chafed.

Then the princes Banner was set by high on a Bushe, and Trumpets and Clarions beganne to sounde, and then the Prince did of his Basenet, and the knightes for his body, and they of his Chamber were readie about him, and pight a Read pavilion presently, and then drinke was brought unto hym and to suche Lordes as were about him, who still encreased as they came from the chase, and their prisoners with them.

And when the two Marchalles were come to the Prince, he demaunded of them, and if they heard any tydings of the French king: and they answered and sayde, Sir we heare none of certaintie, but we thinke verily that he is eyther dead or taken, for he is not gone out of the battayles. Then the prince sayde to the Erle of Warwike, and to Sir Reignold of Cobham: Sirs I requyre you to go forth and hearken and inquire a truth, & returne agayne so soone as you can. These two Lordes tooke their horses and departed from the Prince, and roade by a little hill to looke about them. And they perceaved a flocke of men of armes coming together right verily: There was the French King on foote in great perill, for Englishmen and Gascons were his masters, they had taken him from Sir Denyce Morbeck perforce, and such as were the strongest sayde, I have taken him, nay quoth another I have taken him, so they strave who should have him: Then the French King, to eschewe that perill, spake unto them and sayde, Sirs, strive not, leade me and my sonne curteously to my Cofyn the prince, and fall not out for my taking, for I am so great a Lorde as maye make you all riche: the which wordes did somewhat pacifie them: howbeit, still as they went, they made ryot and braboled for the taking of the King.

When the aforesayde Lordes sawe and heard the noyes and strife amongest them, they came unto them and sayde, Sirs, what is the matter that ye strive for? Sir sayde ore of them, it is for the French King, who is here taken prisoner, and there are mo then .x. knightes and squirees that challenge the taking of him and of his sonne: Then the two Lordes entered into the prease and caused every man to drawe a back, and commaunded them in the Princes name upon paine of their heades to make no more noyes, nor to approche to the king any neerer, without they were commaunded. Then every man gave some to the Lordes, and they alighted, and did their reverence unto the king, and so brought him and his sonne quietly unto the Prince of Wales.

Allone as the two Marchalles were departed from the Prince, as before you have heard: Then the Prince demaunded of the knightes that were about him, whether any of them could tell him of the Lord James Audley: and answer was made, that he was soze hurt, and lay in a Litter, not farre off. Nowe truly sayde the Prince, I am sozy for his hurt: But go knowe if he may be brought hether, or else I will go see him where he is. Then two knightes came to the Lord Audley, and sayd, sir, the Prince hath earnestly asked for you, and is very desyrous to see you, and sayth that if you cannot come to him, he will come to you. A sye quoth the knight, I thanke the prince that that will thinke on so pooze a knight as I am. And then he called, viij. of his servauntes to beare him in his Litter to the place where the Prince was. Then the Prince tooke him in his armes and kissed him, and made to him most lounyng countenance, and great cheere (and sayd) sir James I ought greatly to honour you, for by your valyantes ye have this day obteyned the commendation and fame by all our iudgements to be the most valiant knight of all other that fought at this battaile. O Sir, sayde the knight, ye say your pleasure, I would it were so, but if I have this day put forth my selfe in your service (and for the accomplishment of the bowe that before I had made) it ought not to be reputed to my prowes or force, but to dutie. Sir James, sayd the Prince, I and all ours repute and declare you in this battaile to be the best doer in Armes: And to the entent to furnishe you the better in the warres, and to encourage you to follow the same, I retaine you for ever to be my knight with five hundred markes of yerely reuenewes, the which I will assigne you out of myne inheritance in England. Sir sayde the knight God make me able to deserue the great goodnesse that ye shew me, and so he tooke his leaue of the Prince, for he was very weake.

So soone as sir James Lorde Audley was brought to his lodgyng, he sent for sir Peter Audley his brother, and for the Lorde Bartholomewe of Bunes, the Lorde Stephen of Gouseton, the Lord of Wyllly, and the Lord Raufe Ferrers: All these were of his Linage. And he called before them his foure Esquiers that had served him that day so well and truly: And then he sayde to the Lordes: Where it hath pleased my Lorde the Prince to geue me this day .v. C Markes of yerely reuenewes, for the which gift I have done him small service with my body: Sirs, sayde he to the Lordes, beholde here these foure Esquiers, who have alwayes served me truly, and specially thys day, for the honour that I have, is by their valiantnesse, and therefore I am bound to reward them. Wherefore, here before you all, I geue and resigne into their handes the gift that my Lorde Prince hath geuen me of five hundred markes of yerely reuenewes, to them and to their heyres for ever, in like maner as it was geuen me, and I cleerly disenherite my selfe thereof, and enherite them to hold the same, without any variaunce or contradiction.

The Lordes and other that were present, every of them behelde other, and sayde among themselves, this commeth of a noble and valiant courage, thus to depart with so great a gift: and they answered him with one voyce, Sir, be it as God will, we will beare witness in this behalfe, when & wheresoever we become, and so they tooke their leaue and departed.

The next day as the king departed and was going in his journey, it was tolde the king howe the Lorde Audley had geuen to his foure Esquiers the gift of the five hundred Markes that he had geuen unto him. Then the Prince sent for him, and he was brought unto the Prince in his Litter, who receyved him right curteously (and sayde) Sir James, we have knowledge that the reuenewes that we gaue you, alsoone as ye came to your lodgyng, ye gaue the same to foure Esquiers: We would knowe why ye did so, and whether ye thought the gift sufficient and worthie for you or not? Sir sayde the knight, it is of truth that I have geuen it to them, and I will utter unto you the cause why I did so: Those foure Esquiers have of long tyme served me well and truly in many great daungers: And Sir at this tyme, they serued me in such wise, that if they had neuer done any thing else, I was and am bound towarde them, and befoze this day they neuer had any thing of me in rewarde. And Sir, as ye know, I was and am but a man alone, but by the courage, ayde, and comfort of them, I tooke on me to accomplishe my bowe to you befoze reherfed, and certeinly I had bene deade in the battayle if they had not beene. Wherefoze sir, when as nature and duetye dyd binde me to consider the loue that they bare vnto me, I should haue shewed my selfe to muche vnthankfull if I had not rewarded them: And God I thanke him, I haue and shall haue inough to mainteine my pooze estate, as long as I liue, and I feare nothing lesse then lacke of substance. And forasmuch as I haue done this without your licence and knowledg, I humbly beseech you to pardon me, and Sir be you well assured, that both I and my Esquiers, will serue you as well and as truly as euer we did.

Then the Prince sayd, Sir James, I must needes commend you very much in all your doings, chiefly for your valiantnes shewed in this battaille: and for the good seruice of these Esquiers, whome ye haue so much praised, I agree and allowe to them your gift, and I will render againe to you sixe C. markes in the lyke maner as ye had the other graunted vnto you befoze.

Thus this battaille ended as you haue heard, which was fought the xxij. day of September two leagues from Hoytiers. And it beganne in the morning, and ended at noone: But as then the Englishmen were not returned from the chase of their enemies. Therefore, as ye haue heard, the Princes Banner stood in a bushe to drawe all his men together, but it was night befoze all came from the chase. And as it was reported, there were slaine all the flowre and chualtrie of Fraunce. And there was taken wyth the King and the Lord Philip his sonne. xviij. Erles, beside Barons, knights, and squiers, and there were slaine. v. or. vi. thousand one and other.

When euery man was come from the chase, they had as manye prisoners as the whole armie of the Englishmen were twice in number. Wherefoze it was agreed and concluded among them, because of the great charge and doubt to keepe so manye prisoners, that they should put manye of them to raunsome incontinent in the fielde, and so they did. And the prisoners founde the Englishmen and Gascons right curteous and gentle vnto them. And all that night the prince with his armie and prisoners laye in the fielde, and euery manne made good cheere vnto his prisoner, for that day whoso euer tooke any prisoner, he was cleere his, and might quyte and raunsome him at his pleasure.

All suche as were at this battayle, were all made riche with honour and goodes, as well by raunsoming of prisoners, as by wyning of Golde, Siluer, plate, and Jewels, that was there found in the spoyle. There was no man that did set anye thing by riche harneys, whereof there was great plente, for the Frenchmen came thether very richly besene, wenyng to haue obteyned the glorie of that iourney.

When night came, the prince made to the French King and his sonne, and to the other Lordes that were taken prisoners, a supper. And first the Prince placed the French king and his sonne, the Lorde James of Burbone, the Lorde John de Arthoys, the Erle of Tankerupll, the Erle of Stampes, the Erle of Dampmartyn, the Erle of Graupll, and the Lorde of of Partenay to sit all at one borde, and other Lordes knightes and squires at other Tables. And the prince himselfe serued all that supper time, neither would he sit downe for no request that the French king coulde make vnto him: For he sayde, he was not meete to sit at that table with so great and high a prince as the French King was. And then he sayde to the King, Sir for Gods sake be not sad nor shewe not anye heauie countenaunce, for though God thys daye hath not consented to folow your will: yet Sir surely the King my father I dare boldly say will beare you so much honor and amitie as he maye doe, and I doubt nothing but that ye shall so reasonably accorde and agree, that ye shall be friendes for euer together. And sye mee thinketh that ye ought to reioyce, though the iourney be not as ye would haue had it, for this daye ye haue wonne the high renowne of Prooves, and haue this daye in valyauntnesse exceeded all other of your partie. Sir, I speake not this to mock you, for all that be on oure partie and sawe euery mannes deedes, doe plainely agree and conclude in one sentence to geue you the Chapelet. Therewith the French men beganne to muttor, and sayde among themselves, the prince had spoken nobly, and by all coniectures he was lyke to proue a noble and worthe prince, if God did sende him lyfe.

When supper was done, euery man went to his lodging with their prisoners, the next daye in the morning when euery thing was readie trusted by, then they tooke their horses and roade towarde Hoytiers. The same night there was come to Hoytiers the Lord of Roy with an hundred speares he was not at the battail, but he met the Duke of Normandy nere to Chauigny, and the Duke sent him to Hoytiers to keepe the towne, butill they heard other tydings.

When the Lorde of Roye knewe that the English men were comyng so nere the Citie: he caused euery man to be armed, and euery man to go to his defence to the walles, Towres and gates: and the Englishmen passed by without anye approchyng, for they were so laden with Golde, Siluer, plate, Jewels and prisoners that in their returning they assaulted no fortes.

They thought it much if they coulde bring the French King and other prisoners with all their spoyle in safetie to Bourdeaur. And they roade but small iourneys because of their prisoners and carriages, so that they roade in a whole daye not past foure or fiue leagues at the most, and lodged euer betimes, and roade close together in good aray, sayng the Marshalles battayles, who roade euer befoze with fiue hundred men of armes to open the passages as the Prince should passe. But they met with no encounters, for euery man was so afrayde that they were fled to the Fortresses.

Thus the Prince and his company did so muche, that they passed thorough Hoyteau and Kaynton without daunmage, and came to Blay, and there passed the ryuer of Geron, & arryued in the good City of Bourdeaur.

It cannot be exprest what great feasting and cheere they of the Citie and the Clergie made to the Prince, and how honorably they were there receaued. The prince brought the French king into the Abbey of Saint Androis, and there they lodged both, the King in the one parte and the prince in the other.

And here were many chaloners of the French King to be their prisoner: But in the ende, partly by the confession of the French king, and partly by

by right of armes and tokens shewed by Sir Denyce Morbeck, it was thought his right: but notwithstanding for the appealing of all thinges the prince differred the iudgement of the matter to his father the king, when they shoulde come into Englande. And yet in the meane season, the prince secretly caused two thousande Nobles to be deliuered to Syr Denyce Morbeck to maintaine his estate.

Great ioy made in England for the taking of the French king.

31

The Prince of Wales returned into England with the French king and his other prisoners.

In England when newes came of the victorie of the battaile of Poitiers, and of the taking of the French king, there was great ioy and gladnesse, and great solemnities were made in all churches, Cities, and Townes, throughout all the Realme.

Nowe approached the tyme that the Prince of Wales had made prouision of Ships and furniture to the same, for the conueyaunce and bringing ouer of the French king, and his other Prisoners into England. And when he had all thynges in a redinesse, he called vnto him the Lorde Dalbert, the Lorde Masident, the Lorde Laspare, the Lorde of Dunvers, and the Lorde of Rosen, and gaue them commaundement to kepe the Countrie there vntill his returne againe.

Then he tooke the Sea, and certaine Lordes of Gascoyne with him. The French king was in a vessell by himselfe to be the more at his ease, and was accompanied with two hundreth men of armes, and two thousand Archers. For it was shewed the Prince that the thre Estates, by whome the Realme of Fraunce was gouerned, had layde in Normandy, and Crotuye two great armyes, to the entent to meete with him, and to get the French king out of his handes if they might. But there appered no such matter, and yet they were on the sea. xi. dayes, and on the. xij. day they arriued at Sandwich. Then they issued out of their Ship, and landed and lay there all that night, and taryed there two dayes after to refrefhe them: And on the thirde day they roade to Cauntorbury.

The French king landed at Sandwich

When the king of England knewe of their commyng, he commaunded the Citezens of London to prepare themselves and their Citie, and to make the same seemely and meete to receyue such a man as the French king was, which the Citezens of London did accordyngly.

The French king is honourably receyued into London.

And from Cauntorbury they came to Rochester, and there taryed a day, and from Rochester to Dartford, and there taryed a day, and from thence the next day to London, where they were honourably receyued, and so they were in euery good towne as they passed.

The French king roade through London on a white Courser well apparelled: and the Prince on a little blacke Hobby by him. Thus the French king was conueyed along the Citie vntill he came to the Sauoy, the which house apperteyned to the heritage of the Duke of Lancaster. And there the French king kept his house a long season, and often tymes the king and Queene came thether to see him, and made him great feasting and cheere.

An Ambassade sent from the Pope to increase a peace.

Soone after by the commaundement of Pope Innocent the sixt, there came into Englande the Lorde Taylleran, Cardinall of Piergozt, and the Lorde Nicholas, Cardinall of Dargell. They treated for a peace betwene the two kinges, but nothing came to effect: But yet at the last a truce betwene the two kinges & all their assistentes was concluded for to endure vnto the feast of Saint John baptist, 1359. that is to say, for thre yeres. And out of this truce was excepted the Lorde Philip of Nauerre and his alyes, the Countesse of Mountford, and the Duchie of Britaine.

Anone after, the French king was remoued from the Sauoy vnto the Castell of Windsor, and all his householde, and went on hunting and halwing there at his pleasure, and the Lorde Philip his sonne with him: but all the other prisoners abode stil at London, and yet went to see the king at their pleasure, and were receyued onely vpon their faythes.

In the latter ende of this yere, sayth Fabian, the king did holde a royall Justes in Smithfielde in London, and many a noble feate of Armes was there done to the great honour of the king and of all the realme of England. At the which disport were present, the king of England, and the French king and the king of Scottes his prisoners, with many noble Estates of all the thre prouinces or Kingdomes: whereof the greater number of the straungers were then prisoners.

A Joutes holden in Smithfielde.

Ye haue heard befoze of the taking of the king of Scottes prisoner, by the Queene in the tyme that king Edward was occupied about the siege of Calice, which now was. xi. yeres past and more. And so soone as the aforesayde Cardinales had concluded a truce betweene the king of England and the French king, they also accompanied with the bishop of Saint Andrewes in Scotland, fell to a treatie with the king of England, for the deliuerance of the king of Scottes. And the same was concluded in this maner.

1357

A truce of peace concluded betwene the French king and the king of Englande.

That the king of Scottes should neuer after arme him selfe against the king of England in his realme, nor counsaile, nor consent to any of his subiectes to arme them, nor to grieue nor make warre against England.

Also the king of Scottes after his returne into his realme, should endeavour himselfe with all diligence that his people should agree, that the realme of Scotland should holde in fee, and do homage to the king of England. And if the realme would not agree thereto: Yet the king of Scottes to swere solemnly to keepe good peace with the king of Englande, and to binde himselfe and his Realme to paye within. x. yeres after, five hundreth thousande Nobles as froissart sayth: But Fabian sayth one hundreth thousande Markes. And at the summoning of the king of England, to sende good pledges and hostages for the same: as the Erle of Douglas, the Erle of Moray, the Erle of Mare, the Erle of Surlant, the Erle of Fife, the Baron of Wersley, and Sir William of Caumoyle. And all these to abide in England as prisoners and hostages for the king their Lorde, vnto the tyme that the seuerall paymentes of the money aforesayd were fully contented and payde.

The Scottish kinges ransome.

Of these ordinaunces and bondes, were made instrumentes publiques, and letters patentes, sealed by both the kinges.

When all these thinges were ordered and done, then the Scottish king departed and went into his realme, & his wife Queene Isabell sister to king Edward, with him. And when he came within his realme, he was honorably receyued, and he lay at Saint Johns towne vpon the ryuer of Tyne, while his Castell of Edenburgh was newly reedified.

The Scottish king and his wife departed into Scotland.

Now befoze the day of the truce last concluded with Fraunce, were fully expired, the warre was newly begon. But anone after that, a peace was made betweene the king of Nauarre, and the Duke of Normandy.

betwene the French king and the king
of England.

French king, and the Lord Jaques of Burbon met at London, & they foure beyng alone together in counsaile, agreed vpon a peace vpon certein articles written in a letter, and sent the saue into Fraunce to the Duke of Normandie. When the Duke had receyued these letters, he demaunded counsaile of the king of Nauarre who then was present with him, and he counsailed him that the Prelates and Nobles of Fraunce, and the good tobones should assemble themselves, and to say their mindes therein: the which thing was done. And it seemed to the king of Nauarre, and to the Duke, and to his, and to all the counsaile of the Realme, that the sayde treatie was to greivous to be borne: Wherefore they answered all with one voyce, that the peace and conditions cōteyned in that letter, was so preiudicial to them & to the realme, that they yet would endure greater mischiefe then they had done, rather then in such wise to minish and abace the state of Fraunce: and sayd also that they would rather suffer their king to lie still in England.

And when the French king vnderstood howe the Realme of Fraunce would not agree to his appointment he sayd. A sonne Charles: ye be counsailed by the king of Nauarre, who deceaucth you, and will deceaue suche it. as you be.

A noble and courageous Prince.

And when the King of Englande knew what answer was brought, he sayde: Before winter be past I will enter into Fraunce, in purssuant and valiaunt maner, and there will abyde so long tyll I haue an ende of thys warre, or else peace at my pleasure and to myne honour, and then he made the greatest prouision for warre, that ever he made.

The same season, about the middes of August, the Lorde John of Craon Archebishop of Reynes, and they of the Citie of Paris, and of the Countie thereabout, with certaine knightes and squires of the Countie of Rochell and Laon, went and layde siege to the Castell of Koucy, and therelate five weekes. And then they within yeilded by their lyues and goodes saued, and to go whether they list.

And of this they had letters patents sealed by the Archbishop, by the Erle Porcien and the Erle of Brayne: But for all that, when they departed, the commons that were there, rose against them and slue the most parte of them, for all the Lordes, and they had much paine to saue the Capitaine called Hankyn Frauncois. And thus the Erle of Koucy had agayne his awne Castell.

Sir Robert
Knolles.
Sir James
Dyke.
Thomlyn
Foulke.

And in this tyme (sayth Fabian) Sir Robert Knolles and Sir James Dyke Englishmen warred in Briteyne, and with the helpe of one Thomlyn Fowlke, they came earely in a morning vnto a towne that was nere vnto Ancore called Regennes, which then was in the rule of the Englishmen and out of that towne they tooke more strength and went streight to Ancore being within two English myles, and scaled the walles with ladders, and quit them so manfully that they had the rule of the towne before the Sunne ryng. And in that Castell was taken prisoner Sir Gyllam de Chalyn the sonne of the Erle of Ancerre, his wyfe and many other.

Ancore taken

In taking of which towne and Castell, few were slayne, howbeit there came of armed men aboue to thousand to defend the towne, but it was taken before they came. Then the Englishmen searched so neere, that as the common report went, they founde Jewels as though they had bene priue to the hyding

hyding of them, and they were of great value: Among the which they found certaine skinnes of Fures which were valued at v. M. Mottons of Gold.

Mottons of Golde.

The Motton of Golde was a coyne bled in Fraunce and Briteyn, and is of the value of five shyllings sterlyng.

When the Englishmen had pilled and spoyled the towne by the space of viij. dayes, and ransomed such as were of substance: Then they shewed vnto the rulers of the towne, that they would set it on fyre, except they would geue vnto them a certayne some of money. For the which the rulers, after conference had among themselves, agreed to geue the English Capitaines, xl. thousand Mottons and lx. pearles valued at ten thousande Mottons, the which fiftie thousand Mottons amounted neere vnto. xij. thousand and five hundred pounde sterlyng.

The king of Englande in all this tyme made his prouision for his voyage into Fraunce, suche and so great as had not beene sene before: For he had sent into Almain to al the Lordes of the Empire that serued him before, and they came at their daye appointed vnto Calice, and there came a great number mo then were required, for they came of themselves, vpon hope and gayne of the spoyle of Fraunce, and they taried for the king, from the beginning of August vntill October followyng. And to save truth, they taried so long, that by reason victuals wared skant and dere there were many of them that were fayne to sell the best Jewels they had.

Then the king of Englande sent ouer before the Duke of Lancaster with foure hundred speares and two thousande Archers. And when the Duke came to Calice, the Lordes that were straungers made great ioy and were glad of him, and demaunded tydings of the Kinges comming. The Duke excused the king and sayde that all his prouision was not full ready: and he sayde vnto them, gentle lordes to tarie here is to no purpose, I will ryde forth into Fraunce and see what we can finde there, and I pray you to ryde forth with me, and I will deliuer you a certayne some of money to pay your costes in your lodgings, and ye shall haue furniture of victuall to carie with you. And the Lordes graunted the Duke, and so roade forth and passed by Saint Omers, they were a two thousande speares, beside Archers and other footemen, and at the last came to Mount Eloy a good Abbey and a riche neere to Arras, and there taried foure dayes to refrethe them and their hoxles. From thence they went to Cambrey and there made a great assault, but they within defended themselves valiauntly by the ayde and comfort of the Erle of Saint Paule. And when the Englishmen sawe that nothing was there to be had, they departed and went ouer the ryuer of Some, and came to a Towne called Cheresey, where they founde great plentie of Bread and Wyne. And here the Duke had knowledge that the king was arryued at Calice, who had sent him worde that he and all his companie should come back agayne to him. And then the Duke and his companie returned toward Calice & met with the king by the way, within foure leagues of Calice. And with the king were a great company of Lordes both straungers and other, whose names I ouerpasse. And when the king and the Duke and all their companie were met, the company was so great, that all the Countie was couered with them. And there the Almaynes, Perceuares, Brabanters, Behemoyes, they altogether shewed vnto the king how they

they had spent all their goodes, horses and harnesses solde. So that little or nothing was left them to doe him seruire, for which purpose they came: neyther had they wherewith to beare their charges home agayne into their countreies, wherefore they desyred his noblenesse to haue some consideration of them. The king answered and sayd, how he was not as then readie to geue them a playne aunswere: But sayde, Sirs, I thinke ye be soze trauayled, wherefore go your wayes and refrethe you two or thre dayes in Calice, and this night or to morow I will take counsaile and send you such an aunswere that of reason ye will be content withall.

Then these straungers departed from the king and from the Duke, and roade towarde Calice, and they had not ryd halfe a league, but they met a great multitude of cariages. And after them came the Prince of Wales, nobly and richely besene and all his company: whereof there were such a number, that all the Countrey was couered with them. And the Prince roade a soft pace readie raunged in battaile, as though they should incontinent haue fought. Thus the prince roade euer a league or two after the kinges hoste, and euer the cariages went betweene both the hostes, the which order the straungers lyked meruelously well.

When these straungers had well behelde this company, and had reuerently saluted the prince and suche Lordes as were with him, and the prince louingly receaued them, as he could doe it right well. Then in taking their leaue of him, they shewed him their necessitie, desyring him to consyder of them, and he promised them so to doe.

So the straungers roade on vntill they came to Calice, and the second day after the king sent them their aunswere by three worthy knights, which was that the king had not brought sufficient treasure with him to pay all that they desyred, and also to perforce the enterprize that he hath taken in hand: But if they would go forth with him, and to take such fortune as shall happen, good or euill, they to haue their parte: So that they demaunded no wages, neyther allowaunce for horse nor expence, nor any dammage that they may happen to haue: for sayd they, the king hath brought men enough out of his realme to furnishe his enterprize.

This aunswere pleased not greatly the straunge Lordes, and the company that were about them: Howbeit, they could haue none other, but yet the king of his goodnesse gaue them a somme of money to bring them home. Howbeit, some of them went agayne to the king & serued at their aduenture.

And before the king departed Englande, he tooke this order: first he caused all the Lordes of Fraunce that were Prisoners, to be put into diuers Castelles, and other sure places. And the French king was committed to the Tower of London, and his yong sonne with him, and kept close: And then placed certeine Lordes for the safe keping & good gouernment of the realme.

But to retorne, the kyng passed forward, hauing his Constable the Erle of Marche before him, which had in his battaile fivie hundred knights, and a thousand Archers.

Then folowed the king, who had in his battaile thre thousand men of armes, and fivie thousand Archers, well trimmed, and in good order.

Then came all the cariages, the which conteyned two leagues in length, and they caried with them, hande Milles, Quens to bake in, and forges forges for Iron, and other necessaryes.

Then folowed the Princes battaile and of his brethren, wherein were a thousand speares nobly horsed, and richely besene in order, ready to fight, And in the end of the kinges battaile, there were. v. C. Arlettes wyth Hattookes and Arres, to make euen the wayes for the cariages to passe.

The king thus passed forward into Fraunce with his armie, and at the last came to Reynes, where he layde siege seuen weekes, but could not preuaile, and so passed to Paris, and from thence to Charters, soze spoyling, brennyng, and destroyng the Countrey as he went, & likewise did the prince his sonne with his battaile. So that the Countrey of Fraunce was so greatly wasted, spoyled and decayed, that they were glad to seeke for peace. And at the last by the speciall labour of a fricr called Symond of Langres, and was also a Legate from the Pope, a day of entreatie was appoynted, and a place of metyng for the same.

And at the sayde day and place, there came for the king of England, the Duke of Lancaster, the Erles of Warwike, and of Northhampton, with sir John Chandos, sir Gualter of Manny, and sir William Cheyne knights.

And for the Regent of Fraunce appeared there, the Lorde fewe Constable of Fraunce, the Lord Bociquant then Marshall of Fraunce, the Lord of Saranciers, the Lord Aigney of the Countrey of Aienne, sir Symond Bucy, sir Guichard of Anglie knights, the which treatie came to none effect.

And there came vnto the king to a place called Dones, the Bishop of Beauuays then Chaunceloz of Normandy, with other, and so behaued themselves vnto the king, that a newe day of treatie was appoynted to be holden at Breynguy within a Myle of Charters, vpon the first day of May then next ensuyng.

At which day of appoyntment, the aforesayde Duke of Lancaster, with the sayd Erles of Warwike, and Northhampton, and other, appeared at the the same place for king Edward.

And for the Regent there appered the aforesayde Bishop with many other Lordes and knights, and Spirituall men, to the number of. cxiij. persones, whose names I ouerpasse for length of tyme.

These persones applied them so diligently, that within the space of. liij. dayes they agreed vpon an bnitie and peace, the which was comprised in. xli. articles, the effect whereof hereafter follow.

First the king of England and his heyres kings, with all the landes that he then had in Gascoyne, and Guyan, should haue to him and to his heyres for euer, the Citie and Castell of Doytiers with all the appurtenaunces to that Lordship belongyng. Also the Citie of Limoges, with all the landes of Limosyn, and all other their appurtenaunces. The Citie and Castell of Pirigort, with all the landes and reuenues to the same Lordship belongyng. The Erledome of Bygort, with all that therevnto belongeth, the Erledome of Doytiau, with all the appurtenaunces: the Seignioy of Beluyse, the Lordship of Erantes, Crauchour and Crancon, the Cities of Agen, Agenoys, and of Caours, and Lordshippe of Caoursyn. The Cities of Charbe, of Gaure, Angolesme, of Rodes, and of Raverne. The Lordship of Mounstrell, with all the reuenues therevnto belongyng. The seignioy of Calice, Marguise, of Sandgate & Coligne. The Lordship of Hammes, of Wales and of Duy. The Erledome of Guynes, with all the profites thervnto belongyng. All which Lordshippes, honoures, Castelles, Townes, Cities, and Townes, king Edward the thirde and his heyres should haue and holde for euermore, in as royall wyse and like maner as haue done the kings of Fraunce, without doying for them any homage, fealtie, or other dueitie.

The king here agreeth to refuse the name of the French king and no more to call himselfe by that name.

2 And the sayd king Edward after that day, for him and his heyres kinges of England, should cleerly renounce and geue ouer all his title, right, and interest that he had vnto the Crowne of Fraunce, and specially the name of the king of Fraunce.

3 Also all his right that he had to the Duchie of Normandie, of Thoraie, of Aniou, of Britaine, and of the souereintie of the Erledome of Flaundyng, and of all other Lordshippes, Cities, Castels, honoures, Townes or Townes, that anye king of Englande before that day had any right vnto within the realme of Fraunce: and to holde him content with the abouenamed Lord-shippes, without any further claime.

The ralsome whiche the French king payde was. b hundred thousand pounds.

4 Furthermore it was agreed that the frenche king shoulde pay for hys ransome three Millions of Scutes of Golde, whereof two should alwaye make a noble Engliche, the which do come vnto sterlyng money, fyue hundred thousand pound.

Of the which three Millions of Scutes, ten hundred thousand, which is one Million, to be payed at Calice the first day of June next folowing the sayde treatie. And another Million to be payde at the sayd towne of Calice within. iiii. Monethes after the French king was come to Calice. And the thirde Million, to be payde at London in two yeres and a halfe, that is to say, at Michelmase come a yere after the agreement, foure hundred thousand Scutes: And at Michelmase next after ensuyng, foure hundred thousand Scutes: And at Easter folowynge two hundred thousand Scutes, in full payment of the three Millions, or. xxx. C. thousand Scutes.

The charge of the French kinges bet for a moneth.

5 And further it was agreed that after the French king was come to Ca-lice, he should rest him there foure Monethes: whereof the first Moneth should be at the charge of king Edward, and the other three Monethes to be at the cost and charge of the sayd French king, and to pay for euery of the sayd three Monethes, ten thousand Royalles of Fraunce, which at that tyme were in value euery Royall. xxi. pence, and so a Monethes charge after the account of our money was. iiii. C. lxx. pound.

And it was also agreed, that John the French king for the tyme, nor any king of Fraunce after him should ayde or assist the Scottes against king Edward, nor against his heyres kinges of England. Neyther shall king Edward nor his heyres kinges, allie them with the Fleminges, nor ayde nor assist them agaynst the sayd king John, nor his heyres kinges of Fraunce.

6 And for the title and right of the Duchy of Briteyn, which was in question betweene the Erles of Bloys and of Mountford, it was agreed that both the kinges beyng at Calice, the sayde parties should be called before them. And if a peace betweene them by the two kings might not be set, then the sayde kinges to assigne certaine indifferent persons to agree the sayde Erles, and they to haue halfe a yere of respite for to quiet the matter. And if the sayde persons so by the two kinges assigned, could not agree the sayde Erles by the time aforesayde: That then eyther of the sayde Erles to make the best prouision for himselfe with the helpe of his friendes or other wise, whereby they might attayne to their right and clayme of the sayde Duchy.
the

7 Prouyded alwayes, that neyther of the sayd kinges, nor anye of their sonnes shall ayde or assist any of the sayde Erles, by reason whereof the peace betweene them agreed might be losed or broken. And it is also further prouided, that vnto whether of the sayd two Erles the sayd Duchy shall fall by sentence of man or otherwise, that the homage of it shall alwayes be done to the frenche king.

All which ordynances and agreements, with many mo that would aske long leasure to wyte, were ratified and confirmed by the instruments and seales of the prince of Wales, vpon the party of king Edward for Englands partie, and by Charles Regent of Fraunce for that partie, as by their letters patents and their seales then sealed appered, bearyng date that one at Louiers in Normandye the. xvi. day of May, and that other at Paris the tenth daye of the sayde Moneth and yere.

And moreouer, eyther of the sayd two princes, that is to saye Edward prince of Wales was swozne in the presence of. vii. French knightes vpon the Sacrament of the Altar after the thirde Agnus was sayde in time of a low Masse, at the foresayde Louiers, long or sayde, that he to the vttermost of hys power shoulde vpholde and keepe the aforesayde peace in euery point, as farre as in him was. And in lyke maner was Charles then Regent of Fraunce swozne in the presence of. vii. English knightes to performe the same.

After which treatie thus finished and ended, king Edward with hys sonnes and Nobles of Englande tooke shyping at Honflet in Normandy the twentieth day of Maye, and sayled into Englande, leauyng behinde hym the Erle of Warwike for to guyde the Englishmen that remayned in Guyan and other places, & to see that peace which was then proclaymed thorough France were kept & not broken by them, which for al that endured not long.

And in thys time of king Edwards being in Fraunce, John the French king and his sonne, who were in the Tower of London, did at the returne of king Edward feast him and all his Lords in the sayd Towre of London, and then peace was proclaymed, and the French king set at his libertie.

Peace proclaymed.

The eyght day of the Moneth of Julie next ensuyng, the French king landed at Calice and was lodged in the Castell, and there taried the com-ming of king Edward.

The French
king goeth to Calice.

The. ix. day of October king Edward arriued at Calice, and went streight vnto the Castell to visite king John, which welcomed him with a louing and friendly countenance, and when the king should departe to his lodging into the towne, the French king required him, that he with hys sonnes would dyne with him the morow folowynge, which the king graun-
ted. At which dynner the king was first set and kept the estate, and then se-condarily the French king sate: Thirde the prince of Wales, and fourthly the Duke of Lancaster, and no mo at that table. In the time of which dynner came to the Castle the Erle of Flaundyng, whome the French king welcomed in most louing maner.

King Edward arriueth at Ca-lice.

And when the sayde dynner with all hono: was ended, two of the kings sonnes of England, and two of the French kinges sonnes, tooke leaue of their fathers, and roade toward Boleyne, where at that time the Regent of Fraunce

France was. The which met them in the mid waye betweene Calice and Boleyn, and so conueyghed them vnto Boleyn, and rested there with them that night. And vpon the morow the Regent himselfe came to Calice to hys father, and after his father and he came both to the kinges palace to dyner, whome king Edward receaued with much ioye and honour, and made vnto them a sumptuous feast.

And after two dayes, the Regent departed from Calice, and returned vnto Boleyn, and the two sonnes of king Edward returned from Boleyn to Calice.

The. xxiii. day of October next followyng, both the kinges beyng in two traueses, and in one Chapel at Calice, a Masse was sayde before them, to the offering of which Masse neither of them came. But when the Pare was bozne first to the french king, and then to king Edward, and eyther of them refused to kisse it first: The french king roase vp and came toward king Edward: wherof he beyng aware, roase vp and met with him, and refused the Pare, and eyther killed other. At the which masse, eyther of them was solemnly sworne to maintaine the articles of the sayde peace. And for more assurance of the same, many Lordes vpon both parties were also sworne, to maintaine the same to their powers.

The cause that the french king thus sojourned at Calice, as before it was agreed, was for the discharge of the first payment of his raunsome, and also for the deliuerie of certaine towne which yet the Englishmen had not in possession.

The next day after the takyng of the aforesayd othe by the two kinges, that was the. xrb. day of October, the french king was freely deliuered, and then he departed from Calice, and roade toward Boleyn: Whome king Edward conueyed a myle vpon his way, at which myles ende they departed with kissing, and other louing maner: And Prince Edward kept on his way with the french king, and so conueyed him to Boleyn, where he taried that night. And vpon the morow the sayde Prince Edward, and Charles Duke of Normandie, with the Erle of Estampes and other noble men there then beyng present, were againe sworne to mainteyne and holde the sayde peace, without fraud, colour, or deceyt. And that done, the sayde Prince takyng his leaue, returned that night to Calice. And so it may appeare vnto you that king John stood as prisoner by the space of foure yeres, and moze. And after king Edward had dispatched all his busynesse at Calice, he returned into England. But before the king came from Calice, he sent into England such hostages as the french king had left for the performace of y Articles contained in the last peace, and the names of the hostages were these, as folowe.

Philip Duke of Orleans some tyme son to king Philip of France, and also his two Nephewes.

The Duke of Berry.
The Duke of Burbon.
The Erle of Alanson.

The Lorde of Auergne, and diuers other Lordes and knightes: Besydes these there were two or thre of the best Citizens of euery of the best Cities of France.

And all these the king sent ouer, and commissions also that they should be well bled and intreated, the which was well obserued: for they passed their tyme in the Citie of London, and about where they would, euen as they would themselues. And shortly after king Edward returned into Englande.

And in this yere the Lady Elizabeth daughter to the Erle of Gloucester reedified Uniuersitie Hall in Cambridge, which had bene consumed wyth fyre, and named it Clare hall.

Some after the returne of the french king into France, there were generally throughout all France, sundrie companies went together robyng and spoylyng the Countie, and they were called the Companions. And the number of them so encreased, that they could be none otherwise subdued, but by a strong army: But they so preuailed against the french kings power and did so much mischief in France, that it was sayde and affirmed, that they did more harme then all the warres that Englande had with France. And truly before they were suppressed, it cost many a man his life. The number of them as sayth Froysart, at the first were foure thousand, and after increased to ten thousand, and so to. xx. thousande, and. xxx. thousande and mo. The occasion of their begynnyng, as is alleged in the french Chronicle, was the warres of England, who made such a spoyle and destruction in France, by brennyng of Villages and otherwise, that the husbandmen and their seruautes, and other labouryng men entered into an ydlenesse, and so flocked in companies: wherof sprang these Companions.

This company were named by the Frenchmen Companions

And in this yere (as sayth Fabian) was a great dearth in England, both of men and bestes, duryng the which tyme the noble Duke Henry of Lancaster dyed. And after his death Sir John of Gaunt Erle of Richmond the kinges third sonne, which had maryed the sayd Dukes daughter, was made Duke of that Duchie. This yere the french king, bearyng great loue and fauor to king Edward and to the Queene his wife, and to their children, came into England to visite them, and to make mery with them, and the. xxiii. day of January, he came to Eltham, where then the king and Queene was, and there dined, and after dinner the king conueyed him most honourably through the Citie of London vnto the Sauoye: where he lay vntill the begynnyng of Marche next folowyng, and then a greivous sicknesse tooke him, of the which he dyed the. viij. day of Aprill next folowyng. 1363. and after was carryed into France, and was buryed at Saint Dionise besyde Paris.

For

For it was considered, that the prince of Wales helde a great and a noble estate (as it was right mete for him to doe) for he was valiaunt, puissaunt and riche, and had great possessions & heritage in Aquytayne, where was abundance of al riches welth and prosperity. Wherefore it was thought most mete for the prince did remayne in those parts, for he had sufficient in that Duchy to maintaine his estate. And also al the Barons and knights of Aquytayne did earnestly desyre to haue him among them, for the which they had made their earnest request to the king. For although Sir John Chandos was to them right curteous and friendly: yet they rather coueted to haue their awne naturall Lorde and Souereigne.

The prince was very wylling to agree vnto this deuise, and so was the good Ladye his wyfe, and they prepared themselues with all speede accordyng to their estates. And when euery thing was readie, they tooke their leaue of the king, and of the Quene, and of their brethren, and departed out of England, and with a prosperous winde came to Burdeaur, and shortly after tooke possession of his Duchy of Guyan, and afterwarde did homage to his father for the same.

About this time also dyed the Lady Isabell the kinges mother, which was wyfe to king Edward the second, and daughter vnto Phillip le Beau, sometime French king. And she was buried in London, at the Frier Priours, commonly called the Gray Fryers (which nowe is a parische Church and is called Christes Church) right nobly and honourably, with all the prelates and Barons of Englande, and all the Lordes of Fraunce that then lay here as hostages.

In this time, or a little before, a great and greuous complaynt was made by the Lordes and commons of Englande to the king, that the realme susteyned many mischices and inconueniences, for that the Lawyers pleaded all their ples in lawe in French, and not in English: wherefore it was ordeyned and enacted by parliament that from thenceforth all ples, which are to be pleded in any of the kinges Courtes, before any of his iustices, or in any other his Courts, or before any his other ministers, or in the Courts and places of any other Lordes within the Realme, shalbe pleaded, sued, and defended, answered, debated and iudged in the Englishe tongue, and that the same be entred and entrolled in Latyn.

This yere on Trinitie Sunday Charles sonne and heyre to John the French king, was crowned king of Fraunce in the Citie of Reyns, wyth great pompe and solempnitie, and so was the Queene his wyfe daughter to Peter Duke of Burbone.

And as Fabian sayth, in this yere, because vpon S. Stephyns day the king finished and ended all his warres with Fraunce, he therefore in the worship of S. Stephyn began the foundation of S. Stephyns Chapell at Westmynster, and Richard the second sonne of Prince Edward, called the black prince, fynished the same.

In this yere was borne Edward, the first sonne of Prince Edward, the which died when he was about eyght yeres of age.

And about this time one Barthrain de Claicon a Norman with an army of Frenchmen entered the lande of Castile, and warred vpon Peter, then king of that lande, and so behaued him, that in lesse then foure Moneths, he chased chased the sayde Peter out of his awne lande, and crowned his brother named Henrye king of Castile, at a Towne called Burges vpon Easter daye: wherefore the sayde Peter constrained by necessitie, was compelled to come to Burdeaur to craue ayde of Prince Edward.

Edward the prince did homage to his father for the Duchy of Guyan.

This Peter was rightfull heyre vnto the Crowne of Castile, and Henry his brother (as most writers affirme) was a bastard. But this Peter was of so vile conditions, that his subiectes fauoured him not. And so thys warre continued a season betweene his brother and him, in the which the Prince with his Archers tooke partie with this Peter, and the french king with speares tooke party with Henry.

And in this time King Edward forbade that any money, commonly called Peter pence, should eyther be gathered or payde to Rome.

In this yere also prince Edward had his second sonne borne at Burdeaur, whose name was Richard, and was afterwarde king, by the name of Richarde the second.

This yere at the importunitie, sute and great entreatie of Done Peter King of Spaine, Edward prince of Wales went with him into Spayne with a strong power, and the Prince overcame the Spaniards and frenchmen in a strong battayle, where the number of them were foure to one of the princes power, and the prince restozed king Peter to his former estate as king of Spaine. But not long after the princes returnyng home agayne to Burdeaur, the aforesayde Henry so repayred his army and gaue a new onset, that in the ende he bitterly banquished Peter and put him to death, and then reigned himselfe quietly. I am the shorter herein because this properly doth not touch the warres and affayres of Englande, which is the chiefe thing that I purpose in this Collection.

Prince Edward after his comming out of Spayne where he had spent a great some of money, and yet a number of the Souldyours that went out with him, whome king Peter promised to pay, came home agayne vnpayde and lnygered and still hanged vpon the prince, wherefore he to rayse a masse or great some of money, deuyded to set great taxes and impositions vpon the people of Aquitayne: which thing the Erle of Arminack, of Bret, of Berrygozte, and other noble men would not in any wise consent vnto, but appealed to the french king for remedy, and in such wise perswaded him, that he contrary to the league and peace lately made, summoned the prince to appeare at Paris: By meane whereof the peace was broken, and open warre agayne proclaymed betweene both princes to the great mortalitie and desolation of people on both parties, but the most losse and dammage fell alwayes to the king of England. In so much that in the ende, he lost the moze parte of the lands which were graunted him by the composition and agreement of peace. And no boe fortune, which pleasauntly had smiled vpon king Edward the space of .xl. yeres, in hys latter dayes stowardlye frowned and chaunged her Copie.

This yere in the moneth of May the frenche king in his high court of parliament holden at Paris proceeded in iudgement vpon the appellations before made by the Erle of Arminack, the Lorde of Bret, and Erle of Berrygozt, agaynst prince Edward: wherevpon discord and variaunce began to take place betweene the two kings, insomuch, that by meane of the sayd three Lordes ( notwithstanding that they were before sworn to be to the king of Englande true liege men ) dyuers towne of the Countrey of Poiteau yelded them to the french king, as Aubeuyle, Rue and the moze parte of the towne of the sayde Countrey.

Wherupon Ambassadors were sent bypon both partes, and dyuers meanes of intreacie were commoned of, but in the ende, it came all to none effect. Thus the peace which before was so substancially made & with great solemnity and circumstances established, was now vtterly violat and broken, and eyther king for his parte made prouision for warre.

Charles the french king went to Roan in Normandie and there in the moneth of July rigged his ships, & set them forward to war bypon England.

The Duke of Lancaster landeth in Normandy.

And while king Charles was occupied in Normandie, the Duke of Lancaster landed at Calice with a strong companie of Archers, and other warriors, and from thence passed to Choroienne, and so to Aye, in wastynge and spolyng the Countrey with yron and fyre as he went. Wherfore the french king in the defence of those partes sent forth the Duke of Burgoyne with a puyssant armie to withstand the sayd Duke of Lancaster. The which Duke of Burgoyne sped him in such wise, that aboute the .xxiiij. day of August he lodged his host bypon the Hill of Turneham, nere vnto Arde. And the Englishe hoste was lodged betwene Gygone, and Arde, so that the fronts of both the hostes were within a myle: Betwene whome were dayly skirmishes and small bickerings: And when the sayd Duke of Burgoyne had kept the foresayde hill, from the .xxiiij. day of August, vnto the .xij. day of September folowynge, he remoued his host, and went to Helden: For the which dedde, he was after blamed of his brother.

After which departure of the frenchmen, the Duke of Lancaster with his host tooke the way toward Caur, and passed the ryuer of Some, and so roade toward Harlew, entendynge to haue fyred the french kinges nauye: But at their comynge thether, the towne was so strongly manned, that they did but little hurt. Wherfore the sayde Duke departed shortly thence, and sped him into the Countrey of Poiteau, & so came vnto the towne of Aubeuyle. Where the frenche men encountered him and gaue him bataille. In the which was taken Sir Hugh Chatellon Knight, with other knightes, Esquiers, and Burgesses of the towne, and there were slaine of the frenchmen mo then three hundreth, and they had taken prisoners to the number of .xlv. which they sent to Calice. And then the Duke with his companie went to Burdeaur, and brent and spoyled the Countrey as he went.

And in this time dyed at Calice the Erle of Warwike, after that he was returned from the Duke of Lancaster, which was a noble and valiant man.

And in the moneth of August folowynge, dyed that noble woman Quene Philip, wife of king Edward the thirde, the which was a great benefactor vnto the Chanons of Saint Stephens at Westmynster. And sone after died Dame Blanche, sometime the wife of Henry Duke of Lancaster, and was buried at Paules bypon the Northsyde of the high Altare by her husbnde. Where she ordeyned for him and her (as sayth Fabian) foure Chauntreyes for euer, and an Anniuersary yerely to be kept: At the which helyde other great thinges appoynted to the Deane and Chanons of the Church: Shee ordeyned that the Maior of London beyng present at the Masse, should offer a penny,

This yere also the king helde his Parliament at Westminster. In the which was graunted vnto him thre fiftenes to be payed in thre yeres folowynge. And by the Clergie was graunted vnto him thre Dismes to be payd in lyke maner.

A parliament holden at Westminster.

And in this yere was a thirde mortalitie or death of men: and likewise a marueylous mozeyn bypon Cattell, so that the like had not bene sene in many yeres before. And then fell merueylous aboundaunce of raine, so that the corne was drowned in y earth, by reason whereof, the next yere after wheate was solde for thre shillinges foure pence the Bushell.

A third mortalitye of men and bestes.

And in the ende of the Moneth of July, Sir Robert Knolles beyng accompanied with diuers noble men and souldiours, entered Saint Omers. And when they had done their pleasures there, and in the Countrey rounde about, then they roade vnto Arras, in wastynge and spolyng all the Countrey as they went. And when they had brent the Bulwarkes of the sayde towne of Arras, they passed by Royen, and Vermendoys, and brent the houses of all suche as would not to them geue due ransome. And thus holdynge their way, they passed the ryuers of Dyle, and of Syze, and so came vnto the Citie of Keynes, and passed there the ryuer, and roade toward Croys, and passed the riuers of Aube, and of Seyne, and so helde their way toward Saint Florentyne, and there passed the ryuer of Jon, in holdynge their course toward Joigny, and so to Corbeuile, and Esson. And the .xxij. of September they lodged themselues bypon the Mount Saint Albou, and in the Countrey there about. And within two dayes folowynge, they embattayled themselues in a fielde, betwene the towne of Jony, and Paris. In all which tyme, they passed without bataille through all the Countreys aforesayde, in spolyng and breynynge the towne, and in ransomyng of the Inhabitanes thereof, without resistence or impediment. And albeit that in the Citie of Paris at that day were two hundreth men of armes waged by the french king, beside the Souldiours and strength of the Citizens of that Citie: Yet the sayd hoste of Englishemen lay, as before is sayde, embattelled vntill it was past noone of the aforesayd day. At which tyme, forsomuch as they were credibly informed, that they should there haue no bataille, they brake by their fielde, and went to a place or towne called Antoyngne, and there lodged that night, and bypon the next day, they tooke their iourney toward Normandie. But after foure dayes labour, they turned to Escamps, in pillyng and dammagynge the Countrey as before they had done, and so went forth vntill they came to the Erledome of Angeou, where they wanne by strength the towne of Uaas, and Ruyly, with other strong holdes thereaboutes.

Sir Robert Knolles with a great power taketh his iourney into France

But then it came infortunatly to passe, for it so chaunced that the Lord Fitzwater, and the Lord Grauntson fell at a bariaunce with Sir Robert Knolles and his companie, which encreased to such hatred and displeasure, that Sir Robert Knolles with the flower of the Archers and Souldiours departed departed from the sayde two Lordes, leauyng them in the aforesayd townes of Waas and Bayllye, and then he went into Briteyn.

When the French king heard the certentie hereof, anone he commaunded sir Barthram de Glaycon, who was newly made Marshall of Fraunce, with a strong armie to enter the sayde Countrie of Angeou, and to make sharpe warre vpon the sayde Englishmen. The which vpon the. xij. day of October folowing, layd siege to the sayd towne of Waas, and out of the same issued the sayd lordes of Fitzwater and Grauntson, and gaue vnto the Marshall battaile: But in the ende the Englishe men were discomfited, so that of them were slaine. vij. hundreth, and the rest put to flight, And there was taken the Lorde Grauntson with other.

And after this victoꝝy the French men went vnto the towne of Waas, and wanne it by assault, where also were slaine thre hundreth English men, and many taken prisoners, and the other put to flight.

And after this Sir Barthram pursued the Englishmen that were fled to a towne called Verfure: where in the assaultyng of the sayde towne he slue and toke prisoners foure hundreth Englishmen. And thus by strife and dissension among themselves, those that before by amitie & good accord were victoꝝs, now by hatred and disoord, were slayne and taken prisoners.

Now the king of Englande considering with himselfe of the great and daylie losses that he susteyned, and howe the Frenchmen continually gate and wanne from him in all partes in Fraunce, but chietely the Countie of Poiteau, wherebpon he had spent a marvellous treasure in the fortifyng and strengthing of the same, ouer and aboue the yerely reuenues thereof, and also did now well perceaue that he should haue warre on all parties, and also at this time it was shewed him that he should haue war wyth Scotland because the Scottes were newly allyed with the French king. Wherefoze he was sore bered and troubled, for he feared more the warre of the Scottes then the warre of the Frenchmen: And therfore with all speede he sent men of warre to the frontiers of Scotlande, as to Barwikke, Rokesborough, Newe Castell, Dureham, and into other places about the frontiers. Also he sent a great flauie to the Sea, about Hampton, Bernesey and the Isle of Wight, for it was shewed him howe that the French king had furnished and set forth a great flauie to go to the Sea, and to lande in Englande, so that he wist not well on which parte he should first take heede.

At thys time the Archebishop of Winchester (as Fabian calleth him) then being Cardinall, and was present at Auignon with Pope Gregory the vi. of that name, was put in commission with the Archebishop of Beauuays, to make or treate a peace and bnitie betwene the two Realmes of Englande and Fraunce. Which sayde Cardinall of Winchester, after his departure from the Pope, came downe toward Melune, where by the Cardynall of Beauuays he was honourably met and conueyed into the Citie of Melune. And when he had arrested him there foure dayes, the two Cardinales meeting together went to Parys, where they had communication with the French king touching the peace. And after that they had vnderstande hys pleasure, the Cardinall of England tooke his leaue and departed to Calice, where he tooke shippyng, and so came into Englande, and shewed vnto the king of Englande the Popes pleasure, and the French kinges aunswere.

The Scotts rebell.

And in this time was soze warre in Guyan, and many townes gotten and yeelded to the Frenchmen, and still the Englishmen had the worst, and many of them slayne and taken prisoners, for in a berie shorte time the Citie of Lymoges, and all the countrie of Lymosyn was vnder the obeyssaunce of the French king. And the occasion of this losse as sayth sundrie authoures, was for that prince Edward a little befoze had reysed a great tax vpon the inhabitautes of that Countrie, whereby he lost all their hearts.

When the French king had thus obteyned the rule of the Countrie of Lymosyn, he immediatly after sent syr Berthram de Glaycon into the Erledome of Poiteau, and wanne there many townes and Castelles, and lastly layde his siege to Rochell.

In this yere king Edward kept his high Court of parliament at Westmynster, in the which toward the furniture and ayde of his warres he demaunded of the spiritualtie fiftie thousand ponde, and as much of the laye fee. The which by the Tempozaltie was graunted, but the Clergie kept them of with pleasaunt aunswers: So that the king and his counsaile was with them discontented, in so much that to their displeasures, dyuerse officers, as the Chauncelour, the priuie seale, the Treasorer and other officers who then were possessed by spirituall men, were taken from them, and temporall Lordes set in their places.

And shortly after, the aforesayde Cardynall of Beauuays came into Englande, to treate of the peace betweene the two realmes, but all his labour tooke none effect.

In the Month of Julie, the French king sent into the Countrie of Poiteau the aforesayde Sir Barthram de Glaycon with a strong army, where he wanne dyuers holdes and fortresses from the Englishmen.

In the which time king Edward for strengthing of the countrie, and specially to defende the towne of Rochell, which as aboue in the other yere is shewed, was this yere besieged by the sayd Sir Barthram, sent the Erle of Pembrooke, with other noble men to fortifie the sayde towne, and to remoue the siege. But befoze he could come at that towne, he was encountred on the sea with a flete of Spanyards, the which king Henry of Castile had sent into Fraunce, to strength the French kings partie. By the which flete after long and cruell fight, the sayde Erle was taken, with syr Guychard de Angle and other to the number of. Cij. prisoners and the more parte of hys men slayne and drowned, with the losse of many good shippes.

Also in the begynning of September next folowynge a Gascoyne boꝝne, a man of good fame, whom the king of England had admytted for his Lieutenant and Governour of the countrie of Poiteau, named le Captail de Bueff, fought with an army of Frenchmen befoze a towne named Sonbise, where in conclusion his men were slaine and chased, and he with lxx. of his parte taken prisoners.

Then the Dukes of Berrey and Burgoyne vpon the. vij. daye of September came befoze Rochell, and had certaine communications with the rulers of the sayde towne for the deliuerie thereof.

King Edward nowe heyring of the taking of the Erle of Pembrooke, and of the losse that he daylie had of his men in dyuers partes of Fraunce, with also the ieopardie that the towne of Rochell and other stode in, made hastie

Rocheil is yelden to the French men.

The. viij. daye of September folowyng the Captaine of Rocheil hauing no comfort to haue any quick reskues, yeelded vpon certayne appoyntments the sayd towne vnto the afozenamed Dukes, to the vse of the French King. And shortly after were also yeelden vnto them the Townes of Angoulesme, of Crantes, of Saint John the Angely with dyuers other.

This yere also Sir John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, and Sir Edmond his brother Erle of Cambridge, wedded the two daughters of Peter which was late king of Castile, who was put to death by Henry his bastard brother, as before is shewed in the. xli. yere of this kinges reigne. Of the which two daughters, Sir John of Gaunt maryed the eldest, named Constance, and his brother, the yonger named Isabell, so that by these mariages, these two brethren claymed to be enheritours of the kingdome of Castyle, or Spayne.

Also this yere, After the Duke of Briteyne had receyued many exhortations and requestes from the French King, to haue him vpon his partie: he sent for certeyne Souldiours of English men, and fortetied with them some of his Castels and holdes. Of the which when king Charles heard, he sent thether with a strong power the afozenamed Sir Barthzaim de Clayton, warning them to make war vpon them as enemies to the house of Fraunce. The which accordyng to their commission entered the lande of Briteyne, in wastyng the same with yron and fyre, and in a little time there was yelden to him the most part of the chiefe townes, except Brest, Aulroy, and Daruall.

Brest in Briteyn belleged.

And in the ende of June, the sayd Barthzaim layde siege vnto Brest, and the Lorde of Craon with other, lay before Daruall. And in all this tyme the Duke of Briteyn was in England: for so soone as he had bestowed the afozenamed English souldiours, he sailed into England to speake with king Edward.

The Duke of Lancaster with a great power landeth at Calice.

And in the moneth of July, the Duke of Lancaster with Sir John de Mountford Duke of Briteyne and other, with a great power landed at Calice. And after they had rested them there a fewe dayes, they road vnto Helden, and lodged them within the Parke another season. And after passed by Dourlons, by Benquesne, and so vnto Corby, where they passed the Ryuer of Some, and road vnto Roye in Vermendoys, where they abode the space of. viij. dayes. And then they set the towne on fyre, and tooke their way toward Lamoy, and burned and spoyled the Countrie as they went. And in proccesse of tyme, passed the ryuers of Orne, Marne, and of Aube, and roade through Champaigne, and by the Erledome of Braine, streight vnto Guy, and passed the ryuer of Seyn, and so toward the riuer of Ley, & vnto Margigny the Romnery. And when they were passed the sayde Romnery, they kept their way toward the ryuer of Ancherre, and so vnto Burdeaux. In all which iourney they passed without battaile.

In this tyme dyed at Burdeaux Edward the eldest sonne of Prince Edward, to the great grieffe and sorow both of the Prince his father, and of the good Ladie his mother. And soone after the death of his sonne, he himselfe beyng very sickly, was aduised and counsayled, that he should returne into England, and the rather that he might obteyne his health. The Prince did agree agree therevnto right gladly, and therevpon made his prouision. And when the Prince should depart from Aquitaine, he first caused a speciall summons to be made at Burveaur, of all Barons and knightes of Gascoyn, and Poytreaun, and in all other places where he was Lorde, and they vnder his obeysaunce. And when they were all come together in a Chamber before the prince: Then he spake vnto them and sayd, it is well knowen to you all, that I am your true and the right Lorde and inheritour of your countrie, and how that I haue gouerned, and kept you in peace asmuch as in my power hath lycn. I haue bene so faythful a Protector ouer you, that I haue not feared neither the aduenture of my life against your enemyes and mine, neyther the expences of my treasure, for your defence: and God be prayled, though now ye are a litle afflicted, yet hether to ye haue bene mainteyned in great wealth and pyssaunce agaynst your enemyes. And now at this tyme, I beyng vexed with a great and greivous sicknesse, am counsayled by my Physicians and other, that for the better recouery of my health, I should returne into England to my naturall Countrie, which God willyng I purpose shortly to do. And therefore I most hartely besech you, euen as earnestly as a Prince may requyre his subiectes, that ye will yeelde in mine absence, to my dere and naturall brother here present, the Duke of Lancaster, whome I leaue here as my Lieutenant to gouerne you, the same honour, reuerence, and obeysaunce, and faythfulnesse of heart, that ye beare or should beare vnto me: and doubt you nothing but that ye shall finde him a right good Lorde, valiaunt and courteous, and therefore I beseeche you to ayde and assist him in all his affayres and attemptes, with your good aduice and counsaile.

And forthwith the Barons of Aquitaine, Gascoyne, Poytreaun, and of Raynton promised, and swore on their faythes, that there should neuer be default found in any of them. And therevpon immediately they did their fealtie and homage to the Duke of Lancaster, and promysed him their loues, seruices and obeysaunce, and in the presence of the Prince they swore to byholde and keepe the same, and therevpon kissed his mouth.

And when this was ended, within short tyme after, the Prince and princes his wife, with their yong sonne Richard, accompanied with the Erle of Cambridge, and the Erle of Pembroke, and with them. v. C. fighting men besyde Archers entered into their Shippes, and so long sayled with a good and prosperous winde, that at the last they came vnto Southhampton, and there they tooke lande and refreshed them two dayes, and then they toke their horses, and the Prince went in a horse Litter, and at the last came to Wyndesore, where then the king was, who receyued right sweetly his children, & so there the king was enformed by the prince of all the state of Guien.

After the departure of the Prince from Burdeaux, the Duke of Lancaster kept the obsequy of his Cosyn Edward sonne to the Prince his brother, the which was honourably done in the Citie of Burdeaux.

This yere (as sayth froyssart) came into England sent from the Pope, who then was Gregorie the. xi. the Archebishop of Rauenne, and the Bishop of Carentes, for to treat of a peace betweene the two kinges of Englande and of Fraunce, the which met together at Bruges in Flaundyrs. And thether came certeyne Lordes, aswell from the king of Englande, as also from the French king. And the Commissioners of the French pattie, after they had had spent a tyme in disputations, they then prayed licence of the Legates that they might go to Paris, and shewe vnto the king the offers of the Engliche partie, and so to returne with his pleasure, whereupon it was agreed, that a certene should ryde vnto the frenche king. And the Englishmen abode stiffly vpon the souereintie, that was that the king of Englande, and hys heyres kinges, shall enioy all the former landes, comprised in the peace lately made with John King of Fraunce, without homage, or other due tie for the same doying. And for this the frenche king assembled a counsaile at Paris, and there it was fully concluded, that the frenche king might not geue ouer the souereintie.

When this report was brought to Bruges, the treatie was dissolved without any conclusion of any thing, sauyng that a peace was continued vntill the feast of all Saintes next folowynge.

This yere John Erle of Pembroke, who before, as we haue shewed, was taken by the Spanyardes vpon the sea, and now was raunsomed with the payment of a great somme and masse of money, returning into England, dyed by the way. And the Countesse his wife, who was descended of the noble house of the Erles of saint Paule in Fraunce, a woman of great vertue, and a louer of learning and learned men, founded in Cambridge a house for scholers, which at this day is called Pembroke Hall.

Yet once againe a newe assemblie was made for the treatie of a peace, to be kept at Saint Omers, but after it was kept at Bruges. Where, for king Edward appered the Duke of Lancaster, and Sir Edmond his brother, the Erle of Cambridge, with diuers other of the Kinges Counsaile: Where the sayde Lordes with the other helde their assemblies, and Courtes, vntill it was nere Easter, to the great cost and charge of both parties: But in the ende they departed againe without effect, sauyng onely that the peace was prolonged vntill the first day of Aprill next folowynge. And yet againe by labour of the sayd Legates the sayde peace was further prolonged vntill Midsummer next folowynge. And in this meane tyme great laboures and paynes were taken to haue a peace concluded, but in the ende it would not be, some imputing the fault to the frenche and some to the Engliche. But in whome so euer the fault was, the frenche king in the tyme of these intreaties, waane many townes and Castelles, aswell in Guyan as in Briteyne, and in other places to his great aduantage.

At this tyme there arose a great murmure among the people of Englande agaynst certaine persons that bare auctoritie about the king, as the Lorde Latymer then the kinges Chamberleyne and other: By whose sinister counsaile as they sayde, the king in his age was misled, and hys treasure mispended, to the great dishonour of the king, and to the great losse, hurt, and dammage of all the kinges subiects.

The king being thus troubled on all sydes with warres, called his high Court of parliament, in the which he required a subsidie for the defense of his enemies. Wher vnto it was answered by the common house, that they could no longer beare suche charges, considering the manifold and most grievous burdens that they had from time to time borne before. And further they sayd, that they knew full well that the king was riche enough to defende him and his lande, if the land and his treasure were well guyded and gouerned: But it it had beene long euill ruled by euill officers, so that the lande could not be plenteous, neyther with Chastre, marchandise, nor riches. By reason wherof, & by their impoztune charges the commonaltie was greatly empouertised.

Moreouer, the sayde commons complayned them vpon diuers officers, that were the causers of this misorder, whereof the Lorde Latymer was noted for principall, with also dame Alice Diers, the which the king had long tyme kept for his Concubyne, and also one named Sir Richard Scurre knight, by whose counsailes and sinister meanes, the king was misguyded and the gouernement of the lande disordered.

Wherefore the sayde commons prayed by the mouth of their speaker, which was then Sir Diers de la mere, that the sayde persons with other might be remoued from the king, and other to be set in auctoritie about his person, as should serue for his honour and for the weale of his realme.

Which request of the commons, by the meanes of the Noble Prince Edward, was accepted, so that the sayde persons were remoued from the king, and other Lordes of the realme were put in their places.

And shortly after, the commons graunted the king his pleasure, so that he had of euery man and womā that were aboute the age of. xiiij. yeres, foure pence, Beggers onely except.

And by the Clergie was graunted that the king should haue of euery beneficed man. xij. pence, and of Priestes not beneficed, foure pence, the foure orders of Fryers onely excepted.

But before this money was gathered, the king was fayne to borowe sundrie summes of money in diuers places: Among the which the Citie of London was sent vnto for foure thousande ponde: And for that the Maior then beyng, was not quick in the furthering of that matter, he was by the kings commaundement discharged, and another put in his place.

And vpon the eyght day of June, dyed that noble and famous prince the flowre of Chualrie, Edward the kinges eldest sonne, within the kinges palace of Westmynster, beyng of the age of. xliij. yeres, and after with great solempnitie was conueyed to Cauntorbury, and there honorably buried.

After the death of the prince, the king contrarie to his promise before made, called to him agayne all suche persons as he before for his awne honour and the profite of the realme aduoyded out of his Court, and admytted them agayne to the same offices that they before occupied. By meanes of which alteration the aforesayde speaker of the parliament Sir Diers Dela mere was in such wise complayned vpon to the king, that he was committed to prison, where he laye many yeres after. Fabian.

Then king Edward created Richard the sonne to prince Edward, prince of Wales, and gaue vnto him the Erledomes of Chester and Cornewall.

And because the king waxed now sickly and feeble, he therefore betoke the rule of the realme vnto his sonne Sir John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, and made him Gouernour of the lande, and so he continued duryng hys fathers lyfe.

And this yere Sir John Mynsterwoorth knight, beyng arrayned of high treason at the Guildhall in London, before the Lorde Maiour and other the Queenes Justices, for that he was charged to haue receaued great sommes of money of the king, to haue payd his souldyours withal, and he did not Schisme for election of two Popes.

This yere beganne a wonderfull Schisme in the Church of Rome, a- bout the election of the Pope, for after the death of Gregoꝝ the .xj. there were chosen two Popes, the first was named Urban the .vij. and the other, Clement the .vij. The first an Italian, and the other a Frenchman. Of the which election ensued suche disorde for the terme and space of. xxxix. yeres, that much christian bloud was spent by epyther of them in the defense of their papacy, as after shall appere.

The death of king Edward the thirde.

Now approached the ende of king Edward the thirde, who in the begin- ning of his reigne was courageous but not constāt, and in the middle of his age a valiant and noble Conquerour, and towarde the latter ende of hys dayes, lost that which befoze with great charge and traunyle he had gayned: and now yeilded himselte to pay nature her debt, and dyed the .xxij. daye of June at his manor of Shene, now called Richemount, when he had reig- ned full fiftie yeres and five moneths, lacking foure dayes, and was of the age of .lxx. yeres: leaving behinde him foure sonnes, that is to say, Lyonell Duke of Clarence, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Edmond of Lang- ley Duke of Yorke, and Thomas of Woodstocke Erle of Cambridge.

By the which sonnes and other Lordes of this realme he was most honorably conueyed from his Manour of Shene vnto the Monastery of Westmynster, and there solemnly enterred within the Chapel of Saint Edward vpon the Southside.

ff. j. Richarde

Richard the seconde of that name, borne in Burdeaur, a sonne of Edward prince of Wales, who was called the blacke Prince, which was the eldest sonne of King Edward the thirde, of the age of .xj. yeres, began hys reigne ouer the realme of England the .xxij. day of June. 1377. and was crowned at Westminster the .xv. day of July next folowynge. In bountie and liberalitie he farre passed all his progenitors: But he was ouermuch geuen to rest and quietnesse, and loued little deedes of armes and Martiiall prowes: And for that he was yong, he was most ruled by yong counsaille, and regarded nothing the aduertisement of the sage and wise men of his realme. For the chiefe about him was of no wisdom nor estimation, which turned his lande to great trouble, and himselfe in the ende to extreme miser ye.

Ye haue heard before in the tyme of King Edward, that the peace was continued betweene Fraunce and Englande untill Midsummer folowynge, which tyme was now expired. And the French king in the tyme of peace had made great prouision for warre, aswell of Shippes and Galeys, as of men and munition, insomuch that the king of Spaine had sent him his admirall, called Sir Ferrand Sawse, who with Sir John of Uien Admirall of Fraunce, so soone as the truce or peace was expired, went and bzent the towne of Rye in Kent, the .xxiij. day, or .xxix. day of June, which was within sixe dayes after the death of King Edward.

And shortly after newes hereof came to London: Then the Erle of Cambridge and of Buckyngham went to Douer with a great power. And the Erle of Salburie and the Lorde Mountague went to Southampton: But in the meane time, the Frenchmen had landed in the Isle of Wight, and had bzent therein dyuers townes: And also they landed in the West partes of Englande, and bzent Dartmouth, Plymouthe, Dorsetmouth and dyuers other townes. And then they came to Southampton, and there would haue landed, but there they founde Sir John of Arondell with a great number of men of warre, and Archers, who defended the towne right valiantly, or else it had bene spoyled and taken. Then the Frenchmen departed, and went toward Douer, and one daye they landed beside a little Abbey, called Lyons. There were manye men of the Countrie assembled, and they had made the Priour of the place, and Syr Thomas Cheyny, and John Fusell their chiefe Captaines, and had put themselves in good araye to defende the passage: So that the Frenchmen had but small aduantage there, for they lost many of their people before they could lande: notwithstanding, at the last, by force they did lande, and there was a sore skirmishe, and the Englishmen were put back, and two hundred of them slaine, and the two knights and the Priour were taken prisoners. Then the Frenchmen entred agayne

into their shippes, and lay still all that night at Anker befoze the Abbey. And here the Frenchmen knewe first of the death of King Edward the thirde, by the prisoners that they had taken, and of the coronation of King Richard, and of the order that was taken for the gouernement of the realme. Then Sir John of Uien caused a Barke to departe and to cary those newes with other of his awne enterprizes, vnto the French king.

After the Barke was sent awaye, the Frenchmen and the Spanyards hoppled by their Sayles, and had winde at will, and came with the same tyde to Douer, about thre of the clock in the after noone.

And there was readie to receyue them, Sir Edmonde Erle of Cambridge, and Syr Thomas his brother Erle of Buckyngham, with ten thousand, with Banners displayed, and the Frenchmen were sixe score Wesselles shippes and Galeys. The Frenchmen came heard by the towne, but taried not, but streight passed by and tooke the deepe of the Sea. For then the Sea began to ebbe: Howbeit the Englishmen taried there still all that day and the next night, and the Frenchmen by the nexte tyde, came befoze the Hauen of Calice, and there entred.

At this time also the French king sent vnto Robert King of Scotland, prayeng him to make earnest and effectuell warre vpon the Englishmen and to folow them so hard that they should haue no puissaunce to passe the Sea. Whereupon King Robert assembled hys counsaile at Edenborough; where as were the most parte of all the knightes and Barons in Scotlande, and other suche as he thought were hable to doe him seruyce. And when they were thus assembled together, King Robert sayde vnto them, ye knowe how that the Englishmen in time past haue done vnto vs many great hurtes and harmes in spoylynge and brennyng of our Countrie, beatinge downe of oure Castelles, and in slepyng and raunsomyng of our men. And Sirs, nowe is the tyme come, that we maye be well reuenged of them: For nowe is there but a yong king in Englande, for King Edward is dead, who was wont to haue so good fortune. And when the Barons, and yong knightes that were there heard this, and they also beinge desyrous to be reuenged, answered and sayd, all with one voyce, that they were readie and full appointed and furnished to ryde into England, and it were the same day or the next folowynge, or when it pleased him. This aunswere pleased greatlye the king of Scottes, and he thanked them all. And at the same time the king appointed foure Erles to be the chiefe Captaines of all the armie, that is to saye, the Erle of Douglas, the Erle Mozet, the Erle of Maure, and the Erle of Surlant. And he appointed Sir Archibald Douglas for Conestable of Scotlande, and Syr Robert Uerley to be Marshall of the host, and so they made their sommons to be at a certaine day at Mozlanc.

And in the time of the makinge of thys assembly, there departed from them a valiant Esquier of Scotland called Alexander Ramsay, who thought to enterprize and to atchieue a great feate of armes: and he tooke with him xl. that were well horsed, and roade by night priuely, so long untill that by daye breakyng he came to Berwik, which towne was then Englishe, and the Capitayne of the towne was one of the Erle of Northumberlands Esquiers, and was called John Biset. And in the Castell was Capitaine a valiant knight called Syr Robert Merton.

When

The French men bzent the towne of Rye.

The French men landed in diuers places in Englande, and bzent dyuers townes.

The French king sendeth to the Scots to stir them against the English men.

The Scots with a great power determine to enter vpon Englande.

The enterprize of Alexander Ramsay a Scot, who tooke the Castell of Berwik.

When the Scottes were come to Berwike, they kept themselves close, and sent a spie to the towne and to the Castell, to see in what condition it was. The spie entred downe the ditches, wherein there was no water, nor none could abide there, for it was all a quick sande. And so the spie looked and hearkened all about, but he could neyther here nor see anye creature, and so he returned and shewed his master.

Then Alexander Ramsay auanced forth and brought all his company priuely vnto the ditches, and they brought with them ladders, and so dressed them by to the walles. And Alexander was one of the first that went by the ladder with his sworde in his hande, and entered into the Castell, and all his companie folowed him, for there was none that withstood them. And when they were all within, then they went to the chiefe Towre, where the Capitaine lay a sleepe. And there sodainely with great Axes they brake open the doore. The Capitaine sodainely awooke, and had slept all night, for he had kept but small watch, the which he deerely bought, and so opened his chamber doore, wenyng to him the noyse had beene made by some of his awne Souldiours that would haue robbed or murdered him in his bed, because he had displeased them the weke before, and so lept out at a wyndow into the great ditches in great feare, and there brake his neck.

The watchmen were halfe a sleepe, and heard the noyses, and awooke, and perceyued well howe that the Castell was scaled and betrayed, and so sowned in a Trumpet Trahey, Trahey.

John Biset Capitaine of the Towne hearing the voyce of a Trompet, armed himselfe immediatly, & caused all the towne to arme themselves, and forthwith they drew together all before the Castell, and heard well the noyses that the Scottes made within: But they could not enter into them, for the gate was shut and the bridge drawen. Then John Biset remembred himselfe of a good deuise, and sayde to them of the towne that were about him. Let vs breake downe the staves of the bridge on this side, and then they that are within cannot issue out wythout oure daunger. And incontinent wyth Axes they bet downe the staves of the bridge. And then John Biset sent a messenger to Anwike a. xij. myles of to the Lorde Percy, certefying him of all the matter, desyryng him without delay to come to the rescue of the Castell.

Alexander Ramsay and his company, when they had slayne in the Castell whome it pleased them, and had taken the rest prisoners, and shut them by into a towre, then sayde Alexander, now let vs go downe to the towne, for it is oures, and let vs take all the goods that are therein, and let vs bring all the riche men into thys Castell, and then set fyre on the Towne, for it is not to be kept by vs. And within thre or foure dayes we shall haue rescue out of Scotlande, so that we shall saue all oure pillage: and at our departing let vs set fyre in the Castell, and so pay our hoste. To the which purpose they all agreed, for they all desyred pillage.

And then they toke eche of them a glayue in their handes, for they found enough in the Castell, and so opened the gate and let downe the bridge: And when the bridge was downe, the ropes that helde it brake, for the resting place of the bridge was broken awaye as aforesayde.

And when John Biset sawe the maner of them, he and all his company beganne to hooote and crye, and sayde: A Sirs, keepe you there, ye shall not not departe thence without our leaue.

And when Alexander Ramsay sawe the maner of them without, he knewe well that they were ware of his being in the Castell: and so with much a do closed in agayne the gate for feare of thot: and then they fortrefyed the Castell thinking to haue kept it. And they cast out into the ditches all the deade men that they had slaine, and locked the rest that were prisoners into a Towre. They thought that the place was strong enough to be kept for a long tyme, or at the least vntill some reskewe came to them out of Scotlande, which they thought would not be long.

So soone as the Messenger had declared the whole matter vnto the Lorde Percy, he immediatly sent knowledge into the whole countrie, & made hast himselfe to come to the reskewe, and the Barons, knightes and Esquiers of the countrie and good men of warre came vnto him from all places. And the first that came thether was the Erie of Northumberland, and then dailye came great companyes, so that at the last they mustered themselves, and they were aboute ten thousand men.

Then they besieged the Castell so nere that a Birde could not come out without knowledge. And after they beganne to mine vnder the Castell, the sooner to meete wyth the Scottes that were wythin, and so to recouer agayne the Castell.

Then tydings came to the Barons of Scotlande, howe the Erie, Barons, Knightes, and Esquiers of Northumberland had besieged their companie in the Castell of Barwike. And they were all determined to go and rayse by the siege, and to bitaile the Castell, for they sayde that Alexander Ramsays enterpryce was valiaunt. And to confirme the same, Sir Archibald Douglas Constable of Scotlande sayde: Alexander is my Cosyn, and it cometh of a noble courage, and valiaunt heart, to enterpryce suche a feate, and we ought to comfort and helpe him in his deede: Wherefore, if we may, let vs go raise the siege, it will redounde to our great noblenesse, and therefore let vs go thether. And then they tooke order who should go with him, and who should abyde, and so he toke with him five hundred Speares, the best of all the hoste, and so roade on toward Barwike.

Tydings came to the Englishe Lordes, that the Scottes were comyng to raise the siege, and to victuall the Castell. Then they went to counsaile, and so determined to take a place, & to abyde their enemies and to fight with them. And the Lorde Percy caused all his companie to be readie armed and furnished to fight, and to make their Musters, and they found themselves to be the number of thre thousand men of armes, and. liij. thousande Archers. And when the Erie sawe that he had so great a number, he sayde: Let vs kepe our place, we are men enowe to fight with all the puissaunce of Scotlande, and so they rested in a fayre playne without Barwike in two battayles in good order.

And they had not bene there the space of an houre, but they sawe certein Currouses of the Scottes well horsed, which came to biewe the Englishe hoste. And when these Currouses had well aduised the number of the Englishe men, then they returned to their maisters, and shewed them all that they had seene, and sayde: Sirs we haue ridden so nere to the Englishe men, that we haue well aduised and considered all their doying: And we saye vnto you, you, they are ready abiding for you in two fayre battalles, in a goodly plaine, and in euery battaille a fine thousande men. Therefore nowe take good aduice, for we approached so nere them, that they perceyued well that we were Currouers of Scotland, but they would not stirre nor sende out one man to runne at vs.

When sir Archibalde Douglas and his Captaines heard these tidings, they were pensife, and sayde: we cannot see that it should be for our protite to ryde as nowe against the Englishe men, for they are tenne agaynst one of vs, wherfore we may lose more than we can winne, and of a foolishe enterprize comineth no good, as we maye nowe see by Alexander Ramsay: and there was present an vnckle of Alexanders, called Sir William Lindsey, who tooke great paine to come to comfort his Nephewe. And he sayde vnto the companie: Sirs, on the trust of you, my nephew hath made this enterprize, and taken the Castell of Barwike: It will turne you all to great blame if ye lose him thus, and peradventure hereafter, there will be none so hastie to shewe somuch good will to our Countrie. And they answered and sayde, they could not amend it, neither was it mete that so many noble men as were there, should put themselves in aduventure of life or vndoing, for the sauyng of one Esquier. Wherfore they determined to returne againe to their awne Countrie, and so withdrew themselves.

Nowe when the Erle of Northumberland, and the Erle of Pottyngham, and the other Barons of England perceiued that the Scottes came not forwarde, they sente forth their Currouers, to knowe where they were become, and they brought worde how they were gone toward Mozlan beyond the Castell of Rosburgh.

Against night, the Englishe men drew againe to their lodgynges, and made good watch that night, and in the moornyng euery man was readie to go and assaile the Castell, and there was a fierce assault, and endured almost a whole day. There hath not beene seene more hardier men of so fewe, then those Scottes were, nor that better defended a place then they did. For the English men had ladders, which they rered by to the Walles, and they went by vpon them with Targettes ouer their heades, and before them, and so came and fought with the Scottes hande to hande, and some of them came downe againe into the Ditches: But the thing that troubled the Scottes most, was the Archers, who shot so wholly together, that they durst not come to the defense of the wall. So long this assault continued, that at the last the Englishe men entered by force, and there slue as many as they found, not one of them that were within that scaped, but were slaine, except Alexander Ramsay, whome they tooke prisoner. And thus the Castell of Barwike was againe recouered from the Scottes, and the Erle of Northumberland made John Biset Capitaine there, and he newly repayed the Castell & the brydge.

In the second yere of this kinges reigne (as sayth Reynulph:) By reason of a variaunce that chaunced betwene the Lord Latymer, and sir Raufe Ferrers on the one partie, and sir Robert Hall, and Shakerley Esquier on the other part, for a prisoner that was taken beyond the Sea in Spaine, called the Erle of Deane, whome the sayde Esquier kept in his possession, contrary to the mindes and willes of the aforesayd knightes. And here vpon the sayde knightes beyng in Choler, entered into the Church of Saint Peters at at Westminster, and there findyng the sayde Sir Robert Hall kneeling at Masse before the high Altar, drew out their swordes, and slue him: And afterward by their meanes and labour, caused the sayde Shakerley to be arrested, and committed to the Towre of London, where he was kept as prisoner a great while after, for he would not deliuer the Erle of Deane his prisoner vnto those two knightes: But Carton calleth them Lordes.

Sir Robert
Hall slaine in Westminster
Church.

About this tyme the French king sent a great number of Shippes and Galeyes into England, and they landed in dyuers places, as at Rye, at Winchelley, at Hastings, at Portesmouth, and in dyuers other places, and did great harme, but chiefly at Graues ende, where they landed, and spoyled the towne, & bzent a great part thereof, and so returned againe into France with much spoyle.

Graues ende
bzent and spoyled by the French-
men.

And in this yere a Parliament was called, and therein was graunted to the king foure pence of euery man and woman beyng of the age of xiiij. yeres and vward, that were within the realme, at the which Subsidy the people did greatly murmur, and much mischief came thereof, as in the yere following shall appere. But yet with that money, an armie was prepared and sent ouer, whereof Sir Thomas of Woodstock Erle of Cambridge, and Uncle to the king was chiefe Capitaine: The which beyng accompanied with vij. or viij. thousand men, passed the water of Some, and came vnto Soylones, and passed also the Ryuers of Dyle, and Marne, and other, and came before Troyes, and wanne it, and after lodged them betwene the newe Towne and Sens.

The people greatly murmured for the payment of four pence
the poole.

And euer as they passed the Countries they tooke great ranfomes of the people, or else set fyre on their towne. And although y the french king had sent an armie of frenchmen to resist them, yet they hindered them nothing at all of their purpose. For euer, if they chaunced to skirmishe, the frenchmen were put vnto the worse. And thus they continued forth their iourney, and passed by the Countrie of Gastynoyes, and so into Briteyne, where they were ioyously receyued of syr John de Mountfort, Duke of that Prouynce, who then was but newly come thither.

To the entent to haue a stay and quietnesse with Scotland there was sent vnto them in Ambassade John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, and he came to the Towne of Berwike. And from thence, he sent an Herault of Armes into Scotlande to the king and Barons there, shewing them that he was come to speake with them. And if they would, he would come and treate with them, and thereof he wyllid them to send him worde, or else he knewe right well what he had to doe. The Herault departed and roade to Edenborough, where king Robert of Scotlande, the Erle Douglas, the Erle de la Mare, the Erle Horet, and other the Lordes of Scotland were assembled together. For they had knowledge how that the Duke of Lancaster was comming thither to treate with them. Wherfore they were assembled in the chiefe towne of Scotland that ioyneth vpon the borders of England. And there the Herault did his message, and was well heard at length, and he had answere that they were well content to here the Duke speake. And so the Herault brought a safeconduyt for the Duke and his company, to endure as long as he was in the Marches & that they commoned together.

Thus the Herault returned to Barwike, and shewed how he had sped.

And

And so the Duke departed from Barwike and left all his prouision in the towne behinde him, and so came to Rosebourgh and there lodged. And the next daye he lodged at the Abbey of Maros which is on the ryuer, that departeth Englande and Scotlande a sunder. There the Duke and his companie taried, buttill the Scots were come to Honbanne, thre mile thence, & when they were come thether, they sent word to the Duke. Thus the treaty began betwene the Scots and the Englishmen, and it endured fiftene daies.

The commons
rebelled.

And in this meane whyle the commons of England rebelled, by the which the whole state of the realme was in great perill to be bitterly destroyed and lost: and because ye shall vnderstande the truth thereof, & that the rulers of the realme may preuent and foreseee suche lyke mischiefes as maye hereafter ensue, therefore I haue purposed fully to set forth at length, the truth and whole discourse thereof vnto you, as Froissart doth at large write the same.

Of small occasions great mischiefes growe and increase.

And first, consider how straunge a thing it is, that of so pore and simple a foundatiō, so great a mischiefe should growe and insurge, as this y foloweth. There was and is an vsage in England in many places, that the noble men and Lords of Manoures hauing fraunchises ought to haue seruices of the commons, that is to say, that their tenaunts ought by custome to plow their landes, to gather and bring home their corne, and some to threthe and fanne, and to carie wood, and water, and dyuers suche other things, which they ought to doe by their tenure and seruice that they owe to their Lordes. And lykewise there are another sort that holde their lands by billenage, and those are commonly called bondmen, of the which kinde of people there were then many in England, and specially in the County of Kent, Suffex and Bedford.

At this time there were a certaine of suche kinde of people as is aforesayde, that beganne to stirre in England and namely in Kent, and sayde they were in great seruitude and bondage: But sayd they, in the beginning of the worlde, there were no bond men: neyther ought there to be any now, except it were such a one as had committed treason agaynst his Lorde, as Lucifer did to God. But sayde they we can haue no suche battayle, for we are neyther Angelles nor spirites, but men framed and formed to the similitude of our Lordes, and therefore sayde they, why should we then be so kept vnder lyke beastes and slaues? And they playnely sayde they would no lenger suffer it, for they would be all one with their Lordes, and if they labored or did anye thing for their Lordes, they woulde haue wages for the same as well as other.

priest the setter forth, and the very aucethour of rebellion.

And of this imagination was a foolish priest in the Countie of Kent called John Wall, for the which lyke foolish words he had bene thre times in the Bishop of Cauntorburies prison. This priest vsed oftentimes on the Sundayes, when the people were going out of the Church after seruice, to call them back into the Cloyster or Churchyard, and to talke to them as foloweth: A good people, matters go not wel to passe in England in these dayes, nor shall not do vntill euery thing be common, and that there be no Willynnes nor gentlemen, but that we be all as one, and that the Lordes be no greater then we be. What haue we deserued, or why should we be thus kept in seruitude and bondage? We be all come from one father and one mother, Adam and Eue. Wherefore can they saye or shewe that they are greater Lordes then we be? sayyng in that which we get and labour for, that doe they spend.

They

They are clothed in Vcluet and Chamlet furred richly, and we be clad with the poozest sorte of cloth. They haue their wines, Spices, and fyne bread: and we haue the drawing out of the Chaffe, and drinke water. They dwell in fayre houses, and we in homely cotages, and we in the fieldes in winde and rayne. And with that which they haue by oure laboures, they keepe and maintaine their estates. We be called their bondmen, and without we doe them readie seruice, we must be beaten, punished or put out of our lyuings. And we haue no souereigne to whome we maye complayne, nor none that will here vs, nor doe vs right. Let vs go to the king, he is young, and shew him in what daunger we be in: and let vs shewe him plainely that we wyll haue it otherwise, or else we wyll prouyde a remedy for our selues. And if we set forward, all maner of people that are now in bondage will folow vs, to the entent they may be made free. And when the king seeth vs, he will prouyde some remedy for vs, epyther by fayrenesse or otherwise.

Thus John Wall vsed to talke on Sundayes, when the people went out of the Churches to go into the Villages, wherfore, many of the meane people loued him: and those that meant no goodnesse, sayde he sayde truth: and so they muttered together one with another in the fieldes and wayes as they went.

The Archebishop of Cauntorbury, who was agayne informed of thys John Wall, caused him to be taken and committed to prison, where he remained two or thre moneths, as a matter somewhat to correct his foly: howbeit, it had bene much better in the beginning that he had bene condemned to perpetuall prison, or else to haue dyed, rather then to haue suffered him agayne to be deliuered out of prison, for the great mischiefe that did ensue: But the Bishop had conscience to put him to death.

And when this John Wall was agayne come out of prison, he returned agayne to his olde trade. Of his wordes and deedes there were many peccle in London enformed, namely suche as had great enuy at them that were riche. And at the last they began to speake among themselues, and sayd: that the realme of England was euill gouerned, and how that Golde and Siluer was taken from them, by such as were named noble men. And thus a sort of vnhappy people gathered together about London, began to rebell, and sent worde into dyuerse Countries to such as they knewe, that they should come to London, and bring their people with them, promisyng that they should finde London open to receyue them, and the Commons of the Citie to be of the same mynde, and sayde, that they would worke so much with the king, that there should not be one bond man in all England.

This promise so moued them of Kent, Essex, Suffex, Bedford, and other Countries about, that they arose and came towardes London in great numbers. And they had made to themselues certeine Capitaines, named Watte Tyler, Jacke Strawe, and John Wall and other, of the which companie, Watte Tyler was the chiefe, and he was a Tyler in deede, and an vngracious Patrone.

When these vnhappy men began thus to stirre, they of London, namely the honest Citizens were greatly afrayed. Then the Maior of London, and the substanciall of the Citie toke counsaile together: and when they sawe the people come in on euery syde, they caused the Gates of the Citie to be closed, closed, and would suffer no man to enter into the Citie: But when they had better aduised themselves, they thought it not best so to do, least they might chaunce thereby to geue an occasion that their Suburbs might be bzent. And so they opened againe the Gates of the Citie. And there entered in by xx. and. xxx. together, in some places an hundzeth, and in other places two hundzeth, and tooke their lodgyng within the Citie, but to say truely, the thirde parte of these people coulde not tell what to aske or demaunde, or wheretoze they came, but that one folowed another for company, as brute Beastes.

The same day that these unhappie people of Kent were commyng to London, there returned from Cauntorbury the kinges mother Princesse of Wales, comming from her pilgrimage. She was in great ieopardy to haue bene lost: For these people came to her Chayze, and dealt rudely with her, whereof the good Lady was in great doubt, least they would haue done some vilany to hir, or her Damoselles: howbeit God kept her, and she roade in one day from Cauntorbury to London, for she neuer durst tary by the way. And the same tyme king Richard her sonne, was at the Tower of London, and there his mother found him, and with him there was the Erle of Sarisbury, the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, Sir Robert of Namure, the Lorde of Somegines, and dyuers other, who were in doubt of this people that thus were gathered together, and wist not what they demaunded.

This rebellion was well knowen in the kinges Court, befoze anye of these people began to styrre out of any of their houses: But the king noz hys counsaile prouided not remedie therefoze in due tyme.

But here to begin and shew foorth the story in order. First on the Monday in the yere of our Lorde. 1381. certeine of the aforesayd people issued out of London, and came first to Cauntorbury, and there John Ball or John Wall had thought to haue found the Bishop, but he was at London with the king. When Watte Tyler, and Jacke Strawe entered into Cauntorbury, all the Common people made great ioy, for all the towne was of their mind. And there they tooke counsaile to go to London to the king, and to send some of their companie ouer the Thames into Essex, and likewise to send another company into Suffer, and into the Counties of Stafford, and Bedford, to speake to the people, that they should all come to the farther syde of London, and thereby to close London rounde about, so that the king should not stop their passages, and that they should all mete together on Corpus Christi day.

They that were at Cauntorbury did much harme, for they entered into Saint Thomas Church, and robbed, and brake by the Bishops Chamber. And in robbing and bearyng out their pillage, sayde, A, this Chaunceloz of England hath had a good Market to bring together all this riches: he shall geue vs nowe an accompt of the reuenues of England, and of the great profites that he hath gathered sithen the Coronation.

Then this Monday they came from Cauntorbury, and tooke their way to Rochester. And in their passage they spoyled the houses of all men of lawe that stood in their way, whether they were Spirituall or Tempozall. And when they were come to Rochester, there they had good cheere, for the people of that towne were of that minde. And then they went to the Castel there, and tooke the knight that had the rule thereof, who was called Sir John Motton: and they sayde vnto him, Sir John, you must go with vs, and ye shall be shalbe our souereigne Capteyne, and doe that we will haue you doe. The Knight made many excuses very honestly and discretely, but it auayled him nothing, for they sayde vnto him, Sir John, if ye do not as we will haue you do, ye are but dead. The Knight perceyving those people in that furye, and readie to slay him: He then fearyng death, agreed vnto them, and so he went with them, though against his will. And in like maner did they in other countries in England, as Essex, Suffer, Stafford, Bedford, and Warwike, euen to Lincolne. For they brought the knightes and Gentlemen into such a feare, that they caused them to go with the whether soeuer they would haue them, as the Lorde Holin a great Baron, sir Stephen of Hales, and sir Thomas of Silighen, and other.

Then on the Tuesday these people lodged at Rochester, and from thence departed and came ouer the ryuer there, and so kept on their way towarde London, vntill they came to Datzford, spoylyng and bzennyng as they went, all the houses that belonged to any man of lawe, what soeuer they were, and they stroke of the heades of dyuers personnes: And so long they came forwarde, that at the last they came to Blackheth, which is within foure myle of London, and euer as they went, they sayde they were the kings men, and the seruantes of the noble Commons of England.

But when they of the Citie of London knewe that they were so neere vnto them: The Maior closed the Gates, and stopped the passages.

And whyle the lewde company lay on Blackheth, they agreed the next day, which was Wednesday, to sende syr John Motton (whome they called their knight) to the king, to shewe him that all that they had done and doe, is for him and his honour: and howe the realme of Englande hath not bene well gouerned of a great space, neyther for the honour nor common profite of the same, by his Uncles, nor yet by the Clergie, and specially by the Archebishop of Cauntorburie his Chauncelour, of whome they woulde haue accompt: But when they had well bethought themselves, they wylled syr John Motton to let these things alone, and to say to the king that they desyred to speake with him, because that to him, and to none other they woulde open their griefes. The aforesayde knight durst doe none other, but passed ouer the Thames and came to the Towze, prayng to speake with the king. The king and they that were with him in the towze, desirous to here newes, wylled that the knight should come vnto them. And at that tyme there were present with the king, first the princesse his mother, and hys two brethren, the Erle of Kent, and the Lorde John Holland, the Erle of Salburie, the Erle of Warwike, the Erle of Oxford, the Archebishop of Cauntorbury, the Lord of Saint Johns, Sir Robert of Namure, the Lord of Uertaigne, the Lorde of Somegines, the Maiour of London, and dyuers other notable Citizens.

This knight syr John Motton, who was well knowen among them, for he was one of the kinges officers. He kneeled downe befoze the king, and sayde. My redoubted Lorde, let it not displease your grace, the message that I must shew vnto you, for deare syr, it is by force and agaynst my will, Sir John, sayde the king, save what ye will, I holde you excused, Sir, the commons of your realme hath sent me vnto you, for to desyre you to come and speake with them on Blackheth, for they desyre to speake with you and none none other. And saye ye neede not to haue any doubt of your person, for they will doe you no hurte, for they holde and will holde you for their king: But Sir, they say they will shewe you diuers things the which shall be right necessary for you to take heede of, when they speake with you, of the which thinges I haue no charge to shewe you: But I humbly beseeche you, to geue me your aunswere, suche as may appease them, and that they maye knowe for truth that I haue spoken with you, for they haue my children in hostage vntill I returne agayne vnto them: and if I returne not agayne, they will slea my children incontynent. Then sayde the king, ye shall haue aunswere forthwith.

Then the king toke counsaile what was best for him to doe, and it was anon determined that the nexte morning the king would go downe by water, and without fayle speake with them, by the Thames side, whither he willed that a certaine of them should come vnto him.

And when saye John Motton had that aunswere, he desyred nothing else, and so he tooke his leaue of the king and of his Lords, and returned agayne to Blackheth, where he had left mothen. lx. thousande men: And there he declared his aunswere, which was, that the next morning they should sende some of their counsaile vnto the Thames, and the king would come and speake with them. This aunswere greatly pleased them, and so passed away that night, and the fourth parte of them fasted for lack of victuall, which greued them muche.

In the morning being thursday, the king being accompanied wyth the Erle of Salburie, the Erle of Warwike, the Erle of Suffolk and certaine knyghtes, tooke his Barge and rowed downe along the Thames to Detforde, and there were come downe the hill aboue ten thousand of the aforesayde persons, to see and speake with the king.

And when they sawe the kings Barge comming, they began to shoute, and made suche a crie as if all the Deuills in hell had bene among them. And they had brought with them Sir John Motton, to the entent that if the king had not come, they would haue hewen hym all to pieces, and so they promysed hym.

And when the king and his Lords sawe the demeanour of the people, the stoutest hearted of them that were with the king were afrayed. And the Lordes counsailed the king not to take any landyng there, but to rowe by and downe the ryuer. And the king demaunded of them what they would, for sayde he, I am come hether to speake with you. And they all with one voyce sayde: we would that ye should come a lande, and then we will shewe you what we lack. Then the Erle of Salbury aunswere for the king, and sayde, Sirs, ye be not in suche good order nor araye that the king ought to speake with you. And with those wordes, they were somewhat stayed. Then the king was counsailed to returne agayne to the Towre of London, and so he did. And when they sawe that, they were enflamed with wrath and returned to the hill where the great bande was. And there they shewed them what aunswere they had, and howe the king was returned to the Towre of London. Then they cryed all wyth one voyce, let vs go to London, and so they tooke their waye thether, and in their goyng they bet downe the Lawyers houses without all mercie, and many other houses of suche as had offices offices vnder the king. And specially they brake by the Kinges prisons, as the Marshalsey, and kinges Benche, and deliuered freely all the prisoners that were within. And at the brydge foote, because the Gates were closed, they threatened sore the Citezens of London, sayeng how they would brenne all the suburbes, and also slea all the commons of the Citie, and set the Citie on fyre. And within the Citie were a great number of their affinitie, and they sayde: why doe not we let these good felowes into the Citie? they are oure felowes, and that that they doe, is for vs: And shortly after the gates were opened, and they entred into the Citie, and went into houses, and late do bene to eate and drinke. And they could call for nothing but it was brought vnto them, for euery man was readie to make them good cheere, and to please them with meate and drinke.

Then their Capteynes Watte Tyler, Jacke Straw, Jacke Shepard, and other, to the number of. xx. thousand, went through London, and came to the Sauoy, which then was a goodly place, and perteyned to the Duke of Lancaster. And when they were entered therein, they first slue the keepers thereof, and then spoyled and robbed the house. And when they had so done, they set fyre on it, and cleane consumed and destroyed it: And then came vnto the Temple and other Innes of Court, and spoyled the Bookes of law, and the recorderes of the Counter, and set all the prisoners of Newegate and the Counters at large. And when they had this done, then they went streight to the goodly Hospitall of the Rhodes, called Saint Johns beyond Smithfiede, and spoyled that likewyse, and then consumed it with fyre. Then they went from streete to streete in London, and slue all the Flemyngees that they could meete withall, eyther in Church or in any other place, and they brake by diuers houses of the Lombardes, and robbed them, and toke their goodes at their pleasure. And the same tyme they slue in the Citie a riche Citizen called Richard Lion, for that Watte Tyler once dwelled with him, and on a tyme did beate him, wherefore he was nowe reuenged vpon him, and caused his head to be stricken off, and put vpon the poynt of a Speare, and made it to be borne before him throughout London. Thus these vngacious people demeaned themselues, like mad and outrageous bestes. And toward night they went to Saint Katherines befoze the Tower of London: sayng howe they would neuer departe thence vntill they had the king at their pleasure, and vntill that he had graunted vnto them all that they would aske, and haue speciall accomptes of the Chaunceloz of England to know where all the treasure was become that he had leuyed through the realme: & without he made a good accompt thereof, it should not be for his profite. And so after they had spent all this day, beyng Thursday, and then called Corpus Christi day, and was then a highe and festiuall daye, in doying of mischietes and murders, they rested at night befoze the Towre, as aforesayde.

But here may ye well thinke, that this was a heauy and troublous night vnto the king, and those that were with him in the Tower, for such was the behauiour of these vileynes, that dyuerse and sondry tymes in the night they shouted and cryed as all the deuilles in hell had roared.

And in this Euenyng the king was counsailed by his brethren and Lordes, and by sir Nicholas Walworth Maior of London, and diuers other worshipfull Citizens, that in the night tyme they should haue issued out of the Tower, and haue entred into the Citie, & there to haue had ayde, & so to haue slaine al those vnhappy people that then were at their rest, for it was thought that many of them were drunken, by reason whereof they might haue bene slaine like flees, and among. xx. of them there was scant one in harness. And surely the good men of London might haue done this at their ease, for they had secretly in their houses a great number of theyr friendes, and seruauntes readie harnessed.

And also sir Robert Canolle was in his lodgyng, keepyng the kinges treasure, with sixe score readie at his commaundement. And in lyke maner was sir Perducas Dalbert, who was as then at London. In somuche as there might haue bene assembled. viij. thousand men well harnessed and appointed: Howbeit, there was nothing done, for they were in feare of the rest of the Commons of the Citie, and againe the number of the Commons of the Countrie were. lx. thousand and mo.

Then the Erle of Sarisbury, and the wyse men about the king sayd, sir if ye can appease them with faire wordes, it were best and most profitable so to do, and to graunt them euery thing that they desyre. So this counsaile was accepted and folowed, and the Maior countermaunded not to stirre that night. And in the Citie with the Maior, there were. xii. Aldermen, wherof ix. of them helde with the king, & the other thre took part with the vngacious people, as it was after well knowne, the which they ful derely bought.

On the Friday in the moznyng the people that were lodged at Saint Katheryns, began to apparell themselves, and to cry and howte, and sayde: Without the king would come out and speake with them, they would assault the Tower, and take it perforce, and sley all them that were therein.

Then the king doubted those wordes, and he was counsailed to go out and speake with them. And then the king sent vnto them that they should all draw to a fayre plaine place called Mylende, where as the people of the Citie did vse to shote, and thether the king promised to come to them, and to graunt them whatsoeuer they desyred.

Then the people began to depart, specially the Commons of the Villages, and went to the same place, but all went not thether, for they were not all of one condicion, nor of one minde. For there were some that desyred nothing but spoyle, and the bitter destruction of noble men, and to rob and sacke London: And that was the principall matter of their beginnyng, the which they well shewed. For assone as the Tower Gate opened, and that the king issued out with his two brethren, and the Erle of Sarisbury, the Erle of Warwike, the Erle of Orford, Sir Robert of Hamure, the Lord of Briteyne, the Lord Somegines, and dyuerse other. Then Watte Tyler, Jacke Strawe, and John Wal, alias Wall, and mo then foure hundreth entered into the Tower, and brake by Chamber after Chamber, and at the last found the Archbishop of Cauntorbury called Simon, a valiaunt man & a wise, and high Chaunceloz of England, and him they brought out, and stroke off his heade, and also beheaded the Lorde of Saint Johns, and a gray Friar, which was a Phisition belongyng to the Duke of Lancaster, for hatred that they had to hys mayster, and a Sergeaunt at armes called John Laige. And these foure heades they put vpon the endes of foure long Speares, and they made them to be bozne before them thzough the streetes of the Citie. And at the last set them them on high at London bzydge, as though they had bene Traytors to the king and to the realme. Also these wretches entred into the Princesse Chamber, and brake her head, with the which she was so sore afrayde, that she sobned, and so was taken by and bozne to the water syde, and put in a Barge, & couered, and so conueyed to a place called the Royall, which then was the Queenes Wardrobe, and there she was all that day and night, as a woman halfe deade, vntill shee was comforted with the king her sonne, as ye shall after here.

Now when the king was come to Mylende without London, he put out of his company his two brethren the Erle of Kent, and syr John Hollande and the Lorde of Somegines, for they durst not appere before the people. And when the king and his other Lords were there, he founde there a lx. thousand men of dyuers Villages and of sundrie Countries in Englande.

And the king entered in among them, and spake vnto them gently and sayde. A good people, I am your king, what lacke ye? what doe ye saye? Then such as heard him sayd, that ye will make vs free for euer, our selues, our heyres, and oure landes, and that we be called no more bondmen, nor from henceforth so to be reputed or taken. Sirs, sayde the king, I doe gladly graunt your request: withdrawe you home to your abone houses, and into suche Villages as ye came from, and leaue behind you of euery Village two or thre, and I wyll cause wytynges to be made and seale them woth my seale, the which they shall haue with them, containing euery thing that ye demaund. And to the entent that ye shall be the better assured, I will cause my Banners to be delyuered vnto euery Waplywike, Shire and Countie.

These wordes quieted well the common people, and suche as were simple and good plaine men that were come thether, and wist not wel wherfoze: They answered the king, it was well sayde, they desyred no better. And so they beganne to withdrawe themselves, and came into the Citie of London. And the king sayde also one worde, the which greatly contented them, and that was: syr, among you good men of Kent, ye shall haue one of my banners, and ye of Essex another, of Bedford, of Cambridge, of Stafford, of Lyncolne, and of Lyn, eche of you shall haue one. And also I pardon euery thing that ye haue done hetherto, so that ye folowe my Banners, and returne home to your houses. They all answered they would so doe. Thus these people departed and went to London.

Then the king appointed mo then. xxx. Clerkes the same fridaye to write with all diligence letters patents, to be sealed with the kinges seale, and to be delyuered to these people: and as they receaued their wytyngs, so they departed into their Countries.

But yet the great venome remayned behinde, for Watte Tyler, Jack Strawe, and other of their Captaines sayde, they would not so depart, and there agreed vnto them mo then. xxx. thousand: And thus they abode stil, and made no haste, neyther to haue the kings wytyng nor Seale, for their ententes was to haue spoyled the Citie. The which thing all the honest Citizens of London greatly feared, and therefore had priuely in their houses their friends in a readynesse.

When it drewe somewhat toward night, the king came to the Towre in the Royall, where the Princesse his mother beyng in great feare had remayned all that daye, to comfort her and taried there with her all that night.

And here (sayth Froissart) I will tell you what happened among these unhappie people before the Citie of Norwiche by a Capitaine among them named William Lyster of Stafforde. The afozenamed daye of Corpus Christi that the aforesayde lewde people entered into London, the berye same tyne they assembled together of Stafford, of Lynne, of Cambridge, of Bedford. And as they were comming towardes London they had a Capitaine among them called Lyster, and as they came they stayed before Norwiche, and all the waye as they passed, they caused euery man to arise with them, so that they left fewe lewde people behinde them. And the cause why they stayed before Norwiche was this. There was a knight, and a Capitaine of the Towne called Sir Robert Sale, he was no gentleman borne, but he was sage and balaunt in armes, and for his balauntnesse king Edward made him knight, he was of his body one of the mightiest men in Englād.

William Lyster Captayn of the rebels.

Sir Robert Sale a balaunt knight.

Lyster the lewde Captayne of this route, thought that this man was meete to be a Capitaine among them, to the entent they might be the more dradde and feared of the people: wherfore they sent vnto him that he shoulde come and speake with them in the fielde. The knight considered that it were better for him to go and speake with them, rather then by his not goyng he shoulde prouoke them to doe any outrage to the towne, and therefore he took his horse, and ryd vnto them all alone, hauyng no company with him. And when they sawe him, they shewed him most ioyfull and louing countenance and honored him very much, and prayed him to alight of his horse, for they were desyrus to common with him, and he so did, wherin he did very fondly. And asone as he was alighted, they came rounde about him, and began to speake very sayre vnto him, and sayde. Sir Robert, ye are a knight and a man greatly beloued in thys Countrie, and counted for a balaunt man. And though you be so, yet we knowe you well, ye are no gentleman borne, but sonne to a Willyne, suche as we be: Therfore we will that ye shall go with vs, and we will make you so great a Lorde that one quarter of Englande shall be vnder your obeyfaunce.

When the knight had heard them thus speake, it offended him not a litle, wherfore beholding them with a cruell looke, he sayde vnto them: Admoyde ye false trayterous and ungracious people: wene you that I will forsake the obedience and duety that I owe vnto my soueraigne Lorde for such a company of knaues as ye be, which should be to my dishonour for euer: I had rather ye were all hanged, as I doubt not but ye shall be, for that wyll be your ende. And with those wordes he had thought to haue left agayne to his horse, but he fayled of the Stryop, and the horse sterted awaye.

Then they cryed all with one voyce, at him, and sleigh him without mercy. And when he heard those wordes he let his horse go, and drew out his sworde, and beganne to skirmishe with them, and he made suche ryme about him that it was pleasure to beholde him, for there was none that durst come nere him. Howbeit, some there were that did approche neere vnto him, but at euery stroke that he gaue, he cut of eyther legge, head, or arme, and there was none so hardie but that they feared him. He did there suche deedes of armes, that it was maruell to beholde, but the number of these lewde people were mo then. xl. thousande, and they shot soze at him and wounded him to death. But yet befoze he dyed he slue. xij. of them out of hande, beside many other that he hurte: and finally he was stryken to the earth, and they cut of his armes and legges, and then hewed his body all to peeces. And thys was the end of syr Robert Sale, which did not a litle offend all the knights and squires of Englande: But now to retorne where we left.

Sir Robert Sale knyght.

On Saturday, the next day in the forenoone, the king had bene at Westminster, and came from thence on the backsyde through Holbozne into London, and thought to haue ridden to the Tower, and as he came ouer Smithfielde, he sawe there Watte Tyler, Jacke Strawe, and their companie assembled together, which caused him a litle to stay, and considering them wel, they seemed to be nere vnto the number of. xx. thousand, and all this company had the kings Banners, for they were deliuered vnto them the day befoze. And these vileyne sayde among themselues, let vs ouerruine and spoyle this Citie wherem we may haue great rycheffe, befoze that they of Essex, Suffe, Cambridge, Bedford, Arundell, Warwike, Redyng, Oxenford, Gylford, Lynne, Stafforde, Lyncolne, Poike, and Duram do come hether. For Wallior and Lister will bring them hether, and they will be Lordes of London if we be not, and therefore nowe seeyng we be first here, why should we not geue the attempt: and to this they were all agreed, and euen therewithall the king came.

Wallior Lyster.

And when Watte Tyler sawe the king, he sayd to his company, yonder is the king, I will go speake with him, ferre not you quoth he to his people, from hence, except I make you a signe, and when I make you a signe, come on together, and slay them all (except the king.) But do the king no hurt, for he is yong, and we shall rule him as we list, and leade him with vs round about Englande, and so without doubt we may be Lordes of the realme. And therewith he spurred his horse, and came to the king, so nere him that hys horse touched the kinges horses heade as they roade, and the first worde that he sayde vnto the king was this, Sir king, seest thou all yonder people? ye truly sayd the king, wherfore askest thou that? Because sayde he, they be all at my commaundement, and haue swozne to me fayth and trouth, to do all that I will haue them. In a good tyne sayde the king, be it so. Then sayde Watte Tyler, as he that sought nothyng but ryot. What, beleuest thou king, that these people and as many mo that are in London, which are at my commaundement, that they will depart from thee thus, without hauyng thy letters? So sayd the king, ye shall haue them, they are appoynted for you, and shall be deliuered eche of you one after another: wherfore good felowes withdrawe your selues to your people, and cause them to depart out of London, for it is our entent that eche of you by Villages and Towneships shall haue letters Patents as I haue promised you. With those wordes Watte Tyler cast his eye on a Squier that was ther with the king, and bare the kinges sworde. And Watte Tyler hated greatly the same Squier, for wordes that had passed the day befoze betwene them, and sayde vnto him, what, sayth he, art thou there? Geue me thy dagger. Nay sayd the Squier, that will I not do, wherfore should I geue it thee? The king behelde the squier and sayd, geue it him, let him haue it, and he gaue it him. And when Watte Tyler had it, he began to play wyth it in his hand, turning of it: And then he sayde agayne to the Squier, geue me that sworde, nay sayd he, it is the kings

An arrogant and proud vileyne.

Sworde,

Sworde,

sworde, thou art not worthie to haue it, for thou art but a knaue. And there were no mo here but thou and I, thou durst not demaund any such things of me, neyther to speake as thou hast spoken, for as much Golde as would lye in yonder Abbey: By my fayth sayd Watte Tyler, I will neuer eate meate vntill I haue thy head.

And with those wordes the Shaiour of London came to the king, with xij. horses well armed vnder their coates, and so he brake the pcase, and saw and heard the demeanour of Watte Tyler in the presence of the king, and he sayde vnto him, Ha thou knaue, howe darest thou be so bolde in the kinges presence to speake suche wordes, it is to much to suffer thee so to do. Then the king began to chafe, and sayde to the Shaiour, let handes on him. And when the king had sayd so, Watte Tyler sayde to the Shaiour, a Gods name, what haue I sayde to displease thee? Yes truely quoth the Shaiour, thou false sūking knaue, halt thou speake thus in the presence of the king my naturall Lorde? I wishe neuer to liue, except thou dearely by it. And with those wordes the Shaiour drewe out his sworde, and stroke Watte Tyler suche a stroke on the heade, that he fell downe at the feete of his horse. And alsoone as he was fallen, he was compassed round about, so that he was not seene of his company. Then a Squier alighted, called John Standishe, and thrust his sworde into Watte Tylers belly, and so he dyed.

Then the vnhappy people there assembled, perceyving their Capteyne slaine, began to murmure among themselves, and sayd: A, our Capteine is slaine, let vs go and slay them all. And therewith they raunged themselves in the place in maner of battaile, and their Bowes bent before them.

Thus the king began a great outrage, howbeit all happened to the best: for as soone as Watte Tyler was on the earth, the king departed from all his company, and all alone he roade to the naughtie companie, but before his goyng, he sayde to his awne people, sirs, folowe not me, let me alone. And when he came to the vngacious people, who had put themselves in order of warre, to be reuenged of the death of their Captaine: The king sayde vnto them, Sirs what ayleth you, ye shall haue no Capteine but me, I am and will be your king and Captaine, be you therefore quiet. And a great number that heard him speake, and seeyng him in presence, quieted them selues, and departed. But such as were wicked and maliciously mynded, would not depart, but made a shewe as though they would do somewhat.

Then the king returned to his awne company, and demaunded of them what was best to doe. Then he was counsayled to drawe into the field, for to flie away was no boote. Then sayde the Shaiour, it is good that we do so, for I thinke surely we shall haue some comfort of them of London, and of suche good men as be of our parte, who are prouided and haue their friends and men armed in their houses.

And in this meane time, a crye and noyes went through the Citie, how the king and the Shaiour were lyke to be slayne by these naughtie people: By reason of which noyes, a great number of good men issued out of their houses, and came into Smithfield where the king was. And they were a none to the number of seauen or eyght thousand men well armed.

And first, thether came Sir Robert Canol and Sir Perducas Dalbret well accompanied, and dyuers of the Aldermen of London, and with them

sire hundred men in harneys. And a worthie and puissaunt man of the Citie which was the kinges Draper, called Nicholas Brembre, and he brought wyth him a great companie, and euer as they came, they raunged themselves on foote in order of battaile.

And on the other part these vnhappie people were readie raunged, making countenance as though they would presently fight: and they had with them dyuers of the kings Banners.

There the king made foure knightes. The one the Shaiour of London, Syr Nicholas Walwoorth, Sir John Standishe and Syr Nicholas Brembre. Then the Lords sayde among themselves, what shall we doe? we see our enimies who would gladly slei vs, if they might haue the better hande of vs. Syr Robert Canoll counsayled to go and fight with them and slei them all. But the king would not consent thereto, but sayde: Naye, I will not so, I will sende to them commaundyng them to sende me agayne my Banners, and thereby we shall see what they wyll doe: Howbeit, eyther by fayre meanes or otherwise, I wyll haue them: That is well sayde, quoth the Erle of Salbury. Then these newe knightes were sent to them, and these knightes made token to them that they should not shoote at them. And when they came so nere them that their speche might be heard, they sayde: Sirs, the king commaundeth you to sende him agayne his Banners. And incontinent they deliuered the Banners, & sent them to the king, and then they were commaunded vpon payne of their heads, that all suche as had letters of the king, to bring them forth, and to sende them agayne to the king, and many of them deliuered their letters, but not all. Then the king commaunded them to be all tozne in their presence. And alsoone as the kinges Banners were taken from them, they kept none array, but the most parte of them threwe downe their bowes, and so brake their array, and returned into London. Sir Robert Canoll was sore displeased that he might not set on them, but the king would not, but sayde he would be reuenged on them well enough, and so he was after.

Thus these beastly people departed, some one waye and some another. And the king and his Lordes, and all his company right comely and orderly entred into London with great ioye, and forthwith his grace went to the Lady Princesse his mother, being in the Tower of the Roiall, where she had taried two dayes, and two nightes, in great feare (as she had good cause) And when she sawe the king her sonne, she greatly reioyced and sayde: A fayre some, what paine and sorow haue I suffered for you this daye. Then the king spake and sayde, Madame, I know it right well, but now I pray you reioyce and thanke God, for it his high time. I haue thys daye recouered mine heritage and the realme of England, which I had almost lost. And thus the king taried that day with his mother, and euery Lord went peaceably to their awne lodgings. And forthwith a proclamation was made in euery streete in the kings name, that all maner of men, not being of the Citie of London, neyther hath dwelt there the space of one yere, to departe. And if any suche be founde there, the next day, which was Sunday, by the Summe ryng, that they should be taken as Traytors to the king, and to lose their heades. Alsoone as this proclamation was made, they sparkled abroade, euery man to their awne homes.

And here is to be noted that in the tellyng of all this stoze, Sir John Froyssart nameth one John Ball to be a chiefe Captaine, and I finde none other Authour that nameth any such, but Jack Straw, and Jack Shepard. But I thinke it is some fault in the print, and that it shoulde be John Wall, for in the beginning of the stoze is set forth that a simple priest called John Wall was the first mouer, and speciall authour, and setter forth of thys rebellion, and therefore lyke enough that he was one of their Captaines. And it should the rather appere so to be, for that in the beginning of thys enterpryses, they went first to the Byshop of Cauntozburie, and spoyled hys house, and bare suche malice vnto him that after they slew him in the tower of London. And the same Byshop of Cauntozbury had thre or foure times emprisoned the sayde John Wall for his lewde communication that tended to rebellion, & therefore most lyke it should be John Wall, & sought to be reuenged.

In like maner the aforesayde authour Sir John Froyssart doth in thys stoze acompt Watte Tyler to be the chiefe of this rowte, whom he saith was a Tyler in dede, and an vngacious patrone. But Fabian, Carton, Kastell, Cowper, Polidore and many other Authours doe impute Jack Straw to be chiefe, and more Froyssart sayeth it was Watte Tyler that bragged with the king, and toke by the Maior of London in the kinges presence, and also that it was Watte Tyler whome the Maior of London did overthrow: But all other say it was Jack Strawe, and it should seeme rather Watte Tyler, for that in all this discourse he was the busiest bragger of all the Captaines. But which of them so euer it was, they were naught all.

But nowe sayth Froyssart, John Ball, and Jack Strawe were founde hidden in an olde house, where they had thought to haue stollen awaye, but they could not, for they were accused by their awne company. Of the taking of them, the king and his Lordes were glad, he caused their heades to be stricken of, and Watte Tylers also, and commaunded them to be set vpon London bridge, and those valiaunt mens heades to be taken doone, which they had set on befoze. These tydings spreade abroad so, that the people of strange Countries which were comming towardes London, returned back agayne to their houses, and durst come no further.

And here we must retorne to the Duke of Lancaster, who all the time of this rebellio was in Scotland in treatye of a peace as ye haue heard befoze. And so long they continued this treatie, that at the last a truce was concluded to remain for thre yeres, & when this truce was concluded then the Lordes of eche part made good chere to other. Then sayd the Erle of Douglas to the Duke of Lancaster: sir we know right well of the rebellion of the common people in England, & the peril that the realme is in at this present, and sir we take you for a right sage & valiaunt man, that in all the tyme of this communication of the treatie ye would not seme to vnderstand any thing therof: but syr, we say now vnto you, & we offer our selues to be redy to aide you with .v. or .vi. C. speares, and to do you seruice. By my fayth saide the Duke, gentle Lordes I thanke you, I will not refuse your friendly offer: howbeit I thinke verily that the king my lord hath so good counsaill, & it shall be pacified right well: howbeit, I desyre you to haue a sauve conduyt for me & mine to retorne into your Coutrie if neede be, vntill the matter be appeased. The Erle Douglas, and the Erle Moret who had the kinges aucthoritie, graunted him hys desyre, desyre, and so they departed, the Scottes went to Edenbourgh.

The Duke of Lancaster and his people wente to Barwike, wenyng to the Duke to haue entered into the towne, for when he passed that way, he left all his prouision behinde him: But the Capteyne of the towne called Sir Mathew Redmayn denyed him to enter, and closed in the gates against him and his, sayng he was so commaunded by the Erle of Northumberland. And when the Duke heard these words, he was soze displeased and sayde: Howe cometh this to passe, Mathew Redmayn: is there in Northumberlande a greater souereigne then I am, which should let me to passe this way where all my prouision is with you: what meaneth these newes? By my fayth sir, sayde the knight, this is true that I say, and by the commaundement of the king: and sir, this that I do to you is right soze agaynst my will, but I must nedes do it, and therefore for Goddes sake holde me excused, for I am thus commaunded vpon paine of my life, that I shall not suffer you, nor none of yours to enter into the towne.

Then the Duke not sayng all that he thought, brake out of this matter, and sayde, Sir Redmayn, what tydynges out of England: and he sayde, he knewe none, but that the Countries were soze moued, and the king had sent to all this Country to be in a redinesse when he should send. Then the Duke mused a litle, and sodeinly turned his horse, and bid the knight farewell, and so went to the Castell of Rosebourgh, and the Constable receyued him. Then the Duke of Lancaster was counsayled, that because he was not sure howe the matters went in Englande, neyther knewe not of whome he was beloued, or hated, that therefore he should send vnto the Lordes of Scotland, desyrng them to sende a quantitie of men of warre to conuey him into Scotland: And then he sent to the Erle Douglas, who was as then at Alquest. And when the Erle sawe the letter, he was right glad thereof, and made the Messenger great cheere, and sent worde thereof to the Erle Moret, and to the Erle de la Mare his brother, prayng them incontinent without any delay to meete with him at Mozlane the thirde day after, with a certeine number well horsed and appoynted. Assoone as these Lordes knewe this, they sent for men and friendes, and so came to Mozlane, and there they found the Erle Douglas, and so they roade altogether, to the number of fiftie hundred speares, and came to the Abbey of Mauros, which was .ix. litle myle frome Rosebourgh. And on the way they met the Duke, and there the one embraced the other right louingly, and then kept forth their iourney vntill they came to Edenbourgh, where the king of Scottes of late had beene, but as then he was in the wilde Scottishe. There the Duke of Lancaster was greatly honoured of the Erle Douglas, and of the Barons of Scotland and the Castell was deliuered to the Duke to lie in, and there he lay vntill other newes came out of England, which was not so soone as the Duke had wished. And in the mean season, many naughtie reportes and rumors were raysed and bruted by the rebellious people, of the Duke of Lancaster, affirmyng that he was become Scottishe, and a traytour to England: and Lyffer, Watte Tyler, Jacke Strawe, John Ball, and other Capteynes of the rebelles affirmed at the present houres of their death, the same to be true. The which caused many shamefull and slanderous tales to be reported of the Duke in euery parte of England. And no doubt these villeynes bare great hatred hated to the Duke of Lancaster, as appered by the brennyng of his house, and spoylyng of the same, and by the murderynge of his Phisition.

And soone after the death of these lewde Capternes, the king visited his realme and sate in sundrie places, and made inquirie of the aforesayde rebels, and he persecuted them in very quiet maner, from one billage to another, and from one towne and Countie to another, so long vntill at the last, he had executed aboue. xv. hundreth of them, and the rest he pardoned, and so all the realme was quieted.

Then the king sent for his vnckle the Duke of Lancaster out of Scotland, whereof he was glad, and at his departing he thanked the Lordes of Scotland of their great friendship. And the Erle Douglas, the Erle Mazer, and other Lordes of Scotland would nedes bring him as farre as Mauris and there eche toke leaue of other. And thus the Duke came to Rosebourgh, to Newcastle vpon Tyne, and so to Durham, & Porke, & at the last to Lodon.

And when he had shewed to the king and his Counsaile how he had done with the Scottes: Then he forgate not to shewe howe Sir Mathew Medmayn shutte him out of Barwike. And the Duke inquired of the king if he would allow that deede, and it seemed that the king did but faintly allowe it. So the Duke sayde no moze at that tyme.

And shortly after on the day of the Assumption of our Ladie in August, the king helde a solempne feast at Westminster, vnto the which came many Nobles and Lordes of England, and there was the Erle of Northumberland, and the Erle of Nottyngnam, and dyuers other Lordes of the Forth. And the king made knightes the same day the young Erle of Pembroke, Sir Robert Haubre, sir Nicholas Twyford, and sir Adam fraunces.

And at this feast there were great wordes betweene the Duke of Lancaster, and the Erle of Northumberland. The Duke sayd vnto him, Henrie Percy, I knowe not that ye were so great a man in England, as to close the Gates of any towne, Citie, or Castell, against the Duke of Lancaster. The Erle vnderstood whereof the Duke meant, and he tempered his speech, and sayde, Sir I denie not that the knight did, for I can not. For the king here present commaunded me streyghtly, that on mine honour, and on my lyfe, I should not suffer any maner of person, Lord, or other, to enter into any Citie, towne, or Castell in Northumberland, without he were heyze of the place. And sir the king and his Counsaile may well excuse me, for they knewe that ye were in Scotland, and therefore they should haue excepted you. What quoth the Duke, say you that there ought a exception to haue beene made for me, who am vnckle to the king, and haue kept mine heritage as well or better then any other haue done, next to the king, and knowing that I was gone for the businesse of the realme into Scotlande? This excuse can not excuse you, but that you haue done euill, and greatly agaynst mine honour: and you haue geuen therby an occasion to bring me in suspition that I had done some treason in Scotland, when at my returning the kinges townes are closed against me, and specially there where my prouision was: Wherefore I say, ye haue acquitted your selfe right euill. And for the blame and slaunder that ye haue brought me into, I nowe to purge my selfe, here in the presence of the king do cast you here my gage: reyle it and ye dare.

Then the king stepped forth and sayde: Right louyng vncle, all that was was done, I must take it vpon me. And I must excuse the Erle of Northumberland, and speake for him. For we commaunded him on paine of his life that he should kepe close all the townes of the Marches, and ye knowe well howe our realme was then in great trouble and perill. The fault was in the Clerke that wrote the letters, and in the negligence of our Counsaile: For of truth we should haue excepted you: Wherefore I will and also desyre you, to put apart this euill opinion that ye haue of the Erle of Northumberland, and I take the charge on me, and discharge the Erle in that behalfe. Then kneeled downe before the Duke, the Erle of Arondell, the Erle of Salisbury, the Erle of Suffolke, the Erle of Stafford, and the Erle of Leicester, and sayde vnto him: Sir you here howe louyngly and howe truly the king speaketh, wherefore we besech you to agree to his pleasure. Wel quoth the Duke, who was inflamed with yre, I will hold my peace, and as it pleaseth the king to haue it, it is reason that I be content therewith, & so departed.

In this tyme as sayth Polidore in his booke De Inuentoribus rerum, Connes were first in vse, which were inuented by one of Germany. But sayth he, least he should be cursed for euer that was the Authour of thys inuention, therefore his name is hidden, & not knowne. But dyuers say that a Donke was the inuenter, though they name him not.

In the Moneth of Aprill next followyng, there landed in Kent Dame Anne the daughter of Charles the fourth, late Emperour deceased, and she was Sister vnto Wenceslaus who then was Emperour, the which of the Maior, and Citizens of London was honorably met vpon Blackheth, and conueyed with great triumph vnto Westminster the eyght day of the month of Maye, and shortly after was there solemply married vnto king Richard.

And the sayde yere was a terrible, and a horrible earthquake throughtout the vniuersall worlde as many Authours write, but namely in England, that threwe downe Castelles, Churches, Steples, houses, and Trees, and whole Villages, that y lyke was neuer sene nor heard of before, to the great terrour and feare of all suche as then lyued, and were present.

This yere by the commaundement of Pope Urbane, Henry Spencer Byschop of Norwiche, with a great number of Spirituall men and other, went to warre vpon the king of Spaine. And for the maintenance of thys warre, the Pope, as sayth Froissart, had sent vnto the said Byschop more then xxx. Bulles, and also graunted to the king and to his vncles, to further this enterprise, a Disme of the Clergie. And then the preachers aduanced and set forth this voyage to be so acceptable before God, and that the benefite of the Popes Bulles, were of such value for the remission of sinne, that the people of Englande, who soone gaue credite thereto, beleued verily that if they dyed that yere, they could not come into heauen, except they had geuen somewhat in almose toward this warre. And at Londo (sayth Froissart) and in the Diocesse thereof there was gathered a Tonne full of Gold and silver, and according to the Popes Bulles, he that most gaue, obteyned most pardon. And whosoener dyed in that tyme, and gaue his goodes to further that voyage, he was cleane absolved from paine and from sinne, and he accompted himselfe most happie that dyed in that season to obtaine so noble an absolution. And thus was gathered a great Masse of money.

to make warre vpon the king of Spaine, for that he contrarie to the Popes commaundement withhelde certaine possessions, belonging of right vnto hys John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, in the right of his wife dame Constance.

But to say more truely, as diuers Authours saye, it was for the malice that this Pope Urbane bare vnto Pope Clement, to whome the Duches of Anjou had geuen the kingdomes of Naples, Sicilia, Apulia, and Calabria, of the which she wrote her selfe Queene.

In performance of which act, the sayde Byschop entring into the countre of Flaundyrs, founde there the Flemynge with diuers mistreaunts, such as the king of Spaine had sent thether, making resistence agaynst hym: wherefore he made vpon them sharp warre, and wanne from them certaine townes, as Grauelynge, Burbourgh, and Dunkirke, and wanne great and riche pillage, so that he and his Souldiours stuffed and freight with it (as sayth Reynulph) xli. shippes. But shortly after the Flemynge assembled with such power and strength, and gaue vnto the Englyshmen suche an assault about Dunkirke, that they were constreyned to geue back. And because the sayde shippes and goodes should not come agayne into the possession of his enemies, therfore he the sayde Byschop caused them to be set on fyre within the Hauen, and so were spoyled both shippes and goodes. And although that after this mishap he recovered his strength, and layde siege vnto the towne of Fpre, and wrought the Flemynge much care and trouble, yet shortly after, such sickneses fell among his people, as the flux and osker, that his souldiours dyed in great number: for the which he was compelled to leaue his iourney, and to returne agayne into England.

In thys yere also was a battaile of Combate done and holden in the Kings Palayce at Westminster, betwene one called Garcon Appellaut, and Sir John Aulpe Knight Defendaunt, of the which fight the knight was at length the Victour and forced his enemy to yeelde vnto him. For the which the sayde Garcon was immediatly from that place drawen to Tiborne, and there hanged for his false accusation.

And at this time, being the vij. yere of the reigne of King Richarde, a truce or peare was concluded betwene him the french king, and the king of Scottes for one whole yere next ensuyng, so that the frenchmen should geue knowledge thereof vnto the Scottes.

After the conclusion of the aforesayde peace, certaine Lordes of Englande returning out of Fraunce, and vnderstandyng that the frenche king had not yet geuen knowledge vnto the king of Scotlande of the truce, they now thinking to do a feate, assembled themselves with their powers, namely the Erle of Northumberland, the Erle of Nottingham, and the Barones of the borders and Marches of Scotland, and made a road into Scotland, and beganne to brenne the countre and lande of the Erle of Douglas, and of the Lorde Lyndsey, and left nothing vnbrent to Edenbourgh.

But shortly after that the Englyshmen had done this feate, and were returned agayne into Englande, the Scottes, although then they had knowledge of the peace, that was concluded in fraunce, yet they would not take knowledge thereof: But the Erle Douglas to be reuenged, entered into Northumberland, and so into the lande of the Lorde Percy, and there beganne to brenne, robbe, spoyle and destroy, and then returned by the lande of the the Erle of Nottingham: and the Lord Howbray, and there did much hurt, and so passed by Rosebourgh, but they taried not there, because they were so laden with pillage, prisoners and Cattell, and so returned into their Countre againe without any daunger. And thus one mischief was requyted with another lyke mischief.

Also, thys yere there came vnto king Richarde the king of Ermony, which was driuen out of his lande by the Infidelles and Turkes, and he prayed aide of the king to be restored to his dominion. The king feasted and comforted him according to his honour, and after counsaile taken with hys Lords concerning that matter, he gaue vnto him great somes of money, and other riche giftes: with the which (after he had taried in Englande about two Moneths) he departed with glad countenance.

And in this time a variaunce chaunced betwene John Holland brother to the Erle of Kent, and the Erles sonne of Stafford: By reason of which variaunce in conclusion the sonne of the Erle was slayne by the hande of Sir John Holland: For the which dede the king was greuously amoued.

This yere the king assembled his high Court of parliament at Westminster, during the which he created two Dukes, a Marques & five Erles, The first was hys Edmond of Langley the kinges Uncle, and Erle of Cambridge, who was created Duke of Yorke, hys Thomas of Woodstock Erle of Buckyngham was created Duke of Gloucester, Sir Robert Were, who before was created Erle of Oxford, was now made Marques of Dublyn, Sir Henry Bolynghbrooke sonne and heyre of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, was now made Erle of Darby, Sir Edward sonne and heyre to the Duke of Yorke was made Erle of Rutlande, Sir John of Holland brother to the Erle of Kent was made Erle of Huntynghdon, Sir Thomas Howbray was made Erle of Nottingham, and Marshall of Englande, and hys Hughell de la Poole was made Erle of Suffolk, and Chaunceloz of Englande, who was hated and iudged to be an euill man, both of the Lords and commons of this realme, as in the yere folowynge shall be shewed. And by authoritie of the same Parliament, Sir Roger Mortimer Erle of March, and sonne and heyre vnto Sir Edmond Mortimer, and of Dame Philip eldest daughter and heyre vnto Sir Lyonell the second sonne of Edward the thirde, was sone after proclaymed heyre apparaunt to the Crowne of Englande. The which Sir Roger shortly after sayled into Ireland, to suppress the rebellion & vnquietnesse of the people of his Lordship of Wolster, which he was Lorde of by his aforesayd mother. But whyle he was there occupied about the same, the wyldc Fyrishe came vpon him in great number, and slue him and many of his company.

This Sir Roger had issue, Edmond, and Roger, Anne, Alice, and Alianor that was made a Nonne. The two aforesayde sonnes dyed without issue, and Anne the eldest daughter was maryed to Richarde Erle of Cambridge, which Richard had issue by the sayde Anne, Isabell Ladie Bourcher, and Richard that was after Duke of Yorke, and father to King Edward the fourth, which sayde Richard Erle of Cambridge was put to death by Henrie the fift at Southhampton, as after shall appere.

Also this yere Sir Henry Bolynghbrooke Erle of Darbye, maryed the Countesse daughter of Harford, by whome he was Lorde of that Countre.

And by her he had issue, Henry that after him was King, Blaunche Duches of Barre, and Philip that was wedded to the King of Denmark: Also Thomas Duke of Clarence, John Duke of Bedford, and Humfrey Duke of Gloucester.

Robert Were created Duke of Ireland.

And where a litle before mencion is made, that sir Robert Were was made Marques of Dublyn, ye shall vnderstand, that now the same man was created Duke of Ireland, & that the King purposed to haue made him King of Ireland if he might, such an affection the King had vnto him, albeit that all the Noble men disdeyned his high and sodeyne exalting, seeyng that many of as good qualities and condicions as he was, and of as good blood, remained still in their olde estate. This Robert was maryed to a fayre yong Ladie of King Edwardes blood, which he forsooke and put from him, and toke vnto him one of a base blood, a Sadlers daughter, which was borne in the realme of Beame, named Lancicron, which came ouer with King Rychardes wife. The putting away of the former Lady, was the occasion of many great murmures and displeasures agaynst this Robert Were, specially by the Duke of Gloucester Uncle vnto her, which determined vtterly when he sawe tyme, to reuenge the iniuries done vnto his Niece. This grudge borne by the Duke of Gloucester, was not vnknownen to the Duke of Irelande, which cast in his minde by what meanes he might destroy the sayde Duke, and all those which toke his part. The tyme of Easter came, at which season it was before appoynted, that the Duke of Ireland should haue taken his boyage into Ireland: But small preparation was made for his goyng ouer: But yet because it should be thought none otherwise but y<sup>e</sup> the purpose should hold, the King tooke his iourney into Wales, vnder pretence to bring him to Ship: and yet meant nothing lesse, for his speciall purpose was to deuyse howe he might bring to passe to set holde vpon the Duke of Gloucester, the Erles of Arondell, Warwike, and Darbie, with many other noble men: And to this vngracious purpose was of counsaile Mighell de la Poole Chaunceloz of Englande, Sir Robert Tresilian one of the Kinges chiefe Justices, and Alexander Neuell Archebishop of Yorke, with dyuerse other, as after in this story shall moze at large appere. And after that the king had continued a certeine of tyme in Wales, he put off the iourney of the Duke into Ireland, and the King and the Duke returned to London, and thether had sommoned a Parliament to be holden at Westminster. And these thinges thus wrought betwene the king and the other persons afozenamed, were not kept so secrete, but that the Duke of Gloucester, and the other Lordes had thereof knowledge. Wherefore when the tyme of the Parliament came, they came by euery of them with great power and strength.

And soone after the begynnynge of the sayde Parliament, the aforesayde Mighell de la Poole Chaunceloz (as I finde written in an olde Chronicle, which beareth the name of the Chronicle of Leycester) demaunded of the Commons in the Kinges name, foure fiftenes, for with lesse he sayd that the king could not mainteine his estate, and his outward warres. The whole body of the Parliament made aunswere againe, that without the king were present, they would make therin none aunswere. And they said further that if the king did not remoue this Mighel de la Poole from his office of Chauncelozship, they would no further meddle with any acte in thys Parliament, were were it neuer so small.

This message beyng done to the King, the King sent agayne to the Commons that they should sende to Eltham (for there he lay then) xl. of the wisest and best learned of the common house, the which in the name of the whole house should declare vnto him their minde. And then the house were in more feare then they were in before, for a talke there went that the King entended to betrappe dyuerse of them which folowed not his mynde, eyther by that way or else at a banquet, which was appoynted to be made purposely at London, if Nicholas Erton then Maior of London would haue consented thereto, at which tyme the Duke of Gloucester should haue beene taken. Wherefore the Lordes of the vpper house, and the common house assembled together, and agreed with one assent, that Thomas of Woodstoke Duke of Gloucester, and Thomas Arondell Bishop of Ely, should in the name of the whole Parliament be sent vnto the king to Eltham, which was done, and the king well pleased that they should come.

A dissension betwene the King and the Parliament

Lordes sent by the parliament to the king.

The saing of the Lordes vnto the King.

Once in the yere the king may call a Parliament.

And first when they came into his presence, they most humbly saluted him, and sayd: Most high and our redoubted soueraigne Lorde, the Lordes and Commons at this your Parliament assembled, with most humble subiection vnto your most royall Maiesty, in likewise desyre your most gracious fauor: So that they may liue in tranquillity and peace vnder you, to the pleasure of God, and wealth of your realme: On whose behalfe we also shewe vnto you, that one olde statute and laudable custome is approued, which no man can denie, that the king our soueraigne Lorde may once in the yere lawfully summon his high Court of Parliament, and call the Lords & commons thereto, as to that which is the highest Courte of his Realme. In which Court all equitie and iustice must shine, euen as the Sunne when he is at the highest, whereof pooze and rich maye take refreshyng: Whereas also must be reformed all the oppreSSIONS, wronges, extorcions, and enormities within the realme, and there to counsaile with the wise men for the maintenance of the kinges estate, and conseruation of the same. And if it might be knowen that any persons within the realme or without entended the contrary, there must also be deuised howe such euill wedes may be destroyed. There also must be studied and foreseene, that if any charge do come vpon the king and his realme, howe it may be well and honourably supported and susteyned. Hetherto it is thought to the whole realme, that your subiectes haue louyngly demeaned themselues vnto you, in ayding you with their substance to the best of their powers, and they desyre to haue knowledge how and by whome these goodes be spent. One thing resteth yet to declare on their behalfe vnto you, howe that by an olde ordenance, they haue an acte, if the king absent himselfe. xl. dayes, not beyng sicke, but of his awne minde, (not heedyng the charges of the people, nor their great paynes) will not resort to his Parliament, they then may lawfully retorne home to their houses. And nowe sir, you haue bene absent a lenger tyme, and yet refuse to come amongest vs, which greatly is our discomfort.

The king should be present at the Parliament once in xl. dayes.

The kinges aunswere to the Lordes.

To this the king aunswered by these wordes: Well, we do consider that our people and Commons go about to rise against vs: wherefore we thinke we can do no better then to aske ayde of our Cosyn the French king, and rather submit vs vnto him, then vnto our awne subiectes.

The Lordes answered, Sir that counsaile is not best, but a way rather to bring you into daunger: for it is well knowen that the French king is your auncient enemy, and your greatest aduersarie. And if he set foote once within your realme, he will rather dispoyle you, and invade you, and depose you from your estate royall, then put any hande to helpe you. You may call to your remembrance, how your noble progenitors Edward the thirde, and Edward the Prince your father, toke great laboures vpon them, in heat and colde with great anguise and troubles, and laboured without rest, to conquere the realme of Fraunce, the which rightfully did apperteyne vnto them, and nowe vnto you. Pleaseth you also to remember how many Lords noble men, & good commons of both realmes died in those warres, and what great goodes the realmes exposed & consumed in susteyning of the warres. And nowe great pitie it is to here, that more burthens be dayly layde vpon your subiectes neckes, for mainteyning of your charges, who are brought vnto such incredible pouertie, that they haue not to pay their house rents, nor to ayde theyr Prince, nor yet to haue sufficient for their necessarie sustenance: for so is your power depouerished, and Lordes and great men brought to infelicite, and all your people to great debilitie. And as that king can not be poore that hath riche people: so can not he be riche that hath poore Comons. And as the king taketh hurt in this, so doth the Lordes and Noble men, euery one after his hauour. And all these inconueniences be commonly by euill counsaile which are about you. And if you put not the soner your helpynge hands for the redresse of y<sup>e</sup> pmisses, this realme of England shalbe brought to naught and vtter ruyne, which cleerely should be layde vnto your default, and in your euill counsaile: Seyng that in the time of your father, this realme throughout all the worlde was highlye esteemed, and nothing ordered after these wayes: Wherefore we be sent vnto you, to exhort you, to sequester all such persons as might be the occasion of ruyne, eyther of you, or of your Realme.

By these good perswasions the king was appeased, and promised within thre dayes after, to come to the parliament, and to condiscend to their petitions. And accordyng to his appointment he came. And sone after his coming John Fortham Bishop of Durham was discharged of the Treasurership, and in his place was set the Bishop of Herford. Also there was then discharged and put downe Highell de la Poole Chauncelour of Englande to his great shame and rebuke: And in his roome was placed Thomas Arundell Bishop of Elye, by the whole consent of the parliament. After thys Highell de la Poole was charged with manye and great enorme crimes, fraudes, falsities and treasons by him done and committed, to the great prejudice of the King and of his realme, and therupon was committed to ward: Notwithstanding, they would not adiudge him to death, nor disgrace him from the honoz of knighthood: But as some write, they deemed him to pay a fyne of twentie thousande Markes, for suche aduantages as he had gotten, beyng Chauncelour, in putting the Kings subiects from expedition of their causes, vntill suche tyme as they had rewarded him: All which fynes were adiudged to the King in relieuyng of the commons. And also one thousand pounds of yerely rents, which he had purchased. This done, the Lords and wise men of the realme, considering that by the couetousnesse of the officers

cers aforesayd, the kings treasure and goodes were purloyned and from the kinges profite clerely consumed: The King and the realme thereby soze decaued and empouerished: Tillage also layd downe in many quarters of the realme, and the kinges officers this notwithstanding maruellously enriched: wherfore they did chose. xiiij. Lordes which should haue the ouersight vnder the king of the whole realme. Of the which, thre were the new officers, that is to saye, the Bishop of Ely Chauncelour, the Byshop of Herford Treasorer, and Nicholas Abbot of Waltham keeper of the priuie scale, and ten oither, which were Wylliam Archbishop of Cauntorbury, Alexander Archbishop of Yorke, Edmond Langley Duke of Yorke, Thomas Duke of Gloucester, Wylliam Byshop of Winchester, Thomas Bishop of Excester, Richard Erle of Arundell, John Lorde Cobham, Richarde Lorde Scrope, John Lorde Deuerox: All which had auctoritie to enquire, intreate, desyue and determine of all maner of causes, querels, debtes and demaundes from the time of Edward the thirde vnto that present daye, as well within the realme as without, and also to enquire of the kings charges and of the order of his seruaunts. For the execution wherof well and truely to be done, they all tooke their othes, and the king in lykelike tooke his othe to abyde by their order, and then to mayntaine in all their actes, and not to reuoke any article of their commission, but to holde firme and stable all that euer the sayde counsailors did order, duryng the tyme to them assigned. And if it hapened that all the number could not come together to a determination of anye acte, that then if. vij. of them with the thre principall officers afozenamed did agree, the act should stande firme and stable, whether they were matters of this side the sea or beyond the Sea. And if any manner of person attempted to moue the King to infringe any parte of thys ordynance, and that being knowne, for the first time, he should be depriued of his goodes and possessions, and for the second time, to be drawen thorough the Citie, and so put to execution as an arrant traytor. And for that the king should the rather shew his beneuolent fauour in confirming these actes deuysed by the parliament. There was graunted vnto him halfe a deeme of the Spiritualtie, and halfe a deeme of the Tempozaltie, to be payde at the feast of Saint Highell then next, if it seemed to the Lordes and counsailours that it was neede.

These determinations notwithstanding, the king suffred Highell de la Poole Erle of Suffolke which was prisoner at Wyndsoze, to go at large, and not long after came Robert Tresilian, chiefe Justice of the common benche to Couentrie, and endited there two thousand persons. And the king and the Queene came vnto Grobye, and thether came vnto him by his commaundement the Justices of the Realme, and there were present all these euill Counsailors, that is to say, Alexander Archebishop of Yorke, Robert Vere Duke of Irelande, Highell de la Poole, Robert Tresilian and their felowes. Of whome it was demaunded if it might stande with the lawes of the Realme, that the King might reuoke the ordynances by hym and his realme made in his last parliament, which he accorded vnto in maner by constraint. And they made aunswere that the king might well reuoke and make frustrate all their actes at his pleasure, for they were actes about the lawes.

Then were these Justices commaunded to come agayne to Notting-

In the which counsaile was Syr Alexander Archebischop of Yorke, Robert Ueer Duke of Irelande, Whighell de la Poole Erle of Suffolk, Robert Tresilian Justice, Robert Bramble Justice and sundry other. And al these Justices were commaunded to set to their handes to the questions vnder written, that by the meanes thereof, these seducers, which were about the king, thought they might haue good occasion to put the Duke of Gloucester and all the other Lords to death, which were the last Parliament, as aforesayde, ordeyned to haue the gouernaunce of the realme, and all other that were consenting to the same. Dyuers there were of the Justices which refused to set to their handes, but they were constreyned thereto, among the which was John Belknap, who vtterly refused it, but till such time as the Duke of Ireland and the Erle of Suffolk compelled him therunto, which if he had still refused, he had not escaped their hands. And when he had set to his seale: Nowe sayth he, here lacketh nothing but a rope, that I maye receyue the worthy death for my rewarde, and I knowe that if I had not done thys, I could not haue escaped your handes, and nowe it is done for the kings pleasure and yours, I haue deserued death of the Lordes, which shortly folowed, for in the next parliament he was condemned and put to execution. And for that thys should be in remembrance, an act of counsaile was made therof, in maner as foloweth.

Articles proposed and answers made vnto them.

1 First, it was asked of them whether the newe statute and ordynaunce and commission made in the last parliament holden at Westminster, be hurtfull to the kings royall prerogative?

Wherunto all of one minde answered, that they be hurtfull, and specially because they were agaynst the kings will.

2 Item it was inquired of them, howe they ought to be punished which procured the sayde statute, ordynaunce and commission to be made?

Wherunto of one assent they answered, that they deserued to be punished by the Capitall payne, that is to say of death, onlesse the king of his grace will pardon them.

3 Item, it was inquired howe they ought to be punished which excited the king to consent to the making of the sayde statute, ordynaunce and commissio?

Wherunto of one minde they sayde, that onlesse the king would geue them his pardon, they ought to be punished by the Capitall paine.

4 Item, it was enquired of them, what paine they deserued that compelled the king to consent to the making of the said statute, ordynaunce & commission?

Wher-

Wherunto of one assent they gaue aunswere, that as Traytors they ought to be punished.

5 Item, howe they ought to be punished that interrupted the king, so that he might not exercise those thinges that apperteyned to hys regality and prerogative?

Wherunto of one assent it was answered, that they ought to be punished as Traytors.

6 Item, it was enquired of them, whether that after the businesse of the realme, and the cause of that assembly of the parliament were by the kings commaundement disclosed and declared in the parliament, and other articles lympted by the king, vpon which the Lordes and commons of the Realme ought to procede in the same parliament: If the Lordes and commons would in any wise procede vpon other articles, and in no wise vpon the articles lympted by the king, till the king had answered the Articles expressed by them, notwithstanding that they were by the king enioyned to the contrary: whether the king in this case ought to haue the rule of the Parliament, and in dede to rule, to the intent that vpon the articles lympted by the king, they ought first to procede or not, befoze they proceeded any further?

To which question, of one mynde they answered, that the king in this parte should haue the rule in order one after another, in all other articles touching, but till the ende of the parliament. And if any doe contrarie to thys rule of the king, he ought to be punished as a Traytor.

7 Whether the King whensoever it pleased hym, myght not dissolue the Parliament, and commaunde hys Lordes and Commons to departe from thence or not?

Wherunto it was of one mind answered, y he may. And if any would procede in the parliament against y kings wil, he is to be punished as a traytor.

8 Item, it was inquired that for as much as it is in the king to remooue suche of the Justices and officers as doe offende, and to iustifie and punish them for their offenses, whether the Lordes and commons might without the kings will empeche the same officers and iustices vpon their offenses in the parliament or not?

To thys aunswere was made, that they might not: And he that did contrarie, was to be punished as a Traytor.

9 Item, it was inquired, howe he is to be punished that mooued in the Parliament that the statute whereby Edward, the sonne of king Edward, great Graundfather to the king that nowe is, was indited in the parliament might be sent for, by the inspection of which statute, the sayde newe statute or ordynaunce and commission were conceained in the parliament.

To the which question of one accorde they answered, that as well he that so somoned, as the other which by force of the same motion brought the sayde statute into the parliament house, be as cryminous and Traytors to be punished.

10 Item, it was enquired of them, whether the iudgement geuen in our parliament, holden at Westminster agaynst Whighell de la Poole, late Erle of Suffolk, were erroneous and reuocable or not?

To the which question, of one assent, they sayde, that if the same iudgement were now to be geuen, the same Justices and Sergeaunt aforesayde would would not geue the same, because it seemed to them that the same iudgement is reuocable and is erronyous in euery parte. In witness whereof the Justices & Sergeaunt aforesayde to these presents haue set to their scales, these men being wytnesses. Alexander Archebithop of Yorke, Robert Archebithop of Dowblynd, John Bishop of Durham, Thomas Bishop of Cyster, John Bishop of Wangoz, Robert Duke of Ireland, Hughell Erie of Suffolke, John Kypon Clarke, and John Blake.

But here a little to returne backe: Ye heard before in the viij. yere of the reigne of this king, that a peace was concluded with Englande, Fraunce and Scotland for one yere next to come. And that the frenche men shoulde geue knowledge thereof to the Scottissh king, and so it was that the frenche king sent his Ambassadors into Scotland, and they passed through Englande to geue the Scottissh king knowledge of the peace. In the meane time that the frenche Ambassadors lay in Scotlande, among other thinges, the Erie Douglas sayd vnto them, ye see our Coutry, but ye consider not the strength thereof, for we are so lodged vpon Englande, that we may at our pleasure enter which way we lust, and brenne and spoyle foure dayes iourney into the realme, and returne againe at our pleasure, we lacke nothing but men, had we a thousand Speare men of fraunce to ioyne with the power that we can make, we might geue Englande such an overthrow as Englande neuer had, and this my Lordes were good for you to kepe in remembrance, and to shew the Lordes of fraunce at your returne, that the next and reddest way to persecute and conquere Englande, is to enter with vs into their land. The aforesayde Ambassadors did lightly credit this tale, and at their returne forgot not to make report thereof vnto the counsaile of fraunce, of the which dyuers of them also thought it a right good way: Wherefore against the sayde peace should expire, they made prouision toward Scotland, myndyng to enter that way vpon Englande.

The frenche king purposed to enter & bere Englande three maner of wayes.

The frenche king sent a power into Scotland, purposing that way to overthrowe Englande.

Paris.
Compey.
Valenciens.

And at this tyme, there were bruted abroad in Englande diuers thinges, namely that the frenche king entended to assaile Englande with a mighty puissance, and that thre maner of wayes. The one out of Briteyn, for that the Duke of Briteyn was become frenche. The other by Normandic, for the which as it was sayd, the Constable of fraunce made his prouision at Harflew, and Deepe. And the thirde by Scotland.

In the beginnyng of May, Sir John de Uien Admirall of fraunce, accompanied with a thousande Speares of chosen knightes and Esquiers, and five hundred Crosbowes, with harnesse to arme a thousande Scottes, landed in Scotland, & at the last arrived at Edenbourgh, which is the chiefe towne in Scotland. And as sone as the Erie Douglas, and the Erie Mores knewe of their comming, they went to the Hauen and met them, and receyued them right louingly: sayng that they were right welcom into that Countrie. And at that time the king of Scottes was in the wilde Scottissh. But it was shewed these knightes, that the king would be there shortly, wherewith they were content, and so they were lodged thereaboutes in the Villages. For Edenbourgh though the king kept therein his chiefe residence, yet it is not like Paris, nor yet like Turney, nor Valenciens. For in al the towne there is not foure thousand houses. Therefore these Lordes and Knightes were lodged in Villages about, as well as they might be in that Countrie.

When

When knowledge came into the Realme of Scotlande, that a greate number of men of armes of fraunce were come into their Countrie: some thereat did murmure and grudge, and sayde: who the deuill hath sente for them? what do they here? Cannot we mainteine our warre with Englande without their helpe? we shall do no good as long as they be with vs, and so let them be tolde, that they may returne againe. And say vnto them, that we be strong inough in Scotlande to mainteine our warre without them, and therefore we will none of their companie, they vnderstand not vs, nor we them: They will quickly rise and eate vp all that euer we haue in this Countrie: They will do vs more despight and damage, then though the Englishmen fought with vs. For if the Englishmen brenne our houses, we care little therefore, for we may soone make them againe cheape inough, for in thre dayes we will make them againe, if we may get foure or five stakes, and a fewe Bowes to couer them.

This was the communication of the Scottes at the commyng of the frenche men, for they set nothing by them, but hated and spake shamefully, and vilanously of them, like to rude people without all humanitie. And all thinges considered (sayth Froissart) it was to greut an armie of so many noble men to come into Scotland. For xx. or xxx. knightes of fraunce had bene better then all that number of a thousand, and the cause is, that in Scotland ye shall find lightly no man of honour or nobilitie, neyther that knoweth what belongeth to a Gentleman. They are like wilde and sauage people, they couet to be acquainted with no straunger, and they are full of enuy at the prosperous estate of others, and they are euer in feare to lose that they haue, for it is a pooze Countrie. And when the Englishmen make any roade or boyage into the land, they are euer compelled to haue their victualles folowe them: for in Scotland they shall finde nothing. Neyther is there in Scotland prouision to shoe their horses, nor leather to make harnesse for their horse, as Saddels, Bridels, &c. But they haue all these thinges readie made out of flaundyng. And when that prouision fayleth, then is there none to get in that Countrie.

The frenche men are euil welcomed to Scotland.

A description of Scotland and their maners.

When the Barons and Knightes of fraunce, who were wont to finde sayre hosteryes, Halles hanged, and goodly Castelles, and soft beddes to rest in, saue themselues in that necessitie: They began to smile, and sayde to the Lorde Admirall, Sir this is a pleasaunt iourney, we neuer knewe what beggery was vntill now, and now we finde it true, that our old fathers were wont to say: go your way, and ye liue long ye shall finde hard beddes.

The Admirall pacified them as well as he might, and sayde: It behooueth vs to suffer a little, and to speake sayre, for we be here in daunger, we haue a great long way to go, and by Englande we can not returne, therefore let vs quietly take in good worth that we finde.

Yet there was another thing that was greatly grieuous to the frenche men: For when they were in Scotland, and would ryde, they found horses vnrasonably deare, for that which was not worth .x. floreyngs, they would not sell vnder an hundred, and muche paine to haue them for their money. And when they had a horse, then had they neyther Bydle nor Saddell, except they brought them with them. In this trouble and daunger were the frenche men: Yea, and mozeouer, when their Merlets went forth a foraging, and and had laden their horses with such as they could get for money, in their returne home, the Scottes themselves which had taken their money for the forage, did lie in wayte of them, and tooke all that they had from them, and slue them, so that there was none that durst go a foragynge, for in a moneth the French men lost of their barlettes mo then an hundreth, for if they went fourth three or foure together, they neuer returned againe, and thus the French men were handeled in Scotland.

Also now the French men desired that the king of Scottes would come forward, and likewise the Lordes and knightes of Scotland, for the tyme passed away. And they answered and sayd, that they would make no warre on England at that tyme: and this they sayde, because they would make the French men pay well for their comynge: for befoze the king would come out of the wilde Scottish to Edenbourgh, he demaunded of the Admirall of Fraunce to haue a great somme of money, for him and his people. And the Admirall of Fraunce was faine to promise, and to seale that the king should haue a certeine some of money befoze that he and his company departed his Realme. And if he had not done this, he shoulde haue had none ayde of the Scottes. And yet when he had made the best agreement with them that he could, he gate but little by them, as in the ende will appere.

A description of Robert
Scottes.

At the last, King Robert of Scotland came to Edenbourgh, with a paire of blered eyes, and it semed they were lyned with scarlet. And it appered by him, that he was no baliuant man of armes, but that he loued rather to lye still, then to ryde: He had .ix. sonnes, and they loued well armes. So when the king was come, the Lorde and knightes of Fraunce drew vnto him and did their duetie. And there was present with the king the Erle Douglas, the Erle Doret, the Erle de la Mare, the Erle of Surlant, and dyuerse other, There the Admirall required the king that the cause of their comynge might be accomplished, which was to make a iourney into England.

The Barons, knightes, and Esquiers of Scotland answered and said, that if God pleased, they would make such a voyage that should be to their honour and profite.

The king then sent out his commaundement to assemble his power, & at a day appoynted, there were redy .xxx. thousand men all on horsebacke.

Sir John Uien Admirall of Fraunce thought the tyme long, and faine would haue bene doynge of some great feate in Englande: when he sawe the Scottes were come together, he made haste and sayde, Sirs, it is now tyme to ride, we haue lye still a great while. So then they set forward to Rosebourgh.

The king himselfe went not in this iourney, for he abode still in Edenbourgh, but all his sonnes were in the armie. The thousand complete harnesses which the French men brought with them, were deliuered to the knightes of Scotland, who were befoze but euill harnessed, and had neede of that harness.

Then they rode toward Northumberland, and so long they roade, that they came to the Abbey of Hannes, and there they lodged all about the riuer of Tyne, and the next day they came to Morlan, and so befoze Rosebourgh.

The keeper of the Castell of Rosebourgh vnder the Lord Mountagew, was a knight called Sir Edward Clifford. The Admirall of Fraunce, and the the Scottes tarped and behelde well the Castell. And when they had well considered it, they thought to assail it should not be profitable for them, wherefoze they passed by, and drew along the ryuer syde appoehyng to Barwike, and so long they road, that they came to two towers right strong, the which were kept by two knightes, the father and the sonne, both were called Syr John Strand. About these Towers were faire Laundes, and a faire place, the which incontinent were bzent, and the two Towers assailed, and there were many feates of armes shewed, and diuerse Scottes hurt with shot and throwynge of stones: But finally the Towers were wonne by plaine assault, and the knightes taken, the which manfully defended the same as long as they might.

And after the conquest of these two Towers, they went to another Castell called Werley, belongyng to Sir John Mountagew, and vnder him was Capteine thereof Sir John of Luthborne, who had there with him, his wife, and his children, and all his goodes. And he knewe well befoze that the Scottes would come thether: and therefore he had furnished this Castell to the best of his power to abide the assault. So about this Castell tarped all the armie. This Castell stode in a fayre Countrey, by a fayre Ryuer that cometh out of Tymbre, and runneth into the sea. And one day there was a great assault geuen to the sayd Castell, and the French men bare themselves right well that day, much better then did the Scottes, for they entered into the ditches, and passed through with much paine: There were manye feates of armes done, what by them aboue and them beneath. The French men mounted by by Ladders, and fought hande to hande with Daggers on the Walles.

Sir John Luthborne did quite himselfe as a baliuant knight, & fought with the French men hande to hande on the Ladders. At this assault, there was slaine a knight of Almaine called Sir Bleres Gastelain, which was great pitie. There were many hurt that day: But at the last the number of Scots and French men were so great, that the Castell was wonne, and the knight and his wife, and children taken, and .xl. other prisoners. And then the Castell was bzent, and rased downe, for they saw well that it was not to be kept, seeing it stode so farre within England as it did.

Then the Admirall and the Scottes roade toward Anwike, and there they had knowledge that the Duke of Lancaster, the Erle of Northumberland, the Erle of Pottyngham, with a great number mo, were comynge vpon them with a great power.

When the Admirall of Fraunce heard these tydings, he seemed to be very ioyfull, and in like maner were all the Barons of Fraunce, and all the Scottes: But they were counsailed to returne againe toward Barwike, because of their prouision that folowed them, and to be nere to their awne Countrey, and there to abyde their enemies. And so they returned toward Barwike, and so to their awne Countrey.

Tydings was brought into England how the Frenchmen and Scottes were in Northumberland, and had destroyed and bzent the Countrey. The King of England knowyng befoze of the comynge of the Frenchmen, made great prouision for Scotland, both by sea and lande. And by sea, the king had .xxvj. shippes laden with victuall and prouision coastyng the frontiers of of Englande, and readie to enter into every haven of Scotland.

The king himselfe came accompanied with his Uncles, the Erle of Cambridge, and s<sup>r</sup> Thomas Holland, the Erle of Salisbury, the Erle of Arundell, the Erle of Pembroke, the Erle of Stafford, the Erle of Muzien, the Lord Spencer, and so many other Barons and knightes, that they were foure thousand speares, beside them that went befoze with the Duke of Lancaster, the Erle of Northumberland, &c. which were two thousand speares, and .xv. hundred Archers, beside berlets.

And it was tolde the king that the Scottes and Frenchmen were lyke to fight with the Englishmen that went befoze, and therefore the king made suche haste, that he came to the Marches of Duresme, and there he heard that the Scottes were returned into Scotland.

The king passed still forwarde, beyng accompanied with eyght thousand men of armes, and .lx. thousand Archers, and passed Berwikke, and so into Scotland to the Abbey of Maros. The which Abbey, in all the warres that had bene betwene Englande and Scotlande, was neuer hurte, vntill this time, and nowe was it bitterly spoiled and brent, for it was the entent of the king neuer to returne into Englande, vntill he had destroyed a great peece of Scotlande, because they brought in Frenchmen to the destruction of Englande.

When the Admirall of Fraunce knewe that the king of Englande was passed the ryuer of Tweede, and was entred into Morland in Scotlande, Then he sayde to the Barons of Scotland, Sirs, why doe we lye here still: Let vs go forth and looke on our enimies, and fight with them.

It was shewed vs befoze we came hether, that if ye had out of Fraunce but one thousand of good men of armes, ye should be strong enough to fight with all the Englishmen, and I assure you, ye haue mo here then .xv. C. of good knights and squiers, and suche as will stande by it, and take that fortune that God doth sende.

The Scottes answered and sayde, Sir we beleue well that ye and your company are chosen men and valiaunt: But s<sup>r</sup> we haue knowledge that al the power of England is here at this present, and there were neuer so many Englishmen assembled together in these partes as are nowe, and if ye will, we will bring you into place where ye shal wel see and aduise them. And then if ye thinke them meete to be foughten withall, we wyll not refuse it. Then sayde the Admirall, I pray you let me see them. And they brought him to a Mountaine, where vnder the hill was a passage that the Englishmen must nedes passe, and they sawe them and biewed them to be to the number of sixe thousand men of armes, and .lx. thousand Archers and other.

Then sayde the Admirall to the Erle Douglas, and the Erle Moret, in dede here is no egall number to fight with them, for ye are not aboue .xxx. thousand, and yet many euill armed. But now aduise your selues best what is to be done, they are now entred into your Country, and they are enough to ouerrunne al your Country, and to destroy it: & ye are not minded to encounter with them, what will ye then do? ye sayd ye could enter out of your countrie dyuers waies into dyuers places of England: And I thinke it best that we make them some warre there as they doe vs here. And herebnto all the Barones of Scotlande agreed and sayde, we are well contented so to doe, and we knowe dyuers waies. And they agreed to go into Wales, which is otherwise called Winland, and so to go to the Citie of Carlisle, and there to be reuenged. And so they left the Englishmen in Scotlande, and they went by the Forrestes and Mountaynes. And the Scottishe king was gone to the wilde Scottishe, and there remayned.

The king of Englande, with his Uncles, Barons, Knights and army went to Edenborough, the chiefest towne in all Scotland, and there laye .v. dayes, and at his departing set fyre on it, and brent it downe to the ground. And lyke wise he brent Streuelyn and the Abbay therebnto adioynyng. Also they brent Saint Johns towne, and the towne of Streuelyn, the towne of Dondre, and to be short, they spared nothing that stood in their waye, neyther Towne, Village, Abbey, nor Church, for they might doe in Scotland what they would, for there was no people left to resist them. For all the people were gone with the Frenchmen & Scots toward Carlisle, as aforesayd.

Now when the king had thus spoiled, destroyed, and brent Scotland, the Duke of Lancaster aduised hym to folow the Scottes and Frenchmen to Carlisle. And there were other considered that Winter approached, and that the passage ouer the Mountaynes and forestes would be long and dangerous, and that it would be no small thing to victuall still that great army. Wherefore at the last, by the meane of the Erle of Orford, the king was fully perswaded to returne into Englande as he came, and so he did.

The French Lordes and the Scottes lyke wise, as aforesayd, made a roade into Northumberland betwene the Mountaynes, bremyng Mannoures and Townes, and all that stood in their waye, and did much hurte, and besieged the Citie of Carlisle, but they gaue it ouer, & returned againe into Scotland the same waye they went, but the Frenchmen sayde, they neuer intended to go that way any moze.

When the Admirall of Fraunce and hys companye, were returned to Edenborough, then they tasted of some paine, for they founde the Towne cleane brent, and destroyed, so that there was nothing to be had for money, wyne there were none, so that for drinke, they had none but small Ale or Beere, and their Bread was made of Barley and of Otes. Also their horses were dead for hunger, and foundred for pouertie. And when they would haue soulede them, they wist not to whome, nor there was none that would geue them one penny, neyther for horse, nor for harnays. The Souldyours tolde their Capitaines how they were delt withall, and they knewe it to be true by their awne experience, and their seruants sayde that they could not endure with that miserie: They sayde that the Realme of Scotlande was such a countrie as no host were hable to endure there a wynter, for if they did they should eyther dye for cold, or starue for hunger, or both. And also if they should departe asunder, and serche for their buyng abroad in the Countrie, they doubted that the Scottes would slay them in their beddes. The Admirall considered wel all these things, and saw all was lyke to be true that they sayde: Howbeit he was in purpose to haue bidden there all the wynter, and to haue sent bnto the French king, and to the Duke of Burgoyne, and to haue had newe prouision of money and victualles, and to haue made a new freche warre agayne the next Sommer. Howbeit he sawe well the euill nature and maner of the Scottes, and considered well the perill of his people, and therefore he gaue leaue vnto all suche as would, to departe. But at their departing, then was the mischiese: For the Lordes coulde finde no passage for themselves, nor yet for their men. The Scottes would that such knights and squiers as were but pooze, should departe, to the entent that they might rule the remnaunt at more ease. And they sayde to the Admirall, Sir, let your men departe when you will: But as for your selfe, ye shall not departe out of this Countrey, vntill we be fully satisfied of all such charges and damages as we haue borne and susteyned all this season with your army. This communication seemed harde to the Admirall and to the other Barons of Fraunce. And the Admirall shewed all this matter to the Erle Douglas, and to the Erle Moxet, who seemed to be sore displeased, that they were so hardly delt withall. And so these two Erles spake to the other Erles, and Barons of Scotlande, who sayde howe they had lost as well as they. But they answered, sayeng, although you dissemble with them, we will be recompensed. Then these two Erles sayde to the Admirall and to the other Lordes of Fraunce, that they could not rule the other Lords nor commons: wherefore it behoued them, if they purposed to go out of the realme, to satisfie the commons, and to restore vnto them all their dammages.

And when the Admirall sawe that it would be none otherwise, he thought he would not leese the more for the lesse, and he considered well how that he was without comfort, & closed in with the Sea, and sawe how that the Scottes were of a wyld opinion, and therefore agreed to the Scottes request, and caused a proclamation to be made, that all maner of persons that could proue that anye of his people had done them any damage, let them come to the Admirall, and he would recompense them the balue thereof, the which proclamation appeased the Scottes. And so the Admirall became debter to them all, and sayd how he would not depart out of Scotland vntill all the complayntes were fully satisfied and payde. Then dyuers Knightes and Squyres had passage, and so returned wythout eyther horse or harneis, cursing the day that euer they came into Scotlande, sayng that there were neuer men that had so harde a voyage, wysing that the French king had peace wyth Englande one yere or two, and so both kings together to go into Scotlande, vtterly to destroy that Realme for euer, for they sayde they neuer sawe so euill people, nor so false, nor more foolish people in feates of warre. The Admirall of Fraunce by them that first departed, wrote his letters to the french king, and to the Duke of Burgoyne, certefying them what case he was in, and howe the Scots dealt with hym, and that if they would haue hym to come home, they must send thether suche summes of money as he was become debtor for, to be payde to the knightes, Squyres and commons of Scotland. For the Scottes sayd playnely that the warre that they made into England, at that tyme, was for Fraunce, and not for themselves. And therefore all suche dammages as they had taken by that iourney, they would be fully recompensed agayne befoze he went out of Scotland, to the which he had swozne and agreed.

The french king and his counsaile were bounde to redeeme agayne the Admirall, for they sent hym thether. Then the sommes of money were ordeyned for, and payde by exchaunge in the Towne of Bridges, and so the Scottes were satisfied, and the Admirall tooke his leaue in Scotland and departed departed into Fraunce.

Nowe when the Admirall was returned into Fraunce to the yong king Charles, and to the Duke of Burgoyne, and they demaunded of him the condition of the king and the Lordes of Scotland: He answered, that the Scottes somewhat resembled the English men, because they are enuious to straingers. And moreouer he sayd, that he had rather be Erle of Sauoy, or Erle of Arthoys, then to be king of Scottes, and sayd also that he had seene all the power of the Scottes in one day together, as the Scottes sayd themselves, and yet he neuer sawe together, not past. v. C. Speares, and .xxx. thousande men of warre, the which number against the English Archers, or against a thousand of other good men of armes, could not long endure.

The report made by the Admirall vnto
the french
of the estate and maners of Scotland.

Then the Admirall was demaunded if he had seene the pyssaunce of England: He answered, yea, for on a day quoth he, when I sawe the Scots fle away for feare of the Englishmen, I desired them to bring me where as I might see and aduise the English horte, and so they did. I was set at a streight passage, where as they must nedes passe, and to my iudgement, they were. lx. thousand Archers, and sixe or seuen thousand men of armes. And the Scottes sayde, that it was all the power of England, and that there were none abydyng behynde.

Then the king and his Counsaile studied a little, and at the last sayd, it is a great thing of. lx. thousand Archers, and .vj. or .vij. thousande men of armes. It may well be, quoth the Constable, that they may make that number: But I had rather fight with them at home in their aboue Marches with that number, then here with halfe the number: And so I haue heard my father say often tymes when I was yong. By my fayth, sir quoth the Admirall, if ye had bene there with a great number of men of armes, as I supposed ye should haue bene, I thinke we had famished all in Scotland. And thus an ende of the french mens voyage into Scotland.

Nowe ye haue heard of the iourney that the french men made into Scotland against England, and ye haue also heard befoze, that the french king entended to enter into England, and made provision for the same three maner of wayes, first by Scotland, as ye haue alreadie heard, the second by Briteyn, because the Duke of Briteyn was nowe reconciled to the french king, and thirde by Normandie, in the which two places he made provision of a huge armie, and nauie, as after shall appere.

And while the aforesayd french men were busie in Scotland agaynst the English men, as abouesayde, the yong french king Charles, and his Uncle the Duke of Burgoyne and Constable of Fraunce, had great desyre and affection to go with an army into England, and all knightes and squires of Fraunce did very well agree therevnto, sayng why should not we once go into Englande to see the Countrey, and to learne the pathes of the same, as they haue done in Fraunce. So that forthwith great provision and furniture for that voyage was made in Fraunce on all hydes, and taxes and tallages set and assessed vpon the Cities, townes, and Burgeses of the same, and in the plaine Countrey, that in an hundredth yere befoze there had bene none such scene nor heard of. And also great provision made by sea all the Sommer tyme vntill the moneth of September, they did nothing else, but grinde Coyne, and bake Bisket. And at Toynay, Lille, Doway, Arras, Amiens,

Bethine, saint Omers, and in all the Townes about Sluce, they were occupied to lyke purpose. For the frenche king by the aduise of his counsaile purposed to take the Sea at Sluce, and so to enter England, and to destroy the same. They that were riche men in the Realme of Fraunce to the ayde and furniture of this bozage, were tared and sealed at the thirde penny, and fourth part of their goodes, & many payd moze then they were worth besides.

And from Spaine, and from the Porte of Ciuille to Bruce there was no great ship on the Sea that the French men could lay theyr handes vpon, neyther any ship that was vnder their obeyfance, but they were reteyned for the French king. And his men, and his other prouision came from all partes, and arryued in Flaundyrs, both wyne, salt, fleshe, fishe, otes, hay, Onyons, Bisket, flower, egges in Pipes, and all maner of thinges that could be deuysed, so that the prouision was so great as it could not be beleued of any, but of such as sawe it. Besydes this, Lordes, Knightes, Esquiers, and men of warre were written vnto and desyred to come and serue the French king in this iourney, out of Sauoy, Almaine, and from the Sonne goyng downe, to the lande of the Erle of Arminack. And so these Lordes of farre Countries, as the Erle of Sauoye was reteyned with five hundreth speares. Also the Erle of Arminack, & the Dolphyn of Annerency, though they were of farre Countries, yet they made their prouisions so great and costly, that it was a great maruyle to thinke thereof: And it was a wonder to consider from whence such prouision came, what by land, and what by sea into Flaundyrs, as to Bruges, to Dan, and to Sluce. Also there was sent for into Holland, Zeland, Middlebourgh, Zwickzee, Dordright, Stonehoue, and to all other townes on the sea coast, and to the riuers enterynge into the sea, for all maner of shippes that could do any seruice, and all were brought to Sluce. But the Hollanders, and Zelanders sayd to them that reteyned them, if ye will haue our seruice, pay vs our wages cleerly, or else we will not go to any Porte, and so they were payde, wherein they did wisely. And (sayth Froissart) I thinke that sithen the creation of the worlde, there was neuer sene together so many great ships as were at y tyme at Sluce, and at Blanquerge: For in the moneth of September in the sayde yere, they were numbred to be. xij. hundreth, lxxvij. shippes at Sluce: And their Mastes seemed in the sea lyke a great Wood or forest. And the Constable of Fraunce his ship, was apparayled and furnished at Lentergier in Briteyn. Also the Constable of Fraunce caused to be made in Briteyn of Tymber, a Closure for a Towne, made like a Parke, that when they had taken lande in Englande, to close in their felde to lodge therein with more ease and safetie. And whensoever they should remove their felde, the Closure was so made, that they might take it a sinder in pieces, and a great number of Carpenters and other were reteyned in wages to attend therupon. And whosoener at that tyme had bene at Bruges, at Dan, or at Sluce, and had seene the businesse that there was in charging and lading of shippes with haye, sackynge of Bisket, and lading of Onyons, Peason, Beanes, Barley, Candelles, hosen, shoes, spurres, knyues, daggers, swordes, Targettes, Ares, Hattookes, Nayles of all sozies, Hammes, Hammers, Beddes, Cowches, Horse shoes, Pottes, Pannes, Candlestickes, Candles, Torches, Piche, Tarre, Rosen, Ropes, Gables, Tinkers, shot Powder, Ordinaunce, Armoz, and of all other thinges necessarye saye that might be thought vpon, as Bootes, Clokes, Saddelles, Byddes, Bittes, Stirrops, and Stirrop leathers, scalyng Ladders, and a number of thinges mo that I can not reherce. Whosoener (sayth Froissart) that had bene there and had seene it, although he had bene right soze sicke, yet it woulde haue made hym to haue forgotten both hys disease and paine. The lustie yonkers of Fraunce talkyng among themselves, had almost none other talke, nor made none other accompt, but that the Realme of England should haue bene vtterly spoyled and destroyed for euer and euer, without all mercie and recouerie.

A great number of shippes.

Of this great preparation and prouision the king of England and his counsaile were well informed, and the king was certainly assured that the French king would come into England, for so had he & his Nobles sworne. And although at the first heryng of thys wonderfull great prouision, it dyd somewhat abashe the Englishmen, which was no great maruyle. For as the matter of it self was very great, so the same was reported to be ten times much moze then it was. And agayne, although the Englishmen vnderstood of this great prouision, yet were they not in certaintie, whether the same was wholly purposed to lande in England, or else to laye siege to Calice both by land and sea. For the Englishmen knewe well that of all the Townes of the worlde, the French men most coueted to haue Calice: Wherefore the king of England sent to Calice great prouision of Wheat and other grayne, Salt, fleshe, fishe, wyne, Beere, and other thinges. And thether was sent Sir Thomas Holland Erle of Kent, Sir Hugh Cancell, Sir Wylliam Helman, Sir Dangoses, syr Walter of Wyne, Sir Water Hauille, syr Wylliam Concet, syr Lewes of Mountalbon, syr Colers of Dambzichecourt, and five hundred men of armes, and five hundred Archers, and the Erle Richard of Arondell, and syr Henry Spencer were ordeyned to keepe the Sea, with .xl. great shippes well furnished and trimmed with the number of thre hundred men of armes, and five hundred Archers.

Agayne an other report was bruted abroad that this army of the French being so furnished and appoynted, was not meant to go neyther to Calice, neyther yet into Englande, but rather was altogether purposed against the towne of Gaunt. And (sayth Froissart) as I was informed, the towne of Gaunt the same season doubted greatlye that all that prouision was to come vpon them: But they were in a wrong beleife, for the Duke of Burgoyne their Lorde meant towards them nothing but rest and quiet, although that Fraunces Aitremen were shortly after the making of the peace at Corney Bayne, which happened rather by his awone folye, then by any displeasure that the Duke ought vnto him: but because that matter doth not properly touche this our discourse for Englande, I therefore passe it ouer.

And now agayne to retorne to the prouisions that were made at thys season at Dan, and at Sluce, it is not had in remembrance of man, neyther in wytyng was euer the lyke seene or read of the charges of thys prouision, for sayth Froissart, Gold and siluer was as fast spent by the French king, as though it had reigned out of the Clouds, or that it had come out of the fume and skomme of the sea.

The French king himselfe, as yong as he was, had moze minde and desire to this iourney into England, then any other, and so he shewed himselfe alwayes to the ende thereof. And nowe to go forward, every man helped to make provision for other, and to garnishe and bewtishe their shippes, and to paynt them with their armes, and to aduance and make them a glorious shewe to the whole worlde. Painters at that time were well set on worke, and the time was to them very profitable, for they had whatsoever they desired, and yet there could not enow of them be gotten for money. They made Banners, Penons, Standards of silke, so sumptuous and comely that it was a maruell to beholde.

Great cost heavily spent.

Also they peynted the Mastes of their shippes from the one ende to the other, glittering with Golde, and deuises and armes that was maruelous ryche: and specially (sayth Froissart) as it was tolde me, the Lorde Guy of Tremoull so decked, garnished, and bewtisied his ship with peynting and colours, that it cost him two thousande Frankes of french money, that is more then C. C. xij. pound of the curraunt money of Englande. And in lyke maner did every Lorde of Fraunce set forth his deuise and shew.

And as it is before sayde, all that hath bene rehearsed, and whatsoever else was done in Fraunce concerning the aduancement of this iozney, was well knowen in Englande, which brought some feare among them, and therefore they caused dyuers generall processions to be made in every good Towne and Citie three times in the weeke, wherin prayer was made with feruent spirite and deuotion vnto almighty God to be their Protectour and shield agaynst their enemies, and the perill that the realme was then in. And yet notwithstanding, there were in Englande at that tyme more then a hundred thousand that hartely wished and desired that the Frenchmen myght arrive in Englande. And those lustie young laddes, as triumphyng among themselves and their companions would say, let these frenchmen come, there shall not one taylor of them returne agayne into Fraunce. And suche as were in debt and cared not for the payment thereof, they reioysing greatly at the coming of the frenchmen would saye to their creditors when they demaunded their debt of them, Sirs, be you pacient a little and beare wyth vs, for they forge in Fraunce newe floreyne wherewith ye shall be payde. And in trust thereof they luyed and spent very largely. And when they could not be credited, they would saye, what would ye haue of vs, it were better for you that we shoulde spend freely the goodes of this Realme, rather then the Frenchmen coming hether should finde and consume the same.

At thys time the king of Englande was in the Marches of Wales, and wyth him the Erle of Oxford, by whose aduise the greatest thinges in Englad were gouerned, & without whose aduise nothing in effect was done. Also there was wyth the king as chiefe of hys Counsaile, s<sup>r</sup> Symond Burle, s<sup>r</sup> Nicholas Braule, s<sup>r</sup> Robert Caillon, s<sup>r</sup> Robert Beauchamp, s<sup>r</sup> John Saluen, and s<sup>r</sup> Higbell de la Doole. Also there was named s<sup>r</sup> Wylliam Neuell, brother to the Lorde Neuell. All these as the talke went, did wyth the king what they would. And as for the kings Uncles, the Erle of Cambridge, and the Erle of Buckyngham could doe nothing wythout it were agreeable to the other aforesayd. And this trouble and difference among themselves was well knowne in Fraunce, which greatly aduanced the enterprize of the french king.

Now when the king and the Lordes of Englande were truely informed med that the french king was ready with his power to enter into England and to destroy it, then they drew together in counsaile. And the king at that tyme being in Wales, as aforesayde, was written vnto by his Uncles and other of the counsaile, that it was meete and necessary for hym to come to London where his Lords, and he might best consult for the weale and defence of his realme.

The king forthwith returned towarde London with the Quene hys wyfe, and came to Wynsoze, but shortly after, he came to Westmynster, and thether came vnto him all the Lordes of his counsaile, and there tooke aduice what thinges were to be done agaynst this iozney, and enterprize of the french king.

The king of England with his counsaile taketh aduice
for the defence
of England.

Then s<sup>r</sup> Erle of Sarisbury, who was a right valiant and prudent knight sayde before the king and hys Uncles, and before all the Lordes and prelates of England that were there present. Sir, my soueraigne Lord, and all ye my Lords and other, it ought not to be marueyled at if our aduersary the french king doe come and runne vpon vs, for sithen the death of our late soueraigne Lorde and noble king Edward, one of the purstauntest Princes that euer reigned, this noble realme of Englande hath bene in great hazard and aduerture to haue bene lost and destroyed euen with the lewde and naughtie people brought vp and nourished in the same, which thing is not hidden from Fraunce, and that which is worse, it is well knowne that war among oure selues are not in perfite loue and vnitie, and that maketh our enemy so bolde. And hereunto I wyll specially direct my speche, to moue and exhort that peace, vnitie, and loue may be had amongest our selues, and that being first had, and saythfully and louyngly graunted of every of vs, we shall the better deuyse the resistance and withstandyng of our forreyn enemies. And nowe to beginne wyth that matter. First it is meete that we ordeyne a sufficient power for the defence of all oure enemies at every Porte, Hauen and Creke, within this realme, that our Country receaue no dishonour blame nor damage. And then let vs with all diligence see well to the defence of all oure good Fortes, holdes, Cities and good townes, and endeour our selues to the good consideration and defence of the same.

The worthy
counsaile geuen by s<sup>r</sup> Erle of Sarisbury.

Nowe when the Erle of Sarisbury had ended his tale, his wordes and sayng was very well noted, as the wordes of a sage and valeant knight, and there was no replie made, but with one voice they consented to enter into deuises for defence. And first they thought it most meetest to provide for the defence of those Hauens where they thought the french king was most lykely to lande. And for that the Erle of Sarisburies possession in parte marched nere vnto the Isle of Wight, which is right ouer agaynst Normandie, and the Countrie of Caux, therefore he wyth his Archers and power was there placed for the defence of that frontire. The Erle of Denonshire was appointed to be at Hampton, with two hundred men of Armes, and. vij. hundred Archers, to defende the Hauen and towne. The Erle of Northumberland was placed at Rye, with two hundred men of Armes, and. vij. hundred Archers. The Erle of Cambridge was assigned to Douer, with. v. hundred men of Armes, and. xij. hundred Archers. And his brother the Erle of Buckyngham, at Sandwich with. vij. hundred men of Armes, and. xij. hundred Archers. The Erle of Stafford and the Erle of Dembrooke were assigned to Orwell haven, with .v. hundred men of armes, and .xij. hundred Archers. And sir Henry Percy, & foule Percy, were appointed to Portsmouth, with three hundred men of armes, and .vi. hundred Archers. And sir Symond Burle was appointed Capteyne of Dover Castell. All the Havens and Portes betwene the riuer of Humber, and Coznewall, were relieved with men of armes and archers.

And on the Mountaines and hilles all along the sea coast, byon the frontiers, lying agaynst Flaundrys and Fraunce, were placed certein numbers of watchmen, but in such maner (sayth Froissart) as I can not well describe: But as I heard, they had empty Pyppes filled with sande, one set byon another, and on the height of them was place made where the watch men might both stand and sit, and there they continued their watche both night and daye, hauyng alwayes speciall eye and regarde towarde the sea, hauyng in speciall charge that when they espyed any nauye of Frenchmen drawyng towardes them, that then they should cause certein Beacons beyng nere vnto them, to be set on fyre, that by reason thereof the people might be drawen the sooner to that place, to awayte for the enemye. It was also ordered, that if it fortuneth that the French nauie came, that they should suffer the French king peaceably to take lande, and all his, and to enter into the land three or foure dayes iourney, and that then they shoulde first go betwene the sea and them, and to fight with his shippes if they could, and to destroy them, and to take theyr prouision from them, and then to followe the Frenchmen, but not immediately to fight with them, and to harry them and keepe them wakyng, and to keepe them from goyng a foragyng, and from the destruction of the Country, and so also by diligent folowing of them, they should be brought to great lack and scarcetie. This was the opinion and order of this counsaile of England. And at that time also it was agreed, that Rochester bridge should be broken downe, where there is a great Ryuer runnyng from Arondell, in the County of Suffex, and entereth into the Thames, and so into the sea agaynst the Isle of Tenet: and this bridge they of London, to be the more sure, did beat downe.

And where as the taxes and tallages were great in Fraunce: In likewise at that tyme they were great in England, so that the realme felt great grieffe thereof. There were at that tyme ready in England for defense, of good fighting men, a hundred thousand Archers, and .x. M. men of armes.

Nowe the time approached, that euery man beganne in Fraunce to set forward, cryyng, and sayyng, Now let vs go on these cursed Englishe men, who haue done so many mischiefes and wickednesse in Fraunce, the tyme is at hande, that we shall be reuenged vpon them for the death of our fathers, brethren, and kinsmen, whome they haue cruelly slaine and discomfited. Then the French king tooke his leaue of the Queene his wife, and of the Queene his mother, and of the Duches of Orleans, and of all the other Ladies of Fraunce, and the same daye heard a most solempne Masse in our Ladie Church in Paris, and he sayde that he purposed neuer to returne againe to Paris, vntill he had bene first in England. And the next day early he rood to Senliffe: But all this while the Duke of Berry was still in his Countrie of Berry, although great prouision were made for him, both in Flaundrys and at Schuse. And likewise the Duke of Burgoyne was then in his Countrie, but he forthwith toke his leaue of the Duchesse, and of his children, and determined to take his leaue of his great aunt the Duchesse of Brabant, and so he departed out of Burgoyne, and roade in great estate, and the Admirall of Fraunce in his company, and sir Guy of Tremoyll, & so they came to Bruxelles, and there found the Duches of Brabant and other Ladies, who receyued him with great honour. And two dayes he taried there with them, and then tooke his leaue, and from thence he rood to Douins in Henault, and there he found his daughter the Ladie of Ostreuant, and Duke Albert, and his sonne, sir William of Henault Erle of Ostreuant, who receyued the Duke with great ioy, and so brought him to Valenciens. And the Duke was lodged in the Erles Palace, and Duke Albert in the lodgyng of Alconquet, and the Ladie of Ostreuant. And from thence the Duke roode to Doway, and so to Arras, and there he founde the Duchesse his wife taryng for him. Then the French king came to Compaigne, and so to Royon, and from thence to Peron, and so to Bapalmes, and so to Arras, and dayly there came downe people from all partes, in such great numbers that the Countrie was almost eaten vp. And to say truth, nothing remayned in the Countrie, but it was taken from them, without making any payment for the same. So that the poore Commons that had gathered together their coynes, had nothing left them but strawe, and that also was taken from them, and if they made any complaint thereof, they were eyther beaten or slaine. There Ponds were fished, there houses beaten downe for fyre wood: So that if the Englishe men had arriued in that Countrie, they could haue done them no more hurt, neyther was it likely that they would haue done so much hurt vnto them as the Frenchmen did. And when the poore pitifully called vpon them for some amendes, they answered, as nowe we haue no siluer to pay, but when we returne we will bring inough, and then euery thing shall be fully answered and payde. But when the poore people sawe their goodes thus taken away and spent, and that they durst not complaine thereof, they cursed them betwene their teeth, sayyng: Get ye into England, or to the deuill, and God graunt that ye neuer returne againe.

The French king came nowe to Lille in Flaundrys, and his two Uncles with him, the Duke of Burgoyne, and the Duke of Bourbon, for as yet the Duke of Berry was behinde in his awne Country, and made prouision for his iourney. And with the King at Lille was the Duke of Barre, the Duke of Lozeu, the Erle of Arminack, the Erle of Sauoy, the Erle Dalphyn of Anneringe, the Erle of Geneue, the Erle of Saint Paule, the Erle of Swe, the Erle of Longueuile, and other great Lordes of Fraunce, in such number as I am notable (sayth Froissart) to name them. The report was, that there should passe into England, .xx. thousand knights, and squiers, which certainly were a goodly company, also .xx. thousand Crosbowes, and .xx. thousand of other men of warre, which were persons that should enter into England, & remaine in the fielde, besyde all the full furniture of the whole nauie vpon the sea. And at this tyme sir Oliuer Clifson was in Briteyn, and prouided there for his businesse and nauie, and was appointed to bring with him the Closure of the fielde made of Tymber, wherof mencion is made before. And with the sayde sir Oliuer Clifson Countstable of Fraunce, shoulde come out of Briteyn the best knightes and Esquiers therein, as the Account of Rheau, the Lorde of Rays, the Lorde of Beawmanour, the Lorde of de la

Gale, the Lorde of Rochefort, the Lorde of Malestroyt, sir John of Malestroyt, and sine hundredth Speares Britons chosen men of warre. For it was the Constables purpose and entent, that no man should enter into England, without he were a man of armes chosen. And he gaue charge to the Admirall, saying: take hede that ye charge not our Shippes with Verlettes and boies, for they shall do more hurt then profite. So that two or thre knightes, without they were great maisters & Capitaynes, although they hyred ships for their money, yet should they haue but one horse ouer, & one Verlet. And to say the truth, they ordeyned all theyr busynesse in so good order, that dyuers were of that opinion, that if they might arriue altogether in England, where as they entended to lande (and that was at Orwell Hauen) howe that they should haue put the Countrie in great feare, and so they should haue done without all doubt. For the great Lordes both spirituall and temporall, & the people of the good towne of England were in great doubt: But the Commons and poore people made small accompt thereof, no more did the poore Gentlemen, for they desyred the warre, eyther to lease, or to winne all. And they sayde one to another, I trust God hath sent vs a good tyme, for that the frenche king will come into this Countrie, he sheweth himselfe to be of a valiaunt courage, and we haue not heard of thre hundredth yerres past, of a french king of like courage, but he doth it to make his souldiours good men of warre: And we thanke him that he will thus visite vs, for now we shall attaine to some riches, or else shortly make an ende of our lyues.

Nowe the frenche king came downe to Lisse, to shewe that the iorney pleased him, and to come the neerer to his passage. And it was commonly spoken in flaudyrs, and Arthoys, that the french king and his armie taketh Sea on Saturday, on Mondaye, one Tuesday, so that every daye in the weeke it was sayde, he departeth to morowe. And the kinges brother, the Duke of Thourayn, and the Bishop of Beauoys Chancelour of Fraunce, and dyuers other great Lordes tooke their leaue of the king at Lisse, and they returned to Paris, and it was sayde, how that the king had geuen and committed the gouernaunce of the Realme of Fraunce to his sayde brother the Duke of Thourayne, and to dyuers other Lordes, as the Erle of Bloys and other. And yet all this time the Duke of Berry was behinde, and came fayre and softly, for he had no great appetite to this iourney of going into England: But his long taryng was very displeasaunt vnto the king, and to the Duke of Burgoyne and to the other Lords, for they would fayne haue bene gone. Still great prouision was made, which was very costly and dere vnto them, for that which was not woorth two shyllings, they payde .x. shyllings, and yet they would nedes haue it, for every man desired to be well furnished, in maner of an enuie that euerie man desyred to be better appointed then other. And though the great Lordes were well payde their wages, or their poore felowes bought the bargayne full dere, for some had owyng vnto them for a Moneths wages, and yet could get nothing. The Treasorer of the warres and Clerkes of the Chamber of accompts sayde. Sirs, content you vntill the next weeke, and then ye shall be payde, and so they were answered weekly. And if any payment were made vnto them, it was but for euight dayes, when they were owyng eyght weekes. So that some of the wiser sorte, when they sawe thys maner of dealyng, and howe they were so

euill payde, they were much offended and sayde, this boyage will be of small effect: For it is most lykely, or at the least to be greatly suspected, that so sone as the money is collected and gathered of suche taxes as were set, that then they will breake this iorney and retorne home agayne into their awne countreyes, and those which cast these doubts, and prouided for themselves, were wise. But the poore Gentlemen and common souldyours, who had spent all that euer they had, and euery thing was so deere in flaudyrs, that hard it was to get eyther bread or drinke, and specially if any were in suche neede (as there were a great number) to sell his armour to make money of, there was no person to buy it, neyther was there anye money to geue him for it. There was suche and so great a number of people about Dan, Bruiges, and Ardenburgh, and specially at Scuse, that when the king came thether, they wist not where to lodge him. The Erle of saint Daule, the Lorde of Cowcy, the Lorde of Anuergne, the Lorde de Antoigne, and dyuers other Lordes of fraunce: and to lye the more at their ease, they were lodged at Bruiges, and dyuers times they resorted to the king at Scuse, to knowe when they should departe. And euer it was sayde vnto them that within thre or foure dayes, or when the Duke of Berry doth come, and also that we haue winde to serue vs. And thus euer the time passed, and the dayes shortened, and the yere beganne to waxe soule, and colde, and the nightes long, the which expence and losse of time muche greued and offended the Lordes, not onely for that their charges were great, but also most chiefly for that by their long taryauce, their victualles much diminished.

And in this meane time Lyon King of Armony: who being in fraunce, and had assigned vnto him by the french king sixe thousande frankes by the yere, which is one thousand Marke of the curraunt money of England, toward the maintenaunce of hys estate. And at this time he tooke on him for a good entent to go into England to speake wyth the king there, and his counsaile, to see if he might perswade anye maner of peace to be had betwene the two realmes of Englande and fraunce. And so he departed from his lodging of Saint Aulbyn beside saint Dionise, onely with his awne company and without any great furniture: and so he roade to Bolleigne, and there he tooke shyping, and landed at Douer, where he founde the Erle of Cambridge, and the Erle of Buckyngham, and mo then an. C. men of armes, and two thousand Archers, who laye there to keepe that passage. For the brute went that the french king would lande there, or else at Sandwich. And at this time the king of Englande laye at London, and parte of his counsaile with him, and daylie heard tydings from all the portes of England.

When the king of Armony was arryued at Douer, he had there good cheere, because he was a straunger, and so he came to the kinges Uncles, who receaued him right honorably. And at tyme conuenient they demaunded of him from whence he came, and whether he would. The sayde King of Armony sayde, that in trust of goodnesse he was come thether to see the king of Englande and his counsaile, to treate for peace betwene Englande and fraunce, for he sayde he thought that the warre was not meete, for he sayde by reason of the warre betwene these two Realmes, which hath endured so long: The Sarazens, Jewes and Turckes are wahren proude, for there is none that maketh them any warre, by reaso wherof I (saith he) haue lost my lande and realme, and am not lyke to recouer it agayne without there were firme peace in all christendome. And I would gladly shew this matter which in effect toucheth all christendome, vnto the king of Englande and to his counsaile, as I haue done vnto the french king. Then the kings Uncles demaunded of him if the french king had sent him hether or no: he answered and sayde, nay there is no man that sent me, but I am come hether by mine awne motion, to see if the king of England and his counsaile would any thing bende to the intratie of peace. Then it was demaunded of hym where the french king was: he answered I beleue he be at Schluse. I saw him not since I toke my leaue of him at Schluse. The he was demaunded how he could make anye entreatie of peace, hauing no powere so to do: And they sayde moreouer vnto him, if ye be conueyed to the king our Nephew, and to his counsaile, and the french king in the meane season should fortune wyth hys puyssaunce to enter into England, ye may hap thereby to receaue great blame, and your person to be in great iopardie with them of the Countrie. Then the king answered, I am in suretie of the french king, for I haue sent vnto hym, desyryng that vntill I returne agayne, not to remoue from Schluse. And I repute him so noble, and so well aduised, that he wyll graunt my desyre, and that he will not enter into the Sea vntill I returne agayne vnto him. Wherefore, right honozable and valiant gentlemen, I pray you in the instance of loue and peace, to conuey me to speake with the king, for I desyre greatly to see him: Or else ye that be his Uncles, if ye haue aucthority to geue me aunswere to all my demaundes. Then the Erle of Buckyngham sayde, Syr king of Armony, we be here ordeyned to keepe and defend thys passage and frontier of Englande, and we haue no charge to meddle anye further with the businesse of the realme, without we be otherwise commaunded by the king: But syr ye be come for a good entent into this countrie, and ye are right hartely welcome. But syr, for any certaintie of aunswere ye can haue none of vs, for as now we be not of the counsaile. But we will cause you to be conueyed to the king without perill or dammage. The king thanked them and sayd, I desire nothing else but to se the king & speake with him.

The next day the king of Armony was conueyed with a good conduct that the Lordes appointed vnto him for feare of any rencountres. And at the last he came to London, and ryding thorough London, he was well receaued because he was a stranger. And when time was conuenient, he was brought to the king, who lay then at the Royall, which was then the Quenes Wardrobe, neere vnto Watlyngstreete in London.

When the comming of the king of Armony was knowne, the kings counsaile drewe to the king, to here what tydings the king brought in that troubleous season. When the king of Armony was come into the kings presence, he made his due salutations, and then began to shew the present estate of fraunce, and how he was come from thence, specially to see the king of Englande, whome he had neuer sene before, and sayde, howe that he was right ioyous to be in his presence, trusting that some goodnesse should grow thereby. And then he vttered with many wordes, that to withstand the great daunger of the present mischiefe that was lykely to happen to England, therefore he was come of his awne good will to do some good therein if he might: not sent from the french king, but wylling to set some accorde and peace be-twene the two realmes of Englande and fraunce, if he might.

And the Lorde Chauncelour shortly aunswereed him and sayde, syr king ye are welcome into this realme, for the king our soueraigne Lorde and all we are glad to see you here: But syr, we saye that the king hath not here all his counsaile, but shortly they shall be here, and then ye shall be aunswereed, and so for that time the king of Armony departed. And within foure dayes after the king remoued to his Palayce of Westmynster, and thether came to him all his counsaile, and also the king of Armony.

And when he was come into the presence of the king of Englande, and his counsaile, the king caused the king of Armony to sit by him. And there the king of Armony reherfed agayne the requestes that he made, and also shewed wisely howe that all Christendome was decayed and weakened by occasion of the warres betweene Englande and fraunce, and how that all the knightes and squiers of both the realmes entended and prepared themselves to nothing, but alwayes to be of the one parte or the other, whereby the Empire of Constantinople leeseeth, and daylie is lyke moze to leese. And then he shewed, by reason of thys warre he hymselfe had lost all his realme of Armony, and therefore desyred for Gods sake that there might be some treatie of peace had betwene the two realmes of Englande and fraunce.

The Archebishop of Cauntorbury, who was appoynted to aunswere him, said: sir king of Armony, it is not the maner nor neuer was seene, betwene two such enemies as the king of England, and the french king are, that the king our soueraigne Lord should be requyred of peace with his enemy, and he hauing in readinesse an huge armie to enter his land. Wherefore sir, for aunswere vnto you, if it will please you to returne to the french king, and to cause him and all his puyssaunce to withdraw themselves backe agayne into their awne Countreyes, and when euerye man is at home, if it please you to returne agayne hether, then we will gladly entend to your treatie. And this was the aunswere that the king of Armony had, and so he dyed with the king of England, and had as great honour done vnto him as could be deuised. And the king offered him many riche giftes of Golde, and siluer, but he would take none, although he had neede thereof, but onelye a Rynge to the value of a. C. frankes, which was in English money. xj. pound or thereaboutes.

And after dinner he departed, and toke his way to Douer, and there toke leaue of such Lordes as were there, and so toke his passage and came to the french king, and shewed him how he had bene in England, and what answer he had there. But the french king & his Uncles toke no regard to any thing that he sayde, and therefore sent him back agayne immediately into fraunce.

Shortly after, the Duke of Berry toke his leaue at Paris, & sayd that he would neuer enter there again vntill he had bene in England, although it appeared that he thought nothing lesse. And all the way as he came, he had letters from the king, & from the Duke of Burgoyne to hast him away: But yet notwithstanding he hastid fayre & easely, and came by small iourneyes. And in this tyme the Constable of fraunce departed from Lentringer, standing on the sea side in Britaine, with a great number of men of armes and prouision. He had lxxij. great Shippes, and he had with him the Clofure of the fielde made of Tymber. And the Constable and his companie had good winde at the begynnynge: But when they approached neere to England, the winde rose so fiercely and was so tempestuous about the entrie of Dergate, & the Chamys mouth, that whether they would or not, their shippes were scattered, so that .xx. kept not together, and some were driuen perforce into Chamys, and there were taken by the Englishe men, and specially there was taken two or thre shippes laden with part of the Closure of Tymber that was ordeyned to close in the fielde, and certeine maister Carpenters and Artificers with them, & so they were brought to London, wherat the king had great ioy, & so had all the Londoners. But the Constable and other Lords with much paine came to Scuse to the french king. Of the Constables commynge & his companie, the french king was right ioyfull, and the king sayd vnto him: sir Constable, when shall we depart, certainly I haue great desyre to see England, & therefore I pray you set forth all things with spede, for mine Uncle the Duke of Berry will be here within these two dayes. Sir, quoth the Constable, we cannot depart vntil the wind serue vs, & againe the tempest is soze and great: Then said the king, I haue bene in my bessell vpon the sea, & the ayze therof please th me right wel, & I beleue I shal be a good mariner, for the sea did me no hurt. In the name of God, quoth the Constable, it hath done hurt to me, for we were in great perill coming from Briteyn hether. The king demaunded how so: Then the Constable sayd, by fortune of the sea, and great windes that rose against vs vpon y frontiers of England. And sir, we haue lost both of our shippes & men, for the which I am right soze, but now there is no remedy. Thus the king and the Constable deuised in words: But still the tyme passed away and winter approached, and the Lords lay there in great cold and perill. The Flemynge also were very loth that they should retorne againe through their Countrie, and said among them selues: why the deuill doth not the french king passe into England: what meaneth he to tary so long in this country: Are we not poze enough, though the french king make vs no poze: And to be short, all the whole Country of Flaundrys began to mutter and cry out vpon them,

At the last the Duke of Berry came to Scuse to the king, and the king sayd vnto him. A good Uncle, I haue bene greatly desirous to see you, why haue you taried so long: We had bene as nowe in England, and had fought with our enemyes if ye had bene come. The Duke began to smile and excuse himselfe, but did not vtter what was in his minde. But there they rested .viij. dayes, and euery day it was sayde, that they should depart to morowe. Howbeit, truly the wind was so contrary, that they could not sayle into England. And winter was farre on, for it was past Saint Andrewes tyde: and it was no good season for the Noble men to take the Sea, although diuerse of theyr Shippes were redy crossed to depart. But then the kinges counsaile drewe together, and the Duke of Berry brake all this purpose, and sayde flatly that it was not meete to counsaile the french king beyng but a childe, to take the sea at that season of the yere, and also that the boyage was hindered of much of their prouision that was taken into England, that went with the Constable of Fraunce. And moreouer he sayde, call all the Mariners together, and looke if all they will not say that my counsaile is good. For though we be now .xv. C. goodsaile of Shippes, yet before we come there, we shall not be thre hundred in companie, and therefore consider what perill we shall put our selues in, and namely in a straunge Countrie, wherein before we haue not trauayled. And in the ende they concluded to differre that boyage vntill Aprill, or May next folowynge, and their prouisions of Bisquet, Salt, Beefe, & Wine should be safely kept vntill then. And so brake vp this most wonderfull boyage for this tyme, which cost the realme of Fraunce a hundred thousande frankes, thirtie tymes tolde (sayth Froissart) which of Englishe money was CCC. xxxiiij. thousand. CCC. xxxiiij. pounde. vi. shillings. viij. pence, after it. Franckes to the pound.

And in this yere, as sayth Fabian, the Erle of Arondeil was sent into the Duchy of Guyan, for to strength such souldours as the king at that tyme had in those partes, or as some wrote, to kepe the Seas from Routers, & enemies. The which Erle in keepynge his course and passage, met with a great fleete of Flemynge, laden with Rochell Wine, and set vpon them, and distressed them and their shippes, and so brought them into diuerse Portes of England. By reason whereof, the sayde Wine was so plentiful in England, that a Tonne thereof was solde for. xiiij. shillings, foure pence, and for. xi. shillings to take the choise. And in that fleete was taken the Admirall of Flaundrys, which remayned here long after as prisoner.

Ye haue heard before in the beginning of the .x. yere of this kings reigne that a great counsaile was holden at Pottyngham, and vnto the same were called the chiefe Justices and Sergeants at lawe, and that there was proponed certaine articles against the Lordes of the realme that were admitted by Parliament to haue the examination of suche as had bene lewde rulers, and such as had the gouernment of the kings treasure, and that the same articles, as before may at large appere, did specially touch the luyes of the sayd honorable personages, & that by the sentence and iudgement of the lawyers they were all condemned as Traytors. The which when the sayde Lordes understood, they assembled themselves together and agreed for the safetie of themselves, and for the better gouernement of the realme to gather suche power as they might, and to resort vnto the king, and to admonish him to remoue and aduoyde from him all such lewde counsaillors as before had bene complayned vpon in Parliament, as afore sayde, and also in all humble manner to beseech his highnesse to hearken to their complaynts agaynst the sayd euill counsaillors, which not onely sought the vtter destruction of the realme, but also of his royall person.

The king hering of this assembly, came to London in Nouember, being accompanied with all the afore sayde lewde counsaillors, and there purposed to haue holden a parliament, and to haue attaynted the afore sayde Lordes, which in the last parliament were appointed and aucthorised to haue the examination of suche as had consumed and made awaye the kings treasure, as afore sayde: But the king hering of the Lords approaching with a great puissance, steyed in such sorte as that parliament went no farther. Notwithstanding the king caused to be made, that no Citezene of London should be so hardie to sell to the Duke of Gloucester, the Erle of Arondeil, or anye other the Lords, any harnesse, Bowes, Arrowes, nor anye other munition or matter that should tende to the furniture of the warre, vpon a great paine.

But this notwithstanding, the Lords with a goodly company well furnished, came to London: and before they approached neere to the Citie, they sent vnto the King the Archbishop of Cauntorbury, the Lord John Louell, the Lord Cobham, and the Lord John Eueror requiring to haue deliuered vnto them such as were about him, Traytors and seducers both of him and the realme, and troublers both of poore men and riche, and such as sowed discordes and variaunces betwene the king and his nobles: And they farther declared that their comming was for the honour and wealth both of the king and the realme. But the king ruled by his syue euill counsayloz, was perswaded that the Lordes intended to bring him vnder: Therefore they gaue him counsayle to make the king of Fraunce sure friend vnto him in these great necessities, and for to be more in quiet, to giue him the Towne and Marches of Calice, and whatsoever he had else beyond the Seas, and so to call in the french king to chastise his enemies, and those Lordes that neuer would be fained. And immediatly the king sent for the Maior of London, and demaunded of him how many hable men he supposed that the Citie coude make? And he answered that he thought surely within an houre to haue fiftie thousand, well then sayd the king, go and proue what will be done. And after the Maior beganne to attempt the matter, the Citezens answered with one voyce, that they would neuer fight agaynst the kings friendes and defenders of the realme: But agaynst the kings enemies, and the enemies of the realme they would alway be readie, which answer the Maior reported to the king. At this time also was about the king the Lord Raufe Bassett, which sayde franchly to the king, sye I haue bene and shall be your true liege man, and my bodye and goods shall alway be yours in all iustice and truth: But of thys I assure you, if it fortune me to come into the field, vndoubtedly I will alway folow the true part, and it is not I that intend to aduenture the breaking of my head for the Duke of Ireland. Also at the same tyme was the Erle of Northumberland with the king, which sayd vnto him, sye no doubtis therof, but these Lordes which now be in the field, alway haue bene your true and faithfull subiects and yet be, and entend not to do or attempt any thing agaynst your estate, wealth and honoz: But they feele themselues sorowfully greued by the wicked imagination and false oppression of certayne persons which are about you. And sye, without fayle all your realme is sore moued therewith, and that both great and small, as well your nobles as your commons. And I see none other but they entend to aduenture their lyues with the Lordes, specially in this case, which they doe recon yours & your realmes. And sye, now ye be in the chiefe place of your realme, and in the place of your coronation, nowe order your selfe wisely and like a king, and send vnto them to come into your presence in some open place, and there will them to declare vnto you the entent of their comming with so great a number to these parts, and I doubt not, but they will shewe suche reasons, that you shall haue them excused.

The Archebishop of Cauntozbury and Bishop of Ely Chaunceloz, and other Bishops there present, affirmed the Erles aduise to be good, and the king considering wisely the case as it stode, appeased himselfe, and accorded to their aduise, and desyred the Archebishop of Cauntozbury and the Bishop of Ely to aduertise them of his pleasure, which was: that he willed them to come vnto him to Westmynster the Sunday solowynge, and so they tooke their leaue of him and returned vnto the Lordes, and made vnto them relation of all the king's minde. The Duke of Gloucester and the other Lordes were were so stiff in their matter that they swoze all wholly that they would neuer leaue of as long as they had one penny to maintaine their cause. And if any of them happened to die, the ouer lyuers should doe the same vntill the time that this matter were brought to good effect: And because they were in doubt that the king by his sinister counsayle should stirre the City of London agaynst them, they first determyned to certefie the Maior and the Citie that their comming was for reformations of great and enozme causes, which they declared vnto the sayd Maior and Citezens in wryting, and desired their fauours and counsayle therein. And this done, they farther determyned to kepe their daye on the Sundaye followynge to come to the kinges presence. And according to the same appointment the sayde Lordes came into the Hall at Westmynster. But before their comming thether, they sent certayne persons to serche both the Hewes, and also the Archebishop of Yorkes place, if percase any man had bene layde there to betrap them. For it was shewed vnto them that in those places there should be some treason wrought agaynst them. And when they perceyued that all was cleere, they went forth on their way. And when they entred into Westmynster hall, and had sight of the king, they made vnto him humble obeysaunce, and so went they forth vntill they came to the nether step going by to the kings seat of estate, where they made their second obeysaunce, and then the king made them a countenance to come nere vnto him, and they so did, kneeling downe before hym. And he forthwith arose from his place, and louingly welcommed them, and tooke ech of them by the hand, and that done set him downe againe. There they declared vnto him that their comming was for none euil to his person that euer they imagined or thought: But the cause of their grieue was agaynst the fyue Traytors which were about his person, and suche matters as they had to charge them was there ready in wryting, which they deliuered vnto the king. There the king openly promised them that they should appere personally at the parliament, and that none of them should haue of him pardon without the assent of the Lordes, if they had offended according to their accusations. And then forthwith the king arose from his place, and led them to his chamber, and after that he had dronken with them, they departed. And for as much as it should be well knowne throughout all the Citie that these Lordes had nothing offended him with their comming, the king caused a proclamation to be made, the effect wherof was as foloweth.

Richard by the grace of God. &c. We will that it be knowen to all our liege people throughout our Realme of England: That where as Thomas Duke of Gloucester, Richard Erle of Arondell, and Thomas Erle of Warwick haue bene defamed of Treason by certeyne of our counsayloz: We, as it apperteineth, diligently searching the cause and ground of this defamacion, finde no such thing in them, nor any suspicion thereof. Wherefore we declare the same defamacion to be false and vnttrue, and do receyue the same Duke and Erles into our speciall protection. And because their accusers shall be notoriously knowen, their names are Alexander Archebishop of Yorke, sir Lionel Vere (but in the boke of statutes he is called sir Robert Vere) Duke of Ireland, Adighell de la Poole Erle of Suffolke, Robert Tresilian chiefe Justice of Englands, and Nicholas Bymz of London knight: Who in likewise shall remaine vnto the next Parliament, and there shall stande to their
